Continuing Eligibility Division I

June 20, 2004

Session Overview

- Basic elements
- New academic requirements for student-athletes enrolling after August 1, 2003
- Case studies
- Waivers and exceptions
- On the horizon

First Things First

- Good Academic Standing
  - Determined by the institution for all students
  - Use the more strict of the rules you must follow: NCAA, conference and institutional

Case Study

- Gerty completed her freshman year in 2003-04.
- At the end of the year, she presented a 1.998 grade point average.
- The institution's minimum GPA is 1.900 and the conference requires a 2.000
- Is Gerty in good academic standing?

Case Study
Answer

- To be in good academic standing Gerty needed a minimum of a 2.000 GPA.
- She had a 1.998 GPA.
- Gerty in not in good academic standing.

Definition of Academic Year

- Official interpretation [Reference: 01/08/03].
  - The regular academic year shall be defined as the time beginning with the opening of the institution's fall term and concluding with the institution's spring commencement exercises.

New Academic Requirements

- Effective for those first entering any collegiate institution full time on or after August 1, 2003.
- Consist of both credit-hour and grade-point average minimums for each term of enrollment.
- Intent of new academic standards is to move student-athletes toward graduation within five years of initial full-time collegiate enrollment.

Elimination of Progress-Toward-Degree Triggers

- The following "triggers" have been eliminated:
  - Completion of one academic year in residence.
  - Using one season of competition.
  - Mid-year transfer.

- Trigger is now the student-athlete's full-time enrollment.

Six-Hour Requirement

- To be eligible for competition, a student-athlete must complete a minimum of six-semester or quarter hours of degree-applicable academic credit in the previous full-time regular academic term.
- Applicable to graduate students.
- Purpose is to ensure that student-athletes are in school each term and progressing toward a degree.

Case Study – Jess

- Jess is a soccer player.
- Has Jess fulfilled the six-semester hours required to be eligible for competition in fall 2004?

	Fall	Spring	Summer
2003-04	15 full-time hours	5 part-time hours	10 hours
2004-05	???

Case Study – Jess

- Yes. He completed at least six-semester hours in his last full-time term of enrollment (fall 2003).

	Fall	Spring	Summer
2003-04	15 full-time hours	5 part-time hours	10 hours
2004-05	Eligible

Case Study – James

- James is a cross-country athlete.
- Has James fulfilled the six-semester hours required to be eligible for competition in fall 2004?

	Fall	Intersession	Spring	Summer
2003-04	5 full-time hours	8 hours	5 part-time hours	6 hours
2004-05	???

Case Study – James

- Intersession hours cannot be used for the six-hour requirement.
- The six hours must be from a regular academic term.
- James is not eligible for competition in fall 2004.

	Fall	Intersession	Spring	Summer
2003-04	5 full-time hours	8 hours	5 part-time hours	6 hours
2004-05	Ineligible

"18/27"

- To be eligible for competition, a student-athlete must complete 18-semester hours or 27-quarter hours of academic credit during each regular academic year.
- Averaging no longer applicable.
- Summer hours are not applicable.
- Tied to start of the institution's third semester/ fourth quarter following the student-athlete's initial full-time enrollment.
- Purpose is to ensure student-athletes are earning hours like other non-athlete students in the "traditional" academic year.

Case Study – Wendy

- Is Wendy subject to 18/27?
- Does she meet 18/27?

	Fall	Spring	Summer
2003-04	12 full-time hours	6 full-time hours	6 hours
2004-05	???

Case Study – Wendy

- Yes. Wendy has completed 18 hours during the academic year.
- She is eligible under 18/27 fall 2004.

	Fall	Spring	Summer
2003-04	12 full-time hours	6 full-time hours	6 hours
2004-05	Eligible

Case Study – Lisa

- Lisa is a midyear enrollee.
- Is she subject to 18/27?
- Does she meet 18/27?

	Fall	Spring	Summer
2003-04	Was not enrolled	12 full-time hours	6 hours
2004-05	???

Case Study – Lisa

- NCAA Bylaws 14.4.3.1-(b) and 14.4.3.1.3
- 18/27 is tied to start of the institution's third semester/fourth quarter following the student-athlete's initial full-time collegiate enrollment.
- 18/27 is based on previous two semesters or three quarters of full-time enrollment.

Case Study – Lisa

- Lisa is not subject to 18/27 until the start of the third semester following her initial full-time enrollment.
- She is eligible in fall 2004 because she is not subject to 18/27 until spring 2005.

	Fall	Spring	Summer
2003-04	Was not enrolled	12 full-time hours	6 hours
2004-05		Subject to 18/27 at the start of this term.

Case Study – Brad

- Is Brad subject to 18/27?
- Does he meet 18/27?

	Fall	Spring	Summer
2003-04	12 full-time hours	Was not enrolled	6 hours
2004-05	???

Case Study – Brad

- 18/27 is tied to start of the institution's third semester/fourth quarter following the student-athlete's initial full-time collegiate enrollment.
- Brad is subject to 18/27 at the start of fall 2004.
- Since Brad has only 12 hours during the academic year, he is not eligible fall 2004.

	Fall	Spring	Summer
2003-04	12 full-time hours	Was not enrolled	6 hours
2004-05	Ineligible. Does not meet 18/27.

Case Study – Brad

- The institution may apply the missed-term exception in Brad's case.
- Institution may prorate 9 hours for spring 2004.
- With the inclusion of the 9 prorated hours, Brad has met 18/27 and would be eligible fall 2004.

	Fall	Spring	Summer
2003-04	12 full-time hours	Was not enrolled. Prorate 9 hours under missed-term exception.	6 hours
2004-05	Eligible under 18/27

Case Study – Terri

- May-mester begins during the academic year, but ends after commencement.
- Does Terrimeet 18/27? 24/36?

	Fall	Spring	May-mester	Summer
2003-04	12 full-time hours	3 full-time hours	3 hours	6 hours
2004-05	???

Case Study – Terri

- Terri completed a total of 24 hours, but only 15 during the academic year.
- Terri does not meet 18/27 and is not eligible for competition fall 2004.

	Fall	Spring	May-mester	Summer
2003-04	12 full-time hours	3 full-time hours	3 hours	6 hours
2004-05	Ineligible. Does not meet 18/27.

"24/36"

- To be eligible for competition, a student-athlete must complete a minimum of 24-semester or 36-quarter hours of academic credit prior to the beginning of the second year of enrollment.
- Tied to start of the institution's third semester/ fourth quarter following the student-athlete's initial full-time enrollment.
- Purpose is to position student-athletes to meet the 40/60/80 percentage-of-degree requirement.

Case Study – Ellen

- Will Ellen be eligible in fall 2004 under 24/36?

	Fall	Spring	Summer
2003-04	12 full-time hours	6 full-time hours	6 hours
2004-05	???

Case Study – Ellen

- Yes. Ellen has completed 24 hours before her second year of enrollment.
- She is eligible under 24/36 fall 2004.

	Fall	Spring	Summer
2003-04	12 full-time hours	6 full-time hours	6 hours
2004-05	Eligible under 24/36

Case Study – Carolyn

- Carolyn is a midyear enrollee.
- Is Carolyn subject to 24/36?
- Does she meet 24/36?

	Fall	Spring	Summer
2003-04	Was not enrolled	12 full-time hours	6 hours
2004-05	???

Case Study – Carolyn

- NCAA Bylaw 14.4.3.1-(a)
- 24/36 tied to start of the institution's third semester/fourth quarter following the student-athlete's initial full-time collegiate enrollment.

Case Study – Carolyn

- Carolyn is not subject to 24/36 until the start of the third semester following her initial full-time enrollment.
- She is eligible under 24/36 in fall 2004 because she is not subject to 24/36.

	Fall	Spring	Summer
2003-04	Was not enrolled	12 full-time hours	6 hours
2004-05		Subject to 24/36 at the start of this term.

Case Study – Josh

- Is Josh subject to 24/36?
- Does he meet 24/36?

	Fall	Spring	Summer
2003-04	12 full-time hours	Was not enrolled	6 hours
2004-05	???

Case Study – Josh

- 24/36 tied to start of the institution's third semester/fourth quarter following the student-athlete's initial full-time collegiate enrollment.
- Josh is subject to 24/36 at the start of fall 2004.
- Since Josh has only 18 hours, he is not eligible fall 2004.

	Fall	Spring	Summer
2003-04	12 full-time hours	Was not enrolled	6 hours
2004-05	Ineligible. Does not meet 24/36.

Case Study – Josh

- The institution may apply the missed-term exception in Josh's case.
- Institution may prorate nine hours for spring 2004.
- With the inclusion of the nine prorated hours, Josh has met 24/36 and would be eligible fall 2004.

	Fall	Spring	Summer
2003-04	12 full-time hours	Was not enrolled. Prorate 9 hours under missed-term exception.	6 hours
2004-05	Eligible under 24/36.

Case Study – Anne

- Anne is subject to 24/36, but she has completed 21 hours.
- Is Anne ineligible the entire year, or may she regain her eligibility at midyear?

	Fall	Spring	Summer
2003-04	6 full-time hours	12 full-time hours	3 hours
2004-05	Ineligible

- Bylaw 14.4.3.1.2
- If a student-athlete does not meet 24/36 prior to the third semester/fourth quarter following initial full-time enrollment, the student-athlete may become eligible at the beginning of the next term by earning the hours needed to total 24/36 during the two previous terms.

Case Study – Anne

- Anne would need to complete nine hours in fall 2004 to meet the 24-hour requirement.

	Fall	Spring	Summer
2003-04	6 full-time hours	12 full-time hours	3 hours
2004-05	Needs 9 hours

Percentage-of-Degree 40/60/80

- Start of third year – must have 40 percent of degree completed.
- Start of fourth year – must have 60 percent of degree completed.
- Start of fifth year – must have 80 percent of degree completed.
  - The "trigger" for meeting percentage of degree is dependent on the number of full-time terms of enrollment.
  - Mid-year certification is available.
  - Applicable to transfers.

Percentage-of-Degree
33/50/67

- Institution must identify as a five-year program.
- 150-semester or 225-quarter hours required.
  - Start of third year: 33 percent completed.
  - Start of fourth year: 50 percent completed.
  - Start of fifth year: 67 percent completed.
- Mid-year certification is still available.

“90/95/100” Rule

- A student-athlete must achieve the following minimum GPA:
  - Start of second year: 90 percent of GPA required for graduation.
  - Start of third year: 95 percent of GPA required for graduation.
  - Start of fourth and subsequent years: 100 percent of GPA required for graduation.
- Once responsible for a GPA requirement, must be certified on a term-by-term basis

Progress-Toward-Degree Waivers

- Cases heard by NCAA Division I Committee on Progress-Toward-Degree Waivers.
- Teleconferences held weekly for Division I.
- Staff decisions.
- Committee decisions may be appealed under specified conditions.

Tips for Filing a Waiver

- Submit to NCAA at least three weeks prior to student-athlete's competition.
- Use most recent application form.
- If submitting at end of term, attach grades for that term.
- If student-athlete is learning disabled, attach medical documentation.
- Documentation required for cases involving misadvice.

Tips for Filing a Waiver

- If student-athlete does not meet one-time transfer exception due to not meeting satisfactory progress at the first institution, a waiver may be requested by either the first or second institution, even if the divisions are different.
  - Helpful to have supporting documentation from institution not submitting waiver request.

Progress-Toward-Degree Waivers

- Factors Used to Determine Waiver Decisions:
  - Has SA achieved near compliance with the academic performance standards for which the waiver is being requested?
  - Is the SA still in a position to graduate within five years?
    - See www.ncaa.org for information related to analysis of quality-point totals to predict graduation.

Progress-Toward-Degree Waivers cont'd.

- Does the SA have a strong overall academic record?
- Did the institution submit a reasonable academic recovery plan for the SA?
- Has the SA previously received a waiver?
- What mitigating circumstances affected the SA's academic performance?

Committee Decisions

- Factors used in determining waiver cases:
  - Has student-athlete achieved near compliance with the academic performance standards for which the waiver is being requested?
  - Is the student-athlete still in a position to graduate within five years?
  - Does the student-athlete have a strong overall academic record?
  - Has the student-athlete made a good-faith effort?
  - Did the institution submit a reasonable academic-recovery plan for the student-athlete?
  - Has the student-athlete previously received a waiver?

Waivers and Exceptions

- Waivers.
  - Medical absence.
  - International competition.
  - Olympic games.
  - Learning-disabled/handicapped.
- Exceptions.
  - Missed term.
  - Mid-year enrollee.
  - Nonrequited/nonparticipant.
- Prorated at nine hours per term for new academic requirements.
- Prorated at 12 hours per term for old academic requirements (averaging only).

On the Horizon

The Work of the Continuing-Eligibility Subcommittee

Addressing Unintended Consequences of New PTD Requirements…

Under consideration…

- Proposal No. 2004-4
  - Creates exception to the six-hour requirement for SA in final year of degree program.

Effective immediately…

- Proposal No. 2004-5
  - Creates exceptions to the six-hour requirement for SA in study-abroad and co-op programs.

Addressing Unintended Consequences of New PTD Requirements…

- Timing of Certification Issues:
  - ARS Blanket Waiver through Spring 2005.
    - * Applies when posting or reporting deadline for grades is after first day of next regular academic term.
  - Certification prior to post-season events that occur between terms.

Additional Topics for Review…

- Use of nontraditional courses (e.g., distance learning, correspondence courses).
- Fourth season of competition for PQ and NQ SA's with learning disabilities.
- Others???

  Application of Proposal No. 2002-23 to a Transfer Student-Athlete from a Foreign Institution

  A transfer student-athlete must successfully complete the following progress toward degree credit-hour requirements after attendance at a foreign institution for the specified time to be eligible at the time of transfer to the certifying institution:

  - Equivalency of One semester - six semester or quarter hours.
  - Equivalency of One academic year - 24-semester or 36-quarter hours.
  - Equivalency of Three Semesters/Four Quarters - 30-semester or 42-quarter hours. The subcommittee noted that it would not be necessary for a transfer student-athlete from a foreign institution to complete six credit hours in the previous term of full-time enrollment.
  - A student-athlete who transfers from a foreign institution after completion of two or more years is subject only to the applicable percentage of degree requirements.

Case Study – Tom – 2005-06

To be eligible to compete during the academic year, Tom must satisfy the following:

Term	Requirement	Satisfied
Fall	Six-hour	6 hours (Spring 2005)
	% of degree	40 %
	GPA (90/95/100)	95 % (mid-year transfer)
Spring	Six-hour	6 hours (fall 2005)
	18/27	18 hours: 6 (fall 2005) + 6 (intercession) + 6 (spring 2006)
	GPA (90/95/100)	95% required

Case Study – Tom – 2006-07

To be eligible to compete during the academic year, Tom must satisfy the following:

Term	Requirement	Satisfied
Fall	Six-hour	10 hours (spring 2006)
	18/27	18 hours: 6 (fall 2005) + 6 (intercession) + 6 (spring 2006)
	% of degree	60% required
	GPA (90/95/100)	100% required
Spring	Enrolled part-time – not eligible.

To be eligible to compete during the academic year, Tom must satisfy the following:

Term	Requirement	Satisfied
Fall	Six-hour	15 hours (fall 2006)
	18/27	21 hours: 15 (fall 2006) + 6 (spring 2007)
	GPA (90/95/100)	100% required
Spring	Six-hour	9 hours (fall 2007)
	% of degree	80 % required
	GPA (90/95/100)	100% required

Thank you for attending!

Contacts at the Bookstore:
Bookstore Accounting - Cheryl Blake 2-2038
For general questions and to obtain book lists - Alison Johnson 2-4789
To speak with anyone at the front desk - 2-5024
If you need a book ordered for independent study for example - call Erica Eisodorfer 2-2420 in the Bulls Head Bookstore (downstaires in Student Stores) she will be able to make small orders as needed.

1. Always review the schedule to be sure that the books match the courses they are registered for.
2. Always be sure to check the scholarship list to make sure they are on book scholarship.
3. If they are purchasing a supply or dictionary, etc. copy the syllabus indicating that it is a required supply for the course and staple it to the book form.
4. There is a $600 limit per semester. They may call you to approve some forms that may exceed the limit. Obviously this is ok if they are purchasing required books.
5. Last day to purchase books this semester is Sept. 10. If they need books after this date, just write this notation and initial..."Approve beyond Sept. 10 deadline." Call Cheryl Blake to determine when this date will be set for each semester.

I have handled returns two ways. One is that they may return the book to you and then mark on their book form on file that the book was returned. Or ask them to return the book to the bookstore and bring back a receipt that indicates the transaction and staple it to their form on file. Students who drop courses must return their books.

The only problem that exists with several people signing the forms is where you choose to file them to prevent students from purchasing books twice by going to two different people for approval. I was able to catch this after the fact by filing all the forms in my office in abc order.

Sometimes students will want to purchase books for classes they are sitting in on and are not yet registered for. I normally don't like to approve those unless they say the have work due the next day.

If books are lost, we cannot purchase more books for them.

If books are stolen, before we purchase new books they must give you a police report. Then send the police report to Amy or myself and we will let you know when it is ok to reissue the books.

At the moment I can't think of anything else with regard to books. Let me know if you have any questions. I will email Alison and Cheryl to let them know that you all will be signing for books now.

Thanks,
Susan

Hey Guys!

Looks like the new SIS screens should be up and running. Let me know if you have any problems. Please take note of the comments in the attached email.

Susan,

Sorry it has taken a while to get this finished up. Modifications have now been completed in the "Test" Environment and rolled into Production for your use. The new screens will be available to you the next time you log into SIS.

Please see my notes below for some of the specifics about screen accesses. Screen 11R was requested multiple times for some people, and some people already had access to some of the screens your requested in your list. I did not give anyone access to screen 117 for the degree application because the same information is in screen 120 (which I did give access to) and is easier to use.

If you have questions, please let me know.

Thanks,
Gary

In the interest of the new curriculum and the renumbering of courses that has just taken place, access to these screens is critical to our job functions, i.e. the certification of NCAA eligibility, assessing progress toward degree and advising student-athletes through course registration. If additional information is necessary, please let me know. Confirmation of these additions would be much appreciated.

Subject: Award Winning Advisors

Dear Colleagues,

Each year, the Academic Advising invites students to nominate candidates for the /Minor-Mickel Shaw Excellence in Advising Award and the Class of 1996 Awards for Advising Excellence/. This year fifty-four advisors campus-wide received nominations. I am delighted to announce the 2006 advising awards winners:

Minor-Mickel Shaw Excellence in Advising Award
Amy Dye, Humanities and Social Sciences (Team 60)
Cheryl Junk, Fine Arts and Humanities (Team 95)
Beth Shuster, Basic and Applied Sciences (Team 70)

Class of 1996 Awards for Advising Excellence
Dick Cramer, Senior Team (85)
Gregory Gani, Carolina Environmental Program
Wayne Walden, Academic Support for Student Athletes

A special thank you goes to Jill Fallin for her technical assistance and members of the Awards Selection Committee for their time and deliberations. Members of the selection committee include: Nalin Parikh, Chair and Assistant Dean, Austin Rouse, Peer Advisor, Meredith Soles, Senior Advisor, and Kevin Stewart, Faculty Advisor, Department of Geological Sciences.

I extend my sincere thanks to all advising personnel for making this year a successful one.

Many thanks
Carolyn

All:

After a second look following the meeting of Faculty Council, I found something that I hadn't spotted during the meeting regarding the new credit hour requirements. The issue of interest is what is required to enter the 3rd, 4th, and 5th years (5th, 7th, and 9th semesters, respectively). Assume 120 hours required for graduation. I've tabulated below the UNC and NCAA requirements to be eligible to start those semesters.

3rd year (5th semester): UNC: 51 hours (42.5% of graduation requirement) NCAA: 48 hours (40% of graduation requirement)
4th year (7th semester): UNC: 65 hours (65% of graduation requirement)
NCAA: 72 hours (60% of graduatlion requirement) 5th year (9th semester): UNC: 105 hours (87.5% of graduation requirement) NCAA: 96 hours (80% of graduation requirement)

On its face, this says UNC requirements exceed those of the NCAA and the gap gets larger as work progresses. Depending on the exact wording of the UNC requriements, there may be some flexibility that I have not assumed in making this comparison. As I understand the NCAA requirements, the thresholds stated above are hours applicable to graduation in the student's major. I don't know whether the UNC requirements impose that same restriction. We should check.

Upon not very much reflection, I worry that these requirements might result in additional restrictions, perhaps even hardships, on people who change majors, people who double major, and people who take a major and a minor. I also think we should explore whether or not these requirements make it more likely that people will worry about accumulating hours more than they think about taking advantage of what the University has to offer.

Hi Robert,

The Academic Advising Guide is online. Please share with your staff. I think it is a good read for all advisors who are trying to advise students on the new curriculum. It has the endorsement of Jay Smith.

Mary, I think this would be a great topic for a coaches meeting.

Beth, I could not find the date of our May meeting. If we are meeting, what do you think about putting Mary in front of the coaches for 20 minutes to lay this out?

John,

I asked Coach Mock about the number of kids his team can handle with a low GPA. Perhaps some education for the coaches might be in order. Some think that the LD/ADD status is a bonus or a ticket, or perhaps a reason why the student has not done well. I try and divide the students into categories, under prepared, semi-prepared and prepared for the academic rigor of this place. Then I assess their 'handicaps', and what resources they might need to be successful here. I find that one predictor that can help is the IQ score, although not always available, I do find that the higher it is (100+ is good), the easier it is for the student to overcome the handicaps- even the most under prepared student. The students that I find struggle the most, are those with IQ's in the 90's, have both LD/ADD, and are seriously under prepared. Certainly socioeconomic factors (level of education of family members), appear to play into the mix as does student determination and character. The team culture (and coaches philosophy about academics) has an impact as well as other team members academic success/failure, these factors should not be underestimated or overlooked.

I am beginning to see some patterns in student success that we might be able to put into concrete terms, it might also be useful to draw up potential class schedules (from past experience) for these students(semester to semester). We need to make sure that they are set up for some success early on, confidence seems to be a big factor. Since we know that we will continue to see this type of student recruit, we should perhaps attack the issue in a straight forward, no nonsense, business approach. Pro-active and early intervention could be our most valuable strategy for the overall retention of these students.

Mary

Registration Policy to Change
New System Will Allow Student Athletes to Register Before Their Peers
By Amanda Erickson
Spectator Senior Staff Writer

April 12, 2006

Non-senior athletes will be able to register for classes before other students in their year during registration next week, under a new pilot program approved by the University.

The program, which was changed significantly on Monday, after members of the administration met with several student council members from the Columbia College Student Council, the General Studies Student Council, and the Engineering Student Council, will allow juniors and sophomores who play on varsity sports teams at Columbia the opportunity to pick classes earlier than the rest of their class. All seniors will pick classes at the same time, regardless of whether or not they play sports.

Smaller courses will be capped in order to ensure that there is space in core classes like Art and Music Humanities and in popular seminars for non-athletes.

Students in all four undergraduate schools received an e-mail informing them of the pilot program late Tuesday night.

Administrators hope the new policy will make it easier for athletes to put together a schedule that doesn't conflict with practice time. According to surveys done by the Athletic department, difficulty putting together a schedule is the number one reason students quit their sports teams.

"Athletes have less control over the timing of their activities [than other students]," University Provost Alan Brinkley said. "As an institution, we ask a lot of our athletes. We ask them to represent the University ... This is a small step to make it easier for athletes to be students."

But some student leaders said the regulations give an unfair advantage to some students while excluding others who have just as much difficulty putting together a schedule.

"It's really unfair," said Ellen Marrone, CC '08. "It doesn't take into consideration people on financial aid, people who need a job."

Others on club sports wish that they too had the option of choosing classes early.

"It's unfair," said outgoing squash team captain Bobby Ghosh, CC '06. On squash, "a big problem is that we struggle to find a common time to practice."

But administrators said that while every student at the University faces difficulty balancing jobs and extra-curricular activities with class schedules, student athletes are brought to Columbia to represent Columbia and therefore the University has a special obligation to make sure they are able to balance their academic and athletic lives.

"Clearly, there are costs to doing this," Brinkley said. But it must be "weighed against the tremendous disadvantage the athletes face if we do nothing."

Other students said changes to the system may benefit everyone.

It's the "first step in evaluation and improvement that will be made to the registration system," said CCSC student services representative Alex Green, CC '06.

And student athletes said the change will make a world of difference for them.

For lacrosse player Holly Glynn, CC '09, the chance to register early will help her pick her schedule. "We need it because our schedules are so demanding," she said. The last two semesters, "I had trouble registering ... because the classes I needed were full."

Athletic Director M. Dianne Murphy did not return calls asking for comment.

According to Lisa Hogarty, executive vice president of student and administrative services, the initial program will be evaluated at the end of the semester to see if changes need to be made for the fall.

The administration said the program is part of a larger effort to improve the quality of life for athletes, a push that has been going on since Murphy stepped up as athletics director, and former football coach Bill Campbell, CC '62, was elected chair of the Trustees of the University.

One goal is to better spread class times throughout the day. According to one University study, all political theory classes, five out of six comparative politics seminars, and almost 75 percent of history seminars were only offered after 2 p.m. during the 2005-2006 academic year.

Brinkley said he and others are working with the large departments like economics, political science, history, and English to better distribute class times. Both he and Hogarty said departments had seemed willing to look into making changes and were hoping to see some concrete results by next year.

Student leaders also expressed frustration that they were told about the new plan only days before it was to be instated.

CCSC President Michelle Oh, CC '06, said the council should have been consulted earlier. No Barnard students were present at the meeting, and SGA President M. A. Moutoussis said she was unaware that there was any change in the policy.

But Oh said that their feedback was taken seriously and resulted in a shift from the initial policy, which would have allowed all athletes to register before all students, to the current one.

"The primary concern from members of council was this: we understand that athletes have a serious time strain and scheduling strain," she said. "But should that trump seniority? Council members felt that [the agreed-upon policy] was a reasonable compromise."

Oh said student council reaction was mixed, spanning from enthusiastic support to more critical opinions

Athletic department's response pleases profs
Faculty member: Fact-finding businesslike

By ANTHONY GIMINO and JOHN MOREDICH
Published: 04.12.2006
The University of Arizona athletic department went fact-finding yesterday, interviewing professors who claim the former interim head of the classics department gave preferential academic treatment toward a UA athlete.
"They were businesslike, interested, professional, which is what I hoped it would be," said associate classics professor Gonda Van Steen. "They took it seriously."
Van Steen was one of eight professors in the classics department who signed a vote-of-no-confidence petition March 28 that called for the ouster of interim head Alexander Nava.
Nava resigned Monday.
Yesterday, Bill Morgan, in charge of compliance within the athletic department, and Doug Woodard, the faculty athletic representative, talked individually to those professors and others for more than two hours on campus.
"They were investigating very seriously," said associate professor of classics David Christenson. "They weren't there to argue with me."
Van Steen and Christenson said the athletic department representatives were especially interested in potential academic fraud by Nava and how the student-athlete in question became enrolled in graduate-level classes without sufficient prerequisites.
The student-athlete has not been named by the professors because of federal student privacy rights, but he is identified as Chris Rodgers, who is the only one who fits the description in the petition - a graduate student on the basketball team.
UA senior associate athletic director Kathleen "Rocky" LaRose set no timetable on the completion of the athletic department investigation. She said the Pac-10 was notified of possible problems "the second" athletic director Jim Livengood received the professors' petition.
"I will say this: It will be a very thorough investigation," LaRose said.
"We're not going to reach any conclusions until all the facts are in, and everyone who needs to be talked to has been talked to, and any data that needs to be pulled up is pulled up."
After the athletic department investigation is complete, LaRose said the next step is for UA to forward the findings to the Pac-10. If the athletic department has found any wrongdoing, it will recommend sanctions.
The matter is then reviewed by the Pac-10 compliance committee, which could accept those sanctions or add to them. Then the case could get moved to the NCAA, "who might have an additional say," LaRose said.
Rodgers, who earned his undergraduate degree in December, needed to take nine units of graduate-level classes to remain eligible this spring.
Rodgers has not returned phone calls or e-mails from the Citizen in the past two days.
LaRose said the athletic department monitors class schedules of its athletes to see if they fulfill NCAA requirements, but that the final course work is approved by an individual's college adviser.
A psychology major, Rodgers enrolled in nine graduate-level units in the classics department - three in a course in Greek and Roman Sculpture and another six in an independent study class, supervised by Nava, whose background is in religious studies.
Christenson and Van Steen allege that Nava's handling of independent study courses raises many red flags as potential for abuse.
Nava said yesterday he had 27 students in independent study classes this semester, including 11 student-athletes. Christenson and Van Steen said classics professors typically have less than five students in independent study.
LaRose declined comment on this specific case when asked if the athletic department was aware of potential problems prior to the March 28 petition in regard to student-athletes in independent study classes.
However, a Jan. 30 memo from the Undergraduate Council to university "deans, directors, department heads and faculty" warns that "irregularities in the use of independent study courses were recently brought to the attention of the Undergraduate Council."

In the petition, the professors say that the student-athlete was enrolled in independent study by Nava "without submitting the necessary paperwork." Christenson said Woodard, the athletic department faculty representative, was interested in Nava's alleged "end run" around the enrollment process.
"His actions are indefensible," Christenson said. "This is blatant and willful fraud, and I think that will come out eventually, if it has to."

Subject: Health Insurance Info Sessions

Attach: TEXT.htm; Header

FROM: Elaine Phelps, Director, Benefit Program Administration

Human Resources has scheduled six on-campus information sessions for employees who would like to learn more about the new health insurance options available this year (effective Oct. 1).

The following sessions are planned:

-- Monday, April 24, 2 p.m. in the School of Social Work auditorium (Tate-Turner-Kuralt Building)
-- Wednesday, April 26, 9 a.m. in the School of Social Work auditorium (Tate-Turner-Kuralt Building)
-- Thursday, April 27, 9 a.m. in Toy Lounge (Dey Hall)
-- Monday, May 1, 2 p.m. in the Hitchcock Room (Stone Center)
-- Tuesday, May 2, 2 p.m. in Toy Lounge (Dey Hall)
-- Thursday, May 4, 2 p.m. in the School of Social Work auditorium (Tate-Turner-Kuralt Building)

During each session, HR staff will present information on the available options, as well as several items employees should consider in making their selection. A question and answer period is also planned.

Employees are encouraged to attend these sessions if they have an interest; spouses are also welcome.
All information presented at the meetings will be available on the OHR web site on our 2006 Health Insurance Enrollment page: http://hr.unc.edu/Data/benefits/health-dental/health_enroll.

If you have additional questions regarding the health insurance options, contact the State Health Plan's customer service group at 800-422-4658. If you have questions about the information sessions, contact your HR Facilitator.

Cynthia, below is a list of our current NFL players. Can you tell me how many (and which ones) have graduated from UNC. For years, we have used a stat that said our NFL graduation rate is significantly higher that the league average. I'm trying to verify that for our coaches and get them some other numbers on these guys. Thanks.

I like your summary, Robert. I also like the open involvement of student groups and the willingness of the administration to advocate for this acknowledging the role of the student-athletes as university representatives was impressive. I would note that this is a pilot program so it will probably be watched closely. John

Good article - three things stand out - first the administration was willing to make a decision that would be unpopular to the non-athlete student body - second - they did not extend the benefit to Sr athletes (similar to our plan which is only for first and second years in a small population) - third - the decision appears grounded in the student -athletes representing the institution and less on the improving academics argument (guess they don't need that at Columbia). Good read - thanks John.

Registration Policy to Change
New System Will Allow Student Athletes to Register Before Their Peers
By Amanda Erickson
Spectator Senior Staff Writer

April 12, 2006

Non-senior athletes will be able to register for classes before other students in their year during registration next week, under a new pilot program approved by the University.

The program, which was changed significantly on Monday, after members of the administration met with several student council members from the Columbia College Student Council, the General Studies Student Council, and the Engineering Student Council, will allow juniors and sophomores who play on varsity sports teams at Columbia the opportunity to pick classes earlier than the rest of their class. All seniors will pick classes at the same time, regardless of whether or not they play sports.

Smaller courses will be capped in order to ensure that there is space in core classes like Art and Music Humanities and in popular seminars for non-athletes.

Students in all four undergraduate schools received an e-mail informing them of the pilot program late Tuesday night.

Administrators hope the new policy will make it easier for athletes to put together a schedule that doesnt conflict with practice time.

According to surveys done by the Athletic department, difficulty putting together a schedule is the number one reason students quit their sports teams.

Athletes have less control over the timing of their activities [than other students], University Provost Alan Brinkley said. As an institution, we ask a lot of our athletes. We ask them to represent the University ... This is a small step to make it easier for athletes to be students.

But some student leaders said the regulations give an unfair advantage to some students while excluding others who have just as much difficulty putting together a schedule.

Its really unfair, said Ellen Marrone, CC 08. It doesnt take into consideration people on financial aid, people who need a job.

Others on club sports wish that they too had the option of choosing classes early.

Its unfair, said outgoing squash team captain Bobby Ghosh, CC 06. On squash, a big problem is that we struggle to find a common time to practice.

But administrators said that while every student at the University faces difficulty balancing jobs and extra-curricular activities with class schedules, student athletes are brought to Columbia to represent Columbia and therefore the University has a special obligation to make sure they are able to balance their academic and athletic lives.

Clearly, there are costs to doing this, Brinkley said. But it must be weighed against the tremendous disadvantage the athletes face if we do nothing.

Other students said changes to the system may benefit everyone.

Its the first step in evaluation and improvement that will be made to the registration system, said CCSC student services representative Alex Green, CC 06.

And student athletes said the change will make a world of difference for them.

For lacrosse player Holly Glynn, CC 09, the chance to register early will help her pick her schedule. We need it because our schedules are so demanding, she said. The last two semesters, I had trouble registering ... because the classes I needed were full.

Athletic Director M. Dianne Murphy did not return calls asking for comment.

According to Lisa Hogarty, executive vice president of student and administrative services, the initial program will be evaluated at the end of the semester to see if changes need to be made for the fall.

The administration said the program is part of a larger effort to improve the quality of life for athletes, a push that has been going on since Murphy stepped up as athletics director, and former football coach Bill Campbell, CC 62, was elected chair of the Trustees of the University.

One goal is to better spread class times throughout the day. According to one University study, all political theory classes, five out of six comparative politics seminars, and almost 75 percent of history seminars were only offered after 2 p.m. during the 2005-2006 academic year.

Brinkley said he and others are working with the large departments like economics, political science, history, and English to better distribute class times. Both he and Hogarty said departments had seemed willing to look into making changes and were hoping to see some concrete results by next year.

Student leaders also expressed frustration that they were told about the new plan only days before it was to be instated.

CCSC President Michelle Oh, CC 06, said the council should have been consulted earlier. No Barnard students were present at the meeting, and SGA President M. A. Moutoussis said she was unaware that there was any change in the policy.

But Oh said that their feedback was taken seriously and resulted in a shift from the initial policy, which would have allowed all athletes to register before all students, to the current one.

The primary concern from members of council was this: we understand that athletes have a serious time strain and scheduling strain, she said. But should that trump seniority? Council members felt that [the agreed-upon policy] was a reasonable compromise.

Oh said student council reaction was mixed, spanning from enthusiastic support to more critical opinions

Colleagues.

Our graduate proposal has gone through an initial review by officials in the Graduate School (the latest version of that proposal is attached). Moving to the next stage will require us to add more details to our proposed curriculum offerings. On that score we are asking for you input in terms of course offerings.
a) We would like each faculty member to formulate a short, bullet list, or description of their research interests, so we can construct a compendium of faculty expertise roster that reflects our intellectual breadth and grounding.

b) We are asking each colleague to compose a description (3-4 sentences) of two courses you would be interested in developing and teaching at the graduate level. The course should fit into one or more of the specialization areas. Pease indicate the specialization area in which you think the course would fit best. Currently, the titles of the specialization areas are ("Race and Racism in the Modern World," "Political Economy of the Black World," "Gender, Sexuality, and the Body" "Cultural Production," and "Religion and Social Thought."

The proposed course could be
a) a graduate version of what you teach at the undergraduate level or

b) a new course area encompassing a current or newly developed area of research interest.

Please send your statement of research interests and your course descriptions to Agatha or Haeran by November 22.

Thank you

UNIVERSITY OF NORTH CAROLINA

REQUEST FOR AUTHORIZATION TO PLAN A NEW DOCTORAL OR FIRST PROFESSIONAL DEGREE PROGRAM

THE PURPOSE OF ACADEMIC PROGRAM PLANNING: Planning a new academic degree program provides an opportunity for an institution to make the case for need and demand and for its ability to offer a quality program. Authorization to plan and the planning activity to follow do not guarantee that authorization to establish will be granted. Requests (5 copies) may be submitted in accord with the schedule announced by General Administration. As of January 1, 2010 submission of proposals will be electronic.

1. Describe the proposed new degree program. The description should include:
   a. a brief description of the program and a statement of educational objectives

Our overall objective in establishing a Ph.D. in Global Africana Studies is to join the other prominent scholars and faculties at major research institutions who are fashioning our discipline into a fully functioning enterprise, developing scholars who will teach in programs and departments like ours in future years, while also contributing to building the discipline's body of research and knowledge. Moreover, graduates of this program will also be prepared for careers in a wide range of public and non-governmental organizations dealing with human rights, including access to justice, basic social services, and economic development.

Our approach will bridge historical separations between African Studies and African American studies and unite those fields within a framework that focuses on the experience and the agency of the peoples of African descent in the modern world from a historical and comparative perspective in general, and with respect to the impact of globalization on Africa and the African Diaspora in particular. As such, we also aim to address major gaps in current studies of the global experiences of people of African descent. These objectives shape the five areas of specialization our program will offer in "Race and Racism in the Modern World" "The Political Economy of the Black World," "Knowledge Production, Religion, and Social Change" "Cultural Production," and "Gender, Sexuality and the Body.

BACKGROUND

The Curriculum in African and Afro-American Studies was founded in 1969, a historical moment shaped by profound and sometimes disruptive change involving structures of opportunity and privilege when many institutions of higher education sought to define and embrace broadened, more inclusive, academic and social missions. The Curriculum, like other programs emerging in this milieu, reflected awareness of and sensitivity to curricular, pedagogical, and epistemological concerns connected to these broad transformations. Like some older disciplines, then (e.g., Sociology) African/African-American Studies emerged as a new field to fill the need to address and understand new structures, formations, and social realities produced by social change. In this context, African/African-American Studies has transformed and matured in ways characteristic of other new or emerging disciplines in the academic field, attending to tasks of establishing uniqueness, defining boundaries, establishing legitimacy and, finally, perpetuating itself by training new scholars in terms of its own perspectives, imperatives, and exemplars.[1] Thus, while academic content in African/African-American Studies curricula initially reflected reliance on other disciplines, as African/African-American Studies matured and appreciations of its inherent complexities grew, leaders in the field increasingly recognized the need for discipline-specific doctoral programs to create a critical mass of researchers who are committed to studying questions that lie at the heart of African/African-American Studies.

It is noteworthy that a disproportionately high number of these graduate programs have developed in prominent and highly ranked public and private universities. For example, the ten Ph.D. programs in African or African-American Studies include Berkeley, Harvard, Howard, Massachusetts, Michigan State, Northwestern, and Yale, while the 21 masters degree programs include Columbia, Cornell, NYU, Indiana, Ohio State, Syracuse, SUNY- Albany, UCLA, and Wisconsin. The proposed Ph.D. in African and African American Studies stems in part from the recognition that the Department must offer—in the very near future—an academic doctoral degree if UNC-Chapel Hill's program is to be counted among the leaders in the field. The Department of African and Afro-American Studies proposes to join with these prominent scholars and faculties who are increasingly willing to combine their commitment to African/African-American Studies as a distinct field with a determination to make it a full function enterprise among major research institutions, a goal that encompasses teaching and working with graduate students and training new scholars to carry on the process. With its prominence as flagship of the state system, not to mention its stature as a national model of public education, it is appropriate that UNC-Chapel Hill's Department of African and Afro-American Studies be among these leading-edge sites of knowledge production.

INTELLECTUAL RATIONALE

Establishment of this Ph.D. will thus uphold and advance the University's time-honored tradition of offering doctoral degree programs that are innovative, and preeminent in their respective fields. In that spirit, our plan will situate us to makes innovative contributions, given the existing and emerging approaches in the field. In African Studies, the interdisciplinary Ph.D. at Howard University focuses on contemporary policy and development issues facing Africa, while at the University of Wisconsin-Madison, the Ph.D. focuses on African Languages and Literature .At Temple, where the first African American Studies doctoral program went on line in 1988, the Afrocentric approach, seeking clear demarcation from other disciplines or paradigms, maintains dominance. The inclusionist approach that pairs or blends African American studies with established disciplines endures at the doctoral level in separate iterations at Yale, where is has been most visibly modeled, and at Harvard, where cultural studies paradigms are dominant. The Ph. D program at Massachusetts focuses on the black experience within the United States, while programs at Berkeley, Northwestern, and Indiana are framed by the concept of Diaspora, and Diaspora Studies, reflecting how the multiple forces and changes giving rise to an increasingly globalizing world and an evolving discourse on 'race' and its construction in the globalized 21st century, have occupied scholars in African and African American studies.

Our program is guided by a paradigm that deconstructs the historical separations between African Studies and Black (Africana/African American) Studies to connect the histories of Africa's descendants and incorporate their presences, locations, and agencies, in the globalized framework of emerging modern social orders. This approach, which incorporates the global emergence of structures of modernity (intellectual, political, cultural and economic) aims to fill major gaps in the studies of the global experiences of people of African descent—three of which we highlight here. First, such studies continue to facilitate the erasure and marginalization of people of African descent as constitutive actors in the making of the modern world and the historical process of globalization. Second, through neglect of the power dynamics characterizing the incorporation of people of African descent in the evolution of global structures, current perspectives have implied a naturalization of hierarchies created in this process. Third, the focus on people of African descent as subjects of structures of dominance has created a tendency toward marginalization of agency, where manifestations of direct involvement and initiative in the making of the modern world, tend to be placed at the margins.

Erasure and Marginalization

Despite increasing acknowledgement of experiences and contributions of people of African descent in the formation of modern world, there are nonetheless practices that continue to facilitate the exclusion of people of African descent as constitutive actors in these processes. These practices of marginalization and erasure have significant intellectual, social and political effects. We hope that our graduate program will fill this gap and in the process greatly contribute to a historically grounded inter-cultural understanding of the varied but yet interconnected histories of the whole human family that have gone into the making the modern world order. Such an approach to the study of the experiences and contributions of people of African descent to the evolution of the modern world will make a significant contribution to UNC-CH's efforts to foster intellectual inquiry that emphasizes the shared but different histories of various peoples of the world. Further, the approach will greatly contribute to our students' emergence as critical and grounded global citizens who are equipped to handle the multi-layered issues facing our interconnected world.

Naturalization of hierarchies

The second gap involves the tendency of dominant perspectives to neglect the power dynamics characterizing the incorporation of people of African descent in the evolution of the modern world hierarchies and in the process naturalize this process. These perspectives abstract people of African descent from the modalities of this structure and the making of nation-states: thus enabling the reproduction of the representation of people of African descent as "people without history" to borrow from Eric Wolf's pertinent phrase.[2] Our approach to the study of people of African descent emphasizes not only the nature of their incorporation within such an order through the processes of slavery and colonialism, but also their incorporation in place-based power structures such as nation-states' citizenship regimes and other social orders. Filling this gap, our proposed graduate program aims to provide rigorous historical analysis of the cultural, political and economic experiences of people of African descent in the context of the making of the modern world.

Agency

While being subjects of structures of dominance has been one side of the experiences of people of African descent, manifestations of agency have been the other side of their involvement in the making of modern world cultural, social, and religious orders. Yet, their agency tends to be placed at the margins of human agency driven studies that underpin social movements, civil society discourses, and other intellectual projects. Consequently, in highlighting the centrality of the political agency of people of African descent in the making of the modern world our graduate program will fill a third major intellectual gap in dominant studies on their cultural, political and economic experiences. In the realm of ideas, intellectuals of African descent have been at the forefront in offering rigorous studies of power dynamics both at the national and global level. Further, intellectual cultural producers in the fields of literature, music and cinema have played a significant role in documenting the social change and the role and responses of people of African in this process. Cultural producers in places such as the USA (Toni Morrison), the UK (Armet Francis), Kenya (Ngugi wa Thiong'o), St. Lucia (Derek Walcott), Senegal (Sembene Ousmane) and Canada (George Elliott Clarke), among other parts of the global diaspora, have produced works that not only have lead people of African descent to study and understand cultural, political and economic processes of their prevailing society and the world at large, but also to imagine and engage in projects aimed at organizing their societies and global society in ethical ways. In addition to the political agency of intellectuals drawn from a range of disciplines, counter-consensus movements emerging from religious traditions (such as Christian and Islamic movements) and secular traditions (for example human rights movements) have demonstrated the agency of people of African descent in various social and politico-geographies.

The program curriculum will thus frame the parallel but place-specific experiences of African-descended peoples in terms of their location, presence, and involvement – in the Western Hemisphere and elsewhere – in the cultural, political, social and economic dimensions of the modern world from the pre-modern past, through slavery and colonialism, to the current phase in the historical process of globalization. With these educational objectives in mind, our degree program will offer the previously highlighted areas of specialization.

Faculty in the Department possess the breadth and depth of knowledge in a number of areas that would be necessary to develop and implement a premiere graduate program in this field. Areas of expertise among the faculty include, African politics and economic systems, African languages, African, African-American and African diaspora history, gender studies, and cultural production (film, music, and literature). Current undergraduate offerings in cultural production, political and economic studies, intellectual history and social change, historical analysis, gender studies, social movements, human rights, democracy and citizenship comprise a viable intellectual foundation on which our proposed graduate curricula will build.

Our faculty's scholarly production represents an additional resource, appropriate to our proposed project. Our faculty have produced noted cutting edge contributions in African-American religious history and 20th Century biography, influential scholarship in diaspora and gender studies, a major analytical text for the field of African American Studies, prominent studies in film history, analyses of international political economy, international relations, and development studies. As scholars with prominent and leading contributions, the faculty is thus well suited to serve as models, mentors, and exemplars for graduate students in the production and refinement of knowledge and scholarship relevant to our discipline.

b. the relationship of the proposed new program to the institutional mission and how the program fits into the institution's strategic plan and its response to UNC Tomorrow

The proposed Global Africana Studies Ph.D. will advance the university's overall mission, as well as address priorities articulated in the campus 2003 Academic Plan and the 2007 UNC tomorrow report. The University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill's overall mission statement "is to discover, create, transmit, and apply knowledge to address the needs of individuals and society"[3] through instruction, research, and creative activities that advance knowledge, and public service that contributes to the solution of social problems.

A graduate program in Global Africana Studies at The University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill would embody the University core commitment to advance knowledge, by pulling together

[3] The University of North Carolina Mission Statement
http://www.northcarolina.edu/content.php/themes/rinterfriendly.php?docnumber=13926 scholarship on Africans and African Americans, examining new methodologies and theoretical issues within that scholarship, training the next generation of teachers, policy makers, and citizens, and promoting new research and insights into the experience of people of African descent, who have contributed much to richness of North Carolina's history and heritage.

As our own state becomes increasingly diverse in its population, our program – one of the oldest programs in the country established to examine the history and cultures of Black people— wherever they may be found— contributes to our ability to solve social problems by offering a platform for evaluating the social, political, and economic consequences of this process.

The priorities of the Academic Plan are to provide the strongest possible academic experience for its students, promote interdisciplinary research, education, and public service, improve faculty recruitment and retention, improve faculty recruitment, retention, enhance public engagement, and extend Carolina's global presence, research, and teaching. Each of these are priorities to which our proposed program will contribute.

In several ways, development of deepened and advanced studies in our field will serve the Academic Plan's objective "to provide the strongest academic experience for undergraduate, graduate, and professional students." First, we will create offerings comparable to those that already exist at several top rank public and private universities. Also, by training graduate students our faculty will be able to more fully utilize their talents, and thus contribute more to the University's academic and research productivity. Graduate students will also be involved in undergraduate teaching, creating enhanced resources and possibilities for undergraduate.

The interdisciplinary origins and alignments within our field and our department resonate clearly and strongly with the Academic Plan's call for interdisciplinary research and education. Our faculty and curriculum currently reflect interdisciplinary approaches and conceptions, and our graduate program will extend those efforts. Several of our faculty have joint appointments with other departments, bridging those disciplines and offering new interdisciplinary possibilities.

A viable graduate program will also make UNC an attractive location for both established and emerging scholars in our field. For the past several years new recruits to our department have responded positively to the possibility of graduate development. In this way our efforts will support the Academic objective of "to improve faculty recruitment, retention, and development."

The emergence of our field virtually embodies the imperative of diversity, regarding academic perspective and focus, in sites of higher education.

The personnel who have implemented our mission have very much reflected diversity regarding culture, perspective, geography, social origins, among other parameters. Advanced graduate studies will offer new promises to extend and increase these possibilities for diversity.

Regarding the Academic Plan's call for community engagement, out graduate program will be able to build upon and extend current and ongoing activities our department has developed. For example, the African Studies Center, supported by a Title VI grant for undergraduate education in the Department of Education, provides timely, accurate, and culturally appropriate materials for K-12 teachers in North Carolina houses the Carolina Seminar on Ecology and Social Process in Africa, and has expanded the study of African languages at UNC. In addition, together with World Vision, the Center recently sponsored a study trip to Senegal for teachers, and has fostered the development of curriculum materials available online. Building on these resources to prepare future teachers, policy makers, and citizens prepared for careers in a wide range of public and non-governmental organizations dealing with human rights, including access to justice, basic social services, and economic development, our graduate program will thus provide resources for meaningful community engagement.

In recent years the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill has embraced the study of globalization with initiatives that include the Center for Global Initiatives, the African Studies Center, the exponential growth of the Curriculum in International and Area Studies, along with the many international programs of the School of Public Health. In this vein, the Academic Plan also calls for enhancement of the university's presence, research and teaching at the global level. The African Studies center, along with current relationships our department currently maintains with institutions in Tanzania and South Africa embodies our current contribution to this goal, which will be further enhanced by the institution of our graduate program.

The objectives of our graduate program also speak directly to many of the goals articulated in the 2007 UNC Tomorrow report, especially those that comprise "Global Readiness" (4.1). We will help to "enhance the global competiveness" of the university and its graduates, and the partnerships we maintain with international universities will continue to "enhance the global awareness of [our] faculty and students."

Our department's mission also strongly embraces UNC Tomorrow's commitment to increasing access to higher education for North Carolina's citizens (4.2) including "underrepresented populations, and to increased educational attainment of such populations, "especially African-American male and Hispanic students." Currently, the Carolina Center for Public Service through its Robert E. Bryan Public Service Award Scholars and Engaged Scholars programs promotes profound links between the University and North Carolina peoples and communities. Many of these involve mentoring and/or collaboration between representatives of The University and minority populations in the state. All of these programs accomplish aspects of furthering our knowledge about the history and current issues affecting African Americans in North Carolina, the region, and the world. With the parallel development of a graduate program in African and African-American Studies that would conduct research and train future scholars, these resources can be further enhancements in the production of knowledge.

Instituting a graduate program in Global Africana Studies will naturally make UNC an attractive workplace for talented faculty in our field and thus also serve the stated goal to "increase efforts to attract and retain high-quality staff at all levels" (5.5).

c. the relationship of the proposed new program to other existing programs at the institution

Several university programs have foci that adjoin those of African/African-American Studies. Our committee has identified, and continues to update, a list of courses that will enhance the educational offerings available to our doctoral students' in their various areas of concentration. These include courses from basic academic areas such as Anthropology, Communication Studies, Economics, English, History, International Studies, Journalism, Music, Philosophy, Political Science, Psychology, Peace War & Defense, Religious Studies, Sociology, and Women Studies, in addition to more applied studies like Health Behavior and Education, City and Regional Planning, Public Policy, and Public Administration. In addition, development of the graduate program would benefit from collaboration with students and faculty from several professional schools at UNC-Chapel Hill, including the School of Education, the School of Social Work, the Law School, the Medical School, and the School of Public Health.

Furthermore, Faculty in the Department possess the breadth and depth of knowledge in a number of areas that, in addition to being necessary to develop and implement a graduate program in this field, are useful to graduate studies in other fields. Areas of expertise among the faculty include, African politics and economic systems, African languages, African, African-American and African diaspora history, gender studies, and cultural production. Graduate level courses in African and African American Studies will included offerings in a range of thematic concentrations: including, cultural production (literature, music and cinema), political and economic studies, intellectual history and social change, historical analysis, gender studies, social movements, human rights, democracy and citizenship, and will be open to graduate students in other disciplines who seek to incorporate an understanding of the socioeconomic or cultural dimensions of African-descendant peoples and communities into their studies. In general, it can be expected that the work of scholars and students from other disciplines will be enhanced by scholarly activities generated within the African/African-American studies doctoral program.

Several research centers and institutes on the UNC-Chapel Hill campus would be important collaborators and resources for students in the graduate program, these include the Sonja Haynes Stone Center for Black History and Culture, the Institute of African American Research, the African Studies Center, the Institute for the Study of the Americas, and the Center for the Study of the American South.

d. special features or conditions that make the institution a desirable, unique, or appropriate place to initiate such a degree program.

As the flagship campus of the UNC system and a premiere public research university, UNC-Chapel Hill will play a key role in filling the need for graduate education in African and African American Studies within the state of North Carolina, where there are currently no graduate programs, aside from the M.A. in African American Literature offered at North Carolina Agricultural and Technical State University. Moreover, UNC-Chapel Hill's prominence among academic institutions, both in North Carolina and throughout the Southeast, as well as its stature as a national model of public education, compel it to develop and establish high-quality graduate training in African and African American Studies. Through the development of the proposed graduate program, UNC-Chapel Hill will fill a critical need for graduate training in African and African American Studies statewide, along the east coast, and in the southern United States.

Several research centers and institutes on the UNC-Chapel Hill campus would be important collaborators and resources for students in the graduate program, these include the Sonja Haynes Stone Center for Black History and Culture, the Institute of African American Research, the African Studies Center, the Institute for the Study of the Americas, and the Center for the Study of the American South.

The Sonja Haynes Stone Center for Black Culture and History offers to the campus community and the public a rich array of lectures, artistic performances and exhibitions, and symposia on the African American and Diaspora experience. Like the Department, it encourages undergraduates through internships and study abroad opportunities to broaden their intellectual worlds while engaging deeply in cross cultural living. The Institute of African American Research has sponsored international and regional scholarly conferences exploring themes of historical import to people of African descent wherever they may be found, but especially in North America. Programs like the Race-ing Race Researching Race Seminars for postdoctoral and graduate students conducting research on race and culture, Youth and Race, Race and the Environment have drawn attention to and promoted scholarship on timely themes. Long a center for Southern history, The University continues its excellence in this field through the Center for the Study of the American South, and the rich resources of the Southern History Collection, the NC Collection, the publication of Southern Cultures and the primary materials found in the Documenting the American South digital collection of Davis Library. The Center of Oral History's collection and research publications have deepened our understanding of the history of labor and civil rights in the industrializing of the region. These all provide frequent glimpses into the experiences of Blacks resident in the South without having that experience be the focal point of their work.

2. List all other public and private institutions of higher education in North Carolina currently operating programs similar to the proposed new degree program.

Currently, no Ph.D. programs in African or African American Studies exist at private or public institutions of higher education in North Carolina, aside from the M.A. in African American Literature offered at North Carolina Agricultural and Technical State University. In addition, with the exception of Florida and Kentucky, no graduate programs in these areas, at either the M.A. or Ph.D. level, have been developed in the southern United States. Given the paucity of graduate programs in African and African American Studies in the southern United States, UNC-Chapel Hill will be poised to become a leader within these fields through the development of the proposed Ph.D. program.

3. Estimate the number of students that would be enrolled in the program during the first year of operation: Full-Time __5____ Part-Time _____; the number of students that would be enrolled in the program when it is fully operational: Full-Time__20_____ Part-Time_____.

4. Estimate the current and projected demand for graduates of the proposed new degree program. Provide documentation about the sources of data used to estimate demand.

According to a recent report on the status of Africana Studies, there are currently around 187 institutions that offer at least a bachelors level degree in African/African American Studies. (The number expands to 311 if minors, associates degrees and other certificates are added.) Thirty-eight of the programs offering full majors are in the Southern Census region. Our department is one of five undergraduate degree programs in the state of North Carolina. (Among southern states only Georgia, with six, has more, while Florida matches North Carolina's five).

In addition to these benchmarks in undergraduate education, the report notes "dynamic growth in the number of institutions offering advanced study of the African American experience," at both the masters and doctoral levels. [4]

Several factors may figure in this growth. In part it is a response demand from students who, whether or not they formally majored in Black Studies, increasing look for such studies at the graduate level.

Currently some ten institutions offer Ph.D. programs in African or African American studies, while masters degree programs are currently offered at 21 institutions. In addition, many more institutions have begun to offer certificates and concentrations at both the masters and doctoral levels in African American as well as African studies. It is also noteworthy, in this regard that a disproportionate number of graduate programs are in prominent and highly ranked private and public universities. For example, the Ph.D. programs include Berkeley, Harvard, Howard, Massachusetts, Michigan State, Northwestern, and Yale, while the 21 masters degree programs include Columbia, Cornell, NYU, Indiana, Ohio State, Syracuse, SUNY- Albany, UCLA, and Wisconsin. One might infer from this trend that prominent scholars and faculties are increasingly willing to combine their commitment to African/African-American Studies as a distinct field with a determination to make it a full function enterprise at these major research institutions, a goal that encompasses teaching and working with graduate students and training new scholars to carry on the process.

In addition to these barometers, the impending retirement of what might be called the "founding generation" of the field as it now exists suggest a significant future need for graduate training as, according to the report, a 20-30% faculty turnover is likely in the next ten years.

As a result, the demand for graduate trained scholars will continue.

A survey based on job announcements from three internet lists during the period from August 2008 to January 2010 yielded the following snapshot: A total of 91 jobs notices openings were advertised, 87 of which were tenure track, including 6 chairpersons or directors. Seventy-two involved African and/or African American Studies departments or programs (African American Studies, 33; "Africana Studies," 14; "African and African American Studies," 7; "Black Studies," 6; "African American and African Studies," 4; "African Studies" 4; "African American Diaspora Studies," 2; "Afro-American Studies" 1; "African and African Diaspora Studies" 1). Eight involved Ethnic Studies units while the others called for African and/or

African-American specialists in departments of history (4), religion or divinity (2), literature and American studies, (1 each).[5]

This demand is likely to be sustained, and arguably even grow, as current economic restraints are eased.

STUDENTS

There are several pools of potential students for this graduate program.

1) We estimate that as many as 30 percent of our majors would apply to a graduate program if one existed here. This estimate is based on the number of students who inquire about graduate studies, and informal polling done in our seminars.
2) We would also get African/African American Studies majors from other universities, perhaps especially in this state where there are no other graduate programs, and from this region and around the country, from individuals who, like some of our students, look at the possibility of graduate education in this field before choosing post-baccalaureate life/career paths, and who might see our program as a desirable (given our thematic foci) or convenient (given our location) alternative among other available programs.
3) We would get graduates of other majors, from this university and other institutions, who want to further their studies by concentrating in our area.
4) We should also get students in our graduate classes from other graduate programs in other departments in the university who want to develop knowledge in our areas. While this cross-fertilization would happen naturally, but we could facilitate it in various ways, such as with our newly instituted African Studies Certificate.

5. If there are plans to offer the program away from campus during the first year of operation:
   a. briefly describe these plans, including potential sites and possible method(s) of delivering instruction.
   b. indicate any similar programs being offered off-campus in North Carolina by other institutions (public or private)
   c. estimate the number of students that would be enrolled in the program during the first year of operation: Full-Time _____ Part-Time _____

There are no plans to offer the program away from campus.

6. Describe the procedures to be used to plan the proposed program. List the names, titles, e-mail addresses and telephone numbers of the person(s) responsible for planning the proposed program.

BACKGROUND PLANNING

In the last four years, our unit has held productive discussions aimed at teasing out avenues that would lead to the creation of an intellectual space for our committed students to further their interests in the study of the historical and contemporary experiences of people of African descent globally. Out of these discussions, a graduate planning was appointed by the Chair of the department with the mandate of providing a detailed plan that could enable the establishment of a graduate program in our Department of African and African American Studies at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill (UNC-CH).

Since 2006, a committee created by the Chair of the Department of African and African American Studies, Dr. Julius Nyang'oro, has met to discuss long-range planning for a graduate program in this field. In addition to conversations with department colleagues, the Committee invited external consultants from other African American Studies programs – Dr. Noliwe Rooks (Princeton University), Micere G. Mugo (Syracuse University), and Robert Wolf (emeritus from University of Massachusetts-Amherst) – to provide insights and recommendations based on their experience with similar programs at their universities. An interim report, Departmental Report, Graduate Planning Committee, was compiled in October, 2007.

PROCEDURES

The Graduate Planning Committee will work towards accomplishing the goals established for the following phases in order to submit the Request for Authorization to Establish a New Degree Program by the end of 2011.

Phase I: Fall 2010. Consultation about and draft the Description of the Program and the Narrative Statement Justification for the Program; Staff members will compile statistical data for section C Enrollment.

Phase II: Spring 2011. Consultation about and draft the Program Requirements and Curriculum, Sections I-XIII

Phase III. Fall 2011. Formally submit Request to Plan ("Appendix B"); complete Request for Authorization to Establish ("Appendix C").

7. Describe the method of financing the proposed new program (e.g., potential sources of funding) and indicate the extent to which additional state funding may be required.

This intent to plan a new program has been reviewed and approved by the appropriate campus committees and authorities.

Colleagues.

Our graduate proposal has gone through an initial review by officials in the Graduate School (the latest version of that proposal is attached). Moving to the next stage will require us to add more details to our proposed curriculum offerings. On that score we are asking for you input in terms of course offerings.

a) We would like each faculty member to formulate a short, bullet list, or description of their research interests, so we can construct a compendium of faculty expertise roster that reflects our intellectual breadth and grounding.

b) We are asking each colleague to compose a description (3-4 sentences) of two courses you would be interested in developing and teaching at the graduate level. The course should fit into one or more of the specialization areas. Pease indicate the specialization area in which you think the course would fit best. Currently, the titles of the specialization areas are ("Race and Racism in the Modern World," "Political Economy of the Black World," "Gender, Sexuality, and the Body" "Cultural Production," and "Religion and Social Thought."

The proposed course could be

a) a graduate version of what you teach at the undergraduate level

or

b) a new course area encompassing a current or newly developed area of research interest.

Please send your statement of research interests and your course descriptions to Agatha or Haeran by November 22.

Thank you

ANTH 699: Issues in Biomedical Anthropology

This interactive seminar reviews recently published articles in biomedicine from the perspectives of biocultural, ecological, and evolutionary anthropology. The goal of the seminar is to identify the theoretical assumptions of biomedical research, study the strengths and weakness of various research designs and methods (and their rationale), and evaluate the anthropological implications of the reported results. Articles for review will span the biomedical sciences.

The Center for International Business Education and Research at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill (UNC-CIBER) has selected "Transnationalism & Transformation" as the theme for our proposed program. This title captures the central goals of our proposal: to transform business professionals by enhancing their ability to operate across nations; to leverage partnerships within the university, the state, the nation, and the world; and to disseminate --via innovative use of technology-- relevant and unique knowledge nationwide. During the next four years, we will:

1) Transform our students into competent global business professionals who can operate effectively in myriad international business contexts, particularly India, China, Brazil, Kenya and South Africa;

2) Contribute to US business competitiveness by driving progress in four areas that are key drivers of our economy: global supply chain management, innovation, entrepreneurship, and sustainability;

3) Widely disseminate knowledge generated by the various projects.

The initiatives are briefly described below, arranged by the three primary objectives. This descriptive list demonstrates how by marshalling the particular strengths of UNC, Kenan-Flagler, and a variety of strong domestic and international partners we will further the stated objectives over the next four years.

1.Transformation through Teaching

International awareness among UNC students is already high and continues to increase. Almost 35% of UNC's undergraduates and 50% - 60% of the BSBA and MBA students study abroad. The university has also worked hard to internationalize its curriculum, and a sizable number of UNC faculty and students come from countries other than the US. Despite this international climate, many students lack a thorough international experience. Even for those engaged in international activities, the exposure is often too limited to truly prepare them to effectively function in a transnational business environment. We propose to address these shortcomings through curricular innovations that increase the opportunities for international experiences on and off campus, and that provide transnational and in-depth immersion programs.

1.01 Intercultural Communication Initiative. This program will systematically integrate cross-cultural communication training into the curriculum at Kenan-Flagler as well as international programs at UNC and beyond.

1.02 Less Commonly Taught Business Languages (LCTLs). UNC CIBER will work with the Departments of Asian Studies and African Studies to develop and offer undergraduate courses in Business Hindi, Business Swahili and Business Arabic, thereby more than doubling course offerings in the less commonly taught business languages.

1.03 Language Across the Curriculum (LAC). UNC CIBER will bring the first LAC offerings to Kenan-Flagler, enabling BSBA students with Spanish language experience to continue their language study at an advanced level within a business course context.

1.04 Transnational Summer Institute. Modeled on Kenan-Flagler's successful, year-long GLOBE program, we will form a cohort of undergraduate students from UNC's BSBA program, EGADE in Mexico and McGill University in Canada. Participants will spend approximately 2 weeks at each of the participating universities to take courses, visit companies, and jointly work on case studies.

1.05 Business /Asian Studies Minor. We will explore the possibility of creating a new, cross-disciplinary degree program that will prepare students for careers in which they will be managing trade in Asia.

1.06 Transnational Virtual Network. We will work with our partner institutions to establish distance learning labs for use in joint research projects, course offerings, and other student collaborations.

1.07 Global STAR – Africa Business Projects. The Global STAR program will allow UNC students across disciplines to hone their global leadership skills by engaging in projects focused on sustainable development and social entrepreneurship in developing countries. Teams of students will produce actionable plans for entrepreneurial ventures and service organizations.

1.08 MBA Exchange Program with Africa. UNC-CIBER will explore the creation of an MBA exchange program with an East or a West African university.

1.09 International Internship Initiative. On the undergraduate level, a new summer internship program for undergraduates will combine experiential learning with traditional classes at partner universities in China, India, and Brazil. On the graduate level, UNC CIBER will offer competitive mini-grants to support summer internships abroad.

1.10 Course Innovations. To introduce our BSBA students to the importance of cultural context when doing business internationally, UNC-CIBER will support the design of a new undergraduate course entitled Consumers Across Cultures.

1.11 Working Languages. UNC-CIBER will continue the successful WL program for MBA students and further expand the BSBA offerings to include Mandarin.

1.12 Faculty Development in Int'l Business. To encourage faculty in business, language, and area studies to strengthen their expertise in teaching and research in IB, UNC-CIBER will partner with other CIBERs to offer a comprehensive array of professional development opportunities on campus, at other CIBER universities, and abroad.

1.13 American Competitiveness: Forum on Rethinking Business Education. A consortium of six CIBERs, led by Duke, will undertake an exploration of business education to focus on current US business challenges. The initiative will lead to a recommendation for a new business curricula.

2. Transformation through Research

Increasing the global capacity of students and US businesses requires knowledgeable educators and productive scholars who engage in cutting-edge applied research. The next set of initiatives describes new faculty development programs and activities that encourage innovative research with impact --both theoretical and applied-- in UNC CIBER's areas of focus: global supply chain, sustainability, innovation, and entrepreneurship.

2.01 Faculty Engagement & Global Partnerships: The Next Generation I. This multi-layered faculty development and business outreach program will bring two rising stars in entrepreneurship, innovation, and supply chain --one a scholar and one a professional-- from partner institutions and companies in China, India, and Thailand to be scholars in residence at Kenan-Flagler. They will teach, participate in research colloquia and an annual conference. The first conference for academic and industry leaders will take place at Kenan-Flagler, April 7-9, 2011, on "Innovating the Global Supply Chain."

2.02 Student Engagement & IB Research Program: The Next Generation II. UNC CIBER will invite and support selected Ph.D. students to the annual conference.

2.03 UNC-CIBER Mini Grants. To expand research and teaching in IB, UNC-CIBER will offer a limited number of mini-grants ranging from $500-$3000 for faculty and doctoral students for research, teaching or outreach related to UNC-CIBER's focus on IB areas, countries, and its general mission.

2.04 Global Supply Chains: Innovation, Technology, & Safety. UNC CIBER will support the development of an educational and research platform that will help students and faculty engage in cross-cultural research with their Chinese counterparts and assist US companies in developing business in China, focusing on issues of food safety and secure food/cold chains.

(2.05 This initiative was canceled.)

2.06 Evaluation of Business Lang. Projects & Activities. UNC-CIBER will work with six other CIBERs to evaluate the effectiveness and outcomes of grant-supported business language activities, assessing program effectiveness, relevance, and use in students' careers.

2.07 Effectiveness of Global Action Learning Programs. We will investigate the short-term and long-term outcomes resulting from students' participation in global action learning projects. The project will generate a multi-year study of students and organizations that participated in Global Business Projects and Global STAR.

2.08 UNC-CIBER Business Language Conference. This conference, a pan-CIBER offering, gives faculty and graduate students an opportunity to exchange the latest in business languages research, innovative curricula, new teaching techniques, and effective assessment tools. UNC CIBER will host the 2012 conference tentatively entitled "Building Bridges from Business Languages to Business Communities: Experiential Learning in Business Languages."

1.Transformation through Outreach

North Carolina's traditional economic base of tobacco, furniture, and textiles has been decimated by globalization, and the current economic crisis has further challenged the state's economic condition. UNC-CIBER will further the university's efforts to serve the people of North Carolina and its businesses by providing a number of outreach programs, including training, consulting services, and a public-private partnership that will help firms to adapt to the global economy. UNC-CIBER will also develop programs for K-12 instructors and leaders of HBCUs and Community Colleges to help them effectively prepare students careers of the future.

3.01 Global Business Project. The GBP course fields teams of students drawn from participating CIBER schools to assist US companies in developing comprehensive, actionable strategies for enhanced global competitiveness. Working both virtually and on the ground in one of the GBP destination countries, each GBP team applies functional, cross-cultural and foreign language skills to produce strategic advice on market entry or expansion, product development, or global supply chain.

3.02 Lab for Innovation: A Public- Private Partnership. We are planning to establish a lab in which executives, faculty, and students from various disciplines will collaborate on cutting-edge research and work on solutions to real business problems. Graduate seminars, teaching cases, and published research are expected results.

3.03 Business Across Borders With UNC CIBER and Kenan Institute support, MBA students will organize a half-day long series of panels and workshops for MBAs and young professionals in the Triangle to better prepare them to be successful in work related to emerging markets.

3.04 Interdisciplinary Symposium on Sustainability & Innovation in Global Contexts. In collaboration with six area studies centers at UNC, we will deliver a comprehensive program including a multi-disciplinary annual symposium, a professional networking event for students, and the development of cluster courses on "Sustainability and Innovation."

3.05 Community College Global Education Leaders Program. UNC-CIBER is partnering with Duke's CIBER and UNC's WorldView to offer a week-long, innovative professional development program for 30-35 community college leaders with intensive study of global issues related to international business.

3.06 Professional Training for K-16 Educators. We will sponsor a biannual, day-long K-12 Partners Workshop for 400 to 800 educators that gives insight into current international business issues. CIBER also will offer the online courses Working Spanish for Educators and Working Mandarin to for Educators to provide greater access to language-learning opportunities for K-16 instructors. Further, we will hold one webinar annual on "Infusing Business into the Foreign Language Classroom."

3.07 Globalizing Business Schools for Minority Serving Institutions (MSI). UNC CIBER will provide one-on-one assistance to our MSI partner school, NC A&T University, to facilitate internationalization of business programs and the aid in their application for a BIE federal grant.

3.08 Lessons Learned & Best Practices. UNC CIBER will offer a series of webinars to share best practices and knowledge acquired through its various activities. Furthermore, we will use webcasts to live-stream and archive conferences. We will also create a new searchable web-portal.

Subject: [dptcrchairs] FW: Online Course Evaluation for fall 2010

The enclosed information is being sent on behalf of Lyn Williford, Institutional Research, to all department and curriculum chairs in the College, with a copy to administrative managers.

Dear Department Chairs and Managers,

As you are probably aware, the Exam Scanning Services Office at ITS is no longer processing the Carolina Course Evaluation paper forms for the campus. A new online version of the traditional Carolina Course Evaluation instrument is now available for use in fall 2010 and beyond. Use of this tool is optional, and there is no cost to the department.

If your department will use the online process this fall, please share the following instructions with the person who will serve as your coordinator. Please note that we've already been in contact with most of the representatives of departments that used the old paper evaluation system, so this message will be a repeat for some people.

A brief overview and instructions for registering your courses to use the system this fall are provided on our website at:

http://oira.unc.edu/carolina-course-evaluations-online.html

The process involves only a couple of easy steps:

1. Registering the department chair and evaluation coordinator for access to the system.
2. Selecting course sections and reviewing instructor information for accuracy.

If at all possible, please select you course sections by the end of the day on Tuesday, November 16. The system will be open for students to complete their evaluations between Wed, December 1 and 8:00 am on Friday, December 10th when exams begin. Email notices about the opening and closing of the system will be sent automatically to instructors of participating courses and their students.

You are welcome to contact me with any questions.

Lynn

Subject: Cultural training-Relocation from Ghana to Greensboro

Prof. Nyang'oro

I found your email address on the University website and I need some assistance that you may be able to provide.

I am a Resource Coordinator with Berlitz Cultural Consulting, (a division of Berlitz Int'l), in Princeton, NJ. We organize cross-cultural programs for people who are being relocated by their companies to other parts of the world to live and work. During these programs, we discuss culture differences that will be encountered in daily living and in the workplace. The goal is for the participant to understand the new culture and learn the "do's and don'ts" so that he or she may have a smoother transition and more successful assignment.

My job is to locate resource people or "country specialists" who can assist our trainer. There is nothing formal to prepare because the function of this person is to use their knowledge and experiences to answer the participants' questions covering topics that serve to familiarize them with the new area and culture. The time involved would be about 2 hours, any convenient time between 9am and 5 pm. The resource is paid for his/her time, plus travel expenses.

We are delivering a program in GREENSBORO, NC on November 19, 2010 for someone who has just arrived from GHANA to work for Price Waterhouse Coopers. Our trainer needs assistance from someone who has lived in the Ghana area and who then came to the USA. This person would come to the training, answer questions about and talk a bit about their experiences making the transition.

I can give you more details and our trainer would also be able to speak with and prepare this person in advance.

I am hoping that you can assist me in identifying someone within your staff or faculty. If so, please call or e-mail me at the address below. I truly would appreciate any contact information you can give me. Thank you.

Dear Professor Biddle:

I am pleased to forward, for consideration by the Educational Policy Committee, five recommendations resulting from the review of the Making Connections undergraduate curriculum. These recommendations were approved by the Administrative Boards of the General College and College of Arts and Sciences on October 13, 2010, and have my endorsement.

When the Faculty Council approved the Making Connections curriculum for implementation in fall 2006, faculty members recommended reviewing the curriculum in 2010, after the first class to experience it had graduated. To that end, five subcommittees consisting of over 50 faculty members, students, and advisors, have been examining the undergraduate curriculum since last April. The work has been conducted under the leadership of faculty chair Professor Abigail Panter, Department of Psychology, and a steering committee made up of the subcommittee chairs, representatives of the Office of Undergraduate Education in the College of Arts and Sciences, and Assistant Provost Lynn Williford liaison from the Office of Institutional Research and Assessment. The review included two public forums, analysis of data collected from several sources, reports based on focus groups with undergraduate students, and an extensive review of course syllabuses over the summer.

The attached recommendations directly address desirable revisions in the Making Connections curriculum. If you have any questions about the procedures we have followed or about the recommendations, please feel welcome to call Dean Bobbi Owen, Professor Panter, or me. Thank you for considering these constructive changes in the undergraduate curriculum.

Sincerely,

Karen M. Gil

Curriculum Review Recommendations
Approved by the Administrative Boards of the General College and College of Arts and Sciences, 10/13/2010

Section A. Recommendations Related to Revising the Making Connections Curriculum

A-1. To accept placement into level 4 of a foreign language as satisfying the Foundations foreign language requirement through level 3.

Effective with the fall 2011 semester, first-time, first-year students will no longer be required to take the level-4 course to satisfy the level-3 General Education requirement. Particular majors, however, may continue to require that students demonstrate level-4 proficiency (or higher) in a foreign language.

A-2. To limit the number of times that a student can enroll in an LFIT course to one time only.

Effective with the fall 2011 semester, students may complete only one, one-credit Lifetime Fitness (LFIT) course during their career at Carolina, since the instructional modules and laboratory exercises for all LFIT courses are the same. The Department of Exercise and Sports Science supports this recommendation.

A-3. To rescind the Foreign-Language Intensive (FI) requirement, effective with the fall 2011 semester.

The College of Arts and Sciences has been unable to fund the requirement.

A-4. To revise the Supplemental Education requirement so that students pursuing the BA degree (or the BS degree with a major in psychology) may fulfill it in the following ways:

- By completing a second major or a minor;
- By completing three courses above 199 that are not being used to fulfill the student's major requirements. The three courses must be from outside the home department/curriculum of the major and cannot be cross-listed with a course used to satisfy the requirements for the major.
- By completing a concentration outside a professional school as part of the degree requirements for graduating from the school.

The intent of the requirement was to encourage students pursuing the BA degree (and the BS with a major in psychology) to seek further education beyond the introductory level in areas outside their majors. Significant numbers of students already do this. Double majors and double minors are increasingly common, with 38 percent of current students affected by this requirement majoring or minoring in a College division different from their primary major. Students also encounter enormous difficulties in fulfilling the divisional distributions of the current requirement. Course offerings are insufficient, especially in the College's fine arts division, and courses above 199 are often restricted to majors, especially in the College's natural sciences and mathematics division. Courses in the Cluster Program are offered too infrequently—some have not been offered for two years—to permit students to plan how best to fulfill the requirement. These capacity issues require simplifying the requirement in ways that permit students to fulfill it.

A-5. To approve no more than two General Education designations, as the norm, for any new or revised course.

This recommendation would become effective with the January 15, 2011, course submission deadline. In exceptional cases, the Curriculum Committee may find that a particular course meets the criteria for a third designation, but a maximum of two designations should be the norm.

Subject: African Studies Review Manuscript #2734

Dear Dr. Julius Edo Nyang'oro,

We are writing to you from the editorial offices of the African Studies Review to invite you to review a manuscript for our journal. The manuscript is entitled "The Politics of Government Expenditures in Tanzania: 1999-2007," and we want to make a prompt decision as to whether to accept it for publication, reject it outright, or ask the author to make revisions and then resubmit it for a second round of reviews. We have identified you as having research expertise that matches the topic of this manuscript, and kindly request your assistance in determining its suitability for publication in the ASR.

To give you more information about this manuscript, here is the abstract:

> What allocation strategy do hegemonic party regimes use in order to increase their level of electoral support? Due to the lack of committed partisan preferences and competitive opposition parties it is not clear which distribution strategy yields the highest electoral returns. This paper seeks to address this puzzle by examining the patterns by which expenditures were distributed by the Tanzanian ruling party, Chama Cha Mapinduzi (CCM), across the country's mainland districts from 1999 through 2007. Overall, this study finds that CCM targeted expenditures toward those districts that elected the party with the highest margin of victory.

If you are able to review this manuscript for us, we would need to receive your comments within 45 days of its receipt. We normally send out the manuscript as a PDF file attached to an e-mail message, though we are happy to send a hard copy via regular mail if that is your preference.

If you have any questions or need more information, please get in touch with us. In all references to this manuscript, please include the manuscript number above. We look forward to hearing from you.

Sincerely,

P.S. If you are not able to review this manuscript, we also would appreciate the names of other scholars who you think have the necessary expertise and might be interested. Thanks!

THE ROBERTA ANN DUNBAR AWARD IN AFRICAN AND AFRO-AMERICAN STUDIES IN THE COLLEGE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES

THIS AGREEMENT, made the _____ day of _____2010, and executed in duplicate, between Julius Nyang'oro, on behalf of donors (the "Donor"), and The University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill Arts and Sciences Foundation, Inc., located in Chapel Hill, North Carolina (the "Foundation").

1. Property Entrusted

The Donor and others, in consideration of their abiding interest in the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill (the "University"), as well as their desire to honor the distinguished career of Roberta Ann Dunbar, have given $950 to the Foundation. These gifts, together with any other assets which may hereafter be brought within the operation of this agreement, shall be held by the Foundation for the purposes hereinafter set forth. It is understood and agreed that the Donor and others have the right to make additional donations, either by gift or bequest, to the Foundation for inclusion in the fund hereby established.

2. Name of the Fund

The Foundation agrees to establish an expendable fund to be known as "THE ROBERTA ANN DUNBAR AWARD IN AFRICAN AND AFRO-AMERICAN STUDIES" (the "Fund").

3. Purpose

The fund will be used by the dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, after consultation with the chair of the department of African and Afro-American studies, to provide an annual award to a promising undergraduate student.

If, after a period of five years commencing with the execution of this agreement, the Fund has reached through additional gifts and income the $20,000 minimum necessary to establish an endowment at the University, then the expendable fund shall be converted to an endowment with the same purpose as stated above.

If, in the opinion of the Board of Directors of the Foundation, all or part of the gift cannot appropriately be used in the manner herein described, the Board may use the gift for other purposes as nearly aligned to the Donor's original intent as the Board deems appropriate under the circumstances.

4. Governing Law

This agreement shall be construed in accordance with, and the administration of the assets held in the Fund shall be determined by, the laws of the State of North Carolina, irrespective of the domicile or residence of the Donor or the location of any property held hereunder.

5. Amendment

This agreement may be amended by an instrument in writing that specifically refers to the agreement and that is signed by the Donor or the Donor's representative and the Foundation; provided, however, that no such amendment shall allow the Fund to be used other than for the educational purposes of the College of Arts and Sciences at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, the Donor and an officer of the Foundation have executed this agreement in duplicate the day and year first-above-written.

Subject: Reimbursement

Julius,

I'm writing to follow up on our brief conversation this afternoon. I was wondering if you can assist me in gaining clarification regarding travel reimbursement. I took a trip to Brazil in July to participate in two conferences. At that time, I had $247 remaining in Arts & Sciences travel funding and Adam said I could use it toward the trip. In fact, my airline ticket was purchased in May, so I thought the funds were used then.

When I returned in early August (Aug. 2), I submitted my receipts for reimbursement, but they were not processed until mid-September (probably due to staffing changes). I spoke to Haeran about this reimbursement last week because I noticed that $247 had been taken from this year's travel funding, rather than last year's. Would you please see if this can be rectified? Since, I've traveled to a couple of conferences this fall, I will need to use the full amount for 2010-11 for this academic year, rather than using part of these funds to cover the trip to Brazil that I took in July.

Thanks,
Kia

Title: Innovating the Global Supply Chain Date: April 7-9, 2011

In today's challenging economic times, managing the global supply chain can make the difference between profit and loss, expansion and contraction, success and failure. Maintaining the status quo is not sufficient; innovation is required to emerge from the economic downturn poised to take advantage of future opportunities. Innovating the Global Supply Chain is a conference that partners thought leaders from industry and academia to share insights and discuss options in several areas that are critical to organizational success. At the tip of the supply chain, the retail experience is changing due both to necessity and opportunity. This conference will address the changes to retailing caused by the global meltdown, as well as identifying technologies that will shape the scope of retailing for years to come. At the back end of the supply chain, outsourcing and offshoring have been implemented - or at least contemplated – by every firm in every industry. We will share insight into the successes and failures of outsourcing/offshoring, with particular emphasis on the information technology sector. By considering key aspects of the entire supply chain, Innovating the Global Supply Chain will provide access to leading edge research and practical applications in the field of supply chain management.

Location: Carolina Inn & FedEx Global Education Center

Leading Units: Kenan Institute, UNC CIBER, KFBS, OTIM, and Center for Logistics and Global Strategy

Tentative Conference Agenda
Thursday, April 7th
2.00 – 5.30 pm: Registration & Information Open

3.30 – 3.45 pm: Opening Remarks
Jayashankar Swaminathan, Senior Associate Dean of Academic Affairs, Glaxo Distinguished Professor of Global Business, and UNC CIBER Faculty Director, Kenan-Flagler Business School (confirmed)

3.45 – 5.15 pm: Session I – "Outsourcing & Offshoring in Information Technology – From Labor Arbitrage to the Delivery of Innovative Solutions"
Over the past twenty years, the offshoring of IT services has skyrocketed. The movement began as a way for companies in the developed world to benefit from lower wages in developing countries. While the offshored work was typically not mission critical, over time this has changed as increasingly core and innovative work is being completed offshore. This session will explore these changes and the implications they have for companies.

Presenters: Girish Pananjpe or Suresh Vaswani, CEOs, Wipro Technologies (invited) and Sandra Slaughter, Professor of Information Technology Management and Alton M. Costley Chair, Georgia Institute of Technology (confirmed)

Moderator: Bradley Staats, Assistant Professor of Operations, Technology and Innovation Management, Kenan-Flagler Business School (confirmed)

5.30 – 6.30 pm: Opening Keynote
Introduction: John D. Kasarda, Director of The Frank Hawkins Kenan Institute of Private Enterprise and Kenan Distinguished Professor of Strategy and Entrepreneurship (confirmed)

Keynote: Tony Hsieh, CEO, Zappos.com (invited)

6.30 – 7.00 pm: Reception

7.00 pm: Dinner

Friday, April 8th
8.00 am: Registration & Information Opens

8.30 - 10.00am: Session II – "Manufacturing Outsourcing & Offshoring in a Post-Great Recession World"
Since the First Industrial Revolution the same basic pattern has repeated itself time and again: industries develop in one country, wages rise, work is shifted to a country with lower wages. However, with the shock of recent global economic events and the increased focused on risk and sustainability companies are giving new thought to how they should structure their manufacturing operations and where those operations should be located. This session will explore how those decisions are changing the operational footprint of companies and what the implications are.

Presenters: Martin Richenhagen, Chairman of the Board, President, and CEO, AGCO Corporation (confirmed) and Hau L. Lee, Thoma Professor of Operations, Information and Technology, and Director of the Stanford Global Supply Chain Management Forum, Stanford University (not yet invited)

Moderator: Jayashankar Swaminathan, Glaxo Distinguished Professor of Global Business, Senior Associate Dean of Academic Affairs, and UNC CIBER Faculty Director, Kenan-Flagler Business School (confirmed)

10.15am – 11.45 am: Session III – "Managing Retail in an Economic Downturn"
The global economy is in the midst of a financial downturn with great deal of uncertainty about when the economy might improve. This global meltdown and the continuing economic uncertainty has significantly reduced consumer confidence resulting in large cutbacks in customer spending. However, not all retailers have suffered financially. In fact, some have managed to do well in spite of and, in some cases, due to the crisis. In this session, we will delve into the impact of the economic downturn on consumer behavior and the implications for retail operations.

Presenters: Robert A. Niblock, Chairman of the Board and CEO, Lowes Companies Inc. (not yet invited) and Marshall Fisher, UPS Professor of Operations and Information Management and Co-Director, Fishman-Davidson Center for Service and Operations Management, Wharton School of Business (not yet invited)

Moderator: Sridhar Balasubramanian, Roy and Alice H. Richards Bicentennial Distinguished Scholar, Associate Dean of the MBA Program, and Professor of Marketing, Kenan-Flagler Business School (confirmed)

12:00 – 1.30 pm: Lunch & Keynote

Introduction: Jayashankar Swaminathan, Glaxo Distinguished Professor of Global Business, Senior Associate Dean of Academic Affairs, and UNC CIBER Faculty Director (confirmed)

Keynote: Michael T. Duke, President, CEO, and Director, Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. (invited)

1.45 – 3.15 pm: Session IV – "Future of Retail"

The retail landscape is changing quickly. Consider the following changes that have occurred recently in retail. U.S. online retail sales, which were $155 billion in 2009, are expected to grow to $250 billion by 2014. Smart phones may be used to do price comparisons even when shopping in a brick-and-mortar store. RFID is becoming a reality. Retailers are going green. In this session, we take stock of current trends and look to the future of retail operations.

Presenters: Leslie Herbert Wexner, Chairman of the Board and CEO, Limited Brands, (not yet invited) and Ananth Raman, UPS Foundation Professor of Business Logistics, Harvard Business School (invited)

Moderator: Saravanan Kesavan, Assistant Professor of Operations, Technology and Innovation Management, Kenan-Flagler Business School (confirmed)

- Integration of concepts composing good governance in an interactive exercise. (Kainji/Shirati).

Good Governance: Definitional Issues

- The first element of good governance is the existence of democracy through a free and fair election: A democratic government yields/consists of the following elements
  a) Political Rights-free vote; completion for public office; joining parties, and electing representatives.
  b) Civil liberties-freedom of expression and belief; “rule of law”; and personal autonomy from state
  c) Equal rights-equal opportunities, equal treatment, equal access
  d) Accountability-Public Officials carrying out responsibilities and being answerable to the public
  e) Transparency-Public right to information on governance
  f) Provision of Public Services-Safety, health, education
  g) Rule of law-an autonomous legal order with equality under the law; predictability: legitimacy
  h) Electoral Representation-the institution of parliament as part of 1) representation 2) “checks and balances”.
  i) The Constitutional and Orderly Change of Governments-No COUPS!

The Military and Good Governance

- A clear and unambiguous role of the military is essential to good governance and democratic stability. The military must not be politicized neither should it engage in political activity;
- As part of a broader society and confidence builder, there is need for greater interactions with civil society and civilians in programs such as a) literacy programs; b) visits by military officers to educational institutions; c) workshops, seminars d) provision of health services; e) aide to civilians in emergencies; f) training in humanitarian law
- As part of a clear role of the military, it must remain subservient to civilian control and oversight while providing essential services when appropriate e.g. peacekeeping, support for combating drug trafficing,etc.

Good Governance and Stability

- Evidence shows that when the state provides basic needs to its people and is responsive to them, recourse to violent protest, criminal activity and coups diminish.
- Good governance also leads to a favorable climate for foreign investment; a stable political environment.
- Elements of Political stability include: a) free press; b) rule of law; c) credible free and fair elections; d)effective parliamentary oversight; e)vibrant political opposition; f) levels of political participation; g) peaceful, related transfer of power.

African Case Studies

Botswana- civilian control; economic growth; successive transfer of power;

Mauritius-Transfer of power; active opposition; economic growth, strong civil society

Challenges to Good Governance

Learning Objectives

- Define poor governance and its elements
- Classification of African States
- Historical Context of governance in West Africa with an outline of challenges to good governance
- Discuss how challenges to good governance negatively impact stability (at national level; at regional level).

Definitional Issues (Poor Governance)

Introduction: The key Challenge to Good Governance is the lack or absence of Democracy (reinforced by poverty) The lack of democracy is likely to lead to the following negative results:

a) The abuse of executive power (a result of non-representation)
b) Lack of accountability on the part of government leaders and officials
c) Lack of accountability leads to: corruption, and resource mismanagement
d) Non-representation leads to a conflict between the government and civil society; with limits of access to power by civilian groups; tensions naturally arise;
e) Lack of democracy also leads to the dysfunctionality of two key institutions in society: Legislative and Judiciary
f) The end result might be: Military Coups! A disaster.

Classification of African States:

Classification helps us to see the danger signs ahead.

Functional: Democratic with steady economic progress ensuring stability; good balance between economic development and population growth;

Semi-Functional: Struggling to keep the elements of a functional state but with major challenges in governance and economic growth.

Failing/Fragile: Progression downward from semi-functional; declining capacity to satisfactorily address political, economic, security and social issues

Failed: Usually triggered by civil war; government unable to contain/defeat armed opposition; Lack of territorial control by state; crisis of legitimacy

Collapsed: The disappearing of the state

Post-Conflict: Essentially beginning the climb from failed towards functionality.

The Historical Context of Governance in West Africa.

Governance in West Africa has gone through three main stages:

- Independence-Mid 1960s, Transfer of Power to Africans; civilian rule, multi-party political system
- Mid 1960s-1990, Military rule; single party authoritarian; civil conflict; economic crisis
- 1990-Present, Return to civilian rule; continued economic crisis; at a crossroads. End of civil conflict- a new West African governance regime?

Human Security II: Protecting Civilians (Strategies and Actions)

Learning Objectives:

- Understand the definition of civilian protection
- Understand the roles, responsibilities and relevant law relating to all of the actions involved in
- Protecting civilians: the state, humanitarians, development organizations, human rights groups, the military
- Examine case studies of effective and ineffective civilian protection.

International Human Rights Law

a) The Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948)
b) The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1966)
c) The International Covenant on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights (1966)

- ICCPR commits its parties to respect the civil and political rights of individuals including: the right to life, freedom of religion, freedom of speech, assembly, due process and fair trial.
- ICESCR commits its parties to work towards the granting of economic, social, and cultural sights to individuals, including labor rights, and rights to health, education and an adequate standard of living.

Human Rights Organizations

There are thousands of human rights organizations in the world; Their principal mission to highlight human rights violations and to advocate for the enforcement of basic human rights. There are thousands of human rights organizations in the world; The best known ones include: Amnesty International, Human Rights Watch, Oxfam, Freedom House, Enough. In West Africa: Naomi??? (3 Examples).

In West Africa, human rights organizations were critical in highlighting abuse of civilians by both government forces and rebel movements in Liberia, Sierra Leone, Guinea, Ivory Coast but also in countries not under conflict: Nigeria

Human Rights organizations protect civilians by shining an international light to violations. Those standing trial now in Arusha, Fue Hague etc were exposed by Human Rights Organizations.

PeaceKeeping

Definition: Peacekeeping is defined by the UN as

"a unique and dynamic instrument developed by the Organization as a way to help countries torn by conflict create conditions for lasting peace." It is distinguished from both peacebuilding and peacemaking.

Roles: Peacekeepers monitor and observe peace processes in post-conflict areas and assist ex-combatents in implementing the peace agreements they may have signed. Personnel usually include: soldiers, police officers, and civilian personnel.

Most operations are established and implemented by the UN but in cases where direct UN involvement is not considered appropriate or feasible, the Security Council authorizes regional organizations such as NATO or ECOWAS to undertake peacekeeping or peaceforcement tasks

African Experiences:

Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL): Good Results?

Somalia (UNOSOM II): Bad Results?

DRC: Mixed Results?

Military Intervention to Protect Civilians

Justification: To save civilians from consequences of conflict. It is the most convincing justification. (Human Suffering/innocent victims)

Important question for West African participants: Was the ECOMOG intervention ever justified? What was the result? Lessons Learned?

Colleagues.

Our graduate proposal has gone through an initial review by officials in the Graduate School (the latest version of that proposal is attached). Moving to the next stage will require us to add more details to our proposed curriculum offerings. On that score we are asking for you input in terms of course offerings.

a) We would like each faculty member to formulate a short, bullet list, or description of their research interests, so we can construct a compendium of faculty expertise roster that reflects our intellectual breadth and grounding.

b) We are asking each colleague to compose a description (3-4 sentences) of two courses you would be interested in developing and teaching at the graduate level. The course should fit into one or more of the specialization areas. Pease indicate the specialization area in which you think the course would fit best. Currently, the titles of the specialization areas are ("Race and Racism in the Modern World," "Political Economy of the Black World," "Gender, Sexuality, and the Body" "Cultural Production," and "Religion and Social Thought."

The proposed course could be
a) a graduate version of what you teach at the undergraduate level
or

b) a new course area encompassing a current or newly developed area of research interest.

Please send your statement of research interests and your course descriptions to Agatha by November 22.

Thank you

Dear Perry:

Thank you for your reminder. I propose to teach the next two courses:

1.The Swahili Language and Society

This course focuses on the culture of the Swahili-speaking people, their perception of being a human and productive member of society, and traditional education. It crystallizes the parenting process in terms of parents' responsibilities toward (their) children. Children's desired behaviors and attitudes toward (their) parents, peers, adults, and their immediate community are addressed. The contribution of the Swahili use and development by children and the educational role of Swahili proverbs in edifying a responsible human being are discussed.

2.The Impact/Influence of the Swahili Language and use on the Christian Church In East Africa and Central Africa

The history of the Swahili language and its use in the ritual and preaching activities in East and Central African churches are discussed.
The course will include 1) the Catholic Church, the Protestant Church and its denominations. Their rituals, practices , and impact on the spiritual perceptions of the Christian believers and values are discussed.

Best regards,

Alphonse

Our graduate proposal has gone through an initial review by officials in the Graduate School (the latest version of that proposal is attached). Moving to the next stage will require us to add more details to our proposed curriculum offerings. On that score we are asking for you input in terms of course offerings.

a) We would like each faculty member to formulate a short, bullet list, or description of their research interests, so we can construct a compendium of faculty expertise roster that reflects our intellectual breadth and grounding.

b) We are asking each colleague to compose a description (3-4 sentences) of two courses you would be interested in developing and teaching at the graduate level. The course should fit into one or more of the specialization areas. Pease indicate the specialization area in which you think the course would fit best. Currently, the titles of the specialization areas are ("Race and Racism in the Modern World," "Political Economy of the Black World," "Gender, Sexuality, and the Body" "Cultural Production," and "Religion and Social Thought."

The proposed course could be

a) a graduate version of what you teach at the undergraduate level or

b) a new course area encompassing a current or newly developed area of research interest.

Please send your statement of research interests and your course descriptions to Agatha by November 22.

Thank you

Jonathan --

Apropos our chairs' discussion yesterday, here is yet another totally out of the blue example of another unit using "going online" to outsource a huge new burden onto department chairs. This new policy requires the department chair not only to approve every IRB proposal for faculty research grants, as is normal, but will also require them to approve every student IRB proposal as well, in a role as "department approver," rather than leaving these approvals to the individual faculty advisors and the IRB. The only alternative would seem to be to give EVERY faculty member the status of "department approver," which would clearly be inappropriate in that it would also allow anyone to sign off on faculty research grants as well.

We have large numbers of student IRB proposals even from this small department, for everything from honors theses to dissertations to independent research projects of various kinds, and it has always been far more efficient and appropriate for the faculty advisor to sign off on these than to have the chair review them all. The chairs do not have time to do the IRB's work for them on student proposals.

Why were the chairs never consulted on this, and what can be done about it?!

Sincerely,

Pete

Department Chairs, Center Directors and Research Role Managers:

After several years of work toward this goal, we are nearly ready to launch the next phase of the IRB Information System (IRBIS). This next phase represents a major milestone for human subjects research at Carolina – ONLINE IRB SUBMISSIONS! Given the complexity of this transition, we plan to launch this long-awaited upgrade in a phased approach, with some departments going live sooner than others. There will soon be additional communications with additional details, including training opportunities for departments and researchers. For today, we need your help to pre-populate the electronic system with key departmental representatives.

As part of the online submission process, IRB studies will be routed to the appointing and administering (if applicable) departments of the Principal Investigator (PI). This will be very similar to what occurs with the RAMSeS system for funding proposals. A department approval within IRBIS verifies that your unit is aware of the study, that it is appropriate for the PI to conduct, that the nature and risks of the study are acceptable to your department, and that you have the proper facilities and resources (including data security protections) to support the study. If the chair/director is not providing this verification personally, it must be someone who can act on behalf of the chair/director.

We need your help in identifying the appropriate persons to review and approve IRB submissions for your area. There are two possible roles that individuals may have within the system: IRB SUBMISSION REVIEWER and IRB SUBMISSION APPROVER. The Reviewer role will grant an individual the permission to see a study when it is routed to a department, but that individual will NOT be able to approve the study; this restricted role is optional, and only applies to departments that may have multiple reviewers (e.g., pre-IRB review committees) who shouldn't have the ability to approve studies individually. The Approver role will grant an individual the ability to review and approve a study on behalf of a department.

Similar to the way RAMSeS functions with funding proposals, an IRB study in IRBIS cannot proceed to the IRB until all department approvals have been obtained. As such, we highly recommend that there be at least two individuals granted the Approver role per department to ensure redundancy in the event someone is unavailable.

Please consider carefully which individuals within your department/center should be granted the IRB Submission Approver and IRB Submission Reviewer (optional) roles, drawing on your knowledge of how the unit works, and whether yours is a unit with a pre-IRB ("local") review committee. Once you have identified these individuals, your Role Manager should use the ability he/she already has to grant them the appropriate roles by using the Research Contacts system, located at http://cfx5.research.unc.edu/research_contacts. Instructions on how to do this can be found at http://research.unc.edu/offices/research-info-systems/enterprise-applications/DATA_RES_ORIS_CONTACTS.

If you have questions regarding this request, please don't hesitate to contact the Office of Research Information Systems at 843-2594. Meanwhile, thanks in advance for your assistance with this important step!

Hello Julius,

Agatha and I just figured out that her originally forwarded message did not include attachments that had further instructions. I had completed a version for this year's report based on the template used in past years. (I have attached it here). But the instructions call for more specified tasks and information; especially regarding student writing assessment. (the attached documents speak to that). I hope you can review the attached information and help me figure out how to satisfy these new requirements. My thought is to enlist Reg to report in a systematic way on the writing skills of his student papers (either this year or last).

Given these additional tasks, the report (which I thought it was completed until I discovered the new tasks) is unfortunately still not done .

Apprising you of this fact, I am also asking for you assistance.

This message is being sent on behalf of Dean Karen Gil to all Department Chairs and Directors of Curricula in the College of Arts & Sciences, and copied to all managers.

Dear Colleagues,

Each fall since 2006 every unit in the College that has a teaching responsibility has submitted its annual assessment on student learning outcomes. The attached documents pertain to the assessment report that the College requests of your unit for 2010. Please give this matter your attention to ensure timely delivery of your unit's report by 29 November 2010.

I know that generating an assessment report each year requires time and effort, but I am encouraged by the progress the College is making as we try to focus on the improvement of our teaching programs, not simply compliance with accreditation standards.

Thank you in advance for your report and the support you give to assessment in your unit.

December 1, 2010

Department Name: African and Afro-American Studies Contact Person: Perry Hall
Program: B.A. in African and Afro-American Studies

Outcome(s) Assessed During 2009-10	Assessment Methods Used	Findings	Use of Results (Action)
Identify and explain sources of historical change that have shaped Africa and its diaspora.	Review of papers and presentations in selected African and Afro-American Studies classes by a faculty team.	Examining the work of 14 students in the Afro-American Studies Senior Seminar class, the faculty team rated 5 as excellent and five as good in demonstrating understanding of sources of historical change.	Faculty team will review seminar and general curriculum to identify areas to strengthen in terms of both historical foundations and contemporary perspectives.
Successfully qualify for jobs, occupations, or higher level studies that incorporate knowledge, skills, and capabilities gained in the program of study.	Senior exit interviews	Our information indicates that graduating majors from the past academic year have positions in, graduate School (5) Teach for America (3), international development agencies (4) , community development (3), government (4), and the Peace corps (3).	Faculty team will use survey results to better advise our majors on options for employment and possibilities of professional training and education

RE: 2010 assessment reports

DATE: October 28, 2010

To promote a culture of systematic assessment of student learning at the unit level in the College, former Dean Bernadette Gray-Little initiated a process of planning and reporting of student learning outcomes on an annual basis. In October 2006, each unit was asked to submit to the College a report about each degree program (mission and goals of a center, institute, program, etc.) that explained:

a) the assessment(s) the unit undertook during the previous academic year,
b) what the unit learned from the assessment(s), and
c) what the unit intends to do or already has enacted in response to what it learned.

In October 2007 and 2008 and in December 2009 we requested an updated assessment report from each unit, in keeping with the College's commitment to maintain its culture of assessment. We're now asking that you submit to your Senior Associate Dean your 2010 unit assessment report, preferably in electronic format, by 29 November 2010.

Since UNC is approaching its fifth-year review from the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools, we need some additional information from each department. Your report should incorporate the topics above and also the questions below:

1. Reviewing the past five years of your assessments, what have you done with the results of those assessments? How has your department used those results to improve undergraduate or graduate student learning? Has assessment affected curriculum, for instance, or course assignments, or testing?
2. Now that your initial overall unit assessment plan is five years old, do you feel the plan needs to be revised, updated, or otherwise modified? Since the goal of these assessment plans is program improvement, especially in student learning, if you feel your assessment plan could be improved by a mid-course modification of what your unit should assess over the next five years, please explain in your report.
3. Has your unit's report(s) on student learning included an analysis of a sample of student writing assignments? Many units have already undertaken this in a previous report, but if yours hasn't as yet, your 2010 report should contain such an analysis.

Analysis of sample student writing skills: In this part of your report, you develop a set of rubrics, i.e., a list of the criteria your faculty use to assess the writing skills of your students. The "Rubrics" document that follows this memo will help you see how other universities have used rubrics to define and rate the set of skills in writing that they attempt to assess. Your unit should develop its own set of rubrics for assessing student performance on a given writing assignment.

Please bear in mind that this analysis of student writing skills need not be devoted to more than a sample of papers. The Office of Institutional Research and Assessment (OIRA) can provide financial resources to compensate a faculty member (perhaps from your fixed-term ranks) to review a sample of these written assignments, once your unit has developed its set of assessment rubrics. Please be sure that the analysis of student writing that you provide in your assessment report refers back to an assessment goal stated in your unit's original or evolving assessment plan.

When you have completed your 2010 unit assessment report, please attach a copy of the assessment plan you have been following – which you originally submitted in 2005 and have continued to work from – or versions you have updated along the way.

A copy of your unit's 2010 report and your unit's original assessment plan should be sent to Bill, Bobbi, and Lynn Williford in OIRA for inclusion in the centralized database of University-wide assessment activities.

As in the past, the College does not expect any unit to undertake a full-scale assessment of all student learning in any given year. What we wish to learn every fall semester is what part of your long-term unit assessment plan you undertook during the previous academic year, what you learned from it, and how what you learned will affect your unit's teaching program in the future.

Thanks for your reports, which we look forward to reading, and for your cooperation in this fall's overall curriculum assessment.

RUBRICS

Once you have identified a means of assessment, the next step is identifying a scoring procedure. The assessment methodology you choose will dictate how you will score student data. If you are using some type of objective assessment to measure student learning than the instrument should be scored dichotomously with an answer key to ensure standardization. Scores will be presented in the form of the number or percent correct.

Standardized assessments are usually scored by a testing company and results can be presented in the form of raw or scale scores to make interpretation easy. Results may be aggregated across subscales or for the test as a whole (i.e., composite score).

Performance assessments require the use of a standardized scoring procedure usually involving a rubric. A rubric is a matrix that identifies the expected outcomes of performance on task with the respective levels of performance along those outcomes. There are two type of scoring rubrics. Analytic scoring rubrics break scoring down into components. They provide descriptions and sub-scores for each characteristic of performance. For example, a writing assessment may be broken down into integration of ideas, mechanics, and clarity of expression. Holistic scoring rubrics on the other hand provide a single score for overall performance. Because of this analytic scoring rubrics provide more information and have more of a diagnostic value than holistic scoring rubrics.

There are four components to a rubric: 1) a task description; 2) task dimensions; 3) a performance scale; and 4) cell descriptions. (See the figure on the following page.) The task description describes the assessment activity that serves as a reminder to the grader as to what the task is about. This can be created directly by cutting and pasting from a course syllabus or from the assessment task directions. The task dimensions lay out and describe the parts of the task and are listed in the first column of the table. They should be directly observable and in harmony with the program's learning outcomes. The performance scale indentifies the levels of performance along each of the dimensions and is presented in the first row of the table. Scales should include three to five points. Too many scales points makes it more difficult to differentiate between performance levels. Finally, cell descriptions operationalize what each level of performance means for each dimension. These may include check boxes beside each element of the performance description in the cell. They help convey why the student is given a particular score. The example below comes from Stevens & Levi, (2004).

> Task Description: Each student will make a 5-minute presentation on the changes in one Virginia community over the past thirty years. The student may focus the presentation in any way he/she wishes, but there needs to be a thesis of some sort, not just chorological exposition. The presentation should include x, y, and z.

Dimension 1
Dimension 2
Dimension 3

Developing A Rubric

When developing a rubric, first complete the table by filling in the dimensions in the first column. After you have completed this step, fill in the scale points along the boxes in the first row. Huba and Freed (2000) have developed a list of scale points which is presented below for your assistance. It is helpful to frame scale points in a positive light in order to mitigate potential shock for low marks. Complete the cell descriptions next for each row and corresponding column. Start out by identifying the extreme levels of performance (i.e., the highest and lowest levels of performance). The lowest level of performance can be the negation of the exemplary category or a list of typical mistakes that students may make. It may be helpful to look at student work to identify these descriptions. Next fill in the middle categories.

Once you completed your rubric, share it with other faculty members in the program to get their feedback. Ask them to apply it to a sample of student work to determine if they understand the dimensions and performance

(Huba & Freed, 2000)

Scoring Using A Rubric

Because rating performance involves human judgment, it is subject to error. Personal biases, carry-over effects of judgments due to preceding tasks, and inconsistency in scoring due to lack of standardization of scoring criteria intrude and limit the value of the ratings. To avoid these common errors, 1) rate the performance of all students on one task before going to the next to keep scoring criteria in mind; 2) whenever possible rate performance without knowledge of student's name to avoid halo effects; 3) use multiple raters for high-stakes decisions; and 4) train your raters to calibrate their scoring by bringing them together to review their responses in order to identify patterns of inconsistent responses.

Sample Rubric: UR General Education Field of Study for the Natural Sciences

Task Description: Each student will develop a lab report for the particular experiment in question. This report should include an abstract, introduction, instrumentation and procedure, discussion, error analysis, and conclusion sections. Students must show an understanding of the topic and support all generalizations with details.

LEARNING OUTCOMES	Exemplary	Proficient	Marginal	Unacceptable
Students will demonstrate in-depth knowledge and understanding of content material within the course discipline.	Clear indication of higher order thinking demonstrating mastery of the material.	Some indication of higher order thinking demonstrating mastery of the material.	Some placement of ideas in appropriate disciplinary context. Limited evidence of higher order thinking.	Limited or no evidence of higher order thinking with confused demonstration of understanding of the material.
Students will demonstrate ability to formulate and test good scientific hypotheses.	Formulates elegant and easy to test hypotheses with no confounding variables. Applies appropriate methodologies.	Formulates hypotheses that are testable but lack some clarity or contain some confounding variables. Usually applies appropriate methodologies.	Formulates non-testable hypotheses but contain elements indicative of some understanding of the importance of elegance/ clarity in hypothesis creation. Designs weak experiments.	Formulates non-testable hypotheses and provides no indication of an understanding of the importance of elegance/ clarity in hypothesis formation. Consistently designs poor experiments.
Students will analyze and interpret data using discipline-specific tools.	Consistently identifies and correctly applies appropriate quantitative/qualitative methodologies.	Typically identifies and usually applies appropriate quantitative/qualitative methodologies.	Inconsistently identifies and irregularly applies appropriate quantitative/ qualitative methodologies.	Fails to identify or apply appropriate quantitative/ qualitative methodologies.
Students will interpret knowledge in meaningful and appropriate ways as they draw conclusions about the significance of scientific data.	Draws logical conclusions that follow from data in a manner indicating clear understanding of significance.	Conclusions are generally solid, but may lack some clarity or consistency with data.	Extrapolates beyond the data creating nonviable interpretations of data at hand.	Draws incorrect conclusions and misunderstandings the significance of data/findings.

Guide for writing essays in ATH 305 Peoples and Cultures of Latin America

Criteria	A good paper manifests these qualities:	An excellent paper develop also:
1. Problem or Issue	Clearly identifies a main problem or issue, and summarizes it in relation to essay questions.	Examines several dimensions of the problem or issue and relationships among them.
2. Evidence	Presents supporting evidence from course materials in the form of information, ethnographic descriptions, examples, and quotes. Identifies the sources and assesses the quality of this evidence.	Provides evidence from additional readings, films, news, class discussions.
3. Concepts, assumptions, theories	Identifies ideas, approaches and methods that shape the arguments of authors and/or the people whom they describe: i.e. machismo, gender, contradictory consciousness, modernization or dependency theory, nationalism, revolution, liberation theology, critical race theory, feminism, etc.	Assesses the relevance and implications of specific concepts and assumptions.
4. Context	Locates the authors and/or the people or events that they describe in appropriate cultural, social, national, disciplinary, political, religious and/or historical contexts.	Make connections between the context and the way people think, talk, and act.
5. Perspectives	Compares perspectives of different people or groups described. Compares different ways of analyzing or interpreting the material.	Discusses implications of competing perspectives on issue.
6. Student's analysis or point of view	Presents student's own perspective and position. Raises own questions, critiques, or doubts about the author's message and perspective.	Identifies students' assumptions, stereotypes or prejudices that were somehow challenged or shifted in the process of working with material.
7. Conclusions, implications, consequences	Identifies and discusses conclusions and/or consequences of given perspectives or analyses on the issue at hand.	Considers information and context in identifying implications of the arguments and issues.
8. Write well	Shows correct grammar, and correct punctuation. Quotes, ideas and paraphrases are properly attributed to original sources and references listed at end of essay.	Demonstrates good organization, no gratuitous repetition, strong and compelling prose.

2009-10 Assessment Report

Department of African and Afro-American Studies

December 1, 2010

Department Name: African and Afro-American Studies Contact Person: Perry Hall
Program: B.A. in African and Afro-American Studies

Outcome(s) Assessed During 2009-10	Assessment Methods Used	Findings	Use of Results (Action)
Identify and explain sources of historical change that have shaped Africa and its diaspora.	Review of papers and presentations in selected African and Afro-American Studies classes by a faculty team.	Examining the work of 14 students in the Afro-American Studies Senior Seminar class, the faculty team rated 5 as excellent and five as good in demonstrating understanding of sources of historical change.	Faculty team will review seminar and general curriculum to identify areas to strengthen in terms of both historical foundations and contemporary perspectives.
Successfully qualify for jobs, occupations, or higher level studies that incorporate knowledge, skills, and capabilities gained in the program of study.	Senior exit interviews	Our information indicates that graduating majors from the past academic year have positions in, graduate School (5) Teach for America (3), international development agencies (4) , community development (3), government (4), and the Peace corps (3).	Faculty team will use survey results to better advise our majors on options for employment and possibilities of professional training and education

TO: Unit Chairs and Directors in the College of Arts & Sciences

FROM: Bill Andrews and Bobbi Owen, Senior Associate Deans

DATE: October 28, 2010

To promote a culture of systematic assessment of student learning at the unit level in the College, former Dean Bernadette Gray-Little initiated a process of planning and reporting of student learning outcomes on an annual basis. In October 2006, each unit was asked to submit to the College a report about each degree program (mission and goals of a center, institute, program, etc.) that explained:

a) the assessment(s) the unit undertook during the previous academic year,
b) what the unit learned from the assessment(s), and
c) what the unit intends to do or already has enacted in response to what it learned.

In October 2007 and 2008 and in December 2009 we requested an updated assessment report from each unit, in keeping with the College's commitment to maintain its culture of assessment. We're now asking that you submit to your Senior Associate Dean your 2010 unit assessment report, preferably in electronic format, by 29 November 2010.

Since UNC is approaching its fifth-year review from the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools, we need some additional information from each department. Your report should incorporate the topics above and also the questions below:

1. Reviewing the past five years of your assessments, what have you done with the results of those assessments? How has your department used those results to improve undergraduate or graduate student learning? Has assessment affected curriculum, for instance, or course assignments, or testing?
2. Now that your initial overall unit assessment plan is five years old, do you feel the plan needs to be revised, updated, or otherwise modified? Since the goal of these assessment plans is program improvement, especially in student learning, if you feel your assessment plan could be improved by a mid-course modification of what your unit should assess over the next five years, please explain in your report.
3. Has your unit's report(s) on student learning included an analysis of a sample of student writing assignments? Many units have already undertaken this in a previous report, but if yours hasn't as yet, your 2010 report should contain such an analysis.

Analysis of sample student writing skills: In this part of your report, you develop a set of rubrics, i.e., a list of the criteria your faculty use to assess the writing skills of your students. The "Rubrics" document that follows this memo will help you see how other universities have used rubrics to define and rate the set of skills in writing that they attempt to assess. Your unit should develop its own set of rubrics for assessing student performance on a given writing assignment.

Please bear in mind that this analysis of student writing skills need not be devoted to more than a sample of papers. The Office of Institutional Research and Assessment (OIRA) can provide financial resources to compensate a faculty member (perhaps from your fixed-term ranks) to review a sample of these written assignments, once your unit has developed its set of assessment rubrics. Please be sure that the analysis of student writing that you provide in your assessment report refers back to an assessment goal stated in your unit's original or evolving assessment plan.

When you have completed your 2010 unit assessment report, please attach a copy of the assessment plan you have been following – which you originally submitted in 2005 and have continued to work from – or versions you have updated along the way.

A copy of your unit's 2010 report and your unit's original assessment plan should be sent to Bill, Bobbi, and Lynn Williford in OIRA for inclusion in the centralized database of University-wide assessment activities.

As in the past, the College does not expect any unit to undertake a full-scale assessment of all student learning in any given year. What we wish to learn every fall semester is what part of your long-term unit assessment plan you undertook during the previous academic year, what you learned from it, and how what you learned will affect your unit's teaching program in the future.

Thanks for your reports, which we look forward to reading, and for your cooperation in this fall's overall curriculum assessment.

RUBRICS

Once you have identified a means of assessment, the next step is identifying a scoring procedure. The assessment methodology you choose will dictate how you will score student data. If you are using some type of objective assessment to measure student learning than the instrument should be scored dichotomously with an answer key to ensure standardization. Scores will be presented in the form of the number or percent correct.

Standardized assessments are usually scored by a testing company and results can be presented in the form of raw or scale scores to make interpretation easy. Results may be aggregated across subscales or for the test as a whole (i.e., composite score).

Performance assessments require the use of a standardized scoring procedure usually involving a rubric. A rubric is a matrix that identifies the expected outcomes of performance on task with the respective levels of performance along those outcomes. There are two type of scoring rubrics. Analytic scoring rubrics break scoring down into components. They provide descriptions and sub-scores for each characteristic of performance. For example, a writing assessment may be broken down into integration of ideas, mechanics, and clarity of expression. Holistic scoring rubrics on the other hand provide a single score for overall performance. Because of this analytic scoring rubrics provide more information and have more of a diagnostic value than holistic scoring rubrics.

There are four components to a rubric: 1) a task description; 2) task dimensions; 3) a performance scale; and 4) cell descriptions. (See the figure on the following page.) The task description describes the assessment activity that serves as a reminder to the grader as to what the task is about. This can be created directly by cutting and pasting from a course syllabus or from the assessment task directions. The task dimensions lay out and describe the parts of the task and are listed in the first column of the table. They should be directly observable and in harmony with the program's learning outcomes. The performance scale indentifies the levels of performance along each of the dimensions and is presented in the first row of the table. Scales should include three to five points. Too many scales points makes it more difficult to differentiate between performance levels. Finally, cell descriptions operationalize what each level of performance means for each dimension. These may include check boxes beside each element of the performance description in the cell. They help convey why the student is given a particular score. The example below comes from Stevens & Levi, (2004).

> Task Description: Each student will make a 5-minute presentation on the changes in one Virginia community over the past thirty years. The student may focus the presentation in any way he/she wishes, but there needs to be a thesis of some sort, not just chorological exposition. The presentation should include x, y, and z.

Dimension 1
Dimension 2
Dimension 3

Developing A Rubric

When developing a rubric, first complete the table by filling in the dimensions in the first column. After you have completed this step, fill in the scale points along the boxes in the first row. Huba and Freed (2000) have developed a list of scale points which is presented below for your assistance. It is helpful to frame scale points in a positive light in order to mitigate potential shock for low marks. Complete the cell descriptions next for each row and corresponding column. Start out by identifying the extreme levels of performance (i.e., the highest and lowest levels of performance). The lowest level of performance can be the negation of the exemplary category or a list of typical mistakes that students may make. It may be helpful to look at student work to identify these descriptions. Next fill in the middle categories.

Once you completed your rubric, share it with other faculty members in the program to get their feedback. Ask them to apply it to a sample of student work to determine if they understand the dimensions and performance

Not Yet Competent	Partly Competent	Competent	Sophisticated
Unacceptable	Marginal	Proficient	Exemplary
Novice	Intermediate	Intermediate High	Advanced

(Huba & Freed, 2000)

Scoring Using A Rubric

Because rating performance involves human judgment, it is subject to error. Personal biases, carry-over effects of judgments due to preceding tasks, and inconsistency in scoring due to lack of standardization of scoring criteria intrude and limit the value of the ratings. To avoid these common errors, 1) rate the performance of all students on one task before going to the next to keep scoring criteria in mind; 2) whenever possible rate performance without knowledge of student's name to avoid halo effects; 3) use multiple raters for high-stakes decisions; and 4) train your raters to calibrate their scoring by bringing them together to review their responses in order to identify patterns of inconsistent responses.

Sample Rubric: UR General Education Field of Study for the Natural Sciences

Task Description: Each student will develop a lab report for the particular experiment in question. This report should include an abstract, introduction, instrumentation and procedure, discussion, error analysis, and conclusion sections. Students must show an understanding of the topic and support all generalizations with details.

LEARNING OUTCOMES	Exemplary	Proficient	Marginal	Unacceptable
Students will demonstrate in-depth knowledge and understanding of content material within the course discipline.	Clear indication of higher order thinking demonstrating mastery of the material.	Some indication of higher order thinking demonstrating mastery of the material.	Some placement of ideas in appropriate disciplinary context. Limited evidence of higher order thinking.	Limited or no evidence of higher order thinking with confused demonstration of understanding of the material.
Students will demonstrate ability to formulate and test good scientific hypotheses.	Formulates elegant and easy to test hypotheses with no confounding variables. Applies appropriate methodologies.	Formulates hypotheses that are testable but lack some clarity or contain some confounding variables. Usually applies appropriate methodologies.	Formulates non-testable hypotheses but contain elements indicative of some understanding of the importance of elegance/ clarity in hypothesis creation. Designs weak experiments.	Formulates non-testable hypotheses and provides no indication of an understanding of the importance of elegance/ clarity in hypothesis formation. Consistently designs poor experiments.
Students will analyze and interpret data using discipline-specific tools.	Consistently identifies and correctly applies appropriate quantitative/qualitative methodologies.	Typically identifies and usually applies appropriate quantitative/qualitative methodologies.	Inconsistently identifies and irregularly applies appropriate quantitative/ qualitative methodologies.	Fails to identify or apply appropriate quantitative/ qualitative methodologies.
Students will interpret knowledge in meaningful and appropriate ways as they draw conclusions about the significance of scientific data.	Draws logical conclusions that follow from data in a manner indicating clear understanding of significance.	Conclusions are generally solid, but may lack some clarity or consistency with data.	Extrapolates beyond the data creating nonviable interpretations of data at hand.	Draws incorrect conclusions and misunderstandings the significance of data/findings.

Those funds did expire when they weren't taken up last academic year but let me authorize a one-time $500 research support fund which can be taken from our 2010-11 development fund.

I do hope Lara and AA will be able to work it out this time

Subject: African American History Month Lecture

December 14, 2010

Dear Julius:

In February 2005 the Department of History, with the assistance of founding co-sponsors, presented the University of North Carolina's inaugural campus-wide African American History Month Lecture. Mary Frances Berry, distinguished scholar of legal and African American history, was the inaugural lecturer. More than two hundred people from the student body, faculty, administration, neighboring universities, and the wider community formally celebrated African American History Month as an observance of this University. Subsequent lectures featuring William Jones, Barbara Ransby, Robin D. G. Kelley, Lonnie Bunch and James Anderson were equally successful. The principle of university-wide acknowledgment and observance of African American History is consistent with the mission and the vision of this University.

We are preparing now for the seventh campus-wide African American History Month Event. This year we will direct our attention to the Civil War and the struggle African Americans waged to secure freedom. To reflect on the conflict we are pleased to announce that actor and playwright, Mike Wiley will produce and perform a play he has written for the occasion. The performance will raise exciting questions about the meaning of the Civil War for African Americans and the use of art for engaging these issues. Over the past decade Wiley has produced a number of one-man dramas to engage pivotal moments in African American life. His work has been featured in the 2009 National Black Theater Festival and has been jury-selected for a number of professional industry showcases. The performance will take place in the Stone Center Theater at 7:00 p.m. on Wednesday, February 16, 2009. You will receive further information and an invitation as the date of the campus-wide performance approaches.

We are very grateful for the support of the founding co-sponsors and hope that you will again join us in support of what promises to be an intellectually stimulating event. It is our hope that your budget will permit you to continue your support of this important event. We will be so appreciative to you. Your support will permit us to continue the tradition of publicizing the event widely and offering a reception after the lecture.

Thank you for your kind attention and consideration of this request. We hope to hear from you soon. Please respond to LaTissa C. Davis (davila@email.unc.edu) or Heather Williams (hawill@email.unc.edu.).

Sincerely yours,

Committee for the Annual African American History Month Lecture

Subject: INFORMATIONAL: Annual Benefits Reminders

From: Brian Usischon, Benefits Services
Office of Human Resources

With the start of the new year around the corner, it's a great time to review some important benefit information.

Annual Enrollment Changes: Any benefit changes made during the annual enrollment for NCFlex and the University benefit programs take effect Jan. 1. Remember to check your pay stubs (Jan. 14 for biweekly paid employees and Jan. 31 for monthly paid employees) to ensure that the programs you elected are included with the correct deductions.

MetLife Life Insurance: If you are enrolled in this plan, you may see a change in your deductions beginning in January. Premiums may be adjusted based on your age and salary as of Dec. 31 each year.

ING (ReliaStar) Life Insurance: If you are enrolled in this plan, you may see a change in your deductions beginning in January. Premiums may be adjusted based on your age and salary as of Jan. 1 each year.

MetLife Critical Illness: If you are enrolled in this plan, you may see a change in your deductions beginning in January. Premiums may be adjusted based on your age and salary as of Jan. 1 each year.

Health Care and Dependent Care Flexible Spending Accounts (FSAs): Claims for the 2010 plan year must be filed with Aon by March 31, 2011. Services must have been rendered by Dec. 31. You can check your FSA balance, claims status and pending reimbursements by registering with the FSA ClaimsPlus site at www.ncflex.selfservicenow.com.
-- FSA claims kits will be mailed to employees' home addresses the last week in December. Please read the enclosed materials concerning when to file claims and when documentation is required.
-- You can provide your e-mail address and receive electronic notification of your claims and payment status. Enter your e-mail address on the FSA ClaimsPlus site. You will continue to receive paper statements if no e-mail address is on file.
-- Review your paycheck to verify the correct per-pay period deductions are taken out for your 2011 NCFlex FSA account(s). If you find errors, contact Benefits Services.

NCFlex Convenience Card: If you have an NCFlex Convenience Card, do not destroy it. New cards will not be issued for the new plan year; they are automatically reissued 30 days prior to the card expiration date.
-- Request an NCFlex Convenience Card through the FSA ClaimsPlus site. To request dependent cards, call the NCFlex FSA service center at 877-371-2926. You can also cancel your NCFlex Convenience Card online, or by calling the NCFlex FSA Customer Service Center. There is a $6 annual fee, and you receive two cards per request. Additional cards are available for a one-time $5 fee per request.

Retirement Plan Limits for 2011:
-- The limit on contributions to a 403(b)/401(k) plan for 2011 is $16,500. If you are over the age of 50, or will turn 50 by Dec. 31, 2011, you are eligible for an additional $5,500 catch-up contribution.
-- The limit on contributions to a 457(b) plan for 2011 is also $16,500.

If you are over the age of 50, or will turn 50 by Dec. 31, 2011, you are eligible for an additional $5,500 catch-up contribution.

Employee contributions to a 403(b) and 401(k) plan are combined; however, employees can maximize saving opportunities by contributing to a 457(b) plan. Amounts contributed to a 457(b) plan are not combined with your 403(b) and/or 401(k) contributions.

If you have questions about your deductions or elections, email benefits@unc.edu or call 919-962-3071.

This message is being sent to all chairs and copied to the managers in the College of Arts and Sciences.

The process for submitting nominations for the Provost's Distinguished Professorships is listed below. Departmental chairs nominating faculty must:

- Submit his/her nomination letter via email in Word format to Jessica Pasion (jvpasion@email.unc.edu), no later than 5pm on Monday, February 7, 2011. The letter will be printed on College letterhead and signed by Dean Gil. Only one letter, signed by the Dean and the Chair, will be submitted. The Dean's signature on the nomination letter is intended to enhance your recommendation.

- Once signed by the Dean, you will be notified that your letter is ready for pick up. The chair must sign the letter for inclusion in the packet.

As stated in the Provost's email, the following items must be included in the nomination packet that you submit to the Provost Office.

- Nomination letter signed by the Dean and Chair

- Nomination letter, if nomination is from an individual faculty member rather than the chair

- The curriculum vita of the nominee

- A list of three references for your nominee complete with contact information

Nomination packets should be submitted electronically as an email attachment to Stephanie Thurman (sthurman@email.unc.edu), no later than Friday, February 18, 2011.

Please direct any questions you may have about this process to Jessica Pasion at jvpasion@email.unc.edu or 962-1165.

Subject: Endorsement of MA in Global Studies

Dear Julius, I have a quick favor to ask of you. On Wednesday morning, the proposal for the MA in Global Studies will be going before the Administrative Boards for another set of approvals. As you know, the College and the Curriculum in Global Studies have been working for many years in developing this proposal, the most recent version of which was shared with you a few months ago. At this time, Andy Reynolds and I are asking for your departmental support for the program (given that your department has affiliated faculty with the Curriculum) – this can be indicated by your returning the letter below with your email signature to Andy and/or Erica in the Curriculum.

Thanks for your cooperation. Please let Andy and/or me know if you have any questions.

Administrative Board of the Graduate School
Administrative Boards of the General College and the College of Arts and Sciences
University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

To the Administrative Boards:

We write to indicate the strong support of our departments for the proposed MA in Global Studies and our full intent to cooperate with the Curriculum in Global Studies and the College of Arts and Sciences in its implementation. The Global Studies program is interdisciplinary by nature, and collaboration across academic units is essential to the success of both the undergraduate and proposed graduate curricula.

As Chairs of departments with faculty who share their teaching and curricular responsibilities between our departments and the Curriculum in Global Studies, we support our affiliated faculty working with the Curriculum in the development and implementation of the MA as part of their teaching, advising, and curricular obligations to Global Studies. We also look forward to having Global Studies MA students enrolled in appropriate courses in our departments.

In addition, we will participate in ongoing and future searches for outstanding joint faculty to support the Curriculum and our departmental research and teaching. The expertise of this diverse and excellent pool of faculty teachers and mentors will contribute greatly to the success of the proposed master's program, and the new master's program will continue and deepen the ongoing interdisciplinary cooperation between the Curriculum and other academic units on campus.

Subject: FORMAL NOTICE: UNC Section 403(b) Plan -- Universal Availability Notice for 2011

UNC Section 403(b) Plan -- Universal Availability Notice for 2011

FROM: Ashley Nicklis, Benefits Services
Office of Human Resources

The University of North Carolina offers you a choice of voluntary supplemental retirement programs on a pre-tax and post-tax (Roth) basis in accordance with Section 403(b) of the Internal Revenue Code. Under The University of North Carolina Section 403(b) Plan ("the 403(b) Plan"), eligible employees may elect to defer a portion of their compensation to the 403(b) Plan to supplement their retirement savings.

The 403(b) Plan is designed to help you invest more money today so that you have the income you need in your retirement years. It provides a supplement to either the N.C. Teachers' and State Employees' Retirement System or the UNC Optional Retirement Program, the State's mandatory retirement plans available to permanent employees who work 30 or more hours per week. Voluntary contributions to the 403(b) Plan have become an increasingly important part of saving for retirement.

Eligibility
All employees who receive compensation reportable on a W-2 and pay FICA are eligible to participate in the 403(b) Plan, so long as the employee elects to contribute at least $200 each calendar year.

Contributions
An eligible employee may elect to defer a portion of his or her compensation on a pre-tax or post-tax (Roth) basis.

Pre-tax Contributions: If you elect to make contributions on a pre-tax basis, both federal and state income taxes are deferred on any contributions and earnings until a distribution is made from the plan. Distributions are taxed as ordinary income for federal and state income tax purposes. Generally, a participant must begin receiving a distribution no later than April 1 following the year in which age 70 1/2 or retirement is attained, whichever is later.

Post-tax Contributions (Roth): A Roth 403(b) account allows you to designate some or all of your contributions on an after-tax basis, rather than the traditional pre-tax contributions. Interest and earnings on these contributions when withdrawn are generally tax-free. In the event of either retirement or termination, your earnings can be withdrawn tax-free as long as it has been five tax years since your first Roth 403(b) contribution and you are at least 59 1/2 years old.

Contribution Limits
Annual contribution limits are set by the Internal Revenue Service (IRS). The IRS allows an eligible employee to make an additional catch-up contribution beginning in the year in which he or she turns age 50. For 2011, the calendar year limit under the 403(b) Plan is as follows:

Calendar Year Annual Contribution Limit: $16,500
Age 50+ Catch-up Contribution Limit: $5,500
Note: This is a combined limit for pre-tax and Roth after-tax contributions.

Approved Vendors
The University has approved Fidelity Investments and TIAA-CREF as the two financial services companies offering options under the 403(b) Plan. Fidelity and TIAA-CREF provide a wide range of mutual fund investment options and annuity products through their own funds and other investment managers in the industry. Both companies offer resources and tools to help participants plan their investment strategy. Eligible employees should contact each vendor for information about plan investment options and services provided.

-- Fidelity Investments: 1-800-343-0860
-- TIAA-CREF: 1-800-842-2888

Enrollment Process
Eligible employees may enroll immediately upon date of hire or at any time. To start the enrollment process, please visit the website at www.northcarolina.edu/403(b) and follow the steps listed:

Step 1 -- Complete a Salary Reduction Agreement (SRA) (forms and instructions available on the website)
Step 2 -- Enroll in the plan with Fidelity and/or TIAA-CREF

Contributions may be designated as a percent of salary or as a flat dollar amount depending on your campus payroll capability. The SRA will apply only to amounts earned after enrolling in the Plan, and an employee's election under the SRA will continue until the SRA is modified or revoked by the employee.

Modifying a Deferral Election
An eligible employee may increase, decrease or stop his or her future contributions to the plan at any time by completing an SRA. Employees may also change from one vendor to another at any time by completing an SRA to stop contributions with the existing vendor, and following the steps above to enter into a new agreement with another vendor. It is also possible to make contributions to more than one vendor at a time.

More Information
If you have questions about the 403(b) Plan, please contact your campus Benefits Representative or visit the 403(b) website at: www.northcarolina.edu/403(b).

Subject: NOW ACCEPTING Applications for 2011 FDD Fellowship

Dear Professor:

Knowing of your interest in conflict issues and the Middle East, I am writing to inform you that the Foundation for the Defense of Democracies now is accepting applications for its annual Academic Fellows Terrorism studies program.

This unique program which provides university professors with a detailed understanding of the terror threat that faces our nation and sister democracies is centered on a 10-day course taught in conjunction with Tel Aviv University. The program takes place entirely in Israel and runs June 11th to June 22nd, 2011 (travel inclusive). Participants interact with academics, diplomats, military and intelligence officials, and politicians from Israel, Jordan, India and the United States. They also visit military bases, border zones and other security installations to learn the practical side of deterring terrorist attacks. All expenses are paid by FDD. The deadline for applications is March 25, 2011.

For more information on the program, please click here.

Or you may feel free to contact me at dana@defenddemocracy.org.

Best regards,

Dana Murphy

Subject: [afriafam] AFRI/AFAM Colloquium

Dear Colleagues:

Happy New Year! I hope this finds you well. All my apologies for what might look like a short notice to you but Kia and I have been working on putting together the spring calendar for the AFRI/AFAM colloquium and also making sure the program is as attractive and diverse as possible. We have four presentations from early February to mid-April.

Our first presentation will take place on Thursday February 3 at 4PM in the Global Education Center (GEC) room 1009 and will be followed by a Happy Hour. We have a guest speaker whose name is John Njenga Karugia, from Kenya. John is a Visiting Scholar in the Asian/Pacific Studies Institute at Duke University. He is a PhD candidate and a researcher at the Research Academy Leipzig and Institute of African Studies in the research study group "Transnationalisation and Regionalisation from the 18th Century to the Present" in the University of Leipzig, Germany. He holds a Masters degree in Global Studies and a Bachelor of Education (Arts: German and English Literature) degree. He has taught seminars on 'China in Africa' at African Studies Institute, German as a foreign language to international students of the Global Studies Master in Leipzig as well as Kiswahili and Kikuyu languages in the Institute of African Studies in Leipzig. Apart from that, he has worked previously as a teacher at the German School Nairobi. John's doctoral work focuses on Chinese Migration to Africa; The Case of Tanzania.

Presentation title: "Chinese Migration to Tanzania; Strategies of Interaction Amongst Chinese Migrants and Tanzanians".

Abstract:
'In order to live in harmony with each other, Chinese migrants and Tanzanians interact in specific ways to ensure each one is benefiting and that peace is maintained despite their different linguistic and cultural backgrounds and also despite competition. I will attempt to briefly discuss some insights from field research findings.'

Forthcoming:

Feb. 24 at noon. "Race and Place Identities among Oklahoma's 'All Black Towns' in the 21st Century." By Karla Slocum from AFAM and Anthropology

Best regards,
Mamarame

Subject: Newsletter

Hi Julius,

During our meeting on Wednesday, I was hoping to mention the newsletter. I asked Travis to add it as an agenda item. I'd like to have the submissions by the end of February, so we can have the newsletter finished in April. I also thought it would be nice to include material on Ann's memorial service (possibly remarks shared by one of the ministers) and material from the department's 40th anniversary celebration.

I also welcome any assistance that other faculty can provide.

I wanted to run these ideas by you, in case you have any suggestions or other ideas.

Best,
Kia

WebEvent Reminder

Title: Due Date for Nomination Letters for Inclusion in Provost's Distinguished Professorships Applications
Date: Monday, February 7, 2011
Time: Unspecified

Description: The Provost Office is pleased to inform you that we will be able to name several of our faculty members to distinguished professorships this year. These professorships may include the following: Cary C. Boshamer Professorships; Kenan Professorships; William R. Kenan, Jr. Professorships, and Burton Craige Professorships. All are open to faculty members throughout the University, with the exception of the Burton Craige Professorship which must go to faculty members in political science or law. I ask for your nominations of exceptionally distinguished faculty members to be considered for these various professorships. Any individual nominated must be a tenured full professor and must have a record of scholarly and educational distinction.

The process for submitting nominations for the Provost's Distinguished Professorships is listed below:

Departmental chairs nominating faculty must:

• Submit his/her nomination letter via email in Word format to Jessica Pasion (jvpasion@email.unc.edu), no later than 5pm on Monday, February 7, 2011. The letter will be printed on College letterhead and signed by Dean Gil. Only one letter, signed by the Dean and the Chair, will be submitted. The Dean's signature on the nomination letter is intended to enhance your recommendation.

• Once signed by the Dean, you will be notified that your letter is ready for pick up. The chair must sign the letter for inclusion in the packet.

As stated in the memo from the Provost, the following items must be included in the nomination packet that you submit to the Provost Office.

- Nomination letter signed by the Dean and Chair
- Nomination letter, if nomination is from an individual faculty member rather than the chair
- The curriculum vita of the nominee
- A list of three references for your nominee complete with contact information

Nomination packets should be submitted electronically as an email attachment to Stephanie Thurman (sthurman@email.unc.edu), no later than Friday, February 18, 2011.

Please direct any questions you may have about this process to Jessica Pasion at jvpasion@email.unc.edu or 962-1165.

Subject: UNC expert on Egypt and/or Tunisia?

Hello, Dee, Kim, Julius and Andy,

I'm wondering whether we have a faculty member who could analyze for media what is going on in this part of the world. I should have asked last week!

We'd need someone who could articulate very specifically what he/she would discuss. The media do not respond if you just say that someone is an expert on Egypt.

We need to say the person can discuss such specific angles as perhaps why the unrest is happening now, whether the protesters in Egypt are likely to give up or prevail, what ideally for the people there and/or U.S. interests should be done in these two countries, whether control might go to Islamic extremists, or, what is likely to happen? Our experts likely will have much better and more specific questions than I have.

If you can think of anyone, please forward this to them, and I would ask that they call me at 962-8589.

Many thanks!

LJ

Subject: [asc_faculty] Course Development and Research Grants from the ASC

Dear Colleagues:
As part of our continued Title VI funding from the US Department of Education, the African Studies Center will be providing several course development grants to UNC faculty this year. Grants may be used to travel in Africa, to purchase materials and resources, or as summer salary. Application information can be found at:
http://africa.unc.edu/funding/faculty/faculty_funding_main.asp

In addition, there are limited funds to support faculty research that is not course-related. Preference here will be for projects that are in some manner related to "Islam in Africa" or to "Sustainability," with likelihood of publication.

The deadline for proposals is March 1. If you have any questions, please feel free to contact me. Regards, Barbara

A Poetry Reading with Dr. Anjail Rashida Ahmad

Tuesday, February 22, 2011, 2:00 p.m.
Pleasants Family Assembly Room, Wilson Library

Anjail Rashida Ahmad, PhD. is currently the director of the Creative Writing program at North Carolina A&T State University. As a poet who experiences blindness, she believes that each person's voice and vision can be vital to the life of a community. She also believes that art in order to be truly effective has to be rooted and grounded in authentic life experience, what it means to be human.

Ahmad has received numerous awards and honors, among them, she was one of two NC artists to win a Headlands Center for the Arts Residency and a NC Arts Council Artist Grant; she was also elected to the board of the NC ACLU. In 2006, she was nominated for the Human Rights Medal for her efforts at social justice.

She has also received the Margaret Walker Alexander Award for Poetry, the Robert Frost Prize in Poetry, the Southern Literary Festival Prize for Poetry, two Janet Preston Prizes for Poetry from the Academy of American Poets, and in 2009, she was nominated for the NC State Poet Laureate post.

She has published the poetry collections the color of memory (out of print) 1997 and necessary kinding with Louisiana State University Press which was a finalist in the Milt Kessler Book Award in 2001. Her manuscript, "when I was your anger" is currently under review with LSU Press.

Her poems have appeared in numerous publications such as The Black Scholar, Obsidian III, The African American Review, Washington Square Review, and she is founder of Black Ink Writers Workshop and The Fractured Writer Sunday Workshop Series in Greensboro.

This one hour program is part of the Library series, Exploring Diversity Through the Cultural and Performing Arts, sponsored by the University's Performing Arts and Special Activities Fund. The event is free and open to the public.

RE: Budget Reductions 2010/11 and 2011/12

I am writing to share the latest information we have in the Dean's Office about new one-time reductions to the University's 2010/11 state budget allocation and permanent reductions for 2011/12, and to let you know how these reductions affect the College and your units. Also enclosed is information about the instructional budget reallocation we discussed earlier with you.

Please read each section below, then complete and return Templates A and B to Stephanie Stadler (sstadler@email.unc.edu) in the Dean's Office on Friday, February 4 by 12 noon.

As always, I appreciate your leadership, dedication and patience as we work together to plan for what will likely be our most challenging budget year.

Overview

As North Carolina and the nation struggle to recover from the ongoing economic crisis, the University has been planning for permanent state budget reductions of 5-10% for 2011/12. More recently our campus was told to plan for a worst-case scenario involving the possibility of permanent reductions in state support of up to 15%. The University also has been instructed to return an additional 2.5% as a one-time reduction of the current 2010/11 state allocation.

This news is challenging for all of us in the College, where we are committed to teach nearly all of the undergraduate credit hours for the University, and more than 20% of the graduate students on our campus. This is especially true in light of three consecutive years of significant state budget reductions. While all of us hope that the worst-case scenarios of permanent reductions in state funding do not occur, the Provost has decided the University should begin implementing a 5% permanent budget reduction to the campus for 2011/12 before July 1. He also has asked us to begin planning now for a possible second permanent reduction (another 5-10% to the University) during 2011/12, as a way to responsibly manage a range of possibilities.

The enclosed reflects our response to the information and instructions the Dean's Office has received from the Provost concerning budget reductions to the College.

2011/12 Permanent Budget Reductions Part I (Actual) and Part II (Estimate)

- The table below includes two parts: Part I indicates the reduction in your unit's permanent state funding that will be assessed for 2011/12.

- Part II (estimate) indicates an additional reduction, which, although tentative at this point, you should consider as you admit graduate students, hire fixed-term faculty, or make other future resource commitments. The Part II amount is subject to change depending on what actions the General Assembly takes later this year regarding the state budget allocation to UNC.
- Please complete Template A to show how you will manage the Part I reduction. Please understand that this is a permanent reduction, i.e. your future state budget allocation will be smaller than in the past due to this and prior permanent reductions.
- Any Part I reductions affecting staff, fixed-term faculty or fund source modifications (e.g., moving staff positions to a non-state source), should be implemented as soon as possible and before July 1.
- We understand that this budget reduction on top of previous budget reductions means it will be very difficult for your colleagues to teach all of the credit hours your unit has offered in past years. You should prioritize instructional staffing to ensure that you can provide introductory courses, general education courses and required courses for majors.

Permanent Budget Reductions for FY 2011/2012
Part I	$9,024
Part II (estimate)	$4,061

2010/11 One-Time Reduction

- Your share of the one-time budget reduction for the current fiscal year is: $4,743.
- To manage this reduction, you may use any uncommitted state funds (instructional budget carryover, SPA lapsing salaries and unspent non-personnel funds), F & A dollars, and/or discretionary/unrestricted trust funds. Restricted trust funds designated for specific uses (i.e. professorships, lectureships, fellowships) cannot be used for this one-time reduction.
- Please complete Template B to show how you will manage your one-time reduction.

Instructional Budget Reallocation

- Your instructional budget consists of a "permanent" allocation from the Dean's Office plus any salary savings resulting from leaves without pay, funded leaves, grant buy-outs and other fund transfers compensating the unit for faculty teaching time. These can be used in a given fiscal year, or can be accumulated from year to year in order to even out available leave savings.
- As indicated in a May 7, 2010 memo, starting July 1, 2011, the Dean's Office will hold back a portion of all permanent instructional budgets each year so that those funds may be reallocated to units based on instructional needs, College priorities and shifting enrollments.
- The amount to be held back for fiscal year 2011/2012 will be 1.5%. This amount may change over time.
- For your information, the table below shows your Budget Reduction Amount (1.5%), your Budget Reallocation Amount, with a Net Reallocation (negative, positive or $0).
- The Dean's Office will process the reallocations; no action is necessary on your part. Do incorporate these figures into your budget calculations for 2011/2012.

Instructional Budget (IB) Reallocations for FY 2011/2012
IB Reduction	IB Reallocation	Net Change
-$ 850	+$ 850	$ 0

For Further Information:

- Any questions concerning how to complete your form should be sent through the Dean's Office remedy system. Other questions may be directed to your Senior Associate Dean.

Subject: Craniometric Study
Attach: Anthro study ppt.pptx

Hello Dr. Nyang'oro,

I enjoyed our chat the other night at the Wilmington 10 dinner and wanted to share with you some more details. I have attached a little power point that I put together explaining some traits used in determining sex and ancestry in the skull.

The craniometric study that I am working on with different populations within Africa and the sub-Mediterranean areas is exploratory research. What is significant about this research is that I am looking at within group variation and between group variation, across geographic space with a unique set of crania. I want to see what traits are similar and different among these populations and how this compares with migration patterns (also looking at how these results compare to published molecular data).

Some of these crania are not current, such as the Copper Age and neolithic Algerian crania. This is interesting in how I can also compare crania from different time periods.

I am sorry I couldn't explain everything so clearly, it's a lot easier to illustrate using graphics. It was great speaking with you and I hope we meet again.

Take care and enjoy!

Sincerely,
Merissa Olmer

Sex and Ancestry

In Forensic Anthropology, the standard features used don't always distinguish between ancestries/races. Diagnostic traits are often shared between ancestries.

It is important to note that many of these characteristics have a higher frequency among particular ancestries and the presence or absence of one or more does not automatically classify an individual into a group.

Forensic Anthropologists utilize the Fordisc program to help in the interpretation of craniofacial measurements (of an unknown skull) in regard to ancestry/race determination. However, this program's reference populations are not all modern, diverse, and representative and the use of this program can be very limited.

Fordisc's designers have stated that this program's classifications provide some useful information, but cannot be taken at face value and the user must be aware of this and not rely solely on the program.

These limitations are not inherent in the system but rather there is a continuing need to improve the database.

Here are some examples of cranial measurements that are used.
http://www.cleber.com.br/standard.html

What Do Forensic Anthropologists Answer?

- During a skeletal analysis, a Biological Profile is constructed, ultimately to ID the person
- What is the sex, age, ancestry, stature? (analytically limited by the bones present and the condition of the bones)
- Any anomalies or evidence of pathologies or trauma?

How does this Work?

- Forensic anthropologists use metric and non-metric traits, in combination
- Metric - use regression equations to determine sex, age, stature, and ancestry of skeletal remains
- Non-metric - presence/absence traits, but usually the morphologies of the skull that are used to assess ancestry are more complex than this, showing a lot of variation

Adult Sex Determination

- Sexual dimorphism – a systematic approach to determining phenotypic differences in form between individuals of different sex within the same species
- Males (crania and long bones) are usually larger, more robust, and longer in a single population
- Be cautious if different populations are involved

Sex Determination: Skull

- Good for sex determination, but pelvis is best
- Generalization: male skull more robust and muscle-marked than female (absolute differences are not always the case)

Ancestry

I feel as though these casts are on the extremes when looking at ancestry, as in these skulls are the “typical” book example.

Ancestry traits

- Face
  - Projection/prognathism
  - Height/shape
  - Shape of orbits
  - Nasal shape
- Vault
  - Browridges
  - Muscle markings
  - Sutures
  - Anomalies (example: wormian bones found at higher frequencies in specific populations)

Also look at width of nasal opening and interorbital width. For me, looking at the area between the eyes and just above the nose, you have sort of pinched nasal bones compared to the cranium to the right. There you have a very wide interorbital breadth.

Ancestry – African Ancestry - Skull

- African Ancestry
  - Wide nasal aperture w/ guttered margin, Slide 12
  - Prognathic profile w/ projecting maxilla
  - No nasal spine, see Slide 12, European ancestry ←
  - Hyperbolic palate shape/ U-shaped, less crowding of teeth

Top: African ancestry, prognathism of lower face (projection). Notice the width interorbital breadth, wide nasal opening, nasal gutter, orbital shape.

Bottom: European ancestry, less prognathic. Notice the pinched nasal bones, sloping orbits and nasal spine (red arrow).

Ancestry – European Ancestry - Skull

- Northern European
  - Narrow nasal aperature (opening) and nasal spine (slide 12)
  - Sharp nasal margin, as opposed to a nasal gutter in (slide 12)
  - Less prognathic/facial projection
  - Crowded dentition, due to smaller palate – parabolic (narrow) shaped rather than hyperbolic
  - Most common group missing 3rd molar, due to smaller palate

Ancestry – Asian Ancestry - Skull

- East Asian/Native American
  - Zygomatic arches (cheek bones) are flared meaning projected outward and forward
  - Less prognathic, flat profile
  - Nasal spine average projection
  - Palate shape is elliptical (rounded) and wide
  - Shovel-shaped incisors, see slide 15 (top picture with showing three teeth)

Jaws and teeth

- Tooth size
- Shape of dental arch/palate
- Incisors
- Gonial inversion

Left: Shovel shaped incisors is a trait found at a higher frequency in Asian and Native American ancestries

- Like I said before, the traits I have shown you for both sex and ancestry have a higher frequency among particular ancestries.
- There is a lot of variation, including mixed ancestries, and the presence/absence of one or more traits does NOT automatically classify an individual into a group.
- When analyzing remains (metric and non-metric), it’s not just a few traits that determine who this individual is, but rather using as much information available to build a biological profile.

I am one of the incorporators of the salsa museum in Spanish Harlem and its former executive director. Salsa is an American musical genre amalgamated by Nuyoricans and Puerto Ricans in El Barrio. I resigned as executive director to establish Lubona Corporation, an education consultancy. Lubona Corporation presents the following museum lectures about the development of Salsa.

http://www.salsasight.com/Clients2.html
My consultancy includes the Department of Musical Instruments of The Metropolitan Museum of Art, the Julliard

School, The Cathedral of St. Patrick, El Museo del Barrio, World Financial Center's Winter Garden, etc.

All of my programs are in tandem with an exhibition of Afro-Amerindian-Antillean instruments at the musical instruments gallery of The Metropolitan Museum of Art. This fact can be used for promotional purposes.

My lectures include Religion, Anthropology, Afro-Caribbean History, Ethnomusicology, African Studies, Puerto Rican Studies, Sociology, Dance, and Music, e.g.:

- "Dancing: Intrinsic Element of Salsa": The percussion in salsa addresses the biorhythm, prompting dancing. The social contact dancing that is performed to salsa is composed of English country dancing and certain African movements. The English Country Dancer written in 1651 by John Playford and the subsequent editions were instrumental in the development of the social contact dancing that is essential to Salsa. Musical compositions and performances contain a direct address to this fundamental element.

- "Ceremonial Origins of Salsa" this program presents instruments, music, and lyrics used in the African, Taino and Spanish Catholic rituals that provide a base for Salsa.

- "Salsa is Nuyorican" the music amalgam known as salsa was created by Puerto Ricans and Nuyoricans in Spanish Harlem. I present the artistic, social and economic contributions.

- "Cuatrismo" this program traces the 15 century evolution of one of salsa's stringed instruments and the national stringed instrument of Puerto Rico: the cuatro. Presently there is a cuatro, tiple and bordonua exhibition at the Museum. This exhibition also includes a Jibaro guitar that was donated to the collection in 1915. The guitar is made from a single block of wood and has African textile chip carvings in its body; there are only two such instruments in existence.

- "Salsa is Dead"; Musical genres follow a standard chronology; they grow folklorically from a community, reach a zenith through brilliant and innovative exponents then mark an epoch. As the Puerto Rican community is diminishing in New York and the epoch passes, salsa follows the standard musical chronology.

- "Catholicism/Salsa": Catholicism is a predominant and catalytic religion within the Puerto Rican and Nuyorican community; therefore, salsa has Catholic lyrics, music and instrumentation. The Catholic Archdiocese of New York has approved this program.

- "The 350+ Year Evolution of Salsa": This program traces the development of salsa beginning with the manufacture and use of percussion by the Africans, which was permitted by the Spaniards in their Caribbean colonies.

- "Maraca & Guiro: Two Taino Instruments in the 21st Century□. The Areyto, a Taino ceremony, utilized the maraca and the guiro to augment this narrative celebration. Today, the maraca is an intrinsic part of Salsa and the Guiro has three distinct variations Cuban, Dominican and Puerto Rican for Son, Merengue and Salsa

Research in Puerto Rico has proved that the Tainos did not disappear, as history books usually assert, but that a great majority of Puerto Ricans has mitochondrial DNA links to these Amerindians.

http://www.taino-tribe.org/pr-taino-dna.htm

My web site www.salsasight.com begins with an image of the main altar of the Cathedral of St. Patrick while a set of Bata drums where playing. The Bata segment served to demonstrate the syncretism between the African religions and Catholicism, which is unique to the Spanish-speaking Caribbean and serves as the African rhythmic, singing and dancing contribution to Salsa. This didactic concert, titled "Catholicism/Salsa" was approved by the Religious Education Department of the Catholic Archdiocese of New York.

The programs are independent but interelated and have differing instrumentation.

Subject: AFAM/AFRI Seats for CTOPS
Attach: AFAM-AFRI.doc

Preparations for registering nearly 4,000 first-year students during CTOPS this summer are already underway. I am writing on behalf of Dean Bobbi Owen, Senior Associate Dean for Undergraduate Education, to ask for your assistance to assure that a sufficient number of seats are available for these students this fall.

For the past three summers, we have released seats for classes appropriate for first-year students throughout the fourteen sessions of CTOPS. Coordinating this effort with academic departments and the Registrar's Office has made this process run smoothly and has resulted in the majority of our incoming class leaving CTOPS with a full fall schedule. Students in their first semester normally register for 5 courses with an average registration of 15-17 credit hours. We seek to spread out the most appropriate (and sought after) courses--about 30,000 credit hours of the total of 60,000 - 68,000 credit hours required for first-year students.

With the conversion to ConnectCarolina, we are faced with new challenges and opportunities to reserve seats for first-year students. Our two options are: (1) Keep max enrollment numbers where they are and set reserve capacities for first-year students, or (2) lower max enrollment numbers upfront--reflecting seats reserved for CTOPS--during the period when continuing students register. We believe the latter option would minimize the number of problems and phone calls to all of our offices and create an efficient process for accommodating the needs of our incoming class.

In response to Dean Gil's request that "all chairs prioritize their units' instructional offerings to ensure that students are able to fulfill their general-education and academic-major requirements," we have identified the courses in your department, outlined in the attached document, that seem appropriate for first-year students.

If you agree, we will work with the Registrar's Office to create the proposed maximum enrollment numbers for early registration and release seats during CTOPS as outlined above. We will keep you informed of any increase or decrease in demand. You do not need to do anything with these proposed numbers, but please respond to me by March 15 so that we can be ready for early registration in April. Be aware that 750 sophomore and junior transfer students will create a demand for seats as well, which we intend to address in a subsequent email.

Feel free to contact me with any questions or concerns you may have. Thank you in advance for helping us meet the academic needs of our first-year and transfer students.

INTERNATIONAL CRISIS GROUP - NEW REPORT

Burundi: From Electoral Boycott to Political Impasse

Nairobi/Brussels, 7 February 2011: Burundi risks reversing the decade of progress it has enjoyed since its civil war ended unless the government resumes political dialogue with the opposition.

Burundi: From Electoral Boycott to Political Impasse, the latest report from the International Crisis Group, examines the serious problems that have developed in the wake of last year's elections that ended in a landside victory for the ruling party, including marginalisation of the opposition and the emergence of violent political banditry. Against a backdrop of weak governance, this combination threatens a major setback for democracy in the still fragile state.

"The ruling party is in effect reinforcing a nascent rebellion and doing harm to democracy by marginalising and repressing the opposition", says Thierry Vircoulon, Crisis Group's Central Africa Project Director.

Following announcement that the ruling Conseil National pour la Défense de la Démocratie et Forces de Défense de la Démocratie (CNDD-FDD) had received 64 per cent of the vote in local elections that all national and international observers considered were free and fair, the opposition parties denounced "massive electoral fraud". Subsequently, they formed a coalition and called for dismissal of the electoral commission and cancellation of the results. When their demands were rejected, most boycotted the contests for president and the legislature, which resulted in overwhelming victories for the ruling party. On the pretext that there had been violent incidents during the presidential vote, the security services arrested many members of the opposition, while its main leaders left the country or went underground.

To halt this post-electoral authoritarian trend, the institutional dialogue between all political actors should be resumed within the framework of a reorganised permanent party forum. The government and the opposition must engage urgently in talks to improve the political and security context. They also need to agree on a law on the status of the opposition guaranteeing political freedom, freedom of assembly and an end to arbitrary arrests. Opposition leaders, in turn, should denounce publicly all acts of violence and renounce violence as a political tool.

The international community and religious leaders must press government and opposition alike to restart talks without delay, in order to end the political impasse, and put pressure on the government to respect its commitments regarding human rights, governance and rule of law.

"Six months after the elections, the breakdown of dialogue between the main opposition parties and the government remains, and the violent political banditry is worrying", says Comfort Ero, Crisis Group's Africa Program Director. "Burundi has made significant progress in consolidating peace in recent years, but it remains a fragile state that still requires international engagement".

From Bruce Hall:
Professor Zekeria ould Ahmed Salem from the Department of Political Science at the Université de Nouakchott in Mauritania will be speaking at Duke University (East Campus, 229 Carr) at 12:00 on Wednesday, February 16. His talk is entitled "Challenging Social Inequality and Debating Islam: Ethnicity, Belonging and Muslim Politics in Mauritania." It focuses on efforts by former slaves (haritin) in Mauritania to win the right to act as imams in mosques. A pre-circulated paper for the talk is available upon request by contacting Bruce Hall (bruce.hall@duke.edu).

Professor Zekeria ould Ahmed Salem obtained his Ph.D. from the Université de Lyon in 1996. He is author of Les Trajectoires d'un Etat-Frontière: Espaces, Evolutions politiques et transformations sociales en Mauritanie (Dakar: CODESRIA, 2004). He will be speaking about research for a forthcoming book to be published this year by Karthala in Paris entitled Prêcher dans le Désert: Savoirs, Violences et Changement social en République Islamique de Mauritanie.

Lunch will be served at the talk.

Subject: [afriafam] Request for Departmental Newsletter Submissions

Dear Colleagues:

On behalf of Kenneth Janken and myself, I am writing to request your ideas and submissions for the next edition of the departmental newsletter. We would like to include information on recent faculty publications, grants, awards, and conference participation. Professional activities and publications completed between May 2010 and May 2011 will be included in the newsletter. We are also seeking stories on the accomplishments of our students and alumni, as well as information/stories on speakers and events that faculty organized during the 2010-2011 academic year.

We are planning to include two special items in the newsletter in addition to updates on departmental faculty, students, and alumni:

The first item is a special tribute to Ann Dunbar. We would like to include some of the beautiful reflections that were shared during the memorial service for Ann. If anyone would like to share their reflections in written form from the memorial service or about Ann more generally, please let us know.

The second item focuses on the department's 40th anniversary celebration. We will follow up with faculty who were involved in planning the 40th anniversary celebration, so items about the department's history and the role of student activism in founding the department can also be included in the newsletter.

If you have any other ideas or suggestions for newsletter stories, please let us know.

The deadline for submissions is February 28th. Please send your submissions to Kenneth and me as a Word document.

Best regards,
Kia

Subject: [afriafam] Admin updates and changes

Dear All,
AS I mentioned in at the Faculty meeting last week, due to continuing budget cuts we are making a few administrative changes. Please see below for the details that we discussed – sorry again for the bad news!

1) Copy Machine – each person will be given a copy machine code so that they can make their own copies and scans, rather than having Travis do this. Along with this, each person will be allotted 250 copies per semester. If you use more copies than this, you will be asked to repay the department through other funds or personal funds. Everyone is encouraged to use Blackboard and other systems that rely on less paper copies. (FYI - scanned documents are not part of the count, only copies that use paper).
2) Letterhead and Envelopes – the department will no longer be using hard letterhead. You will find attached the electronic letterhead that you can type directly onto and print out. This has become very common throughout the College. We will continue to have dept envelopes available in the main office, and we will soon order more that actually stick!
3) Phones – we will be discontinuing phone service for everyone in the department, except for the main office and the Chair's Office. Those with professorship funds or grant funds who would like to pay for a phone are welcome to do so – please let me know which account to use. If you do not have other funds that can be used for phone service, and you feel that a phone is critical to your work, please talk to Julius about having an exception made for you. Phones will be discontinued as of 4/1/2011, so please make your arrangements by March 1st at the latest.
4) Supplies – we have funds to by office supplies and materials. We plan to allocate 5 reams of paper and 2 toner cartridges to each faculty member – this is your allocation for the year, until this time in 2012. If you would prefer to have some other type of supply INSTEAD of paper and toner, or no supplies at all, please let Agatha know by March 1st.
5) Summer School books – if you are teaching a summer school course and need a few books to make the course happen, please email the exact title, author and ISBN to Agatha by March 1st. She will order them directly, so please do not buy them yourselves.
6) NEW ANNOUNCEMENT – I forgot to mention this during our meeting – UNC has changed the policy about reimbursements. Effective immediately, no one may be reimbursed for office supplies (such as Staples, Office Max, etc). If you need supplies and have funds for them, please coordinate this with Travis, and he will order through a UNC contract account.

Sorry for all of this detailed bad news… have a lovely week!
Agatha

Hi Julius,
I'm writing to see if the department will be able to contribute a small amount towards a visit by a Brazilian speaker that I'm bringing to campus on March 1. We've gotten co-sponsorships from the IAAR and the Stone Center, and other sources seem to be tapped out. We'll need another $150-200 to cover her airfare from Miami and other costs. If necessary, I would be willing to have the department contribute to her visit instead of supporting the lunch with the scholars who will be on campus in conjunction with NCOBPS. Please let me know what you think.

Thanks,
Kia

TO: Deans, Directors, Chairs, Directors of Undergraduate Studies, Student Services Managers
FROM: Erika Lindemann, Associate Dean for Undergraduate Curricula
DATE: 11 February 2011
SUBJECT: Approved Curriculum Revisions

As we enter the advising period for fall 2011, you will want to know about five revisions to the 2006 Making Connections curriculum resulting from last year's review and approved by the Faculty Council on December 17, 2010. With apologies for the length of this memo, I want to elaborate on what these curricular changes mean for students in the College of Arts and Sciences.

Supplemental Education
Perhaps the most significant change in the undergraduate curriculum is a revised Supplemental Education requirement. As approved by the Administrative Boards of the General College and College of Arts and Sciences, the recommendation reads as follows:

To revise the Supplemental Education requirement so that students pursuing the BA degree (or the BS degree with a major in psychology) may fulfill it in the following ways:

- By completing a second major or a minor;
- By completing three courses above 199 that are not being used to fulfill the student's major requirements. The three courses must be from outside the home department/curriculum of the major and cannot be cross-listed with a course used to satisfy the requirements for the major.
- By completing a concentration outside a professional school as part of the degree requirements for graduating from the school.

By virtue of this revision, College of Arts and Sciences students who are pursuing a BA degree (or the BS with a major in psychology) may satisfy the Supplemental Education requirement by completing a second major or a minor. Students pursuing a BA degree (or the BS with a major in psychology) who have declared only one major, but no second major and no minor, must satisfy the Supplemental Education requirement by taking three courses above 199 (nine credit hours) outside the home department/curriculum of the major. The three courses must be in addition to, and cannot overlap with, courses fulfilling the student's Foundations and Approaches requirements; however, the three courses may satisfy Connections requirements. The three courses do not have to be drawn from different divisions of the College. The intention of the requirement is simply to ask students with only one major to broaden their perspective.

The revised Supplemental Education requirement is effective this semester and applies to all current students in the College, including graduating seniors. Students with only one major may elect to complete the requirement under the new rules. At the same time, students who have been working under the old rules and wish to finish the Supplemental Education requirement by completing a cluster or a distributive option should be encouraged to do so. Students who are completing a minor or a second major may use this second area of study to fulfill the Supplemental Education requirement.

As before, BA students with a first major in the Schools of Education or Journalism and Mass Communication will satisfy the Supplemental Education requirement by completing a concentration outside the school as part of the BA degree. Now, however, BA students with a first major in the College of Arts and Sciences have the option of satisfying the Supplemental Education requirement by completing a second major or a minor in a professional school.

Advisors may encounter difficulties interpreting the new Supplemental Education requirement when cross-listed courses are involved. The requirement states, "The three courses must be from outside the home department/curriculum of the major and cannot be cross-listed with a course used to satisfy the requirements for the major." This means that cross-listed courses CAN be used to satisfy a particular student's Supplemental Education requirement, if (and only if) the course has not been used to satisfy the requirements for the major. If a course is offered in the home department/curriculum of the major but is cross-listed outside that unit AND is not being used to fulfill a student's major requirements, the course can satisfy the Supplemental Education requirement.

For example, PWAD majors can use either HIST 212 (cross-listed with PWAD 212) or PWAD 212 for the Supplemental Education requirement if they have not used the course for the PWAD major. Similarly, English majors generally cannot use CMPL courses to fulfill Supplemental Education because these courses are offered by the same department. However, an English major could use CMPL 270 (cross-listed with GERM 270, JWST 239, and RELI 239) for Supplemental Education if CMPL 270 (or any of its cross-listed variants) has not been used to satisfy the major. Basically, there can be no sharing of cross-listed courses to satisfy both the major and Supplemental Education requirements.

Other changes
The remaining recommendations approved by the Faculty Council are fairly straightforward:

Effective with the fall 2011 semester, placement into level 4 of a foreign language will satisfy the Foundations foreign language requirement through level 3.
First-time, first-year students and new transfer students entering Carolina in fall 2011 will no longer be required to take the level-4 course to satisfy the level-3 General Education Foundations requirement. Placement in level 4, not completion of a level-4 course, will grant students PL credit for level 3, which satisfies the General Education requirement. Particular majors, however, may continue to require that students demonstrate level-4 proficiency (or higher) in a foreign language. Seniors graduating in May or August 2011 who have not yet satisfied the Foundations foreign language requirement by taking a level-4 course and wish to come under the new rule should submit a petition to the Office of Undergraduate Curriculum (see http://www.unc.edu/depts/uc/ht_petition.html).

Students who have taken, or plan to take, two LFIT courses may do so through the second summer session. Thereafter, students may complete only one LFIT course during their career at Carolina, since the instructional modules and laboratory exercises for all LFIT courses are the same.

Effective with the fall 2011 semester, the Foreign-Language Intensive (FI) requirement is rescinded.
This requirement in the Making Connections curriculum was never implemented for lack of resources.

Effective with the January 15, 2011, course submission deadline, no more than two General Education designations may be assigned to any new or revised course.
The majority of undergraduate courses currently fulfilling General Education requirements do so in only one or two areas of the curriculum. This recommendation, then, confirms current practice as normative. In exceptional cases the College's Curriculum Committee may find that a particular course meets the criteria for a third designation, most likely EE or CI.

Plans are underway to notify students of these changes. Questions about these revisions should be directed to Erika Lindemann (ulinde@email.unc.edu) or Nick Siedentop (nick_siedentop@unc.edu) in the Office of Undergraduate Curricula.

Hi Julius,
Haeran is working with Kai on this, so it is all set. Until we receive funds from Dunbar or other sources, we really don't have any more funds this year. All we have is summer school money, and that can't be used for conferences, trips, speakers, etc. At this point, we don't even have $50 that could be used for events, etc, so you will have to start saying no if people ask you (I know how much you like to say yes!).

The $2,500 Speakers Fund that Jonathan recently authorized was in fact for the 40th anniversary in the fall 2010, so it has already been spent (and then some!).
Just want to be sure we are on the same page.
Take care,
Agatha

Hi Julius,
I'm writing to see if the department will be able to contribute a small amount towards a visit by a Brazilian speaker that I'm bringing to campus on March 1. We've gotten co-sponsorships from the IAAR and the Stone Center, and other sources seem to be tapped out. We'll need another $150-200 to cover her airfare from Miami and other costs. If necessary, I would be willing to have the department contribute to her visit instead of supporting the lunch with the scholars who will be on campus in conjunction with NCOBPS. Please let me know what you think.

Thanks,

MEMORANDUM

TO: UNC Chapel Hill Campus

FROM: Christopher Derickson, Assistant Provost and University Registrar

SUBJECT: Course Request Approval System

DATE: February 15, 2011

The Office of the University Registrar is pleased to announce the opening of the Course Request Approval System in ConnectCarolina on Tuesday, February 15, 2011. We appreciate your cooperation with the interim system and are currently reviewing the submissions made through that avenue.

Training for Course Request Submitters started February 1st and is ongoing for those who have not yet attended. Starting on February 15th, training for Course Request Approvers will be offered via on-line tutorial through Blackboard. There will also be a CRAS User's Guide available for reference. Additional information and links to each of these items and the training calendar are available at regweb.unc.edu. Course Request Approval Submitters and Approvers assigned by each department, curriculum, or unit will be required to complete training prior to being given access to the system.

Guidelines:

* New courses – the earliest available effective date will be Spring 2012.

* Revisions to existing courses – the earliest available effective date will be Fall 2012.

* The moratorium on establishing new cross-listings between courses remains in effect.

Tips for Success:

* Please note, course submitters may begin the process of entering course information prior to the time that their approvers complete the training. Submitters may receive an error message as the email notifications will not be forwarded if the approver(s) have not yet completed training. Once the approvers are given access, the information will be available in the CRAS inbox. Email notifications will then be in place for future submissions.

* Remember, the review and approval process still requires some time. Courses submitted this spring that require college/school approval may not be reviewed until the fall term. Please make sure you plan ahead so that the changes are ready when needed.

If you have additional questions, please email Anna Kang at anna_kang@unc.edu.

Dear Professor Nyang Oro,

I write regarding the submission of the 2010 Assessment Report for the Department of African and Afro American Studies. It would be greatly appreciated if you were able to provide the College with your Department's assessment reports.

Below, please find the original email soliciting 2010 Assessment Reports. I have also attached the original memo from Deans Bill Andrews and Bobbi Owen, as well as the Rubrics information. Please do not hesitate to contact me if you have any questions.

This message is being sent to all Department Chairs and Directors of Curricula in the College of Arts & Sciences, and copied to all managers.

Dear Colleagues,

Each fall since 2006 every unit in the College that has a teaching responsibility has submitted its annual assessment on student learning outcomes. The attached documents pertain to the assessment report that the College requests of your unit for 2010. Please give this matter your attention to ensure timely delivery of your unit's report by 29 November 2010.

I know that generating an assessment report each year requires time and effort, but I am encouraged by the progress the College is making as we try to focus on the improvement of our teaching programs, not simply compliance with accreditation standards.

Thank you in advance for your report and the support you give to assessment in your unit.

Sincerely,

TO: Unit Chairs and Directors in the College of Arts & Science
FROM: Bill Andrews and Bobbi Owen, Senior Associate Deans
RE: 2010 assessment reports
DATE: October 28, 2010

To promote a culture of systematic assessment of student learning at the unit level in the College, former Dean Bernadette Gray-Little initiated a process of planning and reporting of student learning outcomes on an annual basis. In October 2006, each unit was asked to submit to the College a report about each degree program (mission and goals of a center, institute, program, etc.) that explained:

a) the assessment(s) the unit undertook during the previous academic year,
b) what the unit learned from the assessment(s), and
c) what the unit intends to do or already has enacted in response to what it learned.

In October 2007 and 2008 and in December 2009 we requested an updated assessment report from each unit, in keeping with the College's commitment to maintain its culture of assessment. We're now asking that you submit to your Senior Associate Dean your 2010 unit assessment report, preferably in electronic format, by 29 November 2010.

Since UNC is approaching its fifth-year review from the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools, we need some additional information from each department. Your report should incorporate the topics above and also the questions below:

1. Reviewing the past five years of your assessments, what have you done with the results of those assessments? How has your department used those results to improve undergraduate or graduate student learning? Has assessment affected curriculum, for instance, or course assignments, or testing?
2. Now that your initial overall unit assessment plan is five years old, do you feel the plan needs to be revised, updated, or otherwise modified? Since the goal of these assessment plans is program improvement, especially in student learning, if you feel your assessment plan could be improved by a mid-course modification of what your unit should assess over the next five years, please explain in your report.
3. Has your unit's report(s) on student learning included an analysis of a sample of student writing assignments? Many units have already undertaken this in a previous report, but if yours hasn't as yet, your 2010 report should contain such an analysis.

   Analysis of sample student writing skills: In this part of your report, you develop a set of rubrics, i.e., a list of the criteria your faculty use to assess the writing skills of your students. The "Rubrics" document that follows this memo will help you see how other universities have used rubrics to define and rate the set of skills in writing that they attempt to assess. Your unit should develop its own set of rubrics for assessing student performance on a given writing assignment.

Please bear in mind that this analysis of student writing skills need not be devoted to more than a sample of papers. The Office of Institutional Research and Assessment (OIRA) can provide financial resources to compensate a faculty member (perhaps from your fixed-term ranks) to review a sample of these written assignments, once your unit has developed its set of assessment rubrics. Please be sure that the analysis of student writing that you provide in your assessment report refers back to an assessment goal stated in your unit's original or evolving assessment plan.

When you have completed your 2010 unit assessment report, please attach a copy of the assessment plan you have been following – which you originally submitted in 2005 and have continued to work from – or versions you have updated along the way.

A copy of your unit's 2010 report and your unit's original assessment plan should be sent to Bill, Bobbi, and Lynn Williford in OIRA for inclusion in the centralized database of University-wide assessment activities.

As in the past, the College does not expect any unit to undertake a full-scale assessment of all student learning in any given year. What we wish to learn every fall semester is what part of your long-term unit assessment plan you undertook during the previous academic year, what you learned from it, and how what you learned will affect your unit's teaching program in the future.

Thanks for your reports, which we look forward to reading, and for your cooperation in this fall's overall curriculum assessment.

RUBRICS

Once you have identified a means of assessment, the next step is identifying a scoring procedure. The assessment methodology you choose will dictate how you will score student data. If you are using some type of objective assessment to measure student learning than the instrument should be scored dichotomously with an answer key to ensure standardization. Scores will be presented in the form of the number or percent correct.

Standardized assessments are usually scored by a testing company and results can be presented in the form of raw or scale scores to make interpretation easy. Results may be aggregated across subscales or for the test as a whole (i.e., composite score).

Performance assessments require the use of a standardized scoring procedure usually involving a rubric. A rubric is a matrix that identifies the expected outcomes of performance on task with the respective levels of performance along those outcomes. There are two type of scoring rubrics. Analytic scoring rubrics break scoring down into components. They provide descriptions and sub-scores for each characteristic of performance. For example, a writing assessment may be broken down into integration of ideas, mechanics, and clarity of expression. Holistic scoring rubrics on the other hand provide a single score for overall performance. Because of this analytic scoring rubrics provide more information and have more of a diagnostic value than holistic scoring rubrics.

There are four components to a rubric: 1) a task description; 2) task dimensions; 3) a performance scale; and 4) cell descriptions. (See the figure on the following page.) The task description describes the assessment activity that serves as a reminder to the grader as to what the task is about. This can be created directly by cutting and pasting from a course syllabus or from the assessment task directions. The task dimensions lay out and describe the parts of the task and are listed in the first column of the table. They should be directly observable and in harmony with the program's learning outcomes. The performance scale indentifies the levels of performance along each of the dimensions and is presented in the first row of the table. Scales should include three to five points. Too many scales points makes it more difficult to differentiate between performance levels. Finally, cell descriptions operationalize what each level of performance means for each dimension. These may include check boxes beside each element of the performance description in the cell. They help convey why the student is given a particular score. The example below comes from Stevens & Levi, (2004).

> Task Description: Each student will make a 5-minute presentation on the changes in one Virginia community over the past thirty years. The student may focus the presentation in any way he/she wishes, but there needs to be a thesis of some sort, not just chorological exposition. The presentation should include x, y, and z.

Dimension 1
Dimension 2
Dimension 3

Developing A Rubric

When developing a rubric, first complete the table by filling in the dimensions in the first column. After you have completed this step, fill in the scale points along the boxes in the first row. Huba and Freed (2000) have developed a list of scale points which is presented below for your assistance. It is helpful to frame scale points in a positive light in order to mitigate potential shock for low marks. Complete the cell descriptions next for each row and corresponding column. Start out by identifying the extreme levels of performance (i.e., the highest and lowest levels of performance). The lowest level of performance can be the negation of the exemplary category or a list of typical mistakes that students may make. It may be helpful to look at student work to identify these descriptions. Next fill in the middle categories.

Once you completed your rubric, share it with other faculty members in the program to get their feedback. Ask them to apply it to a sample of student work to determine if they understand the dimensions and performance

Examples of Scale Points

Emerging	Progressing	Partial Mastery	Mastery
Not Yet Competent	Partly Competent	Competent	Sophisticated
Unacceptable	Marginal	Proficient	Exemplary
Novice	Intermediate	Intermediate High	Advanced

(Huba & Freed, 2000)

Scoring Using A Rubric

Because rating performance involves human judgment, it is subject to error. Personal biases, carry-over effects of judgments due to preceding tasks, and inconsistency in scoring due to lack of standardization of scoring criteria intrude and limit the value of the ratings. To avoid these common errors, 1) rate the performance of all students on one task before going to the next to keep scoring criteria in mind; 2) whenever possible rate performance without knowledge of student's name to avoid halo effects; 3) use multiple raters for high-stakes decisions; and 4) train your raters to calibrate their scoring by bringing them together to review their responses in order to identify patterns of inconsistent responses.

Sample Rubric: UR General Education Field of Study for the Natural Sciences

Task Description: Each student will develop a lab report for the particular experiment in question. This report should include an abstract, introduction, instrumentation and procedure, discussion, error analysis, and conclusion sections. Students must show an understanding of the topic and support all generalizations with details.

LEARNING OUTCOMES	Exemplary	Proficient	Marginal	Unacceptable
Students will demonstrate in-depth knowledge and understanding of content material within the course discipline.	Clear indication of higher order thinking demonstrating mastery of the material.	Some indication of higher order thinking demonstrating mastery of the material.	Some placement of ideas in appropriate disciplinary context. Limited evidence of higher order thinking.	Limited or no evidence of higher order thinking with confused demonstration of understanding of the material.
Students will demonstrate ability to formulate and test good scientific hypotheses.	Formulates elegant and easy to test hypotheses with no confounding variables. Applies appropriate methodologies.	Formulates hypotheses that are testable but lack some clarity or contain some confounding variables. Usually applies appropriate methodologies.	Formulates non-testable hypotheses but contain elements indicative of some understanding of the importance of elegance/ clarity in hypothesis creation. Designs weak experiments.	Formulates non-testable hypotheses and provides no indication of an understanding of the importance of elegance/ clarity in hypothesis formation. Consistently designs poor experiments.
Students will analyze and interpret data using discipline-specific tools.	Consistently identifies and correctly applies appropriate quantitative/qualitative methodologies.	Typically identifies and usually applies appropriate quantitative/qualitative methodologies.	Inconsistently identifies and irregularly applies appropriate quantitative/ qualitative methodologies.	Fails to identify or apply appropriate quantitative/ qualitative methodologies.
Students will interpret knowledge in meaningful and appropriate ways as they draw conclusions about the significance of scientific data.	Draws logical conclusions that follow from data in a manner indicating clear understanding of significance.	Conclusions are generally solid, but may lack some clarity or consistency with data.	Extrapolates beyond the data creating nonviable interpretations of data at hand.	Draws incorrect conclusions and misunderstandings the significance of data/findings.

Guide for writing essays in ATH 305 Peoples and Cultures of Latin America

Criteria	A good paper manifests these qualities:	An excellent paper develop also:
1. Problem or Issue	Clearly identifies a main problem or issue, and summarizes it in relation to essay questions.	Examines several dimensions of the problem or issue and relationships among them.
2. Evidence	Presents supporting evidence from course materials in the form of information, ethnographic descriptions, examples, and quotes. Identifies the sources and assesses the quality of this evidence.	Provides evidence from additional readings, films, news, class discussions.
3. Concepts, assumptions, theories	Identifies ideas, approaches and methods that shape the arguments of authors and/or the people whom they describe: i.e. machismo, gender, contradictory consciousness, modernization or dependency theory, nationalism, revolution, liberation theology, critical race theory, feminism, etc.	Assesses the relevance and implications of specific concepts and assumptions.
4. Context	Locates the authors and/or the people or events that they describe in appropriate cultural, social, national, disciplinary, political, religious and/or historical contexts.	Make connections between the context and the way people think, talk, and act.
5. Perspectives	Compares perspectives of different people or groups described. Compares different ways of analyzing or interpreting the material.	Discusses implications of competing perspectives on issue.
6. Student's analysis or point of view	Presents student's own perspective and position. Raises own questions, critiques, or doubts about the author's message and perspective.	Identifies students' assumptions, stereotypes or prejudices that were somehow challenged or shifted in the process of working with material.
7. Conclusions, implications, consequences	Identifies and discusses conclusions and/or consequences of given perspectives or analyses on the issue at hand.	Considers information and context in identifying implications of the arguments and issues.
8. Write well	Shows correct grammar, and correct punctuation. Quotes, ideas and paraphrases are properly attributed to original sources and references listed at end of essay.	Demonstrates good organization, no gratuitous repetition, strong and compelling prose.

Dear Professor Nyang Oro,

I write regarding the submission of the 2010 Assessment Report for the Department of African and Afro American Studies. It would be greatly appreciated if you were able to provide the College with your Department's assessment reports.

Below, please find the original email soliciting 2010 Assessment Reports. I have also attached the original memo from Deans Bill Andrews and Bobbi Owen, as well as the Rubrics information. Please do not hesitate to contact me if you have any questions.

Kind regards,
Jessica

This message is being sent to all Department Chairs and Directors of Curricula in the College of Arts & Sciences, and copied to all managers.

Dear Colleagues,

Each fall since 2006 every unit in the College that has a teaching responsibility has submitted its annual assessment on student learning outcomes. The attached documents pertain to the assessment report that the College requests of your unit for 2010. Please give this matter your attention to ensure timely delivery of your unit's report by 29 November 2010.

I know that generating an assessment report each year requires time and effort, but I am encouraged by the progress the College is making as we try to focus on the improvement of our teaching programs, not simply compliance with accreditation standards.

Thank you in advance for your report and the support you give to assessment in your unit.

Sincerely,
Karen

Subject: MAY COMMENCEMENT AWARDS: Curriculum in Afro-American Studies

---

Dear Commencement Awards Contact,

Your assistance is needed to include all student awards, honors, and prizes from the 2010-2011 academic year in the May Commencement program. All submissions are due by Thursday, March 17, 2011. When providing this information, please follow these instructions:

1. Send the information via email to courtney_mitchell@unc.edu. Title your email with your department, school, or organization name (e.g., history awards). Do not simply name it "commencement awards." We receive hundreds of emails during this process, and for archiving and recordkeeping purposes it will be very helpful (and will reduce the chance for misunderstanding/error) if you include your department, school, or organization name in the subject line of any email you send.

2. Please email your information in an attached Word document, as opposed to typing the names into the body of the email message. Refer to http://www.unc.edu/depts/pubserv/awards.html for formatting and explanation examples.

3. Type the department, school, or organization name in bold at the top of the submission;

4. Use a one-column format. Type the award's complete name in bold and italic and then;

5. Underneath the award name, type the recipient's complete first, middle (or maiden), and last names, along with any suffix (e.g., Jr.or III), in that order;

6. Use correct spelling. Check against official University lists (e.g., Campus Directory). We will proof only against your list.

IF AWARDS HAVE BEEN RETITLED OR DISCONTINUED SINCE LAST YEAR'S SPRING COMMENCEMENT, IF THERE ARE NEW AWARDS, OR IF AN AWARD HAS NOT YET BEEN PUBLICLY ANNOUNCED, PLEASE INCLUDE AN EXPLANATION IN YOUR SUBMISSION.

We will contact you if we notice any unexplained discrepancies between this year's and last year's awards information for the Commencement program. However, please note that correct award information is ultimately the responsibility of campus departments. A well-explained initial submission will prevent any potential errors in the final publication.

We will respect the confidentiality of all information, and no one will see your information until Commencement weekend when the printed program is made available at the Doctoral Hooding Ceremony and the main Commencement.

If you are not the correct contact person, please let our office know.**

Please email me at courtney_mitchell@unc.edu with any questions.

2009-10 Assessment Report

Department of African and Afro-American Studies

December 1, 2010

Department Name: African and Afro-American Studies Contact Person: Perry Hall
Program: B.A. in African and Afro-American Studies

Outcome(s) Assessed During 2009-10	Assessment Methods Used	Findings	Use of Results (Action)
Identify and explain sources of historical change that have shaped Africa and its diaspora.	Review of papers and presentations in selected African and Afro-American Studies classes by a faculty team.	Examining the work of 14 students in the Afro-American Studies Senior Seminar class, the faculty team rated 5 as excellent and five as good in demonstrating understanding of sources of historical change.	Faculty team will review seminar and general curriculum to identify areas to strengthen in terms of both historical foundations and contemporary perspectives.
Successfully qualify for jobs, occupations, or higher level studies that incorporate knowledge, skills, and capabilities gained in the program of study.	Senior exit interviews	Our information indicates that graduating majors from the past academic year have positions in, graduate School (5) Teach for America (3), international development agencies (4) , community development (3), government (4), and the Peace corps (3).	Faculty team will use survey results to better advise our majors on options for employment and possibilities of professional training and education

RE: 2010 assessment reports

DATE: October 28, 2010

To promote a culture of systematic assessment of student learning at the unit level in the College, former Dean Bernadette Gray-Little initiated a process of planning and reporting of student learning outcomes on an annual basis. In October 2006, each unit was asked to submit to the College a report about each degree program (mission and goals of a center, institute, program, etc.) that explained:

a) the assessment(s) the unit undertook during the previous academic year,
b) what the unit learned from the assessment(s), and
c) what the unit intends to do or already has enacted in response to what it learned.

In October 2007 and 2008 and in December 2009 we requested an updated assessment report from each unit, in keeping with the College's commitment to maintain its culture of assessment. We're now asking that you submit to your Senior Associate Dean your 2010 unit assessment report, preferably in electronic format, by 29 November 2010.

Since UNC is approaching its fifth-year review from the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools, we need some additional information from each department. Your report should incorporate the topics above and also the questions below:

1. Reviewing the past five years of your assessments, what have you done with the results of those assessments? How has your department used those results to improve undergraduate or graduate student learning? Has assessment affected curriculum, for instance, or course assignments, or testing?
2. Now that your initial overall unit assessment plan is five years old, do you feel the plan needs to be revised, updated, or otherwise modified? Since the goal of these assessment plans is program improvement, especially in student learning, if you feel your assessment plan could be improved by a mid-course modification of what your unit should assess over the next five years, please explain in your report.
3. Has your unit's report(s) on student learning included an analysis of a sample of student writing assignments? Many units have already undertaken this in a previous report, but if yours hasn't as yet, your 2010 report should contain such an analysis.

Analysis of sample student writing skills: In this part of your report, you develop a set of rubrics, i.e., a list of the criteria your faculty use to assess the writing skills of your students. The "Rubrics" document that follows this memo will help you see how other universities have used rubrics to define and rate the set of skills in writing that they attempt to assess. Your unit should develop its own set of rubrics for assessing student performance on a given writing assignment.

Please bear in mind that this analysis of student writing skills need not be devoted to more than a sample of papers. The Office of Institutional Research and Assessment (OIRA) can provide financial resources to compensate a faculty member (perhaps from your fixed-term ranks) to review a sample of these written assignments, once your unit has developed its set of assessment rubrics. Please be sure that the analysis of student writing that you provide in your assessment report refers back to an assessment goal stated in your unit's original or evolving assessment plan.

When you have completed your 2010 unit assessment report, please attach a copy of the assessment plan you have been following – which you originally submitted in 2005 and have continued to work from – or versions you have updated along the way.

A copy of your unit's 2010 report and your unit's original assessment plan should be sent to Bill, Bobbi, and Lynn Williford in OIRA for inclusion in the centralized database of University-wide assessment activities.

As in the past, the College does not expect any unit to undertake a full-scale assessment of all student learning in any given year. What we wish to learn every fall semester is what part of your long-term unit assessment plan you undertook during the previous academic year, what you learned from it, and how what you learned will affect your unit's teaching program in the future.

Thanks for your reports, which we look forward to reading, and for your cooperation in this fall's overall curriculum assessment.

RUBRICS

Once you have identified a means of assessment, the next step is identifying a scoring procedure. The assessment methodology you choose will dictate how you will score student data. If you are using some type of objective assessment to measure student learning than the instrument should be scored dichotomously with an answer key to ensure standardization. Scores will be presented in the form of the number or percent correct.

Standardized assessments are usually scored by a testing company and results can be presented in the form of raw or scale scores to make interpretation easy. Results may be aggregated across subscales or for the test as a whole (i.e., composite score).

Performance assessments require the use of a standardized scoring procedure usually involving a rubric. A rubric is a matrix that identifies the expected outcomes of performance on task with the respective levels of performance along those outcomes. There are two type of scoring rubrics. Analytic scoring rubrics break scoring down into components. They provide descriptions and sub-scores for each characteristic of performance. For example, a writing assessment may be broken down into integration of ideas, mechanics, and clarity of expression. Holistic scoring rubrics on the other hand provide a single score for overall performance. Because of this analytic scoring rubrics provide more information and have more of a diagnostic value than holistic scoring rubrics.

There are four components to a rubric: 1) a task description; 2) task dimensions; 3) a performance scale; and 4) cell descriptions. (See the figure on the following page.) The task description describes the assessment activity that serves as a reminder to the grader as to what the task is about. This can be created directly by cutting and pasting from a course syllabus or from the assessment task directions. The task dimensions lay out and describe the parts of the task and are listed in the first column of the table. They should be directly observable and in harmony with the program's learning outcomes. The performance scale indentifies the levels of performance along each of the dimensions and is presented in the first row of the table. Scales should include three to five points. Too many scales points makes it more difficult to differentiate between performance levels. Finally, cell descriptions operationalize what each level of performance means for each dimension. These may include check boxes beside each element of the performance description in the cell. They help convey why the student is given a particular score. The example below comes from Stevens & Levi, (2004).

> Task Description: Each student will make a 5-minute presentation on the changes in one Virginia community over the past thirty years. The student may focus the presentation in any way he/she wishes, but there needs to be a thesis of some sort, not just chorological exposition. The presentation should include x, y, and z.

Dimension 1
Dimension 2
Dimension 3
Dimension 4

Developing A Rubric

When developing a rubric, first complete the table by filling in the dimensions in the first column. After you have completed this step, fill in the scale points along the boxes in the first row. Huba and Freed (2000) have developed a list of scale points which is presented below for your assistance. It is helpful to frame scale points in a positive light in order to mitigate potential shock for low marks. Complete the cell descriptions next for each row and corresponding column. Start out by identifying the extreme levels of performance (i.e., the highest and lowest levels of performance). The lowest level of performance can be the negation of the exemplary category or a list of typical mistakes that students may make. It may be helpful to look at student work to identify these descriptions. Next fill in the middle categories.

Once you completed your rubric, share it with other faculty members in the program to get their feedback. Ask them to apply it to a sample of student work to determine if they understand the dimensions and performance

Examples of Scale Points

Lowest Level → Highest Level

Emerging	Progressing	Partial Mastery	Mastery
Not Yet Competent	Partly Competent	Competent	Sophisticated
Unacceptable	Marginal	Proficient	Exemplary
Novice	Intermediate	Intermediate High	Advanced
Beginning	Developing	Average	Accomplished

Scoring Using A Rubric

Because rating performance involves human judgment, it is subject to error. Personal biases, carry-over effects of judgments due to preceding tasks, and inconsistency in scoring due to lack of standardization of scoring criteria intrude and limit the value of the ratings. To avoid these common errors, 1) rate the performance of all students on one task before going to the next to keep scoring criteria in mind; 2) whenever possible rate performance without knowledge of student's name to avoid halo effects; 3) use multiple raters for high-stakes decisions; and 4) train your raters to calibrate their scoring by bringing them together to review their responses in order to identify patterns of inconsistent responses.

Sample Rubric: UR General Education Field of Study for the Natural Sciences

Task Description: Each student will develop a lab report for the particular experiment in question. This report should include an abstract, introduction, instrumentation and procedure, discussion, error analysis, and conclusion sections. Students must show an understanding of the topic and support all generalizations with details.

LEARNING OUTCOMES	Exemplary	Proficient	Marginal	Unacceptable
Students will demonstrate in-depth knowledge and understanding of content material within the course discipline.	Clear indication of higher order thinking demonstrating mastery of the material.	Some indication of higher order thinking demonstrating mastery of the material.	Some placement of ideas in appropriate disciplinary context. Limited evidence of higher order thinking.	Limited or no evidence of higher order thinking with confused demonstration of understanding of the material.
Students will demonstrate ability to formulate and test good scientific hypotheses.	Formulates elegant and easy to test hypotheses with no confounding variables. Applies appropriate methodologies.	Formulates hypotheses that are testable but lack some clarity or contain some confounding variables. Usually applies appropriate methodologies.	Formulates non-testable hypotheses but contain elements indicative of some understanding of the importance of elegance/ clarity in hypothesis creation. Designs weak experiments.	Formulates non-testable hypotheses and provides no indication of an understanding of the importance of elegance/ clarity in hypothesis formation. Consistently designs poor experiments.
Students will analyze and interpret data using discipline-specific tools.	Consistently identifies and correctly applies appropriate quantitative/qualitative methodologies.	Typically identifies and usually applies appropriate quantitative/qualitative methodologies.	Inconsistently identifies and irregularly applies appropriate quantitative/ qualitative methodologies.	Fails to identify or apply appropriate quantitative/ qualitative methodologies.
Students will interpret knowledge in meaningful and appropriate ways as they draw conclusions about the significance of scientific data.	Draws logical conclusions that follow from data in a manner indicating clear understanding of significance.	Conclusions are generally solid, but may lack some clarity or consistency with data.	Extrapolates beyond the data creating nonviable interpretations of data at hand.	Draws incorrect conclusions and misunderstandings the significance of data/findings.

Identifies students' assumptions, stereotypes or prejudices that were somehow challenged or shifted in the process of working with material.
7. Conclusions, implications, consequences	Identifies and discusses conclusions and/or consequences of given perspectives or analyses on the issue at hand.	Considers information and context in identifying implications of the arguments and issues.
8. Write well	Shows correct grammar, and correct punctuation. Quotes, ideas and paraphrases are properly attributed to original sources and references listed at end of essay.	Demonstrates good organization, no gratuitous repetition, strong and compelling prose.

To all,

I apologize for the very late notice, but I need your help immediately with the request below. Please respond to Stephanie Stadler (copied on this email) at your earliest convenience, but no later than 12noon on Friday, February 18th . If the answer is none, just let her know that.

As you'll see, we just received this request yesterday evening and I am just now reading the email.

Thank you in advance for your understanding and your prompt attention. Please let me know if I may answer any questions or concerns you may have. Otherwise, we look forward to your response.

Sincerely,

Liz Fortune

Subject: Student Recruitment Advertising Expenses

Our campus has received a legislative request for information related to advertising expenses for student recruitment, and I need your input for a reply. This request relates to state funds only.

There are three pieces of information needed to fulfill this request:

1) Actual 2009-2010 FY advertising expenses specifically for student recruitment

2) a general description of the student recruitment expenses for 2009-2010 (i.e. billboards, etc.) and
3) an estimate of expenses that will be allocated for student recruitment for 2010-2011FY.

These items have been set up in separate columns in the attached file. In the file, there are two tabs- the first is for state appropriations and the second is for state receipts. Please complete the information for your school or unit and return the completed file to Amy Zachary (copied on this email) by close of business on Friday, February 18th.

If you have no expenses related to this request, please reply with that information as well.

Thanks, and let me know if you have any questions.

Dear Professor Nyang Oro,

I write regarding the submission of the 2010 Assessment Report for the Department of African and Afro American Studies. It would be greatly appreciated if you were able to provide the College with your Department's assessment reports.

Below, please find the original email soliciting 2010 Assessment Reports. I have also attached the original memo from Deans Bill Andrews and Bobbi Owen, as well as the Rubrics information. Please do not hesitate to contact me if you have any questions.

Subject: Request for 2010 Assessment Report

This message is being sent to all Department Chairs and Directors of Curricula in the College of Arts & Sciences, and copied to all managers.

Dear Colleagues,

Each fall since 2006 every unit in the College that has a teaching responsibility has submitted its annual assessment on student learning outcomes. The attached documents pertain to the assessment report that the College requests of your unit for 2010. Please give this matter your attention to ensure timely delivery of your unit's report by 29 November 2010.

I know that generating an assessment report each year requires time and effort, but I am encouraged by the progress the College is making as we try to focus on the improvement of our teaching programs, not simply compliance with accreditation standards.

Thank you in advance for your report and the support you give to assessment in your unit.

Sincerely,
Karen

TO: Unit Chairs and Directors in the College of Arts & Science
FROM: Bill Andrews and Bobbi Owen, Senior Associate Deans
RE: 2010 assessment reports
DATE: October 28, 2010

To promote a culture of systematic assessment of student learning at the unit level in the College, former Dean Bernadette Gray-Little initiated a process of planning and reporting of student learning outcomes on an annual basis. In October 2006, each unit was asked to submit to the College a report about each degree program (mission and goals of a center, institute, program, etc.) that explained:

a) the assessment(s) the unit undertook during the previous academic year,
b) what the unit learned from the assessment(s), and
c) what the unit intends to do or already has enacted in response to what it learned.

In October 2007 and 2008 and in December 2009 we requested an updated assessment report from each unit, in keeping with the College's commitment to maintain its culture of assessment. We're now asking that you submit to your Senior Associate Dean your 2010 unit assessment report, preferably in electronic format, by 29 November 2010.

Since UNC is approaching its fifth-year review from the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools, we need some additional information from each department. Your report should incorporate the topics above and also the questions below:

1. Reviewing the past five years of your assessments, what have you done with the results of those assessments? How has your department used those results to improve undergraduate or graduate student learning? Has assessment affected curriculum, for instance, or course assignments, or testing?
2. Now that your initial overall unit assessment plan is five years old, do you feel the plan needs to be revised, updated, or otherwise modified? Since the goal of these assessment plans is program improvement, especially in student learning, if you feel your assessment plan could be improved by a mid-course modification of what your unit should assess over the next five years, please explain in your report.
3. Has your unit's report(s) on student learning included an analysis of a sample of student writing assignments? Many units have already undertaken this in a previous report, but if yours hasn't as yet, your 2010 report should contain such an analysis.

   Analysis of sample student writing skills: In this part of your report, you develop a set of rubrics, i.e., a list of the criteria your faculty use to assess the writing skills of your students. The "Rubrics" document that follows this memo will help you see how other universities have used rubrics to define and rate the set of skills in writing that they attempt to assess. Your unit should develop its own set of rubrics for assessing student performance on a given writing assignment.

Please bear in mind that this analysis of student writing skills need not be devoted to more than a sample of papers. The Office of Institutional Research and Assessment (OIRA) can provide financial resources to compensate a faculty member (perhaps from your fixed-term ranks) to review a sample of these written assignments, once your unit has developed its set of assessment rubrics. Please be sure that the analysis of student writing that you provide in your assessment report refers back to an assessment goal stated in your unit's original or evolving assessment plan.

When you have completed your 2010 unit assessment report, please attach a copy of the assessment plan you have been following – which you originally submitted in 2005 and have continued to work from – or versions you have updated along the way.

A copy of your unit's 2010 report and your unit's original assessment plan should be sent to Bill, Bobbi, and Lynn Williford in OIRA for inclusion in the centralized database of University-wide assessment activities.

As in the past, the College does not expect any unit to undertake a full-scale assessment of all student learning in any given year. What we wish to learn every fall semester is what part of your long-term unit assessment plan you undertook during the previous academic year, what you learned from it, and how what you learned will affect your unit's teaching program in the future.

Thanks for your reports, which we look forward to reading, and for your cooperation in this fall's overall curriculum assessment.

RUBRICS

Once you have identified a means of assessment, the next step is identifying a scoring procedure. The assessment methodology you choose will dictate how you will score student data. If you are using some type of objective assessment to measure student learning than the instrument should be scored dichotomously with an answer key to ensure standardization. Scores will be presented in the form of the number or percent correct.

Standardized assessments are usually scored by a testing company and results can be presented in the form of raw or scale scores to make interpretation easy. Results may be aggregated across subscales or for the test as a whole (i.e., composite score).

Performance assessments require the use of a standardized scoring procedure usually involving a rubric. A rubric is a matrix that identifies the expected outcomes of performance on task with the respective levels of performance along those outcomes. There are two type of scoring rubrics. Analytic scoring rubrics break scoring down into components. They provide descriptions and sub-scores for each characteristic of performance. For example, a writing assessment may be broken down into integration of ideas, mechanics, and clarity of expression. Holistic scoring rubrics on the other hand provide a single score for overall performance. Because of this analytic scoring rubrics provide more information and have more of a diagnostic value than holistic scoring rubrics.

There are four components to a rubric: 1) a task description; 2) task dimensions; 3) a performance scale; and 4) cell descriptions. (See the figure on the following page.) The task description describes the assessment activity that serves as a reminder to the grader as to what the task is about. This can be created directly by cutting and pasting from a course syllabus or from the assessment task directions. The task dimensions lay out and describe the parts of the task and are listed in the first column of the table. They should be directly observable and in harmony with the program's learning outcomes. The performance scale indentifies the levels of performance along each of the dimensions and is presented in the first row of the table. Scales should include three to five points. Too many scales points makes it more difficult to differentiate between performance levels. Finally, cell descriptions operationalize what each level of performance means for each dimension. These may include check boxes beside each element of the performance description in the cell. They help convey why the student is given a particular score. The example below comes from Stevens & Levi, (2004).

> Task Description: Each student will make a 5-minute presentation on the changes in one Virginia community over the past thirty years. The student may focus the presentation in any way he/she wishes, but there needs to be a thesis of some sort, not just chorological exposition. The presentation should include x, y, and z.

Dimension 1
Dimension 2
Dimension 3
Dimension 4

Developing A Rubric

When developing a rubric, first complete the table by filling in the dimensions in the first column. After you have completed this step, fill in the scale points along the boxes in the first row. Huba and Freed (2000) have developed a list of scale points which is presented below for your assistance. It is helpful to frame scale points in a positive light in order to mitigate potential shock for low marks. Complete the cell descriptions next for each row and corresponding column. Start out by identifying the extreme levels of performance (i.e., the highest and lowest levels of performance). The lowest level of performance can be the negation of the exemplary category or a list of typical mistakes that students may make. It may be helpful to look at student work to identify these descriptions. Next fill in the middle categories.

Once you completed your rubric, share it with other faculty members in the program to get their feedback. Ask them to apply it to a sample of student work to determine if they understand the dimensions and performance

Examples of Scale Points

Lowest Level → Highest Level

Emerging	Progressing	Partial Mastery	Mastery
Not Yet Competent	Partly Competent	Competent	Sophisticated
Unacceptable	Marginal	Proficient	Exemplary
Novice	Intermediate	Intermediate High	Advanced
Beginning	Developing	Average	Accomplished

Scoring Using A Rubric

Because rating performance involves human judgment, it is subject to error. Personal biases, carry-over effects of judgments due to preceding tasks, and inconsistency in scoring due to lack of standardization of scoring criteria intrude and limit the value of the ratings. To avoid these common errors, 1) rate the performance of all students on one task before going to the next to keep scoring criteria in mind; 2) whenever possible rate performance without knowledge of student's name to avoid halo effects; 3) use multiple raters for high-stakes decisions; and 4) train your raters to calibrate their scoring by bringing them together to review their responses in order to identify patterns of inconsistent responses.

Sample Rubric: UR General Education Field of Study for the Natural Sciences

Task Description: Each student will develop a lab report for the particular experiment in question. This report should include an abstract, introduction, instrumentation and procedure, discussion, error analysis, and conclusion sections. Students must show an understanding of the topic and support all generalizations with details.

LEARNING OUTCOMES	Exemplary	Proficient	Marginal	Unacceptable
Students will demonstrate in-depth knowledge and understanding of content material within the course discipline.	Clear indication of higher order thinking demonstrating mastery of the material.	Some indication of higher order thinking demonstrating mastery of the material.	Some placement of ideas in appropriate disciplinary context. Limited evidence of higher order thinking.	Limited or no evidence of higher order thinking with confused demonstration of understanding of the material.
Students will demonstrate ability to formulate and test good scientific hypotheses.	Formulates elegant and easy to test hypotheses with no confounding variables. Applies appropriate methodologies.	Formulates hypotheses that are testable but lack some clarity or contain some confounding variables. Usually applies appropriate methodologies.	Formulates non-testable hypotheses but contain elements indicative of some understanding of the importance of elegance/ clarity in hypothesis creation. Designs weak experiments.	Formulates non-testable hypotheses and provides no indication of an understanding of the importance of elegance/ clarity in hypothesis formation. Consistently designs poor experiments.
Students will analyze and interpret data using discipline-specific tools.	Consistently identifies and correctly applies appropriate quantitative/qualitative methodologies.	Typically identifies and usually applies appropriate quantitative/qualitative methodologies.	Inconsistently identifies and irregularly applies appropriate quantitative/ qualitative methodologies.	Fails to identify or apply appropriate quantitative/ qualitative methodologies.
Students will interpret knowledge in meaningful and appropriate ways as they draw conclusions about the significance of scientific data.	Draws logical conclusions that follow from data in a manner indicating clear understanding of significance.	Conclusions are generally solid, but may lack some clarity or consistency with data.	Extrapolates beyond the data creating nonviable interpretations of data at hand.	Draws incorrect conclusions and misunderstandings the significance of data/findings.

CAPSTONE PROJECT ASSESSMENT FORM

Project Title: _____

Author: _____ Mentor: _____

Originality

Criteria	Needs Improvement 1	Satisfactory 2	Excellent 3	Score 1 - 3
▪ Project reflects a deep understanding of Capstone topic area	Project summarizes existing research	Project evaluates existing research	Project provides student's own synthesis of research
▪ Project is based on a research question that is significant to the relevant research community	There is no identifiable research question or question is not appropriate to the topic area	Research pursues a question for which there exists conclusive and easily identifiable answer	Research pursues a question about which there is discussion or dispute in the relevant research community
▪ Project represents the student's own perspective and synthesis of reading, research, and reflection	Project lacks a clear thesis	Project thesis reflects student's synthesis of ideas and evidence	Project thesis reframes current thinking in the research area in a novel and compelling way

Independence

Criteria	Needs Improvement 1	Satisfactory 2	Excellent 3
▪ Student has worked primarily on his or her own throughout the project with guidance from the Capstone mentor.	Mentor has both asked and answered questions for student and has frequently been involved in line by line correction of the student's writing	Mentor has, on key occasions, answered central questions for the student. Student's written work was done independently	Mentor has asked questions, discussed general ideas and provided feedback on student work
▪ Student has submitted two preliminary drafts and responded appropriately to feedback on these drafts	Student has failed to submit the required drafts	Student has submitted required drafts but has not appropriately responded to the mentor feedback.	Student has submitted required drafts and improved his or her work based upon the feedback received

Appropriate Scope

Criteria	Needs Improvement 1	Satisfactory 2	Excellent 3
▪ Project constitutes a sustained and complete treatment of the student's research question	Project fails to focus on the research question or does so in a superficial way	Project addresses research question in some depth	Project offers a sustained and compelling treatment of the question	☐
▪ The scope of the project is appropriate for the time available	Project attempts to answer a question that is too broad	Project provides an acceptable treatment of the topic but key issues are not considered	Project treats the topic with sufficient depth and thoroughness	☐

Orderly and objective process of inquiry

Criteria	Needs Improvement 1	Satisfactory 2	Excellent 3
▪ Project demonstrates facility with those methodologies, tools and academic skills appropriate to the area of investigation	Student is unfamiliar with methodologies and skills appropriate to the research area	Student demonstrates basic competence in methodologies, tools and academic skills appropriate to the area of investigation	Student demonstrates full mastery of a methodology or academic skill appropriate to the area of investigation	☐
▪ Project demonstrates an ability to ask relevant and probing questions and synthesize core ideas within this area	Project consistently fail to distinguish between relevant and irrelevant issues	Project considers relevant questions without asking probing questions or appropriately synthesizing central views	Project considers only relevant issues, consistently surfaces key assumptions and synthesizes core ideas	☐
▪ Project demonstrates an ability to identify and use appropriate evidence	No evidence is adduced or evidence is consistently misused or misrecognized	Adequate and appropriate evidence is provided in at least one key argument	Evidence is consistently identified and appropriately used	☐
▪ Project demonstrates an ability to draw and support conclusions and demonstrates facility with the basic elements of argument – evidence, reasons, claims	Project demonstrates no recognition of the distinction between cogency and fallacious arguments	Project contains at least one demonstration of facility with the basic elements of argument.	Project demonstrates complete mastery of the basic elements of argument.	☐

▪ Project demonstrates an ability to identify relevant and reliable research, evaluate the quality of sources and attribute accurately researched results using citation style appropriate to the area of investigation	Project fails to establish the relevance or reliability of key sources or consistently fails to accurately and properly acknowledge sources.	Project sources are all relevant and reliable and the project contains no more than two attribution or citation errors.	Project contains no source or attribution errors.
▪ Project explores different answers to the research question and the evidence that supports them	Project fails to consider non-supportive evidence or positions.	Project addresses but does not deeply consider strong alternatives or disconfirming evidence	Project appropriately considers strongest alternatives and countervailing evidence
▪ Project raises and investigates tacit assumptions on which the thesis rests	Project leaves at least one central assumption unconsidered	Project acknowledges all central assumptions	Project acknowledges addresses all central assumptions.
▪ Project offers clear and solid arguments evaluating the student's thesis.	Primary arguments for thesis are either unclear or fallacious.	Primary arguments for thesis are clear and coherent.	Primary arguments for thesis are clear and compelling.

Intellectual stretch

Criteria	Needs Improvement 1	Satisfactory 2	Excellent 3
▪ Project demonstrates that the student has explored unfamiliar depths of intellectual rigor, richness and originality	Project demonstrates neither a new level of critical depth nor originality for the student.	Project demonstrates a new level of critical depth or originality for the student	Project demonstrates a new level of critical depth and originality for the student
▪ The project goes beyond a summary of previous findings and provides the student's own perspective on an issue of interest to the appropriate research community.	Project summarizes the results and research of others	Project summarizes the results and research of others in the student's own vocabulary and draws at least one connection not explicit in the reading	Project consistently asks questions or draws connections not explicit in the literature

Overall project presentation

Criteria	Needs Improvement 1	Satisfactory 2	Excellent 3

Guide for writing essays in ATH 305 Peoples and Cultures of Latin America

Criteria	A good paper manifests these qualities:	An excellent paper develop also:
1. Problem or Issue	Clearly identifies a main problem or issue, and summarizes it in relation to essay questions.	Examines several dimensions of the problem or issue and relationships among them.
2. Evidence	Presents supporting evidence from course materials in the form of information, ethnographic descriptions, examples, and quotes. Identifies the sources and assesses the quality of this evidence.	Provides evidence from additional readings, films, news, class discussions.
3. Concepts, assumptions, theories	Identifies ideas, approaches and methods that shape the arguments of authors and/or the people whom they describe: i.e. machismo, gender, contradictory consciousness, modernization or dependency theory, nationalism, revolution, liberation theology, critical race theory, feminism, etc.	Assesses the relevance and implications of specific concepts and assumptions.
4. Context	Locates the authors and/or the people or events that they describe in appropriate cultural, social, national, disciplinary, political, religious and/or historical contexts.	Make connections between the context and the way people think, talk, and act.
5. Perspectives	Compares perspectives of different people or groups described. Compares different ways of analyzing or interpreting the material.	Discusses implications of competing perspectives on issue.
6. Student's analysis or point of view	Presents student's own perspective and position. Raises own questions, critiques, or doubts about the author's message and perspective.	Identifies students' assumptions, stereotypes or prejudices that were somehow challenged or shifted in the process of working with material.
7. Conclusions, implications, consequences	Identifies and discusses conclusions and/or consequences of given perspectives or analyses on the issue at hand.	Considers information and context in identifying implications of the arguments and issues.
8. Write well	Shows correct grammar, and correct punctuation. Quotes, ideas and paraphrases are properly attributed to original sources and references listed at end of essay.	Demonstrates good organization, no gratuitous repetition, strong and compelling prose.

Department Name: African and Afro-American Studies Contact Person: Perry Hall
Program: B.A. in African and Afro-American Studies

Outcome(s) Assessed During 2009-10	Assessment Methods Used	Findings	Use of Results (Action)
Identify and explain sources of historical change that have shaped Africa and its diaspora.	Review of papers and presentations in selected African and Afro-American Studies classes by a faculty team.	Examining the work of 14 students in the Afro-American Studies Senior Seminar class, the faculty team rated 5 as excellent and five as good in demonstrating understanding of sources of historical change.	Faculty team will review seminar and general curriculum to identify areas to strengthen in terms of both historical foundations and contemporary perspectives.
Successfully qualify for jobs, occupations, or higher level studies that incorporate knowledge, skills, and capabilities gained in the program of study.	Senior exit interviews	Our information indicates that graduating majors from the past academic year have positions in, graduate School (5) Teach for America (3), international development agencies (4) , community development (3), government (4), and the Peace corps (3).	Faculty team will use survey results to better advise our majors on options for employment and possibilities of professional training and education

DATE: October 28, 2010

To promote a culture of systematic assessment of student learning at the unit level in the College, former Dean Bernadette Gray-Little initiated a process of planning and reporting of student learning outcomes on an annual basis. In October 2006, each unit was asked to submit to the College a report about each degree program (mission and goals of a center, institute, program, etc.) that explained:

a) the assessment(s) the unit undertook during the previous academic year,
b) what the unit learned from the assessment(s), and
c) what the unit intends to do or already has enacted in response to what it learned.

In October 2007 and 2008 and in December 2009 we requested an updated assessment report from each unit, in keeping with the College's commitment to maintain its culture of assessment. We're now asking that you submit to your Senior Associate Dean your 2010 unit assessment report, preferably in electronic format, by 29 November 2010.

Since UNC is approaching its fifth-year review from the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools, we need some additional information from each department. Your report should incorporate the topics above and also the questions below:

1. Reviewing the past five years of your assessments, what have you done with the results of those assessments? How has your department used those results to improve undergraduate or graduate student learning? Has assessment affected curriculum, for instance, or course assignments, or testing?
2. Now that your initial overall unit assessment plan is five years old, do you feel the plan needs to be revised, updated, or otherwise modified? Since the goal of these assessment plans is program improvement, especially in student learning, if you feel your assessment plan could be improved by a mid-course modification of what your unit should assess over the next five years, please explain in your report.
3. Has your unit's report(s) on student learning included an analysis of a sample of student writing assignments? Many units have already undertaken this in a previous report, but if yours hasn't as yet, your 2010 report should contain such an analysis.

Analysis of sample student writing skills: In this part of your report, you develop a set of rubrics, i.e., a list of the criteria your faculty use to assess the writing skills of your students. The "Rubrics" document that follows this memo will help you see how other universities have used rubrics to define and rate the set of skills in writing that they attempt to assess. Your unit should develop its own set of rubrics for assessing student performance on a given writing assignment.

Please bear in mind that this analysis of student writing skills need not be devoted to more than a sample of papers. The Office of Institutional Research and Assessment (OIRA) can provide financial resources to compensate a faculty member (perhaps from your fixed-term ranks) to review a sample of these written assignments, once your unit has developed its set of assessment rubrics. Please be sure that the analysis of student writing that you provide in your assessment report refers back to an assessment goal stated in your unit's original or evolving assessment plan.

When you have completed your 2010 unit assessment report, please attach a copy of the assessment plan you have been following – which you originally submitted in 2005 and have continued to work from – or versions you have updated along the way.

A copy of your unit's 2010 report and your unit's original assessment plan should be sent to Bill, Bobbi, and Lynn Williford in OIRA for inclusion in the centralized database of University-wide assessment activities.

As in the past, the College does not expect any unit to undertake a full-scale assessment of all student learning in any given year. What we wish to learn every fall semester is what part of your long-term unit assessment plan you undertook during the previous academic year, what you learned from it, and how what you learned will affect your unit's teaching program in the future.

Thanks for your reports, which we look forward to reading, and for your cooperation in this fall's overall curriculum assessment.

RUBRICS

Once you have identified a means of assessment, the next step is identifying a scoring procedure. The assessment methodology you choose will dictate how you will score student data. If you are using some type of objective assessment to measure student learning than the instrument should be scored dichotomously with an answer key to ensure standardization. Scores will be presented in the form of the number or percent correct.

Standardized assessments are usually scored by a testing company and results can be presented in the form of raw or scale scores to make interpretation easy. Results may be aggregated across subscales or for the test as a whole (i.e., composite score).

Performance assessments require the use of a standardized scoring procedure usually involving a rubric. A rubric is a matrix that identifies the expected outcomes of performance on task with the respective levels of performance along those outcomes. There are two type of scoring rubrics. Analytic scoring rubrics break scoring down into components. They provide descriptions and sub-scores for each characteristic of performance. For example, a writing assessment may be broken down into integration of ideas, mechanics, and clarity of expression. Holistic scoring rubrics on the other hand provide a single score for overall performance. Because of this analytic scoring rubrics provide more information and have more of a diagnostic value than holistic scoring rubrics.

There are four components to a rubric: 1) a task description; 2) task dimensions; 3) a performance scale; and 4) cell descriptions. (See the figure on the following page.) The task description describes the assessment activity that serves as a reminder to the grader as to what the task is about. This can be created directly by cutting and pasting from a course syllabus or from the assessment task directions. The task dimensions lay out and describe the parts of the task and are listed in the first column of the table. They should be directly observable and in harmony with the program's learning outcomes. The performance scale indentifies the levels of performance along each of the dimensions and is presented in the first row of the table. Scales should include three to five points. Too many scales points makes it more difficult to differentiate between performance levels. Finally, cell descriptions operationalize what each level of performance means for each dimension. These may include check boxes beside each element of the performance description in the cell. They help convey why the student is given a particular score. The example below comes from Stevens & Levi, (2004).

> Task Description: Each student will make a 5-minute presentation on the changes in one Virginia community over the past thirty years. The student may focus the presentation in any way he/she wishes, but there needs to be a thesis of some sort, not just chorological exposition. The presentation should include x, y, and z.

Dimension 1
Dimension 2
Dimension 3
Dimension 4

Developing A Rubric

When developing a rubric, first complete the table by filling in the dimensions in the first column. After you have completed this step, fill in the scale points along the boxes in the first row. Huba and Freed (2000) have developed a list of scale points which is presented below for your assistance. It is helpful to frame scale points in a positive light in order to mitigate potential shock for low marks. Complete the cell descriptions next for each row and corresponding column. Start out by identifying the extreme levels of performance (i.e., the highest and lowest levels of performance). The lowest level of performance can be the negation of the exemplary category or a list of typical mistakes that students may make. It may be helpful to look at student work to identify these descriptions. Next fill in the middle categories.

Once you completed your rubric, share it with other faculty members in the program to get their feedback. Ask them to apply it to a sample of student work to determine if they understand the dimensions and performance

Examples of Scale Points

Lowest Level → Highest Level

Emerging	Progressing	Partial Mastery	Mastery
Not Yet Competent	Partly Competent	Competent	Sophisticated
Unacceptable	Marginal	Proficient	Exemplary
Novice	Intermediate	Intermediate High	Advanced
Beginning	Developing	Average	Accomplished

Scoring Using A Rubric

Because rating performance involves human judgment, it is subject to error. Personal biases, carry-over effects of judgments due to preceding tasks, and inconsistency in scoring due to lack of standardization of scoring criteria intrude and limit the value of the ratings. To avoid these common errors, 1) rate the performance of all students on one task before going to the next to keep scoring criteria in mind; 2) whenever possible rate performance without knowledge of student's name to avoid halo effects; 3) use multiple raters for high-stakes decisions; and 4) train your raters to calibrate their scoring by bringing them together to review their responses in order to identify patterns of inconsistent responses.

Sample Rubric: UR General Education Field of Study for the Natural Sciences

Task Description: Each student will develop a lab report for the particular experiment in question. This report should include an abstract, introduction, instrumentation and procedure, discussion, error analysis, and conclusion sections. Students must show an understanding of the topic and support all generalizations with details.

LEARNING OUTCOMES	Exemplary	Proficient	Marginal	Unacceptable
Students will demonstrate in-depth knowledge and understanding of content material within the course discipline.	Clear indication of higher order thinking demonstrating mastery of the material.	Some indication of higher order thinking demonstrating mastery of the material.	Some placement of ideas in appropriate disciplinary context. Limited evidence of higher order thinking.	Limited or no evidence of higher order thinking with confused demonstration of understanding of the material.
Students will demonstrate ability to formulate and test good scientific hypotheses.	Formulates elegant and easy to test hypotheses with no confounding variables. Applies appropriate methodologies.	Formulates hypotheses that are testable but lack some clarity or contain some confounding variables. Usually applies appropriate methodologies.	Formulates non-testable hypotheses but contain elements indicative of some understanding of the importance of elegance/ clarity in hypothesis creation. Designs weak experiments.	Formulates non-testable hypotheses and provides no indication of an understanding of the importance of elegance/ clarity in hypothesis formation. Consistently designs poor experiments.
Students will analyze and interpret data using discipline-specific tools.	Consistently identifies and correctly applies appropriate quantitative/qualitative methodologies.	Typically identifies and usually applies appropriate quantitative/qualitative methodologies.	Inconsistently identifies and irregularly applies appropriate quantitative/ qualitative methodologies.	Fails to identify or apply appropriate quantitative/ qualitative methodologies.
Students will interpret knowledge in meaningful and appropriate ways as they draw conclusions about the significance of scientific data.	Draws logical conclusions that follow from data in a manner indicating clear understanding of significance.	Conclusions are generally solid, but may lack some clarity or consistency with data.	Extrapolates beyond the data creating nonviable interpretations of data at hand.	Draws incorrect conclusions and misunderstandings the significance of data/findings.

▪ The scope of the project is appropriate for the time available	Project attempts to answer a question that is too broad	Project provides an acceptable treatment of the topic but key issues are not considered	Project treats the topic with sufficient depth and thoroughness	☐

Criteria	Needs Improvement 1	Satisfactory 2	Excellent 3
▪ Project demonstrates facility with those methodologies, tools and academic skills appropriate to the area of investigation	Student is unfamiliar with methodologies and skills appropriate to the research area	Student demonstrates basic competence in methodologies, tools and academic skills appropriate to the area of investigation	Student demonstrates full mastery of a methodology or academic skill appropriate to the area of investigation	☐
▪ Project demonstrates an ability to ask relevant and probing questions and synthesize core ideas within this area	Project consistently fail to distinguish between relevant and irrelevant issues	Project considers relevant questions without asking probing questions or appropriately synthesizing central views	Project considers only relevant issues, consistently surfaces key assumptions and synthesizes core ideas	☐
▪ Project demonstrates an ability to identify and use appropriate evidence	No evidence is adduced or evidence is consistently misused or misrecognized	Adequate and appropriate evidence is provided in at least one key argument	Evidence is consistently identified and appropriately used	☐
▪ Project demonstrates an ability to draw and support conclusions and demonstrates facility with the basic elements of argument – evidence, reasons, claims	Project demonstrates no recognition of the distinction between cogency and fallacious arguments	Project contains at least one demonstration of facility with the basic elements of argument.	Project demonstrates complete mastery of the basic elements of argument.	☐

▪ Project demonstrates an ability to identify relevant and reliable research, evaluate the quality of sources and attribute accurately researched results using citation style appropriate to the area of investigation	Project fails to establish the relevance or reliability of key sources or consistently fails to accurately and properly acknowledge sources.	Project sources are all relevant and reliable and the project contains no more than two attribution or citation errors.	Project contains no source or attribution errors.
▪ Project explores different answers to the research question and the evidence that supports them	Project fails to consider non-supportive evidence or positions.	Project addresses but does not deeply consider strong alternatives or disconfirming evidence	Project appropriately considers strongest alternatives and countervailing evidence
▪ Project raises and investigates tacit assumptions on which the thesis rests	Project leaves at least one central assumption unconsidered	Project acknowledges all central assumptions	Project acknowledges addresses all central assumptions.
▪ Project offers clear and solid arguments evaluating the student's thesis.	Primary arguments for thesis are either unclear or fallacious.	Primary arguments for thesis are clear and coherent.	Primary arguments for thesis are clear and compelling.

Criteria	Needs Improvement 1	Satisfactory 2	Excellent 3
▪ Project demonstrates that the student has explored unfamiliar depths of intellectual rigor, richness and originality	Project demonstrates neither a new level of critical depth nor originality for the student.	Project demonstrates a new level of critical depth or originality for the student	Project demonstrates a new level of critical depth and originality for the student
▪ The project goes beyond a summary of previous findings and provides the student's own perspective on an issue of interest to the appropriate research community.	Project summarizes the results and research of others	Project summarizes the results and research of others in the student's own vocabulary and draws at least one connection not explicit in the reading	Project consistently asks questions or draws connections not explicit in the literature

Criteria	A good paper manifests these qualities:	An excellent paper develop also:
1. Problem or Issue	Clearly identifies a main problem or issue, and summarizes it in relation to essay questions.	Examines several dimensions of the problem or issue and relationships among them.
2. Evidence	Presents supporting evidence from course materials in the form of information, ethnographic descriptions, examples, and quotes. Identifies the sources and assesses the quality of this evidence.	Provides evidence from additional readings, films, news, class discussions.
3. Concepts, assumptions, theories	Identifies ideas, approaches and methods that shape the arguments of authors and/or the people whom they describe: i.e. machismo, gender, contradictory consciousness, modernization or dependency theory, nationalism, revolution, liberation theology, critical race theory, feminism, etc.	Assesses the relevance and implications of specific concepts and assumptions.
4. Context	Locates the authors and/or the people or events that they describe in appropriate cultural, social, national, disciplinary, political, religious and/or historical contexts.	Make connections between the context and the way people think, talk, and act.
5. Perspectives	Compares perspectives of different people or groups described. Compares different ways of analyzing or interpreting the material.	Discusses implications of competing perspectives on issue.
6. Student's analysis or point of view	Presents student's own perspective and position. Raises own questions, critiques, or doubts about the author's message and perspective.	Identifies students' assumptions, stereotypes or prejudices that were somehow challenged or shifted in the process of working with material.
7. Conclusions, implications, consequences	Identifies and discusses conclusions and/or consequences of given perspectives or analyses on the issue at hand.	Considers information and context in identifying implications of the arguments and issues.
8. Write well	Shows correct grammar, and correct punctuation. Quotes, ideas and paraphrases are properly attributed to original sources and references listed at end of essay.	Demonstrates good organization, no gratuitous repetition, strong and compelling prose.

Subject: Somalia: The Transitional Government on Life Support

INTERNATIONAL CRISIS GROUP - NEW REPORT

Somalia: The Transitional Government on Life Support

Nairobi/Brussels, 21 February 2011: If Somalia's Transitional Federal Government (TFG) - incompetent, corrupt and hobbled by weak leadership - does not reform within six months, the international community should withdraw support and concentrate on more effective local administrations.

Somalia: The Transitional Government on Life Support, the latest report from the International Crisis Group, analyses structural flaws that hinder peace-building in central and south Somalia. At the core of the governance crisis is a deeply-flawed centralising state model. The international community has not yet learned the lesson that re-establishing a European-style centralised state, based in Mogadishu, is almost certain to fail.

"The logical alternative is a more decentralised system of governance in which most power and resources are devolved to local administrations, while the federal government takes a modest role of primarily coordinating the activities of those administrations", says Rashid Abdi, Crisis Group's Analyst.

Despite attempts to push transitional governments to delegate power away from Mogadishu, the political class and much of the international community have remained committed to re-establishing a strong central government. The current TFG is even less willing to share power than former transitional governments, which explains the recurrent tensions between it and self-governing enclaves like Puntland, Galmudug, Ximan and Xeeb and local grassroots movements like Ahlu Sunna Wal Jama'a (ASWJ). As a result, Somalia is experiencing a multi-faceted, chaotic, clan-driven and virtually country-wide revolt against the centre.

The TFG needs to be reformed. Somalis should constitute an inclusive consultative forum to amend the transitional charter, deliberate on the constitution and agree on reform of the transitional federal institutions for the period after August, when the TFG's mandate expires. The forum's focus should be solely on governance, in particular the relationship between local administrations and the national government in Mogadishu, the structure of that national government and the division of power within it.

The international community also has a key role to play. Focus should be given by the UN Political Office for Somalia (UNPOS) and donors on assistance, including capacity building, directly to emerging local administrations. Efforts are needed to improve revenue collection and management, fight corruption, increase budgetary transparency and strengthen internal auditing capabilities. UNPOS and donors should also investigate, stop supporting and sanction corrupt officials. If the TFG does not show clear signs of progress in reconciliation and governance by August, they should withdraw support and direct it instead at those administrations that are serving the interests of the Somali people.

"The decision to prop up the TFG at all cost has been a failure, feeding complacency and contributing to stalemate and humanitarian crises", says EJ Hogendoorn, Crisis Group's Horn of Africa Project Director. "But the situation is not as bleak as it may seem. The extremist Al-Shabaab movement is militarily weaker than many believe. If the right political conditions and strategy are put in place, it would be possible to rapidly re-establish peace and stability in central and south Somalia".

Subject: British studies/British empire symposium

Dear Julius Nyang'oro,

I am writing to you as a new faculty member in the history department, on the advice of my staff colleague Adam Kent. I wanted to alert you to the symposium below, and to let you know that I have written to Barbara Anderson, who has kindly pledged support from the Africa Studies Center for the event. If you in your capacity as a department chair, wish to lend support in any other way, we would be very grateful for your help.

The symposium features Africanists Tim Parsons from Washington U., Jon Hyslop from Wits who is moving to Pretoria, and Chris Lee as a discussant. Vince Brown will also serve as a discussant, as below. I work partly in South Africa, but have come to UNC to fill the chair in British studies, hence, the symposium and a Carolina seminar to follow that we will launch in the Fall.

We are hoping to release the publicity including sponsoring departments and programs, on Tuesday, tomorrow, but we can add names of funders at will. In the meantime, if you have a mailing list which you wish us to use, please advise. I hope you might be free to join us on these days. My sincere thanks for your interest and any support that your budget allows. I look forward to meeting very soon.

Best wishes,

Susan D. Pennybacker, Prof.

Draft--- not for circulation—flyer and website to follow 22 February, for wide distribution:

The Department of History at UNC Chapel Hill, the Department of History at Duke, and the Center for European Studies (UNC Chapel Hill) will sponsor the following symposium, convened by Profs. Susan Pennybacker (UNC), Susan Thorne (Duke) and Philip Stern (Duke).

Our co-sponsors include: the Global Studies Program (UNC Chapel Hill); the James M. Johnston Center for Undergraduate Excellence (UNC, Chapel Hill); the Department of English at Duke, the Women's Studies program at Duke, the Center for African and African-American Research at Duke, the North Carolina Consortium for South Asian Studies, the African Studies center (UNC), and the Department of African & African American Studies at Duke.

British studies in transition: the national, the global, and the transnational—A Symposium

March 17-18th 2011 UNC Chapel Hill and Duke University

Day One: 1:30-6:30 (with reception), 17 March, Graham Memorial, UNC

Day Two: 9am-2pm (with breakfast and lunch), 18 March, Franklin labs, Duke

The symposium will feature the following presenters:

THURS. 17 MARCH: Panel I

Margaret Hunt, European Soldiers and Sailors in Seventeenth-century South Asia: Plebeian Attitudes Toward Cultural Difference and Diversity

Hunt is Henry Winkley Professor of History and Political Economy, and associated with the departments of History and Women's and Gender Studies, at Amherst College. She holds a PhD. in History from New York University (1987) and an MTS from the Harvard Divinity School (1978). Her publications include: Women in Eighteenth-century Europe (Pearson/Longman, 2009) and The Middling Sort: Commerce, Gender and the Family in England, 1660-1780 (University of California Press, 1996), which was the winner of the Morris D. Forkosch Prize of the American Historical Association. Hunt is a Fellow of the Royal Historical Society and the Vice-President and Program Chair of the Northeast Conference on British Studies. She received an honorary doctorate from the University of Uppsala in 2010.

Ghosh is Associate Professor of History at Cornell University, where she is active in Cornell's programs in South Asian Studies, and FGSS (Feminist, Gender, and Sexuality Studies). She holds a PhD. in history from the University of California at Berkeley (2000), and is the author of Sex and the Family in Colonial India: the making of empire (2006) and with Dane Kennedy, the co-editor of Decentring Empire: Britain, India, and the Transcolonial World (2006), which includes her essay, "Terrorism in Bengal." Her research interests focus on understanding the history of colonialism on the Indian subcontinent, and popular and radical political movements in early and mid-twentieth century India. She presently studies the ways in which violence against the British colonial state became an important, but historically underemphasized form of protest, and the ways in which political violence became a central part of popular historical narratives.

Jonathan Hyslop, Race, Labor and War in the Dominions: New Perspectives on Britain's Southern Hemisphere Empire c.1901 1971

Jonathan Hyslop is visiting at Colgate University, where he is A.Lindsay O'Connor Professor of American Institutions in the Department of Sociology & Anthropology. He holds a PhD. from the University of the Witwatersrand (1991), where he was also Professor of Sociology and History and Deputy Director of WISER (the Wits Center for Social and Economic Research), until 2010. His publications include: The Notorious Syndicalist: J.T. Bain - a Scottish Rebel in Colonial South Africa (Ravan, 2004); The Classroom Struggle: Policy and Resistance in South Africa 1940-1990 (University of Natal Press, 1999); and, as editor, African Democracy in the Era of Globalisation (University of the Witwatersrand Press, 1999). Hyslop will join the Dept. of Sociology at the University of Pretoria.

Discussants: Vince Brown (Duke); Christopher Lee (UNC, Chapel Hill)

FRIDAY 18 MARCH: PANEL II:

Philippa Levine, The Empire Has No Clothes: Nakedness, Colonialism and Culture

Philippa Levine is the Mary Helen Thompson Centennial Professor in the Humanities at the University of Texas at Austin, and Co-Director of the University's Program in British Studies. She has published in the areas of Victorian feminism, the development of the historical profession in nineteenth-century England, and more recently on the history of the British Empire. Her recent books include Prostitution, Race and Politics: Policing Venereal Disease in the British Empire and The British Empire, Sunrise to Sunset. Her Oxford Handbook of the History of Eugenics, co-edited with Alison Bashford, was published in 2010. She is at present writing a book on colonial nakedness.Levine is currently President of the North American Conference on British Studies.

Deborah Nord, The Location of Home: Migration, Gender, and Politics in the Fiction of Anita Desai and Nadine Gordimer

Nord is Professor of English at Princeton University. She holds a PhD. in English from Columbia University (1980). She is the author of Gypsies and the British Imagination, 1807-1930 (Columbia 2006); The Apprenticeship of Beatrice Webb (Cornell, 1985), Walking the Victorian Streets: Women, Representation, and the City (Cornell, 1995), and is editor of John Ruskin's Sesame and Lilies (Yale, 2002). She is currently co-authoring a book with Prof. Maria DiBattista on women writers and public life, and completing a series of essays on Dickens; her work on Dickens and the "Jewish Question" is forthcoming. Nord was a Fellow of the National Humanities Center in 2008. She directs graduate studies in English and teaches in the Program in the Study of Women and Gender, where she served as director for nine years. Nord is also a member of Princeton's Judaic Studies faculty committee.

Timothy Parsons, Identity and the End of Empire: An Africanist Perspective

Parsons is Professor of History at Washington University in St. Louis, where he also teaches in the African and African American Studies Program, and serves as Director of the International and Area Studies Program. He is the outgoing director of graduate studies in history. Parsons holds a Ph.D. in African history from the Johns Hopkins University (1996) and is a social historian of twentieth century East Africa. His work explores how ordinary Africans navigated the shifting realities of repression and opportunity that emerged during the colonial and post-colonial eras. His publications include: The British Imperial Century, 1815-1914, A World History Perspective (Rowan and Littlefield, 1999), Race, Resistance and the Boy Scout Movement in British Colonial Africa (Ohio U. Press, 2004), and The Rule of Empires: Those Who Built Them, Those Who Endured Them, and Why They Always Fall (Oxford, 2010). His current research maps the imperial Kenyan regime's use of ethnicity in administration, education, labor, and land tenure.

Subject: Helene Cooper March 22nd

Dear Julius,

The curriculum in global studies is hosting a lecture by Helene Cooper, White House correspondent for the New York Times, on Tuesday, March 22nd at 5:30pm in the FedEx Global Education center. The talk, which will focus on Helene's childhood in Liberia and recent reporting on US foreign policy in Egypt, will be followed by a dinner in her honor at about 8pm. The chair of the curriculum, Andrew Reynolds, wanted to extend an invitation to you to these events. Please let me know if you are able to attend the lecture and/or the dinner.

Subject: IMPORTANT: Fri. Feb 25th Changes To SPAM Filter Service

Hello All,

You are receiving this message because you are both an ITS Exchange user and a SPAM filter user. I am writing to share news of updates we are planning for both services. None of the changes are available to folks still using the old Cyrus IMAP system. This note applies only to ITS-managed Exchange users.

As you are probably are aware, a few weeks back, we introduced a new SPAM scanning service from Cisco called IronPort (CIP). The CIP solution did not immediately function as desired and as a result folks saw more spam getting through and more legitimate messages getting caught in the filters. This was exactly opposite of the behavior we expected to see. We have spent the last weeks working with Cisco to help alleviate the situation. We also re-engineered the service a bit to hopefully make your experience better. We believe that the product is working very well with the new tweaks in place. I would like to make you aware of two noticeable changes.

PROBABLE SPAM INTO JUNK E-MAIL FOLDER RATHER THAN A NON-ACCESSIBLE LOCATION
The CIPs first scan messages based on sender reputation which kills off 95% all messages. If it makes it through this filter, it is then scanned for spam and viruses. Messages with viruses will always be deleted. If a message is considered to be spam at this stage, it would normally be put in a quarantine and you would have to a) know it was caught and b) call the helpdesk to get it released. Effective this Friday, February 25th, we will begin delivering these messages into your Junk E-Mail folder within Exchange. We will also begin cleaning out the Junk E-Mail folder automatically. This is to ensure that your quota will not be adversely impacted by this change. We will automatically clean messages out of ONLY the Junk E-Mail folder and ONLY if they are older than 30 days. You may manually clean out any message in that folder any time you like. IMAP client (Thunderbird) users may have to subscribe to this folder if they do not see it immediately.

UTILIZE EXCHANGE BLOCKLISTING FOR CATCHING 'SOLICITED SPAM'
Since our vendor-provided tweaks to the service, our investigations of offending messages that get through concludes that most are not true SPAM in the sense that they are not unsolicited, but are mainly legitimate subscription and marketing emails that a user signed up for at one point or another. These messages also come from marketing companies with a very high sender rating based on their track record of playing by the rules. In the past you could simply block these messages within the SPAM filters web interface. We aim to deliver this same functionality in Exchange. Please read the help document (http://help.unc.edu/025536) for instructions on how to manage your SPAM in Exchange.

Between delivering suspect SPAM to your Junk E-Mail folder and utilizing the built-in block/allow listing in Exchange, our hope is that you will have a better experience.

Warmest Regards,

Subject: Gen Ed Courses: AFRI/AFAM
Attach: GenEd_criteria_10.18.10 rev.pdf

Dear Professor Nyang Oro,

As you already know, the Undergraduate Curriculum Review raised questions regarding several AFAM and AFRI courses that were selected as part of the syllabi review (see email from Dean Owen below). I've listed the courses and questions that were raised, below. Following the course list, I've provided information about what is needed to resolve the issue(s). In some cases, we'll need an updated syllabus (as a Word or PDF document) by May 13, 2011, so this is not urgent.

1. AFAM 50 – a. 10 pages of writing, or equivalent intellectual effort, was not evident on the syllabus.
   b. Re-evaluate for Communication Intensive (CI) requirement.
2. AFAM 259 – 10 pages of writing, or equivalent intellectual effort, was not evident on the syllabus.
3. AFRI 453 – Review 4 General Education tags. (VP, NA, GL, CI)
4. AFRI 488 – Review 4 General Education tags. (VP, GL, CI, BN)

10 pages of writing. Courses that fulfill a General Education requirement must include at least 10 pages of written work (or equivalent work by virtue of the intellectual labor expended) over the course of the semester, excluding pages written for essays on in-class examinations. I'm attaching criteria guidelines if you wish to read more about this requirement, including information about 10-pages of writing in large classes. Please ask the instructor for AFAM 50 and 259 to update the syllabus to include at least 10 pages of written work.

- Send the updated syllabus to submitcourse@unc.edu no later than May 13, 2011. The Office of Undergraduate Curricula will review the syllabus. If these courses are no longer offered, please inactivate this course by using the new Course Request Approval System (CRAS) in ConnectCarolina.

Re-evaluate for a specific General Education requirement. Please read the attached document to review the criteria for the Communication Intensive (CI) requirement. Based on the syllabus that was reviewed last summer, committee members had concerns that AFRI 50 did not meet the criteria for CI.

- Please send an updated syllabus reflecting the CI criteria to submitcourse@unc.edu no later than May 13, 2011. The Office of Undergraduate Curricula will review the syllabus.
- If this course no longer incorporates revision of written or oral work in response to instructor feedback, please let us know and we'll remove the CI designation, effective fall 2012.

Review 4 General Education tags. The Curriculum Review recommended that courses should satisfy no more than two General Education designations, as the norm. In some cases, Communication Intensive (CI) or Experiential Education (EE) may qualify as a third.

- Send an email to submitcourse@unc.edu by May 13, 2011 indicating which two (or three, if CI or EE) General Education requirements you would like AFRI 453 and 488 to fulfill. This change will not go into effect until fall 2012.

If you have any questions or concerns about these requests, please don't hesitate to contact Nick Siedentop (nick_siedentop@unc.edu) or Erika Lindemann (uline@email.unc.edu).

Best wishes,
Nick Siedentop

Approved by the Curriculum Review Steering Committee 3/03; revised by the Administrative Boards of the General College and the College of Arts and Sciences on 12/06/06, 11/05/08, 10/13/10.

CRITERIA FOR GENERAL EDUCATION REQUIREMENTS:

GUIDELINES FOR THE SUBMISSION AND REVIEW OF COURSE PROPOSALS

The criteria described below clarify the guidelines established in "Making Connections: An Initial Proposal to Revise the General Education Curriculum" (version 1.4). The document is intended to assist members of the Arts and Sciences Divisional Committees, the Curriculum Committee, and the Administrative Boards of the General College and the College of Arts and Sciences as they review and approve proposed courses for the General Education curriculum. The criteria are also meant to help faculty in departments, curricula, and schools understand the standards by which their faculty colleagues will judge course proposals. This version of the document, which was approved in fall 2010, has been revised to incorporate recommendations adopted by the Administrative Boards following a review of the "Making Connections" curriculum. Although faculty can consider these guidelines as an authoritative statement of general principles and course requirements, it is a living document, subject to periodic revision as the Administrative Boards discover curricular issues that need to be refined.

COMMON PRINCIPLES

All courses satisfying General Education requirements are subject to review and approval by two faculty committees: the Curriculum Committee, which includes the vice-chairs and course committee chairs of the four divisions of the College of Arts and Sciences, and the Administrative Boards of the General College and the College of Arts and Sciences. Customarily, course submissions are due in the Office of Undergraduate Curricula by September 15 or January 15. Requests to add, revise, or delete courses are then reviewed by the Curriculum Committee and forwarded to the Administrative Boards for approval. Once approved, new courses typically become effective with the following semester; course revisions become effective the following fall semester.

The following guidelines, originally established by the Curriculum Review Steering Committee in March 2003, present criteria for identifying courses that satisfy General Education requirements. The document is meant to be fluid and to allow for criteria to be clarified and refined. However, any substantial revisions of it must be approved by the General Education Implementation Committee (until fall 2006) and the Administrative Boards of the General College and the College of Arts and Sciences. In general, the following criteria apply to all courses satisfying General Education requirements:

Curricular goals of General Education courses:

1. Whenever possible, the goal is to offer instruction in small classes that make regular use (at least weekly) of discussion in or out of the classroom, use problem-based or essay examinations, and contain ample student-instructor interaction.
2. The foundational skills of English composition, quantitative reasoning, and foreign language require small class sizes for effective learning, so 19 to 25 students per class for these entry-level skills courses is desirable.
3. Course content and assignments should be significant within the rubric of each particular academic discipline, including but not limited to research papers, electronic projects, substantial creative projects, laboratory reports, mathematical analysis, problem sets, case study analyses, etc. "Significant" should generally be construed to mean at least 10 pages of written work (at least 3000 words) over the course of the semester, excluding pages written for essays on in-class examinations. This written work may consist of several short papers, reading logs, journals, or projects composed in an alternate medium or format, as long as the materials represent the equivalent intellectual investment of 10 pages of written work. Students in classes that typically require little writing (math, some sciences, etc.) must complete other work (homework exercises, lab reports, etc.) equivalent to 10 pages of writing by virtue of the intellectual labor expended. Take-home examinations that take the form of an instructor-assigned essay or essays may count toward fulfilling this requirement.

   Implementing the 10-page writing requirement (or other work involving equivalent intellectual effort) can be challenging in large classes without teaching assistants or graders. Instructors are free to relax the standard in classes that exceed 60 students without a teaching assistant or classes that exceed 80 students without a grader. In no case, however, should students receive General Education credit for a course in which they have not completed a significant project designed to help them interpret for themselves, not just for the instructor, what the course teaches.

Additional requirements for General Education courses:

1. Final exams are mandatory for all undergraduate courses. Because the final exam period contributes instructional contact hours for all undergraduate courses, only the Office of the Provost can grant an exception to this University policy. Courses with one hour of academic credit may administer their final exams during the last class period; all others must follow the published Final Examination Schedule. First Year Seminars and composition courses are exempt from the requirement of an in-class final exam; Experiential Education and composition courses may have some form of final project or final evaluation of student work in lieu of a traditional final exam. Instructors assigning take-home exams must have the permission of the department/curriculum chair and must make the exams due at a final meeting of the class held according to the published Final Examination Schedule; this class may serve to debrief the exam, provide additional instruction, or sum up the semester.
2. No courses that satisfy General Education requirements may be taken Pass/D+/D/Fail, with the exception of Lifetime Fitness and some Experiential Education courses that are only offered as Pass/D+/D/Fail courses.

3. No General Education requirements may be satisfied with Independent Studies, Internships, Special Topics, Directed Readings, or similar courses with variable content. The only exceptions are some Experiential Education courses, as specified within that description in this document.
4. No more than two General Education designations, as the norm, will be approved for any new or revised course. Courses that meet more than one General Education requirement may do so only in so far as reasonable and practicable, given the amount of time this document stipulates for focusing on particular course content or methods.
5. Foundations, Approaches, and Connections courses may fulfill requirements for a major and minor, unless a department, curriculum, or school specifies otherwise. A course can meet only one Approaches requirement but may also meet one additional Connections requirement. A Connections course may meet one Approaches requirement or a second Connections requirement. Foundations courses may not fulfill either Approaches or Connections requirements, with one exception: a second Quantitative Reasoning (QR) Foundations course may satisfy the Quantitative Intensive (QI) Connections requirement.
6. The General Education Implementation Committee designed a two-letter system to identify each General Education requirement. The two-letter identifiers are included below in parentheses at the first mention of each requirement. A listing of courses fulfilling each General Education requirement appears annually in the Undergraduate Bulletin and online under Browse Course Catalog in the Self-Service section of ConnectCarolina.
7. The University recognizes only one authoritative source for all course information: the Office of the University Registrar. This office maintains the course inventory, which is available through ConnectCarolina and the Undergraduate Bulletin. Changes in the course inventory or in the details of a particular course must have the approval of the Administrative Boards of the General College and College of Arts and Sciences. Though departmental and curricular websites may be popular sources for information about courses, majors, minors, and degree requirements, they can be inaccurate, misleading, and out of date. To avoid confusion and misinformation, departments and curricula should provide on their websites a direct link to the online Undergraduate Bulletin.

FOUNDATIONS COURSES

English Composition and Rhetoric A and B (CR)

First-year students, with the exceptions noted below, are required to take a two-course sequence of Rhetoric courses (RHET A and B). RHET A offers a general introduction to college written and oral argumentation, composition, research and information literacy skills, and rhetorical analysis. RHET B extends this introduction into specific disciplinary contexts and requires that students learn how to write papers and construct oral presentations of greater length and complexity than required in RHET A.

NOTE: A one-semester, four-credit course in college-level written and oral argumentation, composition, research and information literacy, and rhetorical analysis is under development. This course, which will replace RHET A and B and will be required of all first-year students, introduces them to the specific disciplinary contexts for written work and oral presentations required in college courses. Once the one-semester course is implemented, students will not receive placement or By-Examination credit for the CR requirement.

Course goals for RHET A and B:

1. To master the technical aspects of writing and speaking (including standard spelling, punctuation, and grammar) in the context of academic work.
2. To write short papers and develop short oral presentations by revising early versions of work based upon feedback.
3. To incorporate appropriate source material in written and oral presentations (this includes learning how to distinguish between scholarly and non-scholarly sources, to use electronic resources critically, to avoid plagiarizing, and to use standard citation and reference formats).
4. To use graphic and audiovisual materials as part of oral and written presentations.
5. To identify the similarities and differences among various purposes for written and oral communications, and to understand that different contexts require different approaches.
6. To shape written and oral arguments according to purpose and audience.
7. To develop oral delivery skills suitable to topics, purpose, and audience, and to adapt delivery to audience responses.
8. To read and listen critically (that is, to discern main ideas, to identify and evaluate supporting details, and to recognize explicit relationships among ideas).
9. To read and listen in order to pose and respond to questions and comments concisely.

Additional course goals for RHET B:

1. To write papers and give oral presentations of substantial length and of greater complexity than required in RHET A (as in RHET A, students in RHET B revise earlier versions of work based upon feedback from other students and the instructor).
2. To synthesize and evaluate written and oral messages by drawing logical inferences and conclusions and assessing the acceptability of evidence and the validity of arguments (this includes learning to detect biases in received messages and in students' own reception of evidence and arguments put forward by others).
3. To incorporate source material in their written and oral presentations according to the conventions, methodologies, and values of particular disciplinary discourse communities.
4. To identify the similarities and differences among various purposes for written and oral communications within particular disciplines, and to understand that different disciplinary contexts require different approaches.
5. To work on collaborative projects.

Exceptions to the requirement of RHET A and B are the following:

1. Students who demonstrate sufficient mastery of communication skills as to warrant enrollment directly into RHET B are required to take only RHET B and are awarded "PL" credit for RHET A.
2. Students who are admitted to UNC with English-language deficiencies are offered appropriate instruction in small-enrollment classes tailored to their particular needs before being permitted to begin the Rhetoric sequence.

Foreign Language (FL)

All students must successfully complete level 3 of a foreign language, except as noted below. In an increasingly interconnected world, a secure ability to use and understand at least one language other than English and an acquaintance with the cultures and peoples employing that language is highly desirable. Students should therefore learn

1. To communicate directly, orally and in writing, with speakers of the acquired second language.
2. To read and understand texts of average complexity written by and for native speakers of the second language.
3. To be conversant with the behavioral norms and cultural practices—frequently quite different from ours—of the relevant speech community.

It is highly desirable that level 3 and 4 language courses include content to enhance cultural understanding (analysis of the culture of a society, nation, or region in which the language is spoken) and introduce students to the challenges and complexities of understanding different societies and cultures.

Exceptions to the requirement of level-3 competence are the following:

1. Students who place into level 4 have demonstrated level-3 competence and satisfied the requirement.
2. Students who place beyond level 4 are exempt from this requirement.
3. Students who place into level 1 of the language studied in high school (and who continue study in that language) must successfully complete level 3, but will not receive credit toward graduation for level 1.
4. Successful completion of RHET A and B (and eventually, the one-semester, four-credit course in writing and oral communication currently under development) satisfies this requirement for nonnative speakers of English.

Quantitative Reasoning (QR)

Every student is required to take, or have Advanced Placement or transfer credit for, a course in the mathematical sciences in which the central goal is to develop skills and understand concepts in these fields. These courses should also extend students' abilities to think critically about, and with, the numerical information they encounter daily. The successful student should be able to recognize quantitatively unreasonable solutions or conclusions, and demonstrate facility in using numbers.

Courses satisfying this requirement must focus on mathematics, data analysis, statistics, computing, probability, or modeling. Students should recognize situations in which quantitative methods can be used to model and solve problems and identify the appropriate tools to use in formulating and solving a particular problem. The content of the course should be explicitly quantitative and directed toward the development of skill in the use of those tools at a level beyond that required for admission to the University.

Lifetime Fitness (LF)

Every student must take one (but only one) one-hour academic course that combines instruction in life-long health and wellness with instruction in, and practice of, a sport or physical activity that can be sustained for life.

1. A substantial portion of the course should be devoted to a specific physical activity or sport and include instruction in the rules and history of the sport or physical activity on which written examinations can be based.
2. The course must also contain engagement in the sport or activity.
3. At least one quarter of the course should be devoted to developing healthy behaviors related to physical exercise and well-being. An ideal course would continually connect these healthy behaviors to the specific sport or activity.
4. Because the course will carry academic credit, it must include a written final exam as is required in all undergraduate courses. The course grade cannot be based solely on skill level in a sport or physical activity.

APPROACHES COURSES

Physical and Life Sciences (PL and PX)

Students must take two courses in science, at least one of which has a required laboratory component. Some lecture courses may be taken singly for three credit hours as PL courses or combined with an optional matching laboratory of an additional credit hour and PX credit. Science courses combining lecture and required laboratory components normally offer four hours of PX credit. Courses fulfilling the Physical and Life Sciences requirement emphasize a physical science, a life science, the scientific basis of technology, or a combination of these topics.

1. Appropriate courses will focus on scientific content and the scientific method. At the completion of the course students should be able to demonstrate their understanding of a relevant article in a general science magazine, such as Scientific American.
2. A significant field experience, for academic credit, may be used to satisfy the laboratory requirements if approved by the Administrative Boards. A significant field experience would generally require a minimum of 30 hours in the field.
3. Courses may satisfy this requirement if they focus on scientific content but devote a significant amount of time (perhaps one quarter of the course) to the science's broader perspective (e.g., historical development of scientific thought, the social impact and public policy implications of the science, etc.).

Social and Behavioral Sciences

Students must take three courses in social and behavioral sciences, at least one of which emphasizes historical analysis (see below). These three courses must be from at least two different departments or curricula.

A. (Non-Historical) Social and Behavioral Sciences (SS)

1. Courses fulfilling the (non-historical) Social and Behavioral Sciences requirement focus on the scientific study of individual or collective behavior. They consider the individual, family, society, culture, politics, or economy.
2. "Scientific" here means that instructors draw on established quantitative or qualitative methods of analysis and interpretation. Quantitative methods include, but are not limited to, statistical analysis of data and controlled experiments. Qualitative methods include, but are not limited to, fieldwork, surveys, document analysis, ethnographies, case studies, and interviews.
3. Theoretical reflection on empirical findings also is understood as part of the work of the Social and Behavioral Sciences.

B. Historical Analysis (HS)

Students must take at least one course that emphasizes Historical Analysis. Historical analysis involves the systematic study of human behaviors in past times, with an emphasis on how such behaviors change over time. This temporal dimension—particularly the priority given to change over time—distinguishes historical analysis from other forms of social and behavioral analysis. Although historical analysis may be conducted in various ways, explore diverse topics, and employ any number of methodologies, it is always concerned with people, or, more broadly, with social and cultural expressions, patterns, and processes shaped by or affecting humans, in past times.

1. Courses fulfilling the Historical Analysis requirement should focus on the study of some aspect or aspects of human behavior in the past. Such courses may cover broad periods of time or particular historical eras. Some may treat problems relating to the material world, while others will focus largely on cultural questions or intellectual concerns.
2. The primary emphasis should be on historical rather than contemporary phenomena, and should concern human behavior in social or cultural contexts.
3. Courses surveying historical periods in art, photography, film, music, and the like, are suitable for fulfilling this requirement, so long as the primary focus remains on developments in the history of the medium and not on aesthetic considerations or matters of form.
4. Courses that focus on the history of a discipline (e.g., the history of anthropology) are appropriate if the course is sufficiently broad in conception to allow students to understand the history of the discipline in relation to the broader social and intellectual currents.

Humanities and Fine Arts

A. Philosophical and/or Moral Reasoning (PH)

One course in Philosophical and/or Moral Reasoning is required. The course must address philosophical questions—that is, fundamental questions about central areas or aspects of human experience or endeavor. The course must also teach methods of reasoning, analysis, and interpretation appropriate to such inquiry.

1. Philosophical questions often concern important topics such as knowledge, truth, reality, meaning, consciousness, identity, freedom, beauty, happiness, religion, social and political norms, obligation, justice, virtue, the good, and other topics when explored with philosophical complexity. The course need not focus on a single topic, since development of philosophical knowledge and skill is often well served by comparison, or by considering philosophical topics in combination. In courses that treat the social dimensions of philosophical reasoning, however, a significant portion (at least one-fifth) of the course should address questions of morality and values.
2. Philosophical inquiry may be undertaken in conjunction with sociological, anthropological, scientific, political, historical, literary, and other kinds of analysis. Courses fulfilling the philosophical requirement will focus on understanding and critically assessing the truth, adequacy, defensibility, or value of the ideas being explored. Such courses ask students to be open to discovery, to allow their own convictions to be refined, and to understand the range and specificity of philosophical thinking.
3. Courses that treat philosophers primarily as historical figures or as the authors of texts generally do not fulfill the Philosophical and/or Moral Reasoning requirement but rather may meet the criteria for the Historical Analysis (HS) or Literary Arts (LA) Approaches requirements.

B. Literary Arts (LA)

One course in Literary Arts is required. A literary or filmic text is a written or visual expression in any language of human experience; it is a cultural artifact derived from different historical periods and cultural origins. It is ordinarily but not exclusively an imaginative work and will typically take the form of poetry, narrative fiction, drama, essay, or a visual representation of such works. The text is defined in terms of a relationship among author, reader, society, and the historical circumstances of its creation.

A literature or film course is an organization of literary or filmic texts around unifying concepts such as themes, historical periods, genres, theories of criticism and analysis, or the creative writing of such texts. Courses in which films are compared to literary works or are analyzed with respect to plot, setting, characters, and themes also fulfill the Literary Arts requirement. Such a course can include inter-disciplinary links to other studies in the humanities, fine arts, and social sciences, etc. In all cases, however, at least two-thirds of the course content should involve the reading/viewing/analysis/creation of literary or filmic texts.

C. Visual or Performing Arts (VP)

One course in the Visual or Performing Arts, related to art, architecture, music, drama, design, performance studies, or film that emphasizes aesthetic content that is non-literary, is required. Such courses focus on creative expression in a variety of media and can include inter-disciplinary links to other studies in the fine arts, humanities, and social sciences, etc. In all cases, however, at least two-thirds of the course content should involve analysis of a medium or creative expression within the visual or performing arts. Courses that satisfy this requirement are meant to foster critical thinking and creative practice, expand available means of expression, provide perspective into the human condition, and encourage life-long engagement with the fine arts.

The wide range of courses that might fulfill the requirement may focus either on the study or the creation of artistic expression. They must include substantial creative activity, or written assignments that examine creative activity. Appropriate examples include courses engaging students in the following activities:

1. Analyzing and creating art and crafts in various media, including painting, drawing, sculpture, pottery, metalwork, textiles, etc.
2. Studying principles of visual literacy and making films, photographs, or digital images.
3. Analyzing and implementing various aspects of theatre production or design.
4. Playing music, writing music, or studying a variety of musical styles.

CONNECTIONS COURSES

Courses that satisfy these requirements may also satisfy one of the Approaches requirements, another Connections requirement, or a requirement in the major and/or minor.

Foundations across the Curriculum

One Communication-Intensive course is required. (CI)

Communication-intensive courses are not merely courses involving more (or longer) writing assignments and oral presentations than other courses do. Content-area courses with an emphasis on written and oral communication in the English language are intended to prepare students to write and speak effectively in particular disciplines. Such courses should directly or indirectly help students recognize that different disciplines use different discourses. They must provide students practice with and instructor feedback on written and oral assignments within a specific disciplinary context. When feasible, students should be encouraged to take a communication-intensive course in their major or minor area of study.

1. A content course that carries the CI designation must integrate writing and speaking with the subject matter of the course in evident and important ways, making such assignments a substantial portion (at least 20%) of the final grade for the course. The emphasis of the course must be on the content as well as on the way in which the content is communicated.
2. Responses to assignments must be in English, should reflect course content, and must promote the revision of written or oral work in response to instructor, and perhaps also student, feedback and discussion. Courses fulfilling the CI requirement give students the opportunity to revise for a grade a draft or an oral presentation based on the instructor's comments.
3. Courses that incorporate communication only in the form of one research paper and/or oral report at the end of the term, or written and oral reports with no opportunity for revision, are not eligible for the CI designation.

One Quantitative-Intensive course is required (QI).

This second-level requirement is intended to develop and refine quantitative-reasoning skills in disciplinary contexts and to integrate the foundational skills across the curriculum. Students should become acquainted with how quantitative methods are applied in their major fields of interest and, when feasible, should be encouraged to take a quantitative methods course in their major or minor area of study or in an allied field. The course can either be (a) an additional core mathematical sciences course (as described in the Foundations component above), or (b) a course in any department with a substantial quantitative component (at least half). The course content should involve students in some of the following activities:

1. Using quantitative methods to model and solve problems, including problems requiring the development and implementation of computational algorithms.
2. Developing numerical reasoning above the level of basic algebra and trigonometry.

3. Collecting and interpreting quantitative data.
4. Constructing logically sound arguments and recognizing fallacies by using quantitative information, mathematical analysis, formal logic, and proofs.
5. Expressing ideas and concepts from the mathematical sciences orally and in writing.
6. Connecting the role of the mathematical sciences to cultural change, to other sciences, and to the arts and humanities.

Local, National, and Global Connections

A. Experiential Education (EE)

One course that connects academic inquiry with a structured, active learning experience is required. Experiential education takes many forms and develops many skills. It might develop research skills, promote global awareness, enhance career development, encourage community service, support creative expression, or promote closer relationships among students, faculty, staff, and the wider community. Many of the sanctioned learning experiences will be outside the classroom or off-campus, but appropriate on-campus learning sites include the North Carolina Memorial Hospital, the Frank Porter Child Development Center, WUNC-TV, and WUNC-Radio. Summer employment, life experiences, and other learning undertaken for personal or professional enrichment, but not for academic credit, cannot be approved as fulfilling the Experiential Education requirement.

The Experiential Education requirement may be satisfied by completing a course or program of Study Abroad in any of the following six categories:

1. Undergraduate research: sustained, mentored research experience for academic credit, including Honors thesis courses.
2. Approved service learning: Such courses must be approved by the Administrative Boards of the General College and College of Arts and Sciences and require at least 30 hours of supervised service that meets community-identified needs in an off-campus placement.
3. A course with a required, substantial field trip or fieldwork component: These courses must involve all students in at least 30 hours of appropriate off-campus fieldwork or field trips. The fieldwork component of the course should integrate a wide range of subject matter and provide an active opportunity for the student to investigate original problems and apply techniques used by professionals in the discipline.
4. Departmental or University-unit internship or experiential independent study: Internships and experiential independent study courses must (a) be administered by an academic school, department, curricula, or university unit, (b) require a minimum of 100 hours of service or work, and (c) have a unit or departmental faculty adviser to assist students with setting appropriate goals and providing guidance throughout the experience. Though an internship in a student's major may be desirable, not all majors offer internships or have sufficient capacity to accommodate everyone. Internships for academic credit, even if outside a student's major, nevertheless fulfill the Experiential Education requirement.
5. Approved study abroad program: These programs include only those approved by the UNC-Chapel Hill Study Abroad Office or the UNC-Chapel Hill Honors Program.
6. Direct and sustained engagement in a creative process: In conjunction with a literary, musical, dramatic, or studio arts class, a student may participate in a supervised community arts program or produce art for community purposes under faculty supervision culminating in at least 30 hours of work during the semester. Courses in any department or University unit that require at least 30 hours of faculty-supervised work and that culminate in public programming may also satisfy the Experiential Education requirement.

B. U.S. Diversity (US)

One course that aims to help students develop a greater understanding of diverse peoples and cultures within the United States and, thereby, enhance their ability to fulfill the obligations of U.S. citizenship, is required.

1. Courses must systematically explore the perspectives/experiences of at least one U.S. subculture. Such groups might include African-Americans, Asian-Americans, European-Americans, Latino/as, Native Americans, or distinct subcultures within these broad categories. Other culturally distinct groups not identified here may qualify if a case can be made for their cultural/historical significance. A course that addresses in systematic fashion other aspects of diversity such as age, class, gender, sexual orientation, region, or religion may also satisfy the U.S. Diversity requirement.
2. Because the United States is part of the North Atlantic world, a course approved as fulfilling the U.S. Diversity requirement cannot also fulfill the North Atlantic World requirement.

C. The North Atlantic World (NA)

One course that focuses on the North Atlantic World is required. Such a course may address the history, culture, or society of the region but should devote more than two-thirds of the course content, as determined by the reading assignments and class sessions, to the region. The purpose of the requirement is to assure that students understand the world in which they live. The "North Atlantic World" is a phrase that has at once geographical and cultural referents. On the North American side, the North Atlantic World refers to the United States and Canada, and it includes the cultures of Native Americans. In Europe, the boundaries are more difficult to draw, but the notion of language families can be useful in mapping the borders: the requirement refers to cultures and societies whose dominant language belongs to the Germanic, Celtic, or Romance language families. Using this criterion does not solve all difficulties, since European boundaries have changed over time and include some complicated cases (e.g., Finland and Hungary), but this standard should be a useful guideline in most instances. Because of the region's influences on Western Europe and North America, the southern boundaries of the North Atlantic World extend to the Mediterranean—from the Iberian Peninsula to Greece.

Exclusions: Courses dealing with some periods of ancient and medieval history of some Mediterranean cultures from Spain to Greece might be understood as "Beyond the North Atlantic World," or "World before 1750." Courses dealing with diverse groups in the United States are best considered as fulfilling the "U.S. Diversity" requirement. Courses designated as fulfilling the "U.S. Diversity" or "World before 1750" requirement cannot also be designated as fulfilling the "North Atlantic World" requirement.

D. The World before 1750 (WB)

One historically-oriented course that focuses on the period prior to 1750 CE is required. "Focuses on" means that at least two-thirds of the course content, as indicated by the assigned readings and class sessions, is devoted to the period. "Historically-oriented" means that the course either deals explicitly and substantially with change over time or that it situates the course material within a cultural, political, or social context. This requirement, which aims to provide some chronological scope to the curriculum, is included because pre-modern periods of human history differed significantly from our own, and pre-modern ideas, practices, and institutions continue to exert a profound influence on the contemporary world.

1. Courses fulfilling this requirement should focus on human beliefs, practices, or institutions in the period prior to 1750 CE. Such courses may cover broad periods of time or a particular pre-modern era (i.e. before 1750). The broad standards regarding this requirement are similar to those developed for the Historical Analysis Approaches requirement. In the case of this requirement, however, the additional expectation is that courses will devote at least two-thirds of the class time and out-of-class assignments to the pre-1750 period. This focus should be reflected in the assigned readings and class sessions.
2. Exposure to a historically-oriented course focusing on the period prior to 1750 will help students to attain a broader and deeper understanding of pre-modern history and insight into the ways in which events and processes occurring hundreds or thousands of years ago continue to affect us today.

E. Beyond the North Atlantic (BN)

Asia, Africa, the Middle East, Latin America, Eastern Europe, and the Pacific have been important in world affairs, and knowledge of the history, geography, and culture of these regions is necessary for effective citizenship. One course focusing on at least one of these regions is required. At least two-thirds of the course must deal with one of these regions to insure that students have some understanding of a culture that is geographically distant from the United States. Courses fulfilling this requirement focus on a society or region outside North America and Western Europe, as that area is defined by the North Atlantic World requirement. The course may concern itself with a specific aspect of culture—such as literature, religion, or art—or may involve historical or other social scientific analysis of the experiences of the people in the society or region.

F. Global Issues (GL)

One course that provides students with knowledge and understanding of transnational connections and global forces is required. Global forces entail interrelationships among cultures, societies, nations, and other social units, and they include transnational processes such as migration, urbanization, trade, diplomacy, and information flow. Courses treating global forces might analyze globalization in general or focus on particular case studies. For example, case studies might consider international economics and politics, focus on the changing demography or environment, or highlight transnational issues arising from ethnicity, gender, religion, or language.

1. Courses devoted to natural phenomena or technology (e.g. earthquakes or computers) that do not place at least half of the emphasis on human dimensions (perspectives and behaviors of people involved) would not qualify. However, courses examining environmental issues or broad climatic changes are included if the coverage is transnational and if at least half of the course discusses the human dimensions of these phenomena. For example, a course on water resources worldwide, if it treated only the engineering technicalities, might not qualify; however, if it included human dimensions, it could.
2. Courses satisfying this requirement must focus on transnational connections between two or more nations or the transnational dynamics of global forces. "Focus" here means that at least two thirds of the course must deal with this topic.

SUPPLEMENTAL GENERAL EDUCATION REQUIREMENT

The Supplemental General Education requirement is intended to add breadth to students' undergraduate experience and to encourage students to make connections as they cross disciplinary boundaries. The requirement applies to students in the College of Arts and Sciences who are pursuing the BA degree, or the BS degree with a major in psychology, and can be fulfilled in the following ways:

1. By completing a second major or a minor; or

2. By completing three courses above 199 that are not being used to fulfill a student's major requirements. These three courses must be from outside the home department/curriculum of the major and cannot be cross-listed with courses that the student has used to satisfy requirements for the major; or

3. By completing a concentration outside a professional school as part of the degree requirements for graduating from the school. This option applies to students in the School of Education and the School of Journalism and Mass Communication.

Subject: Gen Ed Courses: AFRI/AFAM

Dear Professor Nyang Oro,

As you already know, the Undergraduate Curriculum Review raised questions regarding several AFAM and AFRI courses that were selected as part of the syllabi review (see email from Dean Owen below). I've listed the courses and questions that were raised, below. Following the course list, I've provided information about what is needed to resolve the issue(s). In some cases, we'll need an updated syllabus (as a Word or PDF document) by May 13, 2011, so this is not urgent.

1. AFAM 50 – a. 10 pages of writing, or equivalent intellectual effort, was not evident on the syllabus.
   b. Re-evaluate for Communication Intensive (CI) requirement.
2. AFAM 259 – 10 pages of writing, or equivalent intellectual effort, was not evident on the syllabus.
3. AFRI 453 – Review 4 General Education tags. (VP, NA, GL, CI)
4. AFRI 488 – Review 4 General Education tags. (VP, GL, CI, BN)

10 pages of writing. Courses that fulfill a General Education requirement must include at least 10 pages of written work (or equivalent work by virtue of the intellectual labor expended) over the course of the semester, excluding pages written for essays on in-class examinations. I'm attaching criteria guidelines if you wish to read more about this requirement, including information about 10-pages of writing in large classes. Please ask the instructor for AFAM 50 and 259 to update the syllabus to include at least 10 pages of written work.

- Send the updated syllabus to submitcourse@unc.edu no later than May 13, 2011. The Office of Undergraduate Curricula will review the syllabus. If these courses are no longer offered, please inactivate this course by using the new Course Request Approval System (CRAS) in ConnectCarolina.

Re-evaluate for a specific General Education requirement. Please read the attached document to review the criteria for the Communication Intensive (CI) requirement. Based on the syllabus that was reviewed last summer, committee members had concerns that AFRI 50 did not meet the criteria for CI.

- Please send an updated syllabus reflecting the CI criteria to submitcourse@unc.edu no later than May 13, 2011. The Office of Undergraduate Curricula will review the syllabus.
- If this course no longer incorporates revision of written or oral work in response to instructor feedback, please let us know and we'll remove the CI designation, effective fall 2012.

Review 4 General Education tags. The Curriculum Review recommended that courses should satisfy no more than two General Education designations, as the norm. In some cases, Communication Intensive (CI) or Experiential Education (EE) may qualify as a third.

- Send an email to submitcourse@unc.edu by May 13, 2011 indicating which two (or three, if CI or EE) General Education requirements you would like AFRI 453 and 488 to fulfill. This change will not go into effect until fall 2012.

If you have any questions or concerns about these requests, please don't hesitate to contact Nick Siedentop (nick_siedentop@unc.edu) or Erika Lindemann (uline@email.unc.edu).

Best wishes,

Subject: Explore Carolina this Friday, February 25

Hello everyone!

Thank you again for participating in Explore Carolina. The first Explore Carolina went smoothly (as far as we know) and we've heard some good feedback from the people who came. This next Explore will be much larger than the first. To put it in perspective, around 420 people came in for the first one and 850+ are signed up for this next one on Friday. Get ready!

Attached is the agenda for the second Explore Carolina this Friday, February 25th. Please review the agenda and remind all those in your department who are involved with this program of the time and location.

If you need anything throughout the day, we will have our office cell phone on and with one of the people on the Explore Carolina planning team which includes Patty Baum (me), Dave Meredith, and Kendra Lawrence. The number is 919-265-3865.

I currently have department phone numbers for all faculty and staff and any phone number you emailed me last time. If you would like to share a different number with us where we can reach you during the day on Monday in case anything goes awry, please reply to me with the phone number by tomorrow at noon. *If you are a student and have not yet emailed me a with a contact number, please email me back with a contact phone number by tomorrow at noon.

Thanks again for all that you do! We'll see you Friday.

Best,

Patty Baum

EXPLORE CAROLINA

The University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

Friday, February 25

Dear Admitted Student and Family:

Welcome to Explore Carolina! Inside this packet, you'll find everything you'll need to plan your day. We have carefully organized more than 50 sessions so that you can pick and choose the sessions that interest you most. The day is organized around a schedule that begins with a welcome session upon your arrival at 8:00am and the last opportunity beginning at 2:00pm.

Parents and students should feel free to split up and attend separate events throughout the day. We suggest establishing a central meeting place (perhaps the Pit or the Explore Carolina Help Desk located in the Student Union) where you can meet up after your sessions.

There are several kinds of opportunities available for you today. To assist you with terminology, here is a quick description of the different types of sessions:

- Information Session. Representatives from the department will provide an overview of the opportunities available and take questions. On the schedule, you'll notice that these sessions have a specific start time and typically last about 45 minutes.
- Open House/Office Hours. Representatives from the department will be available to speak with students and families during the scheduled period. Feel free to drop by at any time during the available timeframe.
- Class Session. Students are invited to attend a class taught by a UNC faculty member. Please arrive early and stay for the entire class session to avoid disrupting the class.

Special Notes:

- Throughout the day, if you or your family need any assistance, you can find an Admissions student ambassador at the Explore Help Desk located in the lobby of the Student Union, and you can find Admissions staff in the Admissions Office in Jackson Hall.
- Lunch is available any time between 11:30 until 2:00 at Rams Head Dining Hall

We hope you have a fantastic day exploring Carolina!

The Explore Carolina Planning Committee
Dave Meredith, Kendra Lawrence, and Patty Baum

Subject: Kiswahili translation for Carolina for Kibera website?

Dear Julius and Alphonse,

I came across this interesting technology today that allows website translation to be crowd sourced:

http://www.smartling.com/how_it_works

This year marks Carolina for Kibera's 10th Anniversary and we are excited to launch a new website, as well as the release of Rye Baroctt's memoir and a CFK documentary film. It seems a most opportune time to have our website information available in Kiswahili.

Can we meet to talk about how might do this? I'm wondering if we can utilize a small, advanced independent study course in the Fall (FLAS fellows perhaps?) or perhaps there's a group of graduate students who might want to tackle this project as an end of year initiative?

I would love to hear your thoughts and ideas on how we can work together to make this happen? Perhaps we can set up a time to meet?

Asante sana,

~Beth-Ann Kutchma

Subject: Nigeria's Elections: Reversing the Degeneration?

INTERNATIONAL CRISIS GROUP - NEW BRIEFING

Nigeria's Elections: Reversing the Degeneration?

Abuja/Dakar/Brussels, 24 February 2011: Despite some encouraging preparations, huge challenges remain in the short weeks before the April general elections at which Nigeria's international reputation and faith in its own democracy are at stake.

Nigeria's Elections: Reversing the Degeneration?, the latest policy briefing from the International Crisis Group, examines the build-up to a month that will see the president, state governors and the federal legislature chosen in a series of polls that, if credible and peaceful, could finally reverse the degeneration of the franchise since the country returned to civilian rule in 1999. However, many politicians still seem determined to bribe, rig or bully their way to office.

"The polls could mark a turning point for Nigeria", says Kunle Amuwo, Crisis Group's Senior Analyst. "But a repeat of the 2007 sham elections would increase the country's vulnerability to conflict, further alienate citizens from the political elite and reinforce violent groups' narratives of bad governance and exclusion. Flawed polls may ignite already straining fault lines, as losers protest results".

President Goodluck Jonathan, who came to office when his predecessor died last year and seeks a new term in his own right, has made repeated commitments to respect the rules. The government chose an esteemed academic and civil society activist, Professor Attahiru Jega, to preside over the Independent National Election Commission (INEC) and seems inclined to respect its autonomy, including by providing funds on time. The recent voter registration was far from perfect but appears to have increased confidence in the electoral authorities' ability to protect the integrity of the polls.

An uphill battle remains, however, as high-stakes contests for the spoils of office spark fierce winner-takes-all political battles. Politicians and their sponsors habitually exploit violent groups and social divides to win elections, and many Nigerians perceive the recent upsurge in violence as linked to the general elections. Security forces have previously done little to prevent rigging or violence and have frequently been bought by politicians. Lower-level courts are often corrupt, impunity is pervasive, and the rule of law weak. No one has been convicted of an electoral offence since independence.

Elections, therefore, traditionally offer Nigerian politicians a choice: respect the rules and risk losing to an opponent who does not; or avoid the political wilderness by rigging or violence, knowing that to do so is easy, and you are unlikely to be punished. Shifting these incentives is essential to holding better elections.

"Tackling underlying issues requires reforms of a scope not feasible by April", says Gilles Yabi, Crisis Group's West Africa Project Director. "But by bolstering safeguards, rigorous planning, ensuring better security, acting against bogus results and - at last - convicting electoral offenders, INEC and other institutions can at least make cheating a less attractive option".

Subject:	[sschairs] Scheduling appointments on Dean Hartlyn's calendar

This message is being sent to all chairs of Social Science Departments and Curricula in the College, with an information copy to administrative managers.

Dear Colleagues:

I want to let you know about a change in the process and staff involved in scheduling appointments on my calendar. This change should prove relatively minor from your perspective, but since you likely will notice it, I want to make you aware of it in advance.

My assistant, Tiff Clarke, has been asked to assume some additional responsibilities in the Dean's Office going forward. Tiff will continue to be primary manager of my calendar and your primary contact for making appointments with me, so please continue to direct all your calendar inquiries and meeting requests to her. The new part of the process is that Tiff will now delegate much of my calendaring to Stephanie Stadler, whom you likely know and who has supported our office for over a year now in various administrative capacities. Stephanie is an extremely competent and detail-minded retired University employee; your meeting requests will be in good hands with her. Again, you need to do nothing differently; all meeting requests should still be sent to Tiff, who will delegate them to Stephanie as needed.

Please let Tiff or me know if you have any questions about this change.

Best,
Jonathan

Subject: Reminder: Carolina 101 Admissions Event

Hi all,

To those of you who have already signed up for a Carolina 101 panel, thank you!

For those of you who haven't, please consider volunteering to participate in a panel on Academic Life for Carolina 101, an Admissions Office program for high-ability high school juniors. For more information about the program, please see the original email that was sent below. We still need faculty members in all of the areas on various dates. If you would like to talk more or want more information, please let me know. Again, this is a fairly low-impact program. We will find the location and provide students to sit with you on the panel. It would require about 2 hours of your time on a Saturday morning (10 am – approximately 11:45 am).

Thank you for all you have done to help us recruit the Class of 2015 through Explore Carolina and all that you will do with Carolina 101 to help us recruit the Class of 2016!

Best,

Patty Baum

Hello from the Admissions Office!

I hope this finds all of you well and that you all are having a great spring semester. Thank you to many of you who are already helping us with Explore Carolina.

I write today about another program that many of you have volunteered for over the last 5 or 6 years: Carolina 101. Carolina 101 is a Saturday event for top prospective juniors and their parents. Throughout the day, juniors and their parents attend an admissions session/welcome, a session on financial aid and scholarship opportunities, an academic panel, and eat lunch in Rams Head Dining Hall and go on a campus tour. The event is intended to give students an introduction to the university (hence its name) and our hope is that these top students will apply the upcoming fall.

We are looking for faculty volunteers who are willing to sit on and moderate a panel session. Students will attend the panel that is in their area of interest. The areas we need help with are fairly broad, as they are only juniors in high school:

Physical and Natural Science (2 faculty)
Arts and Humanities (2 faculty)
Social Science (2 faculty)

Many of you have already served on a panel like this and we would be honored if you are willing to do so again. If you've never helped before, now is a great time to start!

The dates this year are all Saturdays and the panel will be from 10:30 am – 11:45 am (faculty should arrive by 10 am):

March 26
April 2

April 16

It is a very informal panel—it would be the two faculty and two or three students who are willing to briefly introduce themselves and then answer questions that students and parents have about the areas.

We will get student volunteers and secure the locations (soon to be finalized). All we'd need from you is a couple hours of your time on a Saturday morning.

Please let me know if you can volunteer for one or more dates and let me know if you have any questions.

Best,

Patty Baum

Africa Knowledge Project (AKP)

AKP promotes Critical African Studies. It disseminates Africa-Centered, Evidence-Based Knowledge on Africa and Global African Diaspora.

P: 607-821-2540 E: administrator@africaknowledgeproject.org W: www.africaknowledgeproject.org

Who are we?

Africa Resource Center, Inc, is a strategically managed company that whirlpools, produces and disseminates scholarly materials and information on Africa and its Diaspora. It brings together streams of research analysis, new theoretical orientations, cultural artistic productions, databases of images and primary documents that promote new lines of scholarship, cultural evaluations and political interpretations with substantial African content.

What is Africa Knowledge Project?

Africa Knowledge Project, known as AKP, is an initiative by Africa Resource Center, Inc., dedicated exclusively to academic research on Africa and its Diaspora. AKP focuses on critical Africa-centered, evidence-based knowledge and research from a diverse range of disciplines. While it values the tremendous contribution of Western scholarship, AKP moves away from epistemic schemes of interpretation that represent Western world-views and research interpretations as central and global, and all others as indigenous or vernacular. AKP produces and disseminates rich, critical narratives and analyses that contribute to global scholarship.

What is Critical African Studies?

"Critical African Studies" utilizes concepts and assumptions generated from African ontology and epistemology to theorize African societies and the world. It is distinguished from the standard "African Studies," that utilizes concepts and assumptions from any part of the world to study Africa.

What makes Critical African Studies important to libraries?

- A critical body of knowledge that is vital for faculty and student in advancing their scholarship
- Presents a paradigm shift on conventional knowledge on Africa and global African Diaspora
- Utilizes African concepts, assumptions, and world-sense to theorize outward and engage the world
- Introduces new ideas and bodies of thoughts that are centrifugally African-based

Why subscribe to Africa Knowledge Project?

- Access to high-quality articles in peer-reviewed e-journals and databases
- Access to critical Africa-centered and evidence-based scholarship
- Access to new research and scholarly trends
- Access to a number of growing databases on African music, language (Kiswahili), and images (forthcoming).

What is the history of AKP publisher, Africa Resource Center, Inc?

- Reputable presence as publishers of high-quality, critical African-centered and evidence-based scholarship on Africa and global African Diaspora since 1999
- Early pioneers in using the Web as a medium for publishing and distributing evidence-based scholarship
- Selected by PBS as the Best of the Web Resource on Africa
- Selected by Vanity Fair as the Best Educational Resource on Africa
- Favorable reviewed by BBC

What is the history of the e-journals on Africa Knowledge Project?

- Won 2002 ICCAP award for excellence in advancing the art and science of electronic publication
- Widely linked to top university and research centers around the world
- Has published the works of distinguished professors and emerging scholars around the world
- Selected by Intute in 2010 as one of the best research and educational resource on Africa
- Indexed and abstracted by EBSCO, Elsevier, Proquest, HW Wilson, and OCLC
- Featured twice on Internet Scout Report from the University of Wisconsin-Madison

- Listed in Ulrich Web and WorldCat, Open J-Gate, and previously in DOAJ

New Service to College and University Libraries

- Virtual library on critical African-centered, evidence-based knowledge on Africa and global African Diaspora
- Serving the needs of a new breed of professors, researchers, and students seeking research, evidence-based, academic materials that derive from, and reflect African perspectives
- Major publisher of the critical works of African women
- Has over 720 materials and growing

New Service to Publishers

- Provides publishers annual licensing fee to reprint any of the articles in the e-journal publications

Dakar/Brussels, 3 March 2011: Côte d'Ivoire is on the verge of a new civil war. This tragedy can only be avoided if Africans and the wider international community stand firm behind the democratically elected president, Alassane Ouattara, and he launches an initiative for reconciliation and a transitional government of national unity.

Côte d'Ivoire: Is War the Only Option?,the latest International Crisis Group report, examines the escalation of political violence and armed confrontations since Laurent Gbagbo refused to accept defeat in the November presidential election and has sought to retain office by manipulating institutions and violence. The report says war is imminent, with Gbagbo's army and militias already beginning to clash with the former insurgent Forces Nouvelles in Abidjan and the west of the country, close to the border with Liberia.

The requirements to avoid a disastrous new conflict include Gbagbo stepping down; Ouattara offering to negotiate, with civil society help, an agreement for unity, national reconciliation and an interim transitional government with him at its head (but without the irreconcilable former president); the UN peace-keeping mission standing firm to carry out its civilian protection mandate; and the international community unequivocally supporting any decisions of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), including deployment of a military mission.

“The Gbagbo regime is a serious threat to peace, security and stability in the whole West African region”, says Rinaldo Depagne, Crisis Group's West Africa Senior Analyst. “Any proposal to end the crisis that endorses or extends the Gbagbo presidency would only prolong the chaos and increase the risks”.

The election was part of a peace process that began after the September 2002 rebellion and was endorsed by several accords, the latest the 2007 Ouagadougou Political Agreement that all candidates, including Gbagbo, accepted and that set out compromises on organisation and security for the balloting. Ouattara won the run-off with a margin of more than 350,000 votes over Gbagbo.

The UN certified that result, but Gbagbo used the country's highest court to throw out votes arbitrarily so he could stage a constitutional coup. Since then, he has relied on violence and ultra-nationalist rhetoric to cling to power. Over 300 people have been killed, dozens raped and many more abducted and disappeared by security forces. ECOWAS and the African Union (AU) have recognised Ouattara as president-elect and asked Gbagbo to step down, but he is apparently prepared to resist to the end, even if it means throwing Côte d'Ivoire into anarchy, war and economic disaster with terrible consequences for the entire region.

The international community has an important role to play in assuring a peaceful outcome. The UN Security Counsel must support the UN Operation in Côte d'Ivoire (UNOCI) and encourage it to use all necessary means to accomplish its mandate. A new list of Ivorians subject to targeted sanctions should be developed, and the illegitimate Gbagbo regime's sources of finance should be examined. African states in particular need to show unity, and in particular South Africa should support ECOWAS efforts to remove Gbagbo and install Ouattara rather than pursue dangerously mistaken power sharing notions.

"The most likely scenario is an armed conflict involving massive violence against civilians that could provoke unilateral military intervention by neighbours", says Crisis Group West Africa Project Director Gilles Yabi. "To prevent this, ECOWAS must reclaim responsibility for political and military management of the crisis, with the unequivocal support of the AU and the UN".

France is the first partner of Senegal, politically and economically. However the U.S sees Senegal as a great ally in the African continent. Senegal is a politically stable, democratic, competitive, moderate and Muslim country committed to fighting terrorism. The U.S. sees Senegal as a stable country in unstable region and a model of religious and ethnic tolerance in contrast to countries such as Liberia, Rwanda, Cote D' Ivoire and even Iraq. Senegal plays a key role in conflict resolution not only in Africa but also across the world. Through NEPAD (New Partnership for Africa's Development) Senegal advocates for the private sector and trade that the U.S appreciates. Thus the U.S interests are to reinforce Senegal's stability and to use it as a tool if needed. The U.S sees Senegal as a future good ally in a time where France is having more and more trouble controlling its colonial empire. Senegal is one of the biggest political allies in Africa that one could have, due to its influence not only upon other African countries but also upon the Group of 77. This group was established in 1964 by 77 developing countries. The G77 has increased to 135 members. Its diplomacy is stronger than its economic weight. The U.S. spent fourteen billion dollars in foreign aid and more than four hundred billion on security and weaponry in 2003. Most of this aid goes to Afghanistan, Iraq, Israel, and so on. Only two billion go to Africa. No more than two hundred million go to African development. The rest is for disaster relief and technical assistance (Somalia, Liberia, Angola, Rwanda...). The U.S. is becoming less and less connected with the rest of the world. France, also, is having more and more problems keeping its former African colonies. Since 2000 Senegal's diplomacy is becoming more and more independent toward the West.

Introduction:

In this paper, an attempt has been made to present a comprehensive and comparative analysis of the interactions among the United States of America, France and Sub-Saharan Francophone countries (Senegal). This paper presents a general view of the influence and interests of France and the Unites States in Africa. Senegal's foreign policies are shifting from France to the United States for economic reasons. Senegal is afraid that France's economic help will decrease. Several factors might be the cause of the current situation: lack of means for France to maintain its influence, the end of France's acquired advantages, openness and reinforcement of Senegalese diplomacy, the creation of the European Union, the new age of globalization, the change of leadership in Senegal, and the important role played by international financial institutions in Senegal, such as the World Bank and the IMF.

This paper is in the context of Senegal, France and the United States' current relationship under the leadership of President Abdoulaye Wade of Senegal, Jacques Chirac of France and George W. Bush of the United States of America. This paper examines small states' relationships with great powers. As a case study, I explore Senegal's relationship with France and the United States of America. For the first three decades after independence in August 1960, Senegal was heavily influenced by France; now it appears to be shifting to the Unites States. Why has Senegal shifted from being aligned with France to being aligned with the United States? How and in what way is it shifting? Where it will go? What are the French and American positions toward Senegal today? These are crucial questions among others that I attempt to answer in the paper that follows. It also seems important to give a brief description of Senegal and African economy in the sense that the American public is not familiar with it. In contrast, France and the U.S are well known across the world. Senegal is a particular country in Africa in terms of stability politically and socially.

In addition, however, a number of specific questions needed to be asked in order to proceed efficiently in this paper. Has the Senegalese government been shifting from French influence to become more pro-American? Why is France losing influence in its "other land," a phrase commonly used to refer to Senegal? Is Senegal only now completing its independence of 1960 from France through President Wade? Could Senegal totally renounce cooperation with France? Why does the U.S. give more and more importance to the African Continent today? What kind of room to maneuver do these three powerful countries play in diplomatic matters between them? -What role do the current leaders play in this new situation? How does their personal relationship influence their foreign policy? What is the extent of the shift in Senegalese diplomacy? How important is a leadership change in conducting foreign policy? A number of concepts such as foreign policy, leadership, great power, small power, North South Concept, foreign policy, neocolonialism, influence, and dependency, need to be defined.

Lately, U.S. global foreign policy has been characterized by two principles. First, there is the matter of its arrogance and loss of credibility. The U.S is not connected with the rest of the world, and this disconnection is increasing day by day. United States foreign policy is in trouble and needs more support. Almost the entire international community, including France, China, Russia, Germany, Japan, South Africa, Arab countries, and so on, criticizes U.S. attitudes concerning international issues, as well as the ways the U.S deals with those issues. While the U.S. has trouble convincing other powerful countries such as Germany, Russia, China, Japan, and so on, these countries agree in many ways with French vision on international matters, particularly with the Iraq crisis. France and the U.S. constantly criticize each other on this issue. The Iraq crisis has increased their differences in many ways. The U.S. turns towards Africa to find more support. For its part, France also is having problems dealing with its former colonies including Senegal. Senegal has historic links with both the United States and France. Today, the relationship between Senegal and its partners is changing. This is an unquestionable fact that we will now explore.

Chapter I: France-Senegal Relationship

Senegal is tied by history with both France and the U.S. Senegal was the economic bridge between Europe and America into Sub-Saharan Africa. It can easily be shown that Senegal was the main entrance to West Africa for European traders and colonizers. France and the United States have always had conflicting relations in Senegal since the colonial period. From 1845 to 1990 France adopted policies not only in Senegal but also in the other French Colonies in West Africa to block American infiltration. France adopted drastic measures such as surveillance and denial to contain American missionaries' infiltration in Senegal. Indeed France political authorities and French missionary authorities together fought American influence not only in Senegal but also in French colonies in West Africa such as present Cote D'Ivoire, Burkina Faso, and Benin. Until 1920 French authorities refused to admit American missionaries into Senegal. French authorities funded Catholic schools to fight American missionaries in 1921. In 1923, the U.S did not hesitate to intervene when France attempted to end the use of the English language in Cameroon[1]. When France showed respect to international treaties the doors were opened to American missionaries. France placed Americans under strong surveillance in order to be able to control their activities. Even the Governor General of the French Colonies in West Africa in Senegal recommended substituting French Protestants for American Protestants in the 1940's. He also ordered a tough surveillance of Ghana and Liberia's (Anglophone countries) borders to contain American influence. This was a beginning of a French anti-Americanism in Senegal.[2]

Senegal was colonized and exploited economically by France. To me, France has specialized Senegal's in the production of agriculture on peanuts, cotton and millets mostly. Resources such as gold, historic objects and diamonds were taken to France during colonialism. Even after independence, France keeps exploiting Senegal. France buys raw materials in Senegal very cheap and sells them back for a higher price, sometimes for four times more than France had bought the product from Senegal. This phenomenon heavily contributed to the deficit of Senegal's balance of payment

Hi Julius,

Hope all is well. As you know Holden and others have worked to create an Innovation Road Map for the University that includes a case statement for innovation for $125M. The College is working on a case statement for Innovation which will align with these same goals. Does the department have funding needs or priorities that might fall within this campaign?

Please let me know your thoughts by Friday, March 11. If you have questions please call or email me.

Thanks!

INNOVATE @ CAROLINA

IMPORTANT IDEAS FOR A BETTER WORLD

A Case for Support

THE UNIVERSITY
of NORTH CAROLINA
at CHAPEL HILL

WE HAVE SO MUCH WORK AHEAD OF US. OUR TO-DO LIST IS NOTHING LESS THAN THE GREATEST PROBLEMS OF OUR TIME: CURE DISEASES, AND GET THOSE CURES TO ALL THE PEOPLE WHO NEED THEM. FIND AND INVENT CLEAN ENERGY. INSPIRE STUDENTS IN OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS. FEED SEVEN BILLION PEOPLE. DESCRIBE THE WORLD, AND REPLACE CONFLICT WITH UNDERSTANDING.

Holden Thorp, Chancellor of the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

A Time for Bold Action

On Oct. 12, 2010, Chancellor Thorp will launch the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill's Innovate@Carolina Campaign. The campaign will aim to raise $125 million to make Carolina a world leader in launching university-born ideas for the good of society.

Why Oct. 12? Because that date, in 1793, marked the birth of public higher education in America. The laying of Old East's cornerstone proclaimed to the nation that Carolina refused to follow the path of cloistered elitism, sequestered in the Ivory Tower. Rather, with one bold stroke, Carolina led a young country to a future filled with highly educated citizens of all creeds and backgrounds, giving generations access to America's promise of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

It is time to be bold again. Even bolder. We must do more than lead in American public higher education. We must extend our impact to the region, state, nation, and the world.

The Challenge

The world needs help. Read any front page, watch any newscast, check any RSS feed. From oil spills to flu pandemics to suicide bombers, every day seems to bring another horror.

And yet there are great institutions that can help. And Carolina is one of them. The Innovate@Carolina Campaign will set in motion our response.

As the nation's first public university, Carolina has always epitomized public service. Further, because of our commitment to liberal arts, strong technical areas, and professional schools, our faculty and students see the world broadly and think critically. They are wired to innovate.

Carolina is both compelled and poised to accelerate and apply its innovative and entrepreneurial mindset to help solve the world's most recalcitrant problems.

Our strength comes from fostering creativity and discovery in the classroom, the lab, and the studio, as well as in communities beyond our campus. Our liberal arts tradition, combined with excellence in scientific research and professional programs, equips our faculty and students to assess the current state of knowledge in a discipline, augment that knowledge through rigorous new research, and share the product of this new knowledge in innovative ways. In short, a culture of innovation.

Although humanity faces great challenges, we have great human capital to respond. Among our 3,500 faculty, we can claim a Nobel Prize winner and members of the national academies in the sciences and medicine as well as the arts and humanities. Our student population boasts many of the nation's best and brightest high school graduates and graduate students. And these students can pursue more than 100 fields of study and earn bachelor's, master's, and doctoral degrees, along with professional degrees in fields including dentistry, medicine, pharmacy, business, journalism, and law.

Carolina is physically located at the nexus of innovation and entrepreneurship. Just miles from two other world-class research universities, Duke University and NC State, UNC-Chapel Hill has forged extensive partnerships with these institutions. The Research Triangle Park (RTP) stands just 10 miles from the Carolina campus as a testament to the power of entrepreneurial thinking. Founded in 1959, RTP is one of the largest research parks in the nation where a concentration of corporate research-and-development facilities and a highly educated workforce have fueled a thriving entrepreneurial economy.

And so our stage is set with tremendous potential. We have the will to turn that potential into even greater achievement. We must now align our values, resources, and processes to drive our culture of innovation. The Innovate@Carolina Campaign will give us the way.

The Way Forward

In early 2010, Chancellor Thorp assembled groups of faculty, staff, students, alumni, parents, and friends of the University — many with extensive experience leading innovation in science, business, medicine, nonprofits, and academia. Their charge: Develop a strategic plan to enable Carolina to increase the volume and accelerate the pace at which important ideas created here are applied for a better world.

> We will build a culture of innovation that permeates every corner of campus.

The resulting roadmap scales far beyond the conventional notions of how a university can do good outside its borders. We envision much more than promoting a single professor's eco-friendly business concept or getting research findings published in academic journals. Such efforts are important, but the scope of the Innovate@Carolina Campaign will be nothing less than transformative: We will build a culture of innovation that permeates every corner of campus, from the chemist in Caudill Labs to the poet in Greenlaw Hall. We will redouble our efforts to leverage scientific and medical research for society's good, and we will advance work in the humanities that leads to greater understanding of the challenges the world faces.

What's more, to effectively address these complex challenges, this culture will be collaborative, with the chemist's science and the poet's verse informing each other.

The key to our roadmap's success is simple: We must raise $125 million to make it a reality. And we aim to do so by June 30, 2013. The world's problems won't wait.

CAMPAIGN GOALS

The Innovation Circle identified these major funding goals for the Innovate@Carolina Campaign:

$25 million to create a permanent endowment supporting innovation. This endowment will create a group of "Innovation Funds" to be awarded on a competitive basis to faculty, students, and staff to support the most promising innovations on campus.

$15 million (endowment) to create five Applied Sciences Professorships. The faculty filling these positions will bring the expertise that lies at the intersection of disciplines. They will help colleagues across campus connect basic sciences with engineering, propelling the University into new areas of discovery and application.

$15 million (endowment and expendable) to hire entrepreneurs-in-residence. Drawn from the ranks of outstanding commercial and social entrepreneurs both on and off campus, these experts will mentor and counsel students and faculty interested or involved in entrepreneurial ventures. They also will use their professional contacts to help students secure off-campus internships and faculty develop relationships with the private and non-profit sectors.

$6 million (expendable) to fund grants tackling the "World's Greatest Challenges." Every two years for the next six years, the campus will coalesce around a theme that addresses a pressing global priority, such as water quality and its critical role in supporting healthy communities around the world.

CAMPAIGN GOALS

$6 million (endowment) to fund two Innovation Professorships. Innovation Professors, selected on a competitive basis to pursue a promising innovation project, will be exempted from the normal structures of their academic position at Carolina for up to three years.

$25 million (endowment) to support teaching and research, including the Minor in Entrepreneurship and other successful programs of the Carolina Entrepreneurial Initiative. Critical to promoting a culture of innovation, the interdisciplinary minor in the College of Arts and Sciences encourages students to think and act entrepreneurially, teaching them the skills to start successful ventures of all kinds: commercial, social, scientific, and artistic. Additional funding will provide ongoing support to the highly successful CEI programs including Launching the Venture, the Chancellor's Faculty Boot Camp on Entrepreneurship, the Carolina Challenge, and First Year Seminars in innovation and entrepreneurship.

$10 million (expendable) to create a Student Innovation Hub. The Innovation Hub will serve as a physical nexus on campus where students, faculty, and staff can come together to engage in innovation and entrepreneurial efforts. Preferably an existing public space, centrally located and transformed over time into an Innovation Hub — open to the entire University community — to nurture, inspire and celebrate the innovation culture of Carolina. Such a space would offer resources to innovators and entrepreneurs who do not have a natural home in a specific unit, provide spaces for ad hoc collaborations, and serve as a common space to celebrate our campus-wide innovation culture.

$5 million (endowment) to support the Innovation Scholars Program. Expanding the Carolina Innovation Scholarship program will enable the University to recruit and support more students who show outstanding promise as entrepreneurs with scholarships that cover the full cost of tuition, fees, room and board, renewable for four years.

$3.3 million (expendable) to expand the Carolina KickStart program campus wide. Carolina KickStart, in collaboration with Office of Technology Development and Center of Entrepreneurial Studies, will improve the probability of successfully commercializing UNC faculty technology by seeding startups and providing comprehensive consulting services.

$14.7 million (expendable and endowment) to fund emerging innovation projects. The remaining $14.7 million in the Innovate@ Carolina Campaign will fund other important efforts that will include seed funding for social innovations created at Carolina; Research Triangle and Global competitive collaboration grants; grants funding studies in innovation and entrepreneurship to assess what approaches are most effective as agents of change; and marketing efforts to collectively nurture Carolina's culture of innovation for a better world.

The Ultimate ROI

Return on investment. Every investor expects it. The Innovate@Carolina Campaign takes this to heart. And as with investors in any enterprise, supporters will receive an annual report and be invited to an annual Innovate@Carolina meeting convened by the Chancellor. Both will document our progress in turning ideas into solutions, using rigorous empirical metrics to measure the performance of every Innovate@Carolina program.

Investors want impact. As a charter shareholder in the Innovate@Carolina enterprise your investment will amount to much more than a thicker stock portfolio. As Chancellor Thorp says, Carolina's "to-do list is nothing less than the greatest problems of our time." And so this campaign represents nothing less than the chance to change the world.

WE MUST BE BOLD, AGAIN.

Call for Proposals: IAH Innovation Fund
Application Deadline: Friday, April 8, 2011

The Institute for the Arts and Humanities (IAH), in partnership with the Office of the Vice Chancellor for Research and Economic Development and with support from the Hyde Family Foundations, is pleased to announce the IAH Innovation Fund, a $100,000 fund for research and creative activities in the arts and humanities.

Proposals for the fund are due April 8, 2011, and winners will be notified by May 20, 2011. Full information is available at http://iah.unc.edu/innovation/cfp.

The IAH Innovation Fund exists to support faculty work that falls within the broad outlines of the roadmap for innovation at UNC (http://innovation.unc.edu).

The IAH Innovation Fund supports projects that venture beyond traditional practices in arts and humanities research and teaching. It encourages work that engages with new methods of working, learning and teaching and embarks in knowledge creation with diverse publics within and beyond the academy.

We encourage projects, collaborative or individual, from faculty across the University as long as the work is within the presented guidelines. In short, we encourage proposals that imagine possibilities, that transform what the arts and humanities can do in our culture and in our world.

All UNC fixed term, tenure-track and tenured faculty are eligible to apply as individuals or in collaboration with other faculty, staff, students, community partners and/or professionals as long as the work has relevance to arts and humanities teaching and/or practice. While each project must be led by a UNC faculty member, the team may include members who are not affiliated with UNC. We encourage faculty applying for proposals to collaborate across and beyond campus.

Call for Proposals: IAH INNOVATION FUND

APPLICATION DEADLINE: FRIDAY, APRIL 8, 2011

The Institute for the Arts and Humanities (IAH), in partnership with the Office of the Vice Chancellor for Research and Economic Development and with support from the Hyde Family Foundations, is pleased to announce the creation of a $100,000 Innovation Fund for projects in the arts and humanities.

INNOVATION IN THE ARTS AND HUMANITIES

The IAH Innovation Fund exists to support faculty work that falls within the broad outlines of the roadmap for innovation at UNC, available online at http://innovation.unc.edu/.

The IAH Innovation Fund will support projects that venture beyond traditional practices in arts and humanities research and teaching. It encourages work that engages with new methods of working, learning and teaching and embarks in knowledge creation with diverse publics within and beyond the academy.

We encourage projects, collaborative or individual, from faculty across the university as long as the work is within the presented guidelines. In short, we encourage proposals that imagine possibilities, that transform what the arts and humanities can do in our culture and in our world.

ABOUT THE FUND

Faculty may submit proposals for projects that are for a short duration or that extend for several years. Proposals may also be for projects that require minimal financial support or that envision substantial amounts. The IAH will provide funding for up to $50,000 and sustained project support for up to three years. Successful applications will receive an initial "seed" grant of up to $5,000 for planning and preliminary work. The Institute will work with successful applicants to define the specific resources (both monetary and non-monetary) necessary for a project's success, to locate these resources within the university and/or community, and to establish measurable benchmarks to ensure its successful completion.

Funds may be used for summer salary support, payment of research assistants, travel, supplies, research materials, equipment or any other properly justified expense of scholarly or artistic endeavor.

PRIORITIES FOR SELECTION

Innovation in the arts and humanities comes in many forms and has a variety of goals. Priority will be given to:

- Work that is multidisciplinary and collaborative, although work by individual faculty will be considered. All work must describe projects that fit clearly within the framework of the arts and humanities;
- Work that utilizes—and experiments in—new forms of communication and new ways of disseminating scholarly work;
- The creation of new curricular forms, including inquiry-based courses organized around a question or a problem;
- Work that makes efforts to bridge the gap between academic knowledge and activities in the non-academic world—cultural, economic, political and global—to which that knowledge can make a contribution;

TO APPLY

Application criteria and forms are available at http://iah.unc.edu/innovation/cfp. Proposals must be submitted electronically on the IAH website by midnight on April 8. Announcement of awards will be made by May 20, 2011.

If you would like to discuss your proposal, please contact IAH Interim Director Bill Balthrop (vwb@email.unc.edu, 843-2657) or Executive Director Megan Granda (mgranda@unc.edu, 843-2653).

Dear Colleagues,

Lecture courses (identified as LEC) with enrollment greater than zero (0) must have an instructor. For the classes that don't have one listed for Spring 2011, scheduling officers must add an instructor by March 14th. After that date, all changes will have to be sent to the scheduling team in the Registrar's Office to process, which will take more time and effort. Updating this information can be done through Connect Carolina on the Meetings tab under Maintain Schedule of Classes. For cross-listed classes, this information can be updated on the Meetings tab under Schedule Class Meetings.

To find out if your department has any courses that need an instructor assigned in the system, your scheduling officer can access the Registration Section Status Summary Report on the Office of the University Registrar's website at http://regweb.unc.edu/
Navigation: Statistics and Reports (link on the left) > Registration Section Status Summary Report (near the top) > Spring 2011 Undergraduate > select appropriate subject code.

If you have any questions, please contact Nick Siedentop in the Office of Undergraduate Education, nick_siedentop@unc.edu, 962-5819.

Thanks,

Bobbi

RESEARCH PLAN FOR SPRING 2012 LEAVE
Reginald F. Hildebrand, Associate Professor Department of African and African American Studies

Project

My ongoing project is to craft a book of essays, called "Engaging Blackness: Body, Mind, and Spirit: The Perspectives of Malcolm X, W.E.B. Du Bois, and Howard Thurman." Using those three thinkers and activists as exemplars, the essays will provide a comparative exploration of the political, intellectual, and spiritual approaches to understanding race and engaging racial issues. Biographically as well as philosophically, each of those three men understood race from different perspectives. Malcolm X believed that power had to be confronted, seized and utilized. As a political realist, he discovered that it was sometimes necessary make compromises with truth in order to attain power. For many years Du Bois believed that ignorance was the root of intolerance, and so he made a life-long commitment to root out ignorance and pursue Truth, even when truth was complex, and even when its pursuit made him unpopular. Because of that reality, he knew that it was unlikely that he would ever achieve power. Howard Thurman was a remarkable theologian who counseled many activists during the Civil Rights Movement, including Martin Luther King, Jr. Thurman focused on things that were spiritual and transcendent, but he insisted that "a man and his black skin must face the timeless issues of the human spirit together." Although each individual had his own distinctive emphasis, they were all complex human beings, and to varying degrees, they were all political, intellectual and spiritual.

Research

To my knowledge, no project like "Engaging Blackness" has been published before, but there is an overabundance of secondary material about X and Du Bois, and a fair amount on Thurman. On the other hand, the papers of Malcolm X only became available to scholars about three years ago. The main body of the papers of Howard Thurman are still being processed, but the first published volume of his letters appeared in 2009, and the second volume should be out in the near future. Also, in 2009 some of the massive collection of Du Bois's papers began to be made available online.

I have read almost all of the secondary material on Malcolm X, but a leave in the spring of 2012 would permit me to tackle his papers which are housed as the Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture in New York City. I have also been fortunate enough to learn about a partially processed collection of Thurman letters that are located in the Friends Historical Collection at Guilford College. There are four boxes of material there that have not been used before, and are not scheduled to be published with the main body of Thurman papers. The archivist of the Friends Collection has welcomed me to go through them. My search through the Du Bois papers will be selective, and will already be underway online even before my leave begins.

In sum, by the end of 2011, I plan to complete my research in secondary sources for all three men, and to have begun sketching out the essays. I will also have read all of X's speeches, and everything published by Thurman himself. It will not be necessary, or possible, for me to read everything written by or about Dr. Du Bois. (But I will read almost everything by him.) My leave time will be primarily devoted to researching manuscript materials. When the spring semester is over, I will ready to shift my focus to writing and re-writing.

Office Hours

COURSE DESCRIPTION:

This course examines Africa's recent history by looking at various social, political, and economic developments during the colonial era, and independence struggles. We will explore the complexity of the Continent's historical experience in the nineteenth and twentieth century, a period characterized by increasingly intense interactions with the western world. Lectures and, discussions, assignments, and readings will focus on the major changes that occurred in the face of European imperialism and its aftershock. We will consider the reshaping of Africa's political economy during the colonial period and analyze contentious legacies that remain in the postcolonial era. The U. S Africa relations and the new North Africa revolutions in Tunisia, Egypt, Libya, and so on will be examined as well.

The work of African scholars, writers, and artist will offer divers perspectives. Challenges facing independent Africa will be explored in the context of debates about development, neocolonialism, conflicts, and nation building. A focus on events and issues in several countries will add this survey of the making of modern Africa

COURSE GOALS:

1:To develop familiarity with African History and an appreciation of both the similarities and diversity in Africa's historical experience.

2:To appreciate Africans as historical actors who are active in the making of their history.

3:To articulate various social, political, and economic changes that happened during colonization and to understand the relevance of colonial legacies in the different parts of postcolonial Africa.

4:To develop a deeper understanding of events in several countries and consider debates on development, neocolonialism, and nation building at the end of the semester.

COURSE READING:

1: Kevin Shillington (2005): History of Africa (Revised 2nd edition). Macmillan Publishers.

2: John Park and Richard Rathbone (2007), African History: A very short Introduction, Oxford University press.

COURSE REQUIREMENTS:

1: Blue books for exams
2: Completion of assignments, i.e., special projects
3: Two major tests: mid-term and final exam and or project
4: quizzes as required
5: Group Research project.

EVALUATION:

Class grade distribution as follows:
Attendance and Participation: 10%
Short Quizzes: 10%
Group project Assignment: 10%
Midterm: 30%
Final Exam or project: 40%

A (excellent): 90-100
B (good): 80-89
C (average): 60-79
D (weak): 50-59
F (failed): 0-49

EXAMINATIONS:

Examination will cover materials from readings, lectures (including guest lectures), film, museum materials, and other sources used in class. Both objective and essay questions will appear on the examinations. There will be no make-up exams except in case of illness or comparable crisis. In these instances, students will be required to present an appropriate explanation (such as a physician's note) for the absence. Make up exam must be taken with in seven (7) days of the original schedule of the original scheduled exam.

GROUP RESEARCH PROJECT

A group research project based on or issue from one of our units is to be completed on a specific date to be determined later by the instructor. Your group will conduct research and give a class presentation to share argument, conclusion and of course have a class discussion. All groups will write a five to ten page-paper on their findings, due to the date of their presentation. All members of a group are expected to contribute constructively to the group's overall project. Work within the group might be divided up.

ATTENDANCE

Attendance is mandatory. Active participation is expected. More than five (5) unexcused absences will result in a zero for your attendance grade. Missing ten (10) or more classes (excused or note) will likely result in failure of the class.
Class lectures and discussions are not a substitute for your readings and vis-versa. Students are expected to prepare for class meetings in advance, come to class on time, and stay for the whole class. Be respectful of your classmates. An attendance sheet will be circulated at each class for my records. Please, sign in at each class meeting. Signing in for others is forgery and will be subject to a charge of academic misconduct. All cell phones must be silenced during class.

ACADEMIC MISCONDUCT:

All form of academic misconduct –including, but not restricted to, cheating, fabrication and falsification, plagiarism, facilitating academic misconduct, and tempering with materials, grades, or records, - carry severe penalties. For more information about academic misconduct check this link:

Special Needs and Religious Holidays:

Any student in this course who has disability that may prevent him/her from fully demonstrating his /her abilities should contact me as soon as possible so that we can discuss accommodations necessary to ensure full participation and facilitate educational opportunity. If class requirements conflict with religious holidays that you observe, please, discuss this with me in advance.

The Rwandan genocide sparked a horrific bloodbath that swept across sub-Saharan Africa, ultimately leading to the deaths of some four million people. In this extraordinary history of the recent wars in Central Africa, Gérard Prunier offers a gripping account of how one grisly episode laid the groundwork for a sweeping and disastrous upheaval.

Prunier vividly describes the grisly aftermath of the Rwandan genocide, when approximately two million refugees—a third of Rwanda's population—fled to exile in Zaire in 1996. The new Rwandan regime then crossed into Zaire and attacked the refugees, slaughtering upwards of 400,000 people. The Rwandan forces then turned on Zaire's despotic President Mobutu and, with the help of a number of allied African countries, overthrew him. But as Prunier shows, the collapse of the Mobutu regime and the ascension of the corrupt and erratic Laurent-Désiré Kabila created a power vacuum that drew Rwanda, Uganda, Angola, Zimbabwe, Sudan, and other African nations into an extended and chaotic war. The heart of the book documents how the whole core of the African continent became engulfed in an intractible and bloody conflict after 1998, a devastating war that only wound down following the assassination of Kabila in 2001. Prunier not only captures all this in his riveting narrative, but he also indicts the international community for its utter lack of interest in what was then the largest conflict in the world.

Key Features:

- Written by an author renowned for his expertise and engaging writings on Africa, and filled with telling details from his own eyewitness reports.
- Renders the complexity of the Congolese conflict in a highly readable, informed narrative that is ideal for both new students and current scholars.

Review:

"This unique and hugely ambitious book may turn out to be one of the most important to emerge on Africa for a long time."
—Financial Times

Bridging the Security/Development Divide With International Security Assistance in Eastern Africa

As a direct result of globalization and expanded economic opportunity, the last half century has yielded the most remarkable exodus from poverty in human history. Regrettably, not all have benefitted equally. No more somber example of this continued disparity can be found than in sub-Saharan African—a region plagued by myriad of security and development challenges, from the spread of infectious disease, to small arms trafficking, to terrorism.

In this report, Stimson Center coauthors Brian Finlay, senior associate and director of the Managing Across Boundaries program, and Johan Bergenas, research associate, along with Stanley Foundation associate program officer Veronica Tessler, hone in on the Eastern Africa subregion and propose a "whole of society" approach that seeks to better leverage existing resources, identify new streams of assistance, and bridge the divide between security and development. The report is the third in a series that seeks innovative approaches to implementing UN Security Council Resolutions 1540 and 1373 by pragmatically pairing states in need of development assistance with those states willing to offer such assistance under the auspices of national security.

INTERNATIONAL CRISIS GROUP - NEW MEDIA RELEASE

A Ceasefire and Negotiations the Right Way to Resolve the Libya Crisis

Brussels, 10 March 2011: A complete ceasefire to be followed by negotiations to secure a transition to a post-Qaddafi, legitimate and representative government should be the immediate objectives of the international community's approach to the Libyan crisis. Military intervention should be viewed as a last resort, with the goal of protecting civilians at risk, and nothing should be allowed to preempt or preclude the urgent search for a political solution.

At the outset of the anti-Qaddafi protests, the international community reacted to widespread abuses against civilians by adopting measures (asset freeze, arms embargo, threat of prosecution of war crimes) which Crisis Group had called for and publicly supported as necessary to prevent a humanitarian disaster. But the situation has since evolved. It is now becoming a full-scale civil war.

In Tunisia and Egypt, the army, by playing a neutral buffer role, was decisive in avoiding civil war and facilitating an orderly resolution of the political crisis. In both countries, the state had an existence independent of the president and his regime, and the army could see that the protesters were opposing the latter but not the state itself. This distinction between state and regime is absent in Libya.

Qaddafi built a power structure centered around him and family members and dependent in part on tribal alliances rather than modern structures. As a result, the army and security forces could not remain neutral; they have split between forces loyal to one side or the other. The country also appears to be dividing along tribal and regional lines.

In this context, Western calls for military intervention of one kind or another are perilous and potentially counter-productive. There are no quick or easy fixes. Insisting that Qaddafi step down will not make it happen. Imposing a no-fly zone, bombing airfields or arming the rebels could tilt the balance of power in the rebels' favour but is unlikely to swiftly bring down the regime.

In fact, it could hand the regime a propaganda gift that enables it to reinforce its position, while compromising and dividing the anti-Qaddafi coalition, which needs time to develop into a truly unified movement with a clear leadership and a coherent political vision. It might also prove inconclusive, placing the international community before a difficult dilemma: to deepen its involvement or witness a protracted stalemate.

Determined Western intervention could help topple the regime but at considerable political as well as human cost and would risk precipitating a political vacuum in which various forces engage in a potentially prolonged and violent struggle for supremacy before anything resembling a state and stable government are re-established. Such a vortex could draw in Libya's neighbours and gravely compromise prospects for democratic development in Tunisia and Egypt as well as create a humanitarian catastrophe on Europe's doorsteps. Entering the conflict likely would be far easier than exiting it.

Instead, the international community should enunciate clear principles aimed at ending loss of life and which it could defend regardless of the conflict's evolution:

- Condemnation of the use of force against civilians and of violations of international humanitarian law, with the credible prospect of international action should such actions escalate
- An immediate ceasefire.
- Negotiations between the protagonists aimed at replacing the current regime with a more accountable, representative and law-abiding government. Both immediate humanitarian and longer term political considerations require an end to the violence through a cease-fire and negotiations between the two sides. Crisis Group accordingly calls for the formation of a contact group or committee consisting of internationally respected statesmen drawn from Libya's North African neighbours and other African states. Its mandate would be to broker an immediate ceasefire and initiate direct talks between the two sides to secure a transition to a post-Qaddafi regime that has legitimacy in the eyes of the Libyan people.

Such talks might not succeed. More forceful measures -- sanctioned by the UN Security Council and in close coordination with the Arab League and African Union -- might become necessary to prevent massive loss of life. But before that conclusion is reached, diplomatic options must first be exhausted. They have not even begun.

Hi Julius,

Hope all is well. As you know Holden and others have worked to create an Innovation Road Map for the University that includes a case statement for innovation for $125M. The College is working on a case statement for Innovation which will align with these same goals. Does the department have funding needs or priorities that might fall within this campaign?

Please let me know your thoughts by Friday, March 11. If you have questions please call or email me.

Thanks!

INNOVATE @ CAROLINA

IMPORTANT IDEAS FOR A BETTER WORLD

A Case for Support

of NORTH CAROLINA
at CHAPEL HILL

WE HAVE SO MUCH WORK AHEAD OF US. OUR TO-DO LIST IS NOTHING LESS THAN THE GREATEST PROBLEMS OF OUR TIME: CURE DISEASES, AND GET THOSE CURES TO ALL THE PEOPLE WHO NEED THEM. FIND AND INVENT CLEAN ENERGY. INSPIRE STUDENTS IN OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS. FEED SEVEN BILLION PEOPLE. DESCRIBE THE WORLD, AND REPLACE CONFLICT WITH UNDERSTANDING.

Holden Thorp, Chancellor of the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

A Time for Bold Action

On Oct. 12, 2010, Chancellor Thorp will launch the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill's Innovate@Carolina Campaign. The campaign will aim to raise $125 million to make Carolina a world leader in launching university-born ideas for the good of society.

Why Oct. 12? Because that date, in 1793, marked the birth of public higher education in America. The laying of Old East's cornerstone proclaimed to the nation that Carolina refused to follow the path of cloistered elitism, sequestered in the Ivory Tower. Rather, with one bold stroke, Carolina led a young country to a future filled with highly educated citizens of all creeds and backgrounds, giving generations access to America's promise of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

It is time to be bold again. Even bolder. We must do more than lead in American public higher education. We must extend our impact to the region, state, nation, and the world.

The Challenge

The world needs help. Read any front page, watch any newscast, check any RSS feed. From oil spills to flu pandemics to suicide bombers, every day seems to bring another horror.

And yet there are great institutions that can help. And Carolina is one of them. The Innovate@Carolina Campaign will set in motion our response.

As the nation's first public university, Carolina has always epitomized public service. Further, because of our commitment to liberal arts, strong technical areas, and professional schools, our faculty and students see the world broadly and think critically. They are wired to innovate.

Carolina is both compelled and poised to accelerate and apply its innovative and entrepreneurial mindset to help solve the world's most recalcitrant problems.

Our strength comes from fostering creativity and discovery in the classroom, the lab, and the studio, as well as in communities beyond our campus. Our liberal arts tradition, combined with excellence in scientific research and professional programs, equips our faculty and students to assess the current state of knowledge in a discipline, augment that knowledge through rigorous new research, and share the product of this new knowledge in innovative ways. In short, a culture of innovation.

Although humanity faces great challenges, we have great human capital to respond. Among our 3,500 faculty, we can claim a Nobel Prize winner and members of the national academies in the sciences and medicine as well as the arts and humanities. Our student population boasts many of the nation's best and brightest high school graduates and graduate students. And these students can pursue more than 100 fields of study and earn bachelor's, master's, and doctoral degrees, along with professional degrees in fields including dentistry, medicine, pharmacy, business, journalism, and law.

Carolina is physically located at the nexus of innovation and entrepreneurship. Just miles from two other world-class research universities, Duke University and NC State, UNC-Chapel Hill has forged extensive partnerships with these institutions. The Research Triangle Park (RTP) stands just 10 miles from the Carolina campus as a testament to the power of entrepreneurial thinking. Founded in 1959, RTP is one of the largest research parks in the nation where a concentration of corporate research-and-development facilities and a highly educated workforce have fueled a thriving entrepreneurial economy.

And so our stage is set with tremendous potential. We have the will to turn that potential into even greater achievement. We must now align our values, resources, and processes to drive our culture of innovation. The Innovate@Carolina Campaign will give us the way.

The Way Forward

In early 2010, Chancellor Thorp assembled groups of faculty, staff, students, alumni, parents, and friends of the University — many with extensive experience leading innovation in science, business, medicine, nonprofits, and academia. Their charge: Develop a strategic plan to enable Carolina to increase the volume and accelerate the pace at which important ideas created here are applied for a better world.

> We will build a culture of innovation that permeates every corner of campus.

The resulting roadmap scales far beyond the conventional notions of how a university can do good outside its borders. We envision much more than promoting a single professor's eco-friendly business concept or getting research findings published in academic journals. Such efforts are important, but the scope of the Innovate@Carolina Campaign will be nothing less than transformative: We will build a culture of innovation that permeates every corner of campus, from the chemist in Caudill Labs to the poet in Greenlaw Hall. We will redouble our efforts to leverage scientific and medical research for society's good, and we will advance work in the humanities that leads to greater understanding of the challenges the world faces.

What's more, to effectively address these complex challenges, this culture will be collaborative, with the chemist's science and the poet's verse informing each other.

The key to our roadmap's success is simple: We must raise $125 million to make it a reality. And we aim to do so by June 30, 2013. The world's problems won't wait.

CAMPAIGN GOALS

The Innovation Circle identified these major funding goals for the Innovate@Carolina Campaign:

$25 million to create a permanent endowment supporting innovation. This endowment will create a group of "Innovation Funds" to be awarded on a competitive basis to faculty, students, and staff to support the most promising innovations on campus.

$15 million (endowment) to create five Applied Sciences Professorships. The faculty filling these positions will bring the expertise that lies at the intersection of disciplines. They will help colleagues across campus connect basic sciences with engineering, propelling the University into new areas of discovery and application.

$15 million (endowment and expendable) to hire entrepreneurs-in-residence. Drawn from the ranks of outstanding commercial and social entrepreneurs both on and off campus, these experts will mentor and counsel students and faculty interested or involved in entrepreneurial ventures. They also will use their professional contacts to help students secure off-campus internships and faculty develop relationships with the private and non-profit sectors.

$6 million (expendable) to fund grants tackling the "World's Greatest Challenges." Every two years for the next six years, the campus will coalesce around a theme that addresses a pressing global priority, such as water quality and its critical role in supporting healthy communities around the world.

CAMPAIGN GOALS

$6 million (endowment) to fund two Innovation Professorships. Innovation Professors, selected on a competitive basis to pursue a promising innovation project, will be exempted from the normal structures of their academic position at Carolina for up to three years.

$25 million (endowment) to support teaching and research, including the Minor in Entrepreneurship and other successful programs of the Carolina Entrepreneurial Initiative. Critical to promoting a culture of innovation, the interdisciplinary minor in the College of Arts and Sciences encourages students to think and act entrepreneurially, teaching them the skills to start successful ventures of all kinds: commercial, social, scientific, and artistic. Additional funding will provide ongoing support to the highly successful CEI programs including Launching the Venture, the Chancellor's Faculty Boot Camp on Entrepreneurship, the Carolina Challenge, and First Year Seminars in innovation and entrepreneurship.

$10 million (expendable) to create a Student Innovation Hub. The Innovation Hub will serve as a physical nexus on campus where students, faculty, and staff can come together to engage in innovation and entrepreneurial efforts. Preferably an existing public space, centrally located and transformed over time into an Innovation Hub — open to the entire University community — to nurture, inspire and celebrate the innovation culture of Carolina. Such a space would offer resources to innovators and entrepreneurs who do not have a natural home in a specific unit, provide spaces for ad hoc collaborations, and serve as a common space to celebrate our campus-wide innovation culture.

$5 million (endowment) to support the Innovation Scholars Program. Expanding the Carolina Innovation Scholarship program will enable the University to recruit and support more students who show outstanding promise as entrepreneurs with scholarships that cover the full cost of tuition, fees, room and board, renewable for four years.

$3.3 million (expendable) to expand the Carolina KickStart program campus wide. Carolina KickStart, in collaboration with Office of Technology Development and Center of Entrepreneurial Studies, will improve the probability of successfully commercializing UNC faculty technology by seeding startups and providing comprehensive consulting services.

$14.7 million (expendable and endowment) to fund emerging innovation projects. The remaining $14.7 million in the Innovate@ Carolina Campaign will fund other important efforts that will include seed funding for social innovations created at Carolina; Research Triangle and Global competitive collaboration grants; grants funding studies in innovation and entrepreneurship to assess what approaches are most effective as agents of change; and marketing efforts to collectively nurture Carolina's culture of innovation for a better world.

The Ultimate ROI

Return on investment. Every investor expects it. The Innovate@Carolina Campaign takes this to heart. And as with investors in any enterprise, supporters will receive an annual report and be invited to an annual Innovate@Carolina meeting convened by the Chancellor. Both will document our progress in turning ideas into solutions, using rigorous empirical metrics to measure the performance of every Innovate@Carolina program.

Investors want impact. As a charter shareholder in the Innovate@Carolina enterprise your investment will amount to much more than a thicker stock portfolio. As Chancellor Thorp says, Carolina's "to-do list is nothing less than the greatest problems of our time." And so this campaign represents nothing less than the chance to change the world.

WE MUST BE BOLD, AGAIN.

Hi Julius,

I hope you are doing well and can have some time to relax before you go again.

By the way, I'd like to stay in Abernethy for the rest of the day to finish my monthly reconciliation work here unless there is anything I should do in Battle today.

Thank you and have a great weekend!

Dear Colleagues:

Susan Caroll, of the Duke-UNC Rotary Cetner for International Studies in Peace and Conflict Resolution, has informed me that they are bringing Lt. Col. Africano Mande to campus at the end of the month. The African Studies Center will not be able to host anything formal, but if faculty would be interested in having Mr. Mande to their class or for private conversation, please contact Susan directly at susan.carroll@duke.edu . He is currently free on Wednesday, March 30, after 4pm and on Thursday between 11am and 5pm. Regards, Barbara

Lt. Col. Africano Mande
Africano Mande was born in Maridi County, Western Equatoria State in Southern Sudan. He is an active duty Lt. Col. in the Sudan People's Liberation Army and is currently undertaking a Master Degree in National Security Studies with a focus on Defense Decision Making and Planning at the Naval Postgraduate School, Monterey California. In addition to the various Military trainings, Lt. Col. Africano Mande also holds a BA (Hons) in International Relations from the United States International University – Africa. He attended other trainings to include trainings at the Institute for Security Studies in Pretoria (South Africa), International Institute for Humanitarian Law in San Remo (Italy) and the University of Birmingham (UK). Lt. Col. Africano Mande has served in various field command position, as an officer's Instructor and as a Head of the Department of Military Planning and Research at the SPLA GHQs, in Juba.

Subject: [asc_faculty] Please help the African Studies Center with grant reporting

Hello everyone,

As you may be aware, the UNC African Studies Center is required to gather and report data annually on Africa-focused courses, graduate placements, and faculty publications. We've been very excited to be renewed by the Department of Education for another 4 year Title VI funding cycle. As an Africanist faculty member, your publications and conference presentations are particularly of interest to us as we report to the DOE on Africa-related research at UNC in the past year.

The main categories that we are required to report on are:

Conference Presentations
Authored Books
Book Chapters
Edited Books
Journal Articles
Working Papers
Assessment Materials
A/V and Podcasts

We need to provide a count of the number of each of these categories completed by our faculty in the reporting period of Fall 2009 - Summer 2010. In particular we are counting publications and presentations which relate directly to Africa. If you would either email me your CV, or simply reply with a number beside each of these categories (an estimate is fine), that would be great. If your CV is available on your department website and you prefer we use that, can you take a moment to check that the most up to date version is available there?

Thank you very much for your help. We appreciate it, as always.

Warm regards,
Stacey

Hi:

As we agreed, I have written a draft resolution for us to consider at our April meeting. I welcome suggestions on the language. I think it makes more sense for us to discuss and reach agreement on the resolution before we raise the issue with the Dean. So, I am not planning on bringing it up at the brown bag today.

Thank very much for considering this.

The Council of Chairs of the College of Arts and Sciences
Draft of Resolution
March 15, 20111

Whereas

1. The Arts and Sciences Advisory Committee (ASAC) comprises four members in a College with more than 40 academic departments;

2. The expertise necessary to evaluate the research, teaching and service record of a candidate for promotion and tenure and to interpret and evaluate the outside letters supporting the candidate is available only in the candidate's home department;

3. ASAC has publicly announced at the November 2010 meeting or the Council of Chairs that it had tightened up standards for early promotion;

4. ASAC turned back a candidate from the Department of Economics where:
   The vote of the full professors was unanimously in support of promotion,
   The candidate was at in her eighth year at rank,
   The Department has supported fewer that one in three candidates for promotion during the last 20 years;

5. ASAC has rejected decisions by departments as to the appropriate source of outside letters of evaluation of candidates for promotion and tenure in cases where the candidate has undertaken non-traditional research and creative activities;

6. Respect by the Office of the Dean for the judgment of a Department's faculty and particularly its full professors is essential to the functioning of the College and the Department and essential to the morale of the faculty;

7. Procedures used by ASAC to deliberate and vote on promotion and tenure recommendations are de jure biased in that members of ASAC do not recuse themselves when ASAC is considering candidates from the home departments of ASAC members.

Be it therefore resolved that it is the sense of the Council of Chairs of the College of Arts and Sciences that:

1. ASAC has exceeded its authority as an Advisory Committee;

2. ASAC has employed an arbitrary definition of "too early" when it assesses the record of candidates who have served time in rank at other institutions before being employed by UNC-CH;

3. The Dean of the College of Arts and Sciences should review all cases for which ASAC has made a negative decision in the past two years, paying special attention to cases where ASAC recommended that the promotion was too early, make her own independent evaluation of those cases, and either approve or provide a detailed rationale for her decision to deny promotion;

4. The Dean of the College should prepare an explicit charge to ASAC no later than April 1 of the academic year before the academic year when it will apply and publish that charge on the College web site;

5. The Dean of the College in consultation with Department Chairs should set out explicit standards that define what "early promotion" means, especially in the context of faculty members who have time in rank at previous academic institutions.

Hi:

Thanks for the advice, McKay.

Here is a bit of background. I met with Karen and Jonathan after ASAC had refused to change its decision even though I had presented additional evidence in the case. At the meeting, the Dean said that if she overturned ASAC it would be interpreted as a lack of respect for faculty governance since ASAC is elected. I respectfully told the Dean, that I thought the decision was unjust and that I would continue my attempts to get it overturned. You know something about this from another meeting we both attended.

I brought the issue to the Council of Chairs on Monday and many fellow chairs advised the it was wise to keep the problem within the college rather than to take it to the provost.

The question I have is: how will the Dean know how wide spread our concern is unless we do something. The "sense of the assembly" resolution was the strategy we decided on but I am open minded.

I think since we know we are not talking just about an isolated case but that there are concerns about other issues it seems that a collective conversation about our concerns is apposite. Current issues include interpretation of non-traditional research, engaged scholarship (which while encouraged by the College seems to be little understood) and the consideration of what UNC considers peer institutions in contrast to what some of our disciplines consider peer- I mean does MOMA really not count as a recommender- really?

I am willing to go to the mats- I am suggesting that there might be one more step before that.

Subject: [aschairsonly] Council of Chairs follow-up

Two items to follow-up from the Council of Chairs meeting on Monday.

(1) ELECTION

Bill Kier was elected as Vice Chair of Council for 2011-2012. Bev Taylor will be Chair that year and Bill will 'rise' to Chair the following year.

Thanks to all who agreed to stand.

(2) DISCUSSION POINT

Mike Salemi from Economics has drafted the attached and sent the following message:

Hi:

As we agreed, I have written a draft resolution for us to consider at our April meeting. I welcome suggestions on the language. I think it makes more sense for us to discuss and reach agreement on the resolution before we raise the issue with the Dean. So, I am not planning on bringing it up at the brown bag today.

Thank very much for considering this.

Mike

Personally, I think we should talk to Karen today, but I do not think the issue is any single case, or a set of cases--but a general attitude of respect. ASAC seems to think its job is quality control, thereby placing its judgment above that of the departments. While there may be instances where departments are divided and some adjudication or oversight is useful, why are they questioning the unanimous decisions of departments. And why are they, for all practical purposes, setting policy--such as concerns early tenure and promotion--that operate against the interests, needs and wishes of the faculty?

Subject: Re: [aschairsonly] Council of Chairs follow-up

Mike and all,

Let me add a little further information on an aspect of this that pertains to the dean's comment that to overrule ASAC's advice would be showing lack of respect for faculty governance.

In my judgment there are two forms of faculty governance at stake in this issue, and the ASAC is arguably the less accountable and less representative of the two for purposes of dealing with the substance of recommendations for reappointment, promotion and tenure.

The chairs are appointed by the dean but except perhaps in exceptional cases, always in full consultation with, and seeking full support from, the faculty of the department. The Personnel Committees of the respective departments are themselves arguably the most fully democratic and fundamental form of faculty self-governance in such matters, and it is always the departments' chairs with the advice of their personnel committees -- and acting within formal departmental APT documents and procedures -- that originate the recomendations taht are then reviewed by the dean and ASAC.

ASAC, in contrast, is composed of four individuals, one from each of the four academic divisions (Fine Arts, Humanities, Social and Physical Sciences), who thus cannot even in principle represent the full range of understandings involved in substantive judgments made by the faculties of of all the departments of the College.

According to the Bylaws of the Division of the Social Sciences (to pick one of the four examples),

"The officers of the Division are a Chair and a Vice-Chair. The Chair and Vice-Chair are elected by the Faculty of the Division. The Chair must hold the rank of Full Professor and the Vice-Chair must be a tenured voting member of the General Faculty. Elections of the Chair and Vice-Chair are conducted by the Secretary of the Faculty. All persons listed by him/her as members of the Voting Faculty in departments and curricula of the Division of the Social Sciences are eligible to make nominations and vote. Every third spring, reckoning from the spring of 2000, the Chair of the Division will invite nominations for Chair and Vice-Chair of the Division and provide a list of those willing to serve to the Faculty Nominating Committee, which will draw nominations from this list, reserving the right to add others. Candidates for each office will be put on separate ballots and submitted to the Divisional Faculty. The Chair and Vice-Chair take office on July 1 next following. They may not be members of the same Department.... The Faculty of the Division meets on call of the Chair.... Special meetings of the Divisional Faculty are called by the Chair of the Division, or by petition to the Dean of the College of Arts and Sciences signed by ten voting members of the Divisional Faculty."
(http://www.unc.edu/faculty/faccoun/code/divbylaws/bylawssocsciences.shtml)

I spoke with the Secretary of the Faculty, Joe Ferrell, who tells me that in practice -- owing perhaps to the lack of a well-structured nominating process and/or of widespread participation in it -- the nominees for ASAC members are elected in practice through an extremely non-transparent and non-accountable process, put on the ballot by teh Secretary of the Faculty (in discussion with the university-wide Faculty Nominating Committee, which is not strictly Arts and Sciences), based largely on nominees identified by the dean's office. So while the form of faculty election is there, the actual links of the nominating process to faculty choices of nominees in practice has not been. Joe also tells me that Humanities is the only one of the four divisions that even meets regularly as a division; the others meet only at the call of their chair, which in practice has not occurred in recent memory.

And as Mike says, there appears to be no formal charge from the dean to the four ASAC members in their role as reviewers of APT cases or definitions and criteria for early promotion or other matters in which they would have a legitimate role of exercising oversight and assuring consistency of procedure across departments; and no indication or clear policy that they should second-guess the merits of individual cases which are supported unanimously or by significant majorities of the department's personnel committee, or by compelling reasons presented by the chairs, both of whom/which are themselves a fundamental faculty governance process and arguably a more accountable and legitimate one for such matters.

I support Mike's recommendations therefore as to the dean giving ASAC a formal charge (and consulting with the chairs as a group in doing so), and also making clear that their role is to assure proper procedures rather than to second-guess well-documented and well-supported recommendations from the chairs and their personnel committees.

The Personnel Committees of the respective departments are themselves arguably the most fully democratic and fundamental form of faculty self-governance in such matters, and it is always the departments' chairs with the advice of their personnel committees -- and acting within formal departmental APT documents and procedures -- that originate the recomendations taht are then reviewed by the dean and ASAC.

ASAC, in contrast, is composed of four individuals, one from each of the four academic divisions (Fine Arts, Humanities, Social and Physical Sciences), who thus cannot even in principle represent the full range of understandings involved in substantive judgments made by the faculties of of all the departments of the College.

According to the Bylaws of the Division of the Social Sciences (to pick one of the four examples),

"The officers of the Division are a Chair and a Vice-Chair. The Chair and Vice-Chair are elected by the Faculty of the Division. The Chair must hold the rank of Full Professor and the Vice-Chair must be a tenured voting member of the General Faculty. Elections of the Chair and Vice-Chair are conducted by the Secretary of the Faculty. All persons listed by him/her as members of the Voting Faculty in departments and curricula of the Division of the Social Sciences are eligible to make nominations and vote. Every third spring, reckoning from the spring of 2000, the Chair of the Division will invite nominations for Chair and Vice-Chair of the Division and provide a list of those willing to serve to the Faculty Nominating Committee, which will draw nominations from this list, reserving the right to add others. Candidates for each office will be put on separate ballots and submitted to the Divisional Faculty. The Chair and Vice-Chair take office on July 1 next following. They may not be members of the same Department.... The Faculty of the Division meets on call of the Chair.... Special meetings of the Divisional Faculty are called by the Chair of the Division, or by petition to the Dean of the College of Arts and Sciences signed by ten voting members of the Divisional Faculty."

(http://www.unc.edu/faculty/faccoun/code/divbylaws/bylawssocsciences.shtml)

I spoke with the Secretary of the Faculty, Joe Ferrell, who tells me that in practice -- owing perhaps to the lack of a well-structured nominating process and/or of widespread participation in it -- the nominees for ASAC members are elected in practice through an extremely non-transparent and non-accountable process, put on the ballot by teh Secretary of the Faculty (in discussion with the university-wide Faculty Nominating Committee, which is not strictly Arts and Sciences), based largely on nominees identified by the dean's office. So while the form of faculty election is there, the actual links of the nominating process to faculty choices of nominees in practice has not been. Joe also tells me that Humanities is the only one of the four divisions that even meets regularly as a division; the others meet only at the call of their chair, which in practice has not occurred in recent memory.

And as Mike says, there appears to be no formal charge from the dean to the four ASAC members in their role as reviewers of APT cases or definitions and criteria for early promotion or other matters in which they would have a legitimate role of exercising oversight and assuring consistency of procedure across departments; and no indication or clear policy that they should second-guess the merits of individual cases which are supported unanimously or by significant majorities of the department's personnel committee, or by compelling reasons presented by the chairs, both of whom/which are themselves a fundamental faculty governance process and arguably a more accountable and legitimate one for such matters.

I support Mike's recommendations therefore as to the dean giving ASAC a formal charge (and consulting with the chairs as a group in doing so), and also making clear that their role is to assure proper procedures rather than to second-guess well-documented and well-supported recommendations from the chairs and their personnel committees.

I respectfully told the Dean, that I thought the decision was unjust and that I would continue my attempts to get it overturned. You know something about this from another meeting we both attended.

New Start-up company -- Afrotal.com – Connects Employers in Africa with African-born Job Seekers Living and Studying Abroad

New York, NY – Career firm Africa Overseas Talent (Afrotal) officially launched an innovative online job search and career web portal this month at www.afrotal.com. The portal connects employers in the continent of Africa and African-born professionals living abroad who are seeking jobs in Africa.

"These are exciting times for the African continent as it experiences increasing economic growth buoyed by commodity prices, inflow of foreign direct investment and record M&A deals," said Abraham Temu, the African-born founder of Afrotal. "More than 522 firms are now listed on sub-Saharan stock exchanges, up from barely 66 in 2000. But one of the daunting challenges remains the attraction of educated and globally savvy citizens overseas. This much-needed talent is the impetus to African governments and businesses as they strive to keep pace with the current growth trend."

Afrotal.com addresses this growing demand and connects multinational corporations, development agencies, African governments and non-government organizations with highly experienced and talented professionals with global experience. The portal delivers targeted job information to the right audience, allowing employers to remain cost effective and competitive in their recruitment.

The portal offers a one-stop-shop to African-born jobseekers living abroad who are searching for jobs in their home countries. This allows them to evaluate their options prior to committing to return to Africa. The portal manages all aspects of their career search and transitions with utmost confidentiality. Afrotal.com utilizes a unique technology to connect registered jobseekers and employers with customized privacy functionality, where users in the privacy of their own space can manage their profiles and job postings, and initiate contact through the portal, without the use of regular web email.

Afrotal.com is a human resource tool for all recruitment needs, especially for businesses with unique geographical needs. It is also designed for companies with limited resources to manage their own career center, allowing them to reduce technology and staff expenses.

About Afrotal and Afrotal.com
Africa Overseas Talent (Afrotal) is a premier career firm that connects educated and experienced African-born professionals living overseas with prospective employers in their home countries and the continent at large. The focal point of Afrotal.com is to simplify the recruitment process by providing a cost-effective one-stop solution for all employers to maintain a competitive and cutting edge online career management platform.

Dear colleagues,

Attached is the agenda for our Burch Advisory Board meeting next Monday as well as the proposals for new Burch Seminars in Belize (Tricia McAnany, Anthropology) and along the Mississippi River (Tim Marr, American Studies). We will meet at 3:30pm in Graham Memorial 011. Please let Joy or I know if you have any questions or suggestions before we meet. I hope you are having a good semester and look forward to seeing you next week!

All the best,

Friederike

Dear Colleagues,

Before your calendars get filled up for the semester, I would like to find a time for our Burch Advisory Board meeting later this semester. Below are a few proposed dates and times which should have taken everyone's class schedule into consideration:

Monday, March 21: 8:30-10:00am
Monday, March 21: 3:30-5:00pm
Thursday, March 24: 3:30-5:00pm.

Please let me know which dates and times would work for you. We will meet in Graham Memorial 011, as always. I look forward to hear from you and hope you are having a good semester.

BURCH FIELD RESEARCH SEMINAR PROPOSAL

Maya Cultural Heritage & the Construction of Knowledge: Community-Based Archaeological Research (Belize, Central America & Yucatán, México)

Spring 2012
(14 weeks, January–May)

Patricia A. McAnany
Kenan Eminent Professor Department of Anthropology

I. PROGRAM OVERVIEW

During the spring semester of 2012, twelve UNC students will have the opportunity to study Maya archaeology and issues of cultural heritage through total immersion in Maya Archaeology and contemporary Maya culture and languages. Students will live in a small Q'eqchi' Maya-speaking community in southern Belize and investigate archaeological sites collaboratively with Maya high-school students from Tumul K'in (TK). Excavation and related cultural projects are designed and undertaken using the model of community-based participatory research (CBPR). Research and study in southern Belize culminates in a community presentation of the archaeological study and also of independent projects involving cultural heritage that students design and carry out collaboratively with community members. To balance the relative remoteness of the southern Belize field site, the final two weeks of the semester are spent in Yucatán, México. First, students travel to Valladolid and the Universidad del Oriente in which they attend lectures given (in English) by Prof Ivan Batun on (1) Yucatec archaeology, (2) on being an Indigenous archaeologist, and (3) on basic Yucatec Mayan conversational language skills. With these skills in hand, students spend the second week visiting and studying five archeological sites in Yucatán. In total, the program extends over 14 weeks and include community-based field research in the Toledo District of southern Belize and field trips that highlight issues of cultural heritage and indigenous perspectives within Belize and Yucatán, México.

II. PROGRAM GOALS

Through full immersion in contemporary Maya cultures, archaeological research, and cultural heritage within the Maya region of southern México and Belize, students will gain an understanding of how archaeological knowledge is constructed. This Burch Seminar reaches this goal through three types of student learning that include (1) visiting & studying archaeological sites and museums in Belize and Yucatán, México; (2) learning archaeological techniques of survey, mapping, excavation, and laboratory analysis through investigation of hilltop Maya houses built and occupied between AD 300-900 and located on the farming lands of the Aguacate community of southern Belize; and (3) forming collaborative research relationships and conducting projects with members of local communities and with Belizean students.

III. ACADEMICS

Students on this 14-week program enroll in the following four academic courses:

- HNRS 353, 01S / ANTH 232 Ancestral Maya Civilizations, 3 hrs
- HNRS 353, 02S / ANTH 457, Archaeological Field School in Mesoamerica, 6 hrs.
- HNRS 352, 01S / ANTH 411, Archaeological Lab Methods, 3 hrs.
- HNRS 350, 01S / ANTH 296, Community-based Participatory Research, 3 hrs.

During the first week and last two weeks of the program, the majority of academic contact hours will be devoted to HNRS 353,01S: Archaeology of Mesoamerica. During this time students will participate in educational excursions within Belize, critically examining important archaeological sites and museums. During Weeks 2 through 12, students meet each week for discussion and lectures about the Archaeology of Mesoamerica with emphasis on the Maya region. During the final two weeks of the Seminar, students travel to Yucatán, México to study sites of cultural heritage (both pre-Hispanic and Historical), including Chichén Itzá, Izamal, Mayapan, Uxmal, and Kiuic. During Weeks 1, 13, & 14, there will be at least one hour per day of formal instruction and at least two hours of educational excursions to sites and museums, 5 days a week. Students will complete readings and a research exercise for each educational excursion. Instruction will be provided by Patricia A. McAnany and three graduate student teaching assistants, one of which is Claire Novotny who will base her dissertation on the field study portion of the seminar.

In Week 2, students settle into living accommodations in the Maya community of Blue Creek in southern Belize and, in consultation with Professor McAnany, the graduate TAs, and local teachers, develop relationships with students and community members that will culminate in an independent (but collaborative with community) project that focuses on cultural heritage (HNRS 350). Possibilities include archaeology programs that could be delivered as special workshops in local primary schools, working collaboratively with local high school students at Tumul K'in to create radio programs with cultural heritage content, or collecting oral histories. The service-learning component continues through Week 12 and culminates in a final day of presentation during which UNC and local Belizean students present a report or performance of their collaborative project to the entire community.

Instruction for HNRS 353,02S / ANTH 457, the archaeological field school, takes place during Weeks 3 through 9. Students participate in the plan and design of the archaeological project, initial survey and mapping of field sites, and excavation of Classic-period Maya houses built on the hilltops surrounding the communities of Blue Creek and Aguacate. Instruction and fieldwork is conducted 8 hours a day, 4.5 days a week. (In consultation with Professor McAnany and the TAs, students develop a plan of rotation between fieldwork and their CBPR project). Instruction is provided by Professor McAnany and graduate student teaching assistants.

In Weeks 9 through 12, emphasis shifts to laboratory study (HNRS 352, 01S /ANTH 411) of artifacts and other sources of information collected during the previous five weeks of excavation. Students participate in workshops on analyzing archaeological materials and study materials recovered from excavations. Instruction and lab work is conducted 8 hours a day, 4.5 days a week (students rotate between their CBPR project and laboratory analysis). Interaction (through visitation and guest lectures) with local artisans, culinary experts, healers, farmers, and hunters enhances the interpretive potential of archaeological analysis. Instruction is provided by Professor McAnany and graduate student teaching assistants.

For HNRS 353, 02S & HNRS 352, 01S students work in teams on the design and execution of a research project. In consultation with Professor McAnany and the TAs, each team generates a set of research questions pertinent to the residential structures under excavation and then attempts to answer those questions through excavation and laboratory analysis. At the end of the Belizean portion of the seminar, the teams present their interpretation based upon excavation and lab analysis to the community and faculty of the Tumul K'in school in the form of oral presentations and posters. Individually, each student prepares a 7-10 page paper on their contribution to the project and the larger significance of their findings.

Students receive a full semester of credit towards their baccalaureate degree.

GPA, Language and Other Requirements

GPA requirement:	3.0, minimum
Language of study:	English for all courses; conversational Spanish is useful but not mandatory for two-week period in Yucatán
Class	Must have completed freshmen year

Outline of Academic Coursework

1. HNRS 353, 01S / ANTH 232: Ancestral Maya Civilizations
(Major credit in Anthropology or Archaeology, 3 credits)
Approaches: Historical Analysis (HS)
Connections: Beyond the North Atlantic World and The World Before 1750

Course Description:

This course involves lectures, readings, discussion, critical examination of archaeological sites and museums, and written and oral assignments. The focus of the class is on active learning and critical evaluation of research and cultural heritage issues relevant to Maya Archaeology. Students will be assigned readings in advance of a site visit and then will complete a written or oral exercise in their journal that is focused on issues related to the site or museum collection. The course will focus on two themes:

1). Maya History. Students learn about long-term changes and shifts within Maya societies from 1000 B.C. through the nineteenth century with an emphasis on subsistence and cosmology, architectural monumentality (shrine and royal/palatial courts), Maya hieroglyphic writing and iconography, households & royal courts, and European colonialism.

2). Issues in Cultural Heritage. Students examine the use of the Maya past in contemporary Belize and México through the study of representations of the past in popular media (such as advertising), the use of the past by indigenous descendants as well as politicians, and the presentation of the past in museum exhibitions. Students examine conflicts over the representation and the conservation of archaeological collections and sites, learn the legal frameworks for protecting the cultural patrimony of Belize and México, the nature of the threats facing sites and collections, and the impact of global tourism. Students may choose to investigate collaboratively the case history of an endangered site in the local area of Blue Creek for their CBPR project.

During the Yucatec portion of the Seminar, students study indigenous Yucatec perspectives on the past through examination of 9th through 19th century sites of cultural heritage. They spend a week in Valladolid and attend special lectures given (in English) by Yucatec Mayan archaeologist, Professor Ivan Batun at the Universidad del Oriente in Valladolid, Yucatán.

Course Structure:

The course consists of a two-week intensive program of travel and instruction at the beginning of the program, Saturday educational excursions during the field and lab schools, and a two-week capstone experience in Yucatán, México at the close of the semester. These activities will be led by Professor McAnany and two teaching assistants. The course will involve 24 hours of classroom time (including five discussions of assigned readings on Friday afternoons during field excavation and lab analysis) and 36 hours of educational excursions, for a total of 60 contact hours.

Course Schedule:

Weeks 1–2, 8 hours of classroom and 12 hours of educational excursions

- The program begins with 2 days of instruction and educational excursions to museums and archaeological sites near Belize City. The faculty director and teaching assistants will meet students at the Belize International Airport and transport them to the program hotel. We will have a safety orientation on the first morning before visiting the Belize Museum.
- From the Belize City region, we travel by charter bus and then by boat to Lamanai—a site that was occupied continuously from 1000 B.C. through the Colonial period, returning to Belize City that evening.
- From Belize City, we travel west to Belmopan, Belize for a short conference with the Director of Research at the Institute of Archaeology, Dr. John Morris, and then down the Hummingbird Highway to visit the Hershey site—a Terminal Classic cacao-producing site on the Sibun River.
- The following day, we travel west to visit the Late Classic site of Xunantunich and witness a demonstration of pottery production by a Soccotz artisan.
- Continuing down the Southern Highway to the Toledo District, we visit the sites of Nim Li Punit, Lubaantun, Uxbenka, and Pusilha, spending approximately a half day at each site.

Weeks 3–12, 8 hours of classroom and 12 hours of educational excursions

- During this segment students meet to discuss readings on Maya archaeology five times. Each meeting will consist of 1 hour of classroom instruction and a 3-hour discussion or educational excursion. Instructors pose questions to guide journal entries.

Weeks 13–14, 8 hours of classroom and 12 hours of educational excursions

- For a capstone experience, the students travel by bus to Belize City and then fly to Cancun, México. Traveling on a small charter bus, we go to Valladolid in order to learn about Yucatec archaeology, culture, and language from Professor Ivan Batun. From there, we visit and study archaeological sites of incomparable monumental architecture from Late-Terminal Classic Maya times as well as Postclassic capitals, Colonial churches, and places of significance during the Caste War of the 19th century, including but not limited to Tulum, Chan Santa Cruz, Chichén Itzá, Izamal, Mayapan, Uxmal, Sayil, and Kiuic.

Course Requirements:

Students are expected to complete assigned reading in advance of each lecture and educational excursion, and participate in discussions. They will be required to keep a journal in which they critically reflect on their experiences in the classroom and on their educational excursions related to the course. Each week, faculty and students generate specific questions to consider in journal entries. Class participation and discussion account for 40% of the grade and journal 60%.

Readings:

- The Maya by Michael D. Coe (2011), 8th edition. Thames & Hudson.
- Course reader (pdf files available electronically and in hard copy) consisting of articles on Maya archaeology and the Toledo District specifically.
- Course reader (pdf files available electronically and in hard copy) consisting of articles on Yucatec archaeology specifically.
- Primer on Yucatec Mayan language (basic conversation skills)

2. HNRS 353, 02S / ANTH 457: Archaeological Field School in Mesoamerica
Major credit in Anthropology or Archaeology, 6 credits
Approaches: Historical Analysis (HS)
Connections: Beyond the North Atlantic World (BN), The World Before 1750 (WB), and Experiential Education (EE).

Course Description:

During Weeks 3-9, Burch Seminar participants spend the bulk of their time conducting fieldwork and receive instruction in archaeological research design and field methods, including mapmaking, GPS survey, excavation, recording, and field photography. Students are divided into groups and paired with high-school students from Tumul K'in. Collaboratively, they participate in mapping, surface collection, and excavation of a Late Classic Maya hilltop residence. These archaeological investigations are part of a long-term research effort within Belize by Professor McAnany and will comprise the core of a dissertation project undertaken by Claire Novotny.

Course Structure:

The course begins with a 3-day workshop on research design and field methods. Both UNC and Tumul K'in students attend the workshop, which meets for six hours each day. After graduating from the workshops, students work in teams of 4 to 5 persons, comprised of US and Belizean students, a grad student mentor, and local laborers who facilitate the clearing of vegetation and assist with heavy lifting. Each team is assigned a house structure consisting of retaining/footing walls, patio areas, and trash deposits, which they will map, surface collect, partially excavate, and document. In consultation with faculty, each team develops research questions and foci that they hope to answer through excavation. Students will spend 6 hours in the field and 2 hours in the lab each day, 4.5 days a week. A typical day of fieldwork will begin at 7:00 am and end 1:00 pm (including travel time to and from the site). After a mid-afternoon break, students spend 2 hours in the lab, washing and processing artifacts that they collected during the day. Instruction takes place through "hands-on" experiences guided by Professor McAnany and graduate student teaching assistants. Each Friday afternoon, a one-hour session is held to discuss excavation strategies in relation to research goals. Periodic lectures on special topics will be given. The course entails 20 hours of classroom time, 30 hours of lab time, and 100 hours in the field.

Course Schedule:

Weeks 4–9, 20 hrs. classroom, 30 hrs. lab, and 100 hrs. field

- The program begins with 3 days of instruction in archaeological research design and excavation methods. This is followed by 32 days of field and lab work (Monday through Friday). Weekly discussion sessions occur on Friday afternoon.

Course Requirements:

Students are expected to participate in fieldwork, lectures, and workshops; complete all assigned readings; write excavation notes; and draw maps and profiles. They work in teams on the structure that they are excavating. The research project involves the description and interpretation of the stratigraphy, architecture, and features encountered. Each team presents an interpretive poster on their excavations at the end of the field course. Assessment of student performance is based on:

- Direct evaluation of "hands-on" work (30% of grade). The faculty director and TAs evaluate each student's mastery of basic techniques and principles of excavation, including effective use of excavation tools, precision and accuracy of measurement, and accuracy of interpretation of soils, sediments, and features (e.g., correct identification of different types of archaeological deposits and features).
- Documentation of excavations (40% of grade). Each student will be responsible for producing a portfolio of drawing and text that documents the excavation. The portfolio will include detailed excavation notes in a standard format, maps, architectural cross-sections, and drawings of stratigraphic profiles. These activities include narrative descriptions of excavation procedures and interpretation of deposits.

Each student's portfolio will include approximately 20 pages of written and graphic documentation. The faculty director will evaluate the content, completeness, and style (grammar and clarity of writing and illustrations) of each student's portfolio.

- Interpretive poster (30% of grade). Each student team will present a poster on their interpretations of the occupational history of their area excavation. The faculty director will evaluate the content, argumentation, layout, and style (grammar and clarity of writing and illustrations) of posters.

Readings:

- Archaeology: Basic Field Methods, R. Michael Stewart (2001)
- Course reader (pdf files available electronically and in hard copy) consisting of articles on field methods.

I. HNRS 352 / ANTH 411: Archaeological Lab Methods

Major credit in Anthropology or Archaeology (3 credits)
Approaches: Social and Behavioral Sciences (non-Historical) (SS)

Course Description:

During Weeks 9-12, students learn techniques used to analyze artifacts and organic remains from archaeological sites by participating in workshops and hands-on exercises in pottery and traditional food preparation. Interaction (through visitation and guest lectures) with local artisans, culinary experts, healers, farmers, and hunters enhances the interpretive potential of this laboratory phase of archaeological analysis and bi-directional knowledge construction. Each team brings back to the contextual analysis of the excavation what they learn through this learning experience. Tables of artifact presence & frequencies and artifact drawings are added to the student portfolio and also synthesized into the team presentation of an interpretive poster. At the end of the 12th week, student teams present their constructed knowledge of excavated archaeological contexts to their peers and the entire community in a festive event.

Course Structure:

The course will begin with a 3-day workshop on laboratory methods in archaeology during which local guest lecturers and artisans will give presentations. The workshops will meet 6 hours each day. Following the workshop, students will work in lab teams (the same as their excavation teams). Each team analyzes the artifacts recovered from their excavated house structure. Students work in the lab for 8 hours each day, 5 days a week. A typical day begins at 8:00 am and ends at 5:00 with a 1-hour lunch break. Weekly sessions are held to discuss the progress of research projects in relation to original research questions. Periodic lectures and educational excursions will occur. The course involves 30 hours of classroom time, 120 hours in the lab.

Course Schedule:

Weeks 9–12, 30 hrs. classroom, 120 hrs. lab

- The program begins with a 3-days workshop in archaeological lab methods. This is followed by 13 days of lab work (Monday through Friday). Visiting lectures by local artisans punctuate the workshop and lab sessions. Weekly discussion sessions are held on Friday afternoon.

Course Requirements:

Students will be expected to participate in lab sessions, lectures, workshops, complete all assigned readings, expand their portfolio, and contribute to the group interpretive poster. They work as a team on their research project through the lab-analysis learning module. This project constitutes preliminary analysis of excavated materials. During the 12th week, each team prepares & presents an interpretive poster on their research project. Individually, each student prepares a 7-10 page paper on their contribution to the project and the larger significance of their findings. Assessment of student performance is based on:

- Class participation and discussion (20% of grade). The faculty director will evaluate each student's contribution to group's discussions, attendance, and his or her performance while conducting lab analysis.
- Direct evaluation of mastery of basic lab skills (10% of grade).
- Portfolio augmentation with artifact-based analyses, drawings, and photographs (15%)
- 7-10 page paper on student contribution to the project and larger significance of findings (40%).
- Contribution to group interpretive poster (15%)

Readings:

- Archaeological Laboratory Methods: An Introduction, Mark Q. Sutton and Brooke S. Arkush (2002)
- Course reader consisting of articles on lab methods.

4. HNRS 350 / ANTH 296: Community-Based Participatory Research
Major credit in Anthropology or Archaeology (3 credit hours)
Approaches: Social and Behavioral Sciences (non-Historical) (SS)

Course Description:

During Week 2, students participate in reading & discussion sessions to learn the epistemology and methodologically basis for community-based participatory research. For the remainder of the seminar, they meet for five Friday afternoon sessions that will consist of reading & discussion paired with challenges presented encountered during implementation of CBPR. They also begin to forge collaborative relationships with fellow students from Tumul K'in and members of local communities. The object of collaboration is to design and undertake a study of some aspect of cultural heritage. The project could be implemented in primary schools, in the Tumul K'in high school, or through more informal community venues. Models for collaborative research include classroom workshops, assistance in designing cultural heritage programming for the Tumul K'in radio station, or the staging of performance events focused on cultural heritage in community centers. Students work at their collaborative project from weeks 3-12 and present their project orally and collaboratively to the community at the end of the 12th week. Individually, each student prepares a 7-10 page paper on the challenges, successes, and findings of their CBPR experience.

Course Structure

After students complete the workshop, faculty members confer with each student and help them to shape their CBPR project if needed. After initial contacts are made and the mechanics of each project set up, students will work about five hours per week on preparation and execution. Totally hands-on and the most independent and community-interactive of the four courses, the structure of this course will be independently shaped with each student.

This course encapsulates the approach taken by this seminar in general and so will be not stand apart from the rest of the field school, which includes daily collaboration with high school students and faculty at Tumul K'in. Through daily interaction with Mopan and Q'eqchi' Maya peoples living in southern Belize, students will gain an understanding of how contemporary Maya peoples relate to their past. This course will also inform the topic of cultural heritage that is addressed in HNRS 353,01S.

Course Schedule:

Weeks 3–12, 50 hrs. CBPR activity

- After the orientation of Week 2, this course will run concurrently with archaeology fieldwork and then with lab analysis. Students confer with faculty on the scheduling of their CBPR project. Every other week, reading & discussion sessions are held on Friday afternoon during which local challenges and successes of CBPR are discussed.

Course Requirements:

Students are expected to participate in design and execution of a CBPR project in schools or through community venues. All projects should be structured around some aspect of cultural heritage. This independent and community-interactive course will include discussion of assigned readings and a final 7-10 page paper that describes the project, challenges of execution, and how the project was received in the community or school.

Assessment of student performance is based on:

- Participation and discussion (20% of grade). The faculty director will evaluate each student's contribution to group's discussions, attendance, and his or her performance while conducting CBPR.
- Presentation of project to community (30% of grade).
- 7-10 page paper on CBPR project and the challenges of its execution (50% of grade).

Readings

- Decolonizing Methodologies: Research and Indigenous Peoples by Linda Tuhiwai Smith (1999). Zed Books.
- Collaborating at the Trowel's Edge: Teaching & Learning in Indigenous Archaeology, edited by Stephen Silliman (2008).

- Pdf files and hard copy of additional assigned readings will be available for students.

IV. PROGRAM LOGISTICS

a. Affiliations

The program will be affiliated with the Belizean Institute of Archaeology, National Institute of Culture and History, the governmental agency that regulates all archaeological projects, museums, and archaeological sites in Belize. Professor McAnany will apply for a research permit several months in advance of the program. She has successfully obtained research permits in Belize since 1990.

b. Student Housing and Meals

On the road, students will stay at economical, safe 2-star and 3-star hotels with good reputations known to the faculty director. Hotels will provide double and triple rooms with private baths and hot water. During the 10 weeks of service-learning and archaeological field and lab work, students will stay in the Maya community of Blue Creek at Tumul K'in.

On the road, students will eat at moderately-priced restaurants with good reputations known to the faculty director. During the field and lab schools, 3 meals a day, 6 days a week will be prepared at the rental house by a local staff of cooks. Bottled drinking water will be provided to students and staff.

c. Program Travel

Students will fly into Belize International Airport, where they will be met by the faculty director and teaching assistants. Students will travel within Belize by charter bus and the project vehicle with a commercial airline flight from Belize City to Cancun, México followed by more charter bus travel within Yucatán. Return flight to the U.S. will originate from Cancun, México. The project also will rent two vehicles for the duration of the field and lab work for logistical support and emergencies.

d. Communication

Internet access is available at the Blue Creek high school of Tumul K'in and also in the town of Punta Gorda (just 27 km from the study location). International calling cards can be purchased and cell phone coverage is present in Punta Gorda. All project staff will have cell phones in case of emergencies.

e. Educational Facilities and Equipment

Most of the equipment and supplies needed to run a field and lab project are currently in storage at the field lab of Professor McAnany, which is located on the Hummingbird Highway in central Belize and will need to be transferred to southern Belize. Equipment includes lab supplies, shovels, screens, and dig kits.

f. Safety and Security

Belize and southern México are extremely safe places to visit. Formerly a British colony, the government of Belize is a parliamentary-style democracy. A popular tourist destination for scuba diving and snorkeling as well as visiting Maya archaeological sites, Belize hosts more than 250,000 tourists per year. Belizeans are friendly and towards visitors from the U.S. Violent crime rates are substantially lower than in the US. The southern Mexican states of Quintana Roo and Yucatán, likewise, are popular tourist destinations and have not been destabilized by the violence that has wreaked havoc on northern México.

g. Medical Care

Belize has a socialized system of medicine as well as excellent private clinics and hospitals with well-trained staff and modern equipment. Before the students arrive, the faculty director will arrange for a doctor to be available on-call, any time of the day or night. Students will have international health insurance through HTH Worldwide and will participate in a workshop at the UNC International Travel Clinic on health and safety in preparation for their time in Belize and southern México. All students will carry a pre-paid cell phone card and will know emergency contact numbers and information about the nearest hospital, embassy, and police station. Purified, bottled drinking water is readily available and will be provided to students and staff.

V. FACULTY DIRECTOR

Short Biography

Patricia A. McAnany is Kenan Eminent Professor in the Anthropology Department at the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill. Her recent research efforts include the Xibun Archaeological Research Project (in central Belize), an NSF-supported effort that is focused on understanding the political economy of cacao (chocolate) production in Classic Maya society. Through the 1990s, her field research was conducted at the site of K'axob (in northern Belize) where she directed an investigation into the agricultural uses of wetlands and earlier into the significance of ancestor veneration within domestic contexts. She is the founder of the Maya Area Cultural Heritage Initiative (MACHI), www.machiproject.org that focuses on educational programs with descendant Maya communities in Mexico, Belize, Guatemala, and Honduras. Initiatives include classroom workshops, radio dramas, and puppet-based film documentaries, all of which work to foster dialogue about the value of the past, deliver knowledge about Maya deep history, and highlight the importance of heritage preservation.

She is the author of Ancestral Maya Economies in Archaeological Perspective (2010), Living with the Ancestors: Kinship and Kingship in Ancient Maya Society (1995) and editor of K'axob: Ritual, Work, and Family in an Ancient Maya Village (2004) and Sacred Landscape and Settlement in the Sibun River Valley (2002). She co-edited Questioning Collapse: Human Resilience, Ecological Vulnerability, and the Aftermath of Empire (2009), Dimensions of Ritual Economy (2008), Debating with Robert: Papers on Mesoamerican Archaeology in Memory of Robert S. Santley (2008), and Prehistoric Maya Economies of Belize (1989). She has written numerous journal articles and book chapters both as sole author and jointly with students and colleagues.

Experience in the Field

Before coming to the University of North Carolina, Professor McAnany directed eight field schools in central and northern Belize for Boston University. Having trained more than 100 undergraduates and a dozen graduate students, she accrued considerable experience in total-immersion experiential learning. Patricia first experienced Belize in 1981 as a graduate student on an archaeological research project in northern Belize. Since then, she has traveled to Belize more than 30 times and completed field research with the support of three National Science Foundation grants. Within both Belize and southern México, she maintains a network of friends and long-standing relationships with local archaeologists and community members, particularly within the small country of Belize.

Burch Field Research Seminar Proposal

DOWN THE GREAT RIVER ROAD: THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER AS AMERICAN ARTERY

Summer 2013
6 weeks, late June – early August

Professor Timothy Marr
Department of American Studies

I. PROGRAM OVERVIEW

This summer Burch Field Seminar will use the Mississippi River and the changing settlements, activities, and productions along its banks to examine the complex relationship between natural environment and human cultures in the heartland of the United States. Beginning at St. Anthony Falls in Minnesota – the northernmost point of navigation—we will track and follow the flow of the Mississippi for almost two thousand miles as it gathers tributaries down to its shifting delta on the Gulf of Mexico. This journey will itself be a dynamic lesson as we trace the explorations of De Soto, Joliet, and Marquette by experiencing the evolution of different modes of transportation by traveling by canoe, barge, towboats, steamship, railroad, bicycle, and bus as we meander south with the widening stream. The river will reveal its lessons as it divides the urban communities of Minneapolis/St. Paul, St. Louis, Memphis, and New Orleans. We will learn how it has supplied the commercial and cultural lifeline for smaller cities such as Dubuque, Hannibal, Cairo, New Madrid, Natchez, and Baton Rouge. The river's bends and horseshoes also pass by dynamically instructive sites as Cahokia, the World Heritage Site of ancient Mississippian mound culture; Nauvoo, Mormon Temple site and resting place of Joseph Smith; Clarksdale, center for blues heritage and tourism; and Rohwer, location of a WWII Japanese internment camp in the Jim Crow South. Students will enroll in two American Studies seminars that earn six Experiential Education credits. AMST 290: The Mighty Mississippi in Story and Song will investigate the rich expressive culture to which the river has given rise ranging from the novels by Mark Twain and Herman Melville, the poems of Langston Hughes, and the blues of Muddy Waters as well as Showboat the musical. AMST 390: Mississippi Memory: Technology, Environment, and Tourism will explore diverse sites of memory along the river's shores including bridges and locks, monuments, prominent geographical places and parks, and locations of important events. We will also visit a series of museums and historical sites to investigate how the past has been processed as a resource for the twenty-first century tourist economy. Students will return from this seminar with an unforgettable sense of American vitality and diversity, one which the Mississippi has long provided to those who encounter it.

II. PROGRAM GOALS

The primary goals of the field seminar will be to:

- Experience the horizontal expanse of the nation by tracking a two thousand mile route through the heartland to the Gulf coast of Louisiana
- Study the rich cultural expressions of diverse people who live or who have lived near the banks of the Mississippi and adapted to the river's changing histories of access and trade
- Encounter the evolving modes of transportation on and near the river by traveling by foot, canoe, barge, steamship, railroad, and bus
- Analyze the human costs of flooding, erosion, and invasive species as well as developing scientific and technological attempts to control these problems
- Examine how historical sites have been reclaimed as resources for current economic development and heritage tourism

III. ACADEMICS

Students on this six-week program enroll in the following two academic courses:

- HNRS 350/AMST 290: The Mighty Mississippi in Story and Song
  Proposed general education requirement: Literary Arts (LA), Experiential Education (EE)
  Major credit: American Studies

- HNRS 353/AMST 390: Mississippi Memory: Technology, Environment, and Tourism
  Proposed general education requirements: Social Sciences (SS), Experiential Education (EE)
  Major credit: American Studies

Outline of academic coursework:

AMST 290: THE MIGHTY MISSISSIPPI IN STORY AND SONG (LA/EE)

T.S. Eliot, a son of St. Louis, once posed the question in his introduction to The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn: "At what point does the Mississippi River become what the Mississippi River means?" This course will explore rich and diverse cultural expressions inspired by the Mississippi River in ways that will provide a powerful script and historic soundtrack enriching our own journey in 2013. Thomas Ruys Smith's River of Dreams: Imagining the Mississippi before Mark Twain (LSU 2007) provides useful historical grounding to this course. Mark Twain's Life on the Mississippi and The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (1884-5) and Herman Melville's The Confidence-Man (1857) are novels that use a the journey down this river as their organizing principle for creative and cultural commentary, and both recycle the genre of the humorous gambling stories that we will examine in other guises. We will visit the Mark Twain

Boyhood Home and Museum in Hannibal, Museum and view Ken Burn's documentary on Twain. A large number of travel narratives and blogs have been written about earlier and ongoing journeys down the river. Students will read accounts such as Jonathan Raban's Old Glory: A Journey Down the Mississippi (1981) and listen to songs such as Johnny Cash's "Big River" to model their own travelogues and poetic responses that they will write as blogs of the their own encounters with the river. The musical heritage of the river is richly alluvial. We will focus especially on the blues music of the Mississippi Delta and the jazz and Dixieland traditions of New Orleans. UNC's Bill Ferris and Ali Neff are two of the scholars who have explored the ethnography of sound in the region. They were preceded by Alan Lomax's The Land Where the Blues Began (1978) and Robert Palmer's documentary Deep Blues: A Musical Pilgrimage to the Crossroads (1990). The Smithsonian commissioned a project called A River of Song: A Musical Journey Down the Mississippi by John Junkerman and Elijah Wald that traces forms of contemporary music at different stops as the river flows south in ways that offers the seminar a series of resonant interludes. One assignment for the course will the memorization and performance of a song or poem by each student that embodies some of the meanings they are experiencing themselves on their voyages, as well as the selection (or composition) of a poem to incorporate into an anthology compiled in the seminar. The final assignment for this course will be the creation of the student's own travel memoir that additionally distills their learnings into an audio or video performance that will serve to share their insights with a wider audience and commemorate their own experiences of our adventure together. But that is after we swim far into the Gulf from Grande Isle, Louisiana, like Edna Pontellier does in Kate Chopin's The Awakening; but unlike her, we will return to tell about the experience.

AMST 390: MISSISSIPPI MEMORY: TECHNOLOGY, ENVIRONMENT, AND TOURISM (SS/EE)

This course will empower students to examine the places, events, legends, and phenomena they encounter on the journey as complex socio-cultural sites in which the historical past is circulated to irrigate a variety of cultural politics and contemporary purposes. A key text providing a historical foundation for this course (as Smith's does for AMST 290) is Lee Sandlin's new book Wicked River: The Mississippi When It Last Ran Wild (Pantheon 2010). One type of site for study, for example, will be the bridges that span the river, especially in the major cities. We will begin in Minneapolis by walking across the 1883 Stone Arch Bridge and studying its construction and changing uses. We will then study the damage, causes, and concerns that resulted from the 2007 collapse the collapse of Bridge 9340 of I-35W. In St. Louis the students will study the Eads Bridge, the longest arch in the world when it was completed in 1874 and the subject of the PBS documentary James Eads: Secrets of a Master Builder. Our seminar will be involved in series of short episodes of river travel on canoes, towboats, barges, and steamers, and the encounters with locks and dams on the river. The steamboats and paddle steamers that are seen as icons of Mississippi travel as remembered in visual culture and historic preservation/replication will serve as another site of memory. We will visit the site of the explosion of the steamship Sultana in 1865 that killed 1700 Union prisoners being returned home to see how it has been commemorated (selection from Alan Huffman, Sultana: Surviving the Civil War, Prison, and the Worst Maritime Disaster in American History [Harper 2010). Another Civil War site will be studied as we camp in Fort Pillow State Historical Park in Henning, Tennessee to study hopefully with John Cimprich, author of Fort Pillow, a Civil War Massacre, and Public Memory (LSU 2005). One campus for our collective education will be the Mormon city of Nauvoo on the river's banks where, after camping at Nauvoo State Park, we will learn from local experts about Mormons as an American ethnicity, and the place of Nauvoo in Mormon memory. The seminar will make an excursion to Rohwer Concentration Camp in Arkansas where Japanese-Americans were interned during WWII. Though largely in ruins, there is a cemetery with a compelling memorial to Japanese soldiers built by the internees themselves in the shape of a tank. We will hopefully tour the site with Rosalie Gould, mayor of McGehee, is a local leader of preservation efforts and collector of artifact, after reading sections of John Howard's book Concentration Camps on the Home Front: Japanese Americans in the House of Jim Crow (Chicago 2008) and viewing the PBS documentary on the two Arkansas camps called Time of Fear (2004).

This course also explores interdisciplinary sites of memory related to the environment. We will view historically prominent geographical locations such as Fort Defiance in Cairo, Illinois at the confluence of the Ohio and the Mississippi. We will also study present day environment efforts to repel the invasion of Asian carp and runoff and erosion causing hypoxia and the dead zone off the Delta's waters (by analyzing the controversial exposé "Troubled Waters: A Mississippi Documentary"). There will be a unit of the seminar on the massive Flood of 1927. We will read sections of John Barry's fascinating book, Rising Tide: The Great Mississippi Flood of 1927 and How It Changed America (Simon and Schuster, 1998) and the American Experience documentary Fatal Flood (2001) before analysis how the flood was remembered through innovations in flood control technologies (and how these projects held up during later floods). Historical insights into New Deal projects will be gained from watching Pare Lorentz's 1938 Film "The River" (and by studying the creation in that period of the Great River Parkway on which we will be traveling), and four short films on the "Chocolate Tide" produced by the US Army Corps of Engineers. We will also go back in time to visit the ancient site of Cahokia whose massive mounds comprised one of the greatest cities in the world in 1250AD.

The presence of the Mississippi and its River Road has provided an important attraction that draws tourists to the valley. Another aspect of our collective study of Mississippi memory will involve an examination of how the region's past has been redeployed into the capital of heritage to draw more dollars into local communities. These ventures also provide important classrooms for our seminar for understanding and criticizing these interpretations. These include museums such as National Mississippi River Museum in Dubuque (Iowa), the National Rivers Museum in Alton (Illinois) and the Mississippi River Museum in Memphis. Another grouping embodying commodified touristic memory is the varied museums of music in Tennessee and Mississippi such as the Stax Museum of American Soul Music and Delta Blues Museum, as well as the many stops on the Mississippi Blues Trail.

Students in the seminar will select one specific site of memory for a ten-page research project that will be submitted, compiled into an anthology titled Mississippi Memory, and presented to each alumni/ae at the concluding dinner just before classes begin in the fall of 2013.

IV. LOGISTICS

As our seminar is more mobile than most Burch Field experiences, some of the logistics will be different. Our primary mode of transportation at this time will be two large vans. This will allow the maximum flexibility for accessing isolated sites and inexpensive accommodations and will take advantage of the Great River Parkway. Lodgings will vary from hotel, motel, and mobile home rentals to nights where we will be camping to encounter natural places and to reduce our costs. Transportation might also involve a segment of railroad travel on the City of New Orleans from Fulton, Missouri to Memphis, Tennessee. Varied forms of river travel will be arranged with varied operators at appropriate ports, include an excursion (at least for one night depending on budgetary constraints) on a paddle steamer. I am ready to work out a more detailed schedule of study and travel with more specific logistical arrangements as the next stage in the development of the seminar. There will perhaps be an opportunity to arrive early for the seminar and begin at the headwaters of the Mississippi at Lake Itasca State Park.

My research has revealed that there is no shortage of resources of experts who are fascinated by the Mississippi River, ranging from academics, to government scientists, to state folklorists and local historians. I am certain that when the dates for the seminar are clearer and closer that I can arrange and contract all the support I need to supplement my teaching with that of dynamic specialists. There are several universities along the path of our travels that could be approached for the use of classrooms, libraries, and professionals. These include University of Minnesota, Winona State, Viterbo College (Lacrosse, WI) Ashford University (Clinton, Ill), Washington University (St. Louis), University of Memphis and Rhodes College, Delta State (Cleveland, MS), Alcorn State (Lorman, Vicksburg, and Natchez), Louisiana State University, and Tulane University. For example, biologist Rosanna Cappellato from Rhodes College in Memphis teaches a seminar (for seniors) on the Mississippi River, as does Luther Brown from Delta State. Our days will be full with travel, excursion, and seminar discussions (in a variety of "classroom" situations), but there will also be time to read, research, and write, sometimes in some very beautiful places.

V. INTEREST AND EXPERIENCE OF THE FACULTY DIRECTOR

My career as an American Studies professor was incubated by the time I was a teenager as I co-piloted with my family on drives through 46 of the continental states. These explorations provided experiential scaffolding that enabled me to relate more to national events as I grew up as well as endowed me with a comfort with the road that eventually opened up towards wider global engagements. Since reading Jack Kerouac's On the Road, and then hitchhiking to Isle Royale National Park in Lake Superior the summer after my junior year in high school, I knew that the there were lessons to be learned by striking out for broader territories that held the promise of new perspectives and the serendipity of encountering situations that might surprise my own sense of what was possible. Maps for me became a form of accurate art that could guide me to fascinating situations.

My interest in leading this seminar is to share some of the excitement of this mode of learning with UNC students to help expand their own horizons and glimpse new vistas with more perspicacity. While the curriculum at UNC fosters students' vicarious power to imagine temporal, spatial, and cultural alternatives, this capacity is dramatically accentuated by experiential learning in the field that simply cannot be fully embodied in the four walls of the classroom. I spent a year in Sweden and another in New Zealand as well as a semester in Chicago during my undergraduate years and the learning and unlearning that I did during those time were essential aspects of my real education. I want the richness and challenges of this seminar, through its dissecting of the natural and cultural core of the continent, to provide students with a profound and flexible American backbone that will affect the way they stand as Americans in their future careers.

A Burch Field Seminar that Rachel Willis and I planned eight years ago called "On the Road and Ridin' the Rails" that went around the whole continental US was not able to be offered. I have since been thinking about the pleasures of this journey and have discussed ideas for it with two undergraduates over the past years who have shared my interest. I have much experience traveling, planning trips, and responding to the challenges that the road offers and am ready to take on this responsibility. I want to provide students—and myself—with Mississippi Memories that each of us will long recollect as they flow back into consciousness.

Jen,
The reason I contacted you is because I feel that the department of African and Afro-American Studies maintains a huge presence at UNC-CH. Also, Planet Aid works parallel with your Departmental Mission "The current goal of African and Afro-American Studies at UNC-CH is to give specific and precise attention to the histories, cultures, and cultural linkages of the peoples of Africa and their descendants in the New World."
In our changing culture climate, the faces of those we serve are diverse and their needs must be met with creativity. Planet Aid is unique in its commitment to addressing the world and its people. I was hoping to set-up an appointment to meet with you and discuss possibly constructing a program with the department of African and Afro-American Studies. Here is some basic information on Planet Aid…

Planet Aid Profile:

Planet Aid is a non-profit organization dedicated to improving the lives of people in developing countries. Our objectives include development, protecting the environment, and relief aid. Our activities in the US fall into these categories: Clothes Collection and Recycling, Partnership in Development and sharing Information about development issues. We mobilize surplus resources in North America for use in development activities in Africa, and Asia. Planet Aid has clothes collection boxes in about 19 states in North America with over 8,000 boxes. Planet Aid has been servicing NC for 9 years.

International Development:

At Planet Aid we are committed to supporting the poorest and most needy people of the world. We recognize the relationship between the distribution and use of the Earth's finite resources and the poverty and lack of basic necessities that the majority of the world's population experiences. Since Planet Aid started collecting clothes in 1997, the world population has grown by more than a billion people and the sad fact is that, worldwide, the amount of poor and starving people in absolute numbers has slowly been rising year-by-year since Planet Aid started in 1997.

Through grants and funds raised via our recycling program Planet Aid has supported more than 50 different programs in 15 countries over the years. In 2008 alone, Planet Aid provided $16.8 million in direct and in-kind support for training of teachers, small-scale farming, Child Aid and community development, vocational training and the fight against HIV & AIDS.

In Africa:

- Angola
- Botswana
- Democratic Republic of Congo
- Malawi
- Mozambique
- South Africa

- Zambia
- Zimbabwe

How our Program helps your environment.
By recycling and reusing textiles, Planet Aid has been able to help reduce water and pesticide usage in cotton production. This has been able to save on average 74 billion gallons of water per year, and reduce pesticide spraying by 21 million pounds yearly. Recycling also saves precious landfill space. In 2008 alone, Planet Aid was able to save landfills from 102 million pounds of textile waste. This also preserved over 200 square miles of farm land (equal to 6 times the size of Manhattan, NY), which would have been used for growing cotton for textile production. The reduction of CO2 is another crucial benefit of Planet Aids recycling program. On average, 1 lb. of clothes sold as second hand clothing will save 5.8 lbs. of CO2, while 1lb. of recycled fibers will save 1.7 lbs. of CO2. Not only is Planet Aid's recycling program providing affordable clothing to those in need, it is going a long way in preserving our most important natural resources.

I would love to come and meet with you and discuss our possibilities.

Thank you for your time and consideration.

Kindest Regards,

Megan Atkins - Planet Aid

Hi All,

Just a reminder to get Fall textbook orders in by this Friday, March 25. If you don't have any textbooks then you can fill out the No Text form. Meeting this deadline allows the University to get better prices on books and the savings get passed on to the students.

Thanks,
Travis

Dear Liaison,
Please find attached electronic forms of the items included in our Fall 2011 order packet, which we recently sent to you. Please feel free to forward these to your faculty.
I would also like to remind you that the deadline for Fall textbook order submissions is Friday, March 25, one week from today. In order for submissions to be counted as "on time," they must be received in the Textbook office by the end of the day on March 25. Faculty who submit their Fall orders on time will receive coupons to the Daily Grind Café, and the department which has the highest percentage of on-time submissions in its size category will win a $500 textbook grant for it graduate students. Please remind your faculty of the deadline.
Thank you for all you do to help us.
Best wishes,

Re: General Administration Board of Governors Guaranteed Buyback Textbook Requirements

Dear Chair,

In ongoing efforts to facilitate General Administrations Board of Governors Textbook Requirements for large introductory courses, we continue to encourage and accept textbook commitment forms from UNC Chapel Hill departments. As noted in UNC's 2011 Report on the Cost of Textbooks, Submitted with Campus-Based Tuition and Fee Increase Requests, "To significantly affect the cost of textbooks, Chancellors, Provosts, faculty and bookstore managers must continue to increase the number of courses and textbooks in the guaranteed buyback programs."

Please note that the Board of Governors' statement on guaranteed buyback or rental has been modified. The requirement that the introductory text be in hardback has been removed, and the Board is encouraging courses beyond the introductory level to participate in the Guaranteed Buyback Program. The modified statement is noted below.

Fall 2011 is the start of a new academic year and the perfect time to decide on a textbook and the duration of its use at UNC Chapel Hill. Let us know the course, the textbook and how many semesters it will be used, and we will guarantee 50% of the purchase price at buyback for students who purchased the textbook at UNC Student Stores for your committed time period. Please find enclosed new textbook commitment forms.

Quick review of previous discussions:

As discussed at the September 11, 2007 Council of Chairs meeting, the following information needs to be provided to Student Stores in order to facilitate General Administration Board of Governors Textbook Requirements.

- Departments need to notify Student Stores about their textbook decision, provide course information and the number of semesters the book will be used.
- Student Stores will guarantee retail buyback price on the textbook for UNC Chapel Hill students who purchased their textbook at Student Stores for the same four to six semesters to which the department has committed use.
- Bundles which include any component intended for a single user may not be adopted for guaranteed buyback, including access codes, workbooks, loose leaf binding, spiral binding, tear out pages, on-line course CDs, codes, or software.

General Administration Board of Governors Textbook Requirements Summary:

All campuses must have a guaranteed buyback or rental program for required textbooks for large, introductory classes for the Spring 2008 semester.

- This option must be available in addition to traditional purchase option.
- "Campuses must at least offer this option for introductory texts that will withstand a two to three year adoption cycle. Campuses are strongly encouraged to go beyond this minimum threshold to explore ways of minimizing the adoptions cycle and making the guaranteed buyback or rental program available beyond introductory level courses."
- "Campuses must make an effort to implement this system for courses that are introductory level and taken by a relatively high percentage of students."
- "A response to this recommendation must also be reported to the VP for Finance in any future requests for increases in tuition and fees."

Information Regarding Desk Copy Requests

Publishers work directly with faculty on desk copy requests and issues. Most publishers have Desk Copy Request/ Examination Copy Request available on their web sites. This is the quickest submission method for requesting Desk Copies. The publisher works directly with the faculty member while reviewing the request. Publisher's approved Desk Copies will be shipped to the faculty members' home department. Desk Copies are not sent to Student Stores.

Desk Copy submissions may be sent to Student Stores via our web site: www.store.unc.edu or the completed Desk Copy Request form may be sent to our department: Student Stores, Textbook Department CB#1530 Daniels Bldg. As a service, Student Stores will forward your completed Desk Copy Request to publishers. Student Stores neither keeps records of submissions, mailings nor does follow up work on Desk Copy Requests.

Student Stores does provide a policy for "emergency" situations regarding Desk Copies, but remember that the books we secure are for students. The quantities ordered are based on class enrollment. When our inventory is purchased for Desk Copies, the transaction decreases the available copies intended for Carolina students. This is especially problematic when multiple copies of a text are purchased by faculty and teaching assistants. Please be aware of the situation in which you may be putting your students!

Student Stores "Emergency" Desk Copy Policy

1. The instructor must purchase the book with check, cash or charge and have proper identification.
2. The instructor must tell the sales clerk that the book will be used as a desk copy. The sales clerk will then write Desk Copy and their initials on the sales receipt. It is essential that the faculty member keeps their receipt.
3. When the instructor received the desk copy from the publisher, they may return either the book purchased or the desk copy received in order to obtain a refund. All refunds require the presentation of the original sales receipt. If the publisher sends a desk copy that is marked as such - i.e., stamped Instructor's Copy – only the book purchased can be refunded. If the book purchased was new and the instructor wrote in it, only the used price of the book (that the instructor wrote in) will be refunded. If they purchased a used copy then only the used copy may be returned for a refund.
4. A refund for the purchase of a desk copy must be made before the end of the semester in which the book was purchased.

DESK COPY REQUEST FORM

Publishers are pleased to provide desk copies of any adopted text plus requested available supplements such as instructor's manuals, solutions manuals and test banks when sufficient quantity of texts are ordered directly from the publisher. Review, complimentary or on approval copies must be requested on departmental letterhead.

Please send this desk copy request directly to the publisher or to its local representative.

Win a $500.00 Textbook Grant for your department graduate students!

Details - How to win a $500.00 Textbook Grant!

Friday, March 25th is the DUE DATE for Fall 2011 Textbook Adoptions.
Submit on time and your department is eligible to win a textbook grant for your graduate student(s)! To qualify, a minimum of 75% of faculty members from your department must submit textbook adoptions By Friday, March 25th. In case of a tie, a random drawing will be held to determine winners.

Our goal is to get 100% of your department's adoptions by the due date. As an incentive, we're going to give THREE departments a $500.00 textbook grant to award to the graduate student(s) of their choice for the Fall 2011 semester. The three departments with the highest percentage of on-time adoptions will win. In awarding prizes, we will judge by department size.

* $500 textbook grant for the top department with less than 30 fall courses
* $500 textbook grant for the top department with 30-80 fall courses
* $500 textbook grant for the top department with greater than 80 fall courses

You can place your order in one of 4 easy ways:

Subject: Textbook Request Forms for Fall 2011

The Student Stores Textbook Department will provide all faculty who meet the Friday, March 25th 2011 Fall Textbook Request deadline with a $1.00 gift certificate to The Daily Grind—the espresso bar located by the Bull's Head Bookshop in the corner of Student Stores. We are offering this incentive because the timely submission of textbook request forms enables us to pay Carolina students significantly more for their books during the May buyback. If we know which books will be used in a forthcoming semester, we can pay students as much as 50% of the retail price and keep the books on campus for future use. If book requests are received after the March deadline, we may be unable to buy back used copies from students for use in Fall.

—Guidelines—

1. Completed Fall Textbook Request Forms must be received by the Textbook Department by Friday March 25th to be eligible for a Daily Grind coupon.

2. One coupon will be provided to each faculty member per course for up to four courses. For example, if a professor turns in six textbook request forms for a single course by March 25th, one Daily Grind coupon will be provided. If a professor submits two textbook request forms for two different courses by March 25th, two coupons will be provided.

3. The Student Stores Textbook Department will provide the Department Liaisons with the coupons for distribution within the department by Monday, April25th. The coupons will expire on Friday, September 30th, 2011.

4. All Department Liaisons will receive a special Daily Grind coupon in appreciation for their role in this promotion.

In order for this program to be a success, we need your help to remind faculty of the submission deadline. Student Stores will provide you with a flyer to post near department mailboxes.

To facilitate the book ordering process, I have enclosed the UNC Student Stores Course Materials Guide. It is a quick reference guide that answers most questions regarding book orders. Accurately completed request forms eliminate or minimize the possibility of ordering the wrong books. The "no text" form enables us to provide information to the students concerning courses that are being offered but will not be using textbooks. Please be sure that the "no text" forms are marked with the proper term and session.

If you have any questions about filling out textbook request forms or the Daily Grind promotion, please contact George Morgan at 962-2432 or Frank Bellamy at 962-8123. Or, feel free to contact the Textbook department using E-mail: textbook@unc.edu.

Guaranteed Buyback Program

The Board of Governors and General Administration have been concerned for several years with the increasing cost of textbooks. The Board completed two studies on the cost of textbooks and has approved recommendations (in February 2006 and in March 2007) to help control the cost of textbooks. One of the recommendations is the implementation of a Guaranteed Buyback or Rental Program for Required Textbooks for Introductory Courses.

"To significantly affect the cost of textbooks, Chancellors, Provosts, faculty and bookstore managers must continue to increase the number of courses and textbooks included in the guaranteed buyback programs. Campuses must continue to expand their Guaranteed Buyback Programs."

The University of North Carolina Report on the Cost of Textbooks, Submitted with Campus-Based Tuition and Fee Increase Requests February 2011

Dear UNC Chapel Hill Chairs,

In our ongoing efforts to facilitate General Administrations Board of Governors Textbook Requirements for large introductory courses, we continue to accept textbook commitment forms from UNC Chapel Hill departments. We encourage departments to commit to the two to three year adoption cycle cited in General Administrations guidelines, but we accept a one year commitment from departments. We accept both hardback and paperback textbooks for inclusion. We allow small courses to participate, and we include courses which may only be offered in a specific term for example, the course is only offered in Fall term. If you have additional courses you would like to include in this program, please submit a new form. We will happily include the course in the Guaranteed Buyback Program.

Fall 2011 is the start of a new academic year and the perfect time to decide on a textbook and the duration of its use at UNC Chapel Hill. General Administrations Board of Governors does expect the Guaranteed Buyback program to grow over time. If you let us know the course, the textbook and how many semesters it will be used, we will guarantee 50% of the purchase price at buyback.

Please note that bundles which include any component intended for a single user may not be adopted for guaranteed buyback, including access codes, workbooks, loose leaf binding, spiral binding, tear out pages, online course CDs, codes, or software.

General Administration Board of Governors Revised Textbook Requirements Summary:

"All campuses must have a guaranteed buyback or rental program for required textbooks for large, introductory classes."

- "This option must be available in addition to traditional purchase option."
- "Campuses must at least offer this option for introductory texts that will withstand a two to three year adoption cycle. Campuses are strongly encouraged to go beyond this minimum threshold to explore ways of minimizing the adoptions cycle and making the guaranteed buyback or rental program available beyond introductory level courses."
- Campuses must make an effort to implement this system for courses that are introductory level and taken by a relatively high percentage of students."
- "A response to this recommendation must also be reported to the VP for Finance in any future requests for increases in tuition and fees."

The Student Stores Textbook Department will provide all faculty who meet the Fall, Spring and Summer Session Textbook Re-quest deadlines with a $1.00 gift certificate to The Daily Grind—the espresso bar located by the Bull's Head Bookshop in the corner of Student Stores.
We are offering this incentive because the timely submission of textbook request forms enables us to pay Carolina students significantly more for their books during buyback. If we know which books will be used in a forthcoming semester, we can pay students as much as 50% of the retail price and keep the books on campus for future use. If book requests are received after the due dates, we may be unable to buy back used copies from students for use in the upcoming semester.

—Guidelines—

Completed Textbook Request Forms must be received by the Textbook Department by the term's due date to be eligible for a Daily Grind coupon.

1) One coupon will be provided to each faculty member per course for up to four courses. For example, if a professor turns in six textbook request forms for a single course by the due date, one Daily Grind coupon will be provided. If a professor submits two textbook request forms for two different courses by the due date, two coupons will be provided.

2) The Student Stores Textbook Department will provide the Department Liaisons with the coupons for distribution within the department.

3) All Department Liaisons will receive a special Daily Grind coupon in appreciation for their role in this promotion.

In order for this program to be a success, we need your help to remind faculty of the submission deadline. Student Stores will provide you with a flyer to post near department mailboxes.

How to win a $500.00 Textbook Grant for your Department's Graduate Students.

Fall and Spring competition
Submit on time and your department is eligible to win a textbook grant for your graduate student(s)! To qualify, a minimum of 75% of faculty members from your department must submit textbook adoptions by the Fall or Spring's Textbook order Due Date. In case of a tie, a random drawing will be held to determine winners.
Our goal is to get 100% of your department's adoptions by the due date. As an incentive, we're going to give THREE departments a $500.00 textbook grant to award to the graduate student(s) of their choice for that semester. The three departments with the highest percentage of on-time adoptions will win. In awarding prizes, we will judge by department size.

- $500 textbook grant for the top department with less than 30 courses
- $500 textbook grant for the top department with 30-80 courses
- $500 textbook grant for the top department with greater than 80 courses

Textbook Order Forms

Textbook Order Packages are delivered to departments one month before the requested due dates. Our faculty ordering website is opened for receiving textbook requisitions. Early course data is supplied by UNC Chapel Hill's Office of the University Registrar. Remember, when placing your online textbook requisition after you REVIEW REQUISITION hit the SUBMIT REQUISITION box. You will immediately receive notification that your requisition was successfully submitted to the bookstore, as well as a follow up email confirmation. If you do not hit Submit Requisition, you order is not send to the store, the requisition remains in your account as an Open Requisition which allows you to continue working on the requisition at a later time and submit at a later date. UNC Student Stores web site: www.store.unc.edu

NO TEXT NEEDED Forms
Please let us know if your course will not be using a textbook. This is important because Student Stores tracks every course being taught at UNC Chapel Hill and we send each department reminders about outstanding orders until we hear back from all courses. You may also submit the No Text Needed through our website. On the New Requisition page, click the box which reads "No books are required for this course". Courses which report No Text Needed are also included in the Board of Governor's calculation for departments percentage of on-time adoptions of textbooks, and in the calculation for the average cost of textbooks.

EZ Order Forms
If you are using the same books that you used in a previous term, the most efficient way to place your book order is through the EZ Order Program. Simply tell us that you are reusing books from a previous semester, note changes in titles or quantity, and we will do the rest. This feature is also available on our web site. On the New Requisition page, scroll down and enter the box which reads "Search Other Course" and follow instructions.

Textbook Information

Why are there textbook request deadlines? Where do used books come from?

Carolina students have expressed their preference is for the less expensive used copy of a textbook. It actually takes quite a lot of time to obtain used copies of textbooks. We work with many used book companies located throughout the States. We compete in a limited market on a national level; other university bookstores within the US are searching for the same books from the same vendors. Wholesale companies have revolving inventories. Their inventory supply can and does vary by the hour. We continually submit textbook want lists to the different companies in order to purchase as many used copies as are available. The more time we have to search these markets, the greater quantity of used copies we will have for students. We place orders directly with publishers for new copies, only once the used search is exhausted. The timely submission of textbook request forms enables us to pay Carolina students significantly more for their books during buyback. Remember, during Spring exams we are buying back at the higher retail buyback price for Fall and Summer Session textbooks. During Fall exams, we are buying back at the higher retail buyback price for Spring textbooks. We need to know what textbook you are using in order to pay students 50% of the new retail price of the textbook during exam periods!

Why does Student Stores need to know if a book will be used in an upcoming term? Why are there different buyback values for textbooks?

There is a two tiered pricing structure at buyback:

1. If we know the book will be used again, we pay students a price equal to 50% of the new textbook retail. Under the (industry standard) pricing we use at student stores, a new textbook selling, for example, for $100, sells for $75 used, and the student is paid $50 for that book at buyback. So, the net cost to a student buying used and selling back the book is $25.

2. If that book is not going to be used again or is part of a "bundle," then we default to a wholesale price, which is the price a wholesale company will pay us for the book (we have to sell it to them because we have no other way to dispose of the inventory). The average wholesale buyback price is 15% of the new retail selling price of the book. The net cost of using the title, then, goes up for the student.

New to Used Textbook Cycle

In order for Carolina students to receive the highest buyback value for their book, we need your textbook next term orders before the exam dates for the current term. Here's how it works: During Spring exams, we are buying back books that have been ordered for Summer Sessions and Fall term.

During Fall exams, we are buying back books that have been ordered for Spring term.

Textbook Vendor Returns

As with all retail establishments, our vendors have return deadlines to which we must adhere. Do not assume that inventory you saw on our shelves a month ago will still be here if you do not let us know you want to use that book for your course.

You must let us know each semester what textbook you want for your course. If we do not have your textbook order and the return deadline is approaching for the inventory, we will return the books to the vendor for a refund or credit because we paid for the inventory upfront. We do not know that you intend to use the book unless you contact us. Once we receive your textbook request, we will happily hold the inventory for your course.

We encourage students to purchase their textbooks as early as possible. If funds are an issue for the student, our Deferred Payment plan, Student Stores Account, is available for all students. They can get their book now and pay the Cashier's office in deferred payments later.

Course Textbook Cancellation and Student Return

Canceling a textbook from your syllabus and it's after the students two week returns period? Let us know! Contact one of our Textbook Buyers, George Morgan 962-2432, Frank Bellamy 962-8123. They will arrange a refund exception for your students, and establish a time frame for returns which you will announce in class. Again, we do not encourage cancellations, but we do not want you to use a book you are unhappy with and we do not want your students to have to pay for the cancelled book.

eBooks

In our ongoing efforts to help reduce textbook costs to Carolina students, if available and with your approval, we offer customers the additional purchase option of eBooks which are typically half the price of the new printed copy of the textbook. Students may choose either the printed text or the eBook format. If you are interested in learning more about student interest in eBooks and issues to consider before approving this format for your course, visit our list of frequently asked questions included in the Faculty link at: www.store.unc.edu. Contact our Textbook Buyers George Morgan 962-2432 or Frank Bellamy 962-8123, to find out if your textbook is available as an eBook!

Suggestions on Reducing Textbook Costs

Participate in the Guaranteed Buyback Program. Several courses can easily decide to join this program, as a single textbook is used consistently by all faculty teaching a course for several terms. Other courses which assign alternating faculty members to teach the same course in alternating terms, should consider a main textbook which will meet the needs of the course and let us know you want to join the program.

Avoid bundles whenever possible. Adopt textbooks, not textbooks marketed with ancillary materials. Any item bundled with the text does two things: (1) it forces students to buy the new book and, (2) it dramatically reduces the price we can pay at buyback. Then, readopt a textbook for as many terms as possible, increasing the number of used titles on campus, moving more student purchase and buyback transactions to the best case scenario: buying at 75%, selling back at 50%.

Increase timely adoption notifications. Students want used textbooks. If bundles are avoided and the bookstore knows, early enough, which books are needed for the next term, we can pay students more at buyback and buy more used textbooks from used book wholesalers, thus decreasing the price paid by students. The used book market is a zero sum game: there are not enough used textbooks available to meet national demand. The earlier we can shop for those books, the more we can have for students to buy.

Be fully aware of cost when adopting a text.

Require a textbook only if it will be used in a substantial way in the course.

Always order Access Codes, Single User License items separately from the textbook.

Do not require the "free" web access code or a "free" study aid offered by a publisher, it eliminates the resale value on the book for your student.

Donate desk copies received from publishers to UNC Chapel Hill libraries as reserve copies of the textbooks for your course.

Textbook Help and Advice

Want to know the price of a book under consideration for course use? Want advice on a win-win package break down scenarios? Want expert help with textbook orders?

Student Stores Textbook Buyers will happily contact publishers and find out the price and relay it to you. They will also offer various options for carrying package components separately for students. Please contact our Buyers for any textbook questions or help you may need.

Foreign Books
George Morgan, Student Stores Foreign Book Specialist, is available to assist you with any questions you may have about foreign book ordering. Please be advised that we are less likely to receive timely notifications of any problems for imported titles. Orders placed overseas typically take two to four months to arrive– depending on the country and the time of year– so please return your forms to us early.

Where's my Desk Copy?

Publishers work directly with faculty on desk copy requests and issues. Most publishers have Desk Copy Request/ Examination Copy Request available on their web sites. This is the quickest submission method for requesting Desk Copies. The publisher works directly with the faculty member while reviewing the request. Publisher's approved Desk Copies will be shipped to the faculty members' home department. Desk Copies are not sent to Student Stores.
Desk Copy submissions may be sent to Student Stores via our web site: www.store.unc.edu or the completed Desk Copy Request form may be sent to our department: Student Stores, Textbook Department CB#1530 Daniels Bldg. As a service, Student Stores will forward your completed Desk Copy Request to publishers. Student Stores neither keeps records of submissions or mailings, nor does follow up work on Desk Copy Requests.

Textbook Issues

Why are Packages and Custom Publications considered a negative? What other options do I have?

Textbook packaged with supplemental component(s) intended for a single user are problematic: for example Access Code Cards, on-line registration codes, workbooks, lab books, software, spiral binding, loose leaf binding, printed chapter supplements.

Single user components of a package are specifically designed for one person's use. There is no used option for these items. The current publishing trend is to package a required textbook with single user components at a discounted price. The package is presented by publishers and their representatives as the most cost effective and beneficial selection a faculty member or department group may choose for their students. Publisher representatives schedule information sessions for faculty and teaching assistants, "so they (the faculty) can convey clearly to their students the importance of the course materials we (the publisher) have provided and the value they (the students) are receiving."

In the majority of cases, the decision to require a package eliminates the used book market and buyback possibility for students. Frequently, the publisher's discounted package price is less than the price of the used textbook and new single user components. While the discounted package sounds like the best choice, it may not be the best long term financial choice for students. Each semester that the package is required, the used textbook markets as well as buyback option are excluded. The package discount price set by the publisher is the only financial benefit the student received for their purchase.

Here are some other options for you to consider. If all components are not required for course completion, the best scenario is to only require the core required item(s) from the package, such as the textbook; other components can be set up as optional for purchase, we can then stock some amount of the package as optional. This allows students to purchase used copies of the textbook as well as receive a higher buyback price for the text. The optional material is available for purchase, if the student decides he or she wants or needs the item(s).

Textbook Issues and Alternatives

Publisher Custom Publications

Financially, these are almost always the most expensive option for students. The price is high; there is no used market on the item; frequently there is no resale value on the item; and our experience is that these materials are slow to ship, and reorders very slow to ship if needed because of last minute increased enrollment.

Should you decide to create a Custom Publication through a publisher please consider binding selection: loose leaf, spiral, tear out pages eliminates any buyback possibility for Carolina students trying to sell their textbook at the end of the year, if your Custom Publication is readopted in the upcoming term.

A required package custom text with single user component completely eliminates the students' possibility to resale package. Again, the package break down scenario above is the best financial solution for students

Should you wish to look into other options, Student Stores has an excellent Custom Publishing department, which can work with you to tailor specific course materials for your class. By controlling the entire operation, we are able to keep expenses down. We secure the copyright permissions and we control the print runs and shelf space. We pass these savings on to students. We have compared prices on Publisher Custom Publications and what we would have been able to offer, and the difference is significant enough for us to highly encourage faculty to consider this option or at least "price compare" the final product.

Frequently Asked Textbook Questions

What do I do if I know some books but not all books I want for the upcoming term? When do I place the order?

Faculty may submit textbook requests at any time, and as many times as they wish. We encourage faculty to submit requests as soon as they have decided on any particular book(s), they do not have to wait until their entire book(s) selection is finalized. We will have more time to search the used market for the book(s), thus more used copies for students to purchase. While we do not encourage cancellations, if a faculty member decides to cancel and replace the book, we will certainly cancel the original request and order the replacement book.

What are my options when an edition changes?

Upon receipt of a textbook request, we notify faculty and or the department liaison if a new edition is currently in print or pending for release. We offer the faculty member the choice of remaining with the "old" edition or substituting the "new" edition.

Should the preference be for the old edition, Student Stores will work with wholesale companies and buyback copies from current students at the higher retail buyback price in order to secure quantity to cover the course enrollment.

Should a department decide they wish to commit to an old edition of a textbook for one, two or more academic years; Student Stores will make an early investment in bulk quantity on the old edition in order to secure enough copies of the edition to cover the academic terms of the department's commitment. We will also be able to offer current Carolina students the higher retail buyback price throughout the duration of the old edition's use at UNC Chapel Hill.

Textbook Course Information & the BOG

As required in the BOG recommendations, tuition and fee requests must also include submission stating the percentage of on-time adoptions of textbooks. The Board of Governor's is requiring all stores affiliated with the sixteen North Carolina campuses to submit a report on the percentage of on-time adoptions of textbooks for their campus.

As orders are submitted to Student Stores, we keep track of the dates the orders are turned into our office. This data is used to compile the percentages of on-time adoptions for the BOG, to create weekly reports to departments and the Provost's office, and to notify department liaisons as well as individual faculty of courses that have not placed a course materials order.

NO TEXT NEEDED Forms: Courses which report No Text Needed are also included in the Board of Governor's calculation for departments percentage of on-time adoptions of textbooks, the Provost's report on outstanding course orders, and in the calculation for undergraduate textbooks average price.

As the Provost has instructed, Student Stores is the official source of textbook information for courses offered by The University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. Faculty members must provide lists of textbooks to be used in upcoming courses to the Student Stores, but book lists are public, and faculty may freely share them with others.

What's Guaranteed Buyback About?

The high cost of textbooks is a growing concern nationally, and a topic of importance to the UNC system administrators.

Re: General Administration Board of Governors Textbook Requirements Summary:

All campuses must have a guaranteed buyback or rental program for required textbooks for large, introductory classes beginning in the Spring 2008 semester.

• This option must be available in addition to traditional purchase option.

• "Campuses must offer this option for introductory texts that are hardcover and will withstand a two to three year adoption cycle."

• "Campuses must make an effort to implement this system for courses that are introductory level and taken by a relatively high percentage of students."

• "A response to this recommendation must also be reported to the VP for Finance in any future requests for increases in tuition and fees."

Implications for UNC Chapel Hill Departments and Student Stores:

• Departments will need to decide on a single textbook for their introductory courses and commit to the text for four to six consecutive semesters.

• Departments will need to notify Student Stores about their textbook decision, provide course information and the number of semesters the book will be used.

• Student Stores will guarantee retail buyback price on the textbook for UNC Chapel Hill students who purchased their textbook at Student Stores for the same four to six semesters to which the department has committed use.

Qualification for the guaranteed buyback program to work:

• Bundles which include any component intended for a single user may not be adopted for guaranteed buyback, including access codes, workbooks, loose leaf binding, spiral binding, tear out pages, on-line course CDs, codes, or software.

Guaranteed Buyback Going Further

In ongoing efforts to facilitate General Administrations Board of Governors Textbook Requirements for large introductory courses, we continue to encourage and accept textbook commitment forms from UNC Chapel Hill departments. If your department already submitted form(s), thank you. If you have additional courses you would like to include in this program, please let us know. We will happily include the course in the Guaranteed Buyback Program.

Fall semester is the start of a new academic year and the perfect time to decide on a textbook and the duration of its use at UNC Chapel Hill. General Administrations Board of Governors does expect that the Guaranteed Buyback program will grow over time. Let us know the course, the textbook and how many semesters it will be used, and we will guarantee 50% of the purchase price at buyback for students who purchased the textbook at UNC Student Stores for your committed time period.

We need to see more of this little fellow on our textbooks for Guaranteed Buyback!

Recognition and Facilitation

Academic freedom is a precious right, fully supported by Student Stores. In no way do we want to play any role in the adoption of textbooks other than one of offering information, information which can increase the array of choices to faculty and possibly lower costs to students. Our hope is to work with faculty as do the publisher representatives who call to discuss their company's textbooks—but we would just be doing so from the perspective of your university bookstore, a perspective we feel can add depth and context to any decision made on course materials.

We continue our work in facilitating General Administration Board of Governors Textbook Ordering Policy for Guaranteed Buyback as departments inform us of their textbook and time line decision for introductory courses.

The following are items which cannot be included due to the nature of their design:

- No bundles which include any component intended for a single user.
- No access codes, workbooks, loose leaf binding, spiral binding, tear out pages, single user on-line course cds, single user license software.

Multi Campus Shared Buyback

We partner with NC State University and East Carolina University bookstores in a shared buyback program. Requested textbooks from all three campuses are loaded in a unique server. If a book is not being bought back at the higher retail price at one campus, the server reviews the textbook wants of the other two universities. If there is a title match the server will automatically identify the other campus, and offer Carolina students 50% of the new price for the other campus, rather than the highest wholesale price a used book vendor is offering. The server reviews the wants of all three campuses and makes sure students at the three campuses receive the highest buyback price available.

UNC Chapel Hill might have a request for a book that has not been previously adopted on our campus, the book was used at NC State, but was not readopted for the upcoming term. The server would identify the book and offer the NC State student 50% of the new price, NC State ships the book to us and Carolina students have more used textbooks available.

Several campuses have different exams dates, some a week earlier than UNC Chapel Hill's. In order for this program to be its most effective, we need textbook adoptions from faculty as early as possible. It's a win-win situation for many NC students!

We hope to expand the shared buyback program to more of the North Carolina universities. It is an excellent program which helps to reduce textbook costs for NC students.

Remember, we need your textbook orders in a timely manner for this program to be a success.

First-Year Preorder Program

Another popular program that Carolina students and their parents take advantage of, is First-Year Preorder.

UNC Student Stores offers a textbook preorder program for incoming first-year students. We begin presenting the program to students at the first of the Summer's C-TOPS orientations starting in early June. During these orientation sessions, which continue through the summer, we explain to incoming Carolina students and their parents how the program works, and its benefits.

Textbook preorder is a service which enables first-year students to receive their books early, before the majority of students have arrived on campus. During the first weeks of August, Student Stores employees obtain the students' schedules from the Registrar's Office, hand pick their course textbooks and package their order. These students have the distinct advantage of being the first to have access to our used book inventory. The ability of Student Stores to provide as large an inventory of used textbooks as possible enables us to reduce the students' textbook costs. We host a Pre-Order Weekend for first year students and their parents to pick up their semester textbook box.

We also offer a Deferred Payment plan for students. They can set up a Student Stores Account and use it for their duration at UNC Chapel Hill. If they choose this method of payment, the price of the books is sent to the University Cashier's office and the charge will appear on the September University Cashier's Office Statement. Students will pay for them exactly as they pay their tuition and other epenses billed through the Cashier's Office.

The success of this program is determined by the submission of textbook orders to Student Stores in time for us to obtain as many used copies as are available, as well as provide enough new copies of textbooks for the incoming students by early August.

Textbooks and Sales Tax Holiday

NC G.S. 105-164. 13C provides an exemption for certain items of tangible personal property sold between 12:01 A.M. on the first Friday in August and 11:59 P.M. the following Sunday.

Textbooks are included in this exemption! All course materials $300.00 or less per item are eligible.

Students take advantage of the tax free weekend, either as a walk in customer or by placing their textbook orders on our web site and having the books shipped to their homes. They are preparing for your course early, securing used copies and taking advantage of the tax free weekend.

Here is yet another area where you can help reduce textbook costs to your students. Be sure to submit your Fall textbook adoption to Student Stores as early as possible. If you were assigned to teach the course after the Spring exams were over, submit either a partial or complete course book list in time for us to search for used copies from wholesale companies, receive the inventory and have the books on the shelf ready for your students by the first Friday in August. Your students will be happy and grateful for your endeavors in reducing the total price for their course books!

Textbook Shoppers

Many Carolina students take advantage of our on-line textbook ordering web site. They order their course textbooks early and have the books shipped to their homes before they return to campus. Ordering early makes them first in line for used copies. Every semester this service grows larger!

On our site we post: "Course textbook adoptions are subject to change. Student Stores will only refund and/ or exchange books purchased from Student Stores. Student Stores receipts are required for refund and/ or exchange." This ensures that if you change your mind about a textbook you ordered and now want to cancel, students who ordered on-line will receive a refund for their purchase from us.

While the site is in no way intended as a source for price comparisons, both students and their parents have used it in this manner. They shop around for the best price they can find, in both brick and mortar stores and at online books sites. A lot of time is spent by customers "shopping around". I feel confident that most students find our prices either comparable or lower to other sources because of the growth in on-line student course book orders.

Your students and their parents are taking the time to obtain your required course books at the most economical cost they can find. You can help them by placing your textbook orders with Student Stores as early as possible. Again, we do not encourage cancellations, but cancel we will if you are not satisfied with your original selection.

About UNC Student Stores

At UNC Student Stores, we are proud to be a part of the UNC Campus Community. The store contributes all income above operating expenses to student scholarships. Student Stores has contributed millions of dollars to the scholarship program of the University, funding in the past ten years alone nearly nine million dollars in non-athletic scholarships. Student Stores is totally receipt supported and receives no state funds.

Student Stores is a department within UNC Chapel Hill. As a state owned business, we must adhere to the Umstead Act, North Carolina state law, which defines operations and limits the ability of state agencies to compete with the private sector.

In accordance with NC Freedom of Information Act, Student Stores is the University's official source of textbook information for courses. Faculty members must provide (but are not limited to) Student Stores with lists of textbooks to be used in upcoming courses.

Our Mission

The mission of UNC Student Stores is to provide books, school supplies, and other merchandise and services to the University community as prescribed in State Law, to pay all operating expenses and provide funds for inventory and capital improvements out of receipts, and to contribute any residual funds to the scholarship program of the University.

Subject: [asc_faculty] Round Table on African Social Movements April 1

African Social Movements in a Globalizing Context
A Round table Presentation and Discussion

When: Friday April 1, 5:30pm-7:30pm
Where: Hitchcock Multipurpose Room
Sonja Haynes Stone Center
150 South Road
UNC Chapel Hill

The recent rebellions that began in Tunisia and Egypt have sparked renewed interest in social movements and the potential for revolutionary change in the 21st century. Yet much of the conversation about these recent round of protests and revolutions has not touched on the specifically African character of the movements: the history of African revolt and the contemporary context of social movements on the continent. This round table takes advantage of the current upheavals to touch on the specifics of these struggles but also to expand our focus to the rest of the region, taking into consideration historical and contemporary conditions for struggle on the continent.

Topics that will be addressed include: examining the context for social movements in the Democratic Republic of Congo in the context of the 50th anniversary of the assassination of Patrice Lumumba, that country's first prime minister; the Eritrean liberation movement and contemporary organizing for transformation; Neoliberalism and the NGO-ization of resistance in West Africa; social movements and the state in East Africa; practices of solidarity between African and Canadian civil society; reflections on how the North African uprisings have resonated throughout the Arab world; the Egyptian revolution and the discourse of a "transition" to democracy.

Panelists include:

Prof. Georges Nzongola, African and African American Studies, UNC-CH
Prof. Bereket Selassie, African and African American Studies, UNC-CH
Prof. Charles Pitot, Cultural Anthropology and AAAS, Duke University
Dr. Firoze Manji, Pambazuka News
Molly Kane, Pambazuka News
Elena Yehia, Graduate Student, Anthropology, UNC-CH
Yousuf Al-Bulushi, Graduate Student, Geography, UNC-CH

The round table will be introduced and moderated by Prof. Eunice Sahle of Global Studies and African and African American Studies at UNC.

This event is co-sponsored by the African Studies Center, the Department of Geography, and the Department of African and African American studies

Subject: US Army RFP for Civil Affairs Assistance on Topics Related to National Security

Dear Dr. Nyang Oro,

Please share with your faculty this Request for Proposals (RFP) from the UNC Partnership for National Security, which focuses on matching education, research, and training needs of the U.S. Military with UNC system subject matter experts.

The UNC system has received this RFP for Civil Affairs Assistance to identify expertise within the system to provide short-courses in support of the US Army's Civil Affairs mission and to conduct development projects involving Civil Information Management and associated technologies.

Requirements identified by the 95th Civil Affairs Brigade include:

- Assistance identifying measurable indicators of political, economic or social instability
- Statistical analysis of field polling results
- Trend identification and analysis
- Request for Information (RFI) tracking system
- African studies
- Agricultural and resource economy
- Effective writing
- Developmental economics
- Value chain analysis
- Political science
- Communism to democracy
- Construction and engineering management

All training will be conducted at Ft. Bragg, North Carolina or at a relevant campus, as required. Faculty will be compensated for their time and travel.

Letters of interest, including the qualifications of the team conducting these projects and training and a description of how the project or short-course would be implemented (including a syllabus), should be sent to Kimrey Rhinehardt, Vice President for Federal Relations at kwr@northcarolina.edu. Faculty may contact Dr. Tom Losordo, Faculty Advisor for Military Affairs (UNC GA), directly at tlosordo@northcarolina.edu for more information on a specific project or short-course.

For details including contact information, see the full RFP online at http://www.northcarolina.edu/frc/mil/civaff.htm. Thank you.

Subject: US Army RFP for Civil Affairs Assistance on Topics Related to National Security

Please share with your faculty this Request for Proposals (RFP) from the UNC Partnership for National Security, which focuses on matching education, research, and training needs of the U.S. Military with UNC system subject matter experts.

The UNC system has received this RFP for Civil Affairs Assistance to identify expertise within the system to provide short-courses in support of the US Army's Civil Affairs mission and to conduct development projects involving Civil Information Management and associated technologies.

Requirements identified by the 95th Civil Affairs Brigade include:

- Assistance identifying measurable indicators of political, economic or social instability
- Statistical analysis of field polling results
- Trend identification and analysis
- Request for Information (RFI) tracking system
- African studies
- Agricultural and resource economy
- Effective writing
- Developmental economics
- Value chain analysis
- Political science
- Communism to democracy
- Construction and engineering management

All training will be conducted at Ft. Bragg, North Carolina or at a relevant campus, as required. Faculty will be compensated for their time and travel.

Letters of interest, including the qualifications of the team conducting these projects and training and a description of how the project or short-course would be implemented (including a syllabus), should be sent to Kimrey Rhinehardt, Vice President for Federal Relations at kwr@northcarolina.edu. Faculty may contact Dr. Tom Losordo, Faculty Advisor for Military Affairs (UNC GA), directly at tlosordo@northcarolina.edu for more information on a specific project or short-course.

For details including contact information, see the full RFP online at http://www.northcarolina.edu/frc/mil/civaff.htm. Thank you.

Subject: [asddd] Important - Annual Report open for departments & stewardship
Attach: A&S Foundation Stewardship Guidelines.pdf

This message is being sent to all Chairs, Directors, and Administrative Managers in the College of Arts & Sciences.

It's time to provide information for our online annual report, which includes reporting by faculty on their activities for the year, the department's summary of those faculty reports and the annual stewardship reporting on private support that your department receives. Based on input the Annual Report Committee received from departments, a new version of the Annual Report system has been developed to streamline this process.

The online system is now open for the 10/11 reporting year for chairs, directors, and managers at https://apps4.oasis.unc.edu/car.

To Do Items and Deadlines:

1. If you plan to add your own questions to the annual report system, this should be done prior to Wednesday, April 6th. (The annual report system will be opened to all faculty Thursday, April 7th, with a deadline of Friday, April 29th).
2. If some of the private funds that you steward were allocated to specific individuals, you will want to add those recipients to the system as soon as possible, so that the Stewardship tab appears in the faculty member's annual report. (This will avoid asking the faculty to enter the system twice to complete their annual report information). We are suggesting a deadline of April 4th for adding recipients (including students) to Stewardship.
3. The deadline for completing all stewardship activities and your departmental annual report summary is Friday, May 13th.

Frequently Asked Questions:

1. How do I learn to use the annual report system?
   * Please refer to the manager help tab for instructions and information on each section of the annual report.
   * If you have additional questions about the Stewardship section, the process to complete it, or the funds included in this section, please contact the Arts and Sciences Foundation: Del Helton, del.helton@unc.edu, 962-8216, Jim Magaw, jim.magaw@unc.edu, 962-6123, or Joanna Cardwell, joanna.cardwell@unc.edu, 962-8342.
   * If you have additional questions about the faculty activities or departmental summary sections, please submit a help ticket at http://tinyurl.com/College-Annual-Report-Help .
   * If you have technical difficulties with the annual report, please submit a remedy ticket to OASIS at the following website: http://oasis.unc.edu/remedy/.
2. Do faculty really need to meet the April 29th deadline? Can they request an extension?
   * The purpose of the faculty deadline is to make sure all faculty have completed their annual report submissions before the end of the academic year (when many leave) so that you will have time to complete the unit portion before May 13. As you know, you need the faculty to complete their portion before you can complete the unit portion. If your faculty need extra time to complete their portion of the Annual Report, you have the option to extend their deadline, so long as you catch them before they leave town and leave yourself enough time to complete the unit portion by May 13.
3. How are joint faculty handled in the annual report system?
   * The affiliation feature now allows administrative managers to affiliate faculty into your unit, rather than asking the faculty to make the affiliation (generally this will only be used for joint faculty).
4. How do we know if faculty have completed their annual report?

* The status section indicates whether the faculty member has ‘not logged in’ or shows 'in progress' if they have logged in. There is also an option for faculty to indicate that their report is completed.

5. Where does the faculty listing for my department come from?
   * The faculty listing itself is taken from LDAP.

Important Stewardship Guidelines

A few things to keep in mind as you're completing the Stewardship section:

1. If there are recipients (faculty or students), use the "Add a Recipient" button. Do not list recipients as a group in the "Add Activity" section. We receive valuable information from students and faculty who respond to an automatic email, but only when they've been entered in the "Add a Recipient" section. If you have multiple recipients, keep selecting "Add a Recipient." If you can't add a recipient (no PID, for example), add the name to the Activity section and provide an e-mail address or other contact information if available.

2. If the fund has NOT been used, tell us why AND if it will be used in the 2011-2012 academic year. If it's an endowment, and income was reinvested, we need to know.

3. Reference the fund's gift agreement for usage specifics. If you need a copy, please tell us. The Dean's office is working towards attaching gift agreements next year.

4. Donors are requesting more detailed financial information, so be prepared to provide a record of all expenses if asked. If you're concerned that income from the fund is not being used properly or efficiently (example, the payout is $5,000 and the department is using only $500), send us an email and we'll pursue with the development officer and dept. chair. In some cases, we can amend gift agreements that were originally too narrowly focused.

5. Include student/faculty project titles or trip locations in the appropriate "Send Comment" section. Many students or faculty don't know they've received private support and this entry alerts them. It also helps us match funding with recipients who may benefit from several funds.

6. Donors are genuinely interested in how their gifts are used. THANK YOU for your efforts in helping the College to provide the best stewardship reports possible.

As always, ask me, Jim Magaw, jim.magaw@unc.edu, or Joanna Cardwell, joanna.cardwell@unc.edu for help with any stewardship question you may have.

This message is being sent to all deans, directors, department heads, and managers in the College of Arts and Sciences.

You are being asked to take part in an evaluation of the College Reporting system. Your participation is entirely voluntary, although your feedback is essential for improving the system.

Survey link - http://www.surveymonkey.com/s/ReportingSystemEvaluation

Results from this survey will be used to suggest improvements to the Arts and Sciences Reporting system and also as part of a project for a class on user interface design at the School of Information and Library Science. The survey will be open to all administrative managers, chairs, and other staff who use the system.

It should take approximately ten minutes to complete the survey. Your responses will remain anonymous and none of your personal information will be saved.

What if you have questions about this study?
If you have questions, complaints, concerns or if you would like a copy of the finished project, contact Ryan Greenway (greenway@unc.edu).

Please complete the ECRT certification. From what I have heard from other people it is pretty easy to complete and takes just a minute or two. IF YOU HAVE QUESTIONS PLEASE EMAIL ME, so that this can still be submitted by the deadline this Wednesday, 3/30.

Here is the info from my email the other week, and I am sure that you are getting automatic emails from the ECRT system as well:

If you are receiving this email you are federally required to complete this by the 3/30/2011 due date
The website to go to is here: http://ecrt.unc.edu
You can login with your onyen and password
FINAL DUE DATE: MARCH 30, 2011

I have checked the effort recorded in the system and things seem to be accurate to me. However, you will need to go into the system, double check for yourself and 'certify' your effort on various projects. It then comes back to me to double check (again) and officially submit.

You will be certifying the amount of time that you spent on any 'sponsored research' that you worked on from JULY 1, 2010 TO DECEMBER 31, 2010. These figures are pulled from both payroll and any grants or contracts that you were listed on or paid from. It is federally mandated that we certify these a few times each year. For those who remember it, this system replaces the PARS forms that you may have filled out in the past.

Please let me know if you have questions, and please certify your time ASAP – no one is able to do this but you!
Thanks so much,
Agatha

Hi Pete and Julius,
Please see below - I assume that I should coordinate most of the Annual Reporting for our departments. Please let me know if this is incorrect. Also, by Monday, 4/4, I will need to know if you want to add more department specific questions. I have only the final summary records of what was submitted in recent years for both departments, so please let me know if there are other things that I should be aware of.

Later this week I will be contacting faculty to let them know what they need to do in order to complete this during April.
Take care,
Agatha

INNOVATE @ CAROLINA

IMPORTANT IDEAS FOR A BETTER WORLD

A Case for Support

THE UNIVERSITY
of NORTH CAROLINA
at CHAPEL HILL

WE HAVE SO MUCH WORK AHEAD OF US. OUR TO-DO LIST IS NOTHING LESS THAN THE GREATEST PROBLEMS OF OUR TIME: CURE DISEASES, AND GET THOSE CURES TO ALL THE PEOPLE WHO NEED THEM. FIND AND INVENT CLEAN ENERGY. INSPIRE STUDENTS IN OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS. FEED SEVEN BILLION PEOPLE. DESCRIBE THE WORLD, AND REPLACE CONFLICT WITH UNDERSTANDING.

Holden Thorp, Chancellor of the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

A Time for Bold Action

On Oct. 12, 2010, Chancellor Thorp will launch the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill's Innovate@Carolina Campaign. The campaign will aim to raise $125 million to make Carolina a world leader in launching university-born ideas for the good of society.

Why Oct. 12? Because that date, in 1793, marked the birth of public higher education in America. The laying of Old East's cornerstone proclaimed to the nation that Carolina refused to follow the path of cloistered elitism, sequestered in the Ivory Tower. Rather, with one bold stroke, Carolina led a young country to a future filled with highly educated citizens of all creeds and backgrounds, giving generations access to America's promise of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

It is time to be bold again. Even bolder. We must do more than lead in American public higher education. We must extend our impact to the region, state, nation, and the world.

The Challenge

The world needs help. Read any front page, watch any newscast, check any RSS feed. From oil spills to flu pandemics to suicide bombers, every day seems to bring another horror.

And yet there are great institutions that can help. And Carolina is one of them. The Innovate@Carolina Campaign will set in motion our response.

As the nation's first public university, Carolina has always epitomized public service. Further, because of our commitment to liberal arts, strong technical areas, and professional schools, our faculty and students see the world broadly and think critically. They are wired to innovate.

Carolina is both compelled and poised to accelerate and apply its innovative and entrepreneurial mindset to help solve the world's most recalcitrant problems.

Our strength comes from fostering creativity and discovery in the classroom, the lab, and the studio, as well as in communities beyond our campus. Our liberal arts tradition, combined with excellence in scientific research and professional programs, equips our faculty and students to assess the current state of knowledge in a discipline, augment that knowledge through rigorous new research, and share the product of this new knowledge in innovative ways. In short, a culture of innovation.

Although humanity faces great challenges, we have great human capital to respond. Among our 3,500 faculty, we can claim a Nobel Prize winner and members of the national academies in the sciences and medicine as well as the arts and humanities. Our student population boasts many of the nation's best and brightest high school graduates and graduate students. And these students can pursue more than 100 fields of study and earn bachelor's, master's, and doctoral degrees, along with professional degrees in fields including dentistry, medicine, pharmacy, business, journalism, and law.

Carolina is physically located at the nexus of innovation and entrepreneurship. Just miles from two other world-class research universities, Duke University and NC State, UNC-Chapel Hill has forged extensive partnerships with these institutions. The Research Triangle Park (RTP) stands just 10 miles from the Carolina campus as a testament to the power of entrepreneurial thinking. Founded in 1959, RTP is one of the largest research parks in the nation where a concentration of corporate research-and-development facilities and a highly educated workforce have fueled a thriving entrepreneurial economy.

And so our stage is set with tremendous potential. We have the will to turn that potential into even greater achievement. We must now align our values, resources, and processes to drive our culture of innovation. The Innovate@Carolina Campaign will give us the way.

The Way Forward

In early 2010, Chancellor Thorp assembled groups of faculty, staff, students, alumni, parents, and friends of the University — many with extensive experience leading innovation in science, business, medicine, nonprofits, and academia. Their charge: Develop a strategic plan to enable Carolina to increase the volume and accelerate the pace at which important ideas created here are applied for a better world.

> We will build a culture of innovation that permeates every corner of campus.

The resulting roadmap scales far beyond the conventional notions of how a university can do good outside its borders. We envision much more than promoting a single professor's eco-friendly business concept or getting research findings published in academic journals. Such efforts are important, but the scope of the Innovate@Carolina Campaign will be nothing less than transformative: We will build a culture of innovation that permeates every corner of campus, from the chemist in Caudill Labs to the poet in Greenlaw Hall. We will redouble our efforts to leverage scientific and medical research for society's good, and we will advance work in the humanities that leads to greater understanding of the challenges the world faces.

What's more, to effectively address these complex challenges, this culture will be collaborative, with the chemist's science and the poet's verse informing each other.

The key to our roadmap's success is simple: We must raise $125 million to make it a reality. And we aim to do so by June 30, 2013. The world's problems won't wait.

CAMPAIGN GOALS

The Innovation Circle identified these major funding goals for the Innovate@Carolina Campaign:

$25 million to create a permanent endowment supporting innovation. This endowment will create a group of "Innovation Funds" to be awarded on a competitive basis to faculty, students, and staff to support the most promising innovations on campus.

$15 million (endowment) to create five Applied Sciences Professorships. The faculty filling these positions will bring the expertise that lies at the intersection of disciplines. They will help colleagues across campus connect basic sciences with engineering, propelling the University into new areas of discovery and application.

$15 million (endowment and expendable) to hire entrepreneurs-in-residence. Drawn from the ranks of outstanding commercial and social entrepreneurs both on and off campus, these experts will mentor and counsel students and faculty interested or involved in entrepreneurial ventures. They also will use their professional contacts to help students secure off-campus internships and faculty develop relationships with the private and non-profit sectors.

$6 million (expendable) to fund grants tackling the "World's Greatest Challenges." Every two years for the next six years, the campus will coalesce around a theme that addresses a pressing global priority, such as water quality and its critical role in supporting healthy communities around the world.

CAMPAIGN GOALS

$6 million (endowment) to fund two Innovation Professorships. Innovation Professors, selected on a competitive basis to pursue a promising innovation project, will be exempted from the normal structures of their academic position at Carolina for up to three years.

$25 million (endowment) to support teaching and research, including the Minor in Entrepreneurship and other successful programs of the Carolina Entrepreneurial Initiative. Critical to promoting a culture of innovation, the interdisciplinary minor in the College of Arts and Sciences encourages students to think and act entrepreneurially, teaching them the skills to start successful ventures of all kinds: commercial, social, scientific, and artistic. Additional funding will provide ongoing support to the highly successful CEI programs including Launching the Venture, the Chancellor's Faculty Boot Camp on Entrepreneurship, the Carolina Challenge, and First Year Seminars in innovation and entrepreneurship.

$10 million (expendable) to create a Student Innovation Hub. The Innovation Hub will serve as a physical nexus on campus where students, faculty, and staff can come together to engage in innovation and entrepreneurial efforts. Preferably an existing public space, centrally located and transformed over time into an Innovation Hub — open to the entire University community — to nurture, inspire and celebrate the innovation culture of Carolina. Such a space would offer resources to innovators and entrepreneurs who do not have a natural home in a specific unit, provide spaces for ad hoc collaborations, and serve as a common space to celebrate our campus-wide innovation culture.

$5 million (endowment) to support the Innovation Scholars Program. Expanding the Carolina Innovation Scholarship program will enable the University to recruit and support more students who show outstanding promise as entrepreneurs with scholarships that cover the full cost of tuition, fees, room and board, renewable for four years.

$3.3 million (expendable) to expand the Carolina KickStart program campus wide. Carolina KickStart, in collaboration with Office of Technology Development and Center of Entrepreneurial Studies, will improve the probability of successfully commercializing UNC faculty technology by seeding startups and providing comprehensive consulting services.

$14.7 million (expendable and endowment) to fund emerging innovation projects. The remaining $14.7 million in the Innovate@ Carolina Campaign will fund other important efforts that will include seed funding for social innovations created at Carolina; Research Triangle and Global competitive collaboration grants; grants funding studies in innovation and entrepreneurship to assess what approaches are most effective as agents of change; and marketing efforts to collectively nurture Carolina's culture of innovation for a better world.

The Ultimate ROI

Return on investment. Every investor expects it. The Innovate@Carolina Campaign takes this to heart. And as with investors in any enterprise, supporters will receive an annual report and be invited to an annual Innovate@Carolina meeting convened by the Chancellor. Both will document our progress in turning ideas into solutions, using rigorous empirical metrics to measure the performance of every Innovate@Carolina program.

Investors want impact. As a charter shareholder in the Innovate@Carolina enterprise your investment will amount to much more than a thicker stock portfolio. As Chancellor Thorp says, Carolina's "to-do list is nothing less than the greatest problems of our time." And so this campaign represents nothing less than the chance to change the world.

WE MUST BE BOLD, AGAIN.

Attach: ExternalPay.pdf

Dear All,
This is an annual reminder and request. If you engaged in any "External Activities for Pay," including receiving Honorariums, pay for project work that was outside of UNC payroll, etc, please fill out the attached form and return it to me by April 29th.

In general this form should be filled out as a Request, PRIOR to each time you would like to work outside of UNC, but if you happened to miss filling this out for any external work in 2010-11, please do fill the form out now. By April 29th I must receive any of these forms that you need to file for July 1, 2010 to June 30, 2011, so that we can make a summary report to Provost's Office.

Also, please note that I will be sending out info in the next few days about your role in completing the Annual Report, which will also be due by April 29th. You will be required to fill out an online survey about your work during the past year, and I have been told that this can be somewhat time consuming (1-3 hours). However, it is required by UNC, only you may fill out your portion, and it will be available ONLY from April 7th to April 29th. So please plan some time for this, during this particularly busy time of year.

Thanks!
Agatha

Regulations on External Professional Activities for Pay by Faculty and Non-Faculty EPA Employees

In accordance with the Board of Governors' policy on Conflicts of Interest and Commitment Affecting Faculty and Non-Faculty EPA Employees (UNC Policy Manual, 300.2.2), UNC faculty and non-faculty EPA employees sometimes may engage in compensated activities that are not a part of University employment. Through such opportunities, employees apply their specialized knowledge and experience to activities outside of their University employment, thereby enhancing their own capabilities in teaching and research and contributing significant societal benefits, including economic development through technology transfer. These activities are encouraged if the intended activity complies with Section II, A of the corresponding policy 300.2.2, and do not create a conflict of interest (see definitions, UNC Policy Manual, 300.2.2, Section I).

An EPA employee who wishes to engage in external professional activity for pay must adhere to these regulations to provide satisfactory assurances that such activity will not interfere with University employment obligations.

I. Regulations

A. Any EPA employee who plans to engage in external professional activity for pay shall complete the "Notice of Intent to Engage in External Professional Activity for Pay" (hereinafter referred to as "Notice of Intent," see Appendix 1), which shall be filed with the head of the department in which the individual is employed. A separate "Notice of Intent" shall be filed for each such activity in which an employee proposes to engage. Unless there are exceptional circumstances, the "Notice of Intent" shall be filed not less than ten (10) calendar days before the date the proposed external professional activity for pay is to begin.

B. Approval of a "Notice of Intent" may be granted for a period not to exceed the balance of either 1) the fiscal year (in the case of 12-month employees and employees with contract service periods that include the summer session) or 2) the academic year (in the case of 9-month employees with no summer session contract period) remaining as of the date of approval; if the approved activity will continue beyond the end of the relevant fiscal or academic year in which it was begun, an additional "Notice of Intent" must be filed at least ten (10) days before engaging in such activity in the succeeding relevant year.

C. Except as set out in paragraph D below, the "Notice of Intent" shall be considered as follows: If, after a review of the "Notice of Intent" and consultation with the EPA employee, the department head (or appropriate administrator, see definition UNC Policy Manual, 300.2.2, Section I, Item F) determines that the proposed activity is not consistent with the policy statements of the institution or Board of Governors, the faculty or other professional staff member shall be notified of that determination within ten (10) calendar days of the date the "Notice of Intent" is filed. In the event of such notification by the department head, the EPA employee shall not proceed with the proposed activity but may appeal that decision to the administrative officer to whom the department chair reports, and then to the chancellor or the chancellor's designee (or, in the Office of the President, to the President). A decision on any such appeal shall be given to the EPA employee within ten (10) calendar days of the date on which the appeal is received. The decision of the chancellor (or of the President) shall be final. Appeals shall be made in writing.

D. If question 8, question 9a, or question 9b on the "Notice of Intent" is answered in the affirmative, the procedure set out in paragraph 3 above shall be modified as follows: The decision of the department head to approve the activity shall be reviewed promptly and approved or disapproved within ten (10) days of receipt by the administrative officer to whom the department head reports, and appeal of a disapproval by that officer shall be to the chancellor or the chancellor's designee (or, in the Office of the President, to the President).

E. Departmental summaries of all "Notices of Intent" filed and of actions taken in response to such "Notices of Intent" during the preceding fiscal year shall be submitted by department heads to the chancellor or the chancellor's designee (or, in the Office of the President, to the President) each July. On or before September 1 of each year, the UNC Office of the President, Office of Research and Sponsored Programs, will initiate the submission of annual summary reports from the chancellors to the President.

F. External professional activities for pay performed for another institution or agency of the State of North Carolina also must comply with State policies governing dual employment and compensation, unless an exception to those State policies is expressly authorized by the chancellor or the President.

G. In addition, senior academic and administrative officers may be subject to special regulations regarding honoraria. Please refer to the UNC Policy Manual, 300.2.2.2 [R].

H. University employees not complying with these procedures will be subject to disciplinary action.

II. Special Provision

These regulations shall not be required of EPA employees serving on academic year contracts, if the external professional activity for pay is wholly performed and completed outside of the academic year, provided that the activity does not conflict with the policy statements of the institution or Board of Governors and is not conducted concurrently with a contract service period for teaching, research, or other services to the institution during a summer session.

APPENDIX I

NOTICE OF INTENT TO ENGAGE IN EXTERNAL PROFESSIONAL ACTIVITIES FOR PAY

Date:_____

_____ (name) intends to engage in external professional activity for pay under the following conditions:

1. Name and address of contracting organization:

2. Nature of proposed activity:

3. Beginning date and anticipated duration of activity:

4. On average, how many hours per week will be devoted to this activity?

   a. For 12-month employees, for the anticipated duration of the activity, within the current fiscal year ending June 30:_____

   b. For 9-month employees, for each component part of the academic year, as applicable, within the current fiscal year ending June 30 (see above paragraph 2):

      (1) Second summer session (post July 1)_____

      (2) Fall semester_____

      (3) Spring semester_____

      (4) First summer session (pre July 1)_____

5. Total number of hours to be devoted to activity:_____

6. Identify any classes, meetings or other University duties that will be missed because of involvement in the proposed activity (respond separately for each applicable component part of the academic calendar if 9-month employee) and state what arrangements have been made to cover any such duties:

Duties Missed	Arrangements to Cover

7. Use of University resources in connection with proposed activity:

a. Will the activity entail the use of any University resources (see UNC Policy Manual, 300.2.2, Section I, Item G)?
( ) Yes ( ) No

b. If yes, describe what resources will be used.

8. To your knowledge, does the contracting organization above provide funding which directly supports any of your University duties or activities?
( ) Yes ( ) No

9. To be completed if the contracting organization is a private firm:

a. Do you or any member of your immediate family own an equity interest in the contracting organization?
( ) Yes ( ) No

b. Do you hold an office in the contracting organization?
( ) Yes ( ) No

10. Performance of the above described activity is consistent with the Board of Governors Policy on conflicts of interest and commitment and external professional activities (300.2.2).

Dear Colleagues:

We have received a few newsletter submissions, but would like to have more. If you have not sent an update on your recent professional activities, please do so by Monday, April 4. We would like to include information on faculty presentations, publications, grants/fellowship and new courses for the period from May 2010 to May 2011.
We are also in a need of a few photos from events and activities this year, including the Venezuela Study Abroad Program and the Department's 40th Anniversary Celebration. If you have any photos that you would not mind sharing with us, please let me know.

If you are a new faculty member, please send a short description of your research and teaching interests.

These materials should be emailed to Kenneth (krjanken@email.unc.edu) and me.

Thanks in advance!

Chapter Thirteen

African Americans and an Atlantic World Culture

Walter C. Rucker

Few topics have generated as much scholarly interest in the past decade as Atlantic World history. As a relatively new approach to regional history, the Atlantic World is geographically defined as the economic, political, social, and cultural connections forged between Africa, the Americas, and Europe beginning in the fifteenth century (Thornton 1992). In the assessment of Kristin Mann (2001: 13), this approach to history seeks "to consider the Atlantic basin as a single integrated unit of analysis." A ground swell of interest in this field has led to a number of recent developments. The Du Bois Institute dataset, which includes detailed information for close to 70 percent of all Atlantic slave voyages, is currently available on CD-ROM and is already producing a flood of scholarly reassessments. Slavery and Abolition, the William and Mary Quarterly, Contours and other refereed journals publish the latest research in Atlantic World and African Diaspora history. A dizzying number of articles, essay collections, and book-length monographs have appeared on the topic in just the last five years. In addition, a few university presses – Louisiana State, Indiana, South Carolina and Michigan State – have created special book series for works encompassing elements of Atlantic World history, while a growing number of research centers continue to expand scholarly understandings of this field.

The formation of the historical Atlantic World was no less dynamic than the creation of the corresponding field of study. The Iberian Reconquesta of the early to mid-fifteenth century led to a series of events that brought the Portuguese to the West African coast for the first time. In their search for Prester John – a mythical East African defender of Christianity – Portuguese navigators encountered powerful West African kingdoms with an expansive trade network, which linked West Africa to much of the known world. Massive quantities of gold and other commodities inspired the Portuguese to establish trading posts from Senegal to Angola in the years after 1482. This opening act in the establishment of the Atlantic World trade network set in motion the Atlantic slave trade, the formation of colonies in the western hemisphere, the economic decline of East African polities and the emergence of Portugal as a truly global power.

As a site of massive intercontinental migrations and trade networks, and also as a conceptual space, the Atlantic World is larger in scope and scale than the African Diaspora. While the African Diaspora is typically defined by the geographic regions that Africans were dispersed to as a result of the Atlantic slave trade – the Americas, and arguably Europe – by definition it excludes continental Africa and the Atlantic islands from historical analyses. Only recently has the concept of the Diaspora been expanded to encompass the dispersal of Africans across the Sahara to Arabia, and north and east Africa; indeed, it appears that a series of diasporas existed in Africa, which predated the arrival of Europeans and the growth of the Atlantic slave trade (Mann 2001).

In addition to its more significant geographic scope, the Atlantic World began close to a century before the creation of the African Diaspora. While obvious differences between these two approaches are evident, there is at least one area where scholars of the Atlantic World and the African Diaspora have seemingly forged a consensus. Researchers working in both fields have granted subject-positioning or agency to peoples of African decent. No longer are scholars contending that Africans were either victims, bystanders or objects of historical processes that shaped the world around them. From its very inception, the African Diaspora concept saw Africans as agents of history largely because, as Mann notes, "the idea of the African diaspora developed first among Africans and their descendants, a point not sufficiently recognized in most academic discussions of the subject" (Mann 2001: 3). The notion of viewing Africans as active historical agents has been slow in development among Atlantic World historians. In his analysis of the pioneering works in this field, John Thornton recounts that "the Atlantic still appeared [in the literature] largely from a European perspective . . . The Atlantic, it seems, unlike the Mediterranean, was regarded by all these researchers as being particularly dominated by Europeans" (Thornton 1992: 2).

This Eurocentric approach is epitomized in a number of works, including Pierre and Hugette Chaunu's nine-volume Séville et l'Atlantique, 1504–1650 (1955–60), James Duffy's Portuguese Africa (1961), Charles R. Boxer's The Dutch Seaborne Empire, 1600–1800 (1965), and Fernand Braudel's Civilization and Capitalism (1982–4). Working from the context of the post-colonial world, many of these scholars simply projected current realities and power relationships back through time. By the 1970s and 1980s however, concerted challenges to these views began to alter scholarly approaches to Atlantic World history.

In direct response to Eurocentric approaches, nationalist historians, dependency theorists, revisionists, neo-revisionists, post-modernists and advocates of world systems analysis filled the interpretive void. Some of these interpretations still emphasized the relatively passive role that Africans played in the formation of the Atlantic World. Borrowing from dependency theory developed largely by Latin Americanists, Walter Rodney (1974) contends in How Europe Underdeveloped Africa that colonial and neo-colonial economic links to Europe can be traced back to the era of the slave trade. Thus, in this view, Africans played a subordinate and relatively passive role to Europeans as early as the fifteenth century. Other scholars, including Eric Williams (1944), André Gunder Frank (1967), Immanuel Wallerstein (1974–80) and Chancellor Williams (1976), seemingly concur with this approach. While these studies were generally more sympathetic, emphasizing the victimization of Africans by repressive European powers, the results were the same as the scholarship generated by Eurocentric scholars: Africans were still denied agency and subject-positioning.

These denials of black agency were mirrored in scholarship that focused on North American slavery. During the early twentieth century, a scholarly consensus among American historians emerged to claim that the enslaved African was effectively a tabula rasa denuded of any African culture. Once exposed to the "superior" attributes of European and Euro-American culture, Africans – generally assumed to be primitive and savage – readily and willingly adopted European cultural norms and values. Again, these notions essentially denied African agency while emphasizing the sheer inability of Africans to resist this acculturative process. These ideas resonated in the works of scholars such as U. B. Phillips (1918), Kenneth Stampp (1956), Stanley Elkins (1959) and others. In addition, among folklorists and sociologists analyzing African American folk culture, a dominant paradigm emerged in the 1920s known as the "white-to-black" school of acculturation. This interpretive school held the opinion that Africans in North America borrowed so heavily from European and Euro-American culture that slave folklore was ultimately a syncretic matrix of butchered European values and beliefs. Addled by limited intellectual capacity and a barbaric past, Africans in this view were incapable of fully comprehending the complexities of European culture.

Neo-revisionists scholars like Thornton (1992), George Brooks (1993) and others published works detailing a number of elements related to the formation of the Atlantic World; importantly, these scholars approached the issue of African agency seriously. Even before these innovations, however, scholars like Carter G. Woodson (1936), Melville Herskovits (1941) and Lorenzo Dow Turner (1949) had given significant consideration to African agency in the creation of African American culture. Together, both sets of scholars demonstrated a continuum of activities that Africans and their descendants engaged in, including the formation of powerful kingdoms and cities in West Africa, the active role they played in the Atlantic trade network and their creation of Afro-Atlantic societies and cultures throughout the Americas. With this emphasis on African agency, the need to connect Diasporic communities with their homelands in Africa has become an increasing focus in recent scholarship.

The works of Sterling Stuckey (1987), Margaret Washington [Creel] (1988), Joseph Holloway (1990), Michael Gomez (1998), Sheila S. Walker (2001) and Linda Heywood (2002) have done a great deal to facilitate current understandings of important historical connections and cultural continuities. The maintenance of particular "Africanisms" – or discrete systems of African thought and belief – demonstrated to many that Africans were not simply uncultured bodies, which had to be assimilated or Europeanized in order to properly function. This view is epitomized in the work of Sterling Stuckey (1987) who provides strong evidence for the African influences on slave culture. The conditions that facilitated cultural retentions and continuities required resistance on the part of enslaved Africans, as well as a conscious set of decisions to maintain connections to the land of their ancestors. Stuckey (1987) posits a dynamic process by which Africans became a single people, laying the foundation for the development of a black nationalist/Pan-Africanist consciousness.

Another recent trend, highlighted in Paul Gilroy's The Black Atlantic (1993), recognizes African agency while focusing on cultural hybridity and amalgamation. In this post-modernist approach, Gilroy forwards a "black Atlantic" culture that is not African, American, Caribbean or European, but a syncretic blending or hybrid of all of these national and ethnic identities. Black Atlantic culture, then, is a polyglot, which transcends "race," ethnicity and nation; according to Gilroy, this cultural concept belongs to no one set of localities in Africa (Gilroy 1993). Instead he emphasizes the transnational and intercultural nature of identity, focusing almost exclusively on contemporary Anglo-America. Hence, Gilroy tends to place a greater emphasis on cultural discontinuities and disconnections. This approach is not without its problems. As Mann notes, Gilroy "ignores both the rich and dense world of the predominantly Lusophonic and Spanish South Atlantic and the roots of the transnational, intercultural black perspective in the pre-modern era" (Mann 2001: 15).

Geography and Culture in Atlantic West and West-central Africa

Anthropologist Melville Herskovits published The Myth of the Negro Past (1941), which at the time was a watershed effort on the topic of African cultural transmissions and continuities. In an attempt to undermine race prejudice in America, his work sought to counter a number of myths about Africa, and about Africans residing in all parts of the Diaspora. By demonstrating tangible cultural links between Africa and Diasporic communities, Herskovits took full aim at the myth that "The Negro is thus a man without a past" (Herskovits 1941: 2). Other myths he addressed in this work included the idea that Africans were brought to America from extremely diverse cultures and were distributed in a fashion that destroyed their cultural identity, and the idea that African cultures were so savage and unredeeming that European customs were readily preferred by enslaved Africans.

In answering these flawed perceptions, he posits what seems to be a problematic homogeneous and monolithic West African cultural heritage. Indeed, Herskovits does not give much consideration to West-central Africa, making passing references to the "Congo" in his analysis of African cultural influences. Most problematic are certain assumptions, guided no doubt by his disciplinary focus, that assume an unchanging African cultural past. Despite these shortcomings, the lasting importance of his research is in noting several examples of Africanisms in both the secular and sacred ethos of African Americans. Herskovits' argument was not a claim that African Americans were Africans culturally, but that "this group, like all other folk who maintained a group identity in this country, have retained something of their cultural heritage, while at the same time accommodating themselves . . . to the customs of the country as a whole" (Herskovits 1941: 145). This research, and subsequent studies by other scholars, helped put to rest various myths and forwarded the idea that "African American" culture was something rich, unique, and worthy of serious and significant scholarly contemplation.

When Sidney Mintz and Richard Price (1976) published The Birth of African-American Culture, it was intended to critique and revise Herskovits' 1941 findings. They argued that Africans who were transported across the Atlantic to become slaves in the Americas developed and created a culture that cannot be characterized simply as "African." Essentially, the very nature of the slave trade and enslavement in the Americas made the continuity of African culture nearly impossible. To further this claim, they state that, "[h]erded together with others with whom they shared a common condition of servitude and some degree of cultural overlap, enslaved Africans were compelled to create a new language, a new religion, indeed a new culture" (Mintz and Price 1976: xi). While African culture may have been crucial in the creation of African American culture, Mintz and Price contend that it was by no means central and not independent of European influences or new cultural developments in the Americas.

This conclusion finds resonance in the claims made by Gilroy (1993), who asserts that black Atlantic culture, itself a "counterculture" of modernity, is not part of a Manichean dichotomy situated between monolithic "black" and "white" cultures. Instead, like Mintz and Price, Gilroy emphasizes the creole, hybrid, and fluid nature of black Atlantic culture; as a combination of European and African cultures, African American culture was a new creation and can be best understood, according to Gilroy, using W. E. B. Du Bois' concept of double consciousness. As Du Bois articulates it, "One ever feels his twoness, – an American, a Negro; two souls, two thoughts, two unreconciled strivings; two warring ideals in one dark body whose dogged strength alone keep it from being torn asunder" (Du Bois 1903: 45). This duality encapsulates the nature of African American culture for Gilroy, Mintz, and Price.

In terms of Herskovits' interpretations, Mintz and Price oppose his theory of West African cultural homogeneity by noting the sheer amount of cultural diversity in Atlantic Africa and by asserting that a number of enslaved Africans exported to the Americas came from West-central Africa (Mintz and Price 1976). They also oppose the notion that specific African cultural enclaves formed in the Americas. Instead, Mintz and Price claim that deliberate ethnic "randomization" – actively engaged in by slave traders, ship captains, and slave owners – ensured diverse populations of enslaved Africans throughout the Americas. Most of their conclusions are based on the same premise – the vastly numerous and diverse cultural heritages of West and West-central Africa. While there is little doubt that major cultural differences indeed existed in Atlantic Africa, what can be contested is the degree of this diversity.

On one end of the debate, Herskovits (1941) and Joseph Holloway (1990) support ideas of cultural homogeneity. Holloway, in his introduction to Africanisms in American Culture (1990), asserts that since most North American slaves originated from West-central Africa, the idea of a monolithic Bantu cultural heritage and its links to the birth of African American cultures would be quite applicable. Although there might be flaws with this sort of approach, the idea of a monolithic Bantu culture or its significant contribution to African American culture finds support in the works of a number of scholars (Vansina 1990; Vass 1979; Thompson 1983). On the other end of the spectrum, Mintz and Price likely exaggerate the amount of diversity by using African languages as a tool of measurement. The truth probably lies between the two extremes and ample evidence for this conclusion can be found in recent scholarship.

John Thornton (1992), in Africa and Africans in the Making of the Atlantic World, demonstrates that ethnographers have tended to overestimate the amount of cultural diversity in Atlantic Africa – an area encompassing the coastal regions from Senegambia in the north to Angola in the south – because they often ascribe an ethnic identity to every distinct language and regional dialect. The problem with this is the fact that many Atlantic Africans were multilingual, and certain languages and regional dialects were so related that they could be mutually understood throughout vast areas. Thornton concludes that, instead of Atlantic Africa being composed of hundreds of cultural groupings, the region should instead be divided into three cultural zones and further separated into seven "subzones": Upper Guinea, which included the Mande language family and two variants of the West Atlantic language family (northern and southern West Atlantic); Lower Guinea, which included two variants of the Kwa language family (Akan and Aja); and the Angola zone, which included two variants of the western Bantu language family (Kikongo and Kimbundu).

Another issue of major importance in Thornton's assessment is the claim that European traders, slave-ship captains and plantation owners engaged in active and conscious efforts to ethnically randomize enslaved Africans. If practiced, this measure could effectively have undermined the ability of enslaved Africans to foment rebellion on slave ships or plantations in the Americas, since they would not have an effective means of communication or collaboration. According to Thornton (1992) however, cultural randomization was not a significant aspect of the slave trade. In sociological terminology, he contends that the enslaved Africans on the average transport ship were indeed a group as opposed to an aggregate. In other words, most enslaved Africans on European slave ships had some prior connection to each other and were likely enslaved at the same time from the same geographic region. In addition, he states, "[s]lave ships drew their entire cargo from only one or perhaps two ports in Africa and unloaded them in large lots of as many as 200–1,000 in their new Atlantic homes" (Thornton 1992: 192). Shuffling and randomizing slaves was simply not feasible. While doing so made perfect logic, achieving the goal of cultural randomization could result in longer stays on board ships by enslaved Africans and this would invariably lead to increased mortality rates. Tracing the slave trade from the sixteenth through the early eighteenth century, Thornton concludes that "there were limits on the ability to achieve a random linguistic distribution of slaves, and what this meant was that most slaves on any sizable estate were probably from only a few national groupings" (Thornton 1992: 196).

Michael Gomez (1998), in Exchanging Our Country Marks, expands on Thornton's conclusion by claiming that significant African cultural enclaves developed in the Americas as a result of a number of factors. One of these factors would be the lack of cultural diversity in Atlantic West and West-central Africa; again, the conclusion of Mintz and Price (1976) – that hundreds of distinct cultures existed in Atlantic Africa – has stood neither the test of time nor intense scholarly inquiry. While Thornton contends that Atlantic Africa could be divided into three culturally distinct zones and seven subzones, Gomez shows that in fact there were roughly six cultural zones in this region, with a number of subzones in each: Senegambia, Sierra Leone, the Gold Coast, the Bight of Benin, the Bight of Biafra and West-central Africa. In addition, Africans from certain regions shared cultural affinities, which facilitated the process of hybridization between African groups. Even if randomization was attempted on North American plantations, Gomez contends that this only facilitated the creation of a group consciousness, a group identity and collaborative resistance efforts: "Africans of varying ethnicities, who had never considered their blackness a source of reflection let alone a principle of unity, became cognizant of this feature perhaps for the first time in their lives" (Gomez 1998: 165). This idea finds resonance in the pioneering work of Sterling Stuckey who states in Slave Culture that "slave ships were the first real incubators of slave unity across cultural lines, cruelly revealing irreducible links . . . , fostering resistance thousands of miles before the shores of the new land appeared on the horizon" (Stuckey 1987: 3).

While they still clung to their ethnic identities, enslaved Africans began to shape a new set of cultures in the Americas. These new cultures were not simply a hybrid of "European" and "African" cultural milieus as a number of scholars contend. Instead, Gomez makes a convincing claim that the first step towards the birth of an African American culture was intra-African cultural syncretism or, in his words, the formation of an "African sociocultural matrix" (Gomez 1998: 5). This notion even serves as the guiding intelligence for the structure of Exchanging Our Country Marks. Gomez, for example, discusses the cultural links between Africans from Senegambia and Benin, Sierra Leone, and the Gold Coast (the Akan), the Bight of Biafra (the Igbo) and West-central Africa in separate chapters of this important work. He concludes by noting that "[t]he development of African American society through 1830 was very much the product of contributions made by specific ethnic groups . . . varying mixes of ethnicities in each colony/state resulted in communities and cultural forms that were distinctive though related" (Gomez 1998: 291).

With recent efforts to demonstrate that Atlantic Africans were multilingual and separated into just a handful of culturally distinct zones, reassessments of the nature of African American culture have become increasingly frequent (Berlin 1996; Gomez 1998; Morgan 1998; Walker 2001; Heywood 2002). While the work of Sterling Stuckey (1987) has been pivotal in the contemporary scholarship about the formation of African American culture, only at the start of the twenty-first century have Africanists begun to corroborate his findings. Recent trends, however, have moved away from generalizations about "African" cultural continuities, to emphasizing instead the contributions that specific African ethnic groups (such as Igbo, Yoruba, Fon, Mande and the like) made to African American culture.

In creating an accurate depiction of cultural diversity in Atlantic Africa, using the separate discussions of cultural zones by Thornton (1992) and Gomez (1998) becomes instructive. As Thornton contends, "Africans brought with them a cultural heritage in language, aesthetics, and philosophy that helped to form the newly developing cultures of the Atlantic world" (Thornton 1992: 129). With this being the case, a clear depiction of the cultural geography of Atlantic Africa is necessary. The first of these cultural zones, Upper Guinea, was one of the more ethnically diverse regions in Atlantic Africa. In geographic terms, this area reached from the Senegal River in the north to the region near Cape Mount in modern Liberia and included two important slave-trading regions – Senegambia and Sierra Leone. Culturally, Sengambia was home to a number of ethnic groups representing both the West Atlantic and Mande language families, including the Bambara, the Malinke (Mande-speakers), the Sereer, the Soninke, the Wolof, and the Fulbe. The various ethnonyms used by Europeans to describe Africans from this region – Mandingo, Gambian and Senegambian – were employed to designate people who were primarily from the Bambara linguistic group. The Bambara likely represented the largest population of enslaved Upper Guinean Africans imported to the Americas, but other groups from Senegambia were important in the creation of African American culture (Thornton 1992; Rodney 1969; Gomez 1998; Curtin 1969; Hall 1992). As Gomez recounts, "the Senegambian contingent was both early and substantial. In fact, it can be argued that the Senegambian presence provided a significant portion of the foundation for the consequent African American population" (Gomez 1998: 38–9).

Sierra Leone, a region of Upper Guinea extending from the Casamance River in the north to Cape Mount in the south, was even more heterogeneous than Senegambia. While Gomez contends that the people of Sierra Leone "did not see themselves as ethnicities during the slave trade [and] a number of groups had indeed developed a shared identity," certain cultural patterns can be discerned (Gomez 1998: 89). Among the many ethnicities and other "collective groupings" were the Mande-speakers – the Mandinka, the Susu, the Gola, the Kissi, the Jallonke, the Vai, and the Kono – and the non-Mande West Atlantic language groups, including the Temne, the Landuma, the Bulom, and the Krim (Thornton 1992; Gomez 1998; Curtin 1969). The sheer amount of cultural diversity in this region was balanced by the fact that the forms of Mande spoken in Sierra Leone "were almost mutually intelligible, at least in the seventeenth century" (Thornton 1992: 187). Even the non-Mande groups in Sierra Leone spoke "closely related languages" (Gomez 1998: 88), a concept which finds corroboration in Thornton (1992), who emphasizes the amount of multilingualism and cultural sharing that occurred as a consequence of numerous commercial networks and political interconnections.

The second major cultural zone, Lower Guinea, stretched from modern Ivory Coast in the west to Cameroon in the east and represented the largest geographic region of the three major cultural zones in Atlantic Africa. This area encompassed the regions that Europeans referred to as the Ivory Coast, the Windward Coast, the Gold Coast and the Slave Coast. Despite its geographic scale, Lower Guinea was much more culturally homogeneous than Upper Guinea and included only one major language family – Kwa. While this region was relatively less culturally diverse, the Kwa language family had two vastly different branches – Western Kwa (Akan, Ewe and Ga) and Eastern Kwa (Yoruba, Fon, Edo, and Igbo). Dominating the eastern portion of Lower Guinea and the region generally known as the Gold Coast, the Akan language subgroup included Baule-speakers in the eastern Ivory Coast (the Sefwi and the Ahanta) and Twi-speakers in the region coterminous with modern-day Ghana (the Asante, the Fante and the Bron). Due to the large number of Akan-speakers leaving Fort Kormantse along the Gold Coast, they became known by the false ethnonym "Cormantee" or "Kromantin" throughout the Americas and were highly prized captives by a number of European slave traders (Thornton 1992; Gomez 1998; Curtin 1969).

Among the most significant Eastern Kwa subgroups were the Fon, the Yoruba, the Edo, and the Igbo (Thornton 1992; Gomez 1998; Curtin 1969). In the case of the Yoruba and the Igbo, Gomez (1998) and Northrup (2000) demonstrate that these ethnic and national terms were more applicable in the American context than in pre-colonial Atlantic Africa. Yoruba, for example, was a term of possible Hausa origin and referred to the people living in the town of Oyo Ile. As Gomez contends, "[t]he Yoruba emerged as a 'nation' not only in North America but also in the West Indies and Brazil" (Gomez 1998: 55). While the Yoruba were a very real group in the Americas, this ethnolinguistic identity emerged only recently in Africa and as a direct result of British colonial administration in Nigeria. Likewise, the "Igbo" did not exist as a distinct ethnicity in Atlantic Africa until they were "created" in the twentieth century (Northrup 2000: 1–2). Simply put, "twentieth-century colonial forces and post-colonial politics fostered solidarity among the millions of Yoruba- and Igbo-speaking peoples that had no pre-colonial counterpart" (ibid: 1). Like a number of ethnonyms used by Europeans during the slave trade era, Calabar, Moko, and Igbo were imprecise and, at times, overlapping identities that Africans in this region did not create or embrace. However, "Igbo was a name Igbo-speaking people seem to have readily accepted abroad" (ibid: 13).

The Fon of Dahomey and the Edo of Benin were relatively stable ethnolinguistic groups centered around strong and expansive states in Lower Guinea (Thornton 1992; Gomez 1998; Curtin 1969; Wax 1973). The Bight of Benin, stretching from the Volta to the Benin River, was culturally more diverse than Thornton (1992) contends, but the spreading political influence and domination of the kingdoms of Dahomey and Benin along this region of the coast led to an impressive amount of cultural diffusion and integration. Gomez claims that this cultural sharing was caused by a large number of factors, including "wars, raids, demographic shifts, displacements, diplomatic missions, and trade" (Gomez 1998: 56). Thus, by the mid-seventeenth century, the use of commercial and political lingua francas as well as shared religious beliefs in the Bight of Benin proved that "African populations succeeded in borrowing aspects of each other's culture" (ibid: 56).

The third major cultural zone was the Angola coast in West-central Africa. The home of roughly 40 percent of all Africans transported to the Americas as a result of the slave trade, this region was the most significant of the three cultural zones. Importantly, this was one of the most homogenous regions in Atlantic Africa – though there were more than just two language groups (Kikongo and Mbundu) in Angola, as Thornton (1992) claims. Most Africans living in Angola spoke a variant of Bantu (Kikongo, Duala, Bakweri, Isubu, Bassa-Bakoko, Yambassa, Bafia, Ewondo, Bene, and Bulu). Other language groups in this region included semi-Bantu (Bamilike, Banyang and Tikar), Aka, Fulbe, and Podoko. Gomez contends that "[t]hose slaves who found themselves bound for the Western Hemisphere mostly came from Bantu and semi-Bantu populations organized politically into smaller units" (Gomez 1998: 134). It was primarily in the area of politics that the Angola region was diverse, with the proliferation of a number of smaller states. The two larger polities in the Angola coast – the Kikongo state of Kongo and the Mbundu state of Ndongo – because of their size and expansive scope were significant factors in forging a sense of cultural unity in the region by the mid-seventeenth century, though the latter was defeated by Portuguese forces in 1671 (Thornton 1992; Gomez 1998; Curtin 1969; Wax 1973).

The Atlantic Slave Trade and the Birth of African American Culture

Cramped into the numerous factories and slave castles dotting the Atlantic coast of Africa, enslaved Africans awaited the arrival of European-owned slave ships to transport them to the Americas. This second leg of the triangular trade connecting Europe, Africa, and the Americas, known as the Middle Passage, was one of the most terrifying experiences in human history. In the midst of this tragic story, Stuckey (1987) contends that the slave ships crossing the Atlantic were crucibles that helped forge a single people out of numerous African ethnicities. This was an ongoing process, beginning with the enslavement experience in Atlantic Africa and continuing in certain regions of the Americas well into the nineteenth century. Both Gomez (1998) and Douglas Chambers demonstrate that, throughout the Americas, enslaved Africans "identified themselves, or were so identified by others, as members of African-derived named groups" (Chambers 2001: 25). They readily identified themselves as members of separate "nations" initially, until a more unified identity was forged as a result of the common circumstances and conditions of enslavement.

The initial sense of national identity was facilitated by the formation of large ethnic enclaves, which were direct results of import patterns in the Atlantic slave trade. As Daniel Littlefield (1991) notes, European planters developed a number of ethnic preferences based on perceptions of traits that certain enslaved African groups supposedly had. He contends that "European colonists concerned themselves quite closely with distinctions among African peoples, and paid great attention to such things as size, color, and cultural or other characteristics" (Littlefield 1991: 8). Thus, Europeans created alternating hierarchies of ethnic and regional preferences, which were employed and gave some shape to import patterns in locales throughout the Americas. In colonies like Jamaica, Barbados, and South Carolina, Gold Coast Africans were coveted by some planters for their alleged propensity for loyalty and hard work; in other colonies, or even among other planters in colonies that seemingly coveted Gold Coast Africans, these slaves were considered unruly and rebellious. Igbos, and others from Calabar or the Bight of Biafra, were reviled because of an alleged propensity for suicide. Angolans were supposedly paradoxically prone to docility and flight (Littlefield 1991; Gomez 1998; Wax 1973).

European preferences for certain African ethnic groups were likely due to a range of factors – the cost of importing enslaved Africans from certain regions, limited access to certain slave markets on the Atlantic African coast, or the demand for Africans from specific regions with expertise in the cultivation of certain crops and other skills (Littlefield 1991; Gomez 1998; Washington [Creel], 1988; Carney 2001). Certainly among slave traders and plantation owners, there was no clear consensus on the behavioral characteristics of any African group. This reflects what seems obvious from the vantage point of hindsight: the reason why African groups do not fit into generalized behavioral categories is because, like the rest of humanity, Africans can and will display a broad spectrum of behavior. Whether real or imaginary, these perceptions of African behavioral characteristics did contribute to the formation of ethnic enclave communities in North America as well as elsewhere.

The Du Bois Institute database bears out this conclusion. This important project significantly modified the findings of Philip Curtin (1969) and provides a more accurate picture of the slave trade. The Du Bois database, for example, demonstrates that of 101,925 enslaved Africans from identifiable locations sent to Virginia, 44.8 percent came from the Bight of Biafra. In South Carolina, enslaved Africans from the Bight of Biafra accounted for just 9.89 percent of identifiable imports; in the US as a whole, Bight of Biafra exports were 18.6 percent of the 317,748 enslaved Africans recorded in the Du Bois database (Eltis et al. 1999). So it is possible to discuss a Bight of Biafra (Igbo) enclave in Virginia as a phenomenon unique in North America. Not only does this database corroborate many of the findings of Stuckey (1987), Gomez (1998), Washington [Creel] (1988) and others, but it opens new possibilities in the study of the formation of African American culture.

Although the nature of African ethnic enclaves varied over time, it is now possible to pinpoint the nature of these concentrations and track specific cultural influences. Between 1701 and 1800, 26.4 percent of enslaved Africans from identifiable regions and embarking on ships to the Carolinas came from West-central Africa. The 1739 Stono Revolt, initiated principally by enslaved Angolans from West-central Africa, forced the proprietors and slave owners of South Carolina to reduce their reliance on Africans from this region. Also, due to the emphasis on rice cultivation in the South Carolina Lowcountry and sea islands, Africans from rice-producing regions of Upper Guinea – Senegambia (24.9 percent) and Sierra Leone (9.48 percent) respectively – became important demographic factors and largely replaced the earlier West-central African import stream. These three cultural contingents played active roles in the formation Gullah and Geechee culture.

Elements of the West-central African, Senegambian, and Biafran (11.3 percent) contingents of South Carolina's slave population apparently created an alliance in 1822, under the leadership of Denmark Vesey, in an attempt to foment a rebellion. While the details of this conspiracy are currently in dispute, it is clear that separate bands of Gullahs, Igbos, Mande-speakers, French-speaking Santo Dominguans and American-born slaves had formed and found between them areas of commonality. In some ways, this could have been an early expression of Pan-Africanism (Eltis et al. 1999; Gomez 1998; Washington [Creel], 1988; Carney 2001; Stuckey 1987; Brown 2002; Littlefield 1981; Wood 1974; Thornton 1991; Vass 1979; Rucker 2001a; Johnson 2001; Starobin 1970).

Between 1701 and 1800, 45.1 percent of Africans entering Virginia from identifiable regions were embarked on ships leaving ports in the Bight of Biafra. Thus, Virginia imported a disproportionately large number of Igbo-speakers and others from Calabar and surrounding regions. As Lorena Walsh (1997) and James Sidbury (1997) contend, this emphasis on Igbo imports played a significant factor in the rise of Afro-Virginian culture. One cultural implication of the presence of so many Igbo-speakers was the proliferation of Igbo terms and concepts – okra, buckra, obia – or discrete Igbo cultural practices (for example, the Jonkonu celebration, funerary customs and spiritual beliefs) in Jamaica, Virginia, and other regions of the Anglophone Americas that imported significant numbers of Africans from the Bight of Biafra. Another implication, discussed by Sidbury (1997), was the possibility that Gabriel Prosser – leader of a failed Richmond slave revolt in 1800 – was accorded a great deal of respect and veneration because of his blacksmithing skills and the spiritual powers associated with this trade among the peoples living near the Niger River delta. In fact, three separate blacksmiths were claimed to have been part of the leadership core of this attempt to capture and raze the capital of Virginia (Walsh 2001; Walsh 1997; Sidbury 1997; Chambers 1997; Stuckey 1999; Gomez 1998).

Information regarding imports into areas like North Carolina, Georgia, Maryland, the Middle Colonies (with the exception of New York) and the New England colonies is scanty at best and scholars can only detail the slave trade in these regions through inference and suggestive evidence. As the principal port of entry for enslaved Africans, Charleston satisfied most of the demand for forced labor in North Carolina and Georgia. The result of this commercial connection meant that both colonies/states likely had similar demographic patterns and ethnic enclaves to those found in South Carolina (Gomez 1998). Maryland imported a large number of Africans from Senegambia (49.4 percent) and did not mirror the reliance on imports from the Bight of Biafra found in its Chesapeake neighbor, Virginia (Eltis et al. 1999). For the remainder of the slaveholding regions of North America, Gomez notes that "states such as Alabama, Mississippi, Kentucky, Tennessee, and North Carolina all boasted significant slave populations, derivative, in turn, of the five core colonies/states: Virginia, Maryland, South Carolina, Georgia, and Louisiana" (Gomez 1998: 24).

While there has been a major problem in tracking African imports into certain regions, the Du Bois Institute database and other sources reveal much about imports in colonial New York and Louisiana. The Dutch colony of New Netherland – which became New York after 1664 – witnessed two different waves of African immigrants. The first, lasting for the initial few decades of Dutch rule, was dominated by the importation of West-central Africans. The second wave focused on Africans from the Gold Coast. Combined, these contingents may have contributed to such cultural formations as the Pinkster festivals, the "Congo" dances in Albany and specific funerary practices associated with the African Burial Ground in New York City (for example, carved symbols on coffins, the use of burial shrouds and interment with earthware, beads, and other objects). A definite Gold Coast presence is noted in both the 1712 New York City revolt and the alleged conspiracy of 1741: in both instances, enslaved Africans with Akan day-names predominated among the leadership core (Thornton 1998; Boxer 1965; Postma 1990; Goodfriend 1992; Stuckey 1994; Stuckey 1999; Foote 2001; Blakey 1998; Rucker 2001b).

Although Louisiana shifted from French to Spanish, and finally to American control after 1803, the demographics of the slave trade are relatively easy to trace. The principal import groups into Louisiana were Africans from Senegambia, the Bight of Benin and West-central Africa. As the most numerically significant African group in Louisiana, the Congolese and other West-central Africans contributed to expressive culture (such as dance contests in New Orleans' Congo Square and baton twirling), cuisine (for example, gumbo and jumbalaya) and even body gestures or poses (among them, arms akimbo with both hands on the hips) in Louisiana. The significant African contingent from the Bight of Benin, as well as enslaved Santo Dominguans arriving in New Orleans in the wake of the 1791 revolution, brought with them spiritual beliefs that became Voodoo and Hoodoo in Louisiana. The Voodoo/Hoodoo complex is a syncretic blend of Fon and Yoruba metaphysical and religious concepts and, in Louisiana, it likely incorporated Catholic icons and elements from West-central African and Senegambian belief systems (Mulira 1991; Thompson 1991; Caron 1997; Gomez 1998; Hall 1992).

During her reign as Voodoo Queen in New Orleans from 1830 to 1869, Marie Laveau routinely evoked the names of Fon and Yoruba deities – Legba and Damballa – in her ritual ceremonies (Gomez 1998; Mulira 1991). Finally, according to Gwendolyn Midlo Hall, "African religious beliefs, including knowledge of herbs, poisons, and the creation of charms and amulets of support or power, came to Louisiana with the earliest contingent of slaves" (Hall 1992: 162). The Bambara from Senegambia played an important role in these areas. While the term "Bambara" has a number of meanings and ethnic connotations, in the context of Louisiana it referred specifically to non-Muslim Africans from Senegambia who were captured in jihads and sold to European merchants. However defined, this group significantly influenced the nature of slave culture in Louisiana. For example, zinzin – the word for an amulet of power in Louisiana Creole – has the same meaning and name in Bambara. Gris-gris and wanga were other Bambara or Mande words for charms referred to in colonial and antebellum Louisiana. Even the Arabic-derived Mande word for spiritual advisor or teacher – marabout – appears in the records of colonial Louisiana (Hall 1992; Gomez 1998; Caron 1997).

Based on the reality of ethnic enclaves and the information regarding the pattern and structure of the Atlantic slave trade revealed by the Du Bois Institute database, Douglas Chambers notes that "the evidence is mounting that the transatlantic slave-trade was much more patterned and much less random (and randomizing) than previously had been simply assumed, thereby resulting in a greater likelihood of historical influences of groups of Africans in the formation . . . of particular cultural patterns in the Americas" (Chambers 2002: 101). The fact is that randomization was not feasible on either side of the Atlantic and patterns of ethnic concentration that emerged in the Caribbean and South America also emerged in North American colonies/states (Gomez 1998; Chambers 2001 and 2002).

In spite of this mounting evidence however, a number of scholars remain skeptical about the close cultural connections between Africa and the Americas. Among the many critics of the notion of cultural continuities is Philip D. Morgan. In seeming agreement with the interpretations of Paul Gilroy, Mechal Sobel, Ira Berlin, Michael Mullin, Sidney Mintz, and Richard Price, he forwards the notion of ethnic randomization – on both sides of the Atlantic – which, in turn, served as a facilitating factor for creolization and acculturation (Morgan 1997; Morgan 1998; Gilroy 1993; Sobel 1987; Mintz and Price 1976; Berlin 1996; Mullin 1994). Using the preliminary results of the Du Bois Institute database, Morgan finds in "much of the Caribbean and North America . . . the absence of a dominant single African provenance zone" (Morgan 1997: 125). He further claims that "contrary to one interpretation, North American plantation slaves generally could not practice 'African religion,' nor did they appropriate only those values that could be absorbed into their 'Africanity.' This is to make excessive claims for the autonomy of slaves and the primacy of their African background" (Morgan 1998: 657).

A spectrum of opinions on the issue of African cultural retention and continuities has emerged among historians and other scholars of the Atlantic World experience. On one end of this spectrum would be the "annihilationist" school epitomized in the work of Jon Butler (1990), who argues that Africans in North America suffered a "spiritual holocaust" between 1680 and 1760, which facilitated their immersion into Euro-American Christianity. This idea – that Africans were stripped of their culture – resonates in the earlier approaches of Phillips (1918), Stampp (1956), Elkins (1959), and E. Franklin Frazier (1964). On the other end of the spectrum would be the work of the "Africanist" school, which includes Herskovits (1941), Stuckey (1987), and Gomez (1998). This school emphasizes direct African cultural influences and the presence of important Africanisms in African American culture.

The interpretive middle ground between the annihilationists and the Africanists, what can be referred to as the "creolization" school, is epitomized in the work of Morgan (1998), Mullin (1994), and Gilroy (1993). Although they largely agree that certain African cultural elements persisted in the Americas, these scholars place more emphasis on cultural hybridity, heterogeneity, and fluidity. While a consensus may never be forged on these important issues, Mann offers a useful and constructive model for future studies of Atlantic World culture. She contends that scholars will need to:

> represent the African diaspora beyond simple oppositions, unitary models and static constructions to more varied, complex and fluid accounts that come close to capturing the unfolding experiences of Africans and their descendants throughout the Atlantic world. At the same time, they will challenge us to rewrite Atlantic history and rethink Atlantic culture. (Mann 2001: 16)

What is quite clear is that research on the birth of African American culture has advanced dramatically over the past sixty years and new developments in this area will continue to demonstrate the high level of interconnectedness existing between Atlantic Africa and the Diaspora of peoples created by the slave trade.

"I WILL GATHER ALL NATIONS": RESISTANCE, CULTURE, AND PAN-AFRICAN COLLABORATION IN DENMARK VESEY'S SOUTH CAROLINA

By
Walter C. Rucker*

From U.B. Phillips' contention that Africans were "inertly obeying minds and muscles" to the pioneering work of Herbert Aptheker, the historiographical discourse on American slave resistance has undergone a dramatic paradigm shift over the past century.[1] Despite considerable opposition to both his political affiliations and his theoretical approach, Aptheker successfully created the foundation from which future studies of slave resistance would begin. Writing in the 1940s, Aptheker built upon the works of such black scholars as W.E.B. DuBois and Carter G. Woodson by arguing that Africans never accepted their collective conditions under slavery and this sentiment was occasionally expressed in the form of insurrection and other types of resistance. He points to over two hundred and fifty alleged rebellions and conspiracies as evidence of the widespread nature of slave discontent.[2]

To Aptheker, the root cause of slave revolts was slavery, a conclusion which undermines any romantic perception of plantation life. He also viewed slave resistance as a necessary and natural phenomenon; in essence, it was a human response to inhumane conditions. In the "Preface" to his 1969 edition of American Negro Slave Revolts, Aptheker claims that "Humans, no matter of what color, being humans (sic) have rebelled when their treatment was bestial and when opportunity and capacity for rebellion was present." A similar sentiment is voiced by Kenneth Stampp in his 1956 work entitled The Peculiar Institution. In this sustained rebuttal of Phillips, Stampp states that "I have assumed that the slaves were merely ordinary human beings, that innately Negroes are, after all, only white men with black skins, nothing more, nothing less."[3]

These statements, while well intentioned, can obscure as much as they reveal. Though it can be maintained that resistance is indeed a human reaction, this notion may not fully reflect the nuanced and multi-faceted realities evident in the African Diaspora. Slaves were human beings as well as Africans from specific socio-political contexts and cultural backgrounds. While the conclusion that resistance is a human response might be true on the most rudimentary level, it would only seem logical that the types of resistance engaged in by slaves were largely determined and shaped by their African past.

Historians Stanley Elkins, Richard Dunn, and Albert Raboteau have all argued that African "tribalism" and cultural diversity contributed heavily to undermining the possibilities of slave collaboration and resistance. Dunn epitomizes this by noting that both linguistic barriers and tribal rivalries "hindered these blacks, once enslaved, from combining against their masters." Additionally, Raboteau claims that "[t]ribal and linguistic groups were broken up, either on the coasts of Africa or in the slave pens across the Atlantic. . . . In the New World slave control was based on the eradication of all forms of African culture because of their power to unify slaves and thus enable them to resist or rebel."[4] The essential argument being made by these scholars is that the very nature of the transplanted African cultures in the Americas, in this case the assumed unbridgeable diversity between African groups, was an obstacle to organized slave resistance. The contention made in this current study is quite the opposite, however. This study will demonstrate that African culture and Pan-African connections brought together enslaved Africans, from various backgrounds, and facilitated resistance during Denmark Vesey's 1822 conspiracy.

The Charleston Plot and Subsequent Trials

Serving in its principal role as the main entry for many Georgia, South Carolina, and North Carolina slaves, the city of Charleston was a key commercial center in the Atlantic commercial network during the era of the slave trade. Daily auctions of African and American born slaves held on Vendue Range Street, near the aptly named Exchange building, were so common that by 1790 the city of Charleston began to assume a distinctly African flavor. Its 16,341 total residents made Charleston the fourth largest urban region in North America at the time of the first federal census in 1790. Of that total number, more than half were free and enslaved blacks, giving the city the highest concentration of Africans and their descendants in urban North America. Rice, indigo, and both sea-island and short-staple cotton cultivation fueled Charleston's booming export market, but it was the trade in black flesh which made the enormous profits possible. By the first two decades of the nineteenth century, Charleston—the commercial capital of the South—stood on the brink of a new millennium with both unlimited economic opportunities as well as the ever present fear, and real possibility, of servile revolt.[5]

On May 25, 1822 a slave conspiracy in Charleston was uncovered which sent shock waves throughout the slaveholding South. After being implicated in the plot by a house servant, three slaves—William Paul, Mingo Harth, and Peter Poyas—were arrested by city authorities on May 31. Due to the fact that they maintained their composure, both Mingo Harth and Peter Poyas were released the same day after questioning. William Paul, however, remained in custody as late as June 8. Fearing what he believed to be his imminent execution at the gallows, William made additional revelations about the plot. He claimed in his confession to have been aware of the conspiracy for some time and "that it was very extensive, embracing an indiscriminate massacre of the whites, and that the blacks were to be headed by an individual, who carried about him a charm which rendered him invulnerable." This testimony would be the first hint of the central role that African cultural factors played in the formation of the planned rebellion.[6]

Even after this initial admission, it was not until June 14 that the information provided by William was confirmed by Charleston city officials. On that date, Major John Wilson—commander of a local militia company—visited Charleston city Intendant James Hamilton and presented him with additional proof of the existence of a large-scale slave conspiracy. His wife's slave, George, told Major Wilson that a "public disturbance was contemplated by the blacks . . . the succeeding Sunday, the 16th, at twelve o'clock at night, was the period fixed for the rising, which, if not prevented, would inevitably occur at that hour."[7] George voluntarily served as a spy and the intelligence he relayed to his master was particularly damaging for the conspirators' plans. This information also became a useful means for the politically ambitious Major Wilson to discredit his chief rival Thomas Bennett—the Governor of South Carolina. A number of Bennett's slaves were found to be involved in the conspiracy and this revelation was a contributing factor in Wilson's election as Governor in 1824.[8]

On June 14, 1822, Intendent Hamilton communicated the plans for the revolt to Governor Bennett who immediately acted to ensure the security of Charleston. Five military companies under the command of Colonel Robert Hayne were ordered to patrol city streets and guard against insurrection. On the night of the planned rebellion, the rebels discovered Colonel Hayne's troops and a sizable contingent of volunteers patrolling the area surrounding the city.[9] The rebel leaders—Denmark Vesey, Monday Gell, and Peter Poyas—decided to delay the revolt, but after a number of slaves were arrested on June 18, the plot was effectively over. With these arrests, full disclosure of the conspiracy soon followed.[10]

The plot reportedly included between 6,6000 and 9,000 slaves divided into six attack units. According to the confession of John Enslow—an enslaved African-born cooper involved in the plot—the original plan called for five of these groups to storm Charleston, capturing weapons caches and killing all whites they found. After the main guard houses, arsenals, a naval store, and the city magazine were taken, the rest of Charleston would be set on fire to create an additional distraction. The sixth unit of rebels would patrol the city's streets on horseback initially and would later be used to recruit more slaves from the surrounding countryside. By mid-June, some 500 weapons had been crafted, bought, or stolen, and access to a local militia company's arsenal was made available by a slave who had a copy of the key. The conspirators reportedly made note of every store and house in Charleston containing weapons, while hundreds of slaves who were expert horse handlers and riders were actively recruited. They even made use of a barber who volunteered to craft wigs and mustaches to conceal the identities of the conspirators. Once the city was completely captured, the rebels planned to plunder Charleston's banks of all available gold and silver specie and set sail for Haiti where they hoped to receive asylum.[11] The revelations made by William Paul completely undermined these plans, and with the arrests of key figures in this conspiracy on June 18 all hopes of a successful revolution were soon ended.[12]

The trials of the captured conspirators began on June 19. Arrested soon after was Denmark Vesey, leader of the insurgent army. Born in 1767 in either West Africa or the Danish Caribbean Island of St. Thomas, he was in all likelihood the child of Akan-speaking parents from Africa's Gold Coast. At the age of fourteen, Denmark was one of 390 slaves Captain Joseph Vesey transported from St. Thomas to Cape Francois, Santo Domingo in 1781. Allegedly subject to frequent epileptic fits, however, young Denmark was judged unsound by the French planter who purchased him and he was returned to Captain Vesey within a few months. By 1783 Captain Vesey settled in Charleston and Denmark remained his property until 1800, when he won a $1,500 prize in the East Bay Street lottery. At the age of thirty-three Denmark purchased his freedom for $600 and used the remainder of the lottery money to open a carpentry shop on Bull Street in downtown Charleston. He utilized his considerable talents as a carpenter to amass approximately $8,000 by 1822.[13] Despite the fact that he was a successful free black professional, Denmark orchestrated the largest slave conspiracy in North American history. In doing so, he actively utilized his understanding of pan-African cultural phenomena and inter-cultural connections to his advantage.[14]

The Role of Afro-Atlantic Religion and Conjure

The plan set in motion by Denmark epitomizes the ways in which African culture and pan-African connections shaped the conspiracy and, in a more general sense, became facilitating factors in slave resistance. One of the most effective and ubiquitous of these pan-African links was the various Afro-Atlantic religious impulses which helped inspire slave revolts throughout the Americas.[15] Denmark's plan to destroy Charleston was bolstered by three men who claimed to wield uncanny supernatural forces. The first of these men, an African born conjurer named Gullah Jack Pritchard, was one of the central figures in the 1822 conspiracy. Having served as a "doctor" in Charleston for fifteen years, Jack's reputation as the "little man who can't be killed, shot or taken [by whites]" allowed him to sway enslaved Africans of all nationalities. As a member of a cohort of Gullahs, Jack brought esoteric spiritual practices from his Angola homeland which were familiar to the numerous Bantu-speaking West-central Africans present in South Carolina. In a more tangible sense, Zaphaniah Kingsley—a slave trader and planter residing near Saint John's River in East Florida—reports that Jack also brought his "conjuring implements with him in a bag which he brought on board the ship and retained them."[16]

Gullah Jack's influence extended into a number of spheres. According to court testimony and other contemporary sources, even country born slaves—those born within the confines of North America—greatly feared his powers as a conjurer. Intendant Hamilton noted in his account of the 1822 plot that "Even the negroes who were born in this country seem to have spoken of his charmed invincibility with a confidence which looked much like belief."[17] In his most crucial role, Jack was to distribute charms to slave combatants which were said to render them invincible. This particular activity was mirrored in a number of slave rebellions and conspiracies throughout the Atlantic world. The fact that not one slave questioned the validity of Jack's powers during the course of the trials is singular testament to the continuing connection they had to African spiritual beliefs and values.

For Gullah Jack's conjurations to work, slaves had to first fast on corn and peanuts the night before the revolt. The following morning, the rebels were to place Jack's charms, consisting of crab claws, in their mouths in order to be rendered invulnerable. These talismans had one severe limitation however; one anonymous witness noted that "his charms would not protect him from the treachery of his own color."[18] Jack also presided over a ceremony in which a small group of conspirators ate a half-cooked fowl to solidify their bond. Oathing ceremonies of this sort were common features of slave rebellions and conspiracies in the Americas.[19]

Gullah Jack's role as a recruiter in the conspiracy was equally significant. The fear inspired by his supernatural abilities often became sufficient inducement in compelling slaves to join the plot. During the trial of Julius Forrest for example, Henry Haig testified that Jack had "charmed" both men into joining the conspiracy and that even after Jack was arrested, Haig felt that he was somehow "bound up and had not the power to speak one word about [the conspiracy]." The influence Jack held over these men and others was due perhaps to his threat to kill anyone who betrayed the planned revolt. In Jack's own trial, one slave witness literally begged the court to send him out of state because he considered his life "in great danger from having given testimony." Regarding this particular instance, a presiding judge mentioned later that "it was not without considerable difficulty that the Court satisfied him that he need no longer fear Jack's conjurations (as he called them)."[20]

The dread inspired by Jack's ability as a conjurer was not limited to blacks alone. One of his contingency plans, in case the rebellion failed, was so frightening that all mention of it was intentionally omitted from the version of the trial record made publicly available by judges Lionel Kennedy and Thomas Parker. Henry Haig, one of the conspirators who turned state's witness, told the court that Jack "was going to give me a bottle with poison to put into my Master's pump and into as many pumps as he could about town, and he said he wanted to give the other bottles to those he could trust to [sic]."[21] These unpublishable words reveal the real worries of white Charlestonians; militia companies and federal troops could probably defeat an army of slave rebels, but there was no legitimate means of preventing slaves who had both the ability and inclination from poisoning the city's water supply.

Due to his considerable influence, Jack was able to recruit enough slaves to lead an entire unit, known as the Gullah Company. As revealed by court officials during Gullah Jack's trial, this unit was to "kill the City Guard, and take all the arms in the Arsenal" during the outbreak.[22] Leading up to the appointed date for the rebellion, the Gullah Company met on a monthly basis from December 1821 until June 1822 to solidify their plans and involve more recruits from slaves living along the Atlantic coast and the coastal sea islands. To find additional enlistees for his company, Jack was sent by Monday Gell—a noted harness-maker and fellow leader of the plot—to get the support of slaves living in the countryside on the outskirts of Charleston. Jack returned having reportedly enlisted some 6,000 slaves from Goose Creek and Dorchester counties.[23]

One of Jack's recruits in the Gullah Company was Tom Russel—a blacksmith who specialized in the making of edged tools.[24] During the course of the planning for the rebellion, Tom made six pike heads that were later given to Gullah Jack to be mounted on wooden poles and used as spears during the revolt. Not only was Tom an expert blacksmith and Jack's second-in-command for the Gullah Company, he was also a conjurer in training. According to trial testimony given by Henry Haig, "Tom Russel the Blacksmith and Jack are partners—Jack learned him to be a Doctor. . . . Jack said Tom was his second and when you did not see him, and see Tom, you see [Gullah Jack].... Jack said he could not be killed nor could a white man take him."[25] Thus Tom served as a vehicle for Jack's mystical powers, allowing for tighter control over slaves involved in the plot. In obvious ways then, Tom was a vital asset to Jack's Gullah Company.

The notion that Tom Russel was indeed Gullah is made evident in the trial testimony. Not only did he voluntarily join Gullah Jack's Company, but James Mall reveals an additional piece of evidence. Described by the court as a young white man about sixteen or seventeen years old, Mall testified that "Gullah Jack was frequently at [Tom's] shop—and they frequently talked together in Gullah so that I should not understand them." This unique dialect became an effective language of subversion as enslaved Africans actively code-switched when in the presence of whites to maintain secret communication. The use of Gullah dialect in this manner creates what James C. Scott refers to as a "hidden transcript." By using Gullah dialect as a medium of communication, slaves could safely criticize and mock slaveholders and, in this particular instance, make plans to rebel against white authority while in the very presence of their enemies.[26] Whites were not the only ones unable to decipher this unique form of Africanized English. During the trial of a slave named Nero, testimony reveals that on one occasion "Nero and [Gullah] Jack spoke some time together in the Gullah language." After this particular conversation was over, Nero translated portions of the conversation to Perault Strohecker, a slave who apparently did not understand the Gullah dialect.[27]

The origins of Gullah dialect have been a topic of scholarly inquiry for the past half century. Beginning with the pioneering work of Lorenzo Turner in the 1940s to the more recent scholarly contributions of Margaret Washington Creel, Peter Wood, and Daniel Littlefield, the various debates regarding the origin and nature of Gullah culture are well beyond the scope of the current study. In terms of Gullah culture as it specifically relates to the 1822 Charleston conspiracy, Michael Gomez recently noted that Gullah Jack's company was composed of "Congolese-Angolan [Bantu] and/or Gola [Sierra Leonian] members of the slave community in the Charleston area and their descendants."[28] With distinct influences from and connection to Bantu-speakers of Angola and both Golas and Gizzis from Sierra Leone and Liberia respectively, evidence suggests that this unique culture and dialect is in fact a syncretic blend of at least two different African cultural enclaves.

As one of the earliest population groups in South Carolina, Angolans greatly influenced the nature of Gullah culture. In this particular regard, Winifred Vass and Lorenzo Turner in separate studies made note of a number of Bantu linguistic elements in Gullah dialect. The more recent work of Washington Creel, Wood, and Littlefield has proven that Sierra Leonians—brought over in vast numbers because of their expertise in rice cultivation—were imported in increasingly large numbers in the decades before and after the American Revolution. This new wave of importation allowed for a fushion of Bantu and Gola-speakers and added new dimensions to Gullah dialect and culture. Though Gullah Jack Pritchard was of likely Bantu origin, the scholarly convention of referring to his Gullah Band as "Angolan" simplifies a rather complex cultural reality.[29]

An elderly blind preacher named Philip was the third conjurer to have some connection to the slave plot. During the planning phases of the conspiracy, Monday Gell and Peter Poyas—two of the plot's main leaders—brought a slave named William Garner to Philip's house on Elliott Street. William, who worked as a cart driver, was recruited primarily because of his skills as a horseman and his access to a dozen or more horses from his mistress's stables. Monday Gell testified that on this particular occasion, Philip addressed William and asked him "why he looked so timorous," and quoting from biblical scripture, added "let not thy heart be troubled neither be afraid."[30] William Garner was greatly alarmed by this conversation with Philip which seemed extraordinary; in his own testimony William stated that the old man's inquiries "alarmed him much as Philip was blind."[31] The "blind" preacher was not completely without sight however. Court officials made note that Philip was born with a layer of skin known as a caul covering his face. According to the folk traditions of enslaved Africans throughout the Americas, the caul or veil was a sign that an infant will eventually be able to communicate with ghosts and predict future events. Philip testified to the court that having been born with a caul allowed him to "foresee events. . . . He said he possessed a Gift—a species of second sight—which came to him after prayer or in dreams."[32]

Philip was never tried even though the court later determined that this "High Priest of Sedition" played a role in the plot. Trial testimony confirms the fact that conspirators frequently gathered at his residence and his words would often help reassure frightened recruits. It was in fact his claims to predict the future which ultimately spared him the wrath of the court. Due to his alleged second sight, Philip predicted the ultimate failure of the conspiracy and attempted to dissuade recruits from joining the doomed plot. Monday Gell testified that the preacher had told rebels to "to give up the business" because "white people could fire five times while they fired once."[33] Despite his rather ambiguous role in the planned rebellion, Philip's presence is definitive proof of the numerous pan-African influences in Vesey's plot.

The caul Philip was born with is a strong indicator of continuing African influences in North America. The nearly identical meaning of the caul among Africans in the Kingdom of Dahomey, the Gold Coast, Dutch Guyana, Jamaica, Haiti, and the American South "as a sign dey will be bery wise an kin talk wid duh spirits" fully demonstrates that enduring African spiritual concepts and pan-African cultural links continued to inform the actions of slaves in Vesey's South Carolina. These notions were ubiquitous features of the African-American ethos as late as the 1930s.[34] The numerous interviews performed by the Georgia Writers' Project during the Great Depression illuminate the continuing significance of the caul in communities across the American South. Ex-slave Mary Hunter, originally from a coastal Georgia community, claims that she "kin seem um. . . . Yuh see, I was bawn wid a double caul obuh muh face and anybody knows dat a pusson bawn wid a caul obuh dey face kin sho see ghoses."[35] Ex-slave Nathaniel Lewis of Savannah stated he was born with wisdom, owing to the fact that he "was the seventh child an bawn with a caul."[36]

Martha Page of Yamacraw, Georgia, a community of ex-slaves from both coastal South Carolina and Georgia, stated "I dohn mine ghos, cuz I caahn see me as I wuzn bawn wid a caul."[37] From the same ex-slave community, Carrie Hamilton revealed that "I wuz bawn wid a caul an wuz diffrunt frum duh res. Ebry now an den I see ghos."[38] The ability of these individuals to see the extraordinary and the supernatural is explained by James Washington of Springfield, Georgia. He noted "I wuz bawn wid a double cawl wut wuz sabe fuh me till I wuz grown. Duh spirit show me ebrything."[39] Those born with this gift believe they can see the unseeable because of their direct connection to a spirit world defined by distinctly West African parameters.

Pan-African Connections and the Role of Ethnic Enclaves

In addition to the central role of conjure and other African components, additional pan-African elements influencing this conspiracy demonstrate a level of inter-cultural collaboration ignored by many previous scholars of the 1822 plot. Along with Jack Pritchard's Gullah Company, Denmark Vesey also relied upon aid from a "French band" in formulating his plot. This band which had spent months preparing for the rebellion was composed of about 300 slaves who fled Santo Domingo with their masters in the wake of the 1791 slave uprising led by Touissant L'Ouverture.[40] The trials of two of these "French Negroes," Louis Remoussin and Joe Jore, reveal that this French band was thoroughly armed in the weeks before the planned outbreak. William Colcock mentioned in his trial testimony that "there were some Frenchmen, blacks, very skillful in making swords and spears, such as they used in Africa."[41] Once the rebellion was to begin, they were to raid a weapons arsenal to procure additional arms.[42] Similar to the members of the Gullah company, the Santo Domingo slaves also used a subversive language, in this case Creole French, to help plan the revolt while maintaining a high level of secrecy. Peirault, a French-speaking slave who turned state's witness, testified that when Louis and Joe would communicate, "the conversation was in Creole French."[43]

Haiti influenced other crucial areas of the conspiracy. Denmark was reported to have read "passages in the newspapers that related to Santo Domingo" as a means of encouraging his fellow conspirators and enlistees.[44] One particular newspaper article used by Denmark related the story of the Haitian defeat over a Spanish army sent to defend the Dominican Republic. Taking advantage of Spanish military weaknesses in the Dominican Republic, President Jean-Pierre Boyer of Haiti successfully invaded the Spanish territory and abolished slavery there. This news emboldened one recruit enough to claim "if he had men he could do the same as Boyer—and that he could whip ten white men himself."[45]

Having spent some time earlier in his life in Santo Domingo, Denmark learned French and used this ability as yet another tool to facilitate resistance. During the planning of the rebellion, two letters requesting military aid from Santo Domingo were reportedly drafted by Denmark. One of the letters was to be carried by a ship's steward whose brother was allegedly a General in the Haitian military. The other, addressed directly to President Boyer, was to be conveyed via a ship's cook. Despite the fact that he was not in direct contact with Haitian officials, Vesey and other leaders frequently claimed that armies from both "Santo Domingo and Africa would come over and cut up the white people" to further inspire fellow conspirators.[46]

In addition to Gullah and Haitian components, other more directly African elements were present in the conspiracy. Monday Gell, described in the trial transcript as "an Ebo (sic) . . . having been in the country fifteen or twenty years," was leader of an entire company of Aja-speaking Igbo slaves.[47] Though he turned state's witness and provided some rather damaging testimony during the trials, Monday was one of the key leaders and recruiters. Enjoying the relative freedom of a highly skilled slave, Monday was a harness-maker who kept his own shop in downtown Charleston. Reflecting the limited numbers of Igbo and other Aja-speakers entering South Carolina during the slave trade, Monday's "Ebo" Company had only forty-two enlistees. In comparison, Jack reportedly recruited thousands into his Gullah Company and the French Band numbered in the hundreds.[48]

Akan-speakers were another African group whose presence can be found in records generated by the Charleston courts. Aside from the likelihood that Denmark Vesey was born to Akan parents, other examples of an Akan presence are evident. Two men with Akan day-names were arrested in connection with the conspiracy—Cuffy Graves and Quash Harleston. Arrested on July 11, 1822, Cuffy Graves was released soon after due to a lack of sufficient evidence to bring him to trial.[49] Though he was found not guilty by the court, a free black man named Quash Harleston was transported out of "the limits of the United States" on July 29, 1822.[50] It is unknown exactly where Quash was sent, but it is possible he followed the same route as his close companion Prince Graham; one of two other free black men to be found guilty during the court proceedings, on July 21, 1822 Prince was sentenced to permanent banishment from South Carolina. The court record reveals that Prince made a request to be "transported to Africa on board a vessel which sailed from Charleston." His request was honored and after serving one month in the Charleston workhouse, Prince sailed aboard the Dolphin to Liberia.[51]

Western Sudanic Mande-speaking Africans were another segment of South Carolina's slave population playing an integral role in the events unfolding in 1822. Imported in large numbers due to their expertise in rice cultivation. Africans from the Western Sudan were to have a profound influence on cultural developments throughout the region. The two most apparent Mande-speakers involved in the conspiracy, Mingo Harth and Peirault Strohecker, engaged in activities bearing a strong cultural and socio-political stamp from their West African place of origin. Mingo, identified as a twenty-six year old "Mandingo," eventually became one of the most important figures in the conspiracy. Peirault, according to his brief biography detailed in the court proceedings, was a Mande-speaker born in a Western Sudanic region near Goree. Both men were expert horse handlers and had the responsibility of either recruiting for or leading the slave cavalries. Monday Gell testified that Mingo "was to take his master's horse and act as a horseman during the fight."[52] In the trial of Mingo's brother, Isaac Harth, Monday further claimed that "[Isaac] said also, that he belonged to the horse company. Mingo told me that his brother was one too."[53] This horse company led by Mingo was composed primarily of stable workers from three different stables throughout the city.[56]

Peirault was a member of a separate horse company. Working as a stable hand, his role in the conspiracy was to "get horses to send men into the country," probably to recruit more slaves after the rebellion commenced. On several occasions, Peirault hired his horses out to slaves who were sent into the country to enlist more volunteers. From June 6 to June 16 three separate slaves requested horses from Peirault for the purpose of going "into the country to get men to join this insurrection."[55]

During the outbreak of violence, the various horse companies were to "go about the streets and prevent the whites from assembling." Understanding the tactical importance represented by having use of a cavalry, Denmark actively recruited men with some experience with horses. Smart Anderson confessed that "[t]he old man (meaning Vesey) told me to get some draymen who had horses, and if I was a good rider he would make me a captain of a troop." In this manner, Denmark ultimately recruited about 100 draymen to serve in the slave cavalry during the revolt.[56]

The fact that two Mande-speakers were intimately involved with recruiting or leading the slave cavalry demonstrates an important continuity of Mande military culture in North America.[57] From as early as 1100 AD, the Mande were renowned in the Western Sudan for being fierce horse warriors. Between 1100 AD and 1600 AD, Mande cavalry forces swept across an extensive territory in the sahel, savanna, and woodland areas of the Western Sudan and became primarily responsible for the rise of the Mali and Songhai empires. The unique disease ecology created by trypanosomiasis infected tsetse flies contained the spread of horse warrior states, as well as the horses themselves, to the region north of the Upper Guinea coastal rivers. Even as late as the mid-nineteenth century, horse warriors continued to be a determining factor in warfare and state formation in the Western Sudanic region of Upper Guinea.[58]

It is entirely possible that Peirault was once a Mande horse warrior. In his revealing biography, included in the trial extracts, the court recorded the following:

> Peirault was born at Jumba in Africa, about a week's travel from Goree. . . . Peirault was engaged in three battles against the people of [Hausa], who do not cultivate their lands, but made predatory incursions into the cultivated territories of their neighbors. Peirault also fought twice against the people of Darah, but in the second battle he was taken prisoner and carried to that place.[59]

He therefore spent significant time earlier in his life as a soldier during a period in which Mande-speaking horse warriors were engaging in a number of military conflicts in Upper Guinea.

Confirmation that Mande horse warriors were present among North American slaves can be found in the story of Ibrahima, a Mande-speaking Muslim prince and former soldier. Living in Futa Jallon, Ibrahima was the son of a Fulbe King and was a high ranking officer in his father's army. In 1788, at the age of 26, he led a group of horse warriors in an attack on the "Hebohs" near Rio Pongas. He was captured following a Heboh ambush, enslaved by his former enemies, and sold to European slave traders. After spending forty years as a slave in the West Indies and Natchez, Mississippi, he was recognized by a white man he had known in West Africa. Ibrahima's master manumitted him and he returned to Africa where he died, within months of his return, in 1828. His story, detailed in Terry Alford's Prince Among Slaves attests to the presence and influence of Mande-speaking horsemen in North American history.[60]

Combined with their aptitude in rice cultivation, Mande-speaking Africans were highly prized by South Carolina planters because of their expertise in handling horses and livestock. As Peter Wood notes, "[p]eople from along the Gambia River, a location for which South Carolina slave dealers came to hold a steady preference, were expert horsemen and herders."[61] This strong association made between Western Sudanic Africans and horses and other livestock prompted Wood to suggest that even the word "cowboy" may have originated as a result and was first applied to these Mande-speaking horse-men.[62]

Along with the obvious African influences, there was also a correlating fear among the rebels in Denmark's conspiracy of those slaves who were born in North America and seemed to lack a direct link to Africa. This is clear in the trial of Pierre Lewis. In his testimony against Pierre, Charles Drayton claimed "Pierre Lewis told me that something serious would happen, but that I was a countryborn, and he was afraid to trust me."[63] He testified on yet another occasion that Joe Jore, a member of the French Band, typically spoke to him using parables because he "did not know how to trust countryborns."[64] Eventually, Charles was allowed to join and even lead his own army; he was given command over the country-born company. This initial lack of confidence was perhaps well founded as it would be Charles Drayton, along with two others, who received pardons in exchange for the testimony they provided during the court proceedings.[65]

Even some African-born men were not to be trusted by the rebel leaders. George Parker was the subject of much suspicion by Denmark and Monday Gell. The most heinous charge against George, in the eyes of the conspiracy's leaders, was that "he was an African, but they alleged against him, that he did not associate with his countrymen. . . ."[66] Unlike Charles Drayton, George was never allowed to join and actively participate and, according to court officials, his suspect character "convinced the Court of the wisdom and circumspection displayed by the leaders of the conspiracy in excluding him from their ranks."[67] The conspiracy leaders even developed a means to encourage trustworthy, but reluctant African-born slaves to join the rebellion. In the trial of Peter Poyas, anonymous witness No. 10 testified that Peter threatened him by saying "if I did not join he would turn all my country people against me. . . . " This prospect was so frightening to witness No. 10 that he immediately told Peter, "I'll join you."[68]

Slaves, whether born in Africa or America who were house servants or "waiting men who receive presents of old coats from their masters" could not be trusted by the conspirators either.[69] It would in fact be a house servant named Peter Prioleau who, after William Paul attempted to enlist him, informed his mistress and ultimately played a key role in unraveling the conspiracy. Though a number of the rebel leaders were skilled slaves or free blacks, this in their minds did not signify some greater degree of cultural assimilation or political conformity on their part. Their actions and words reflect a consciousness shaped tremendously by an appreciation and understanding of African cultural influences. The main dichotomy existing in their minds was not between skilled and unskilled blacks or even city and country slaves, but between those who identified themselves as African and those who did not.

Aftermath of the Vesey Conspiracy

After the trials were over, thirty-five men were executed, thirty-two were banished, and fifty-three were either acquitted or discharged. Fear-stricken whites in Charleston began to engage in vigilante justice, seeking to suppress the spirit of insurrection among the slave populace.[70] Then, on December 31, 1822, the state legislature passed the Negro-Seaman's Act as a viable means of cutting off any further rebellious influences from entering Charleston. This act stipulated that free black seamen employed on vessels coming into any South Carolina port would be imprisoned until the ship was ready to leave.[71] In addition, blacks from Mexico, the West Indies, or South America were prohibited from entering the state.[72] Ever since the 1791 Haitian revolt, the fear of imported slave discontent weighed heavily on the minds of South Carolina's law makers. Charlestonians now hoped that with the 1808 federal ban on the slave trade, the Negro Seamen Act and the renewed limitation on black immigration from the Caribbean and Latin America, any disruptive pan-African connections would be severed forever.

What many planters realized in the wake of the tumultuous events of 1822 was that Vesey's conspiracy represented something extremely unsettling for the continuation of white hegemony in the slave South. Simply put, the earlier efforts to "randomize" Africans on slave ships and auction blocks had utterly failed to prevent collaboration and resistance. Denmark Vesey, in his brilliance, created a confluence of African cultures and understood much of what concerned and inspired slaves, whether country-born or African. Not surprisingly, he would claim to others that "country-born, Africans and all kinds joined [the plot]."[73] This sentiment was also reflected in one of his favorite biblical passages: "For I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle; and the city shall be taken. . . ."[74] Akan, Igbo, Mande, Gullah, French-speaking Haitian, and English-speaking American born slaves all combined in this effort to caste off the shackles of bondage. Given the numerous pan-African connections, Denmark's conspiracy epitomized a reality that many Africans in the Americas experienced, one that transcended any assumed or real ethnic boundaries and allowed for, and even facilitated, resistance. Both the intersection of various African cultures and the acknowledgement of pan-African connections during the course of this plot were a means to the end of creating a more unitary black consciouness in North America.

Phillips also remarks that black slaves "for the most part were by racial quality submissive rather than defiant, light-hearted instead of gloomy, amiable and ingratiating instead of sullen. . . ." Even though he held the view that slaves, by their very nature, were docile and obedient, Phillips could not avoid a discussion of slave resistance. In fact he dealt with resistance over the course of one entire chapter entitled "Slave Crime." Explicit in both the title and its contents is the notion that enslaved Africans were not rebelling against an evil and abusive system, instead ulterior motives, such as their lust for white women, and other vestiges of their "barbaric" past guided their actions. Phillips fascination with the alleged rape of white women by enslaved African men further underscores the truly polemical nature of this monograph and, in some ways, anticipates the work of novelist William Styron.

Bennett's slaves, including Ned, Batteau, Matthias, and Rolla were not only involved, but Ned and Rolla were to lead entire companies of slave insurgents during the uprising. The implication of this level of involvement was obvious; if Bennett could not manage and control his own slaves, he was not fit to govern the quarter of a million slaves living in South Carolina.

The Danes concentrated most of their trade efforts in the Gold Coast. In one year, 1778, the Danes exported 1,200 slaves, 83% of which came from the Gold Coast region. If this pattern of exports remained persistent throughout the course of the Danish slave trade, then an overwhelming percentage of the 28,000 total Africans imported into the Danish Virgin Islands were Akan-speakers. Also according to Monica Schuler, numerous Akan rebellions occurred in the Danish Virgin Islands between the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries; this becomes further evidence for the overwhelming Akan majority and increases the likelihood of Denmark Vesey being born to Akan-speaking parents.

On the other hand, when Lionel Kennedy and Thomas Parker published the more widely circulated An Official Report of the Trials of Sundry Negroes Charged with an Attempt to Raise an Insurrection in the State of South Carolina, all mention of Jack's plan was deliberately omitted because of the dangers such knowledge posed. Even with this omission, the Official Report was considered dangerous enough that all copies of the manuscript which could be located were allegedly destroyed shortly after its 1822 publication.

[49] South Carolina imported very few Akan-speakers and it is entirely likely that these two individuals simply had Akan day-names, but were not Akan-speakers themselves. This is especially true in the case of the popular name "Cuffee" which, while Akan in origin, was used quite frequently in North American slave communities with few if any Akan-speaking elements. [57] Evidence, however circumstantial, suggests that two additional men may have also been Mande-speaking horse handlers. The first, a drayman named Peter Cooper, was described as an elderly "Guinea" Negro by Monday Gell. The term "Guinea" lacks geographic specificity, but it would definitely include the Western Sudanic region which was home to numerous Mande-speaking states. The second possible Mande-speaker was a drayman named Caesar Smith. Trial records describe him as "a tall Negro, an African, who is an intimate acquaintance of Peirault's, and who is often at the stable where Peirault keeps his horses." The fact that he was a very close acquaintance of a known Mande-speaker and also shared an affinity for horses suggests strongly that Caesar was Mande as well. Ibid., 110-1, 117; Pearson, ed., Designs against Charleston, 239.

CONJURE, MAGIC, AND POWER
The Influence of Afro-Atlantic Religious Practices on Slave Resistance and Rebellion

WALTER RUCKER
University of Nebraska–Lincoln

Writing in 1842, Reverend Charles C. Jones (1969) exposed the fears many antebellum southerners had regarding the influence of what he called "teachers, doctors, prophets, conjurers" in determining the actions of North American slaves:

> Ignorance and superstition render them easy dupes to . . . artful and designing men . . . . On certain occasions they have been made to believe that while they carried about their persons some charm with which they had been furnished, they were invulnerable. They have, on certain other occasions, been made to believe that they were under a protection that rendered them invincible . . . . They have been known to be so perfectly and fearfully under the influence of some leader or conjurer or minister, that they have not dared disobey him in the least particular. (p. 128)

These "artful and designing men" and women found on plantations throughout the Americas were as ubiquitous as the individual and group acts of slave resistance they inspired. They served as conduits of powerful supernatural forces beyond the comprehension of their contemporaries and were, therefore, believed to be integral to the success of a number of slave resistance movements. The mystical powers conjurers claimed to control made them formidable and respected figures among enslaved Africans. As historian John Blassingame (1972) noted, "In many instances, the conjurer had more control over the slaves than the master had" (p. 110).

The fear evoked by these spiritualists is readily measured by the words and actions of slaves and their holders. Henry Clay Bruce (1969), a man who spent 29 years of his life as a slave in Missouri, Virginia, and Mississippi, recalled numerous "conjurors, who succeeded in duping their fellow-slaves so successfully, and to such an extent that they believed and feared them almost beyond their masters" (p. 52). Among slaves at least, conjurers were respected not solely because of the apprehension their powers inspired. In the words of W.E.B. Du Bois (1982), these spiritualists had multifaceted and multidimensional functions in the slave community; at any given time, the conjurer could be "the healer of the sick, the interpreter of the Unknown, the comforter of the sorrowing, the supernatural avenger of the wrong" (p. 216). It would be through many of these roles that African conjurers helped to encourage slave resistance throughout the Americas.

In North America, the power of conjure was revered by both African- and American-born slave rebels in similar fashion. They seemingly believed, without question, the ability of these spiritualists to determine the outcome of a variety of events, including resistance movements, through arcane and supernatural means. This assessment runs counter to the claims of Eugene Genovese (1976) who argued that the presence of West Indian conjurers as insurrectionary leaders "could not be reproduced in the United States, except on a trivial scale, because the necessary revolutionary conjuncture did not exist. The conjurers of the Old South were accommodationists in the same sense as were the black preachers" (p. 222). Despite a general tendency by Genovese and other American historians to view the North American slave experience as unique or exceptional, the widespread belief and practice of conjuration proves that this particular phenomenon at least was a shared African diasporic reality. Indeed, sufficient evidence demonstrating that slave conjurers in North America were in fact an influencing presence in a number of mass rebellions, conspiracies, and acts of day-to-day resistance can be found in a variety of primary sources. Far from being the "accommodationists" discussed by Genovese, North American conjurers can be better viewed as a revolutionary vanguard inspiring and encouraging resistive behavior among their fellow slaves.

AFRICAN CONJURERS IN SLAVE REBELLIONS

Claiming command over esoteric and magical forces, conjurers were seen as integral to the success of slave revolts. This was definitely the case in the 1712 New York City slave rebellion, which was the most serious slave disturbance up to that time in the British American colonies. It only involved about 28 insurgents; however, this relatively small band killed 10 Whites, wounded 12 others, and created a panic throughout the North American colonies (Aptheker, 1993, p. 173; Carroll, 1938, pp. 14-15). Among the key components in this rebellion was Peter the Doctor, a free African conjurer who rubbed a magical powder onto the clothing of the slaves to reportedly make them invulnerable. Thus emboldened, the rebels armed with swords, knives, and guns set fire to a building in downtown New York City and waited to ambush approaching Whites seeking to put out the blaze (Aptheker, 1993, p. 172; Sharpe, 1890, pp. 162-163).

This New York City revolt had some revealing parallels with an uprising that took place in 1760 on another British colonial possession, Jamaica (Higginson, 1969, pp. 7-8). A slave named Tacky, who was claimed to be Koromantyn,[1] led a slave rebellion in Jamaica with the aid of a number of Obeah conjurers. As a spiritual practice linked to Akan-speaking West Africans from the Gold Coast region, Obeah was a powerful belief system found particularly among slaves in the British, Danish, and Dutch Caribbean, and mainland South American colonies. During the early phases of this revolt, one of Tacky's Obeah-men was captured by colonial officials, allowing a window into the world of this unique practice, while at the same time, creating a plausible explanation for the events occurring during the New York City rebellion nearly 50 years earlier (Morrish, 1982, pp. 23, 41; Schuler, 1970b, p. 375).

According to a contemporary source, this captured conjurer was also Coromantin or Akan-speaking. After being apprehended by British colonial authorities, this Obeah-man testified that he, along with his fellow practitioners, "administered a powder, which being rubbed on their bodies, was to make them invulnerable" (Schuler, 1970b, p. 375). Thus, in both the 1712 New York City revolt and the 1760 Jamaican conspiracy, powder was rubbed onto slaves imbuing them with special powers and giving them the confidence to rebel.

A definite Akan-speaking presence can be found in the 1712 New York City revolt. Two of the three extant contemporary accounts of the uprising demonstrate tangible proof that Akan-speaking Africans played active roles in this event. The April 7th to 14th, 1712 edition of the Boston News-Letter, which at the time was the only newspaper operating in British North America, reported that "some Cormentine Negroes to the number of 25 or 30 and 2 or 3 Spanish Indians . . . conspired to murder all the Christians here" (Boston News-Letter, 1712). In a letter dated June 23, 1712, Reverend John Sharpe, chaplain of the English garrison in New York City, revealed even more information linking these events to Akan-speaking Africans. Sharpe reported that "some Negro Slaves here of ye Nations of Caramantee & Pappa plotted to destroy all the White[s] in order to obtain their freedom" (Sharpe, 1890, pp. 162-163).

Not only were the rebels referred to in two of the contemporary accounts as Kormantine—a term associated with Akan-speakers from the Gold Coast—but another important indicator of an Akan presence is readily evident in the trial records generated in the aftermath of the 1712 revolt. Of the 21 Africans facing criminal charges in connection with the uprising, 9 had Akan day names. Of the slaves accused of being involved in the revolt, 2 were named Cuffee, 4 were named Quacko, 1 was named Quashi, Quasi, and Amba, respectively (Scott, 1961, pp. 63-65). With few exceptions, every Akan child is given a first name determined by the actual day of his or her birth, in addition to any other familial names (see Table 1). On reaching adulthood, the original day name was typically no longer commonly used, except by close relatives and others wishing to express familiarity and endearment. This practice in the Americas is a testament to particular African cultural understandings which continued to shape the consciousness of 18th-century North American slaves (Anim, 1991, pp. 2-3; Schuler, 1970a, p. 29).

In addition to the nine rebels with obvious Akan day names, a young male slave by the name of Dick, owned by Harmanus Burger, performed a vital function during the course of the trials. Having been charged in the coroner's inquest with the murder of Henry Brasier on April 9, 1712, Dick along with Peter Vantilborough's Cuffee received immunity in return for services provided to the British Crown. Serving as an interpreter for the slaves who could not speak English—on several dates including April 11th, 12th, 14th, 16th, and 17th; May 7th and 27th; and June 4th—Dick's skills in that regard were drawn on in at least seven of the nine cases involving slaves with Akan day names. Joost Lynsen's Quacko, who was charged on the same day as Dick, and Vantilborough's Cuffee, who also became a witness for the British Crown, were the only Africans with Akan day names not requiring Dick's services in their cases (Scott, 1961, pp. 53, 57, 62-65). Quite obviously, then, Dick too was an Akan-speaking enslaved African.

With so many links to Akan culture in New York City at the time of this uprising, it is entirely conceivable that Peter the Doctor, the African-born conjurer who inspired the rebellion, was an Akan Obeah-man. Obeah conjurers would later inspire rebellions throughout the British, Dutch, and Danish American colonial possessions, including important revolts in Jamaica in 1733, 1738, and 1760; Antigua in 1736; and Berbice in 1763. No less than 20 rebellions in the Americas were attributed to Akan-speakers in locations including Dutch Guyana, the Virgin Islands, Barbados, and based on the above findings, colonial New York City as well. A sizable number of these Akan slave revolts were intertwined with the practice of Obeah (Curtin, 1955, p. 24; Herskovits & Herskovits, 1934, pp. 350; Higginson, 1969, pp. 7-8; Schuler, 1970a, pp. 9-18).

The word Obeah likely derives from the Akan word Obayifo, which denotes witchcraft and sorcery in the Akan spiritual universe. The fo suffix is added to all proper names in the Akan family of languages. By dropping the suffix, the resulting word is Obayi, which was linguistically and phonetically transformed into Obeah, Obia, and Obi throughout the Americas (Gyekye, 1987, pp. 73-75; Hedrick & Stephens, 1977, p. 8; Morrish, 1982, pp. 120-122; Williams, 1932, pp. 120-122). As practiced in the Atlantic world, Obeah often served as an important impetus to slave resistance for a variety of reasons. Like their Gold Coast Obayifo counterparts, Obeah conjurers in the Americans used supernatural forces to bring about desired effects and actions. The desired outcome of their incantations and charms could be either positive or negative depending on the specific scenario in which an Obeah-man or Obeah-woman was employed. Similarly, Akan spiritualists and Obayifo often employed aduru, or any medicine in the form of liquid or powder, in their practice. Based on the expected outcome, aduru is categorized as benevolent medicine (Aduru Pa), malevolent medicine (adubone), or poison (aduto). The powders used by both Peter the Doctor in New York City and the Jamaican Obeah doctors would be categorized as aduru pa because they were created for the positive outcome of protecting rebellious slaves from evil agents and increasing the likelihood of success in these revolutionary movements. Powders and other forms of benevolent aduru function because of the spiritual power they naturally contain. The plants, herbs, human blood, graveyard dirt, and other substances that constitute the powder all contain an innate amount of supernatural force, which under the proper preparations proved to be quite potent in the hands of Obeah conjurers (Minkus, 1977, pp. 116-117).

Although Obeah served as a powerful inducement to slave resistance in areas with high concentrations of Akan speakers, the Yoruba spiritual system known as Ifá and its various Western hemisphere derivatives—Vodun, Santeria, and Condomblé—would play a similar role in other regions of the Americas. During the initial phases of the 1791 Santo Domingo slave uprising, for example, an individual known as Boukman Dutty, a Vodun high priest, was the initial leader who masterminded the revolutionary movement. Boukman had considerable influence among slaves, serving as both a religious figure and the headman of a plantation. The plan he initiated was on a massive scale, involving hundreds if not thousands of slaves. The insurgents were to set fire to plantations in the outskirts of the province of Le Cap and kill all Whites within the town. On the night of August 22, 1791, the rebels organized in the mountain range adjacent to Le Cap. It was here that Boukman gave final instructions and made Vodun incantations while drinking the blood of a sacrificed pig. Although Boukman was to be captured and executed early in the revolt, his actions gave the necessary momentum and impetus to a movement that culminated in the only successful slave revolt in the history of the Americas (James, 1980, pp. 86-87; Ott, 1973, pp. 47-49; Rodney, 1969, p. 336).

Of the ethnic origins of Boukman, little is known except that he was supposedly a fugitive slave originally from Jamaica. Although Vodun is a religion associated with the Aja-speaking Yoruba, Fon, and Edo peoples of West Africa, based on all available evidence, Boukman was either a Mande speaker or an Akan speaker. Walter Rodney (1969, pp. 336-337) has conjectured that Boukman was possibly a Muslim Mande-speaking Mandinga, an assumption he bases solely on his name. This is because an educated, Muslim Mande speaker in Upper Guinea was often called Bookman by English traders in the 18th century, due to that person's education and command of Koranic verse.

If it is true that Boukman was originally from Jamaica, a region that imported an overwhelming majority of Akan speakers from the Gold Coast during the 18th century, then he might have fit well into a region like Santo Domingo, which was dominated primarily by Aja-speaking Yoruba cultural influences. The Aja-speaking Yoruba originated in a region of West Africa in which both variants of the Kwa language group (including Akan and Aja) were spoken and in which there was a great deal of cultural and commercial contact between the Akan and the Yoruba city-states. With this degree of cultural interplay and diffusion, it is conceivable that an Akan speaker would be well versed in the spiritual beliefs and practices of the Yoruba (Ott, 1973, p. 47; Schuler, 1970b, p. 375; Thornton, 1988, p. 267; 1992, pp. xvi, 253).

If Boukman in fact was an Akan speaker, this would represent a significant phenomenon. Because belief in conjure and magic could be found among most West African peoples, the conjurer in the Americas served as a cultural bridge, with the ability of transcending cultural differences between African groups. As an Akan-speaking Vodun priest, Boukman influenced the actions of Aja-speaking Yoruba, Edo, and Fon as well as the Bantu-speaking Kongolese and Angolans, the principal import populations in the decades leading up to the revolution. The notion among European slave traders and planters that randomizing or mixing African ethnic groups effectively undermined resistance would have been rendered implausible with the presence of such cultural bridges as the conjurer and with the shared belief among many African- and American-born slaves in the power of conjurers to wield supernatural and magical forces (Fouchard, 1979, pp. 283-285; Thornton, 1993, pp. 185-186).

AFRICAN CONJURERS IN SLAVE CONSPIRACIES

Conjurers and other African spiritualists were present in a variety of North American conspiracies and plots, including important examples in New York City in 1741, Richmond in 1800, and Charleston in 1822. In terms of the Charleston, South Carolina, conspiracy initiated by Denmark Vesey, the involvement of three separate conjurers in the planning and the recruiting phases further demonstrates the notion that conjurers could indeed act as a bridge between Africans from various ethnic backgrounds. The first conjurer, Gullah Jack Pritchard, was perhaps the conspiracy's most important leader next to Vesey. Also known as Cooter Jack, he had a multidimensional role in the conspiracy. Gullah Jack, similar to Peter the Doctor in New York City and the Obeah doctors in the British Caribbean, provided the insurgents with talismans said to render them nearly invincible. In preparation for the rebellion, the combatants had to fast on parched corn and peanuts before receiving a charm from Gullah Jack that consisted of a cullah, or crab claw. On the morning of the planned uprising, the rebels were to place the crab claws in their mouths, and this, according to Gullah Jack, would make them invulnerable (Killens, 1970, pp. 76-77).

Gullah Jack was one of the most important recruiters in the conspiracy, due primarily to his influence over fellow slaves. Feared by others because of his abilities, this "little man who can't be killed, shot or taken" was well respected in Charleston and in the surrounding countryside. This fear was reinforced by Jack's threat to injure any informant who betrayed the conspiracy. In fact, even after Jack was captured by local authorities, one slave witness literally begged the court to send him out of state because he considered his life "in great danger from having given testimony." This witness concluded his testimony by stating, "I was afraid of Gullah Jack as a conjurer." Both American- and African-born slaves believed in his powers, and thus, Gullah Jack epitomizes the ability of the conjurer to bridge ethnic differences. Of likely Bantu-speaking Angolan background, Jack held sway over Akan, Igbo, Mande, Gullah, French-speaking Haitian, and English-speaking American-born slaves alike (Killens, 1970, pp. 76-77; Pearson, 1999, pp. 196-197).

One of Gullah Jack's most important recruits was a blacksmith named Tom Russel. According to the testimony of fellow conspirator Henry Haig, when Jack was asked what he would do about weapons, he replied that "he would have some arms made at the blacksmith's shop" (Killens, 1970, p. 79). It would be at Tom's blacksmith shop that six spear-like weapons were crafted and later transported to Gullah Jack in preparation for the rebellion. But Tom Russel was not only a blacksmith and Jack's second-in-command, he was also an apprentice conjurer. Henry Haig noted, "Tom Russel the Blacksmith and Jack are partners—Jack learned him to be a Doctor. . . . Jack said Tom was his second and when you did not see him, and see Tom, you see [Gullah Jack]" (Killens, 1970, p. 70; Pearson, 1999, p. 196).

A third conjurer played another pivotal role in the planning of this revolt. His name was Philip, and he was described in the trial records as a blind preacher. On one occasion during the initial stages of the conspiracy, Monday Gell and Peter Poyas brought a slave named William Garner to Philip's house. Monday remarked in his testimony that the blind preacher addressed William and asked him "why he looked so timorous" and quoted a passage from biblical scripture (Killens, 1970, pp. 134, 164-165). William Garner was greatly alarmed by this inquiry, which seemed extraordinary "knowing that the old man was blind" (Killens, 1970, p. 134). However, Philip was not completely without sight. At his birth, a caul covered his face, and according to African folklore, this granted him the ability to foresee events and communicate with the spirit world. In his own testimony, Philip claimed that being born with the caul gave him the gift "of second sight—which came to him after prayer or in dreams" (Killens, 1970, p. 165).

Although the court later deemed this "High Priest of Sedition" to have had some role in the conspiracy, Philip was never tried. It was quite clear from the trial testimony that the conspirators often gathered at his house and that his words would help reassure any frightened recruits. However, because of his second sight, he predicted the failure of the revolt, and this probably explains why he did not face punishment. Philip claimed in his testimony that although the conspiracy was never specifically mentioned to him, "he had foreseen something of that sort, and therefore had advised his visitors, on one occasion 'to give up the business'" (Killens, 1970, p. 165). Despite his rather ambiguous role in the rebellion, Philip's presence is definitive proof of continuing Afro-Atlantic religious influences on slave resistance.

The significance of the caul with which Philip was born has far-reaching ramifications for the continuation of African spiritual conceptualizations in North America. The insightful interviews performed in the 1930s by the Georgia Writers' Project illuminate the significance of the caul in communities across the American South. Ex-slave Mary Hunter claimed that her belief in ghosts was due to the fact that she "kin seem um. . . . Yuh see, I waz bawn wid a double caul obuh muh face and anybody knows dat a pusson bawn wid a caul obuh dey face kin sho see ghoses" (Georgia Writers' Project, 1940, p. 2). This widespread belief can be found throughout the slave South. A common interpretation of the meaning of the caul "as a sign dey will be bery wise an kin talk wid duh spirits" (Georgia Writers' Project, 1940, pp. 76-77) was a ubiquitous feature of the slave ethos (Puckett, 1929, pp. 137, 336). The near identical meaning of the caul among Africans in Dahomey, the Gold Coast, Dutch Guyana, Jamaica, Haiti, and the American South further demonstrates that enduring African spiritual concepts were lasting influences on the actions of enslaved Africans throughout the Atlantic world (Beckwith, 1969, p. 57; Georgia Writers' Project, 1940, p. 197; Herskovits, 1937, p. 95; 1967, p. 264).

AFRICAN CONJURERS IN DAY-TO-DAY RESISTANCE

Aside from their obvious presence in the trial records of slave revolts and conspiracies, conjurers also make their appearance in a number of slave narratives, interviews, biographies, and autobiographies as agents in day-to-day forms of resistance. Through these sources, there is ample proof that conjurers were an ever-present factor in the lives of the majority of North American slaves. No less an authority than William Wells Brown (1968) once noted that "Nearly every large plantation . . . had at least one, who claimed to be a fortune-teller, and who was regarded with more than common respect by his fellow-slaves" (p. 70; Levine, 1977, p. 69). Speaking on the widespread appeal of conjuration in South Carolina in the early 1800s, Charles Ball (1969) added that enslaved Africans "are universally subject to the grossest and most abject superstition, and uniformly believe in witchcraft, conjuration, and the agency of evil spirits in the affairs of human life" (p. 165). Combined, these statements demonstrate that not only were conjurers ubiquitous, but belief in their supernatural abilities encompassed a large portion of the slave populace.

For Frederick Douglass, a conjurer named Sandy Jenkins of Easton, Maryland, created a shaping impression on his early life. After a savage beating he received at the hands of Edward Covey, a man "who enjoyed the reputation, of being a first rate hand at breaking young slaves," Douglass eventually turned to Sandy Jenkins for aid. In Douglass's words, Sandy was > not only a religious man, but he professed to believe in a system for which I have no name. He was a genuine African, and had inherited some of the so called magical powers, said to be possessed by African and eastern nations.

Sandy instructed Douglass to find the root of a herb in the forest that had mystical powers of protection. After undisclosed preparations, Sandy further instructed Douglass to wear the root on his right side because "it would be impossible for Covey to strike a blow; that with this root . . . no white man could whip [him]" (Douglass, 1969, pp. 203, 238).

To Douglass, talk of magically endowed herbs and roots was "very absurd and ridiculous, if not positively sinful." These statements were guided, in part, by his acceptance of Christianity and can also be viewed as an appeal to both his writing audience and his fellow abolitionists. One of the key arguments used by abolitionists to undermine the legitimacy of slavery was that few slaves received true Christian instruction. This was tangibly measured by the persistence of "heathen" or "savage" African religious practices in the plantation South. Despite Douglass's obvious disdain for conjure, he still wore the root. In August 1834, a confrontation Douglass had with Covey involved a protracted wrestling bout between the two that rendered the former Negro-breaker "as gentle as a lamb" for the next 6 months that Douglass lived with him (Douglass, 1969, pp. 239-250). Although Douglass never fully acknowledged it, the root in his right pocket was certainly a factor in his new spirit of assertiveness and resistance.

In another case, William Webb, a conjurer living in Kentucky, became concerned about the cruel treatment faced by slaves on a neighboring plantation. After secretly meeting with the slaves, Webb urged them to gather roots that were then placed into bags. The slaves then walked around their own quarters a few times and positioned the bags in front of their master's abode during the morning hours. These steps were taken to induce their master to have dreams about the slaves gaining retribution for past wrongs. Shortly after, the master reportedly began to treat the slaves decidedly better, and Webb's influence over the slaves was to increase dramatically as a result (Blassingame, 1972, p. 110).

In a case related to Henry Clay Bruce by a female slave from Amelia County, Virginia, a conjurer was said to have been employed to aid about 30 slaves who were fearing their imminent sale to the cotton fields of Alabama in the year 1800. Hearing of a conjurer living 10 miles away from the plantation, the slaves pooled their resources to pay him to set a hand or a jack on their master. After receiving 10 dollars in payment, this conjurer > went to the front door steps of the great house about twelve o'clock that night, dug a small hole under the ground step, took from his pocket a little ball, talked to it a while in a whisper, then kissed it and put it in the hole, and covered it carefully and came away. (Blassingame, 1972, p. 56)

The key was insuring that the master actually stepped over the hand; if that did not occur, then all the conjurer's preparations and incantations to make the charm effective would have been a wasted effort. Fortunately for those slaves, the next morning they "saw [the master] come down the steps and walk around a while, then go back over this particular step." It was thought that this insured the success of the hand. In any case, the slaves were never sold to Alabama (Blassingame, 1972, pp. 56-57).

Fugitive slave Henry Bibb related similar experiences. According to Bibb, the general prescription for dealing with an abusive master was "some kind of bitter root," which the slave was directed to chew and spit in the direction of their master. Along with the root were "certain kinds of powders, to sprinkle about their master's dwellings. This is all done for the purpose of defending themselves in some peaceable manner" (Levine, 1977, p. 72; Osofsky, 1969, p. 70). After a conjurer gave Bibb the protective powders and roots, he did not receive a whipping for leaving the plantation without permission. Bibb firmly trusted in the powers conveyed to him, claiming that he had "great faith in conjuration and witch-craft," which led him to believe that he could do what he pleased without getting flogged. Thus emboldened, he left the plantation again without his master's permission. On his return, Bibb's master punished him for absconding, but he added, "I did not believe that he could do it, while I had the root and dust" (Bibb, 1849, pp. 26-27; Blassingame, 1972, pp. 110-113).

Unfortunately for Bibb, however, his master was so enraged at his slave's "saucy" retorts that he "grasped a handful of switches and punished [him] severely, in spite of all [his] roots and powders." Despite the seeming failure of the charms of protection, Bibb was to consult yet another conjurer who gave him a concoction composed of fresh cow manure, red pepper, and hair from a White man's head to safeguard Bibb from further abuse by his master. That Bibb was to continue believing in conjure even after evidence that the protective charms did not work is indicative of how much sway this practice had in the slave community (Bibb, 1849, pp. 25-31; Levine, 1977, p. 70).

Even the failure of these charms to protect slaves from their masters or from other Whites could be explained without disturbing the foundations of these spiritual beliefs. Henry Clay Bruce (1969) claimed that if a slave with a protective hand or jack > got whipped, and so reported to the old conjuror, he would promptly claim one of three things, either that someone removed the jack, or that the fellow had failed to carry out instructions, or had no faith in the jack, and therefore was deserving of punishment. (p. 53)

Not only did conjurers claim to possess supernatural abilities and charms to protect fellow slaves, these spiritualists were also able, at times, to avoid their own punishment from Whites. Susan Snow, an ex-slave from Wilcox County, Alabama, testified that her mother was a Black African who could not be whipped by her master. This was due to Snow's mother being > a "conger" and dey was all scared of till the next day to get somebody to help tie her up, den he'd forget to whip her. Dey used to say she was a "conger" and dey was all scared of her. (Yetman, 1970, p. 290)

This fear was perhaps associated with conjurers having command over both esoteric and mundane means of retribution. Their knowledge of roots and herbs gave them the simultaneous ability to cure the ailing and to poison wrongdoers. This skill in creating toxic substances made Gullah Jack Pritchard, one of the key conspirators in the 1822 Denmark Vesey conspiracy, a feared presence among the Whites of Charleston, South Carolina. One of his contingency plans, in case the rebellion failed or was betrayed, was so frightening that all mention of it was intentionally omitted from the version of the trial record made publicly available by judges Lionel Kennedy and Thomas Parker. Henry Haig, one of the conspirators who turned state's witness, told the court that Jack > was going to give me a bottle with poison to put into my Master's pump and into as many pumps as he could about town, and he said he wanted to give the other bottles to those he could trust to [sic]. (Freehling, 1986, pp. 38-39; Killens, 1970, pp. xxiii-xxv; Pearson, 1999, pp. xvii, 1, 196).

John Blassingame (1972) argued that conjurers were "industrious enough to avoid punishment" and, in turn, told their slave comrades that "they were not punished because they had cast a spell on their masters" (p. 109). This was not always the case, however. In William Wells Brown's (1968) discussion of the conjurer Dinkie, industriousness alone did not explain his uncanny ability to avoid punishment. In fact, Dinkie was known to never work but was also never beaten or sold. Typically wearing a "snake's skin around his neck, carr[ying] a petrified frog in one pocket, and a dried lizard in the other," Dinkie was such a feared figure on the plantation that Brown claimed he was his own master (Blassingame, 1972, p. 113; Brown, 1968, pp. 10, 70-71, 79-80; Levine, 1977, p. 74).

Not only were conjurers thought to be able to protect themselves and others from punishment at the hands of Whites, it was also believed that they could foretell the outcome of rebellions and runaway attempts. This ability was said to have saved Philip, the blind preacher, from execution in the trials following the Denmark Vesey conspiracy. Philip predicted the disastrous outcome of the plot and discouraged slaves from continuing on their ill-fated path. In similar fashion, Frederick Douglass received a warning from Sandy Jenkins, who informed Douglass about a series of dreams he had while slaves on the plantation were plotting a mass escape. Sandy's interpretation of the dreams did not bode well for the conspirators, and he told Douglass (1969) "dare is sumpon in [that dream]; dare is, indeed, honey" (pp. 284-285). Despite these warnings, the slaves continued their plans. On the morning of the escape, Douglass himself had a premonition: "I had a sudden presentiment, which flashed upon me like lightning in a dark night . . . . I instantly turned to Sandy Jenkins, who was near me, and said to him, 'Sandy, we are betrayed'; something just told me so." Sandy replied to Douglass, "Man, dat is strange; but I feel just as you do." Within minutes, the plan was revealed, and the slaves were placed into custody (Douglass, 1969, p. 289; Levine, 1977, p. 69).

At times, the predictions of slave fortune tellers had positive outcomes. Uncle Frank of St. Louis, Missouri, described by William Wells Brown as a slave who "was very distinguished (not only among the slave population, but also the whites) as a fortune-teller," once predicted that Brown would successfully escape bondage. After being paid a fee of 25 cents, Uncle Frank gazed into a gourd filled with water and immediately relayed the results. Brown (1969) would later query "whether the old man was a prophet, or the son of a prophet, I cannot say; but there is one thing certain, many of his predictions were verified" (pp. 40-41).

In a more famous case, Harriet Tubman had frequent premonitions and visions while helping slaves escape from bondage. Sarah Bradford, Tubman's biographer, remarked that "she is the most shrewd and practical person in the world, yet she is a firm believer in omens, dreams, and warnings." Tubman reportedly had dreams that foretold her flight from bondage, helped her avoid pursuers during her missions in the South, and predicted the Civil War and the eventual emancipation of all slaves 3 years before these events actually occurred. According to Tubman, her father was the source of these abilities because he had an uncanny skill of predicting the weather and even foretold the Mexican-American War (Bradford, 1993, pp. 73-75, 92, 114-115).

CONCLUSION

Based on evidence derived from trial records, slave narratives, interviews, autobiographies, and other sources, a composite sketch of the "typical" slave conjurer can be drawn. Conjurers were often isolated ascetics, living on the margins of the slave community and wrapped in mystery. Their elevated status on the plantation and their mastery over mystical forces made them simultaneously feared and respected. These spiritualists claimed to possess a variety of supernatural powers including the ability to communicate with the spirit world and the power to heal the sick, and many claimed possession of second sight or the ability to foretell future events through interpreting visions and dreams. Their command of esoteric forces and other-worldly knowledge allowed them to gain influence over slaves, which resulted in conjurers playing central roles in various acts of slave resistance. In terms of their collective belief in conjure and magic, North American slaves shared similar cultural experiences with Africans throughout the Atlantic world. This conclusion, then, firmly situates the North American slave experience into context with other diasporic slave societies, while underscoring the notion that far from being accommodationists, North American conjurers were vital in the creation of a revolutionary consciousness among fellow enslaved Africans.

NOTES

1. The various terms Koromantyn, Coromantee, Coromantin, Kormantine, Kromantine, and Cormentine all refer to an important trading port located on the Gold Coast of Africa during the 17th and 18th centuries. The correct appellation, Kromantine, was the name of a key commercial region controlled by the Fante Kingdom of Efutu. Africans exported from this region of West Africa were principally Akan speakers.

AASP Fall Business Meeting

Friday, November 19, 2010
7:00-8:00 a.m.

Attendance: Ousseina Alidou, Chair (Rutgers), Amadou Fofana, Vice-Chair (Willamette), Ibigbolade Aderibigbe (Georgia), Devon Adjei (U. Michigan), Kelly Askew (U. Michigan), Maimouna Basso (Illinois), Judi Byfield (Cornell), James Delehanty (Wisconsin), Jacob Fisseha (MSU), Maria Grosz-Ngaté (Indiana), Tim Longman (Boston), Zoliswa Mali (Boston), Garth Myers (Kansas), Samuel Obeng (Indiana), James Pritchett (Michigan State), Aimbale Twagilimana (Buffalo State), Kiarie Wa'Njogu (Yale), Jennifer Yanco (WARA/Boston)

Meeting called to order at 7:10 am

Review of 2010 spring meeting minutes

Minutes from spring business meeting reviewed. Clarification was made on page 2 by inserting a space between Sam's question about GPS programs and the answer, which was generated through subsequent discussion.

3rd page discussion of SCALI. Strike incorrect phrase: "only MSU students receive a discount."

Motion made to approve the minutes by Garth Myers. Seconded by Sam Obeng.

Introductions and announcements

- Introductions made of all in attendance
- Dates of spring AASP conference have been set for May 31-April 2, 2011 at SAIS.

Budget report

- Judy will send out reminders about dues.
- Current account balance $3,975. Awards were not conferred last year, which explains healthy budget. Do want to give out awards.

Discussion – International African studies networks

Proposal to bring together all ASA organizations worldwide for a meeting. European AEGIS organization actively seeking North American members, represented at this ASA meeting by Paul Nugent (Edinburgh) and Ulf Engel (Leipzig). Other organizations in Canada, Japan and China.

Discussion – GPA programs

Question raised of whether proposals should be accepted from any who wish to submit rather than current process of word of mouth. Need to revisit issue.

Might be worthwhile to establish a review committee and formal application process through joint AASP and ALTA. Jennifer Yarco suggested Hausa GPA. Question of what the process would be to apply for a program.

James Pritchett suggested that in the past there was a process in place to review applications. Application deadline October 15 with awards announced in August for the following summer. Decisions made at the Spring meeting 2011.

Call for committee at this meeting and request concept papers. AASP sends a letter of endorsement with vetted (?) proposals to DOE (?). Suggested it would be a bad idea to send competiting applications. Yesterday vote held 11 to 2 in favor of no competition and to submit applications as clusters.

The joint committee of AASP and ALTA ensures Director buy-in. Suggested that people can submit concept papers and potentially form joint proposal.

Aimable suggested that AASP documents the process of applying for endorsement.

Agreed to ask ALTA to suggest 2 people and AASP 2 people to form a committee. Goal to hold a virtual meeting and

Final AASP representatives- Kiarie Njogu (Yale) and Aimable Twagilimana

Discussion items – SCALI and FLAS scholarships

Kelly raised the question about SCALI funding for non-NRC institutions: when is it determined that extra FLAS are available? Students from any institution can apply for FLAS through any institution. Advised to have U-M students apply to the host institutions. May be less money available than before.

- now undergraduate FLAS's
- cannot fund non-NRC students for abroad travel only to SCALI
- allowable to roll over funds

Discussion of joint website in future to coordinate applications from outside institutions. Currently all outside students should apply to Florida and Florida will keep track of who has applied from where.

Other matters

Maimouna nominated and elected as Vice-Chair of AASP

Requested nominations for Wiley awards for smaller institutions to attend the spring meeting. Now accepting applications.

The undergraduate African studies program at Howard needs letters of support. Suggested letter of support from AASP.

Encouraged to bring other institution along to the AASP meeting as many NRCS included a budget item in their NRC applications to fund another smaller institution to attend. Reminder to do this for this upcoming meeting.

Subject: [isfaculty] April 13 - Appreciation Banquet

SPC Instructors -
Two weeks from today is the Instructor Appreciation Banquet - Wednesday, April 13, starting at 6:00 in the Trillium Room here at the Friday Center. Many of you have already responded and we are delighted at those who are planning to attend. But, you can still RSVP and we hope that you will decide to attend; as the invitation said, you are welcome to bring a guest.

We realize that many of you are not in this area and that it would be quite a bit of travel to attend. We regret that we can't bring the banquet to you to show our thanks, but please realize how much we do appreciate your efforts to make your courses available for students through Self-paced Courses.

If you are planning to come, please let Judith Benowitz know (benowitz@email.unc.edu or 919-962-6302) so that we can have enough seats for everyone. Our retiring director, Norm Loewenthal, will be our keynote speaker and we'll be awarding the Friday Center Excellence in Teaching Award. Come join us on the 13th!

Hope to see you then.

Dear Colleagues,

The UNC Partnership for National Security, an initiative of the UNC System, focuses on matching education, research and training needs of the United States Military with UNC system subject matter experts.

The University received a request to identify expertise within our system to provide short-courses (1 - 5 days in duration) in support of the US Army's Civil Affairs mission and to conduct development projects involving Civil Information Management and associated technologies. 95th Civil Affairs Brigade Soldiers enable military commanders and U.S. Ambassadors to improve relationships with various stakeholders around the world. These soldiers help host nations assess the needs of an area, bring together local and non-local resources to ensure peace through long-term stability. They may be involved in disaster prevention, management, and recovery, and with human and civil infrastructure assistance programs. Please see the list of 8 short-courses and 4 projects requested by the 95th Civil Affairs Brigade (USASOC) at Fort Bragg, NC. Please handle this as a request-for-proposals and distribute the list of projects and short-courses widely within your faculty. Faculty should have a desire to train adult learners and a genuine interest in supporting the Civil Affairs mission.

All training will be conducted at Ft. Bragg, North Carolina or at a relevant campus, as required. Faculty will be compensated for their time and travel. Letters of interest, including the qualifications of the team conducting these projects and training and a description of how the project or short-course would be implemented (including a syllabus), should be sent to Kimrey Rhinehardt, Vice President for Federal Relations at kwr@northcarolina.edu. Faculty may contact Dr. Tom Losordo, Faculty Advisor for Military Affairs (UNC GA), directly at tlosordo@northcarolina.edu for more information on a specific project or short-course.

Thank you for your time and consideration of this request.

Kimrey Rhinehardt
Vice President for Federal Relations

Requirements Identified by the 95th Civil Affairs Brigade:
1. Assistance identifying measurable indicators of political, economic or social instability: As part of our methodology, we seek to identify civil vulnerabilities that can be or are being exploited by counter-state actors and then implement programs, projects or activities to mitigate or eliminate these vulnerabilities. We conduct a wide range of assessments, and these assessments tend to be fairly exhaustive, but these assessments, in some cases, work at the periphery of identifying a civil vulnerability rather than directly identifying the vulnerability. We could use assistance from political and social scientists to help identify measurable indicators that more directly portend the civil vulnerabilities we seek to identify.
(a) Duration: Ongoing assistance, or one time project.
(b) Recurrence: As needed/requested.

2. Statistical analysis of field polling results: The Brigade uses a USAID-designed tool to poll local populations called the District Stability Framework DSF, of which the Tactical Conflict Assessment and Planning Framework (TCAPF) is a part. While TCAPF is a useful tool for helping to identify civil vulnerabilities and societal friction points, it lacks the statistical rigor of most formal polling. We can use assistance applying statistical tools, spatially and temporally, to help interpret polling results, to include assistance identifying correlation vs. causal relation between local trends and our actions.
(a) Duration: Ongoing assistance, or one time project.
(b) Recurrence: As needed/requested.

3. Trend identification and analysis: The Brigade's central repository of geo-spatially referenced civil information contains over 6,000 data points spread throughout the world. Deployed teams are actively collecting and analyzing these data points. These data points potentially offer more robust and deeper insights into trends within an area, but our teams are limited in their analysis by their level of subject-matter expertise. With the assistance of subject-matter experts, we can gain greater insights and more productive analysis out of the data we have collected.
(a) Duration: Ongoing assistance, or one time project.
(b) Recurrence: As needed/requested.

4. Request for Information (RFI) Tracking System: The Brigade will add "UNC" as a reach back team within the Civil Affairs Operating System's (CAOS) RFI Tracking system. This system is accessible to all CA personnel and will allow for a repository of RFI's to include original request, UNC Subject Matter Experts (SMEs) and product deliverables. The Brigade's system will be inter-operable with any UNC internal web-based tracking system/database.
Assistance from the NC State Institute for Next Generation IT System:
(4.1) Data compression - As we expand our suite of collective devices in CAOS to includes COTS systems, we will need to compress the data we collect in order to transmit it to our server more efficiently.
(4.2) Data mining- We have enormous quantities of legacy civil information stored on hard drives that needs to be populated into CAOS/WCID. We are in need of a search tool that can data mine unstructured data and structure in into a form that will then allow us to upload the data to WCID.

(4.3) System optimization - UNC/NCSU will provide consultation on how we can optimize the CAOS system (database, web services, etc.).

(a) Duration: Ongoing assistance, or one time project.
(b) Recurrence: As needed/requested.

5. African studies: Focus on West Africa, specifically Mauritania, Senegal, Mali, Nigeria and Chad. The focus should be a mixture of history for the region or specific country. What defines the people and the various ethnic cultures, and outstanding issues. The intent is to gain more insight on problems from a local perspective.

(a) Duration: The duration can be from a couple of days to one week.
(b) Recurrence: The best window for training would be the May-July time frame.

6. Agricultural and Resource economy: The focus should be on agricultural programs in developing countries from grass roots level to national level initiatives. This should be of course tailored to the continent if possible so that the information is more relevant. This would give our soldiers tools for working with USDA, and would compliment what our veterinarians already offer the teams.

(a) Duration: Two to five days.
(b) Recurrence: The best window for training would be the May-July.

7. Effective Writing: As a whole, our basic writing skills are not to par for US Diplomatic cables and reports. Soldiers must be able to articulate themselves in active voice, within three to four sentences. Furthermore, Soldiers must be able to write Executive Summaries in active voice, under one typed page.

(a) Duration: Two to three days.
(b) Recurrence: Once per pre-mission training cycle or twice a year.

8. Developmental Economics: Soldiers need to be able to quantify civil data according to a standard metric used by NGOs, IGOs, and governments. Knowing the standard measures of developmental economics would allow Soldiers to conduct a more in depth analysis of civil data as well as share that data with partner agencies in a common language.

(a) Duration: 1 day seminar.
(b) Recurrence: Once per year.

9. Value Chain Analysis: Civil Affairs Soldiers implement targeted small scale projects aimed at addressing civil vulnerabilities in populations. Soldiers must be able to analyze local governments and communities as value producing systems when determining which projects to choose. The course would be oriented towards Value Chain Analysis of civil systems producing good governance and stability. This would allow Soldiers to better understand the cause and effect relationships between different nodes in the system and the impact their interventions would have.

(a) Duration: 1 day seminar.
(b) Recurrence: Once per year.

10. Political Science: Several courses outlining the government structure and electoral processes in the countries under the Pacific Command (i.e. Philippines, Bangladesh, Indonesia, Sri Lanka, and Cambodia). The courses should then detail the informal political power structure represented by tribes, family, and religion and the interaction between the two modes of governance. Soldiers must be able to understand which spheres and levels of society are dominated by each power structure and why.

(a) Duration: 1 day seminar per country, 5 countries.
(b) Recurrence: Once per pre-mission training cycle or twice a year.

11. Communism to Democracy: A course covering historical examples of countries that have transitioned from Communist societies to Capitalist Democracies. This would include an overview of the inner workings of Communist governments and their relationship to the populations they govern. This would be followed by historical examples of pitfalls countries making the transition have faced and best practices for overcoming those hurdles.

(a) Duration: 1 day seminar.

(b) Recurrence: One per year.

12. Construction and Engineering Management: Civil Affairs Soldiers implement targeted small scale projects aimed at addressing civil vulnerabilities in populations. Soldiers must be able to effectively nominate these projects, negotiate contracts for projects, and effectively manage and over see completion of the project.

(a) Duration: 4 weeks.

(b) Recurrence: Once per PMT cycle or twice a year. Tentatively for the year 2011 would be during the months of April and November.

Jen,
The reason I contacted you is because I feel that the department of African and Afro-American Studies maintains a huge presence at UNC-CH. Also, Planet Aid works parallel with your Departmental Mission "The current goal of African and Afro-American Studies at UNC-CH is to give specific and precise attention to the histories, cultures, and cultural linkages of the peoples of Africa and their descendants in the New World."
In our changing culture climate, the faces of those we serve are diverse and their needs must be met with creativity. Planet Aid is unique in its commitment to addressing the world and its people. I was hoping to set-up an appointment to meet with you and discuss possibly constructing a program with the department of African and Afro-American Studies. Here is some basic information on Planet Aid…

Planet Aid Profile:

Planet Aid is a non-profit organization dedicated to improving the lives of people in developing countries. Our objectives include development, protecting the environment, and relief aid. Our activities in the US fall into these categories: Clothes Collection and Recycling, Partnership in Development and sharing Information about development issues. We mobilize surplus resources in North America for use in development activities in Africa, and Asia. Planet Aid has clothes collection boxes in about 19 states in North America with over 8,000 boxes. Planet Aid has been servicing NC for 9 years.

International Development:

At Planet Aid we are committed to supporting the poorest and most needy people of the world. We recognize the relationship between the distribution and use of the Earth's finite resources and the poverty and lack of basic necessities that the majority of the world's population experiences. Since Planet Aid started collecting clothes in 1997, the world population has grown by more than a billion people and the sad fact is that, worldwide, the amount of poor and starving people in absolute numbers has slowly been rising year-by-year since Planet Aid started in 1997.

Through grants and funds raised via our recycling program Planet Aid has supported more than 50 different programs in 15 countries over the years. In 2008 alone, Planet Aid provided $16.8 million in direct and in-kind support for training of teachers, small-scale farming, Child Aid and community development, vocational training and the fight against HIV & AIDS.

In Africa:

- Angola
- Botswana
- Democratic Republic of Congo
- Malawi
- Mozambique
- South Africa
- Zambia
- Zimbabwe

How our Program helps your environment.
By recycling and reusing textiles, Planet Aid has been able to help reduce water and pesticide usage in cotton production. This has been able to save on average 74 billion gallons of water per year, and reduce pesticide spraying by 21 million pounds yearly. Recycling also saves precious landfill space. In 2008 alone, Planet Aid was able to save landfills from 102 million pounds of textile waste. This also preserved over 200 square miles of farm land (equal to 6 times the size of Manhattan, NY), which would have been used for growing cotton for textile production. The reduction of CO_2 is another crucial benefit of Planet Aids recycling program. On average, 1 lb. of clothes sold as second hand clothing will save 5.8 lbs. of CO_2, while 1lb. of recycled fibers will save 1.7 lbs. of CO_2. Not only is Planet Aid's recycling program providing affordable clothing to those in need, it is going a long way in preserving our most important natural resources.

I would love to come and meet with you and discuss our possibilities.

Thank you for your time and consideration.

Kindest Regards,

Megan Atkins - Planet Aid

Subject: Position Authorizations Effective July 2012

We are continuing with our state budget planning process for fiscal year 2011-2012 amidst great uncertainty. We do not expect significant state support for additional faculty positions for fiscal year 2011-2012. Nevertheless, we must plan ahead so that we are prepared to act should state budget decisions made later this year create opportunities. For this reason, we ask that you submit your authorization requests for faculty positions effective July 2012.

It is unlikely that we will be able to authorize more than one hire in any one department this year. Thus be sure to prioritize your requests if you ask for more than one position. Do NOT include requests for positions that have already been authorized. Positions for which you are searching (or completed a search) this year will automatically carry over to next year if the search is not successful this year.

New position authorization requests should be submitted online at http://www.surveymonkey.com/s/req-new-pos no later than May 23rd at 5pm. We will review these requests over the summer and make position authorizations as quickly as possible after the 2011/2012 state budget allocations and reductions have been finalized (which we hope will be no later than August, 2011).

Subject: Politics and Transition in the New South Sudan

INTERNATIONAL CRISIS GROUP - NEW REPORT

Politics and Transition in the New South Sudan

Juba/Nairobi/Brussels, 4 April 2011: Now that South Sudan's self-determination has been realised, long-suppressed grievances and simmering political disputes have re-surfaced, threatening instability on the eve of independence.

Politics and Transition in the New South Sudan, the latest report from the International Crisis Group, cautions that unless there is an opening of political space and a participatory transition, the soon to be independent government risks recreating the kind of centralised, authoritarian and ultimately unstable state it finally managed to escape. The ruling Sudan People's Liberation Movement (SPLM) cobbled together an important, though tentative, Southern consensus ahead of the January 2011 referendum. But its choke-hold on power and a "winner-takes-all" approach to the transition have since jeopardised those gains. Meanwhile, armed insurgencies, militia activity and army defections highlight internal fault lines and latent grievances within the security sector.

"A politics of exclusion threatens further polarisation of ethnic communities and their political leaders", says Zach Vertin, Crisis Group Sudan Analyst. "The nascent state can ill-afford further antagonism, particularly when the challenges in realising independence and managing domestic security concerns make Southern unity all the more important".

The SPLM should recognise that meaningful opposition participation is not a threat to, but an investment in, stability and legitimate rule. Opposition parties share responsibility for pursuing common national interests, shouldering national responsibilities and developing a robust multi-party system. International partners must re-calibrate relations with the government to reflect new political realities, including the need to cultivate greater democratic space within and beyond the ruling party, in the wake of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA) - the treaty that ended the two decades of civil war in 2005 and that concludes in July, concurrent with Southern independence.

The liberation struggle is over, and the CPA era is coming to a close; the SPLM must mark a new chapter in its own evolution if it is to maintain cohesion and deliver in government. Party reforms should aim to manage internal divisions, erode a top-down military culture, professionalise operations and trade coercion for enhanced internal dialogue.

Once independent, a series of governance issues - most notably sound management of oil resources and a more tangible commitment to decentralisation - will shape the political and economic structure of the emerging state and help manage sky-high post-independence expectations. Each can be a vehicle for empowering state and local politics and accelerating development in the new South.

"The months ahead present a considerable opportunity, but it comes amid enormous challenges", says Ernst Jan Hogendoorn, Crisis Group Horn of Africa Project Director. "Failing to start on the right foot could undermine progress already achieved in the South and contaminate the institutions and institutional values in Africa's youngest state".

Opening this Friday: A Season of German Art and Culture

On Friday, April 8, the Ackland opens two spectacular exhibitions of German art: Romantic Dreams | Rude Awakenings explores German prints and drawings informed by the tumultuous century 1840-1940, while DE-NATURED presents a complex and compelling introduction to the art of post-war Germany.

OPENING EVENTS Thursday, April 7

5:00 PM | Exhibition Galleries Open to the Public
5:30-7:00 PM | Panel Discussion
"Multiple Identities: New Thinking about Recent German Art"
Seating is limited.
7:00-9:00 PM | Public Reception

April 14
Curator's Clinic
1:00 - 4:00 PM

April 14

What is the role of art in times of darkness? German artists, confronted with the urgency of this question during the second half of the twentieth century, saw art as a means to reflect upon catastrophic events. This series examines German filmmakers' responses to the incomprehensibility of violence, terror, and self-destruction that was associated with their national identity.

Free and open to the public.
Location: Varsity Theater, East Franklin Street, Downtown Chapel Hill.

April 9, 3:00 PM: Our Hitler (Hans-Jürgen Syberberg, 1977)

One of the most aesthetically daring films about one of the most controversial figures of world history, Our Hitler examines the culture that made Hitler possible. In it, Hans-Jürgen Syberberg develops a new film aesthetic, using artificial sets, fragments of historical speeches, puppets, staged monologues, and an intensive engagement with the German musical tradition to reflect upon the catastrophic history of Germany.

Gabriel Trop, Department of Germanic Languages and Literatures, will give a pre-film talk at 2:15 PM. Meet in the Ackland Museum lobby.

Upcoming:
April 16: Sugarbaby (Percy Adlon, 1985)
Film: 7:00 PM
April 30: Lessons of Darkness (Werner Herzog, 1992)

Subject: [asddd] Important - Annual Report open for faculty
Attach: College Annual Report Faculty Manual.pdf

This message is being sent to all faculty in the College of Arts and Sciences with a copy to unit chairs/directors and administrative managers.

The College Annual report system is now open for faculty to summarize their activities and accomplishments. Based on input the Annual Report Committee received from departments, a new version of the Annual Report system has been developed to streamline the process and make the reporting easier and more efficient for faculty, chairs, and administrators. The attached help document explains the design and navigation for the new system. Please contact OASIS for additional help.

All faculty in the College of Arts and Sciences are required to prepare for their department or curricula an annual report of some of your activities and accomplishments for the period May 1, 2010 to April 30, 2011. These reports are used for a variety of assessment and evaluation purposes within your units, but they are also an important component of the units' required report to the College of Arts and Sciences.

The deadline for completing your report is April 29, 2011. Please bookmark the new system address - https://apps4.oasis.unc.edu/car/

Stewardship:

You may also be prompted to complete a tab labeled "Stewardship." This section is included if you have received funding from private sources.

The Arts and Sciences Foundation produces letters to donors on the use of these funds. These reports benefit your department and the College of Arts and Sciences in future fund-raising efforts.

If you have questions about the Stewardship section, please contact one of the following staff members at the Arts & Sciences Foundation: Del Helton, del.helton@unc.edu, 962-8216, Jim Magaw, jim.magaw@unc.edu, 962-6123, or Joanna Cardwell, joanna.cardwell@unc.edu, 962-8342.

Please note that your contributions last spring helped the Arts and Sciences Foundation produce nearly 600 letters to our generous College donors. This annual "stewardship report" explains how the fund was used and includes information about the fund's investment performance. Donors often respond with a thank-you note in appreciation.

We very much appreciate your assistance with another round of outstanding stewardship letters.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR ACCESSING THE ANNUAL REPORT SYSTEM AND STEWARDSHIP

1) https://apps4.oasis.unc.edu/car/

2) Login with your onyen and onyen password

3) You can access the Stewardship system through a tab on the Annual Report.

*For responses from previous years – Previous system.

Your Onyen

Website: http://onyen.unc.edu

Your ONYEN is the first part of your email address, e.g. for an email address of jdoe(at)email.unc.edu your ONYEN is "jdoe" without the quotes.

If you lose or forget your ONYEN password, you can get a new one by taking your UNC One Card (or another picture ID) to IT Response Center at Wilson Library suite 300. It is not possible to recover your old password. For security reasons, you can get a new password only with a picture ID.

If you have forgotten your ONYEN you may look it up by selecting the "Forgotten Onyen" button and supplying your last name and your PID.

College of Arts and Sciences: Annual Report System

Overview

The online College annual report system has been redesigned for the 2010-2011 reporting period. A primary goal of the redesign was to make it easier for reporters to enter data into the system.

The general work flow of the application will be:

1. sign on
2. verify onyen, reporting period, departmental affiliations
3. answer questions on 9 pages
4. upload your CV
5. mark your report as complete
6. review your report
7. sign out

Access and Logon: where is it?

https://apps4.oasis.unc.edu/car Once you click on that link, you will be presented with the following login screen:

Provide your onyen and password to access the annual report system

College of Arts and Sciences: Annual Report System

Verify your affiliations

After a successful sign on, you will be sent to the first page in the system, the profile page:

The profile page presents some information that you, the reporter, must verify. Make sure that the onyen, the current year and the home/primary department is correct. You can easily change your primary department with the radio buttons.

All departments in the "Affiliated Units" section will be able to view your report. You do NOT need to fill out a report for each department.

In the example above, the reporter with an onyen of lerch is doing a report for the 2010-2011 reporting period and is affiliated with 2 departments. Note how the OASIS department is selected as the primary.

College of Arts and Sciences: Annual Report System

System Navigation: getting around within the system

The faculty/reporter part of the system consists of several pages, all with the navigation buttons "Back" and "Save and continue". Choosing “Back” will save any changes and send you to the previous page. “Save and Continue” will save any changes and send the reporter to the next page.

Here is an example of what the buttons look like (keep in mind that these buttons are at the bottom of each report page):

Sections of the report are also provided (right side menu) to navigate to any page within the report. Using these links will save the work you have already done on the current page.

Session time out

The annual report system will logout automatically after 30 minutes of inactivity and your work will not be saved. Remember to save your work before moving to another task.

Also, a pop up dialog will appear when only 5 minutes remain:

If you anticipate that an answer to a question(s) may take longer than 30 minutes, it may be necessary to draft the reply in a word process or text editor. Replies can be cut and pasted from the word processor.

College of Arts and Sciences: Annual Report System

Question Pages

The majority of the pages in the report system are in a question and answer format. Publications, creative activities, teaching, university service, internal funding, professional activities, public service, unit questions, and comments are all question/answer pages.

Replies to the questions are in one of several formats.

1. A small text box for numeric and short text answers (#6 below),
2. A larger, multi-line text box for more lengthy answers (#8 below), or
3. Radio button selections (#7 below).

6. Number of former graduate student coauthors:
7. Did any undergraduates you supervise present or perform their work at an off-campus meeting or venue this year?
   ○ Yes ◉ No
8. If yes, please list the event(s) below with the names of the students below each event listed.

9. Did any undergraduates you supervise participate in an on-campus presentation/performance

Once the questions have been answered, you may click one of "Back" button, "Save and continue" button, or one of the direct-to-page links. Any of these will save your work.

Attachments Page

The attachment page allows you to attach uploaded files to your report. At this time, the only attachment required is your current CV, although your department may require other documents:

To add an attachment, click on the "(+) Add Attachment" link on the upper right hand side of the page. You will see the following:

Use the browse button to locate your CV file on your computer. Enter a description such as "My CV for 2010-2011" and then click the "Save" button. Please note that there is a limit on the size of the file you wish to upload of 2000 Kilobytes (2 Megabytes). This should accommodate most CVs in Microsoft Word or PDF format.

College of Arts and Sciences: Annual Report System

Status Page

The status page allows you to indicate whether or not you are have completed the annual report:

Click the appropriate choice of "In Progress" or "Complete" and then save the choice by clicking "Save and continue". This status is used to inform your department and the college that you are done with your report for the current reporting period. It should be noted that you are still able to make changes to your report even if it is marked as "completed". You may amend your report until the system closes according to the schedule released by the Dean's Office.

Summary Page

The summary page is a reporting page that summarizes all your input into the system for the given report period. An image/link is provided to download the summary in PDF format:

Click the image on the page to download a pdf version of your report. Your report summary is viewable online at anytime even when the reporting period is closed. The "save to pdf" option is provided in case you want a file/print version of your summary.

Getting Help

If a technical issue arises or if you have some question regarding the system, some links are provided near the bottom of every page in the system:

Clicking on the "Request for help" link will produce an email that is sent directly to us (Oasis). If you see an error message, please copy and paste it into the email along with some description of what you were trying to do (I typed in my response to the questions and clicked the save button and bam there's an error message). If you have a question on how to use the system please ask that in your email.

If you have feedback regarding the system itself, click the "Feedback" link. This will send an email to Oasis management who will address your comments or concerns.

Logging Off

A link is provided on the upper right hand corner of all pages. Clicking it will present you with a choice of "Quitting" or "Signing Out":

The distinction is explained in the box. The bottom line is that if you plan on doing some more work on the annual report system, choose "quit" instead of "sign out".

Title: Last Day to Participate in Survey about Changing from Blackboard to Sakai
Date: Monday, April 11, 2011
Time: Unspecified

Description: Important news about Blackboard to Sakai transition
Sakai will replace Blackboard as UNC-Chapel Hill's learning management system by December 2012. To make the transition as easy as possible for faculty and graduate student teaching assistants, ITS is asking for feedback as follows:
Please take this short survey (http://tinyurl.com/prefs) to select which semester you prefer to begin teaching with Sakai (you may begin as soon as Fall 2011) and your preferred method of Sakai assistance such as workshops and one-to-one consultations. The five-question survey closes on Monday, April 11.
Two information sessions are scheduled on Monday, April 4 at 10 a.m. in Peabody Hall 08 and on Monday, April 18 at 1 p.m. in Toy Lounge, Dey Hall.

Topics include a brief overview of Sakai, the migration timeline and support processes and an opportunity for questions, suggestions and ideas.

For more information on the transition from Blackboard to Sakai, please visit http://sakai.unc.edu/

Hello,

This email is to inform that the location of your final exam has changed.

Your class:

AFRI 266.001

Regularly held on/at:

Wed at 4-6:50pm in PE 216

Has been relocated to:

PH (Phillips) 220

This change is ONLY for the final exam; not the rest of the semester. This class was moved due to room scheduling conflicts and has been relocated to a similar room. The exam will still be held at the regular exam time. Please make sure your students and anyone else involved with this class is aware of this change. If you have any questions please let us know. Thank you and have a good day.

Subject: FORMAL NOTICE: Important Request to Check Your Directory Information

It is very important that your information is correct in the online campus directory which is part of ConnectCarolina, the University's integrated administrative system.

Because ConnectCarolina centralizes management of person information in one integrated system, any information in the directory is duplicated in all of the University's administrative systems (payroll, benefits, etc.).

The purpose of this email is to request that you check your addresses in the directory to ensure that the information is current and accurate. This request will be sent out to you on a quarterly basis.

You are requested to log-in to MyUNC (http://my.unc.edu) using your Onyen and password. Click on Update Personal Information to review and update your directory information, particularly your home and business addresses.

Your home and business addresses are explained below:

Home address: This is your "permanent" address; as such, your home address is the address where your benefits and tax forms (W-2, 1098T, etc.) will be sent. You can update your home address but you cannot delete it.

Business address: This is your University work address and, by virtue of University policy, is viewable by all. You can update your business address but you cannot delete it.

Privacy:
Any new or updated home address will be designated private unless designated to be public by you. You can make this change in the directory by logging in through the MyUNC portal and clicking Update Personal Information.

If you need help using the online campus directory, please visit the Help Desk's online help documentation: http://help.unc.edu/181 or contact the Help Desk at (919) 962-HELP (962-4357).

IMPORTANT
The 2010-2011 Printed Campus Directory was the last publication for the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. Directories in the print or CD form will no longer be available. Personal Information can continue to be accessed online at MyUNC (http://my.unc.edu). Department and Organization Information can continue to be accessed online at ITS Communication Technologies Department and Organization (D&O) Online Directory (http://www.unc.edu/dept_addr/).

Department and Organization (D&O) listings are maintained by ITS Communication Technologies and can be updated at any time throughout the year through coordination with our office. Updates cannot be changed online for D&O listings. Department administrators that require updates should contact ITS Communication Technologies by calling the ITS Help Desk at 962-HELP, or, by submitting an online Service Requisition (https://itsapps.unc.edu/telreq/).

Your time and effort is appreciated.

COLLEGE TEXTBOOKS

Enhanced Offerings Appear to Drive Recent Price Increases

Why GAO Did This Study

The federal government strives to make postsecondary education accessible and affordable, primarily by providing financial aid to students and their families. Given that nearly half of undergraduates receive federal financial aid, Congress is interested in the overall cost of attendance, including the cost of textbooks. We were asked to determine (1) what has been the change in textbook prices, (2) what factors have contributed to changes in textbook prices, and (3) what factors explain why a given U.S. textbook may retail outside the United States for a different price.

We received technical comments from the Department of Labor. The Department of Education had no comments. The National Association of College Stores generally agreed with the report's findings. The Association of American Publishers agreed with some findings but expressed concern about the data sources we used and the characterizations made by retailers and wholesalers regarding the impact of publisher practices on students. We carefully reviewed the data sources available on college textbook pricing and found the data we used to be the most complete and reliable data available for our purposes. Additionally, we sought perspectives from publishers, retailers, and used book wholesalers to ensure our characterization of the textbook industry was balanced and complete.

What GAO Found

In the last two decades, college textbook prices have increased at twice the rate of inflation but have followed close behind tuition increases. Increasing at an average of 6 percent per year, textbook prices nearly tripled from December 1986 to December 2004, while tuition and fees increased by 240 percent and overall inflation was 72 percent. The cost of textbooks as well as supplies as a percentage of tuition and fees varies for first-time, full-time, degree-seeking students by the type of institution attended—72 percent at 2-year public institutions, 26 percent at 4-year public institutions, and 8 percent for 4-year private institutions.

Annual Percentage Increase in College Textbook Prices, College Tuition and Fees, and Overall Price Inflation, December 1986 to December 2004

Source: Bureau of Labor Statistics.

While many factors affect textbook pricing, the increasing costs associated with developing products designed to accompany textbooks, such as CD-ROMs and other instructional supplements, best explain price increases in recent years. Publishers say they have increased investments in developing supplements in response to demand from instructors. Wholesalers, retailers, and others expressed concern that the proliferation of supplements and more frequent revisions might unnecessarily increase costs to students.

U.S. college textbook prices may exceed prices in other countries because prices reflect market conditions found in each country, such as the willingness and ability of students to purchase the textbook. While geographical barriers have historically limited the reentry of textbooks intended for international distribution back into the United States, known as reimportation, recent advances in electronic commerce have broken down this barrier. In response to concerns that the international availability of less expensive textbooks might negatively affect textbook sales, publishers have taken steps to limit large-scale textbook reimportation.

Congressional Requesters

The federal government endeavors to improve access to and affordability of postsecondary education, primarily by providing financial aid to students and their families. Consequently, the overall cost of postsecondary attendance, including components such as tuition and textbooks, is of national importance because escalating costs can have negative effects on access and affordability. In academic year 2003-2004, students and their families spent over $6 billion on new and used textbooks.[1] Given that nearly half of undergraduates receive federal financial aid and the cost of textbooks is one component considered in making these awards, escalating textbook prices can impact federal spending. Because of the impact on access, affordability, and federal spending, recent reports of escalating textbook prices and instances in which publishers sell U.S. textbooks in other countries at lower prices have heightened congressional concern and raised questions about textbook pricing practices. You asked us to determine (1) what has been the increase, if any, in textbook prices? (2) what factors have contributed to changes in textbook prices? and (3) what factors explain why a given U.S. textbook may retail outside the United States for a different price?

To quantify the change in college textbook prices, the Department of Labor's Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS) constructed for GAO's use a Consumer Price Index (CPI) data series that shows how the price of textbooks for consumers has changed since December 1986, the earliest date for which college textbook prices are available as part of BLS's research index. In drawing samples to compute price indices, BLS defines a textbook as any book required for a course, including books intended for general readership and packages containing the textbook and related supplements when the textbook alone has not been ordered. In order to put the price of a textbook into context, we examined the cost of tuition and fees to students and their families as tracked by the CPI since 1980. We also examined data from the Department of Education's (Education) Integrated Postsecondary Education Data System (IPEDS) to gain an understanding of the cost of textbooks and supplies (IPEDS does not disaggregate textbooks and supplies) for first-time, full-time, degree-seeking students during the course of an entire academic year, as estimated by postsecondary institutions, and the portion of the total estimated cost of tuition and fees that books and supplies represent. To determine what factors have contributed to the change in college textbook prices, we interviewed executives from five textbook publishers that account for more than 80 percent of new textbook sales; the three major national used textbook wholesalers; three companies that operate over 1,300 college textbook retail stores, or 29 percent of stores nationwide; the National Association of College Stores; the Association of American Publishers; the California and state Public Interest Research Groups; and various other industry experts. To determine what factors have led to differences in the price of some textbooks in U.S. and non-U.S. markets, we reviewed relevant economic theory and interviewed major industry players. Specifically, we spoke to representatives from textbook publishers, operators of textbook retail stores, and used book wholesalers to determine the extent to which books may be available in other countries at lower prices, and the reasons behind these price differences. A more detailed explanation of our methodology, including more information about our data sources, is in appendix I. We conducted our work between November 2004 and June 2005 in accordance with generally accepted government accounting standards.

Results in Brief

College textbook prices have risen at twice the rate of annual inflation over the last two decades, following close behind annual increases in tuition and fees at postsecondary institutions. Rising at an average of 6 percent each year since academic year 1987-1988, compared with overall average price increases of 3 percent per year, college textbook prices trailed tuition and fee increases, which averaged 7 percent per year. Since December of 1986, textbook prices have nearly tripled, increasing by 186 percent, while tuition and fees increased by 240 percent and overall prices grew by 72 percent. While increases in textbook prices have followed increases in tuition and fees, the cost of textbooks and supplies for degree-seeking students as a percentage of tuition and fees varies by the type of institution attended. For example, the average estimated cost of books and supplies per first-time, full-time student for academic year 2003-2004 was $898 at 4-year public institutions, or about 26 percent of the cost of tuition and fees. At 2-year public institutions, where low-income students are more likely to pursue a degree program and tuition and fees are lower, the average estimated cost of books and supplies per first-time, full-time student was $886 in academic year 2003-2004, representing almost three-quarters of the cost of tuition and fees.

While there are many factors that affect textbook pricing, the price of textbooks has increased in recent years, according to experts we spoke with, as a result of the increase in costs associated with new features, such as Web sites and other instructional supplements. Other factors that affect pricing include production costs, availability of used books, and the demand for textbooks. Publishers say they have increased their investments in the development of supplements to meet the demands of a changing postsecondary market. For example, publishers we spoke with cited increases in part-time faculty who need additional teaching support as a key factor that has increased demand for instructional supplements. Publishers also said instructors are requesting more supplements, such as Web-based tutorials and self-assessment tools, to enhance student learning. However, wholesalers, retailers, and others suggest that while supplements may be of value to students, the increasing practice of packaging them with textbooks effectively limits the students' ability to purchase less expensive used books. Industry representatives and public interest groups also suggested that publishers are revising textbooks more frequently, and some expressed concern about the financial impact on students. Their concern is that more frequent revisions limit the opportunity students have to reduce their costs by purchasing used textbooks and selling their textbooks back to bookstores at the end of the term. While publishers generally agreed that the revision cycle for many books is 3 to 4 years, compared with 4 to 5 years that were standard 10 to 20 years ago, they said revisions were necessary to keep the materials current for faculty and to recoup their investments.

The price of a U.S. textbook may differ when the book is sold in other countries primarily because publishers price their textbooks in order to compete in local markets, and conditions exist that limit the resale of books from lower-priced markets back to the United States. Publishers told us that they produce textbooks primarily for the U.S. market and once they have incurred development costs, they can sell textbooks at a lower price in other countries because the cost of printing additional copies to sell outside the United States is relatively low. Publishers told us they price textbooks in other countries based on local market conditions, such as income levels, the extent to which students are required to purchase textbooks, and the availability of locally published textbooks. For example, publishers told us that some U.S. textbooks are priced lower in the United Kingdom because they must compete with locally produced textbooks that are less expensive. Price differences between the United States and other countries persist because there are barriers that limit the reentry of textbooks into the United States. In some cases the cost of locating lower-priced textbooks and shipping them to the United States would result in a higher cost than purchasing them in the United States. In other cases, purchases are restricted by agreements between publishers and foreign distributors. For instance, some publishers told us that their agreements with one online retailer outside the United States limit the number of copies that can be shipped back to the United States.

We provided copies of a draft of this report to the Department of Labor and the Department of Education for review and comment. The Department of Labor provided technical comments on the use of its CPI data, which we incorporated as appropriate. The Department of Education did not have any comments. We received written comments from the National Association of College Stores (NACS) and the Association of American Publishers (AAP), the trade groups representing the companies we interviewed for this study. NACS generally agreed with our findings, stating that the report accurately portrayed the textbook industry. AAP agreed with some findings in the report, but expressed concern with respect to the data sources we used in our analyses and with characterizations provided by retailers and wholesalers on the impact of publisher practices on students. We carefully reviewed the data sources available on college textbook pricing, and found the data we used to be the most complete and reliable data available for our purposes. Additionally, we sought perspectives from publishers, retailers, and used book wholesalers, to ensure our characterization of the textbook industry was balanced and complete. Both NACS and AAP also provided technical comments, which we incorporated where appropriate.

Background

The college textbook market is complex, comprised of many publishers, retailers, and used book wholesalers. Textbooks include new and used books and can be combined with supplemental learning materials. Figure 1 illustrates the typical life cycle of a textbook and the roles of publishers, instructors, bookstores, wholesalers, and students.

Publishers develop and produce textbooks and accompanying materials for instructors and students. While there are hundreds of college textbook publishers, there has been substantial industry consolidation in recent years, with sales at five of the largest publishers representing over 80 percent of the market in 2004. Because developing a textbook involves a significant investment of time and resources, publishers carefully consider the potential risks and rewards before publishing a new textbook. Publishers consider market needs, including the size of the market and competing products. They also consider how the textbook would fit into their existing portfolios because they are more likely to publish in subject areas that complement successful existing textbooks. For example, a publisher that has successful textbooks for calculus might want to develop a textbook in an adjacent area like statistics. Publishers may also consider what value they can add by publishing a given textbook to move beyond reproducing what is already available in the market.

Publishers direct their marketing efforts at instructors, and sometimes academic departments that make the decision about the course materials they will use and ultimately require their students to purchase. Publishers employ sales representatives who often call on instructors in person to discuss product options and provide instructors with free sample textbooks and instructional materials for consideration. Publishers also market their products at professional conferences and meetings, as well as through targeted mailings. Sales representatives typically receive a base salary and have the opportunity to earn commissions based on the volume of new course materials that are sold. They receive no compensation for materials that students purchase used.

College textbook retailers collect information about the materials instructors have selected for their courses and stock them for student purchases. Located both on and off campus, college textbook retailers are made up of a diverse group of businesses including independent booksellers, campus cooperatives, and large retail chains. The National Association of College Stores reports that about half of college textbook stores are owned by the postsecondary institution they serve and one-third are operated through lease agreements by outside companies. The companies that operate stores on college and university campuses through lease agreements typically pay a commission based on the total volume of sales to the postsecondary institutions in lieu of rent. It is not uncommon for the colleges and universities that contract with them to limit the margin on textbooks.

As bookstores receive information from instructors on the books required for the upcoming term, they determine the number of textbooks to order based on factors such as estimated enrollment and previous sales. Even with information on the number of students enrolled in the class, it can be difficult to estimate the number of books students will buy because many colleges and universities are served by more than one bookstore and students may also obtain textbooks from a variety of other sources. According to the National Association of College Stores, over 900 postsecondary institutions are served by multiple bookstores, with over 70 bookstores serving the 10 largest colleges and universities. Additionally, because students now have the opportunity to purchase their textbooks via the Internet from online retailers, no bookstore is without competition.

Retailers also attempt to make used books available to students, recognizing that many students prefer to purchase used books because they are generally less expensive. Bookstores generally buy as many used textbooks from their students as possible and then turn to used textbook wholesalers to obtain additional copies. However, the demand for used textbooks is much greater than the available supply, which is estimated to be between 25 and 30 percent of all textbooks in the market. The ability of bookstores to make used books available depends, in part, on how early they are aware an instructor will use a certain title. Receiving an order for a textbook by the end of a term increases the ability bookstores have to purchase used textbooks, particularly if the book is currently being used and they can buy back the book directly from students who have finished using it. Once the supply of used books has been exhausted, bookstores complete their orders with new textbooks from publishers. When instructors require new editions or materials that publishers have customized specifically for their course, bookstores must rely exclusively on publishers to fulfill their orders.

Wholesale companies facilitate the circulation of used textbooks by purchasing used books from retailers and directly from students to distribute to other retailers in need of used textbooks. Three major wholesale companies distribute textbooks nationally, and several smaller wholesalers distribute textbooks in specific regions of the country. Two of the national wholesalers also operate retail bookstores, and the other is tied to a retail chain through common ownership. Wholesalers have developed a complex model for determining the wholesale value of any given textbook based on factors such as demand, the available supply, and when a new edition is likely to be released. Because the supply of used books is limited and demand is high, wholesalers rank retailers in order to determine which will get first priority in receiving the used books they desire. Generally, national wholesalers give first priority to retailers that supply them with the most used books and do not return many of the books they purchase. To encourage bookstores to supply used books, wholesalers pay a commission and cover the cost of shipping the books to their warehouses.

While students have little choice over which textbooks they must purchase, they have some choice in where they buy their textbooks. Many campuses are served by multiple bookstores, and students may also be able to obtain their books through book exchanges on their campus. Advances in technology have allowed students to bypass traditional textbook outlets with expanded purchasing options online. A local bookstore may provide convenience, speed, and return options, while online retailers and student-to-student exchanges may offer lower prices. In some cases, textbooks meant to be sold in international markets at lower prices are also available to U.S. students through online retailers.

In addition, students can sometimes offset their costs by selling back their books at the end of the term. Generally, if a book is in good condition and will be used on the campus again, bookstores will pay students 50 percent of the original price paid. If the bookstore has not received a faculty order for the book at the end of the term and the edition is still current, bookstores may offer students the wholesale price of the book, which could range from 5 to 35 percent of the new retail price. This practice allows bookstores to provide an added service to students while supporting the national availability of used books. Students can also sell their books online to a wholesaler or to an individual. However, if a new edition of the book is forthcoming, students would not generally be able to sell back the book.

College Textbook Prices Have Grown at Twice the Rate of Inflation, Trailing Annual Tuition Increases

College textbook prices have risen at double the rate of inflation for the last two decades but have followed the trend of tuition increases at postsecondary institutions. The average growth in college textbook prices has been 6 percent per year since academic year 1987-1988, ranging from 4 percent in 1993-1994 to 9 percent in 1989-1990.[2] Meanwhile, tuition and fees have increased at an average of 7 percent per academic year during the same period, while overall price increases averaged 3 percent per academic year. Not only have textbook prices steadily increased each year, but the overall change in textbook prices has been substantial. According to a BLS research series on the CPI for college textbooks shown in figure 2, prices in December of 2004 were 186 percent higher than they were in December of 1986, the first month in which data were available, compared with a 240 percent increase in the cost of tuition and fees at colleges, universities, and professional schools.[3] Overall price inflation was 72 percent during the same time period.

[2]An academic year is defined as September through August for this analysis.

[3]The CPI measures the average change over time in the prices paid by urban consumers for consumer goods and services, and the CPI for college textbooks measures the average change over time of the price that students and their families pay for college textbooks.

Note: Data have not been seasonally adjusted.

With certain publisher packaging practices, supplementary products may sometimes be included in the price of the textbook for this index, but it is not possible with available data to determine the extent to which these practices may have contributed to price increases. The prices collected for BLS's textbook index represent new college textbook prices at colleges, universities, and professional schools at which textbooks are required.[4] Because only the price of the textbook is collected, the prices of any supplementary materials that may be available are typically not reflected in the index. However, if the textbook is only available at the bookstore in combination with some other course material—a practice commonly referred to as bundling—then the price of the entire bundle is collected. Officials at the Bureau of Labor Statistics told us that the practice of bundling has become increasingly prevalent in recent years. However, they told us it is not possible to determine with the information available the extent to which bundling may have contributed to increases in college textbook prices. For more information about the methodology used for constructing this index, please refer to appendix I.

[4]Although only new textbook prices are collected, standard industry pricing practices generally result in used book prices tracking the movement of new book prices. Wholesalers and retailers agree that the standard pricing practice for used books is to assign a price that is equal to 75 percent of the new price of the same book, so that if the new book price increases by 3 percent, the used book also increases by 3 percent.

Increases in college textbook prices were particularly high for the academic years 1989-1990 and 2001-2002, at 9 percent and 8 percent respectively. Since 2001-2002, the growth in textbook prices has been slowed, increasing by 5 percent in 2003-2004. Appendix II contains more details on average annual changes in textbook prices.

While increases in textbook prices have not followed far behind hikes in college tuition and fees, the cost of textbooks and supplies as a percentage of tuition and fees varies for degree-seeking students attending different types of institutions. According to data from Education's Integrated Postsecondary Education Data System, first-time, full-time students attending 4-year private, nonprofit colleges were estimated to spend $850 for books and supplies in their first year, or 8 percent of the cost of tuition and fees during academic year 2003-2004, as shown in figure 3.[5] In contrast, first-time, full-time students paying in-state tuition at 4-year public colleges or universities were estimated to spend 26 percent of the cost of tuition and fees on books and supplies, or $898, during the same period. At 2-year public colleges, where low-income students are more likely to begin their studies and tuition and fees are lower, first-time, full-time students are estimated to spend 72 percent of the cost of tuition and fees on books and supplies.[6] Specifically, 2-year public colleges estimated that their first-time, full-time students would spend about $886 in 2003-2004 on books and supplies. In 2002-2003, the last year for which

[5]We did not validate the methodology the institutions used to derive these estimates. These estimates are gross, that is, they do not estimate what students might receive if they resell their books. Because retailers may pay up to 50 percent of the retail price for used textbooks, students' net costs may be reduced substantially. Also, while these figures include the cost of supplies, we cannot disaggregate those cost from the totals. More detail on Education's definition of supplies is in appendix I.

Publisher Investments in New Products Have Contributed to Increases in Textbook Prices

While publishers, retailers, and wholesalers all play a role in textbook pricing, the primary factor contributing to increases in the price of textbooks has been the increased investment publishers have made in new products to enhance instruction and learning according to industry executives we interviewed. In particular, publishers point to the high cost associated with the development of technology applications that supplement traditional textbooks. Publishers told us they have made these investments to meet changing needs of higher education, such as the increase in part-time faculty who require greater instructional support and supplements that will enhance student learning of the subject matter. While wholesalers, retailers, and others do not question the quality of these materials, they have expressed concern that the publishers' practice of packaging supplements with a textbook to sell as one unit limits the opportunity students have to purchase less expensive used books. Additionally, wholesalers, retailers, and others have expressed concern about how certain publisher practices, such as revising textbooks more frequently and increasing the availability of custom publishing options for instructors, have affected their ability to help students save money by providing used textbooks and buyback services.

How Textbooks Are Priced

Publishers set the net price, or the price bookstores pay publishers to obtain the textbook, based on development and production costs, expected sales, and competition from comparable products available in the market. While the amount spent on development and production varies across publishers and specific titles, the publishers to whom we spoke underscored the substantial investments they make before a single textbook is sold. These include the cost of author advances, the development of content for the textbook and supplements, copyrights and permissions for illustrations and photographs, along with the cost of typesetting and printing enough copies to provide sample copies and cover expected sales.

In estimating expected sales of textbooks, publishers must consider the size of the overall market for a given textbook, the amount of market share they can reasonably capture based on the availability of competing products, and the availability of used books in subsequent years. The publishers we talked to focus heavily on publishing textbooks for introductory-level courses because the market is larger, even though competition for market share tends to be greater. Publishing in smaller markets can still be attractive, though, according to one publishing executive, because publishers may be able to attain greater market share, as there are generally fewer competing titles. Regardless of the market for a particular textbook, publishers told us that new textbook sales are highest in the first year an edition is available, with sales declining each year as the supply of used books becomes greater.

Publishers told us that they must price their textbooks based on what similar textbooks in the market are selling for, even if it will not generate enough revenue to offset their costs or they could lose sales to more competitively priced products. As a result, publishers noted that textbooks may not realize a profit in the first year of publication. Publishers told us that they are willing to take this financial risk because of the long-term rewards they expect for successful textbooks.

While each college store determines its own pricing model, many utilize a similar approach for determining the price of new and used textbooks. Bookstores set the retail price to ensure a certain percentage of the selling price goes to the bookstore. This percentage, commonly referred to by retailers as the margin,[7] covers bookstore costs and may allow the store to realize a profit. While the margin may vary at different individual bookstores, the average margin on new college textbooks among stores reporting to the National Association of College Stores is about 23 percent.[8] The margin on used textbooks, however, is typically higher. Used textbook prices are directly linked to new textbook prices as retailers and wholesalers typically follow a traditional pricing practice. According to this practice, retailers purchase used books from wholesalers at 50 percent of the new retail price and in turn charge students 75 percent of the new retail price to purchase the book. This pricing practice results in a 33 percent margin on used books for bookstores. Table 1 illustrates the typical pricing practice for a new and used textbook. College bookstores justify higher margins on used textbooks based on increased inventory risks and resources involved in preparing the books for resale.[9]

[7]Two terms, markup and margin, are commonly used to describe the difference between the net (or publisher) price and the retail price of textbooks. Publishers commonly refer to the markup, or the price increase relative to the publisher price, while college bookstores typically refer to the margin, the percentage of the retail price that they keep.

[8]National Association of College Stores, 2005 College Store Industry Financial Report (Oberlin, Ohio: 2005).

[9]For example, buying back books from students represents an inventory risk because it requires a substantial financial investment, which bookstores cannot recoup until they sell the books to another student or a wholesaler.

Publishers Have Developed New Product Options to Meet Perceived Needs of Instructors and Students

The factors that publishers consider in determining the price of their textbooks has not changed over time, but the nature of offerings from higher education publishers has changed in recent years. Publishers say they have invested heavily in developing additional textbook supplements for instructors and students, particularly resource-intensive technology applications, and ensuring that the content they provide is updated with the most current pedagogy and examples. Publishers told us they are making these investments in response to the changing needs of the higher education community and to remain competitive in the marketplace. While supplements are not new, publishers told us the number and variety of supplements available for a given textbook have increased substantially in the last 10 years.

Even though there has been widespread consolidation among textbook publishers over the last 20 years, publishers characterized the textbook market as intensely competitive and said this competition drives what products they offer and ultimately how they price their textbooks. Because the adoption process in which instructors select the textbooks and materials they wish to use in their courses is central to ensuring sales, publishers told us that they focus their efforts on developing textbooks and accompanying materials that will meet the diverse needs of instructors and their students. To ensure their products are appealing to instructors, publishers say they must offer a wide range of materials that accommodate a variety of teaching and learning styles. Publishers fear that if they are unable to keep up with offerings of their competitors they will lose adoptions and ultimately market share. One industry analyst we spoke to speculated that the consolidation of publishers and a lack of new entrants are largely factors of the enormous investments required to compete in the marketplace. The analyst said that by consolidating, publishers may gain economies of scale and spread their overhead and other costs across more titles.

Publishers say the investments they are making in product development are largely in response to changes in higher education that have resulted in publishers playing a more central role in facilitating instruction and learning. For example, publishers have always provided no-cost instructional supplements to help faculty teach their courses, but these offerings have intensified in recent years. In particular, publishers told us that the increased demand for instructional technology applications has resulted in high development costs. They say that since the advent of the Internet, postsecondary institutions have made substantial investments in technology and increased their expectations for instructors to make use of technology in the classroom. In response to this demand, publishers have invested millions of dollars in developing content that can be delivered via technological applications, such as Web sites and CD-ROMs, to accompany their textbooks. Some of these applications are designed to help instructors be more effective in the classroom, while others are intended for student use to enhance their learning of the material.

Publishers told us that they have tailored their instructional supplements to enhance instructor productivity and teaching, largely to meet the needs of instructors in an environment of funding cuts. Publishers say tools designed to enhance instructor productivity are in demand because reductions in the number of teaching assistants available to help instructors have increased the administrative burden for instructors. For example, publishers have developed online homework and quizzes that allow instructors to track student progress quickly, saving instructors time. The homework and quizzes students complete online can be graded immediately to provide both the instructor and students with immediate feedback on performance. The need for greater teaching support is another area in which publishers told us there has been increased demand, stemming largely from a reduction in the employment of full-time tenure track faculty at institutions across the country. Publishers say they are now providing more extensive curricular support including lesson plans, homework sets, multimedia lectures, and even workshops on specific teaching approaches. While these materials are provided at no cost to instructors, the cost of developing them is built into the price of the textbook.

Publishers also described a wide array of supplements that faculty can adopt that are intended to enhance student learning and success in the course. Publishers say there is a growing demand for these products because the number of students who are unprepared for college-level work has been increasing. Student supplements are either sold separately or bundled with the textbook, but the bulk of the development costs are typically built into the price of the textbook, according to publishers. While publishers produce print supplements, such as study guides and solutions manuals to accompany their textbooks, technology content represents the area in which publishers say they are investing more substantially. For example, one publisher told us the company had invested over $1 million in the development of a CD-ROM that provides three-dimensional images to enhance learning in anatomy. In the short term, these investments are very costly for publishers, but publishers are predicting increased demand for these products over time, with more content delivered digitally. Electronic content is appealing to publishers because sales of these products would be less affected over time by the used textbook market than print products, which can more easily be bought and sold in the used textbook market. Specifically, passwords to restricted access Web sites cannot be resold, and there is no national used market for other types of electronic products, such as CD-ROMS and software, because retailers and wholesalers cannot easily verify that the products are functional once they have been used.

Wholesalers, Retailers, and Others Express Concern That Some Publisher Practices May Unnecessarily Increase Costs to Students

Wholesalers, retailers, and some public interest groups acknowledge that publishers are making substantial investments to develop textbooks and supplementary materials, but they have expressed concern about the impact some publisher practices may have on student costs. In particular, they think some of the strategies employed by publishers, such as bundling textbooks with supplements and revising textbooks more frequently, may limit the ability students have to decrease their costs by purchasing less expensive used textbooks.

Concerns about Bundling

Wholesalers, retailers, and some public interest groups agree that there has been a proliferation of supplements in recent years, and they have expressed concern about the increasing practice of selling supplements and textbooks bundled together in a package. While wholesalers and retailers do not question the quality of these materials, they suggest the practice of combining these supplements with textbooks limits students' ability to reduce their costs by purchasing less expensive used books and choosing which, if any, supplements they want to purchase. Retailers told us that when bundling started becoming more common, it became difficult for them to obtain supplements separately from publishers to provide students the option of buying a used book and selected supplements. Though publishers say that most supplements are now available separately, retailers said that because publishers often discount bundles, most of the savings students could expect from purchasing a used textbook would be negated if they bought the supplements separately. For example, a new book may be bundled with an access code to a companion Web site at no additional cost to the student. Students who choose to buy a less expensive used textbook will have to purchase the access code separately, but the combined cost of the used book and the access code will be similar to the price of the new course materials sold in a bundle. One retailer also noted that publishers assign every product a unique identification number, whether sold individually or bundled. Because the identification number for a bundle varies based on the specific combination of materials included in the package, the retailer told us it can be difficult to identify the individual components in the bundle to order them separately from publishers or, when available, through the used textbook market. Publishers note, however, that the standard industry practice of assigning each bundle a unique identification number is intended to make it easy for students, retailers, and wholesalers to obtain a complete description of the bundle's contents by entering the identification number online.

Publishers told us that textbook sales representatives work to identify materials that will best meet a given instructor's needs and generally bundle course materials with the textbook when the instructor desires it. However, retailers said that instructors are often unaware that the course materials they selected will come bundled, based on routine follow-up discussions that stores have had with instructors. Retailers told us that many instructors want the supplements to be available for their students but also want students to have the option of buying a used book. However, some publishers say that the discounts available on bundles are a selling point with instructors, along with the assurance that students will purchase the correct course materials.

While publishers typically allow retailers to return new textbooks that are not sold without penalty if the textbooks are in new condition, when course materials are bundled together they can be returned only if the seal is unbroken. Retailers explained that their stores offer generous return policies to accommodate students who, for example, buy the wrong course materials or drop a course. If a student has broken the seal of the bundle, retailers say they will not be able to return the materials to the publisher for a refund. One retailer told us that its stores will generally accept returns of unsealed bundles to minimize ill will with students but that they would have to absorb the return as a loss.

Some publishers acknowledged that there has been resistance to the practice of bundling, and some told us they are now more carefully considering when bundling may be appropriate. While the practice is designed to provide students with greater value, publishers understand that students must perceive that value for a bundle to sell. Publishers say they are also beginning to understand that as students may be sensitive to high prices, they must strike a balance between quality and price. For example, one publisher provided an example of a bundle that did not sell well because the number of components increased the price beyond what students were willing to pay. While the publisher knew that the textbook and the individual components would retail separately for much more, students perceived the price as too high. Publishers also told us that bundling is most effective when instructors make use of all the materials included in the bundle and stress their importance to students. Publishers understand that when students spend money for course materials that are never used they may perceive the purchase as unnecessary.

Concerns about the Frequency of Revisions

Industry representatives and some public interest groups also suggested that publishers are revising textbooks more frequently, and some expressed concern about the financial impact revisions have on students. Retailers and wholesalers told us that because instructors typically use the most current edition of textbooks in their courses, the previous edition becomes obsolete once a new edition is released. Once retailers and wholesalers learn of a pending new edition, typically several months in advance of the release date, they said the buyback value drops rapidly to zero. Once a new edition is released, retailers say they generally cannot buy back an old edition from students, a practice that helps students reduce their costs.

Publishers agreed that the revision cycle for many books has accelerated over time, but most said that it has been stable in recent years. While textbook revision cycles can vary based on several factors, such as the level of the course and the discipline, publishers told us that textbooks are generally revised every 3 to 4 years, compared with cycles of 4 to 5 years that were standard 10 to 20 years ago. Publishers say that the revision cycle is driven by instructors who want the most current material and may seek products from competitors if they are unable to meet the demand. Publishers cited a recent poll of 1,029 college professors commissioned by the Association of American Publishers that found that 80 percent of those polled think it is important that the material in the textbook be as current as possible.[10] However, this may not be universal across disciplines. For example, over 700 mathematics and physics instructors from 150 universities across the country have petitioned one publisher to delay revisions until there have been substantial changes in content or teaching methods that merit revision.[11]

Publishers noted that while not every revision results in substantial content changes, revisions must also be made for other reasons, such as changing teaching methods. For example, one publisher cited a teaching

[10]Zogby International, The Attitudes of College Faculty on the Textbooks Used in Their Courses (Utica, New York: December 2004).

[11]As part of the state Public Research Interest Group's efforts to advocate for lower prices for students, a number of faculty members signed a letter dated April 2004 calling on one publisher to change certain practices.

approach from the 1980s that has regained popularity in calculus. Revisions may be based on current events, such as including recent accounting scandals in textbooks for business law and ethics courses, or recent elections in political science textbooks. Publishers told us that changes in industry standards that are relevant to a discipline may also necessitate out-of-cycle revisions or updates, such as pronouncements issued by the Financial Accounting Standards Board for accounting textbooks.

Some wholesalers and retailers think that the revision cycle for some textbooks has the effect of limiting the used market. For example, retailers and wholesalers have observed that books for introductory-level classes are on a shorter revision cycle than other books, possibly because there is a greater supply of used books, as students are less likely to keep them. One publisher we talked to said that books for introductory classes are typically revised more frequently because demand for current content and technology applications is greater in these courses. Most publishers maintain that their decisions to revise a book are based on factors other than sales patterns. However, one publisher we spoke with said that the current revision cycle at the company is tied to the pattern of sales revenues, which all publishers agreed decline the longer the textbook is on the market and more used copies become available. Publishers estimated that in the second year of an edition they might sell 25 percent to 70 percent of the textbooks that were sold in the first year, depending on level and discipline. Moreover, publishers say that they count on textbook revisions to recoup the initial investment costs of developing the textbook. They told us that first-edition textbooks are highly risky and that only about 20 to 30 percent of their first-edition textbooks are ever revised. However, they said that they are willing to take on this risk based on the long-term rewards they expect to receive from successful textbooks that are revised.

Concerns about Other Publisher Practices

Wholesalers, retailers, and some public interest groups have also raised concerns about other publisher practices that may limit students' ability to purchase used textbooks, such as custom publishing, which allows instructors to customize their course materials by adding or deleting chapters from a single textbook or multiple textbooks. According to publishers, technological advances have made the practice more cost-effective and the adoption of custom materials has been increasing. Publishers say that custom publishing appeals to instructors because it allows them to consolidate material from multiple sources into one textbook for their students. Publishers also think it provides students with good value because instructors are more likely to use all of the material they select. Because the price of custom publishing is based on the content, the price of custom textbooks may be lower than for a traditional textbook, according to publishers. For example, students might pay less for one custom textbook than they would for several books the instructor might have required if customization was not available. Some publishers also observed that sales of custom materials tend to be better because instructors are committed to using all of the material, and there is no national used textbook market for them.

Retailers and wholesalers said that because there is no resale market for a given custom textbook outside the campus where it was originally used, students may lose out on the ability to save money by buying used books and selling them back at the end of the term. One retailer expressed particular concern about a few specific instances in which textbook covers had been customized with the mascot or logo of a specific institution, but the content of the textbook was the same. Because these textbooks are designed for a specific campus and have a unique identification number, there is no national used market for them. In addition, retailers say that publishers place strict return limits—typically 10 percent—on custom textbooks, even though traditional textbooks are usually fully returnable to the publisher. As a result, retailers say that they have to carefully balance their commitment to carrying an adequate supply of custom materials for students against the risk of exceeding the return limit if they do not sell enough copies.

Wholesalers, retailers, and others are also concerned about the long-term cost implications for students that may result from publisher practices to provide lower-cost alternatives to the traditional textbook. Among these alternatives are loose-leaf textbooks that are designed to be placed in a binder and electronic textbooks that are available for purchase online. While these options may save students money initially, wholesalers and retailers are concerned about the long-term cost implications for students. For example, students may initially pay less for a loose-leaf textbook than they would for a textbook that is bound, but wholesalers and retailers said students would be unable to sell a loose-leaf book back because it is not possible to determine whether all the pages are intact. With electronic textbooks, students may pay about half of the price of a new textbook for password-protected access to an online version of the textbook. Until the password expires, students can access the textbook as many times as they wish, either reviewing the chapters online or printing a hard copy. Some public interest groups initially embraced the idea of electronic textbooks but now point out that students may run into technical difficulties if they have to rely on Internet access. Additionally, because access to the textbook may expire, students may not have the option at the end of the term to keep the textbook. According to publishers, electronic textbooks have not caught on with students, and sales of these products have been unsuccessful.

The Price of U.S. Textbooks Sold in Other Countries Varies according to Local Market Conditions

College textbook prices in the United States may exceed prices in other countries because textbook publishers assign prices that reflect the market conditions found in each country. The demand for textbooks can vary across countries because of, for example, differences in income levels or in the classroom role of textbooks. Publishers typically incur substantial costs in order to develop textbooks, but once these development costs have been undertaken, the additional cost of producing more copies is quite low. As a result, a publisher may be able to profitably sell textbooks in one country at prices that are closer to actual costs of printing and distributing additional copies while charging higher prices in the United States that reflect the substantial development costs undertaken. Two factors are typically cited as enabling a seller, such as a publisher, to profitably charge different prices to different buyers, such as textbook buyers in different countries. The seller must be able to distinguish among groups with differences in their willingness and ability to pay a given price, and the ability for these groups to buy and sell among one another must be restricted. Traditionally, the geographical separation of markets has made it difficult for U.S. students to acquire lower-priced textbooks from other countries. More recent developments in Internet commerce have reduced the costs for buyers in the United States to acquire textbooks from other countries, causing publishers to reexamine their distribution arrangements.

Varying Local Market Conditions and Barriers to Importation Help Explain Textbook Price Differences between the United States and Other Countries

Textbook publishers told us that college textbooks are developed primarily for sale in the United States, based on cost considerations and demand forecasts for the North American market, but that they sell textbooks in other markets when there is international demand. Textbooks developed for certain academic disciplines are more likely to have broader international appeal than others, according to publishers. For example, the content found in many mathematics, science, and engineering textbooks is essentially global in its applicability. However, the content found in textbooks used in other disciplines, such as political science, may pertain much more specifically to U.S. experiences, institutions, or culture. If international demand for a textbook exists, publishers may sell the same textbook that is sold in the United States, an international edition produced with less expensive materials, or an adaptation of the textbook that includes locally relevant examples. In international markets where the primary language spoken is not English, publishers may sell the rights to translate the textbook into the local language.

In assigning prices to the different versions of U.S. textbooks sold in the international marketplace, publishers told us that they consider local market conditions and the willingness and ability of students to purchase the textbook. As there can be significant intercountry differences in the demand for textbooks, publishers told us that they make country-by-country and book-by-book distribution and pricing decisions. Specifically, publishers told us that factors they consider in making pricing decisions are income levels, the cost of living, the role of the textbook in the classroom, intellectual property protections, the strength of the local currency, and the prices of competing textbooks sold in that marketplace. In some cases, international prices may be substantially lower than prices at which the textbook is sold in the United States, while in other cases, they may be the same as or higher than U.S. prices. For example, publishers told us that in many developing countries, incomes are generally too low for students to buy textbooks at U.S. prices. However, in areas where the cost of living is generally higher than in the United States, such as in Scandinavian countries, textbook prices may be higher.

Publishers told us that they have to be particularly concerned about pricing at a level that is affordable to students in developing countries because of the threat of piracy in these countries. Although they already grapple with piracy in many of these markets, publishers say that even fewer legitimate copies would be sold in these markets if prices were too high. According to publishers, some countries do not have a strong commitment to intellectual property protections, but governments have been more responsive in dealing with piracy cases when textbooks are priced at a level that local students can afford.

In addition to income levels, differences in instructional styles and systems of higher education influence publishers' pricing decisions. For example, publishers told us that even though average income levels are high in the United Kingdom, textbooks tend to sell for lower prices than in the United States because the demand for textbooks is lower. Specifically, they said that instructors in the United Kingdom are more likely to recommend several textbooks for students to consider, rather than requiring a specific textbook. Additionally, publishers told us that there is less demand for electronic and print supplements to support teaching and learning in non-U.S. markets. Publishers also told us that because higher education funding tends to be highly subsidized in the United Kingdom and European countries, students may not be willing to pay out-of-pocket costs for textbooks at U.S. prices. According to publishers, textbook prices in Canada and Australia tend to be similar to those in the United States because the instructional styles are similar in that instructors select specific textbooks for their classes. However, publishers noted that in these markets there is also greater demand for U.S. textbooks that have been adapted to the local culture or economy.

The National Association of College Stores has criticized the practice of differential pricing, or the publisher practice of charging lower prices in some countries, saying that it is unfair for U.S. students to pay more for the same textbooks. However, the practice of differential pricing is not exclusive to textbook publishing and occurs both within and outside the United States. For example, GAO has reported on differential pricing in the airline industry, where business travelers typically pay much higher fares than leisure travelers.[12] Likewise, we have reported on differential pricing of prescription drugs in the pharmaceutical industry.[13] Publishers can afford to sell textbooks at prices that are sometimes lower outside the United States because once development costs have been incurred for the U.S. market, the incremental cost of producing additional copies for the international market is low. This allows publishers to sell textbooks in other countries at prices that are closer to printing and distribution costs while charging prices in the United States that better reflect the high costs of development. The publishers we talked to estimated that international sales make up from 5 to 15 percent of their total revenues. Some publishers speculated that without the added revenues from international sales, they would feel more cost pressure and would have to either increase U.S. prices or invest less in certain products.

In order for international pricing differences to persist, there must be barriers that limit mass importation of less expensive U.S. textbooks from other countries. Such barriers ensure that individuals and businesses purchase from the intended distribution channels and insulate students from awareness of price differences in other countries. Historically, the geographic separation of countries served as a natural barrier preventing such trade from occurring. Geographic distances and lack of information made it difficult for individuals or businesses in the United States to save money on textbooks by purchasing lower-priced textbooks in other countries and having them shipped to the United States, a practice commonly referred to as reimportation. However, recent technological developments in electronic commerce have diminished the effects of this natural barrier, increasing awareness of prices in other countries and making it easier for students and retailers to purchase lower-priced textbooks from international markets.

Publishers Have Taken Recent Steps to Limit the Reentry of Their Textbooks into the U.S. Market

Retailers and publishers have expressed concern about the reimportation of lower-priced textbooks from international locations. Specifically, they cited the ability students have to purchase books from online distribution channels outside the United States at lower prices, which may result in a loss of sales for U.S. retailers. Additionally, the availability of lower-priced textbooks through these channels has heightened distrust and frustration among students regarding textbook prices, and college stores find it difficult to explain why their textbook prices are higher, according to the National Association of College Stores. Retailers and publishers have also been concerned that some U.S. retailers may have engaged in reimportation on a large scale by ordering textbooks for entire courses at lower prices from international distribution channels. Concerned about the effects of differential pricing on college stores, the National Association of College Stores has called on publishers to stop the practice of selling textbooks at lower prices outside the United States.

Publishers told us that they intend for the textbooks they distribute in other countries to be sold for use in those countries, not for resale to the United States, and so have taken recent actions to limit large-scale reimportation. Most of the publishers with whom we spoke say they are particularly concerned about the actions of foreign distributors and U.S. retailers that may result in large-scale reimportation of textbooks. As a result, publishers told us they have taken recent steps to limit the reimportation of textbooks in large quantities. Specifically, publishers told us that they have strengthened their agreements with foreign wholesalers to prevent the large-scale sale of U.S. textbooks back to the United States. Some publishers also said they have made an agreement with an online retailer outside the United States to limit the number of copies of a given textbook that can be delivered to a single U.S. address in one order. Because these measures target large-scale reimportation of U.S. textbooks from international sources at lower prices, they will not prevent U.S. students from purchasing single copies of textbooks from international sources.

Concluding Observations

College textbook prices have risen steadily, along with tuition and fees, and appear to have been largely driven by investments in supplements. While price increases have resulted in increasing costs for students and their families, they reflect a change in the characteristics of postsecondary education. Just as teaching and learning have changed with increasing reliance on technology, the college textbook has evolved from a stand-alone text to include a variety of ancillary products designed to enhance the educational experience for instructors and students. By increasingly becoming involved in the development of instructional aids, publishers are assuming roles that have traditionally belonged to postsecondary institutions. If publishers continue to increase these investments, particularly in technology, the cost to produce a textbook is likely to continue to increase in the future.

Although changes in the nature of college textbooks are evident, it is difficult to assess the impact of these changes on students. Instructors can now select from a much wider variety of supplements to tailor their courses to the needs of their students, but these additional textbook offerings may come at an increased cost to students. While textbook prices have risen with tuition costs, these costs can vary greatly depending on the type of institution a student is attending. Because textbooks may represent a substantial portion of the cost of tuition and fees for students attending some public institutions, any increase in textbook prices may affect affordability and access disproportionately for some students. Consequently, while students may benefit from the advances in textbook supplements, they may not feel the price increases are justified relative to what they spend on tuition. Students may also think the amount they have to pay for their textbooks is unfair, especially if some of the same textbooks are available at lower prices outside the United States.

Because the cost to students may not be the primary factor considered when publishers are developing textbooks that students are ultimately required to buy, the rate of textbook price increases is not likely to slow. Students may lower their costs by purchasing used textbooks and may search for lower-priced textbooks from online sources, including international retailers, and directly from other students. However, these options are unlikely to provide a sustainable source of lower prices because the supply of these textbooks is limited and international prices are subject to change. In addition, because publishers, wholesalers, and many retailers are profit-seeking firms, any widespread action that would lower costs to students at the expense of profits would be met with changes in their business practices, such as changing distribution patterns.

Agency Comments

We provided copies of a draft of this report to the Department of Labor and the Department of Education for review and comment. The Department of Labor provided technical comments on the use of its CPI data, which we incorporated as appropriate. The Department of Education did not have any comments. We also sought comments on our characterization of the textbook industry from the National Association of College Stores and the Association of American Publishers, the trade groups representing the companies we interviewed for this study.

NACS generally agreed with our findings, stating that the report accurately portrayed the textbook industry. NACS also provided technical comments that we incorporated as appropriate. NACS's comments appear in appendix III.

AAP agreed with some findings in the report but expressed concern with respect to the data sources we used in our analyses and the tone and objectivity of the report.

With respect to the data sources we used, AAP expressed concern about the limitations of the data we used in determining textbook price increases over time, and the proportion of tuition and fees that spending on textbooks and supplies represent for students at different types of postsecondary institutions. AAP also suggested alternative data sources for addressing these issues, but we found that they were not sufficiently reliable for our purposes.

While AAP disagreed with our use of CPI data from BLS, these are the most complete and reliable data on textbook prices available. Further, we clearly disclose the limitations and definitions of the CPI data in the report. AAP's claim that BLS data do not capture the "penetration of lower-cost alternatives" is not accurate. The college textbooks CPI is an index designed to capture the prices of assigned textbooks. To the extent that lower cost alternatives are assigned, they would be fully reflected in BLS's index. AAP also suggested that the availability of alternative data from Student Monitor that differ substantially from the BLS data call into question our decision to use BLS data as a sole source. We disagree because the two data sources are not comparable. Student Monitor data are measuring annual changes in student spending, while BLS data measure annual price changes.

AAP also expressed concerns about the use of Education's IPEDS data, in particular that estimates are for textbooks and supplies and that we did not validate the estimates postsecondary institutions provided. We use IPEDS data because they are the most complete data available on estimated student spending. As we state in appendix I, we tested IPEDS for reliability and note that other available data sources are not as complete or reliable. AAP also questions the appropriateness of measuring estimated spending on textbooks and supplies as a percentage of tuition. We present these data to provide perspective on college affordability—a primary federal policy concern. To address AAP's concerns about what constitutes supplies, we have noted in appendix I that supplies are defined as usual costs incurred by a majority of students. AAP also expressed concern that in discussing estimates of student spending on textbooks, we did not take into account the extent to which students lower their costs through buyback. We have added this context where we discuss costs to students.

AAP also provided additional data sources for consideration and expressed concern that deadlines prevented us from giving these sources appropriate consideration. We considered other sources available that provide estimates of student spending. Time was not a factor in our decision not to use the data, but rather we found these sources to be not as complete or as reliable as the IPEDS data. Student Monitor, one of the sources suggested by AAP, provides market research for those targeting college students as a consumer group. Student Monitor employs a nonprobabilistic sampling methodology using an intercept-based quota sample of 1,200 students covering 100 colleges and universities. Because of the sample selection process used, it cannot be used to estimate to the college student population as a whole for the purpose of addressing a key finding. Other industry sources AAP suggested provide estimates on the total size of the market, but they cannot be used to provide representative estimates on student spending for textbooks.

AAP expressed concern about the tone and objectivity of the report, particularly the characterizations of retailers and wholesalers on the impact of publisher practices on students. In most instances we had already discussed issues raised by AAP in other sections of our report. AAP took issue with comments made by wholesalers and retailers regarding the impact of textbook revisions, bundling, and custom publishing on students' ability to pursue lower-cost, used textbooks. We specifically provide information on the views of wholesalers and retailers to add balance and include more perspectives in our report. We provide publisher perspectives on why they revise textbooks and characterize why and how the revision cycle has changed over the last two decades. We also extensively discuss in our report publisher perspectives on supplements, bundling, and other options, such as custom publishing, while capturing publisher views regarding their benefits. Wholesalers and retailers provided a different perspective on these practices as they relate to potential costs to students, which we captured in our report.

More generally, GAO's approach to this study was to rely primarily on publishers to provide information on how they price textbooks and gain their perspectives on the factors that influence price changes. We also sought out other experts in the field, including retailers and wholesalers, to better understand how students obtain textbooks and what factors affect the cost to the student. Retailers and wholesalers did not place blame on publishers but pointed out the impact of some publisher practices on students. We do not place any blame in our report on the publishers and do in fact note that they offer a variety of options for students, sometimes at a discount. We also note in our report that faculty have primary responsibility for determining what students are required to buy.

AAP stated in its letter that it agreed with the findings related to international price differences and the report's concluding observations. AAP also provided technical comments, which we incorporated as appropriate. AAP's comments appear in appendix IV.

As arranged with your offices, unless you publicly announce its contents earlier, we plan no further distribution of this report until 30 days from its issue date. At that time, we will send copies of this report to the congressional committees and subcommittees responsible for the Higher Education Act, the Secretary of Education, the Secretary of Labor, and other interested parties. Copies will also be made available to others upon request. In addition, this report will be available at no charge on GAO's Web site at http://www.gao.gov.

Appendix I: Objectives, Scope, and Methodology

To determine the extent to which textbook prices have changed over time, we reviewed college textbook pricing data from the Bureau of Labor Statistics' Consumer Price Index (CPI).[1] The CPI measures the average change over time in the prices paid by urban consumers for consumer goods and services, and in the case of textbooks represents an index of change over time of the retail price of college textbooks, or the price that students and their families pay. While college textbooks have been included in the CPI since 1964, data on textbooks in the Bureau of Labor Statistics' (BLS) research database only go back to 1986, when BLS collected textbook prices as part of an index on the price of books and supplies. The agency began publishing a separate CPI series on textbooks in 2001. Using these data, BLS constructed an unpublished research series on college textbooks for GAO for the period of December 1986 through December 2004. The index was compiled from three separate index series, as outlined in table 2. The implications on the index of these differences in methodology are discussed below.

Table 2: Source and Methodology for CPI College Textbook Research Series Data

Time period	Source and methodology
December 1986 to December 1998	BLS produced the index using data collected for the Educational Books and Supplies CPI series.
December 1998 to December 2001	BLS applied a standard BLS calculation procedure to college textbook price data in order to generate the index.
December 2001 to December 2004	BLS used the published index for college textbooks, which employs quality adjustment methods.[a]

Source: BLS.

[a]For a detailed analysis of these quality adjustment methods, see BLS, Hedonic Quality Adjustment Methods for College Textbooks in the U.S. CPI (Washington, DC.: October 2001).

The college textbook CPI is constructed using a probability-based selection process that identifies bookstores as well as textbooks that are assigned for use in courses of higher education. Prices for specific books are taken from a variety of bookstores located on and off campus, as well as from Web-based retailers, reflecting prices at public and private postsecondary institutions, including 2-year, 4-year, graduate, and professional schools. The sample composition changes each year for the following reasons: (1) books assigned to classes change over time,

[1]Data for the college textbooks CPI have not been seasonally adjusted. Seasonal adjustment removes the effects of recurring seasonal influences from many economic series, including consumer prices.

(2) some books cycle out of circulation, and (3) a quarter of the sample rotates out annually. Similarly, the sample size for this research series varies over time as sampling procedures are modified and may range from 200 to 500 price quotes. This variation in sample size does not affect the value of the index, though fewer observations may affect the variance of the index. Overall, BLS reports that the response rate for college textbook CPI data collection is very high, 88 percent.

Most of the textbooks included in the sample are designated as required texts for courses offered by the college or university associated with each sampled bookstore. In some cases, the selected textbook may not be available for pricing because the course has been terminated, the course requires a different textbook, or the course is not offered every term. In instances in which the course is no longer offered and the textbook is not used in any other course, then the assigned textbook for a similar course is selected as a substitute. If the textbook is no longer used for the selected course, it is replaced with the textbook that is currently used for the selected course. If the book is temporarily out of use (for example, the course associated with the book is offered only in the fall semester), then the book is listed as temporarily not available and the price change is imputed based on the price changes of the other books.

An important limitation to this research series is that prior to 2001, prices for such substitute books were not usually compared and no adjustments were made for any qualitative changes between the previous and substitute books.[2] With the introduction of quality adjustment in 2001, the index is adjusted when certain characteristics of a textbook change, such as a move from a major to a smaller publisher or a considerable change in the number of pages. If the new version of the textbook contains substantially different characteristics and quality adjustment values are not available, the price movement is imputed based on the prices of comparable textbooks. Because hedonic quality adjustment is implemented only for the published portion of the research series, for the periods before 2001, the index may have higher variance than the published index, which begins in 2001.

In addition, BLS officials pointed out that textbooks are increasingly wrapped in packages along with additional materials, making it difficult to collect all of the qualitative characteristics of the textbook. If the selected textbook is sold by itself, then only the textbook is priced. However, if the selected textbook is automatically sold with another item, such as a CD or workbook, then the agency must price the entire package. As a result of these packaging practices, it is sometimes difficult for BLS to obtain the information necessary for quality adjustment, and other times the price recorded as the textbook price may also include ancillary materials.

To put changes in textbook prices into the context of other changes in the cost of higher education, we also reviewed CPI data on tuition and fees, which are constructed using a probability-based selection process and reflect the cost of tuition and fees at 2-year and 4-year institutions and professional schools.[3]

We analyzed data from the Department of Education's (Education) Integrated Postsecondary Data System (IPEDS) to determine the proportion of tuition and fees that expenditures for textbooks and supplies represent.[4] Specifically, postsecondary institutions estimate the amount first-time, full-time, degree-seeking students will spend for an entire academic year on textbooks and supplies and report on the amount of tuition and fees. IPEDS defines books and supplies as the average cost of books and supplies for a typical student for an entire academic year (or program). Supplies are to include usual costs that are incurred by a majority of students. Supplies required of special groups of students, such as engineering or art majors, would not be counted unless they constituted a majority of students at the institution. The Department of Education has not established a comprehensive definition of what supplies are. However, an Education official told us that supplies can include such things as allowances for personal computers, but such expenses should be reported only if they are required for a majority of students at the institution.

[3]Since the CPI for college textbooks is not seasonally adjusted, we relied on nonseasonally adjusted data for the overall CPI as well as the CPI for tuition and fees. There are no long-term significant differences between the nonseasonally adjusted and seasonally adjusted indexes.

[4]IPEDS is a system of surveys designed to collect data from all primary providers of postsecondary education. These surveys collect institution-level data in such areas as enrollments, program completions, faculty, staff, and finances. Data are collected annually from approximately 9,600 postsecondary institutions, including over 6,000 institutions eligible for the federal student aid programs.

To assess the completeness of the IPEDS data, we reviewed the National Center for Education Statistics' documentation on how the data were collected and performed electronic tests to look for missing or out-of-range values. On the basis of these reviews and tests, we found the data sufficiently reliable for our purposes. We did not validate the methodology the institutions used to derive their estimates for the cost of books and supplies, and there has been no review of how well these institutional estimates actually predict student spending on textbooks and supplies.

There are other sources available that provide estimates of student spending on college textbooks that we considered, but we did not find these sources to be as complete or reliable as IPEDS. The College Board collects estimates from postsecondary institutions on spending for books and supplies for full-time undergraduate students as part of its Annual Survey of Colleges. While the methodology employed was similar to that used for IPEDS, the survey included responses from a smaller population of institutions than IPEDS. Another source, Student Monitor, estimates spending on college textbooks based on student-reported expenditures. Student Monitor provides market research for those targeting college students as a consumer group. Student Monitor employs a nonprobabilistic sampling methodology using an intercept-based quota sample of 1,200 students covering 100 colleges and universities. Because of the sample selection process used, it cannot be used to estimate to the college student population as a whole for the purpose of addressing a key finding.

To determine what factors have contributed to the change in college textbook prices, we interviewed executives from five of the largest textbook publishers, representing more than 80 percent of new textbook sales; the three national used textbook wholesalers; three companies that operate over 1,300 college textbook retail stores, or 29 percent of stores nationwide; the National Association of College Stores; the Association of American Publishers; and various other industry experts.

To determine what factors have led to differences in the price of some U.S. textbooks in non-U.S. markets, we conducted a review of economic theory and relevant GAO work on differential pricing. We interviewed representatives from textbook publishers, operators of textbook retail stores, and used book wholesalers to determine the extent to which books may be available in other countries at lower prices, their analysis of the reasons behind these price discrepancies, and their concerns about pricing differences.

[b]Academic year 1987-1988 shows the growth in prices over the previous academic year, 1986-1987. Data for the 1986-1987 estimate lack the months of September through November, as data became available in December of 1986. As a result, the average price level in 1986-1987 is based on 9 months of data rather than 12.

Dear Ms. Ashby,

I am writing in response to your request for comments on the Government Accountability Office (GAO) draft report (GAO-5-806) "College Textbooks." On behalf of the National Association of College Stores, I want to thank you for the opportunity to review and comment on the draft report.

Generally, we believe the report accurately portrays the post-secondary course material industry, and captures many of the key factors affecting course material pricing and costs for college stores and the U.S. students they serve. We appreciate the professional job performed by your staff.

College stores support the goal of making a college education more affordable. It is for this reason that college stores work every day to find ways to reduce cost for students through such activities as buying and selling used books; enhancing the adoption process for faculty through the use of technology; supporting improved communications between faculty and students on the course material requirements of a course; sponsoring student book exchanges; and many other approaches to help students.

With respect to the findings in the report on international differential pricing, NACS supports a "one price" system in which U.S. students are not paying more than non-U.S. students, particularly those in developed countries. U.S. students should not, by themselves, bear the sole burden of course material development costs as the report has found or suffer the consequences of underdeveloped countries' inability or unwillingness to enforce copyright laws. All segments of the textbook industry should be working together to see how we can best maintain the extraordinary high quality of U.S. higher education—which is the envy of the world-- without making the price of that education prohibitive to many Americans.

In regard to the critical role of faculty, NACS believes the selection of course materials should rest with faculty who can best determine what textbooks and materials contribute to the learning experience and academic success of their students. While we recognize an extensive study on the role faculty plays in course material development, adoption, and utilization was beyond the scope of this study, we believe faculty roles should be considered as an integral part of any future discussions regarding the availability and accessibility of course materials.

Dear Ms. Ashby:

The Association of American Publishers, the national trade association of the U.S. publishing industry, appreciates the opportunity to provide comments on the Government Accountability Office draft report on college textbook pricing (GAO-05-806). While we found some aspects of the report to be insightful, we are seriously concerned about the accuracy and overall tone and balance of the draft report. The publishers provided solid evidence that corrected the GAO data, and they shared with you their concerns regarding misrepresentative statements, as well as the assumptive conclusions that the draft report included.

Specifically, the AAP has provided analyses and corrections of two data sources employed by GAO: the U.S. Department of Education's Integrated Postsecondary Education Data System (IPEDS) report of what students spend on books and supplies, and a Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS) review of college textbook pricing data.

The GAO intended to use the IPEDS "to gain an understanding of the annual cost of textbooks and supplies for students as estimated by postsecondary institutions." However, as the publishers demonstrated to the GAO, the IPEDS data aggregates school administrator estimates of books and "supplies," which may include computers, calculators, lab equipment, and other materials that represent about 27% of total student spending on books and supplies. Publishers do not produce or market supplies. Independently derived estimates confirm that the average full-time equivalent student spends about $580 per year on textbooks, far less than the $898 figure used repeatedly in the GAO draft. GAO has chosen not to use this independent data. Detailed analyses of student spending can be found at the end of this letter.

The second metric the report uses is the BLS data to track textbook price increases. By its own disclaimer, before 2001, BLS data did not accurately reflect the increasing penetration of lower-cost alternatives that are replacing unabridged, hardcover texts. Consequently, BLS data exaggerates textbook price increases over the course of the reporting period. BLS acknowledges "textbooks are increasingly wrapped in packages along with additional materials, making it difficult to collect all of the qualitative characteristics of the textbooks. As a result, it is difficult for BLS to obtain the information necessary for quality adjustment, and other times the price recorded as the textbook price may also include ancillary materials."

Our third critical concern is the tone and objectivity employed by GAO in the titles and subheadings of the draft report. There are frequent instances where conclusion statements and the narrative of the report are judgmental, and include unsubstantiated statements from single sources that create an unbalanced view. We believe the editorial style of the draft report suggests GAO advocacy for used books and used booksellers rather than providing a factual analysis of the industries.

The report does describe in accurate fashion some – but not all, or even, most -- of the choices publishers offer faculty for text selection. As our members have shown, and as could be confirmed by looking at the books available for any college course, there is always a broad range of titles that an instructor can choose for his or her students, and these titles are often at very different price points. The instructors, of course, select what they believe best serves the educational needs of their students.

In sum, we are disappointed to be writing this letter since there is nothing present here that AAP and its members did not present to the GAO during the writing of the report. We believe that this report is being rushed to completion due to deadline pressures, and that with thorough consideration of these comments a more balanced and representative report can be produced.

We recognize that some of our comments may be moot if the GAO chose to incorporate them in their final report, but because we have not had access to that report, we felt it necessary to make our position part of the record. We're proud of our products and services and our expanding role in Higher Education, and we believe our efforts aid in opening opportunities to all aspiring students.

Our more detailed comments address three key issues: (1) Accuracy of Data, (2) Tone of the Draft report, and (3) Draft report's Valuable Insights.

Accuracy of Data

The report's first data source on text price increases, provided by the Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS), compares dissimilar factors and leads to an incorrect set of conclusions that persist throughout the report. As the report notes, BLS price data does not accurately reflect the increasing penetration of lower-cost alternatives that are replacing the traditional unabridged, hardcover texts, a significant trend over the last 10 years.

Further, as noted in the appendix (page 29 of the report), the BLS price index imputes prices based on comparable textbook prices when data is not available and has a higher margin of error prior to 2001. In regard to post-2001 price analyses, BLS acknowledges (page 29) that "textbooks are increasingly wrapped in packages along with additional materials, making it difficult to collect all of the qualitative characteristics of the textbook…As a result...it is sometimes difficult for BLS to obtain the information necessary for quality adjustment, and other times the price recorded as the textbook price may also include ancillary materials." The standard practice of including quality adjustments in measures of inflation was not done here. As a result, the BLS data exaggerates textbook price increases over the course of the reporting period.

The presentation of the data is misleading because BLS data includes supplements and textbooks, but chart labels and dialogue consistently refer only to textbooks. The Draft report must clarify its data in every case. Finally, BLS numbers, based on the Producer Price Index, do not reflect the labor-intensive nature of the textbook development industry, which relies on intellectual capital.

Other independent research sources, including Student Monitor, LLC, measure student spending on new and used textbooks. Student Monitor data has been included in other GAO reports, but was excluded from this report. Student Monitor research shows that per-capita spending increases for new and used books increased at roughly the rate of inflation in recent years.

Student Spending Increase On Textbooks Per Student Monitor

2000/2001	+ 3.5%
2001/2002	+ 5.4%
2003/2003	+ 2.1%
2003/2004	+ 0.8%

Since the BLS data and the Student Monitor data are so different, we remain very concerned that using BLS as a sole source, while making mild note of its limitations, has the effect of fairly dramatically exaggerating textbook price increases over the data series. Using the BLS data alone, misleads the reader into believing that the price index and the draft report's analysis results are significantly more precise, and more generally accepted, than they are.

Finally, there is no mention at any point in this section that students can recoup up to 50 percent of their costs by reselling their course materials, so any measure of spending overstates how much a student may spend.

The draft report's other source of data, provided by the Department of Education's Integrated Postsecondary Education Data System (IPEDS), employs methodology to report on costs that GAO acknowledges they "did not validate." This is curious because the GAO chose to ignore other data on the basis that they could not validate it.

IPEDS pricing information on textbooks and supplies is based on the estimated guess of college administrators, with no instructions from the Department of Education or any attempts to standardize the information. "Supplies," in this case, are not just inconsequential items such as pencils and notebooks but, according to IPEDS, may include computers, calculators, lab equipment, and other materials that represent about 27% of total student spending on books and supplies, according to the National Association of College Stores. Publishers do not produce or market "supplies." To refer to materials other than textbooks is very misleading in the current context.

In contrast to the GAO's use of inaccurate and misleading data, two independently derived estimates (see charts that follow) confirm that the average full-time equivalent student spends about $580 per year on textbooks, far less than the $898 figure used repeatedly in the GAO draft, even taking into account part-time students. In light of the admittedly misleading IPEDS data discussed above, the AAP has requested that GAO revise the Draft to include this independent and generally accepted research and also has asked that GAO use this data to provide the estimated cost to students of textbooks, without including supplies. As noted before, the total cost students spend on their textbooks is not qualified to include the amount they receive from the sale of their used textbooks.

GAO also measures texts and course materials as a percentage of tuition. This is particularly misleading because tuition is independent of the cost of textbooks. This comparison creates the impression that students attending lower-cost institutions are being penalized, when, in fact, they benefit from a comparable educational experience, by virtue of their access to equivalent course materials at exactly the same price paid by any peer at any other higher educational institution. There is neither price discrimination nor dilution of quality based on which school a student attends—all students are treated equally in this respect. The draft states that two-year public institutions are places "where low-income students are more likely to pursue a degree program" – implying with no substantiation that the cost of textbooks is a barrier to access – but fails to acknowledge the diversity of the courses taken by students attending two-year schools, including allied sciences students studying courses that feature the most complex to produce, highly technical course materials such as dental hygiene, radiology and nursing, and students who work full time and do not conform to the draft report's chosen characterization.

Tone of the Draft Report

Our third critical concern is the tone and objectivity of portions of the report. The draft, for example, presents concerns of used book distributors and advocates without complete balancing information or independent GAO analysis. This approach of citing "concerns" with a subsequent summary rebuttal from publishers leaves the reader with the impression that GAO is advocating a particular point of view in favor of the used book market and used booksellers rather than providing a factual analysis of the industries.

This is especially true is cases where the cited concern is unsubstantiated or refuted by available data. For example, GAO notes that wholesalers, retailers and some public interest groups "...think some of the strategies employed by publishers, such as revising textbooks more frequently, limit the ability students have to decrease their costs by purchasing less expensive used textbooks." What GAO fails to point out is that available empirical data indicates that revisions have been very stable at 4 years since at least 1996, the last year of data to which publishers have ready access.

Additionally, we find that the entire section of the report presented on pages 16 – 21 fails to acknowledge publisher efforts to address instructor and student needs and concerns by offering a variety of choices in educational materials at a variety of price points. This section contains conflicting "concerns" from competitors and others that create the impression that publishers efforts to offer low-cost alternatives for instructors and students is somehow wrong, especially when publishers offer particularly steep discounts.

Generally, this section would be greatly improved by the recognition of the central role of the instructor in choosing selected materials, the reasons why publishers offer these choices, including significant cost savings and other benefits generated for students. For example:

- On page 11, paragraph 2, the report states: "Additionally, wholesalers, retailers, and others have expressed concern about how certain publishing practices, such as...increasing the availability of custom publishing options for instructors, have affected their ability to help students save money by providing used textbooks and buyback services."

As presented, this statement provides no discussion of the benefits of custom publishing – such as the increased value to the student because the book is more often used in its entirety and the common up-front cost saving to students who would otherwise have to purchase multiple books for a single course – leaving the reader with the misperception that custom textbooks are inappropriate, not valued by students and increase overall costs to them. The fact is publishers offer instructors a wide range of choices in materials at a variety of price points. The extent to which those products offer increased value or discounted costs to every student up-front should be balanced with concerns that students may not be able to receive additional sums from reselling their textbook on the current national used book market.

- Another example of a statement that lacks balance and appears to be inconsistent with other text in the draft report can be found on page 16, paragraph 2 of the report. The report says, "Wholesalers, retailers and some public interest groups agree that there has been a proliferation of supplements in recent years, and they have expressed concern about the increasing practice of selling supplements and textbooks bundled together in a package. While wholesalers and retailers do not question the quality of these materials, they suggest the practice of combining these supplements with textbooks limits students' ability to reduce their costs by purchasing less expensive used books and choosing which, if any, supplements they want to purchase."

There is no mention that those objecting to bundled supplements on the grounds that potential student re-sale savings are reduced, are objecting even though bundled packages commonly result in a lower overall cost for students compared with buying the items

separately. These savings are obtained by every purchasing student, up-front and can sometimes exceed the savings the student would receive from re-selling their used textbook.

The apparent concern that offering bundled packages "limits students' ability to reduce their costs by purchasing less expensive used books and choosing which, if any, supplements they want to purchase," appears to be in conflict with their subsequent concern on page 17, paragraph 1, that "...retailers said that because publishers often discount bundles, most of the savings students could expect from purchasing a used textbook would be negated if they bought the supplements separately."

As written, the wording leaves the reader with the misimpression that publishers have done something wrong by offering instructors the choice of ordering textbooks and integrated materials in a discounted bundled package, and that publishers compound that transgression by offering discounts that are too steep.

In summary, we believe the editorial style of the draft report suggests GAO advocacy for used books to reduce student costs without consideration of any other factors, such as the impact on the quality of a student's education, low-cost and technological alternatives to the traditional textbook, total cost of textbook ownership, the impact on the price of new books and compensation to authors.

Draft Report's Valuable Insights

Those sections of the report AAP endorses are the Concluding Observations and the section entitled, The Price of Textbooks Sold in Other Countries Varies according to Local Market Conditions.

We believe the Concluding Observations in the draft report correctly note a number of the more important factors that influence the college textbook sector, and acknowledge the expanded role of publishers in providing increasingly sophisticated learning tools to meet the demands of today's faculties and students.

For example the report observed that:

1) Price increases in textbooks "reflect a change in the characteristics of postsecondary education;"
2) "...as teaching and learning have changed with increasing reliance on technology, the nature of the college textbook has evolved from a stand-alone text to the inclusion of a variety of ancillary products designed to enhance the educational experience for instructors and students;" and
3) "...publishers are assuming roles that have traditionally belong to postsecondary institutions."

The section of the report dealing with the economic factors that influence the price of textbooks sold overseas and the efforts publishers are making to limit the re-importation into the United States of those books is balanced and accurate.

Specifically, GAO noted that:

1) "Without the added revenues from international sales, [publishers] would feel more cost pressure and would have to…increase U.S. prices;
2) Publishers price textbooks sold overseas on the basis of "local market conditions and the willingness and ability of students to purchase the textbook" and that they want to make their textbooks "affordable to students in developing countries because of the threat of piracy;"
3) Specific factors that publishers consider when making pricing decisions are "income levels, the cost of living, the role of the textbook in the classroom, intellectual property protections, the strength of the local currency, and the prices of competing textbooks sold in that marketplace."

We appreciate your consideration of these significant concerns and look forward to working with GAO to ensure the accuracy and balance of the final report.

Sincerely,

Patricia Schroeder
President and Chief Executive Officer
Association of American Publishers

COLLEGE TEXTBOOKS

Enhanced Offerings Appear to Drive Recent Price Increases

Why GAO Did This Study

The federal government strives to make postsecondary education accessible and affordable, primarily by providing financial aid to students and their families. Given that nearly half of undergraduates receive federal financial aid, Congress is interested in the overall cost of attendance, including the cost of textbooks. We were asked to determine (1) what has been the change in textbook prices, (2) what factors have contributed to changes in textbook prices, and (3) what factors explain why a given U.S. textbook may retail outside the United States for a different price.

We received technical comments from the Department of Labor. The Department of Education had no comments. The National Association of College Stores generally agreed with the report's findings. The Association of American Publishers agreed with some findings but expressed concern about the data sources we used and the characterizations made by retailers and wholesalers regarding the impact of publisher practices on students. We carefully reviewed the data sources available on college textbook pricing and found the data we used to be the most complete and reliable data available for our purposes. Additionally, we sought perspectives from publishers, retailers, and used book wholesalers to ensure our characterization of the textbook industry was balanced and complete.

What GAO Found

In the last two decades, college textbook prices have increased at twice the rate of inflation but have followed close behind tuition increases. Increasing at an average of 6 percent per year, textbook prices nearly tripled from December 1986 to December 2004, while tuition and fees increased by 240 percent and overall inflation was 72 percent. The cost of textbooks as well as supplies as a percentage of tuition and fees varies for first-time, full-time, degree-seeking students by the type of institution attended—72 percent at 2-year public institutions, 26 percent at 4-year public institutions, and 8 percent for 4-year private institutions.

Source: Bureau of Labor Statistics.

While many factors affect textbook pricing, the increasing costs associated with developing products designed to accompany textbooks, such as CD-ROMs and other instructional supplements, best explain price increases in recent years. Publishers say they have increased investments in developing supplements in response to demand from instructors. Wholesalers, retailers, and others expressed concern that the proliferation of supplements and more frequent revisions might unnecessarily increase costs to students.

U.S. college textbook prices may exceed prices in other countries because prices reflect market conditions found in each country, such as the willingness and ability of students to purchase the textbook. While geographical barriers have historically limited the reentry of textbooks intended for international distribution back into the United States, known as reimportation, recent advances in electronic commerce have broken down this barrier. In response to concerns that the international availability of less expensive textbooks might negatively affect textbook sales, publishers have taken steps to limit large-scale textbook reimportation.

Congressional Requesters

The federal government endeavors to improve access to and affordability of postsecondary education, primarily by providing financial aid to students and their families. Consequently, the overall cost of postsecondary attendance, including components such as tuition and textbooks, is of national importance because escalating costs can have negative effects on access and affordability. In academic year 2003-2004, students and their families spent over $6 billion on new and used textbooks.[1] Given that nearly half of undergraduates receive federal financial aid and the cost of textbooks is one component considered in making these awards, escalating textbook prices can impact federal spending. Because of the impact on access, affordability, and federal spending, recent reports of escalating textbook prices and instances in which publishers sell U.S. textbooks in other countries at lower prices have heightened congressional concern and raised questions about textbook pricing practices. You asked us to determine (1) what has been the increase, if any, in textbook prices? (2) what factors have contributed to changes in textbook prices? and (3) what factors explain why a given U.S. textbook may retail outside the United States for a different price?

To quantify the change in college textbook prices, the Department of Labor's Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS) constructed for GAO's use a Consumer Price Index (CPI) data series that shows how the price of textbooks for consumers has changed since December 1986, the earliest date for which college textbook prices are available as part of BLS's research index. In drawing samples to compute price indices, BLS defines a textbook as any book required for a course, including books intended for general readership and packages containing the textbook and related supplements when the textbook alone has not been ordered. In order to put the price of a textbook into context, we examined the cost of tuition and fees to students and their families as tracked by the CPI since 1980. We also examined data from the Department of Education's (Education) Integrated Postsecondary Education Data System (IPEDS) to gain an understanding of the cost of textbooks and supplies (IPEDS does not disaggregate textbooks and supplies) for first-time, full-time, degree-seeking students during the course of an entire academic year, as estimated by postsecondary institutions, and the portion of the total estimated cost of tuition and fees that books and supplies represent. To determine what factors have contributed to the change in college textbook prices, we interviewed executives from five textbook publishers that account for more than 80 percent of new textbook sales; the three major national used textbook wholesalers; three companies that operate over 1,300 college textbook retail stores, or 29 percent of stores nationwide; the National Association of College Stores; the Association of American Publishers; the California and state Public Interest Research Groups; and various other industry experts. To determine what factors have led to differences in the price of some textbooks in U.S. and non-U.S. markets, we reviewed relevant economic theory and interviewed major industry players. Specifically, we spoke to representatives from textbook publishers, operators of textbook retail stores, and used book wholesalers to determine the extent to which books may be available in other countries at lower prices, and the reasons behind these price differences. A more detailed explanation of our methodology, including more information about our data sources, is in appendix I. We conducted our work between November 2004 and June 2005 in accordance with generally accepted government accounting standards.

Results in Brief

College textbook prices have risen at twice the rate of annual inflation over the last two decades, following close behind annual increases in tuition and fees at postsecondary institutions. Rising at an average of 6 percent each year since academic year 1987-1988, compared with overall average price increases of 3 percent per year, college textbook prices trailed tuition and fee increases, which averaged 7 percent per year. Since December of 1986, textbook prices have nearly tripled, increasing by 186 percent, while tuition and fees increased by 240 percent and overall prices grew by 72 percent. While increases in textbook prices have followed increases in tuition and fees, the cost of textbooks and supplies for degree-seeking students as a percentage of tuition and fees varies by the type of institution attended. For example, the average estimated cost of books and supplies per first-time, full-time student for academic year 2003-2004 was $898 at 4-year public institutions, or about 26 percent of the cost of tuition and fees. At 2-year public institutions, where low-income students are more likely to pursue a degree program and tuition and fees are lower, the average estimated cost of books and supplies per first-time, full-time student was $886 in academic year 2003-2004, representing almost three-quarters of the cost of tuition and fees.

While there are many factors that affect textbook pricing, the price of textbooks has increased in recent years, according to experts we spoke with, as a result of the increase in costs associated with new features, such as Web sites and other instructional supplements. Other factors that affect pricing include production costs, availability of used books, and the demand for textbooks. Publishers say they have increased their investments in the development of supplements to meet the demands of a changing postsecondary market. For example, publishers we spoke with cited increases in part-time faculty who need additional teaching support as a key factor that has increased demand for instructional supplements. Publishers also said instructors are requesting more supplements, such as Web-based tutorials and self-assessment tools, to enhance student learning. However, wholesalers, retailers, and others suggest that while supplements may be of value to students, the increasing practice of packaging them with textbooks effectively limits the students' ability to purchase less expensive used books. Industry representatives and public interest groups also suggested that publishers are revising textbooks more frequently, and some expressed concern about the financial impact on students. Their concern is that more frequent revisions limit the opportunity students have to reduce their costs by purchasing used textbooks and selling their textbooks back to bookstores at the end of the term. While publishers generally agreed that the revision cycle for many books is 3 to 4 years, compared with 4 to 5 years that were standard 10 to 20 years ago, they said revisions were necessary to keep the materials current for faculty and to recoup their investments.

The price of a U.S. textbook may differ when the book is sold in other countries primarily because publishers price their textbooks in order to compete in local markets, and conditions exist that limit the resale of books from lower-priced markets back to the United States. Publishers told us that they produce textbooks primarily for the U.S. market and once they have incurred development costs, they can sell textbooks at a lower price in other countries because the cost of printing additional copies to sell outside the United States is relatively low. Publishers told us they price textbooks in other countries based on local market conditions, such as income levels, the extent to which students are required to purchase textbooks, and the availability of locally published textbooks. For example, publishers told us that some U.S. textbooks are priced lower in the United Kingdom because they must compete with locally produced textbooks that are less expensive. Price differences between the United States and other countries persist because there are barriers that limit the reentry of textbooks into the United States. In some cases the cost of locating lower-priced textbooks and shipping them to the United States would result in a higher cost than purchasing them in the United States. In other cases, purchases are restricted by agreements between publishers and foreign distributors. For instance, some publishers told us that their agreements with one online retailer outside the United States limit the number of copies that can be shipped back to the United States.

We provided copies of a draft of this report to the Department of Labor and the Department of Education for review and comment. The Department of Labor provided technical comments on the use of its CPI data, which we incorporated as appropriate. The Department of Education did not have any comments. We received written comments from the National Association of College Stores (NACS) and the Association of American Publishers (AAP), the trade groups representing the companies we interviewed for this study. NACS generally agreed with our findings, stating that the report accurately portrayed the textbook industry. AAP agreed with some findings in the report, but expressed concern with respect to the data sources we used in our analyses and with characterizations provided by retailers and wholesalers on the impact of publisher practices on students. We carefully reviewed the data sources available on college textbook pricing, and found the data we used to be the most complete and reliable data available for our purposes. Additionally, we sought perspectives from publishers, retailers, and used book wholesalers, to ensure our characterization of the textbook industry was balanced and complete. Both NACS and AAP also provided technical comments, which we incorporated where appropriate.

Background

The college textbook market is complex, comprised of many publishers, retailers, and used book wholesalers. Textbooks include new and used books and can be combined with supplemental learning materials. Figure 1 illustrates the typical life cycle of a textbook and the roles of publishers, instructors, bookstores, wholesalers, and students.

Publishers develop and produce textbooks and accompanying materials for instructors and students. While there are hundreds of college textbook publishers, there has been substantial industry consolidation in recent years, with sales at five of the largest publishers representing over 80 percent of the market in 2004. Because developing a textbook involves a significant investment of time and resources, publishers carefully consider the potential risks and rewards before publishing a new textbook. Publishers consider market needs, including the size of the market and competing products. They also consider how the textbook would fit into their existing portfolios because they are more likely to publish in subject areas that complement successful existing textbooks. For example, a publisher that has successful textbooks for calculus might want to develop a textbook in an adjacent area like statistics. Publishers may also consider what value they can add by publishing a given textbook to move beyond reproducing what is already available in the market.

Publishers direct their marketing efforts at instructors, and sometimes academic departments that make the decision about the course materials they will use and ultimately require their students to purchase. Publishers employ sales representatives who often call on instructors in person to discuss product options and provide instructors with free sample textbooks and instructional materials for consideration. Publishers also market their products at professional conferences and meetings, as well as through targeted mailings. Sales representatives typically receive a base salary and have the opportunity to earn commissions based on the volume of new course materials that are sold. They receive no compensation for materials that students purchase used.

College textbook retailers collect information about the materials instructors have selected for their courses and stock them for student purchases. Located both on and off campus, college textbook retailers are made up of a diverse group of businesses including independent booksellers, campus cooperatives, and large retail chains. The National Association of College Stores reports that about half of college textbook stores are owned by the postsecondary institution they serve and one-third are operated through lease agreements by outside companies. The companies that operate stores on college and university campuses through lease agreements typically pay a commission based on the total volume of sales to the postsecondary institutions in lieu of rent. It is not uncommon for the colleges and universities that contract with them to limit the margin on textbooks.

As bookstores receive information from instructors on the books required for the upcoming term, they determine the number of textbooks to order based on factors such as estimated enrollment and previous sales. Even with information on the number of students enrolled in the class, it can be difficult to estimate the number of books students will buy because many colleges and universities are served by more than one bookstore and students may also obtain textbooks from a variety of other sources. According to the National Association of College Stores, over 900 postsecondary institutions are served by multiple bookstores, with over 70 bookstores serving the 10 largest colleges and universities. Additionally, because students now have the opportunity to purchase their textbooks via the Internet from online retailers, no bookstore is without competition.

Retailers also attempt to make used books available to students, recognizing that many students prefer to purchase used books because they are generally less expensive. Bookstores generally buy as many used textbooks from their students as possible and then turn to used textbook wholesalers to obtain additional copies. However, the demand for used textbooks is much greater than the available supply, which is estimated to be between 25 and 30 percent of all textbooks in the market. The ability of bookstores to make used books available depends, in part, on how early they are aware an instructor will use a certain title. Receiving an order for a textbook by the end of a term increases the ability bookstores have to purchase used textbooks, particularly if the book is currently being used and they can buy back the book directly from students who have finished using it. Once the supply of used books has been exhausted, bookstores complete their orders with new textbooks from publishers. When instructors require new editions or materials that publishers have customized specifically for their course, bookstores must rely exclusively on publishers to fulfill their orders.

Wholesale companies facilitate the circulation of used textbooks by purchasing used books from retailers and directly from students to distribute to other retailers in need of used textbooks. Three major wholesale companies distribute textbooks nationally, and several smaller wholesalers distribute textbooks in specific regions of the country. Two of the national wholesalers also operate retail bookstores, and the other is tied to a retail chain through common ownership. Wholesalers have developed a complex model for determining the wholesale value of any given textbook based on factors such as demand, the available supply, and when a new edition is likely to be released. Because the supply of used books is limited and demand is high, wholesalers rank retailers in order to determine which will get first priority in receiving the used books they desire. Generally, national wholesalers give first priority to retailers that supply them with the most used books and do not return many of the books they purchase. To encourage bookstores to supply used books, wholesalers pay a commission and cover the cost of shipping the books to their warehouses.

While students have little choice over which textbooks they must purchase, they have some choice in where they buy their textbooks. Many campuses are served by multiple bookstores, and students may also be able to obtain their books through book exchanges on their campus. Advances in technology have allowed students to bypass traditional textbook outlets with expanded purchasing options online. A local bookstore may provide convenience, speed, and return options, while online retailers and student-to-student exchanges may offer lower prices. In some cases, textbooks meant to be sold in international markets at lower prices are also available to U.S. students through online retailers.

In addition, students can sometimes offset their costs by selling back their books at the end of the term. Generally, if a book is in good condition and will be used on the campus again, bookstores will pay students 50 percent of the original price paid. If the bookstore has not received a faculty order for the book at the end of the term and the edition is still current, bookstores may offer students the wholesale price of the book, which could range from 5 to 35 percent of the new retail price. This practice allows bookstores to provide an added service to students while supporting the national availability of used books. Students can also sell their books online to a wholesaler or to an individual. However, if a new edition of the book is forthcoming, students would not generally be able to sell back the book.

College Textbook Prices Have Grown at Twice the Rate of Inflation, Trailing Annual Tuition Increases

College textbook prices have risen at double the rate of inflation for the last two decades but have followed the trend of tuition increases at postsecondary institutions. The average growth in college textbook prices has been 6 percent per year since academic year 1987-1988, ranging from 4 percent in 1993-1994 to 9 percent in 1989-1990.[2] Meanwhile, tuition and fees have increased at an average of 7 percent per academic year during the same period, while overall price increases averaged 3 percent per academic year. Not only have textbook prices steadily increased each year, but the overall change in textbook prices has been substantial. According to a BLS research series on the CPI for college textbooks shown in figure 2, prices in December of 2004 were 186 percent higher than they were in December of 1986, the first month in which data were available, compared with a 240 percent increase in the cost of tuition and fees at colleges, universities, and professional schools.[3] Overall price inflation was 72 percent during the same time period.

[2]An academic year is defined as September through August for this analysis.

[3]The CPI measures the average change over time in the prices paid by urban consumers for consumer goods and services, and the CPI for college textbooks measures the average change over time of the price that students and their families pay for college textbooks.

Note: Data have not been seasonally adjusted.

With certain publisher packaging practices, supplementary products may sometimes be included in the price of the textbook for this index, but it is not possible with available data to determine the extent to which these practices may have contributed to price increases. The prices collected for BLS's textbook index represent new college textbook prices at colleges, universities, and professional schools at which textbooks are required.[4] Because only the price of the textbook is collected, the prices of any supplementary materials that may be available are typically not reflected in the index. However, if the textbook is only available at the bookstore in combination with some other course material—a practice commonly referred to as bundling—then the price of the entire bundle is collected. Officials at the Bureau of Labor Statistics told us that the practice of bundling has become increasingly prevalent in recent years. However, they told us it is not possible to determine with the information available the extent to which bundling may have contributed to increases in college textbook prices. For more information about the methodology used for constructing this index, please refer to appendix I.

[4]Although only new textbook prices are collected, standard industry pricing practices generally result in used book prices tracking the movement of new book prices. Wholesalers and retailers agree that the standard pricing practice for used books is to assign a price that is equal to 75 percent of the new price of the same book, so that if the new book price increases by 3 percent, the used book also increases by 3 percent.

Increases in college textbook prices were particularly high for the academic years 1989-1990 and 2001-2002, at 9 percent and 8 percent respectively. Since 2001-2002, the growth in textbook prices has been slowed, increasing by 5 percent in 2003-2004. Appendix II contains more details on average annual changes in textbook prices.

While increases in textbook prices have not followed far behind hikes in college tuition and fees, the cost of textbooks and supplies as a percentage of tuition and fees varies for degree-seeking students attending different types of institutions. According to data from Education's Integrated Postsecondary Education Data System, first-time, full-time students attending 4-year private, nonprofit colleges were estimated to spend $850 for books and supplies in their first year, or 8 percent of the cost of tuition and fees during academic year 2003-2004, as shown in figure 3.[5] In contrast, first-time, full-time students paying in-state tuition at 4-year public colleges or universities were estimated to spend 26 percent of the cost of tuition and fees on books and supplies, or $898, during the same period. At 2-year public colleges, where low-income students are more likely to begin their studies and tuition and fees are lower, first-time, full-time students are estimated to spend 72 percent of the cost of tuition and fees on books and supplies.[6] Specifically, 2-year public colleges estimated that their first-time, full-time students would spend about $886 in 2003-2004 on books and supplies. In 2002-2003, the last year for which

[5]We did not validate the methodology the institutions used to derive these estimates. These estimates are gross, that is, they do not estimate what students might receive if they resell their books. Because retailers may pay up to 50 percent of the retail price for used textbooks, students' net costs may be reduced substantially. Also, while these figures include the cost of supplies, we cannot disaggregate those cost from the totals. More detail on Education's definition of supplies is in appendix I.

enrollment data are available, students attending 2-year public colleges represented 42 percent of all postsecondary students.

Publisher Investments in New Products Have Contributed to Increases in Textbook Prices

While publishers, retailers, and wholesalers all play a role in textbook pricing, the primary factor contributing to increases in the price of textbooks has been the increased investment publishers have made in new products to enhance instruction and learning according to industry executives we interviewed. In particular, publishers point to the high cost associated with the development of technology applications that supplement traditional textbooks. Publishers told us they have made these investments to meet changing needs of higher education, such as the increase in part-time faculty who require greater instructional support and supplements that will enhance student learning of the subject matter. While wholesalers, retailers, and others do not question the quality of these materials, they have expressed concern that the publishers' practice of packaging supplements with a textbook to sell as one unit limits the opportunity students have to purchase less expensive used books. Additionally, wholesalers, retailers, and others have expressed concern about how certain publisher practices, such as revising textbooks more frequently and increasing the availability of custom publishing options for instructors, have affected their ability to help students save money by providing used textbooks and buyback services.

How Textbooks Are Priced

Publishers set the net price, or the price bookstores pay publishers to obtain the textbook, based on development and production costs, expected sales, and competition from comparable products available in the market. While the amount spent on development and production varies across publishers and specific titles, the publishers to whom we spoke underscored the substantial investments they make before a single textbook is sold. These include the cost of author advances, the development of content for the textbook and supplements, copyrights and permissions for illustrations and photographs, along with the cost of typesetting and printing enough copies to provide sample copies and cover expected sales.

In estimating expected sales of textbooks, publishers must consider the size of the overall market for a given textbook, the amount of market share they can reasonably capture based on the availability of competing products, and the availability of used books in subsequent years. The publishers we talked to focus heavily on publishing textbooks for introductory-level courses because the market is larger, even though competition for market share tends to be greater. Publishing in smaller markets can still be attractive, though, according to one publishing executive, because publishers may be able to attain greater market share, as there are generally fewer competing titles. Regardless of the market for a particular textbook, publishers told us that new textbook sales are highest in the first year an edition is available, with sales declining each year as the supply of used books becomes greater.

Publishers told us that they must price their textbooks based on what similar textbooks in the market are selling for, even if it will not generate enough revenue to offset their costs or they could lose sales to more competitively priced products. As a result, publishers noted that textbooks may not realize a profit in the first year of publication. Publishers told us that they are willing to take this financial risk because of the long-term rewards they expect for successful textbooks.

While each college store determines its own pricing model, many utilize a similar approach for determining the price of new and used textbooks. Bookstores set the retail price to ensure a certain percentage of the selling price goes to the bookstore. This percentage, commonly referred to by retailers as the margin,[7] covers bookstore costs and may allow the store to realize a profit. While the margin may vary at different individual bookstores, the average margin on new college textbooks among stores reporting to the National Association of College Stores is about 23 percent.[8] The margin on used textbooks, however, is typically higher. Used textbook prices are directly linked to new textbook prices as retailers and wholesalers typically follow a traditional pricing practice. According to this practice, retailers purchase used books from wholesalers at 50 percent of the new retail price and in turn charge students 75 percent of the new retail price to purchase the book. This pricing practice results in a 33 percent margin on used books for bookstores. Table 1 illustrates the typical pricing practice for a new and used textbook. College bookstores justify higher margins on used textbooks based on increased inventory risks and resources involved in preparing the books for resale.[9]

[7]Two terms, markup and margin, are commonly used to describe the difference between the net (or publisher) price and the retail price of textbooks. Publishers commonly refer to the markup, or the price increase relative to the publisher price, while college bookstores typically refer to the margin, the percentage of the retail price that they keep.

[8]National Association of College Stores, 2005 College Store Industry Financial Report (Oberlin, Ohio: 2005).

[9]For example, buying back books from students represents an inventory risk because it requires a substantial financial investment, which bookstores cannot recoup until they sell the books to another student or a wholesaler.

Publishers Have Developed New Product Options to Meet Perceived Needs of Instructors and Students

The factors that publishers consider in determining the price of their textbooks has not changed over time, but the nature of offerings from higher education publishers has changed in recent years. Publishers say they have invested heavily in developing additional textbook supplements for instructors and students, particularly resource-intensive technology applications, and ensuring that the content they provide is updated with the most current pedagogy and examples. Publishers told us they are making these investments in response to the changing needs of the higher education community and to remain competitive in the marketplace. While supplements are not new, publishers told us the number and variety of supplements available for a given textbook have increased substantially in the last 10 years.

Even though there has been widespread consolidation among textbook publishers over the last 20 years, publishers characterized the textbook market as intensely competitive and said this competition drives what products they offer and ultimately how they price their textbooks. Because the adoption process in which instructors select the textbooks and materials they wish to use in their courses is central to ensuring sales, publishers told us that they focus their efforts on developing textbooks and accompanying materials that will meet the diverse needs of instructors and their students. To ensure their products are appealing to instructors, publishers say they must offer a wide range of materials that accommodate a variety of teaching and learning styles. Publishers fear that if they are unable to keep up with offerings of their competitors they will lose adoptions and ultimately market share. One industry analyst we spoke to speculated that the consolidation of publishers and a lack of new entrants are largely factors of the enormous investments required to compete in the marketplace. The analyst said that by consolidating, publishers may gain economies of scale and spread their overhead and other costs across more titles.

Publishers say the investments they are making in product development are largely in response to changes in higher education that have resulted in publishers playing a more central role in facilitating instruction and learning. For example, publishers have always provided no-cost instructional supplements to help faculty teach their courses, but these offerings have intensified in recent years. In particular, publishers told us that the increased demand for instructional technology applications has resulted in high development costs. They say that since the advent of the Internet, postsecondary institutions have made substantial investments in technology and increased their expectations for instructors to make use of technology in the classroom. In response to this demand, publishers have invested millions of dollars in developing content that can be delivered via technological applications, such as Web sites and CD-ROMs, to accompany their textbooks. Some of these applications are designed to help instructors be more effective in the classroom, while others are intended for student use to enhance their learning of the material.

Publishers told us that they have tailored their instructional supplements to enhance instructor productivity and teaching, largely to meet the needs of instructors in an environment of funding cuts. Publishers say tools designed to enhance instructor productivity are in demand because reductions in the number of teaching assistants available to help instructors have increased the administrative burden for instructors. For example, publishers have developed online homework and quizzes that allow instructors to track student progress quickly, saving instructors time. The homework and quizzes students complete online can be graded immediately to provide both the instructor and students with immediate feedback on performance. The need for greater teaching support is another area in which publishers told us there has been increased demand, stemming largely from a reduction in the employment of full-time tenure track faculty at institutions across the country. Publishers say they are now providing more extensive curricular support including lesson plans, homework sets, multimedia lectures, and even workshops on specific teaching approaches. While these materials are provided at no cost to instructors, the cost of developing them is built into the price of the textbook.

Publishers also described a wide array of supplements that faculty can adopt that are intended to enhance student learning and success in the course. Publishers say there is a growing demand for these products because the number of students who are unprepared for college-level work has been increasing. Student supplements are either sold separately or bundled with the textbook, but the bulk of the development costs are typically built into the price of the textbook, according to publishers. While publishers produce print supplements, such as study guides and solutions manuals to accompany their textbooks, technology content represents the area in which publishers say they are investing more substantially. For example, one publisher told us the company had invested over $1 million in the development of a CD-ROM that provides three-dimensional images to enhance learning in anatomy. In the short term, these investments are very costly for publishers, but publishers are predicting increased demand for these products over time, with more content delivered digitally. Electronic content is appealing to publishers because sales of these products would be less affected over time by the used textbook market than print products, which can more easily be bought and sold in the used textbook market. Specifically, passwords to restricted access Web sites cannot be resold, and there is no national used market for other types of electronic products, such as CD-ROMS and software, because retailers and wholesalers cannot easily verify that the products are functional once they have been used.

Wholesalers, Retailers, and Others Express Concern That Some Publisher Practices May Unnecessarily Increase Costs to Students

Wholesalers, retailers, and some public interest groups acknowledge that publishers are making substantial investments to develop textbooks and supplementary materials, but they have expressed concern about the impact some publisher practices may have on student costs. In particular, they think some of the strategies employed by publishers, such as bundling textbooks with supplements and revising textbooks more frequently, may limit the ability students have to decrease their costs by purchasing less expensive used textbooks.

Concerns about Bundling

Wholesalers, retailers, and some public interest groups agree that there has been a proliferation of supplements in recent years, and they have expressed concern about the increasing practice of selling supplements and textbooks bundled together in a package. While wholesalers and retailers do not question the quality of these materials, they suggest the practice of combining these supplements with textbooks limits students' ability to reduce their costs by purchasing less expensive used books and choosing which, if any, supplements they want to purchase. Retailers told us that when bundling started becoming more common, it became difficult for them to obtain supplements separately from publishers to provide students the option of buying a used book and selected supplements. Though publishers say that most supplements are now available separately, retailers said that because publishers often discount bundles, most of the savings students could expect from purchasing a used textbook would be negated if they bought the supplements separately. For example, a new book may be bundled with an access code to a companion Web site at no additional cost to the student. Students who choose to buy a less expensive used textbook will have to purchase the access code separately, but the combined cost of the used book and the access code will be similar to the price of the new course materials sold in a bundle. One retailer also noted that publishers assign every product a unique identification number, whether sold individually or bundled. Because the identification number for a bundle varies based on the specific combination of materials included in the package, the retailer told us it can be difficult to identify the individual components in the bundle to order them separately from publishers or, when available, through the used textbook market. Publishers note, however, that the standard industry practice of assigning each bundle a unique identification number is intended to make it easy for students, retailers, and wholesalers to obtain a complete description of the bundle's contents by entering the identification number online.

Publishers told us that textbook sales representatives work to identify materials that will best meet a given instructor's needs and generally bundle course materials with the textbook when the instructor desires it. However, retailers said that instructors are often unaware that the course materials they selected will come bundled, based on routine follow-up discussions that stores have had with instructors. Retailers told us that many instructors want the supplements to be available for their students but also want students to have the option of buying a used book. However, some publishers say that the discounts available on bundles are a selling point with instructors, along with the assurance that students will purchase the correct course materials.

While publishers typically allow retailers to return new textbooks that are not sold without penalty if the textbooks are in new condition, when course materials are bundled together they can be returned only if the seal is unbroken. Retailers explained that their stores offer generous return policies to accommodate students who, for example, buy the wrong course materials or drop a course. If a student has broken the seal of the bundle, retailers say they will not be able to return the materials to the publisher for a refund. One retailer told us that its stores will generally accept returns of unsealed bundles to minimize ill will with students but that they would have to absorb the return as a loss.

Some publishers acknowledged that there has been resistance to the practice of bundling, and some told us they are now more carefully considering when bundling may be appropriate. While the practice is designed to provide students with greater value, publishers understand that students must perceive that value for a bundle to sell. Publishers say they are also beginning to understand that as students may be sensitive to high prices, they must strike a balance between quality and price. For example, one publisher provided an example of a bundle that did not sell well because the number of components increased the price beyond what students were willing to pay. While the publisher knew that the textbook and the individual components would retail separately for much more, students perceived the price as too high. Publishers also told us that bundling is most effective when instructors make use of all the materials included in the bundle and stress their importance to students. Publishers understand that when students spend money for course materials that are never used they may perceive the purchase as unnecessary.

Concerns about the Frequency of Revisions

Industry representatives and some public interest groups also suggested that publishers are revising textbooks more frequently, and some expressed concern about the financial impact revisions have on students. Retailers and wholesalers told us that because instructors typically use the most current edition of textbooks in their courses, the previous edition becomes obsolete once a new edition is released. Once retailers and wholesalers learn of a pending new edition, typically several months in advance of the release date, they said the buyback value drops rapidly to zero. Once a new edition is released, retailers say they generally cannot buy back an old edition from students, a practice that helps students reduce their costs.

Publishers agreed that the revision cycle for many books has accelerated over time, but most said that it has been stable in recent years. While textbook revision cycles can vary based on several factors, such as the level of the course and the discipline, publishers told us that textbooks are generally revised every 3 to 4 years, compared with cycles of 4 to 5 years that were standard 10 to 20 years ago. Publishers say that the revision cycle is driven by instructors who want the most current material and may seek products from competitors if they are unable to meet the demand. Publishers cited a recent poll of 1,029 college professors commissioned by the Association of American Publishers that found that 80 percent of those polled think it is important that the material in the textbook be as current as possible.[10] However, this may not be universal across disciplines. For example, over 700 mathematics and physics instructors from 150 universities across the country have petitioned one publisher to delay revisions until there have been substantial changes in content or teaching methods that merit revision.[11]

Publishers noted that while not every revision results in substantial content changes, revisions must also be made for other reasons, such as changing teaching methods. For example, one publisher cited a teaching

[10]Zogby International, The Attitudes of College Faculty on the Textbooks Used in Their Courses (Utica, New York: December 2004).

[11]As part of the state Public Research Interest Group's efforts to advocate for lower prices for students, a number of faculty members signed a letter dated April 2004 calling on one publisher to change certain practices.

approach from the 1980s that has regained popularity in calculus. Revisions may be based on current events, such as including recent accounting scandals in textbooks for business law and ethics courses, or recent elections in political science textbooks. Publishers told us that changes in industry standards that are relevant to a discipline may also necessitate out-of-cycle revisions or updates, such as pronouncements issued by the Financial Accounting Standards Board for accounting textbooks.

Some wholesalers and retailers think that the revision cycle for some textbooks has the effect of limiting the used market. For example, retailers and wholesalers have observed that books for introductory-level classes are on a shorter revision cycle than other books, possibly because there is a greater supply of used books, as students are less likely to keep them. One publisher we talked to said that books for introductory classes are typically revised more frequently because demand for current content and technology applications is greater in these courses. Most publishers maintain that their decisions to revise a book are based on factors other than sales patterns. However, one publisher we spoke with said that the current revision cycle at the company is tied to the pattern of sales revenues, which all publishers agreed decline the longer the textbook is on the market and more used copies become available. Publishers estimated that in the second year of an edition they might sell 25 percent to 70 percent of the textbooks that were sold in the first year, depending on level and discipline. Moreover, publishers say that they count on textbook revisions to recoup the initial investment costs of developing the textbook. They told us that first-edition textbooks are highly risky and that only about 20 to 30 percent of their first-edition textbooks are ever revised. However, they said that they are willing to take on this risk based on the long-term rewards they expect to receive from successful textbooks that are revised.

Concerns about Other Publisher Practices

Wholesalers, retailers, and some public interest groups have also raised concerns about other publisher practices that may limit students' ability to purchase used textbooks, such as custom publishing, which allows instructors to customize their course materials by adding or deleting chapters from a single textbook or multiple textbooks. According to publishers, technological advances have made the practice more cost-effective and the adoption of custom materials has been increasing. Publishers say that custom publishing appeals to instructors because it allows them to consolidate material from multiple sources into one textbook for their students. Publishers also think it provides students with good value because instructors are more likely to use all of the material they select. Because the price of custom publishing is based on the content, the price of custom textbooks may be lower than for a traditional textbook, according to publishers. For example, students might pay less for one custom textbook than they would for several books the instructor might have required if customization was not available. Some publishers also observed that sales of custom materials tend to be better because instructors are committed to using all of the material, and there is no national used textbook market for them.

Retailers and wholesalers said that because there is no resale market for a given custom textbook outside the campus where it was originally used, students may lose out on the ability to save money by buying used books and selling them back at the end of the term. One retailer expressed particular concern about a few specific instances in which textbook covers had been customized with the mascot or logo of a specific institution, but the content of the textbook was the same. Because these textbooks are designed for a specific campus and have a unique identification number, there is no national used market for them. In addition, retailers say that publishers place strict return limits—typically 10 percent—on custom textbooks, even though traditional textbooks are usually fully returnable to the publisher. As a result, retailers say that they have to carefully balance their commitment to carrying an adequate supply of custom materials for students against the risk of exceeding the return limit if they do not sell enough copies.

Wholesalers, retailers, and others are also concerned about the long-term cost implications for students that may result from publisher practices to provide lower-cost alternatives to the traditional textbook. Among these alternatives are loose-leaf textbooks that are designed to be placed in a binder and electronic textbooks that are available for purchase online. While these options may save students money initially, wholesalers and retailers are concerned about the long-term cost implications for students. For example, students may initially pay less for a loose-leaf textbook than they would for a textbook that is bound, but wholesalers and retailers said students would be unable to sell a loose-leaf book back because it is not possible to determine whether all the pages are intact. With electronic textbooks, students may pay about half of the price of a new textbook for password-protected access to an online version of the textbook. Until the password expires, students can access the textbook as many times as they wish, either reviewing the chapters online or printing a hard copy. Some public interest groups initially embraced the idea of electronic textbooks but now point out that students may run into technical difficulties if they have to rely on Internet access. Additionally, because access to the textbook may expire, students may not have the option at the end of the term to keep the textbook. According to publishers, electronic textbooks have not caught on with students, and sales of these products have been unsuccessful.

The Price of U.S. Textbooks Sold in Other Countries Varies according to Local Market Conditions

College textbook prices in the United States may exceed prices in other countries because textbook publishers assign prices that reflect the market conditions found in each country. The demand for textbooks can vary across countries because of, for example, differences in income levels or in the classroom role of textbooks. Publishers typically incur substantial costs in order to develop textbooks, but once these development costs have been undertaken, the additional cost of producing more copies is quite low. As a result, a publisher may be able to profitably sell textbooks in one country at prices that are closer to actual costs of printing and distributing additional copies while charging higher prices in the United States that reflect the substantial development costs undertaken. Two factors are typically cited as enabling a seller, such as a publisher, to profitably charge different prices to different buyers, such as textbook buyers in different countries. The seller must be able to distinguish among groups with differences in their willingness and ability to pay a given price, and the ability for these groups to buy and sell among one another must be restricted. Traditionally, the geographical separation of markets has made it difficult for U.S. students to acquire lower-priced textbooks from other countries. More recent developments in Internet commerce have reduced the costs for buyers in the United States to acquire textbooks from other countries, causing publishers to reexamine their distribution arrangements.

Varying Local Market Conditions and Barriers to Importation Help Explain Textbook Price Differences between the United States and Other Countries

Textbook publishers told us that college textbooks are developed primarily for sale in the United States, based on cost considerations and demand forecasts for the North American market, but that they sell textbooks in other markets when there is international demand. Textbooks developed for certain academic disciplines are more likely to have broader international appeal than others, according to publishers. For example, the content found in many mathematics, science, and engineering textbooks is essentially global in its applicability. However, the content found in textbooks used in other disciplines, such as political science, may pertain much more specifically to U.S. experiences, institutions, or culture. If international demand for a textbook exists, publishers may sell the same textbook that is sold in the United States, an international edition produced with less expensive materials, or an adaptation of the textbook that includes locally relevant examples. In international markets where the primary language spoken is not English, publishers may sell the rights to translate the textbook into the local language.

In assigning prices to the different versions of U.S. textbooks sold in the international marketplace, publishers told us that they consider local market conditions and the willingness and ability of students to purchase the textbook. As there can be significant intercountry differences in the demand for textbooks, publishers told us that they make country-by-country and book-by-book distribution and pricing decisions. Specifically, publishers told us that factors they consider in making pricing decisions are income levels, the cost of living, the role of the textbook in the classroom, intellectual property protections, the strength of the local currency, and the prices of competing textbooks sold in that marketplace. In some cases, international prices may be substantially lower than prices at which the textbook is sold in the United States, while in other cases, they may be the same as or higher than U.S. prices. For example, publishers told us that in many developing countries, incomes are generally too low for students to buy textbooks at U.S. prices. However, in areas where the cost of living is generally higher than in the United States, such as in Scandinavian countries, textbook prices may be higher.

Publishers told us that they have to be particularly concerned about pricing at a level that is affordable to students in developing countries because of the threat of piracy in these countries. Although they already grapple with piracy in many of these markets, publishers say that even fewer legitimate copies would be sold in these markets if prices were too high. According to publishers, some countries do not have a strong commitment to intellectual property protections, but governments have been more responsive in dealing with piracy cases when textbooks are priced at a level that local students can afford.

In addition to income levels, differences in instructional styles and systems of higher education influence publishers' pricing decisions. For example, publishers told us that even though average income levels are high in the United Kingdom, textbooks tend to sell for lower prices than in the United States because the demand for textbooks is lower. Specifically, they said that instructors in the United Kingdom are more likely to recommend several textbooks for students to consider, rather than requiring a specific textbook. Additionally, publishers told us that there is less demand for electronic and print supplements to support teaching and learning in non-U.S. markets. Publishers also told us that because higher education funding tends to be highly subsidized in the United Kingdom and European countries, students may not be willing to pay out-of-pocket costs for textbooks at U.S. prices. According to publishers, textbook prices in Canada and Australia tend to be similar to those in the United States because the instructional styles are similar in that instructors select specific textbooks for their classes. However, publishers noted that in these markets there is also greater demand for U.S. textbooks that have been adapted to the local culture or economy.

The National Association of College Stores has criticized the practice of differential pricing, or the publisher practice of charging lower prices in some countries, saying that it is unfair for U.S. students to pay more for the same textbooks. However, the practice of differential pricing is not exclusive to textbook publishing and occurs both within and outside the United States. For example, GAO has reported on differential pricing in the airline industry, where business travelers typically pay much higher fares than leisure travelers.[12] Likewise, we have reported on differential pricing of prescription drugs in the pharmaceutical industry.[13] Publishers can afford to sell textbooks at prices that are sometimes lower outside the United States because once development costs have been incurred for the U.S. market, the incremental cost of producing additional copies for the international market is low. This allows publishers to sell textbooks in other countries at prices that are closer to printing and distribution costs while charging prices in the United States that better reflect the high costs of development. The publishers we talked to estimated that international sales make up from 5 to 15 percent of their total revenues. Some publishers speculated that without the added revenues from international sales, they would feel more cost pressure and would have to either increase U.S. prices or invest less in certain products.

In order for international pricing differences to persist, there must be barriers that limit mass importation of less expensive U.S. textbooks from other countries. Such barriers ensure that individuals and businesses purchase from the intended distribution channels and insulate students from awareness of price differences in other countries. Historically, the geographic separation of countries served as a natural barrier preventing such trade from occurring. Geographic distances and lack of information made it difficult for individuals or businesses in the United States to save money on textbooks by purchasing lower-priced textbooks in other countries and having them shipped to the United States, a practice commonly referred to as reimportation. However, recent technological developments in electronic commerce have diminished the effects of this natural barrier, increasing awareness of prices in other countries and making it easier for students and retailers to purchase lower-priced textbooks from international markets.

Publishers Have Taken Recent Steps to Limit the Reentry of Their Textbooks into the U.S. Market

Retailers and publishers have expressed concern about the reimportation of lower-priced textbooks from international locations. Specifically, they cited the ability students have to purchase books from online distribution channels outside the United States at lower prices, which may result in a loss of sales for U.S. retailers. Additionally, the availability of lower-priced textbooks through these channels has heightened distrust and frustration among students regarding textbook prices, and college stores find it difficult to explain why their textbook prices are higher, according to the National Association of College Stores. Retailers and publishers have also been concerned that some U.S. retailers may have engaged in reimportation on a large scale by ordering textbooks for entire courses at lower prices from international distribution channels. Concerned about the effects of differential pricing on college stores, the National Association of College Stores has called on publishers to stop the practice of selling textbooks at lower prices outside the United States.

Publishers told us that they intend for the textbooks they distribute in other countries to be sold for use in those countries, not for resale to the United States, and so have taken recent actions to limit large-scale reimportation. Most of the publishers with whom we spoke say they are particularly concerned about the actions of foreign distributors and U.S. retailers that may result in large-scale reimportation of textbooks. As a result, publishers told us they have taken recent steps to limit the reimportation of textbooks in large quantities. Specifically, publishers told us that they have strengthened their agreements with foreign wholesalers to prevent the large-scale sale of U.S. textbooks back to the United States. Some publishers also said they have made an agreement with an online retailer outside the United States to limit the number of copies of a given textbook that can be delivered to a single U.S. address in one order. Because these measures target large-scale reimportation of U.S. textbooks from international sources at lower prices, they will not prevent U.S. students from purchasing single copies of textbooks from international sources.

Concluding Observations

College textbook prices have risen steadily, along with tuition and fees, and appear to have been largely driven by investments in supplements. While price increases have resulted in increasing costs for students and their families, they reflect a change in the characteristics of postsecondary education. Just as teaching and learning have changed with increasing reliance on technology, the college textbook has evolved from a stand-alone text to include a variety of ancillary products designed to enhance the educational experience for instructors and students. By increasingly becoming involved in the development of instructional aids, publishers are assuming roles that have traditionally belonged to postsecondary institutions. If publishers continue to increase these investments, particularly in technology, the cost to produce a textbook is likely to continue to increase in the future.

Although changes in the nature of college textbooks are evident, it is difficult to assess the impact of these changes on students. Instructors can now select from a much wider variety of supplements to tailor their courses to the needs of their students, but these additional textbook offerings may come at an increased cost to students. While textbook prices have risen with tuition costs, these costs can vary greatly depending on the type of institution a student is attending. Because textbooks may represent a substantial portion of the cost of tuition and fees for students attending some public institutions, any increase in textbook prices may affect affordability and access disproportionately for some students. Consequently, while students may benefit from the advances in textbook supplements, they may not feel the price increases are justified relative to what they spend on tuition. Students may also think the amount they have to pay for their textbooks is unfair, especially if some of the same textbooks are available at lower prices outside the United States.

Because the cost to students may not be the primary factor considered when publishers are developing textbooks that students are ultimately required to buy, the rate of textbook price increases is not likely to slow. Students may lower their costs by purchasing used textbooks and may search for lower-priced textbooks from online sources, including international retailers, and directly from other students. However, these options are unlikely to provide a sustainable source of lower prices because the supply of these textbooks is limited and international prices are subject to change. In addition, because publishers, wholesalers, and many retailers are profit-seeking firms, any widespread action that would lower costs to students at the expense of profits would be met with changes in their business practices, such as changing distribution patterns.

Agency Comments

We provided copies of a draft of this report to the Department of Labor and the Department of Education for review and comment. The Department of Labor provided technical comments on the use of its CPI data, which we incorporated as appropriate. The Department of Education did not have any comments. We also sought comments on our characterization of the textbook industry from the National Association of College Stores and the Association of American Publishers, the trade groups representing the companies we interviewed for this study.

NACS generally agreed with our findings, stating that the report accurately portrayed the textbook industry. NACS also provided technical comments that we incorporated as appropriate. NACS's comments appear in appendix III.

AAP agreed with some findings in the report but expressed concern with respect to the data sources we used in our analyses and the tone and objectivity of the report.

With respect to the data sources we used, AAP expressed concern about the limitations of the data we used in determining textbook price increases over time, and the proportion of tuition and fees that spending on textbooks and supplies represent for students at different types of postsecondary institutions. AAP also suggested alternative data sources for addressing these issues, but we found that they were not sufficiently reliable for our purposes.

While AAP disagreed with our use of CPI data from BLS, these are the most complete and reliable data on textbook prices available. Further, we clearly disclose the limitations and definitions of the CPI data in the report. AAP's claim that BLS data do not capture the "penetration of lower-cost alternatives" is not accurate. The college textbooks CPI is an index designed to capture the prices of assigned textbooks. To the extent that lower cost alternatives are assigned, they would be fully reflected in BLS's index. AAP also suggested that the availability of alternative data from Student Monitor that differ substantially from the BLS data call into question our decision to use BLS data as a sole source. We disagree because the two data sources are not comparable. Student Monitor data are measuring annual changes in student spending, while BLS data measure annual price changes.

AAP also expressed concerns about the use of Education's IPEDS data, in particular that estimates are for textbooks and supplies and that we did not validate the estimates postsecondary institutions provided. We use IPEDS data because they are the most complete data available on estimated student spending. As we state in appendix I, we tested IPEDS for reliability and note that other available data sources are not as complete or reliable. AAP also questions the appropriateness of measuring estimated spending on textbooks and supplies as a percentage of tuition. We present these data to provide perspective on college affordability—a primary federal policy concern. To address AAP's concerns about what constitutes supplies, we have noted in appendix I that supplies are defined as usual costs incurred by a majority of students. AAP also expressed concern that in discussing estimates of student spending on textbooks, we did not take into account the extent to which students lower their costs through buyback. We have added this context where we discuss costs to students.

AAP also provided additional data sources for consideration and expressed concern that deadlines prevented us from giving these sources appropriate consideration. We considered other sources available that provide estimates of student spending. Time was not a factor in our decision not to use the data, but rather we found these sources to be not as complete or as reliable as the IPEDS data. Student Monitor, one of the sources suggested by AAP, provides market research for those targeting college students as a consumer group. Student Monitor employs a nonprobabilistic sampling methodology using an intercept-based quota sample of 1,200 students covering 100 colleges and universities. Because of the sample selection process used, it cannot be used to estimate to the college student population as a whole for the purpose of addressing a key finding. Other industry sources AAP suggested provide estimates on the total size of the market, but they cannot be used to provide representative estimates on student spending for textbooks.

AAP expressed concern about the tone and objectivity of the report, particularly the characterizations of retailers and wholesalers on the impact of publisher practices on students. In most instances we had already discussed issues raised by AAP in other sections of our report. AAP took issue with comments made by wholesalers and retailers regarding the impact of textbook revisions, bundling, and custom publishing on students' ability to pursue lower-cost, used textbooks. We specifically provide information on the views of wholesalers and retailers to add balance and include more perspectives in our report. We provide publisher perspectives on why they revise textbooks and characterize why and how the revision cycle has changed over the last two decades. We also extensively discuss in our report publisher perspectives on supplements, bundling, and other options, such as custom publishing, while capturing publisher views regarding their benefits. Wholesalers and retailers provided a different perspective on these practices as they relate to potential costs to students, which we captured in our report.

More generally, GAO's approach to this study was to rely primarily on publishers to provide information on how they price textbooks and gain their perspectives on the factors that influence price changes. We also sought out other experts in the field, including retailers and wholesalers, to better understand how students obtain textbooks and what factors affect the cost to the student. Retailers and wholesalers did not place blame on publishers but pointed out the impact of some publisher practices on students. We do not place any blame in our report on the publishers and do in fact note that they offer a variety of options for students, sometimes at a discount. We also note in our report that faculty have primary responsibility for determining what students are required to buy.

AAP stated in its letter that it agreed with the findings related to international price differences and the report's concluding observations. AAP also provided technical comments, which we incorporated as appropriate. AAP's comments appear in appendix IV.

As arranged with your offices, unless you publicly announce its contents earlier, we plan no further distribution of this report until 30 days from its issue date. At that time, we will send copies of this report to the congressional committees and subcommittees responsible for the Higher Education Act, the Secretary of Education, the Secretary of Labor, and other interested parties. Copies will also be made available to others upon request. In addition, this report will be available at no charge on GAO's Web site at http://www.gao.gov.

Appendix I: Objectives, Scope, and Methodology

To determine the extent to which textbook prices have changed over time, we reviewed college textbook pricing data from the Bureau of Labor Statistics' Consumer Price Index (CPI).[1] The CPI measures the average change over time in the prices paid by urban consumers for consumer goods and services, and in the case of textbooks represents an index of change over time of the retail price of college textbooks, or the price that students and their families pay. While college textbooks have been included in the CPI since 1964, data on textbooks in the Bureau of Labor Statistics' (BLS) research database only go back to 1986, when BLS collected textbook prices as part of an index on the price of books and supplies. The agency began publishing a separate CPI series on textbooks in 2001. Using these data, BLS constructed an unpublished research series on college textbooks for GAO for the period of December 1986 through December 2004. The index was compiled from three separate index series, as outlined in table 2. The implications on the index of these differences in methodology are discussed below.

Table 2: Source and Methodology for CPI College Textbook Research Series Data

Time period	Source and methodology
December 1986 to December 1998	BLS produced the index using data collected for the Educational Books and Supplies CPI series.
December 1998 to December 2001	BLS applied a standard BLS calculation procedure to college textbook price data in order to generate the index.
December 2001 to December 2004	BLS used the published index for college textbooks, which employs quality adjustment methods.[a]

Source: BLS.

[a]For a detailed analysis of these quality adjustment methods, see BLS, Hedonic Quality Adjustment Methods for College Textbooks in the U.S. CPI (Washington, DC.: October 2001).

The college textbook CPI is constructed using a probability-based selection process that identifies bookstores as well as textbooks that are assigned for use in courses of higher education. Prices for specific books are taken from a variety of bookstores located on and off campus, as well as from Web-based retailers, reflecting prices at public and private postsecondary institutions, including 2-year, 4-year, graduate, and professional schools. The sample composition changes each year for the following reasons: (1) books assigned to classes change over time,

[1]Data for the college textbooks CPI have not been seasonally adjusted. Seasonal adjustment removes the effects of recurring seasonal influences from many economic series, including consumer prices.

(2) some books cycle out of circulation, and (3) a quarter of the sample rotates out annually. Similarly, the sample size for this research series varies over time as sampling procedures are modified and may range from 200 to 500 price quotes. This variation in sample size does not affect the value of the index, though fewer observations may affect the variance of the index. Overall, BLS reports that the response rate for college textbook CPI data collection is very high, 88 percent.

Most of the textbooks included in the sample are designated as required texts for courses offered by the college or university associated with each sampled bookstore. In some cases, the selected textbook may not be available for pricing because the course has been terminated, the course requires a different textbook, or the course is not offered every term. In instances in which the course is no longer offered and the textbook is not used in any other course, then the assigned textbook for a similar course is selected as a substitute. If the textbook is no longer used for the selected course, it is replaced with the textbook that is currently used for the selected course. If the book is temporarily out of use (for example, the course associated with the book is offered only in the fall semester), then the book is listed as temporarily not available and the price change is imputed based on the price changes of the other books.

An important limitation to this research series is that prior to 2001, prices for such substitute books were not usually compared and no adjustments were made for any qualitative changes between the previous and substitute books.[2] With the introduction of quality adjustment in 2001, the index is adjusted when certain characteristics of a textbook change, such as a move from a major to a smaller publisher or a considerable change in the number of pages. If the new version of the textbook contains substantially different characteristics and quality adjustment values are not available, the price movement is imputed based on the prices of comparable textbooks. Because hedonic quality adjustment is implemented only for the published portion of the research series, for the periods before 2001, the index may have higher variance than the published index, which begins in 2001.

In addition, BLS officials pointed out that textbooks are increasingly wrapped in packages along with additional materials, making it difficult to collect all of the qualitative characteristics of the textbook. If the selected textbook is sold by itself, then only the textbook is priced. However, if the selected textbook is automatically sold with another item, such as a CD or workbook, then the agency must price the entire package. As a result of these packaging practices, it is sometimes difficult for BLS to obtain the information necessary for quality adjustment, and other times the price recorded as the textbook price may also include ancillary materials.

To put changes in textbook prices into the context of other changes in the cost of higher education, we also reviewed CPI data on tuition and fees, which are constructed using a probability-based selection process and reflect the cost of tuition and fees at 2-year and 4-year institutions and professional schools.[3]

We analyzed data from the Department of Education's (Education) Integrated Postsecondary Data System (IPEDS) to determine the proportion of tuition and fees that expenditures for textbooks and supplies represent.[4] Specifically, postsecondary institutions estimate the amount first-time, full-time, degree-seeking students will spend for an entire academic year on textbooks and supplies and report on the amount of tuition and fees. IPEDS defines books and supplies as the average cost of books and supplies for a typical student for an entire academic year (or program). Supplies are to include usual costs that are incurred by a majority of students. Supplies required of special groups of students, such as engineering or art majors, would not be counted unless they constituted a majority of students at the institution. The Department of Education has not established a comprehensive definition of what supplies are. However, an Education official told us that supplies can include such things as allowances for personal computers, but such expenses should be reported only if they are required for a majority of students at the institution.

[3]Since the CPI for college textbooks is not seasonally adjusted, we relied on nonseasonally adjusted data for the overall CPI as well as the CPI for tuition and fees. There are no long-term significant differences between the nonseasonally adjusted and seasonally adjusted indexes.

[4]IPEDS is a system of surveys designed to collect data from all primary providers of postsecondary education. These surveys collect institution-level data in such areas as enrollments, program completions, faculty, staff, and finances. Data are collected annually from approximately 9,600 postsecondary institutions, including over 6,000 institutions eligible for the federal student aid programs.

To assess the completeness of the IPEDS data, we reviewed the National Center for Education Statistics' documentation on how the data were collected and performed electronic tests to look for missing or out-of-range values. On the basis of these reviews and tests, we found the data sufficiently reliable for our purposes. We did not validate the methodology the institutions used to derive their estimates for the cost of books and supplies, and there has been no review of how well these institutional estimates actually predict student spending on textbooks and supplies.

There are other sources available that provide estimates of student spending on college textbooks that we considered, but we did not find these sources to be as complete or reliable as IPEDS. The College Board collects estimates from postsecondary institutions on spending for books and supplies for full-time undergraduate students as part of its Annual Survey of Colleges. While the methodology employed was similar to that used for IPEDS, the survey included responses from a smaller population of institutions than IPEDS. Another source, Student Monitor, estimates spending on college textbooks based on student-reported expenditures. Student Monitor provides market research for those targeting college students as a consumer group. Student Monitor employs a nonprobabilistic sampling methodology using an intercept-based quota sample of 1,200 students covering 100 colleges and universities. Because of the sample selection process used, it cannot be used to estimate to the college student population as a whole for the purpose of addressing a key finding.

To determine what factors have contributed to the change in college textbook prices, we interviewed executives from five of the largest textbook publishers, representing more than 80 percent of new textbook sales; the three national used textbook wholesalers; three companies that operate over 1,300 college textbook retail stores, or 29 percent of stores nationwide; the National Association of College Stores; the Association of American Publishers; and various other industry experts.

To determine what factors have led to differences in the price of some U.S. textbooks in non-U.S. markets, we conducted a review of economic theory and relevant GAO work on differential pricing. We interviewed representatives from textbook publishers, operators of textbook retail stores, and used book wholesalers to determine the extent to which books may be available in other countries at lower prices, their analysis of the reasons behind these price discrepancies, and their concerns about pricing differences.

[b]Academic year 1987-1988 shows the growth in prices over the previous academic year, 1986-1987. Data for the 1986-1987 estimate lack the months of September through November, as data became available in December of 1986. As a result, the average price level in 1986-1987 is based on 9 months of data rather than 12.

Dear Ms. Ashby,

I am writing in response to your request for comments on the Government Accountability Office (GAO) draft report (GAO-5-806) "College Textbooks." On behalf of the National Association of College Stores, I want to thank you for the opportunity to review and comment on the draft report.

Generally, we believe the report accurately portrays the post-secondary course material industry, and captures many of the key factors affecting course material pricing and costs for college stores and the U.S. students they serve. We appreciate the professional job performed by your staff.

College stores support the goal of making a college education more affordable. It is for this reason that college stores work every day to find ways to reduce cost for students through such activities as buying and selling used books; enhancing the adoption process for faculty through the use of technology; supporting improved communications between faculty and students on the course material requirements of a course; sponsoring student book exchanges; and many other approaches to help students.

With respect to the findings in the report on international differential pricing, NACS supports a "one price" system in which U.S. students are not paying more than non-U.S. students, particularly those in developed countries. U.S. students should not, by themselves, bear the sole burden of course material development costs as the report has found or suffer the consequences of underdeveloped countries' inability or unwillingness to enforce copyright laws. All segments of the textbook industry should be working together to see how we can best maintain the extraordinary high quality of U.S. higher education—which is the envy of the world-- without making the price of that education prohibitive to many Americans.

In regard to the critical role of faculty, NACS believes the selection of course materials should rest with faculty who can best determine what textbooks and materials contribute to the learning experience and academic success of their students. While we recognize an extensive study on the role faculty plays in course material development, adoption, and utilization was beyond the scope of this study, we believe faculty roles should be considered as an integral part of any future discussions regarding the availability and accessibility of course materials.

Dear Ms. Ashby:

The Association of American Publishers, the national trade association of the U.S. publishing industry, appreciates the opportunity to provide comments on the Government Accountability Office draft report on college textbook pricing (GAO-05-806). While we found some aspects of the report to be insightful, we are seriously concerned about the accuracy and overall tone and balance of the draft report. The publishers provided solid evidence that corrected the GAO data, and they shared with you their concerns regarding misrepresentative statements, as well as the assumptive conclusions that the draft report included.

Specifically, the AAP has provided analyses and corrections of two data sources employed by GAO: the U.S. Department of Education's Integrated Postsecondary Education Data System (IPEDS) report of what students spend on books and supplies, and a Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS) review of college textbook pricing data.

The GAO intended to use the IPEDS "to gain an understanding of the annual cost of textbooks and supplies for students as estimated by postsecondary institutions." However, as the publishers demonstrated to the GAO, the IPEDS data aggregates school administrator estimates of books and "supplies," which may include computers, calculators, lab equipment, and other materials that represent about 27% of total student spending on books and supplies. Publishers do not produce or market supplies. Independently derived estimates confirm that the average full-time equivalent student spends about $580 per year on textbooks, far less than the $898 figure used repeatedly in the GAO draft. GAO has chosen not to use this independent data. Detailed analyses of student spending can be found at the end of this letter.

The second metric the report uses is the BLS data to track textbook price increases. By its own disclaimer, before 2001, BLS data did not accurately reflect the increasing penetration of lower-cost alternatives that are replacing unabridged, hardcover texts. Consequently, BLS data exaggerates textbook price increases over the course of the reporting period. BLS acknowledges "textbooks are increasingly wrapped in packages along with additional materials, making it difficult to collect all of the qualitative characteristics of the textbooks. As a result, it is difficult for BLS to obtain the information necessary for quality adjustment, and other times the price recorded as the textbook price may also include ancillary materials."

Our third critical concern is the tone and objectivity employed by GAO in the titles and subheadings of the draft report. There are frequent instances where conclusion statements and the narrative of the report are judgmental, and include unsubstantiated statements from single sources that create an unbalanced view. We believe the editorial style of the draft report suggests GAO advocacy for used books and used booksellers rather than providing a factual analysis of the industries.

The report does describe in accurate fashion some – but not all, or even, most -- of the choices publishers offer faculty for text selection. As our members have shown, and as could be confirmed by looking at the books available for any college course, there is always a broad range of titles that an instructor can choose for his or her students, and these titles are often at very different price points. The instructors, of course, select what they believe best serves the educational needs of their students.

In sum, we are disappointed to be writing this letter since there is nothing present here that AAP and its members did not present to the GAO during the writing of the report. We believe that this report is being rushed to completion due to deadline pressures, and that with thorough consideration of these comments a more balanced and representative report can be produced.

We recognize that some of our comments may be moot if the GAO chose to incorporate them in their final report, but because we have not had access to that report, we felt it necessary to make our position part of the record. We're proud of our products and services and our expanding role in Higher Education, and we believe our efforts aid in opening opportunities to all aspiring students.

Our more detailed comments address three key issues: (1) Accuracy of Data, (2) Tone of the Draft report, and (3) Draft report's Valuable Insights.

Accuracy of Data

The report's first data source on text price increases, provided by the Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS), compares dissimilar factors and leads to an incorrect set of conclusions that persist throughout the report. As the report notes, BLS price data does not accurately reflect the increasing penetration of lower-cost alternatives that are replacing the traditional unabridged, hardcover texts, a significant trend over the last 10 years.

Further, as noted in the appendix (page 29 of the report), the BLS price index imputes prices based on comparable textbook prices when data is not available and has a higher margin of error prior to 2001. In regard to post-2001 price analyses, BLS acknowledges (page 29) that "textbooks are increasingly wrapped in packages along with additional materials, making it difficult to collect all of the qualitative characteristics of the textbook…As a result...it is sometimes difficult for BLS to obtain the information necessary for quality adjustment, and other times the price recorded as the textbook price may also include ancillary materials." The standard practice of including quality adjustments in measures of inflation was not done here. As a result, the BLS data exaggerates textbook price increases over the course of the reporting period.

The presentation of the data is misleading because BLS data includes supplements and textbooks, but chart labels and dialogue consistently refer only to textbooks. The Draft report must clarify its data in every case. Finally, BLS numbers, based on the Producer Price Index, do not reflect the labor-intensive nature of the textbook development industry, which relies on intellectual capital.

Other independent research sources, including Student Monitor, LLC, measure student spending on new and used textbooks. Student Monitor data has been included in other GAO reports, but was excluded from this report. Student Monitor research shows that per-capita spending increases for new and used books increased at roughly the rate of inflation in recent years.

Student Spending Increase On Textbooks Per Student Monitor

2000/2001	+ 3.5%
2001/2002	+ 5.4%
2003/2003	+ 2.1%
2003/2004	+ 0.8%

Since the BLS data and the Student Monitor data are so different, we remain very concerned that using BLS as a sole source, while making mild note of its limitations, has the effect of fairly dramatically exaggerating textbook price increases over the data series. Using the BLS data alone, misleads the reader into believing that the price index and the draft report's analysis results are significantly more precise, and more generally accepted, than they are.

Finally, there is no mention at any point in this section that students can recoup up to 50 percent of their costs by reselling their course materials, so any measure of spending overstates how much a student may spend.

The draft report's other source of data, provided by the Department of Education's Integrated Postsecondary Education Data System (IPEDS), employs methodology to report on costs that GAO acknowledges they "did not validate." This is curious because the GAO chose to ignore other data on the basis that they could not validate it.

IPEDS pricing information on textbooks and supplies is based on the estimated guess of college administrators, with no instructions from the Department of Education or any attempts to standardize the information. "Supplies," in this case, are not just inconsequential items such as pencils and notebooks but, according to IPEDS, may include computers, calculators, lab equipment, and other materials that represent about 27% of total student spending on books and supplies, according to the National Association of College Stores. Publishers do not produce or market "supplies." To refer to materials other than textbooks is very misleading in the current context.

In contrast to the GAO's use of inaccurate and misleading data, two independently derived estimates (see charts that follow) confirm that the average full-time equivalent student spends about $580 per year on textbooks, far less than the $898 figure used repeatedly in the GAO draft, even taking into account part-time students. In light of the admittedly misleading IPEDS data discussed above, the AAP has requested that GAO revise the Draft to include this independent and generally accepted research and also has asked that GAO use this data to provide the estimated cost to students of textbooks, without including supplies. As noted before, the total cost students spend on their textbooks is not qualified to include the amount they receive from the sale of their used textbooks.

GAO also measures texts and course materials as a percentage of tuition. This is particularly misleading because tuition is independent of the cost of textbooks. This comparison creates the impression that students attending lower-cost institutions are being penalized, when, in fact, they benefit from a comparable educational experience, by virtue of their access to equivalent course materials at exactly the same price paid by any peer at any other higher educational institution. There is neither price discrimination nor dilution of quality based on which school a student attends—all students are treated equally in this respect. The draft states that two-year public institutions are places "where low-income students are more likely to pursue a degree program" – implying with no substantiation that the cost of textbooks is a barrier to access – but fails to acknowledge the diversity of the courses taken by students attending two-year schools, including allied sciences students studying courses that feature the most complex to produce, highly technical course materials such as dental hygiene, radiology and nursing, and students who work full time and do not conform to the draft report's chosen characterization.

Tone of the Draft Report

Our third critical concern is the tone and objectivity of portions of the report. The draft, for example, presents concerns of used book distributors and advocates without complete balancing information or independent GAO analysis. This approach of citing "concerns" with a subsequent summary rebuttal from publishers leaves the reader with the impression that GAO is advocating a particular point of view in favor of the used book market and used booksellers rather than providing a factual analysis of the industries.

This is especially true is cases where the cited concern is unsubstantiated or refuted by available data. For example, GAO notes that wholesalers, retailers and some public interest groups "...think some of the strategies employed by publishers, such as revising textbooks more frequently, limit the ability students have to decrease their costs by purchasing less expensive used textbooks." What GAO fails to point out is that available empirical data indicates that revisions have been very stable at 4 years since at least 1996, the last year of data to which publishers have ready access.

Additionally, we find that the entire section of the report presented on pages 16 – 21 fails to acknowledge publisher efforts to address instructor and student needs and concerns by offering a variety of choices in educational materials at a variety of price points. This section contains conflicting "concerns" from competitors and others that create the impression that publishers efforts to offer low-cost alternatives for instructors and students is somehow wrong, especially when publishers offer particularly steep discounts.

Generally, this section would be greatly improved by the recognition of the central role of the instructor in choosing selected materials, the reasons why publishers offer these choices, including significant cost savings and other benefits generated for students. For example:

- On page 11, paragraph 2, the report states: "Additionally, wholesalers, retailers, and others have expressed concern about how certain publishing practices, such as...increasing the availability of custom publishing options for instructors, have affected their ability to help students save money by providing used textbooks and buyback services."

As presented, this statement provides no discussion of the benefits of custom publishing – such as the increased value to the student because the book is more often used in its entirety and the common up-front cost saving to students who would otherwise have to purchase multiple books for a single course – leaving the reader with the misperception that custom textbooks are inappropriate, not valued by students and increase overall costs to them. The fact is publishers offer instructors a wide range of choices in materials at a variety of price points. The extent to which those products offer increased value or discounted costs to every student up-front should be balanced with concerns that students may not be able to receive additional sums from reselling their textbook on the current national used book market.

- Another example of a statement that lacks balance and appears to be inconsistent with other text in the draft report can be found on page 16, paragraph 2 of the report. The report says, "Wholesalers, retailers and some public interest groups agree that there has been a proliferation of supplements in recent years, and they have expressed concern about the increasing practice of selling supplements and textbooks bundled together in a package. While wholesalers and retailers do not question the quality of these materials, they suggest the practice of combining these supplements with textbooks limits students' ability to reduce their costs by purchasing less expensive used books and choosing which, if any, supplements they want to purchase."

There is no mention that those objecting to bundled supplements on the grounds that potential student re-sale savings are reduced, are objecting even though bundled packages commonly result in a lower overall cost for students compared with buying the items

separately. These savings are obtained by every purchasing student, up-front and can sometimes exceed the savings the student would receive from re-selling their used textbook.

The apparent concern that offering bundled packages "limits students' ability to reduce their costs by purchasing less expensive used books and choosing which, if any, supplements they want to purchase," appears to be in conflict with their subsequent concern on page 17, paragraph 1, that "...retailers said that because publishers often discount bundles, most of the savings students could expect from purchasing a used textbook would be negated if they bought the supplements separately."

As written, the wording leaves the reader with the misimpression that publishers have done something wrong by offering instructors the choice of ordering textbooks and integrated materials in a discounted bundled package, and that publishers compound that transgression by offering discounts that are too steep.

In summary, we believe the editorial style of the draft report suggests GAO advocacy for used books to reduce student costs without consideration of any other factors, such as the impact on the quality of a student's education, low-cost and technological alternatives to the traditional textbook, total cost of textbook ownership, the impact on the price of new books and compensation to authors.

Draft Report's Valuable Insights

Those sections of the report AAP endorses are the Concluding Observations and the section entitled, The Price of Textbooks Sold in Other Countries Varies according to Local Market Conditions.

We believe the Concluding Observations in the draft report correctly note a number of the more important factors that influence the college textbook sector, and acknowledge the expanded role of publishers in providing increasingly sophisticated learning tools to meet the demands of today's faculties and students.

For example the report observed that:

1) Price increases in textbooks "reflect a change in the characteristics of postsecondary education;"
2) "...as teaching and learning have changed with increasing reliance on technology, the nature of the college textbook has evolved from a stand-alone text to the inclusion of a variety of ancillary products designed to enhance the educational experience for instructors and students;" and
3) "...publishers are assuming roles that have traditionally belong to postsecondary institutions."

The section of the report dealing with the economic factors that influence the price of textbooks sold overseas and the efforts publishers are making to limit the re-importation into the United States of those books is balanced and accurate.

Specifically, GAO noted that:

1) "Without the added revenues from international sales, [publishers] would feel more cost pressure and would have to…increase U.S. prices;
2) Publishers price textbooks sold overseas on the basis of "local market conditions and the willingness and ability of students to purchase the textbook" and that they want to make their textbooks "affordable to students in developing countries because of the threat of piracy;"
3) Specific factors that publishers consider when making pricing decisions are "income levels, the cost of living, the role of the textbook in the classroom, intellectual property protections, the strength of the local currency, and the prices of competing textbooks sold in that marketplace."

We appreciate your consideration of these significant concerns and look forward to working with GAO to ensure the accuracy and balance of the final report.

Sincerely,

Patricia Schroeder
President and Chief Executive Officer
Association of American Publishers

The Board of Governors and General Administration have been concerned for several years with the increasing cost of textbooks. The Board completed two studies on the cost of textbooks and has approved recommendations (in February 2006 and in March 2007) to help control the cost of textbooks. One of the recommendations is the implementation of a Guaranteed Buyback or Rental Program for Required Textbooks for Introductory Courses.

"To significantly affect the cost of textbooks, Chancellors, Provosts, faculty and bookstore managers must continue to increase the number of courses and textbooks included in the guaranteed buyback programs. Campuses must continue to expand their Guaranteed Buyback Programs."

The University of North Carolina Report on the Cost of Textbooks, Submitted with Campus-Based Tuition and Fee Increase Requests
February 2011

Dear UNC Chapel Hill Chairs,

In our ongoing efforts to facilitate General Administrations Board of Governors Textbook Requirements for large introductory courses, we continue to accept textbook commitment forms from UNC Chapel Hill departments. We encourage departments to commit to the two to three year adoption cycle cited in General Administrations guidelines, but we accept a one year commitment from departments. We accept both hardback and paperback textbooks for inclusion. We allow small courses to participate, and we include courses which may only be offered in a specific term for example, the course is only offered in Fall term. If you have additional courses you would like to include in this program, please submit a new form. We will happily include the course in the Guaranteed Buyback Program.

Fall 2011 is the start of a new academic year and the perfect time to decide on a textbook and the duration of its use at UNC Chapel Hill. General Administrations Board of Governors does expect the Guaranteed Buyback program to grow over time. If you let us know the course, the textbook and how many semesters it will be used, we will guarantee 50% of the purchase price at buyback.

Please note that bundles which include any component intended for a single user may not be adopted for guaranteed buyback, including access codes, workbooks, loose leaf binding, spiral binding, tear out pages, online course CDs, codes, or software.

General Administration Board of Governors Revised Textbook Requirements Summary:

"All campuses must have a guaranteed buyback or rental program for required textbooks for large, introductory classes."

- "This option must be available in addition to traditional purchase option."
- "Campuses must at least offer this option for introductory texts that will withstand a two to three year adoption cycle. Campuses are strongly encouraged to go beyond this minimum threshold to explore ways of minimizing the adoptions cycle and making the guaranteed buyback or rental program available beyond introductory level courses."
- Campuses must make an effort to implement this system for courses that are introductory level and taken by a relatively high percentage of students."
- "A response to this recommendation must also be reported to the VP for Finance in any future requests for increases in tuition and fees."

The Board completed two studies on the cost of textbooks and has approved recommendations (in February 2006 and in March 2007) to help control the cost of textbooks. One of the recommendations is the implementation of a Guaranteed Buyback or Rental Program for Required Textbooks for Introductory Courses.

"To significantly affect the cost of textbooks, Chancellors, Provosts, faculty and bookstore managers must continue to increase the number of courses and textbooks included in the guaranteed buyback programs. Campuses must continue to expand their Guaranteed Buyback Programs."

The University of North Carolina Report on the Cost of Textbooks, Submitted with Campus-Based Tuition and Fee Increase Requests
February 2011

Dear UNC Chapel Hill Chairs,

In our ongoing efforts to facilitate General Administrations Board of Governors Textbook Requirements for large introductory courses, we continue to accept textbook commitment forms from UNC Chapel Hill departments. We encourage departments to commit to the two to three year adoption cycle cited in General Administrations guidelines, but we accept a one year commitment from departments. We accept both hardback and paperback textbooks for inclusion. We allow small courses to participate, and we include courses which may only be offered in a specific term for example, the course is only offered in Fall term. If you have additional courses you would like to include in this program, please submit a new form. We will happily include the course in the Guaranteed Buyback Program.

Fall 2011 is the start of a new academic year and the perfect time to decide on a textbook and the duration of its use at UNC Chapel Hill. General Administrations Board of Governors does expect the Guaranteed Buyback program to grow over time. If you let us know the course, the textbook and how many semesters it will be used, we will guarantee 50% of the purchase price at buyback.

Please note that bundles which include any component intended for a single user may not be adopted for guaranteed buyback, including access codes, workbooks, loose leaf binding, spiral binding, tear out pages, online course CDs, codes, or software.

General Administration Board of Governors Revised Textbook Requirements Summary:

"All campuses must have a guaranteed buyback or rental program for required textbooks for large, introductory classes."

- "This option must be available in addition to traditional purchase option."
- "Campuses must at least offer this option for introductory texts that will withstand a two to three year adoption cycle. Campuses are strongly encouraged to go beyond this minimum threshold to explore ways of minimizing the adoptions cycle and making the guaranteed buyback or rental program available beyond introductory level courses."
- Campuses must make an effort to implement this system for courses that are introductory level and taken by a relatively high percentage of students."
- "A response to this recommendation must also be reported to the VP for Finance in any future requests for increases in tuition and fees."

Re: General Administration Board of Governors Guaranteed Buyback Textbook Requirements

Dear Chair,

In ongoing efforts to facilitate General Administrations Board of Governors Textbook Requirements for large introductory courses, we continue to encourage and accept textbook commitment forms from UNC Chapel Hill departments. As noted in UNC's 2011 Report on the Cost of Textbooks, Submitted with Campus-Based Tuition and Fee Increase Requests, "To significantly affect the cost of textbooks, Chancellors, Provosts, faculty and bookstore managers must continue to increase the number of courses and textbooks in the guaranteed buyback programs."

Please note that the Board of Governors' statement on guaranteed buyback or rental has been modified. The requirement that the introductory text be in hardback has been removed, and the Board is encouraging courses beyond the introductory level to participate in the Guaranteed Buyback Program. The modified statement is noted below.

Fall 2011 is the start of a new academic year and the perfect time to decide on a textbook and the duration of its use at UNC Chapel Hill. Let us know the course, the textbook and how many semesters it will be used, and we will guarantee 50% of the purchase price at buyback for students who purchased the textbook at UNC Student Stores for your committed time period. Quick review of previous discussions:

As discussed at the September 11, 2007 Council of Chairs meeting, the following information needs to be provided to Student Stores in order to facilitate General Administration Board of Governors Textbook Requirements.

- Departments need to notify Student Stores about their textbook decision, provide course information and the number of semesters the book will be used.
- Student Stores will guarantee retail buyback price on the textbook for UNC Chapel Hill students who purchased their textbook at Student Stores for the same four to six semesters to which the department has committed use.
- Bundles which include any component intended for a single user may not be adopted for guaranteed buyback, including access codes, workbooks, loose leaf binding, spiral binding, tear out pages, on-line course CDs, codes, or software.

General Administration Board of Governors Textbook Requirements Summary:

All campuses must have a guaranteed buyback or rental program for required textbooks for large, introductory classes for the Spring 2008 semester.

SEC. 112. TEXTBOOK INFORMATION.

(a) AMENDMENT.—Part C of title I (20 U.S.C. 1015) is further amended by adding after section 132 (as added by section 111 of this Act) the following new section:

''SEC. 133. TEXTBOOK INFORMATION.

''(a) PURPOSE AND INTENT.—The purpose of this section is to ensure that students have access to affordable course materials by decreasing costs to students and enhancing transparency and disclosure with respect to the selection, purchase, sale, and use of course materials. It is the intent of this section to encourage all of the involved parties, including faculty, students, administrators, institutions of higher education, bookstores, distributors, and publishers, to work together to identify ways to decrease the cost of college textbooks and supplemental materials for students while supporting the academic freedom of faculty members to select high quality course materials for students.

''(b) DEFINITIONS.—In this section:

''(1) BUNDLE.—The term 'bundle' means one or more college textbooks or other supplemental materials that may be packaged together to be sold as course materials for one price.

''(2) COLLEGE TEXTBOOK.—The term 'college textbook' means a textbook or a set of textbooks, used for, or in conjunction with, a course in postsecondary education at an institution of higher education.

''(3) COURSE SCHEDULE.—The term 'course schedule' means a listing of the courses or classes offered by an institution of higher education for an academic period, as defined by the institution.

''(4) CUSTOM TEXTBOOK.—The term 'custom textbook'—

''(A) means a college textbook that is compiled by a publisher at the direction of a faculty member or other person or adopting entity in charge of selecting course materials at an institution of higher education; and

''(B) may include, alone or in combination, items such as selections from original instructor materials, previously copyrighted publisher materials, copyrighted third-party works, and elements unique to a specific institution, such as commemorative editions.

''(5) INSTITUTION OF HIGHER EDUCATION.—The term 'institution of higher education' has the meaning given the term in section 102.

''(6) INTEGRATED TEXTBOOK.—The term 'integrated textbook' means a college textbook that is—

''(A) combined with materials developed by a third party and that, by third-party contractual agreement, may not be offered by publishers separately from the college textbook with which the materials are combined; or

''(B) combined with other materials that are so interrelated with the content of the college textbook that the separation of the college textbook from the other materials would render the college textbook unusable for its intended purpose.

''(7) PUBLISHER.—The term 'publisher' means a publisher of college textbooks or supplemental materials involved in or affecting interstate commerce.

''(8) SUBSTANTIAL CONTENT.—The term 'substantial content' means parts of a college textbook such as new chapters, new material covering additional eras of time, new themes, or new subject matter .

''(9) SUPPLEMENTAL MATERIAL.—The term 'supplemental material' means educational material developed to accompany a college textbook that—

''(A) may include printed materials, computer disks, website access, and electronically distributed materials; and

''(B) is not being used as a component of an integrated textbook.

''(c) PUBLISHER REQUIREMENTS.—

''(1) COLLEGE TEXTBOOK PRICING INFORMATION.—When a publisher provides a faculty member or other person or adopting entity in charge of selecting course materials at an institution of higher education receiving Federal financial assistance with information regarding a college textbook or supplemental material, the publisher shall include, with any such information and in writing (which may include electronic communications), the following:

''(A) The price at which the publisher would make the college textbook or supplemental material available to the bookstore on the campus of, or otherwise associated with, such institution of higher education and, if available, the price at which the publisher makes the college textbook or supplemental material available to the public.

''(B) The copyright dates of the three previous editions of such college textbook, if any.

''(C) A description of the substantial content revisions made between the current edition of the college textbook or supplemental material and the previous edition, if any.

''(D)(i) Whether the college textbook or supplemental material is available in any other format, including paperback and unbound; and

''(ii) for each other format of the college textbook or supplemental material, the price at which the publisher would make the college textbook or supplemental material in the other format available to the bookstore on the campus of, or otherwise associated with, such institution of higher education and, if available, the price at which the publisher makes such other format of the college textbook or supplemental material available to the public.

''(2) UNBUNDLING OF COLLEGE TEXTBOOKS FROM SUPPLEMENTAL MATERIALS.—A publisher that sells a college textbook and any supplemental material accompanying such college textbook as a single bundle shall also make available the college textbook and each supplemental material as separate and unbundled items, each separately priced.

''(3) CUSTOM TEXTBOOKS.—To the maximum extent practicable, a publisher shall provide the information required under this subsection with respect to the development and provision of custom textbooks.

''(d) PROVISION OF ISBN COLLEGE TEXTBOOK INFORMATION IN COURSE SCHEDULES.—To the maximum extent practicable, each institution of higher education receiving Federal financial assistance shall—

''(1) disclose, on the institution's Internet course schedule and in a manner of the institution's choosing, the International Standard Book Number and retail price information of required and recommended college textbooks and supplemental materials for each course listed in the institution's course schedule used for preregistration and registration purposes, except that—

''(A) if the International Standard Book Number is not available for such college textbook or supplemental material, then the institution shall include in the Internet course schedule the author, title, publisher, and copyright date for such college textbook or supplemental material; and

''(B) if the institution determines that the disclosure of the information described in this subsection is not practicable for a college textbook or supplemental material, then the institution shall so indicate by placing the designation 'To Be Determined' in lieu of the information required under this subsection; and

''(2) if applicable, include on the institution's written course schedule a notice that textbook information is available on the institution's Internet course schedule, and the Internet address for such schedule.

''(e) AVAILABILITY OF INFORMATION FOR COLLEGE BOOKSTORES.— An institution of higher education receiving Federal financial assistance shall make available to a college bookstore that is operated by, or in a contractual relationship or otherwise affiliated with, the institution, as soon as is practicable upon the request of such college bookstore, the most accurate information available regarding—

''(1) the institution's course schedule for the subsequent academic period; and

''(2) for each course or class offered by the institution for the subsequent academic period—

''(A) the information required by subsection (d)(1) for each college textbook or supplemental material required or recommended for such course or class;

''(B) the number of students enrolled in such course or class; and

''(C) the maximum student enrollment for such course or class.

''(f) ADDITIONAL INFORMATION.—An institution disclosing the information required by subsection (d)(1) is encouraged to disseminate to students information regarding—

''(1) available institutional programs for renting textbooks or for purchasing used textbooks;

''(2) available institutional guaranteed textbook buy-back programs;

''(3) available institutional alternative content delivery programs; or

''(4) other available institutional cost-saving strategies.

''(g) GAO REPORT.—Not later than July 1, 2013, the Comptroller General of the United States shall report to the authorizing committees on the implementation of this section by institutions of higher education, college bookstores, and publishers. The report shall particularly examine—

''(1) the availability of college textbook information on course schedules;

''(2) the provision of pricing information to faculty of institutions of higher education by publishers;

HEOA Textbook Provision

''(3) the use of bundled and unbundled material in the college textbook marketplace, including the adoption of unbundled materials by faculty and the use of integrated textbooks by publishers; and

''(4) the implementation of this section by institutions of higher education, including the costs and benefits to such institutions and to students.

''(h) RULE OF CONSTRUCTION.—Nothing in this section shall be construed to supercede the institutional autonomy or academic freedom of instructors involved in the selection of college textbooks, supplemental materials, and other classroom materials.

''(i) NO REGULATORY AUTHORITY.—The Secretary shall not promulgate regulations with respect to this section.''.

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by subsection (a) shall take effect on July 1, 2010.

In ongoing efforts to facilitate the Board of Governors textbook requirements for large introductory courses, we continue to encourage and accept textbook commitment forms from UNC Chapel Hill departments. As noted in UNC's 2011 Report on the Cost of Textbooks, Submitted with Campus-Based Tuition and Fee Increase Requests, "To significantly affect the cost of textbooks, Chancellors, Provosts, faculty and bookstore managers must continue to increase the number of courses and textbooks in the guaranteed buyback programs."

Subject: [asmgrs] Important - Annual Report open for faculty

This message is being sent to all faculty in the College of Arts and Sciences with a copy to unit chairs/directors and administrative managers.

The College Annual report system is now open for faculty to summarize their activities and accomplishments. Based on input the Annual Report Committee received from departments, a new version of the Annual Report system has been developed to streamline the process and make the reporting easier and more efficient for faculty, chairs, and administrators. The attached help document explains the design and navigation for the new system. Please contact OASIS for additional help.

All faculty in the College of Arts and Sciences are required to prepare for their department or curricula an annual report of some of your activities and accomplishments for the period May 1, 2010 to April 30, 2011. These reports are used for a variety of assessment and evaluation purposes within your units, but they are also an important component of the units' required report to the College of Arts and Sciences.

The deadline for completing your report is April 29, 2011. Please bookmark the new system address - https://apps4.oasis.unc.edu/car/

Stewardship:

You may also be prompted to complete a tab labeled "Stewardship." This section is included if you have received funding from private sources.

The Arts and Sciences Foundation produces letters to donors on the use of these funds. These reports benefit your department and the College of Arts and Sciences in future fund-raising efforts.

If you have questions about the Stewardship section, please contact one of the following staff members at the Arts & Sciences Foundation: Del Helton, del.helton@unc.edu, 962-8216, Jim Magaw, jim.magaw@unc.edu, 962-6123, or Joanna Cardwell, joanna.cardwell@unc.edu, 962-8342.

Please note that your contributions last spring helped the Arts and Sciences Foundation produce nearly 600 letters to our generous College donors. This annual "stewardship report" explains how the fund was used and includes information about the fund's investment performance. Donors often respond with a thank-you note in appreciation.

We very much appreciate your assistance with another round of outstanding stewardship letters.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR ACCESSING THE ANNUAL REPORT SYSTEM AND STEWARDSHIP

1) https://apps4.oasis.unc.edu/car/

2) Login with your onyen and onyen password

3) You can access the Stewardship system through a tab on the Annual Report.

*For responses from previous years – Previous system.

Your Onyen

Website: http://onyen.unc.edu

Your ONYEN is the first part of your email address, e.g. for an email address of jdoe(at)email.unc.edu your ONYEN is "jdoe" without the quotes.

If you lose or forget your ONYEN password, you can get a new one by taking your UNC One Card (or another picture ID) to IT Response Center at Wilson Library suite 300. It is not possible to recover your old password. For security reasons, you can get a new password only with a picture ID.

If you have forgotten your ONYEN you may look it up by selecting the "Forgotten Onyen" button and supplying your last name and your PID.

College of Arts and Sciences: Annual Report System

Overview

The online College annual report system has been redesigned for the 2010-2011 reporting period. A primary goal of the redesign was to make it easier for reporters to enter data into the system.

The general work flow of the application will be:

1. sign on
2. verify onyen, reporting period, departmental affiliations
3. answer questions on 9 pages
4. upload your CV
5. mark your report as complete
6. review your report
7. sign out

Access and Logon: where is it?

https://apps4.oasis.unc.edu/car Once you click on that link, you will be presented with the following login screen:

Provide your onyen and password to access the annual report system

College of Arts and Sciences: Annual Report System

Verify your affiliations

After a successful sign on, you will be sent to the first page in the system, the profile page:

The profile page presents some information that you, the reporter, must verify. Make sure that the onyen, the current year and the home/primary department is correct. You can easily change your primary department with the radio buttons.

All departments in the "Affiliated Units" section will be able to view your report. You do NOT need to fill out a report for each department.

In the example above, the reporter with an onyen of lerch is doing a report for the 2010-2011 reporting period and is affiliated with 2 departments. Note how the OASIS department is selected as the primary.

College of Arts and Sciences: Annual Report System

System Navigation: getting around within the system

The faculty/reporter part of the system consists of several pages, all with the navigation buttons "Back" and "Save and continue". Choosing “Back” will save any changes and send you to the previous page. “Save and Continue” will save any changes and send the reporter to the next page.

Here is an example of what the buttons look like (keep in mind that these buttons are at the bottom of each report page):

Sections of the report are also provided (right side menu) to navigate to any page within the report. Using these links will save the work you have already done on the current page.

Session time out

The annual report system will logout automatically after 30 minutes of inactivity and your work will not be saved. Remember to save your work before moving to another task.

Also, a pop up dialog will appear when only 5 minutes remain:

If you anticipate that an answer to a question(s) may take longer than 30 minutes, it may be necessary to draft the reply in a word process or text editor. Replies can be cut and pasted from the word processor.

College of Arts and Sciences: Annual Report System

Question Pages

The majority of the pages in the report system are in a question and answer format. Publications, creative activities, teaching, university service, internal funding, professional activities, public service, unit questions, and comments are all question/answer pages.

Replies to the questions are in one of several formats.

1. A small text box for numeric and short text answers (#6 below),
2. A larger, multi-line text box for more lengthy answers (#8 below), or
3. Radio button selections (#7 below).

6. Number of former graduate student coauthors:
   0
7. Did any undergraduates you supervise present or perform their work at an off-campus meeting or venue this year?
   ○ Yes ◉ No
8. If yes, please list the event(s) below with the names of the students below each event listed.

9. Did any undergraduates you supervise participate in an on-campus presentation/performance

Once the questions have been answered, you may click one of "Back" button, "Save and continue" button, or one of the direct-to-page links. Any of these will save your work.

Attachments Page

The attachment page allows you to attach uploaded files to your report. At this time, the only attachment required is your current CV, although your department may require other documents:

To add an attachment, click on the "(+) Add Attachment" link on the upper right hand side of the page. You will see the following:

Use the browse button to locate your CV file on your computer. Enter a description such as "My CV for 2010-2011" and then click the "Save" button. Please note that there is a limit on the size of the file you wish to upload of 2000 Kilobytes (2 Megabytes). This should accommodate most CVs in Microsoft Word or PDF format.

College of Arts and Sciences: Annual Report System

Status Page

The status page allows you to indicate whether or not you are have completed the annual report:

Click the appropriate choice of "In Progress" or "Complete" and then save the choice by clicking "Save and continue". This status is used to inform your department and the college that you are done with your report for the current reporting period. It should be noted that you are still able to make changes to your report even if it is marked as "completed". You may amend your report until the system closes according to the schedule released by the Dean's Office.

Summary Page

The summary page is a reporting page that summarizes all your input into the system for the given report period. An image/link is provided to download the summary in PDF format:

Click the image on the page to download a pdf version of your report. Your report summary is viewable online at anytime even when the reporting period is closed. The "save to pdf" option is provided in case you want a file/print version of your summary.

Getting Help

If a technical issue arises or if you have some question regarding the system, some links are provided near the bottom of every page in the system:

Clicking on the "Request for help" link will produce an email that is sent directly to us (Oasis). If you see an error message, please copy and paste it into the email along with some description of what you were trying to do (I typed in my response to the questions and clicked the save button and bam there's an error message). If you have a question on how to use the system please ask that in your email.

If you have feedback regarding the system itself, click the "Feedback" link. This will send an email to Oasis management who will address your comments or concerns.

Logging Off

A link is provided on the upper right hand corner of all pages. Clicking it will present you with a choice of "Quitting" or "Signing Out":

The distinction is explained in the box. The bottom line is that if you plan on doing some more work on the annual report system, choose "quit" instead of "sign out".

THE UNIVERSITY
of NORTH CAROLINA
at CHAPEL HILL

STUDENT STORES

DANIELS BUILDING
CAMPUS BOX 1530
CHAPEL HILL NC 27599-1530

To: Department Chairs

From: Kelly Hanner, Course Materials Manager

Subject: Textbook Cost Reduction Programs and HEOA

Date: February 23, 2011

First and foremost, I would like to thank The Office of the Executive Vice Chancellor & Provost, Senior Associate Deans, Chairs, Deans, faculty, and staff involved in the textbook adoption process and the BOG's textbook cost reduction programs. The time has come again for us to look to the next semester. Student Stores Fall 2011 Course Materials adoptions will be due March 25, 2011. General Administration's due date will be April 29, 2011. UNC Chapel Hill's Office of the University Registrar has sent the current Semester Section Book for 2011 Fall. We will receive updated versions of the SSB throughout the summer, which will reflect course changes through the duration.

I want to let you know of some statement revisions and review how the HEOA Textbook Requirement affects the campus.

As you know, the University of North Carolina's General Administration has made mandates that address the high costs of textbooks, set benchmarks for each campus to meet, and is monitoring our campus responsiveness to this issue. The Board of Governors revised their requirements for the Guaranteed Buyback Program in the University's February 2011 Report on the Cost of Textbooks, Submitted with Campus-Based Tuition and Fee Increase Requests. The requirement that the introductory textbook be in hardback has been removed. Both paperback and hardback textbooks are now included in the BOG's statement for the Guaranteed Buyback Program. The BOG is also recommending that campuses include textbooks for courses beyond the introductory level in the Guaranteed Buyback Program. Any undergraduate course that may be interested in participating in the program is encouraged by the BOG to do so.

The BOG's revised statement for the Guaranteed Buyback Program:

> "Campuses must at least offer this option for introductory texts that will withstand a two to three year adoption cycle. Campuses are strongly encouraged to go beyond this minimum threshold to explore ways of minimizing the adoptions cycle and making the guaranteed buyback or rental program available beyond introductory level courses.

I ask that the following points be reviewed and to consider entering a textbook in the Guaranteed Buyback Program:

- Students who purchase their book from Student Stores are guaranteed to receive 50% of the purchase price of their books at buyback without quantity limits therefore reducing the cost of use for that book.

- A greater number of used copies are available to students for future semesters thereby reducing the upfront textbook cost to students.

- All courses are eligible to participate.

- The BOG's Guaranteed Buyback recommends a two to three-year commitment from the department to use the same textbook for all sections of the course. UNC Student Stores encourages departments to commit to the BOG's recommended time period, but we will as well accept a one year commitment, and we include courses which are only offered in a specific term for example, the course is only offered in Fall term.

- Guaranteed Buyback saves faculty time adopting only on a two to three-year cycle.

- Reusing textbooks saves paper, printing and distribution costs.

Attached pdfs include the Guaranteed Buyback Form, a Guaranteed Buyback Summary, and a Guaranteed Buyback Brochure for convenience. The Guaranteed Buyback Form is also on our website at: www.store.unc.edu (Home: Textbooks: Faculty: Guaranteed Buyback Program)

Twenty courses were enrolled in the Guaranteed Buyback Program for Fall 2010. Twelve of the courses commitment period expired December 2010. I hope many of these courses re-enroll in the program. Please note that bundles which include any component intended for a single user may not be adopted for guaranteed buyback, including access codes, workbooks, loose leaf binding, spiral binding, tear out pages, on-line course CDs, codes, or software.

As of February 2011, five large introductory courses and three smaller courses* are enrolled in the Guaranteed Buyback Program.

1) Astronomy 101/102: Fall 2010 through Spring 2013
2) Drama 115: Fall 2010 through Spring 2012
3) Drama 116: Fall 2010 through Spring 2012
4) Hist 395: Fall 2009 through Fall 2011 (Fall terms only)*
5) Hist 584: Fall 2009 through Fall 2011 (Fall terms only)*
6) Linguistics 101: Fall 2010 through Spring 2012
7) Physics 104/105: Spring 2010 through Spring 2013
8) Public Policy/Environmental Studies 585: Fall 2009 through Fall 2011*

As noted in the February 2011 Report, bundles are a big challenge for effectively containing textbook costs:

> 'One challenge that continues to persist is the publishers' creation of "bundles" where the textbook is combined with other materials such as lab information, homework materials, "clickers," online access codes, or other items. This makes it almost impossible for the bookstores to effectively contain costs, as it is much more expensive and additionally impacts the market for used books. Where pedogically sound, the Board of Governors encourages faculty to adopt stand-alone texts and avoid the adoption of bundled materials.'
> "Bookstore managers should continue to work on ways to share best practices, collaborate, and leverage resources to lower the cost of textbooks. Likewise, Chancellors, faculty and staff must continue to pursue additional strategies to aid the bookstores in lowering the cost of textbooks."

No Textbook Needed notification

Courses which officially report No Text Needed are included in the Board of Governor's average undergraduate cost of textbooks calculation. Is it very important that we are notified that a course will not be requiring a textbook. We are not allowed to include the course in the calculation without official notice from the department that no textbook is required.

On-Time Adoptions

At UNC Chapel Hill, the on-time textbook adoption average for undergraduate courses in 2006-2007 was 48.2%. The on-time textbook adoption average for undergraduate courses in 2009-2010 grew to 79.8%.

Notes regarding On-Time Adoptions from the 2011 Report on the Cost of Textbooks:

'System-wide, an average of about 87% of faculty textbook adoptions for 2009-10 were received before the target date. Since the 2006-07 year, on-time adoptions have increased by 17%.'

'On-time faculty adoptions help reduce the average cost of textbooks by affecting the amount returned to students if they choose to sell back the books. Timely adoptions also allow bookstores to search for, and make available, more used textbooks.'

'Increases in on-time submission of textbook adoptions have allowed bookstores more time to locate used books and have also allowed students more time to compare sources for purchasing books.'

‘Campuses have shown improvement in the on-time adoptions of books, and those efforts should continue. It is apparent that active engagement by all of the campus community (faculty, staff, and administration) is critical in these efforts.’

‘Chancellors and Provosts must work diligently, alongside bookstore management, to improve on-time textbook adoptions by faculty. Their involvement in the process has helped to make significant changes in adoption rates. Efforts that have begun to result in improvements must be sustained and built-upon.’

‘The work completed so far by the campuses is showing results.’

It is apparent in review of the last four years of data that the textbook cost reduction programs are stabilizing the cost of textbooks for students. As publishers typically release new editions of textbooks at the start of an academic year, one would expect textbook prices to dramatically increase from year to year. But that is not what we see in the data. The review of UNC Chapel Hill data reveals the 2006-2007 average gross cost for an undergraduate student if purchasing all New textbooks was $980.55 and if purchasing all Used textbooks $741.97. The 2009-2010 average gross cost if purchasing all New was $987.95 and Used $745.99. The GAO’s 2005 Report to Congressional Requesters on College Textbooks states that “Over the last 20 years, college textbook prices have increased at twice the rate of inflation.” While we are not currently seeing textbooks costs dramatically drop for students, we are seeing that textbook costs are not dramatically increasing for students. It is impressive that the prices are being stabilized especially in light of the GAO’s findings. Attached is a pdf of the GAO Report to Congressional Requesters.

HEOA Textbook Provision

Federal Coursebook Display Requirements

PURPOSE AND INTENT.—The purpose of this section is to ensure that students have access to affordable course materials by decreasing costs to students and enhancing transparency and disclosure with respect to the selection, purchase, sale, and use of course materials. It is the intent of this section to encourage all of the involved parties, including faculty, students, administrators, institutions of higher education, bookstores, distributors, and publishers, to work together to identify ways to decrease the cost of college textbooks and supplemental materials for students while supporting the academic freedom of faculty members to select high quality course materials for students.

To the maximum extent practicable, an institution must include on its Internet course schedule for required and recommended textbooks and supplemental material

- the International Standard Book Number (ISBN) and retail price;
- if the ISBN is not available, the author, title, publisher, and copyright date; or
- if such disclosure is not practicable, the designation “To Be Determined.”

The information requested in the provision for UNC Chapel Hill is provided by UNC Student Stores. The internet look up is available on Student Stores website home page (www.store.unc.edu) at: https://itsapps.unc.edu/UNCStoreFront/form/showbooks.jsp

This page allows for lookup of UNC Chapel Hill course materials, of required and recommended textbooks and supplemental material, and No Text Needed notification by course, section and term.

The link has been provided to administration for the university to link the page from other appropriate pages, to facilitate coursebook searches via the web.

The University's Student Stores is the official source of textbook information for courses offered by the University. On the State level, NC Freedom of Information Act, we provide UNC Chapel Hill's course material information upon request. Now on the Federal level, we provide the federally mandated coursebook display requirements. Faculty members must provide lists of textbooks to be used in upcoming courses to the Student Stores, but book lists are public, and faculty may freely share them with others. Attached is a pdf of the HEOA Textbook Provision.

Orders can be placed in one of 5 easy ways:

1) Use the Student Stores website: http://www.store.unc.edu

2) Fax your order to: (919) 962-3334

3) Email the Textbook Office textbook@unc.edu, or

George Morgan gfmorgan@store.unc.edu
Frank Bellamy fbellamy@email.unc.edu

4) Send your order by campus mail to the Course Materials Department at Campus Box #1530

5) Stop by the Textbook Office, 3rd floor, Student Stores

With the rising cost of textbooks, it is very important that we continue to work together to address the financial burden that the cost of textbooks is putting on many of our students. Thank you again for your continued support and I look forward to hearing from you soon.

Best regards,
Kelly

Shopping Well to Save the World

Lisa Ann Richey and Stefano Ponte

A critical account of the rise of celebrity-driven "compassionate consumption"

Lisa Ann Richey is professor of international development studies at Roskilde University. She is the author of Population Politics and Development: From the Policies to the Clinics.

Stefano Ponte is senior researcher at the Danish Institute for International Studies. He is the coauthor of Trading Down: Africa, Value Chains, and the Global Economy and The Coffee Paradox: Global Markets, Commodity Trade, and the Elusive Promise of Development.

Visit Brand Aid on Facebook: Scan this QR code into your smartphone to access the page.

"Has there ever been a better reason to shop?" asks an ad for the Product RED American Express card, telling members who use the card that buying "cappuccinos or cashmere" will help to fight AIDS in Africa.

In Brand Aid, Lisa Ann Richey and Stefano Ponte offer a deeply informed and stinging critique of "compassionate consumption." Campaigns like Product RED and its precursors, such as Lance Armstrong's Livestrong and the pink-ribbon project in support of breast cancer research, advance the expansion of consumption far more than they meet the needs of the people they ostensibly serve. At the same time, such campaigns sell both the suffering of Africans with AIDS (in the case of Product RED) and the power of the average consumer to ameliorate it through familiar and highly effective media representations.

Richey and Ponte argue that this "causumerism" represents a deeply troubling shift in relief efforts, effectively delinking the relationship between capitalist production and global poverty.

"There is a desperate need for critical intervention in debates about Product RED and other manifestations of development capitalism. Brand Aid, a smart and edgy book, deftly meets that need." —Samantha King, Queens University

"An original and important contribution to the critique of international development." —Vinh Kim Nguyen, University of Montreal

Hi Julius,

Hope all is well. As you know Holden and others have worked to create an Innovation Road Map for the University that includes a case statement for innovation for $125M. The College is working on a case statement for Innovation which will align with these same goals. Does the department have funding needs or priorities that might fall within this campaign?

Please let me know your thoughts by Friday, March 11. If you have questions please call or email me.

Thanks!

WE HAVE SO MUCH WORK AHEAD OF US. OUR TO-DO LIST IS NOTHING LESS THAN THE GREATEST PROBLEMS OF OUR TIME: CURE DISEASES, AND GET THOSE CURES TO ALL THE PEOPLE WHO NEED THEM. FIND AND INVENT CLEAN ENERGY. INSPIRE STUDENTS IN OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS. FEED SEVEN BILLION PEOPLE. DESCRIBE THE WORLD, AND REPLACE CONFLICT WITH UNDERSTANDING.

CAMPAIGN GOALS

The Innovation Circle identified these major funding goals for the Innovate@Carolina Campaign:

$25 million to create a permanent endowment supporting innovation. This endowment will create a group of "Innovation Funds" to be awarded on a competitive basis to faculty, students, and staff to support the most promising innovations on campus.

$15 million (endowment) to create five Applied Sciences Professorships. The faculty filling these positions will bring the expertise that lies at the intersection of disciplines. They will help colleagues across campus connect basic sciences with engineering, propelling the University into new areas of discovery and application.

$15 million (endowment and expendable) to hire entrepreneurs-in-residence. Drawn from the ranks of outstanding commercial and social entrepreneurs both on and off campus, these experts will mentor and counsel students and faculty interested or involved in entrepreneurial ventures. They also will use their professional contacts to help students secure off-campus internships and faculty develop relationships with the private and non-profit sectors.

$6 million (expendable) to fund grants tackling the "World's Greatest Challenges." Every two years for the next six years, the campus will coalesce around a theme that addresses a pressing global priority, such as water quality and its critical role in supporting healthy communities around the world.

CAMPAIGN GOALS

$6 million (endowment) to fund two Innovation Professorships. Innovation Professors, selected on a competitive basis to pursue a promising innovation project, will be exempted from the normal structures of their academic position at Carolina for up to three years.

$25 million (endowment) to support teaching and research, including the Minor in Entrepreneurship and other successful programs of the Carolina Entrepreneurial Initiative. Critical to promoting a culture of innovation, the interdisciplinary minor in the College of Arts and Sciences encourages students to think and act entrepreneurially, teaching them the skills to start successful ventures of all kinds: commercial, social, scientific, and artistic. Additional funding will provide ongoing support to the highly successful CEI programs including Launching the Venture, the Chancellor's Faculty Boot Camp on Entrepreneurship, the Carolina Challenge, and First Year Seminars in innovation and entrepreneurship.

$10 million (expendable) to create a Student Innovation Hub. The Innovation Hub will serve as a physical nexus on campus where students, faculty, and staff can come together to engage in innovation and entrepreneurial efforts. Preferably an existing public space, centrally located and transformed over time into an Innovation Hub — open to the entire University community — to nurture, inspire and celebrate the innovation culture of Carolina. Such a space would offer resources to innovators and entrepreneurs who do not have a natural home in a specific unit, provide spaces for ad hoc collaborations, and serve as a common space to celebrate our campus-wide innovation culture.

$5 million (endowment) to support the Innovation Scholars Program. Expanding the Carolina Innovation Scholarship program will enable the University to recruit and support more students who show outstanding promise as entrepreneurs with scholarships that cover the full cost of tuition, fees, room and board, renewable for four years.

$3.3 million (expendable) to expand the Carolina KickStart program campus wide. Carolina KickStart, in collaboration with Office of Technology Development and Center of Entrepreneurial Studies, will improve the probability of successfully commercializing UNC faculty technology by seeding startups and providing comprehensive consulting services.

$14.7 million (expendable and endowment) to fund emerging innovation projects. The remaining $14.7 million in the Innovate@ Carolina Campaign will fund other important efforts that will include seed funding for social innovations created at Carolina; Research Triangle and Global competitive collaboration grants; grants funding studies in innovation and entrepreneurship to assess what approaches are most effective as agents of change; and marketing efforts to collectively nurture Carolina's culture of innovation for a better world.

For clarification the $5K gift went to the department's general discretionary fund, not the Dunbar award. My concerns were, one does the family realize the award will not exist in perpetuity unless the fund reaches 20K and if not do they want the money to go to the award (or was this stipulated in Ann's estate)? Also do they have plans to give additional funds?

Please make sure you are writing stewardship letters on a regular basis.

Thanks!

Greetings Boss:
1. I tasked Barbara to follow up with John. I think that John feels more comfortable talking to Barbara than anybody else about this. In my instructions to Barbara, I indicated what our preference was....a more open/flexible than restricted gift.
2)Agatha tells me that we can get gift reports.
3)I used a Summer School excuse to send him a note and he just responded that he will be communicating with me shortly.
4)I just received a $100.00 check in the mail for Ann's scholarship fund. I will send it your way tomorrow morning.
I am sure all is well. We are due for lunch and that should take place within the coming 30 days.

Lisa Ann Richey and Stefano Ponte will be at the Bull's Head Bookshop on Monday, April 18th at 12pm to read and share from their new book Brand Aid: Shopping Well to Save the World. The Bull's Head invites you to attend this free event and please feel free to bring others from your department/classes.

"Has there ever been a better reason to shop?" asks an ad for the Product RED American Express card, telling members who use the card that buying "cappuccinos or cashmere" will help to fight AIDS in Africa. Cofounded in 2006 by the rock star Bono, Product RED has been a particularly successful example of a new trend in celebrity-driven international aid and development, one explicitly linked to commerce, not philanthropy.

In Brand Aid, Lisa Ann Richey and Stefano Ponte offer a deeply informed and stinging critique of "compassionate consumption." Campaigns like Product RED and its precursors, such as Lance Armstrong's Livestrong and the pink-ribbon project in support of breast cancer research, advance the expansion of consumption far more than they meet the needs of the people they ostensibly serve. At the same time, such campaigns sell both the suffering of Africans with AIDS (in the case of Product RED) and the power of the average consumer to ameliorate it through familiar and highly effective media representations.

Using Product RED as its focal point, this book explores how corporations like American Express, Armani, Gap, and Hallmark promote compassionate consumption to improve their ethical profile and value without significantly altering their business model, protecting themselves from the threat to their bottom lines posed by a genuinely engaged consumer activism. Coupled with the phenomenon of celebrity activism and expertise as embodied by Bono, Richey and Ponte argue that this "causumerism" represents a deeply troubling shift in relief efforts, effectively delinking the relationship between capitalist production and global poverty.

Lisa Ann Richey is professor of international development studies at Roskilde University. She is the author of Population Politics and Development: From the Policies to the Clinics.

Stefano Ponte is senior researcher at the Danish Institute for International Studies. He is the coauthor of Trading Down: Africa, Value Chains, and the Global Economy and The Coffee Paradox: Global Markets, Commodity Trade, and the Elusive Promise of Development.

The Bull's Head Bookshop is located in the UNC Student Stores on the campus of UNC-CH. All events at the Bull's Head are free and open to the public. Call 919-962-5060 for questions.

Subject: i6 Green Challenge inquiry

Dear All,

Our office, the Office of Research Development (ORD), was recently made aware of the President's i6 Green Challenge. We have had an inquiry from NCSU about potential interest in this program and we are writing to inquire if any of your colleagues currently or planning to pursue the i6 Green Challenge. I have included a link to the full announcement below. The letter of intent is due May 2, 2011

http://www.eda.gov/i6

This initiative focuses on the nexus between economic development and environmental quality, spotlighting the best ideas that contribute to a vibrant, innovative clean economy. The i6 Challenge supports innovative, ground-breaking ideas that accelerate technology commercialization and new venture formation across the United States. i6 Green will reward communities that utilize Proof of Concept Centers to accelerate technology-led economic development in pursuit of a clean economy. Applicants must address a persistent problem or an unaddressed opportunity with a sense of urgency and demonstrate how an i6 Green Proof of Concept Center will remove existing road blocks and spark sustainable economic opportunities in the applicant's region.

We look forward to hearing from you.

Please do not hesitate to contact us with questions.

Best,
Regina

For clarification the $5K gift went to the department's general discretionary fund, not the Dunbar award. My concerns were, one does the family realize the award will not exist in perpetuity unless the fund reaches 20K and if not do they want the money to go to the award (or was this stipulated in Ann's estate)? Also do they have plans to give additional funds?

Please make sure you are writing stewardship letters on a regular basis.

Thanks!

Family Research: Conceptual & Methodological Issues

This institute addresses the unique conceptual and methodological challenges of family research, with particular attention paid to innovative strategies for treating the family or family sub-system as the unit of study and analysis. The institute focuses on research proposal development, and specific content includes conceptual frameworks for studying families, qualitative, quantitative, and mixed method designs, family measures, analytic techniques, and ethical issues. Didactic presentations are combined with small group work and individual consultation. By the end of the institute,participants will have an increased understanding of family and family-related research and the skills needed to develop successful family research proposals. This institute is of interest to faculty members and graduate students who plan to conduct family or family-related studies and are at the beginning or intermediate level of their research careers.

Faculty:

Kathleen Knafl, PhD, FAAN
Frances Hill Fox Distinguished Professor and Associate Dean for Research
The University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
School of Nursing

Marcia Van Riper, PhD, RN
Associate Professor and Chair, Family Health Division
The University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
School of Nursing

Drs. Knafl and Van Riper are leaders in family research with expertise in a wide array of family frameworks and methods, experience in studying families facing varied health care challenges, and a record of success in obtaining funding for family research. Guest faculty member, George Knafl, PhD, lectures on quantitative analysis of family/dyadic data. The faculty will be available for individual consultation during and following the institute.

Subject: [aschairsonly] Council of Chairs meeting Monday, May 2nd 12.30-1.50
Attach: Salemi draft 3_15_11.docx; jpickles.vcf

Dear Colleagues,

In order to complete the year's work of the Council of Chairs, we will meet Monday, May 2nd, 12.30-1.50pm to discuss concerns some have expressed about ASAC.

As background: At its March 14 meeting, the assembled chairs asked Mike Salemi to draft a document that could be discussed and possibly sent to the Dean. Mike circulated that draft and the next day many of us were present for an extended discussion about some of the issues at the dean's brown-bag.

At the April 11 meeting (this week), chairs asked for closure and a follow-up to discuss the draft and the issues.

Since the dean's brownbag, I have received emails from quite a number of you on this issue. Some suggest that you feel we have aired the issue with the dean and no longer need to push the memo further. Others have indicated that they find the memo too strong or too specific in its detail. Yet others remain concerned about possible changes in ASAC policy we may be seeing.

The meeting will be a bring your own lunch.

Regards,
John

The Council of Chairs of the College of Arts and Sciences
Draft of Resolution
March 15, 20111

Whereas

1. The Arts and Sciences Advisory Committee (ASAC) comprises four members in a College with more than 40 academic departments;

2. The expertise necessary to evaluate the research, teaching and service record of a candidate for promotion and tenure and to interpret and evaluate the outside letters supporting the candidate is available only in the candidate's home department;

3. ASAC has publicly announced at the November 2010 meeting or the Council of Chairs that it had tightened up standards for early promotion;

4. ASAC turned back a candidate from the Department of Economics where:
   The vote of the full professors was unanimously in support of promotion,
   The candidate was at in her eighth year at rank,
   The Department has supported fewer that one in three candidates for promotion during the last 20 years;

5. ASAC has rejected decisions by departments as to the appropriate source of outside letters of evaluation of candidates for promotion and tenure in cases where the candidate has undertaken non-traditional research and creative activities;

6. Respect by the Office of the Dean for the judgment of a Department's faculty and particularly its full professors is essential to the functioning of the College and the Department and essential to the morale of the faculty;

7. Procedures used by ASAC to deliberate and vote on promotion and tenure recommendations are de jure biased in that members of ASAC do not recuse themselves when ASAC is considering candidates from the home departments of ASAC members.

Be it therefore resolved that it is the sense of the Council of Chairs of the College of Arts and Sciences that:

1. ASAC has exceeded its authority as an Advisory Committee;

2. ASAC has employed an arbitrary definition of "too early" when it assesses the record of candidates who have served time in rank at other institutions before being employed by UNC-CH;

3. The Dean of the College of Arts and Sciences should review all cases for which ASAC has made a negative decision in the past two years, paying special attention to cases where ASAC recommended that the promotion was too early, make her own independent evaluation of those cases, and either approve or provide a detailed rationale for her decision to deny promotion;

4. The Dean of the College should prepare an explicit charge to ASAC no later than April 1 of the academic year before the academic year when it will apply and publish that charge on the College web site;

5. The Dean of the College in consultation with Department Chairs should set out explicit standards that define what "early promotion" means, especially in the context of faculty members who have time in rank at previous academic institutions.

John,
One other loose end from the meeting was the question about the ability to upload grades into PS. I've circled back with Jerri Bland who tells me this is strictly a Registrar issue. The technical ability exists to do this, but it's a policy issue.

JOURNEY THROUGH HISTORY (2011)
(For History & Political Science Programs)
Across the continents through four destinations, this DVD takes you on 4 exciting journeys following particular story lines from history, unique to each country and which often pass through sites which have now become part of UNESCO's World Heritage. In Peru we follow the defeat of the once-majestic Inca Empire at the hands of a small band of Spanish Conquistadores lusting for gold. In China, The life and death in the Ming Dynasty which built the largest palace complex in the world and fortified the Great Wall. In Ghana we remember the tragedy and brutality of the Transatlantic slave trade and the inhumane slave dungeons at Elmina and Cape Coast Castle while in Mexico, the cults of human sacrifices of the Aztecs of Tenochititlan to the Maya of Palanque.

ADDICTED IN AFGHANISTAN (2010)
(For Middle East Studies & Political Science Programs)
Afghanistan is a country devastated by the horrors of war, crime, violence and poverty. It is also a country blighted with the cultivation and supply of opium. Although it is estimated that 95% of all heroin on the streets of the UK & Europe comes from Afghanistan, few talk of the drugs that stay within the country and the devastating effects it is having on its children – the youth & future of Afghanistan. After the so-called "War on Terror"and the fall of the Taliban, what future is there for the next generation? Jabar and Zahir are two 15 year old friends, whose own sisters, mothers and fathers are also addicted to heroin and opium."Addicted in Afghanistan" is an intimate observational documentary that explores the heartbreaking reality behind the headlines as seen through the eyes of Jabar & Zahir, two 15 year old drug addicts living in Kabul. (78:00 Price $239.95 S&H $8.95)

NEW RELEASES FOR 2011 INCLUDE:

EARTH REPORT : LEASE OF LIFE (2009)
(For Environmental Studies & Asian Studies Programs)
The magnificence of the Himalayas stands in stark contrast to the impoverished lives of its people. But the poorest of the poor are now in the forefront of a controversial new government scheme to reforest barren hillsides - and planting trees helps absorb CO_2. The scheme has given Laxmi, a poor landless farmer a new lease of life. But wealthier villagers criticize the scheme insisting the land could be put to better use. (24 min. VOICES IN EXILE (2008)
(For Asian Studies & Religious Studies)
As the Tibetan people stand at the edge of extinction, "Voices in Exile" speaks out against the continued brutal policies of the Chinese government. Most film and photography on Tibet is from the Western eye looking in. "Voices in Exile," by first-time Tibetan director Tenzin Wangden Andrugtsang, presents the Tibetan exile community from the rarely seen Tibetan point of view. Never before seen footage includes many surprising interviews on the future of Tibet and inspiring accounts of life in exile. "Voices in Exile" has been produced in association with The Tibetan Photo Project. The Tibetan Photo Project offers the first collection of photos taken by Tibetans living in exile, images of the Dalai Lama, informational texts and rare 1932 pictures of TibetThe perspective provided from the modern history of Tibet and China reveals a great deal about the nature of China's future leadership. The lessons have become even more relevant with the rise to power by Hu Jintao, China's former hard-line secretary to Tibet. (95 min. DVD only Price $229.95 S&H $8.95)

WHICH WAY TO THE WAR? (2008)
(For Conflict Studies, Religious Studies & Political Science)
The story of the global conflict you can't find on the map. When Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim nation was also becoming the world's 3rd largest democracy with its free elections in 1998, the majority of the country remained remarkably peaceful. However, a remote area on the island of Sulawesi - Poso fell victim to brutal communal fighting. Fueling it was the underlying struggle for control of local politics, commercial enterprise, and religious identity in this forgotten corner of the world where religious identity was used as the agitator that exploited and widened the conflict. Which Way To the War? reveals the true story of the wrenching Poso conflict, telling the story of Poso's redeeming rehabilitation in the conflict's aftermath. This is a story that throws new light on religious conflicts not just in Indonesia, but throughout the entire world. (100 min. DVD only Price $229.95 S&H $8.95)

VARANASI (2004)
(For South Asian Studies, Religious Studies & Cultural Studies Programs)
"Varanasi is older than history, older than tradition, older even than legend, and looks twice as old as all of them put together." – Mark Twain, 1897. Produced by Samsara Films, VARANASI is a cinematic meditation on a remarkable ancient city, where both life and death are encountered daily on the historic Ganges River. This film is a rare account of cremation rituals at Manikarnika Ghat, India's holiest cremation ground(60 min. DVD only Price $199.95 S&H $8.95)

KUMBH MELA: Songs Of the River (2004)
(For South Asian Studies, Religious Studies & Cultural Studies Programs)
The Allahabad Kumbh Mela religious festival in India in January 2001 was the final mela in a series of 12 full cycles: the "Maha Kumbh Mela" that occurs every 144 years. This increased spiritual powe drew an estimated 70 million people to vast encampments on the sand over a 44 day period, making this religious and spiritual celebration the largest single gathering of humanity in recorded history. Produced by Samsara Films, this documentary is a fascinating look at our humanity and how our spirituality manifests in the world.

SAMADHI (2003)
A widely known practice among yogis in the Himalayas, SAMADHI is a state of suspended animation -- a virtual death where all bodily functions are suspended. This state has been repeatedly demonstrated by Pilot Baba, a Hindu mystic. Although a pilot in the Indian Air Force who fought the 1965 and 1971 wars against Pakistan, the path of his life made him renounce the secular world at the age of 35 to become a yogi. After 7 years of studying with various teachers, Pilot Baba attained self-realization and hence the capacity to maintain the state of Samadhi. He has taken many underground Samadhis, where he will remain buried in a small space as in Agra for 7 days and in an ice cave in the Himalayas for 33 days. Pilot Baba has also taken Samadhi in an airtight glass at Mavlankar Hall in New Delhi. In this completed episode he undertakes Samadhi in an airtight glass in the town of Dewas in Madhya Pradesh for 96 hours. (48 Min. DVD only Price $199.95 S&H $8.95)

(THE) NEVER ENDING PATH (2004)
The state of Tamil Nadu is located along the south east coast of the Indian subcontinent. The Tamil culture and language is said to have its origins in prehistoric times and is related to the ancient Dravidian culture of Southern India. The rural region of interior Tamil Nadu is made up of thousands of small villages, most with no electricity, inadequate health care and on-going problems with inadequate sanitation and water supplies. Health care is not affordable for most families. Produced by Professor Annette Danto THE NEVER ENDING PATH tells the stories of the women living in rural Tamil Nadu. From 5 family units, the women share many of the concerns facing mothers and daughters throughout rural regions of South Asia. As with women from poor villages in many parts of the world, issues of dowry, their daughters' educational opportunities, and economic hardship are discussed, along with inter-caste and arranged marriages. (37 Min. BUDDHA WILD: THE MONK IN A HUT (2006)
(For Religious Studies & Cultural Studies Programs)
Produced & narrated by Australian Anna Wilding, Buddha Wild provides viewers with a well-judged glimpse into the monastery world of the Buddhist Monk and the real world of those who follow the precepts and principals of Buddhism. The documentary centers on the life of the Buddhist monks. They are a kind lot of warm hearted and enlightened men who are eager to share their religious doctrines of faith. Buddha Wild is a journey of discovery. The monks are honest in the telling of their lives, hopes, and disappointments. They speak freely about their lives, limitedly about the absence of physical closeness and sexual activity, and in depth about the world challenges faced by a Buddhist. The monks were clearly enamored by Ms. Wilding and their generosity of information from taboo subjects exhibits this fact. It appears that being a monk is not so much a calling as a culture. There is a break from the seriousness of the narration with the invitation by one of the Monk's to visit his hut – hence the title "The Monk in a Hut." (60 min. DVD only Price $229.95 S&H $8.95)

HISTORY IS A TEACHER (2008)
(For History & Cultural Studies Programs)
The bitter struggles for freedom in Bosnia and Rwanda are the backdrop for first 2 installments on the importance of History in shaping national identity. In Bosnia, where memories of conflict are still very fresh children are growing up with a one-sided account of History. In multi ethnic towns schools are divided and in the same building Croat children are taught in seperate classrooms from Muslims. In Rwanda, for eight years following the 1994 genocide, history was not taught in Rwandan schools. Over the last 4 years, historians and educators have tried to re-introduce history into the curriculum with limited success. The problem is that history has been so manipulated to justify political actions that impartial accounts of Rwanda's history are very hard to come by. Started by the Belgian Administration 150 years ago and then inflamed by Hutu figure heads for the last 50 years, the social structure of Rwanda has been divided into Tutsi elite and Hutu labourers. Archaeologists are finding evidence to prove that this division into distinct ethnic groups was never the case. (45 min. DVD only Price $219.95 S&H $8.95)

KE GARNE: What to do ... (2008)
(For Asian Studies, Political Science & Cultural Studies Programs)
Nepal is currently experiencing the worst political crisis of its fifteen year old democracy. The King has sacked the government and assumed absolute military and political power. KE GARNE is the story of how Nepal's king tried to consolidate his power over the people by attempting to crush the nation's free, independent media. Pradip, who works for Kantipur, Nepal's largest and most popular independent media agency, is the sole support of his extended family. The pressure is on when the King clamps down on Kantipur, threatening Pradip's job. This brash move by the king is perceived by many to be the final straw and thousands of protesters take to the streets as the fight for real democracy in Nepal truly begins.

THE BOY WHO PLAYS ON THE BUDDHAS OF BAMIYAN (2004)
(For Middle East Studies & Cultural Studies Programs)
In 2001, when the Taliban in Afghanistan destroyed the 1600 year-old statues of giant buddhas in Bamiyan, the world was horrified. Just as horrifying, though, is to explore the lives of some of the people who live in Bamiyan, poverty-stricken, sickly peasants who find shelter in the ancient caves carved into the face of the mountains. Meet Mir, eight years old. Mir lives with his parents, his sister and his brother-in-law, and in British director Phil Grabsky's beautiful, painful but ultimately optimistic documentary feature, we follow his footsteps over the course of a year, starting in summer. He seems to be a surprisingly cheerful youngster, given the horrors he's endured and the fact that he lives on the edge of starvation. His father, who looks old enough to be his grandfather, came from a village, from which he was forced to flee. With his livelihood destroyed, he's forced to feed his family on whatever he can find — offal the butcher throws away, stale bread the baker doesn't want. The Taliban are gone, now, and Mir rather likes the Americans, whose choppers patrol the skies above. This is a documentary without narration, in which the images. (96 min. DVD only Price $229.95 S&H $8.95)

THE OTHER SIDE OF TORA BORA (2007)
(For Middle East & Cultural Studies Programs)
More than five years on from the Battle of Tora Bora and the US military's 'Operation Enduring Freedom', first-generation American Alia Ayub returns to her tribal home in the North West Frontier Provinces of Pakistan. Just 12km from the border with Afghanistan, and with growing Taliban and sectarian tensions in the area, this largely autonomous region remains closed to outsiders. Through unique access, "The Other Side of the Tora Bora" looks beyond this veil of infamy giving insight into a largely misunderstood and under-represented way of life, exposing an ancient culture on the cusp of change, and a region under growing threat from Taliban forces.

Subject: US Army RFP for Civil Affairs Assistance on Topics Related to National Security

Please share with your faculty this Request for Proposals (RFP) from the UNC Partnership for National Security, which focuses on matching education, research, and training needs of the U.S. Military with UNC system subject matter experts.

The UNC system has received this RFP for Civil Affairs Assistance to identify expertise within the system to provide short-courses in support of the US Army's Civil Affairs mission and to conduct development projects involving Civil Information Management and associated technologies.

Requirements identified by the 95th Civil Affairs Brigade include:

· Assistance identifying measurable indicators of political, economic or social instability

· Statistical analysis of field polling results

· Trend identification and analysis

· Request for Information (RFI) tracking system

· African studies

· Agricultural and resource economy

· Effective writing

· Developmental economics

· Value chain analysis

· Political science

· Communism to democracy

· Construction and engineering management

All training will be conducted at Ft. Bragg, North Carolina or at a relevant campus, as required. Faculty will be compensated for their time and travel.

Letters of interest, including the qualifications of the team conducting these projects and training and a description of how the project or short-course would be implemented (including a syllabus), should be sent to Kimrey Rhinehardt, Vice President for Federal Relations at kwr@northcarolina.edu<mailto:kwr@northcarolina.edu>. Faculty may contact Dr. Tom Losordo, Faculty Advisor for Military Affairs (UNC GA), directly at tlosordo@northcarolina.edu<mailto:tlosordo@northcarolina.edu> for more information on a specific project or short-course.

For details including contact information, see the full RFP online at http://www.northcarolina.edu/frc/mil/civaff.htm. Thank you.

Thank you for your time and consideration of this request.

From Larry Grossberg:

Dear colleagues.

This message may concern only the chairs of larger departments. I am not sure. A number of us are having a hard time finding nice venues for our graduation ceremonies or, more accurately, finding a nice affordable venue. My own department is being charged about $2000 for the space we have reserved, and since I doubt that we can afford that, we are now searching once again.

I think this is rather outrageous. Graduation is one of the key moments of the academic year and the most powerful symbolic expression of our educational mission. It is a significant event for students, families and friends. We all want to make it an experience that our students and their guests will treasure. It does not seem like a time for the people in charge of facilities to be demanding payments that many of us can ill afford. Graduation should be the one event where space is given over if not freely then at least cheaply.

I have talked with a number of other chairs who are having similar problems, and I have also talked with SAD Bill Andrews. Bill suggests that if people are having similar problems, they should write a brief message to Dean Karen Gill and Executive Associate Provost Ron Strauss.

Perhaps we can at least prevent this from happening in the future.

Thanks.

Dear Professor Nyang'oro,

Hello from Oxford University Press! I am touching base with you to see if you have last-minute course assignments or need to examine any textbooks. If so, I will gladly make textbook suggestions and send out examination copies for your review. Or, for the fastest way to find and request the most current titles in your discipline offered through Oxford University Press, you can visit our website at www.oup.com/us/he. Be sure to include promotion code (ENDSP11) on the request form. This will ensure any books you request are sent express delivery.

As you may know, Oxford University Press is a not-for-profit publisher in the United States. This puts us in a unique position to produce high-quality educational resources at the best possible prices. In addition, we contribute some of the surplus we generate back to education. Over the years, Oxford University Press has funded hundreds of yearly scholarships that make an Oxford University education possible for U.S. students who could not otherwise afford it. Also, surplus generated by Oxford University Press U.S.A. funds educational publishing, including academic monographs and important reference works, such as the Oxford English Dictionary.

We understand your students' concerns about the price of textbooks. We are in a unique position to offer high quality textbooks at a much better price than many of our competitors. On average, an Oxford University Press textbook is 20% less than comparable books from commercial publishers. We invite you to compare the price and quality of our books to other books you may be considering for your course.

Thank you. If I do not hear from you, I hope that you have a wonderful summer.

Sincerely,

Kim

Subject: costs of venues for graduation ceremonies

From: Andrews, William L <wandrews@unc.edu>

John, I'd be grateful if you would circulate the following message to the chairs. I'm not expressing the position of the College on this matter -- we haven't had an opportunity yet to take a position, if Karen believes we should. This is just a suggestion of mine based on a recent message I received from Ron Strauss about the matter that Larry raises in his email.

Ron has made inquiries into the costs of a few of the venues, particularly Carmichael auditorium and the Smith center, for graduation ceremonies. Based on the information he's received and shared with me, the evidence suggests that
1. the Smith center costs less than half of the cost of Carmichael to rent for a graduation ceremony; and
2. the cost to rent Carmichael seems to be based on the costs they have to pay for staging, chairs, flowers, stage furniture, a backdrop/curtain for the arena, tables, etc.

In short, the evidence Ron has suggests that, while Carmichael rental is certainly not inexpensive, they are basically passing on to departments the costs they are charged for what they provide for a graduation ceremony.

Here's my suggestion: create a subcommittee of the Council of Chairs to research the sizes and costs of venues across campus that might be available for next year's graduation ceremonies. Distribute this research to all department chairs sometime in the fall semester so that each department would be aware of what's available at what cost. Then each department would know at least the range of options available to them based on the size of the space they need and the costs they can afford. It may be that currently there's a lack of information as to what space might be available and what the range of charges might be.

Sincerely,
Bill

Hi:

If it is true that grade uploading is a policy issue, then the council should take a strong stand because faculty are being asked to do lots of mindless work. I had understood from pervious IT presentations that we did not yet have the capability that would allow faculty to upload grades.

John,
One other loose end from the meeting was the question about the ability to upload grades into PS. I've circled back with Jerri Bland who tells me this is strictly a Registrar issue. The technical ability exists to do this, but it's a policy issue.

Dear Colleagues,

I write to ask that you urge faculty members in your unit to participate in the 2011 faculty elections. This year we will choose a new Chair of the Faculty as well as new members of the elected standing committees of the General Faculty and members of the Faculty Council. Carolina has a tradition of shared governance that stretches back to the early years of the 19th Century. That tradition is one of the many things that has made this institution so special. Last year, 24% of our 3,800-member faculty voted. We can do better than that!

Thank you for helping keep shared governance at Carolina strong and vibrant.

Best regards,

McKay Coble

AFL-CIO

Organizing Institute

www.organize.aflcio.org

April 7, 2011

Dear Faculty and Staff,

My name is Patrick Scott of the AFL-CIO Organizing Institute. I am writing to inform you that the AFL-CIO is very excited to announce Union Summer 2011 Internship. Union Summer will be looking to recruit and place student activists from colleges and universities across the country to take the fight for workplace justice into the streets on some of the most exciting union organizing campaigns in decades!

Since 1996, Union Summer has graduated over 3000 activists, many of whom continue to work in and alongside the labor movement. Union Summer is a 10-week educational internship in which participants develop skills while working on union organizing campaigns. The AFL-CIO is committed to uniting student and worker activists to bring about social change through workplace and community organizing.

The Union Summer Internship will run from June 13th through August 19th. It will begin with a week-long orientation and training. After the orientation, interns will work in teams on union organizing drives in various parts of the country. As of now, we have confirmed Union Summer sites in Charlotte, Minneapolis, Portland, New Orleans, Milwaukee and Fort Lauderdale. Their work could include visiting workers in their homes, finding out what workers would like to change about their jobs, participating in direct actions such as marches, as well as assisting in building community, labor and religious organizations. Interns will play a critical role in helping to build support for workers in their fight to gain a voice in their workplaces.

Union Summer is looking to recruit students with a strong commitment to social and economic justice as and openness to working with people of various races, ethnicities, sexual and religious orientations. Participants should be enthusiastic, energetic and flexible to working long and irregular hours. We are accepting applications from rising juniors and seniors as well as graduating seniors. Women and People of Color are strongly encouraged to apply.

Participants will receive a stipend of $350 per week (less taxes) to cover meals and other incidental expenses. Local transportation will also be provided by the Local Union. Each intern will be responsible to getting to and from their orientation training. After the weeklong orientation, Union Summer will cover the costs of transportation to their internship site.

We ask that you pass this information along to those students you think would be best suited for the internship and encourage them to apply. Please feel free to pass this information on to faculty peers as well. Union Summer is a competitive internship and will have a limited number of available positions this year. Please encourage all interested students to apply soon.

Enclosed is an electronic application and Union Summer Internship Description. Interested students should complete the application and return it to unionsummer@aflcio.org. For more information, students should contact us at 1.800.848.3021 or visit us at www.unionsummer.aflcio.org.

Once again, thank you and we look forward to this being a very exciting and rewarding experience for your students.

In Solidarity and Peace,
Patrick Scott, Deputy Director

America's Union Movement

Union Summer Internship

Internship Description

Union Summer is a ten week educational internship in which participants are introduced to the labor movement. The Union Summer Internship will run from June 13th through August 19th. It will begin with a weeklong orientation and training, which will be held in Washington, D.C. June 13-June 17. After the training, interns will work in teams on union organizing drives in various parts of the country. The work could include working on state legislative battles, visiting workers in their homes to find out what workers want to change about their jobs, planning and participating in direct actions such as marches, as well as assisting in building community, labor and religious organizations. Interns will play an important role in helping to build support for workers in their fight to gain a voice in their workplaces.

Participation in Union Summer is also an ideal way for people to learn about union or community organizing as a career.

Internship Requirements

Union Summer interns should be dedicated to social and economic justice and have a specific desire to learn about the Labor Movement.

It is NOT necessary to have union experience or knowledge of the Labor Movement to be accepted as a Union Summer intern, but such a background is a plus in the application process.

Union Summer interns must be:

- flexible
- adaptable in the face of new challenges and experiences
- able to work in teams and have excellent communications skills
- open to working with people of different races, ethnic backgrounds, religions, and sexual orientation
- willing to immerse themselves for ten weeks in an intensive learning-by-doing experience

A sense of humor is also a definite asset. In some areas, applicants who are fluent in a language other than English will be given preference, based on the needs of a specific internship site and organizing campaign. The Union Summer program is committed to achieving diversity among interns which reflects, as closely as possible, the diversity of the workforce with whom we are working.

The above interests and qualities should be demonstrated clearly in the written Union Summer application and in the interview process.

Brown Bag Lunch Series on

THE CROSSROADS OF STUDENT SUCCESS: ACADEMICS, WELLNESS AND ENGAGEMENT

SPRING 2011 SCHEDULE

February 18th Living-Learning Communities and Student Success with Annice Fisher, Assistant Director for Academic Collaboration and Assessment, Housing & Residential Education

Carolina's Living-Learning Communities (LLC) give students a unique, inclusive residential learning experience that connects classroom learning with residence life. Students benefit from living among a group of students who share academic goals and interests. Through student, faculty and staff partnerships, as well as educational and cultural programs, students broaden their perspectives and understanding of the world around them. This holistic approach complements classroom experiences and lays the foundation for students to become better prepared to succeed in life beyond college. Join us for this session to learn more about how LLCs promote student success at Carolina!

March 18th Student Sexual Assault: Prevention and Support with Kelli Raker, Rape Prevention Education Coordinator, Counseling and Wellness Services

Statistics show that one in four women are sexually assaulted in their lifetimes. Unfortunately, the students at Carolina are not protected from this disturbing reality. Please join us to learn more about what we have learned about sexual assault on our campus and new initiatives in place to address the issue. We will also discuss how to best respond to students who disclose assault, resources in place to support survivors, and the process and importance of blind reporting.

April 15th Strategies for De-Escalating Upset Students with Greg Stonerock, M.A., Pre-doctoral Intern, Counseling and Wellness Services and Amy Schmitz-Sciborski, Clinical Psychologist, Counseling and Wellness Services

Have you ever worked with an irate student and nothing you say calms him or her down? In fact, the anger just seems to escalate? These situations can be frustrating, annoying, and even scary. Please join us to learn effective strategies for de-escalating upset students and how to stay mindful of your personal safety during potentially dangerous situations. Come ready to role play and please feel free to share your own experiences with these difficult encounters.

May 13th Identifying Your Strengths and Using Them in Your Work with Students with Demi Brown, Assistant Dean of Students, Office of the Dean of Students

What are your personal strengths? How can you recognize, nurture and build on your strengths in your work with students? In this session we will talk about identifying your personal strengths using the Strengths Finder program as well as how to use this information to enhance your work with students. The first 20 people who RSVP to this event to studentsuccess@unc.edu will be given a login to complete the Strengths Finder online. We will discuss results from the Strengths Finder during this session.

All lunches are from noon to 1:30 in Graham Memorial 011

Dear Julius,
If you've had time to screen my film, I'd appreciate any feedback. Also, I'm asking people for quotes I can use in the promotion of These Are My Children to educational institutions.
The Cameroonian filmmaker Jean-Pierre Bekelo, a friend of mine, was in town for a few days. I got caught up on all the news about the state of African filmmaking. Not good news according to Bekelo.

Subject: [asc_faculty] Fwd: FW: Wilson Library Sprinkler Project

Dear UNC community and Wilson Library patrons,

Beginning in late July or in August, fire sprinklers will be installed in the stacks of the Wilson Special Collections Library at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. The project will take approximately one year to complete.

The installation of a fire suppression system to protect UNC's most valuable library collections is critical. However, it will disrupt the retrieval of research collections during the installation period.

During the project, which is expected to last approximately one year, each of the library's nine stack floors will be closed for six to eight weeks. The library materials in each work zone will be enclosed in floor-to-ceiling protective sheeting and will be inaccessible until the floor re-opens.

The project will affect access to materials from the North Carolina Collection, the North Carolina Collection Photographic Archives, the Southern Historical Collection, the Southern Folklife Collection, University Archives and Records Management Services, and the Rare Book Collection.

If you expect to need specific special collections materials for research or teaching during the installation period, we urge you to contact Wilson Library staff as soon as possible. With early notice, we will make every effort to work with you to identify and make the collection materials you need available during the project. Staff can also advise on the availability of collections during the installation.

Direct questions and requests for materials to Wilson Library at (919) 962-3765 or wilsonlibrary@unc.edu. As the project progresses, updates will be posted to http://library.unc.edu/wilson/research/sprinklers.html.

If you would like additional information about this project, please do not hesitate to contact me.

Sincerely,

Bill Landis

Hi, Tim,

Enrollments are looking pretty good for session one and Maymester about 3 1/2 weeks out from classes. The only exception is AFAM 263 which has only 2 students enrolled.

So if there is some way to publicize that course to majors, I would encourage you to do so. I'll keep monitoring it and other classes as well. Any cancelation decision would be made around May 3.

I'll look at second session a bit further out.

Subject: INFORMATIONAL: Paid research opportunity for 15-21 year olds with chronic stomachaches

Do you suffer from chronic stomachaches?

Many adolescents and young adults who suffer from chronic stomachaches avoid eating to prevent pain. A research study at UNC investigates whether food avoidance affects the gut.

If you are 15-21 years old and diagnosed with functional abdominal pain or Irritable Bowel Syndrome by a physician, you may be eligible to take part in this research study.

We're looking both for people who avoid eating and who do not avoid eating to prevent stomachaches. One weekday morning visit to UNC is required. You will receive $65 for completing the study.

If you are interested in participating or would like more information, please contact:

Subject: INFORMATIONAL: Advising Opportunity for Graduate Students

[The website link below has been fixed since the last notice!]

The Pre-Graduate Education Advising Program seeks graduate students wanting to serve undergraduates while enriching their own skills during 2011-2012. If you volunteer as an advisor, you will will expand your skill set and add appeal to your C.V. sharpening your edge in the job market.

As an advisor, you will meet with undergraduates considering graduate school and help them to understand, among other things, the application process and what life as a graduate student is like. You will be required to attend a 3 hour training session at the beginning of the fall 2011 semester, a 1 hour training session each month during the school year, and then serve as an advisor for either 1 hour a week or 1 hour every other week, depending on your availability. For more information on the program and for details on applying and the application deadline, please visit our website:

Subject: Fall 2011 Textbook Reports through April 15, 2011

Attach: Fall 2011 Textbook Submission Report_Through_April_15_2011.xls; Guaranteed

Dear Chairs, Deans, Senior Associate Deans, and department Liaisons,

Here is an update on the progress for Fall 2011 percentage of on-time adoptions of textbooks and/or notification of No Text Needed for UNC Chapel Hill, and the current list of courses participating in Guaranteed Buyback Program. Attached are the two reports reflecting submissions made to Student Stores through 4/15/2011.

Fall 2011 Textbook Submission Report lists the percentage of course submissions and/or No Text Needed notification to Student Stores. As well as additional worksheets listing each department's courses which have not placed an order or notified Student Stores that no text is needed. Please review your department's course worksheet indicated on the bottom tab of the excel report. Please let us know if any changes need to be made. General Administration's due date for Fall 2011 Course Materials orders is April 29, 2011.

To date we have received 41% of Fall 2011 course submissions.

Guaranteed Buyback report reflects large introductory courses and their notification to Student Stores regarding the Guaranteed Buyback Program. We continue to encourage and accept Guaranteed Buyback textbook commitment forms from UNC Chapel Hill departments. Please let me know if your department wishes to participate in the Guaranteed Buyback Program.

UNC Student Stores contributes all income above operating expenses to UNC Chapel Hill student scholarships. Student Stores is totally receipt supported and receives no state funds.

Orders can be placed in one of 5 easy ways:

1) Use the Student Stores website: http://www.store.unc.edu

2) Fax your order to: (919) 962-3334

3) Email the Textbook Office textbook@unc.edu, or

George Morgan gfmorgan@store.unc.edu
Frank Bellamy fbellamy@email.unc.edu

4) Send your order by campus mail to the Course Materials Department at Campus Box #1530

5) Stop by the Textbook Office, 3rd floor, Student Stores

Quick summary review:
As required in the BOG recommendations, tuition and fee requests must also include submission stating the percentage of on-time adoptions of textbooks. The Board of Governor's is requiring all stores affiliated with the sixteen North Carolina campuses to submit a report on the percentage of on-time adoptions of textbooks for their campus.
General Administration Board of Governors Textbook Requirements Summary:
All campuses must have a guaranteed buyback or rental program for required textbooks for large, introductory classes for the Spring 2008 semester.

. This option must be available in addition to traditional purchase option.

. "Campuses must offer this option for introductory texts that will withstand a two to three year adoption cycle."

. "Campuses must make an effort to implement this system for courses that are introductory level and taken by a relatively high percentage of students."

. "A response to this recommendation must also be reported to the VP for Finance in any future requests for increases in tuition and fees."

Best,
Kelly

In ongoing efforts to facilitate the Board of Governors textbook requirements for large introductory courses, we continue to encourage and accept textbook commitment forms from UNC Chapel Hill departments. As noted in UNC's 2011 Report on the Cost of Textbooks, Submitted with Campus-Based Tuition and Fee Increase Requests, "To significantly affect the cost of textbooks, Chancellors, Provosts, faculty and bookstore managers must continue to increase the number of courses and textbooks in the guaranteed buyback programs."

Contextualising children's migration in West Africa

Dorte Thorsen, University of Reading

Discussant: Simon Turner, Danish Institute of International Studies
Moderator: Stig Jensen, Centre of African Studies

Migration – or leaving home – is not a rite of passage per se for young male migrants from rural Burkina Faso. Seeking independence, they usually join a network of relatives of different proximity, in which many people take upon themselves to steer the boys onto life paths that are considered successful in the wider society.

The presentation is based on ethnographic research produced in a period of twelve months between 2005 and 2008 and draws on a small number of detailed case studies from Ouagadougou and Abidjan. It forms part of the book Child Migration in Africa and in particular the chapters in the book dealing with the migrants' introductions to new social worlds and the processes of constructing identities. It examines the dynamics between young migrants who digress from the dominant views of how they should behave. This is necessary in order to grasp the social pressures and constraints to which children and young people are subject and how they resist them.

What emerges is a picture of how children and young people navigate their social and economic context through moving in and out of childhood in different times and places of their lives. Moreover, it becomes clear that social pressures are intermeshed with mechanisms of protection and prospects for future jobs and resources.

Dorte Thorsen is teaching fellow at the Department of Geography and Environmental Science, University of Reading, England.

Simon Turner is senior researcher at the Danish Institute of International Studies, Copenhagen

The seminar will be followed by launch of the book:

Seeking independence, they usually join a network of relatives of different proximity, in which many people take upon themselves to steer the boys onto life paths that are considered successful in the wider society.

The presentation is based on ethnographic research produced in a period of twelve months between 2005 and 2008 and draws on a small number of detailed case studies from Ouagadougou and Abidjan. It forms part of the book Child Migration in Africa and in particular the chapters in the book dealing with the migrants' introductions to new social worlds and the processes of constructing identities. It examines the dynamics between young migrants who digress from the dominant views of how they should behave. This is necessary in order to grasp the social pressures and constraints to which children and young people are subject and how they resist them.

What emerges is a picture of how children and young people navigate their social and economic context through moving in and out of childhood in different times and places of their lives. Moreover, it becomes clear that social pressures are intermeshed with mechanisms of protection and prospects for future jobs and resources.

World Languages: Resources for Educators

> Kolik jazyků znáš, tolikrát jsi člověkem.
> "You live a new life for every new language you speak.
> If you know only one language, you live only once."
> - Czech proverb

As the quote suggests, language is much more than grammar and pronunciation; it is a gateway into another world of understanding, exchange, and ideas. Whether it's a Romanized, Cyrillic, or Arabic alphabet, written words also allow us to see the world as other cultures see it. American citizens, especially students, are in desperate need to learn, improve, and expand their knowledge of world languages. This issue of Global Updates will offer facts, resources, and top ten reasons to engage our students in multilingual dialog.

A special thank you to World View's Carina Brossy for authoring this month's Global Update!

WORLD LANGUAGE FACTS

- The world has 6912 living languages.
- Of these languages, nearly 516 are close to extinction.
- The language with the greatest number of speakers is Mandarin Chinese.
- The language spoken by the greatest number of non-native speakers is English (250 to 350 million non-native speakers).
- Papa New Guinea is the country to School and Youth Literacy Grants Program

The Dollar General Literacy Foundation provides support to schools, libraries, and literacy-based nonprofit organizations throughout Dollar General's thirty-five-state market. The foundation is now accepting applications for Back to School Literacy Grants and Youth Literacy Grants.

Back to School Grants provide funding to help school libraries and media centers meet some of the financial challenges they face in the following areas: implementing new or expanding existing literacy programs; purchasing new technology or equipment to support literacy initiatives; and purchasing books, materials, or software for literacy programs. Applicants must be K-12 public, private, or charter schools. Grants of up to $5,000 will be awarded.

Youth Literacy Grants provide funding to schools, public libraries, and nonprofit organizations working to help students who are below grade level or experiencing difficulty reading. Applicants must be a nonprofit 501(c)(3) organization, a K-12 private or public school, a college or university, or a public library. Grants of up to $3,000 will be awarded.

All applicant organizations must reside in and provide direct service within Dollar General's thirty-five-state market area and must be located within twenty miles of a Dollar General store.

For complete grant guidelines, eligibility quiz, application procedures, and store locator, visit the Dollar General Web site.

Subject: [afriafam] FW: Wilson Library Sprinkler Project

Dear UNC community and Wilson Library patrons,

Beginning in late July or in August, fire sprinklers will be installed in the stacks of the Wilson Special Collections Library at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. The project will take approximately one year to complete.

The installation of a fire suppression system to protect UNC's most valuable library collections is critical. However, it will disrupt the retrieval of research collections during the installation period.

During the project, which is expected to last approximately one year, each of the library's nine stack floors will be closed for six to eight weeks. The library materials in each work zone will be enclosed in floor-to-ceiling protective sheeting and will be inaccessible until the floor re-opens.

The project will affect access to materials from the North Carolina Collection, the North Carolina Collection Photographic Archives, the Southern Historical Collection, the Southern Folklife Collection, University Archives and Records Management Services, and the Rare Book Collection.

If you expect to need specific special collections materials for research or teaching during the installation period, we urge you to contact Wilson Library staff as soon as possible. With early notice, we will make every effort to work with you to identify and make the collection materials you need available during the project. Staff can also advise on the availability of collections during the installation.

Direct questions and requests for materials to Wilson Library at (919) 962-3765 or wilsonlibrary@unc.edu. As the project progresses, updates will be posted to http://library.unc.edu/wilson/research/sprinklers.html.

If you would like additional information about this project, please do not hesitate to contact me.

Sincerely,

Bill Landis

Subject: FORMAL NOTICE: State Health Plan Update

TO: All Permanent Employees

FROM: Ashley Nicklis, Interim Senior Director, Benefits Services
Office of Human Resources

As you may have seen, Governor Perdue vetoed legislation that would have made changes to the State Health Plan on Wednesday. We had planned for UNC-Chapel Hill's annual enrollment to begin next week; however, this recent development will cause the enrollment period to be delayed.

We understand that some of you may be concerned and want to know what changes to expect. It is difficult for us to determine, at this point, when we might expect a new bill to be presented, but we are monitoring this legislation very closely.

It is possible that the annual enrollment period could occur after the spring semester has concluded. We will send out updates as we have additional information to share. Please monitor your communications from our office over the next several weeks for news on the State Health Plan changes and annual enrollment period.

If you have any questions, please contact your Benefits Counselor or call 962-3071.

Subject: Film Today: American Revolution 2

A free and public film screening:

AMERICAN REVOLUTION 2
(76 min)

When: Monday April 18
@ 7pm

Where: Hitchcock Multipurpose Room
Sonja Haynes Stone Center
150 South Road
UNC Chapel Hill Campus

A heady time of change and chains, the 1960s was defined by a common effort to fight against injustice. And Chicago filmmaker Mike Gray was there, using his camera to document the politics of the streets.
American Revolution 2 is a rare cinematic treasure that captures the social upheaval that followed the 1968 Democratic National Convention in Chicago. From the riots that followed, two disparate groups, the Black Panthers and the Young Patriots (a group of poor Southern whites living in Chicago), emerge to unite against prejudice and injustice in their city.
Gray's gritty, no-frills style is spontaneous and purposeful suggesting a you-are-there quality that captures the excitement of the era. Shot verite style, with no script, hand-held camera, direct sound, and natural lighting, the look is rough, raw, and real much like the city it depicted.

This showing is part of a film series that examines the legacy of the Black radical tradition. Future showings include:

April 25: Bastards of the Party

All showings begin at 7pm in the Hitchcock Multipurpose Room, Sonja Haynes Stone Center, UNC-Chapel Hill

Co-Sponsored by the Black Student Movement

Subject:	Ballot for Faculty Governance Elections Spring 2011

Hello Faculty Colleague,

We've noticed that you haven't yet voted in the 2011 UNC faculty-wide elections. There's still time! The elections are open until 5:00 p.m. on Friday, April 22nd.

Please take a few minutes to respond -- it's easy! The original email with link to the ballot is shown below this note. There is also a link to the full voter guide with candidate information.

Consider that:

- Two of your colleagues are willing to devote their professional energies for the next three years to serving as Chair of the Faculty, attending countless meetings (including the Board of Trustees) and other events to represent faculty interests.
- Over 100 of your colleagues have agreed to run for positions.
- The positions being voted for make decisions related to appointments, promotions, and tenure; policies for student-athletes; undergraduate policy; faculty hearings and grievances; and the granting of honorary degrees.
- The outcome of many races in past years has been decided by only a few votes.

Last year, only 24% of eligible faculty (just over 800 people) voted. In the first days of this year's elections, about 650 people have participated.

Your vote matters! Faculty governance has deep roots at Carolina, and a robust turnout makes a powerful statement about the faculty's continued engagement in campus decision-making. While we can't go back to the days of weekly all-faculty meetings in the chancellor's dining room, you can still participate. Please cast your ballot today.

Thank you!

April 13, 2011

Dear Colleague,

Welcome to the 2011 UNC-Chapel Hill faculty elections! This message is being sent to you because you are a member of the UNC Voting Faculty. The annual faculty elections are one of the best ways for you to influence policy on a host of issues affecting the university□s core research, teaching, and service missions.

Balloting opens today and closes on Friday, April 22, 2011 at 5:00 p.m. To be sure that your ballot is tabulated, please observe the deadline.

Candidate Information: A full voter guide includes statements and biographical information for all candidates for all positions. You will also be able to access this guide from within the ballot.

To Vote:

Please click the link below to access your ballot. Your ballot is unique to you and may be used only once.

Link to the Official Ballot Site: Click Here for Your 2011 Faculty Governance Ballot

Or, paste this link into your browser:
https://uncodum.qualtrics.com/WRQualtricsSurveyEngine/?Q_SS=a8EPu9enGfXwvDm_9zZJbPx1sZsfrdq&_=1

Some additional points about voting:

- All of the positions for which you are eligible to vote will appear in a series. You may vote for fewer than the number of positions to be filled.
- You will not be able to change any of your votes once you have completed the survey and submitted your ballot.
- If you have technical problems accessing the ballot site, please email: FacultyGovernance@unc.edu for assistance.
- The election results will be announced in an email to all faculty by April 25, 2011.

Thank you for helping keep faculty governance strong at UNC!

There, the bloggers will research and write the stories of Kakamega's women, how they support the health of their families, their access to safe and clean drinking water, and how the public health challenges of the community touch upon MDGs. The application deadline is April 22, 2011.

NEW Water, Food and Energy Nexus workshop at Water and Health Conference. The United Nations World Water Assessment Programme (WWAP) will be convening a workshop entitled “Water, food security and energy nexus and the related impacts on health”. It will provide an out-of-the-box perspective exploring water, food and energy nexus; soil, water and food contamination, air pollution, and biofuels; and direct and indirect impacts on water. Additionally, the conference will have a session featuring research on Water, food and energy nexus and the related impacts on health. We are seeking high quality abstracts for oral and poster presentation. Deadline: April 30, 2011.

The UNC Gillings School of Global Public Health needs your help for Fall 2011. The Gillings School of Global Public Health is looking for student analysts with the right skills to work on competitive intelligence, benchmarking, and data visualization projects. Students will work approximately 10 hours a week. Ideal candidates would be second year master's students with a background in marketing analytics, management information systems, data management, balanced scorecards or other data intensive projects/positions. Advanced Excel knowledge is required.

Traveling this Summer? Review the UNC Travel Policy. All UNC public health students or students sponsored by a UNC public health program and planning to travel to other countries to fulfill academic requirements, travel with funding from a UNC group, or as part of a UNC student group project, must follow specific instructions. Visit the Office of Student Affairs, 263 Rosenau Hall with any questions.

Are you interested in taking a leadership position in the Student Global Health Committee for 2011-2012? If so, please send 1-2 paragraphs about yourself, your qualifications, and a resume to the contact person for each committee:

- Executive Co-Chairs: Responsibilities include overseeing the activities of all subcommittees, organizing monthly Executive Committee Meetings to update all executive members about current and future events, lead various events throughout the year, and provide internal and external support of SGHC.
- HIV Narrative Committee Co-Chairs: Responsibilities include bringing inspiring, grassroots, and innovative speakers to the UNC campus, organize film screenings and other activities to raise awareness about the global epidemic.

The School of Public Health at the University of Alberta is offering summer courses on Public Health Surveillance. These courses are ideal for practitioners, clinicians and policy developers working in health services, health systems, government and non-governmental organizations.

The Global Nutrition Committee would like to invite you to the OXFAM America Hunger Banquet. Share a free meal and a dynamic discussion of world hunger led by Mamie Sackey-Harris, MPH. Donations will be accepted for hunger relief efforts in Japan. Forty percent of people on our planet - more than 2.5 billion - now live in poverty, struggling to survive on less than $2 dollars a day. More people die from hunger each year than from AIDS, malaria, and tuberculosis combined. With your participation we can take strides together to end poverty and injustice around the world.

Call for Proposals! The Harvard University Center for AIDS Research (CFAR) is pleased to announce a request for proposals for clinical and basic science HIV/AIDS research awards.

Engineers Without Borders is holding a fundraiser on April 20, 2011. At the "Pie-a-Professor/Student" event people will be able to throw a pie at a professor or student of their choice. Six professors and six students will be selected to have pies thrown at them, with people being able to nominate through the purchase of a raffle ticket. Raffle tickets will go on sale April 13, 2011, for $5.

Graduate School announces Impact Awards and other honors for public health students

North Carolinians will know more about what contaminates their well water, what happens to mothers exposed to medical radiation, and why asthma rates are high in schools near industrial hog farms, thanks to the work of graduate students at the UNC Gillings School of Global Public Health. These and other outstanding projects were recognized on April 6, as The Graduate School at UNC held its 12th annual Graduate Student Recognition Celebration at the George Watts Hill Alumni Center's Carolina Club.

Honored were winners of external fellowships, inductees into University honorary societies and University Research Day winners (see list below). The centerpiece of the event was a research poster presentation by recipients of the Graduate Education Advancement Board's 2011 Impact Awards, which recognize research providing special benefits to the citizens of North Carolina.

Five of the 23 Impact winners are in UNC's Gillings School of Global Public Health.

Subject: Workshop: The Twelve Keys to Successful Grant Writing

---

Date: Friday, April 29
Time: 9:00 a.m. to 12:30 p.m.
Place: Pleasants Room, Wilson Library
Registration Required
Dr. Robert Lowman, Associate Vice Chancellor for Research, will be conducting this workshop that presents twelve key concepts related to success in grant writing. Designed for the grant writer with limited experience, this workshop starts from the premise that nothing succeeds like a good idea. But there are other important ingredients of success, from assembling a winning team to achieving a strong match between the idea and a potential sponsor. The workshop stresses the importance of planning, and presents the sponsor as a potential ally, not an adversary.
This event is appropriate for grant proposal writers in any discipline. It is open only to UNC-Chapel Hill faculty, postdoctoral fellows, and staff, and space is limited. Registration is required.
If you have questions regarding the workshop, please contact Jennifer Pruitt 962-7757 (jennifer_pruitt@unc.edu) for more details.

Good afternoon Professor Nyangoro,

My name is Brian Smith and I am the account manager for the university in regards to our Primary Source microfilm products. While Gale publishes in print and electronic formats, we continue to build premier, very high quality, primary source collections in the film format. In fact, many of the contributors to these collections mandate that the content is built in a film format, and in some cases, that it not be offered electronically ever. We recognize that everyone might want everything electronically if possible, but we also know that these materials are so important to researchers that we continue to build these new film collections.

With that being said, I know with end of the year purchases coming up that librarians are always looking for feedback on collections that would be valuable to researchers. Microfilm format also offers a great advantage for end of year purchases, because it's a one-time purchase, and has no continuing fees that will affect the budget in future years. We can also do a 50% discount for the library at this time, and free shipping through June 10th, 2011. We also continue to update our online guide site to make these collections are easier to use and more discoverable to library patrons. I have attached our African-American studies catalog to this email in case you wanted to weigh in on new resources. A few new collections that we are really excited about include:

African American Business, Entrepreneurship and the Commerce Department: Records of the Office of the Secretary's Advisor on Negro Affairs, 1940-1953

The War on Poverty and the Office of Economic Opportunity — Part 1: Records of the Office of Civil Rights, 1965-1968

The War on Poverty and the Office of Economic Opportunity — Part 2: Community Profiles. Volume 2

U.S. Military Activities and Civil Rights — Part 2: The Military Response to the March on Washington, 1963

Grassroots Social Activism Records of the Highlander Folk School and Highlander Research and Education Center, 1932-1978

If you have any questions, or just want to discuss any collections, please don't hesitate to contact me. Take care and have a great day!

Best Regards,
Brian

African-American Business, Entrepreneurship and the Commerce Department: Records of the Office of the Secretary's Advisor on Negro Affairs, 1940-1953

Emmer Martin Lancaster was appointed adviser for the Division of Negro Affairs in the Office of the Secretary of Commerce on May 25, 1940. The division had been established in 1933. Lancaster filled a vacancy created by the resignation of Eugene Kinckle Jones. The National Negro Business advisory Council was formed to serve the Division of Negro Affairs. These records include correspondence with insurance companies owned and operated by Blacks, 1942 to 1953; correspondence with banks owned and operated by Blacks, 1942 to 1953; correspondence with Black lending institutions, 1942-1943; and correspondence and reports pertaining to Conferences on the Negro Business, 1940-1953.

Lancaster's records indicate that he often traveled to visit African American business leaders in various U.S. cities and offered advice to students and faculty at a number of historically-Black college and universities.

The Advisor's records include material from the Division of Negro Affairs. The division's voluminous correspondence included request for information and publications; inquiries about conference activities; questions about the Committee on Negro Defense Contracts; questions from Black trade associations and real estate brokers; and materials relating to post-World War II planning, housing, and emergency programs. The division also issued a series of annual reports primarily relating to African American banking institutions, but some periodic reports also relate to insurance companies, postwar planning for Blacks in business, and a directory of Black businesses in the U.S. Although many of the materials in the files are routine letters, they still provide details about the scope of African American business endeavors. Often the letterheads on the stationary provide useful information. Division correspondents include manufacturers, architects, real estate agents, journalists, hair-care producers, beauticians, attorneys, film producers, shop owners, funeral directors, builders, business students, and publishers.

This collection explores racial uplift and black economic development in the 20th century.

African American Culture & History: The L.S. Alexander Gumby Collection of Negroiana

Alexander Gumby (1885-1961) was a book collector who ran a salon in Harlem known as The Gumby Book Studio because of the hundreds of books that lined the walls. His salon, a large, rented studio on 5th Avenue between 131st and 132nd Streets attracted many theatrical and artistic luminaries.

A strength of the collection is the individual scrapbooks on noted people, such as W.E.B. DuBois, Langston Hughes, Ralph Bunche, Frederick Douglass, Marcus Garvey, Jackie Robinson, Booker T. Washington and many other African Americans. Topics include Lynchings and Race Riots; Social Equality; the Negro (Gumby's term) as a Soldier; Harlem; the Negro and Communism; the Negro in Bondage; the Negro in Politics and more.

American Negro Historical Society Collection, 1790–1905

Includes a variety of materials that illustrate the black experience in the 19th and early 20th centuries. The historical society was founded in 1897 by a group of African Americans in Philadelphia that included Robert Adger, W. M. Dorsey and Jacob C. White, Jr.

S3362. 12 reels.

The American Missionary, 1846–1934

The American Missionary was published monthly from 1846 to 1934 as the official organ of the American Missionary Association. From 1846 to the Civil War, the American Missionary Association was the best organized, best financed and most active abolitionist society in America. Beginning in 1861, the American Missionary Society took the lead in providing education for the liberated slaves and continues today to be one of the leading supporters of Afro- American education.

D3623. 15 reels.

The American Missionary Association Archives, 1839–1882

This collection currently includes nearly 350,000 manuscript pieces. The mass of these were written during the period 1839-1882, but several thousand are dated before and after that time. The manuscripts include some of the treasurers' papers, some minutes of executive committee meetings, and other items such as sermons, statistical reports, drawings, pictures and essays, but letters make up the large majority of the items. More than 100,000 of the letters are reports from foreign and home missionaries and teachers.

D3622. 261 reels.

Annual Report of the American Missionary Association, 1847–1949

The American Missionary Association was founded in 1846 in response to the refusal of some of the largest and oldest missionary organizations to adopt abolitionist principles. During antebellum period, in addition to missions in Africa, Siam, Jamaica, Hawaii and Egypt, and in Canada among fugitive slaves, the Association supported hundreds of abolitionist pastors of churches in the United States, from New England to California and in the border states of the South, among Native Americans, native whites, European and Chinese immigrants, and Chicanos.

D3624. 5 reels.

The Anti-Slavery Collection

As early as 1835, Oberlin College was a major center of anti-slavery activity, having first permitted blacks to enter the school that year. This collection comprises pamphlets from Hubbard's "Catalogue of the Collection of Anti-Slavery Propaganda in the Oberlin College Library," plus materials acquired since 1932.

1107. 7,235 fiche.

The Archives of the Race Relations Department of the United Church Board for Homeland Ministries, 1942–1976

In spite of the notable efforts of the American Missionary Association and others who joined in the education and elevation of American blacks, and in spite of the Emancipation Proclamation, the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution, the "sins of caste" continued to divide America as the nation entered World War II to fight against Fascism and racism abroad.

Civil Rights and Social Activism in the South

Series 1, Civil Rights and Social Activism in Alabama

Part 1: John L. LeFlore Papers, 1926–1976

The John LeFlore papers tell important stories about the civil rights movement in the urban South, document the development and early work of the NAACP in Mobile, and provide insight into his life and aspirations.

233521.010. 15 reels.

Part 2: Records of the Non-Partisan Voters League, 1956–1987

The records in this collection span thirty years (1956-1987) with the bulk of the materials between 1961 and 1975. During that time the League demanded and obtained the hiring of more black municipal employees, sued to force desegregation of the Mobile school system and filed complaints with the U.S. Department of Justice to open public accommodations to all. All of these activities are documented in this collection.

233521.010. 29 reels.

Series 2, The Legal Battle for Civil Rights in Alabama

This collection consists of selected portions of the Vernon Z. Crawford and Blacksher, Menefee and Stein law firm, whose work in the areas of Alabama civil rights had a profound influence on the shape of the U.S. civil rights movement in the 20th century. This collection consists of two parts defined as:

244232.010. Part 1: Vernon Z. Crawford Records, 1958-1978: Civil Rights Cases 6 reels.

FBI File on Jonestown

The People's Temple—a religious cult started by the Reverend Jim Jones—flourished in San Francisco in the 1970s. Jones styled himself as a social activist and a civil rights leader, promoting racial and economic equality, and offering an alternative religion to older African Americans who felt distanced from radical political groups like the Black Panthers, who they saw as too extreme. The summary reports of FBI interviews represent the bulk of the file. They contain a great deal of information concerning the inner workings and activities of the cult in the United States, including arms smuggling, drug trafficking, and planning terrorist attacks. The file also contains information on experiences at Jonestown, including the "White Nights" rehearsals of mass suicide and public ritual, and beatings intended to humiliate and psychologically control cult members.

The FBI File on Jonestown also provides insight into the 1970s culture of paranoia in the wake of the Manson Family murders and the Hearst kidnapping, both of which are referenced in the file in relation to Jones and the People's Temple. It also demonstrates the FBI's attempts to come to grips with the sometimes frightening manifestations of the growing counterculture opposed to mainstream America. This is a tremendous resource on a late twentieth-century alternative religious movement that ended in disaster, providing information on this unique cult known as the People's Temple and its mostly African-American membership.

FBI File on the Posse Comitatus

This FBI file is an excellent case study of the tracking of a hate group. A group of right-wing extremists, the Posse Comitatus was formed in Oregon in the early 1970s. Established as a group of citizens "voluntarily acting in the name of the local sheriff to enforce the law," the Posse Comitatus hated Jews, African-Americans, and government officials above the rank of sheriff. Holding the federal government in contempt as illegitimate, and recognizing lawful authority only on the county level, the Posse also advocated tax rebellion. Covering the period 1973–1977 and 1980–1996, this collection contains copies of hate literature, details of a bombing, and notes from several income tax evasion trials. This file will be of interest to those studying hate groups and the government's efforts to monitor them.

The Minority Voter, the Election of 1936, and the Good Neighbor League

The minority voter has long been of interest to historians and political scientists, especially during presidential election years. Although a great deal has been published on how minorities have voted in particular elections, there have been few studies on their actual participation in political campaigns.

This microfilm publication is designed as a case study of minority, including African American, women, and ethnic involvement in a presidential election campaign, using the 1936 Democratic Campaign as a model. The 1936 election provides an excellent example due to the importance of the election to minorities and the Democratic Party, and because of the availability of manuscript material on the Good Neighbor League – the principal "auxiliary" organization through which minorities participated in the 1936 Democratic campaign.

U.S. Military Activities and Civil Rights

Part 1: Integration of the University of Mississippi and the Use of Military Force, 1961-1963

In the fall of 1962 the college town of Oxford, Mississippi erupted in violence. At the center of the controversy stood James Meredith, an African American, who was attempting to register at the all-white University of Mississippi, known as "Ole Miss." Meredith had the support of the federal government, which insisted that Mississippi honor the rights of all its citizens, regardless of race. Mississippi's refusal led to a showdown between state and federal authorities and the storming of the campus by a segregationist mob. Two people died and dozens were injured. In the end, Ole Miss, the state of Mississippi, and the nation were forever changed.

This microfilm publication comprises the Records of the Office of the Deputy Chief of Staff for Military Operations (ODCSOPS) relating to the military efforts to enforce the integration of the University of Mississippi. These records highlight the use of Federal marshals, U.S. Troops, and the federalized National Guard in Oxford, MS, 1962-1963, on the occasion of James Meredith's enrollment at the University of Mississippi. The records cover events such as the riots of September 30 and Governor Barnett's efforts to obstruct Federal marshals, as well as daily events on campus and Meredith's progress under integration. The files detail the extensive Federal involvement, including preparations for the military operation, Executive Orders , after action reports on the costs and lessons of Federal involvement, congressional correspondence on the military's involvement, and effects on the media, public, and in particular, students and staff at Ole Miss. These records demonstrate that the Federal government was highly sensitive to public opinion, researching the legality of Federal intervention and monitoring press reports, letter to congressmen, and the international impact of the campaign.

Part 2: The Military Response to the March on Washington, 1963

The records comprising Part 2: The Military Response to the March on Washington, 1963, reveal details of the Federal Government's plans to militarily intervene in the March on Washington (codenamed Operation "Steep Hill") in the event the march became disorderly. Army staff communications and memos tracked the plans of the March organizers throughout the summer, and the Office of the Deputy Chief of Staff for Military Operations prepared contingency plans for cooperation with District of Columbia police for controlling the march. The records also include intelligence reports and estimates, congressional correspondence, press articles, and maps planning the route of the March and facilities needed. These records give an insight into the personalities and events at the March on Washington. In addition, there is small quantity of records relating to the plans to intervene in Alabama in 1963 over the issue of school integration.

249704. 5 reels.

Part 3: The Integration of Alabama Schools and the Use of Military Forces, 1963

Part 3: The Integration of Alabama Schools and the Use of Military Force, 1963, details Operation OAK TREE the codename for the Army's plans to intervene in Alabama in the event of civil disturbances related to school integration in May 1963. Operation PALM TREE was the new designation in June when the operation was extended over a wider area. These records cover Governor Wallace's "stand in the schoolhouse door" and the Birmingham church bombing, when the National Guard was federalized and U.S. troops were deployed to protect property, support desegregation, and provide law and order.

249705. 14 reels.

Part 4: The Little Rock Integration Crisis, 1957-1958

Events in the fall of 1957 drew international attention as Little Rock became the epitome of state resistance when Arkansas Governor Orval E. Faubus directly questioned the sanctity of the federal court system and the authority of the Supreme Court's desegregation ruling when nine African-American high school students sought an education at Little Rock Central High School.

The controversy in Little Rock was the first fundamental test of the United State's resolve to enforce African-American civil rights in the face of massive southern defiance during the period following the Brown decisions.

When President Dwight D. Eisenhower was compelled by white mob violence to use federal troops to ensure the rights of African-American children to attend the previously all-white Little Rock Central High School, he became the first president since the post-Civil War Reconstruction period to use federal troops in support of African-American civil rights. As a result, the eyes of the world were focused on Little Rock in 1957 and the struggle became a symbol of southern racist reaction, as Governor Faubus created a constitutional crisis.

This publication covers President Eisenhower's use of Federal troops and the Arkansas National Guard in the Little Rock integration crisis of 1957-1958. The operation is detailed from the planning for intervention prior to deployment, up to the withdrawal of troops at the end of the school year. Records include a journal of events, an ODCSOPS summary of the operation, a historical report prepared by the Office of the Chief of Military History, papers on Governor Faubus' actions with regard to integration, press reports and observations by Army officers on the reaction of the community, and congressional correspondence. The records document official concern over the legality and ramifications of the operation and provide an insight into the problems surrounding this early attempt at school integration.

The War on Poverty and Office of Economic Opportunity

Part 1: Records of the Office of Civil Rights, 1965-1968

The most ambitious and controversial part of the Great Society was its initiative to end poverty. President Johnson, who as a teacher had observed extreme poverty in Texas among Mexican-Americans, launched an "unconditional war on poverty" in the first months of his presidency with the goal of eliminating hunger and deprivation from American life. The centerpiece of the War on Poverty was the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964, which created an Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO) to oversee a variety of community-based antipoverty programs. The OEO reflected a fragile consensus among policymakers that the best way to deal with poverty was not simply to raise the incomes of the poor but to help them better themselves through education, job training, and community development.

254220. 10 reels.

Part 2: Community Action Program Profiles

In an effort to assess the scale of poverty in America, the OEO developed the Community Profile Project. The Community Profile Project was designed to increase the scope, accessibility, accuracy, and utility of information supporting the planning and evaluation of programs for community improvement.

The Project compiled data for 3,135 U.S. counties and county equivalents that subdivided each state into independently-administered localities. Each profile, composed as a narrative with statistical indices, contained information showing general poverty indicators, size and composition of the poor population, and selected aspects of geography, demography, economy, and social resources.

Each profile is subdivided into six sections with a number of sub-sections: Poverty Indicators, Profile of the Poor, Geographic Profile, Demographic Profile, Economic Profile, and Social Profile.

These Community Profiles provide an in-depth analysis of poverty in America by providing an extensive inventory of current and historical data of the U.S. at a local level.

African American Collections from the Library of Congress

Abolitionist Periodicals

A collection of 29 American abolitionist periodicals, and one British title, dating 1827 through 1927. Titles include Freedom's Journal, Zion's Watchman, The Colored American, and others, and stem from all parts of the U.S., including Salem, Ohio; New York; Boston; Philadelphia; Tuskegee; San Francisco; Concord; Hampton; Providence; Rochester; Utica; and, London, England.

Shelf No. Microfilm 01278-01288, 01384-01396, et al. 30 reels.

"African American Life at Home and Abroad, 1821-1910:" The Daniel Murray Pamphlet Collection.

An assemblage of materials on African American culture and black culture abroad. With pamphlets on all aspects of black life, it consists of 352 individual titles published between 1831 and 1910. Most pamphlets were published in the latter half of the 19th century and encompass a variety of subjects and genres. They include sermons, plays, poems, speeches, Masonic and fraternal publications, slave narratives, college catalogs, and other publications. Among the authors represented are Frederick Douglass, Booker T. Washington, Ida B. Wells-Barnett, Benjamin W. Arnett, and Alexander Crummell.

Shelf No. Microfilm 90/3001. 10 reels.

Africana serials in microform in the Library of Congress

More than 160 serial titles, including monographic series, annual reports, and government publications, dating from the early 19th century through 1978. Places of publication include cities in the U.S. and Europe as well as places in Africa. Among the titles are holdings of the Microform Reading Room, the Law Library, the Newspaper Reading Room, and the Near East Section. However, the majority of African newspapers held by the Library in either the Near East Section or the Newspaper Reading Room are not listed here. In addition, several titles listed are held only as master negative microfilm by the Photoduplication Service. Other titles of related interest have been added to the Library's collections since this list was compiled; interested researchers should consult appropriate periodical catalogs and/or a reference librarian to determine title or holdings in microfilm not listed in the guide.

LCCN: (No Library of Congress Online Catalog entry)
LAFS001. Various microfilm numbers. 200+ (?) reels.

American Colonization Society

The American Colonization Society was organized in 1817 to resettle African Americans in West Africa. The records of the society span the years 1792-1964, with the majority of the material concentrated in the period 1823-1912. This collection contains a variety of material, including correspondence, reports, and financial and business papers.

Correspondence covers such subjects as administrative matters, the status of slaves and freedman in antebellum America, and the society's role in founding and colonizing Liberia and supporting Liberian education.

Letters document the largely unsuccessful efforts to get financial aid from the U.S. Congress and State legislatures, and reports received from agents around the country attest to the difficulty in obtaining individual contributions and the lack of cooperation from various State auxiliaries. The correspondence is concerned with the society's efforts to obtain funds for these purposes through private contributions and with counseling those who wished to emigrate. The microfilm is divided into seven series:

Financial Papers, 1818-1963.	36 reels.
Incoming Correspondence, 1819-1917.	186 reels.
Outgoing Correspondence, Letterbooks, 1839-1912.	63 reels.
General Correspondence, 1909-1965.	8 reels.
Business Papers, 1816-1963.	14 reels.
Subject File, 1792-1964 .	16 reels.
Miscellany, 1835-1935	8 reels.

L110185. Shelf No. MSS 14,745. 331 reels.

Black Sash Papers

The Black Sash was formed in 1955 by a group of white South African women determined to protest against the government's policy of apartheid. It has continued to do so into the present, counting among its members many eminent South African women. The Black Sash has protested and organized consistently and dramatically, against pass laws, detentions, removals to the "homelands," etc. In 1963, the group opened itself to non-white members. This collection spans the dates 1955-1972, and consists of the Society's speeches, administrative records, minutes and memoranda of national conferences, internal and external correspondence, and records of political actions.

LBSP001. Shelf No. 45115 6 reels.

Papers of Arthur B. Spingarn

Arthur Barnett Spingarn (1878-1971) was an African-American lawyer and civil rights leader who became president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). This collection contains correspondence, memoranda, minutes of meetings, wills and estate files, reports, briefs, hearing and trial transcripts, and other papers relating chiefly to Spingarn's service with the NAACP as vice president, chairman of the legal committee, and president (1911- 1965). The material spans the years 1850-1970, with the bulk concentrated in the period 1920-1955and is divided into seven series:

- Family Correspondence, 1912–1964
- Personal Correspondence, 1903–1967
- NAACP Files, 1912–1967
- Miscellany, 1850–1970
- Printed Matter, 1911–1967
- Addition, 1915–1968
- Oversize, 1915–1964

L110481. Shelf No. 20666. 58 reels.

Selected documents from records of the Committee on Fair Employment Practice in the custody of the National Archives: field records

Collection of office records, case records, and miscellaneous records of 13 regional offices and numerous sub-offices of the FEPC from 1943-1945. It includes records of complaints filed, follow-ups on the complaints, and disposition of cases. Good source of information on discrimination of all types against employees in the defense industry during World War II. Gives information on the names of private companies involved in defense, company addresses, type of industry, number of employees, original documents of complaints, nature of complaints, names of field officers to whom complaints were assigned, resolutions of complaints, statistics on cases, etc. Some typed and mimeographed records are almost illegible.

LCFE001. Shelf No. 88/375 58 reels.

Selected documents from records of the Committee on Fair Employment Practice in the custody of the National Archives: headquarters records

Collection of meeting agenda, summaries of meeting minutes, actions taken at meetings, weekly news digests, and newspaper clippings about the FEPC from 1942-1946. Sound recordings are not included. The collection provides information on the operation of the office of the Chairman of the FEPC. It also includes office memorandums, office files, press releases, field trip reports, agreements between agencies involved in handling disputes, lists of cases pending, teletypes, drafts of proposed Executive Orders, correspondence, Congressional testimony, and other matters of concern to the Committee. Some carbon copies of documents are illegible.

LCFE002. Shelf No. 88/376. 86 reels.

Slave Narratives: A Folk History of Slavery in the United States

A collection of typewritten records of more than 2000 ex-slaves, interviewed by workers of the Federal Writers Project (1936-1938), in seventeen states. The subjects discussed include family, work, relations of slaves and slave owners, the Civil War, life after emancipation, the Ku Klux Klan, folklore, religion, thoughts on the future, race, and slavery.

Shelf No. Microfilm 974. 11 reels.

Selected Negro Newspapers from the Library of Congress

This research collection contains issues of over one hundred African-American publications from the Library of Congress. The titles represent all regions of the United States. Because of the vast number of small runs filmed, several titles may appear on a given roll. Below is a partial listing of some of the titles available. Please keep in mind some volumes may be missing, and roll counts may change pending verification by the Library of Congress.

The Washington Bee, Washington, DC. 1882–84.
Shelf No. NP 2194. L110301 19 reels.

Subject: INFORMATIONAL: Are you a young adult cancer survivor interested in an exercise program?

Are you a young adult cancer survivor interested in getting more physically active? Do you have an active Facebook account?

Researchers at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill are studying ways to promote physical activity among young adult cancer survivors using Facebook. We are seeking volunteers to enroll in a research study that tests an exercise program designed specifically for young adult cancer survivors. Your participation will be some of the first data collected about an exercise program delivered through Facebook.

If you participate, you will receive exercise information via Facebook and a pedometer. You will be asked to complete two online questionnaires and may receive access to weekly group discussions and an exercise website. The entire 12-week study can be completed online.

You may be eligible if you:
-- are 21 to 39 years old
-- were diagnosed with cancer (excluding non-melanoma skin cancer) at age 18 or older
-- have completed cancer treatment
-- have an active Facebook account

Additional eligibility criteria apply.

Participants will receive a $30 gift card after the 12-week assessment.

For more information and to see if you qualify, please go to:
www.fitnet-unc.org

The study was approved by the Public Health-Nursing Institutional Review Board on 12/16/10 (Study # 10-2150).

Subject: FORMAL NOTICE: New Campus Email Address and Domain Policies

---

M E M O R A N D U M

TO: Carolina Faculty and Staff

FROM: Stan Waddell
Executive Director of Information Security and Information Security Officer

DATE: April 18, 2011

SUBJECT: New Campus Email Address and Domain Policies

Two new information security policies, the Email Address Policy and Email Domain Policy, have recently been approved. These policies have been created because of the need for the University to maintain the privacy and security of the information it creates and receives. The University must also be able to provide legally required information for discovery and public records purposes. When third party consumer email systems are used for official business the University does not have assurances that these important obligations can be met.

The new policies set forth the guiding principles on how email will be used for official communications and detail the following requirements:

1. All faculty, staff, and student-employees must use University-owned, managed, or approved email addresses for all work-related email correspondence (i.e. Email accounts that end in unc.edu including the new HeelMail live.unc.edu service for students). All faculty, staff and student-employees must maintain a University email address in the campus directory;
2. Faculty, staff, and student-employees may not automatically forward email from campus email systems to external non-University managed email systems (such as Yahoo, Gmail, or Hotmail);
3. Any University department desiring to outsource management of department email services to an external entity must first have a contract in place that has been approved by the Office of University Counsel; and
4. Email systems owned or managed by University departments must meet certain management criteria as identified in campus information security policies and have a completed and signed memorandum of understanding on file with the campus Information Security Office.

These policies apply to all faculty, staff, and student-employees at UNC-Chapel Hill, as well as to all email systems owned and/or managed by UNC-Chapel Hill. The policies can be found on the University IT Policies Page at: http://its.unc.edu/ITS/About_ITS/ITS_Policies/index.htm.

This message is a follow-up communication to one sent by Leslie Strohm, vice chancellor and general counsel and Larry Conrad, vice chancellor for information technology and chief information officer, to campus deans, directors and department heads on March 14.

Thank you for your continued assistance in reducing information security risks at UNC-Chapel Hill and in helping the University meet its legal obligations.

For assistance or questions with the policies please contact either your departmental information security liaison or the Office of Information Security at security@unc.edu or 919-962-HELP.

Subject:	INFORMATIONAL: Message from the Chancellor: Campus Response to Tornado Relief Efforts in N.C.

Dear Carolina Students, Faculty and Staff:

Here in Chapel Hill, our thoughts and prayers are with those across the state who have been affected by Saturday's tornados. We are identifying any students, faculty and staff directly affected, as well as establishing contact with those communities in North Carolina to find out what they need.

To best determine how we can help, I have asked the North Carolina Institute for Public Health and the Carolina Center for Public Service to coordinate our campus efforts and to serve as centralized source of information. Please check the website at http://www.unc.edu/ccps/ for information and share information about relief efforts with the center by e-mailing ccps@unc.edu.

One thing we do know is that the situation is being handled by emergency management, and the state has asked that no volunteers visit the affected areas right now, in the immediate aftermath. Given the scope of the disaster, however, certain volunteer efforts will be needed in the near future and for many months to come. Meanwhile, you can donate money to the Red Cross or to our campus Disaster Relief Fund at the Carolina Center for Public Service. The center will also coordinate a food drive for the Food Bank of Eastern North Carolina.

As we know what other relief efforts are underway, we will share that information on the website and through our UNC Facebook page.

Sincerely,

Holden Thorp

Yes, you read that right: Your silence has reached Oprah. Because of what you've already accomplished for 25, Oprah is having us on her show—for the THIRD time—to share the story of Invisible Children with millions more. We'll be on with our friend and film director Tom Shadyac.

Watch "The Oprah Winfrey Show" tomorrow (April 20th) to see our filmmakers talk with Oprah about what you've done for 25. Check your local listings for when it airs. (Yes, we copied and pasted that last sentence directly from TV Guide.)

This is all happening because in 5 days, on Sunday at 7PM, we're going silent, to speak out against 25 years of LRA violence. 25 hours later, on Monday at 8PM, we'll be breaking that silence together in a big way. How big? Keep reading...

The College Annual report system is now open for faculty to summarize their activities and accomplishments. Based on input the Annual Report Committee received from departments, a new version of the Annual Report system has been developed to streamline the process and make the reporting easier and more efficient for faculty, chairs, and administrators. The attached help document explains the design and navigation for the new system. Please contact OASIS for additional help.

All faculty in the College of Arts and Sciences are required to prepare for their department or curricula an annual report of some of your activities and accomplishments for the period May 1, 2010 to April 30, 2011. These reports are used for a variety of assessment and evaluation purposes within your units, but they are also an important component of the units' required report to the College of Arts and Sciences.

The deadline for completing your report is May 6, 2011. Please bookmark the new system address - https://apps4.oasis.unc.edu/car/

Stewardship:

You may also be prompted to complete a tab labeled "Stewardship." This section is included if you have received funding from private sources.

The Arts and Sciences Foundation produces letters to donors on the use of these funds. These reports benefit your department and the College of Arts and Sciences in future fund-raising efforts.

If you have questions about the Stewardship section, please contact one of the following staff members at the Arts & Sciences Foundation: Del Helton, del.helton@unc.edu, 962-8216, Jim Magaw, jim.magaw@unc.edu, 962-6123, or Joanna Cardwell, joanna.cardwell@unc.edu, 962-8342.

Please note that your contributions last spring helped the Arts and Sciences Foundation produce nearly 600 letters to our generous College donors. This annual "stewardship report" explains how the fund was used and includes information about the fund's investment performance. Donors often respond with a thank-you note in appreciation.

We very much appreciate your assistance with another round of outstanding stewardship letters.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR ACCESSING THE ANNUAL REPORT SYSTEM AND STEWARDSHIP

1) https://apps4.oasis.unc.edu/car/

2) Login with your onyen and onyen password

3) You can access the Stewardship system through a tab on the Annual Report.

*For responses from previous years – Previous system.

Your Onyen

Website: http://onyen.unc.edu

Your ONYEN is the first part of your email address, e.g. for an email address of jdoe(at)email.unc.edu your ONYEN is "jdoe" without the quotes.

If you lose or forget your ONYEN password, you can get a new one by taking your UNC One Card (or another picture ID) to IT Response Center at Wilson Library suite 300. It is not possible to recover your old password. For security reasons, you can get a new password only with a picture ID.

If you have forgotten your ONYEN you may look it up by selecting the "Forgotten Onyen" button and supplying your last name and your PID.

College of Arts and Sciences: Annual Report System

Overview

The online College annual report system has been redesigned for the 2010-2011 reporting period. A primary goal of the redesign was to make it easier for reporters to enter data into the system.

The general work flow of the application will be:

1. sign on
2. verify onyen, reporting period, departmental affiliations
3. answer questions on 9 pages
4. upload your CV
5. mark your report as complete
6. review your report
7. sign out

Access and Logon: where is it?

https://apps4.oasis.unc.edu/car Once you click on that link, you will be presented with the following login screen:

Provide your onyen and password to access the annual report system

College of Arts and Sciences: Annual Report System

Verify your affiliations

After a successful sign on, you will be sent to the first page in the system, the profile page:

The profile page presents some information that you, the reporter, must verify. Make sure that the onyen, the current year and the home/primary department is correct. You can easily change your primary department with the radio buttons.

All departments in the "Affiliated Units" section will be able to view your report. You do NOT need to fill out a report for each department.

In the example above, the reporter with an onyen of lerch is doing a report for the 2010-2011 reporting period and is affiliated with 2 departments. Note how the OASIS department is selected as the primary.

College of Arts and Sciences: Annual Report System

System Navigation: getting around within the system

The faculty/reporter part of the system consists of several pages, all with the navigation buttons "Back" and "Save and continue". Choosing “Back” will save any changes and send you to the previous page. “Save and Continue” will save any changes and send the reporter to the next page.

Here is an example of what the buttons look like (keep in mind that these buttons are at the bottom of each report page):

Sections of the report are also provided (right side menu) to navigate to any page within the report. Using these links will save the work you have already done on the current page.

Session time out

The annual report system will logout automatically after 30 minutes of inactivity and your work will not be saved. Remember to save your work before moving to another task.

Also, a pop up dialog will appear when only 5 minutes remain:

If you anticipate that an answer to a question(s) may take longer than 30 minutes, it may be necessary to draft the reply in a word process or text editor. Replies can be cut and pasted from the word processor.

College of Arts and Sciences: Annual Report System

Question Pages

The majority of the pages in the report system are in a question and answer format. Publications, creative activities, teaching, university service, internal funding, professional activities, public service, unit questions, and comments are all question/answer pages.

Replies to the questions are in one of several formats.

1. A small text box for numeric and short text answers (#6 below),
2. A larger, multi-line text box for more lengthy answers (#8 below), or
3. Radio button selections (#7 below).

6. Number of former graduate student coauthors:
   0
7. Did any undergraduates you supervise present or perform their work at an off-campus meeting or venue this year?
   ○ Yes ◉ No
8. If yes, please list the event(s) below with the names of the students below each event listed.

9. Did any undergraduates you supervise participate in an on-campus presentation/performance

Once the questions have been answered, you may click one of "Back" button, "Save and continue" button, or one of the direct-to-page links. Any of these will save your work.

Attachments Page

The attachment page allows you to attach uploaded files to your report. At this time, the only attachment required is your current CV, although your department may require other documents:

To add an attachment, click on the "(+) Add Attachment" link on the upper right hand side of the page. You will see the following:

Use the browse button to locate your CV file on your computer. Enter a description such as "My CV for 2010-2011" and then click the "Save" button. Please note that there is a limit on the size of the file you wish to upload of 2000 Kilobytes (2 Megabytes). This should accommodate most CVs in Microsoft Word or PDF format.

College of Arts and Sciences: Annual Report System

Status Page

The status page allows you to indicate whether or not you are have completed the annual report:

Click the appropriate choice of "In Progress" or "Complete" and then save the choice by clicking "Save and continue". This status is used to inform your department and the college that you are done with your report for the current reporting period. It should be noted that you are still able to make changes to your report even if it is marked as "completed". You may amend your report until the system closes according to the schedule released by the Dean's Office.

Summary Page

The summary page is a reporting page that summarizes all your input into the system for the given report period. An image/link is provided to download the summary in PDF format:

Click the image on the page to download a pdf version of your report. Your report summary is viewable online at anytime even when the reporting period is closed. The "save to pdf" option is provided in case you want a file/print version of your summary.

Getting Help

If a technical issue arises or if you have some question regarding the system, some links are provided near the bottom of every page in the system:

Clicking on the "Request for help" link will produce an email that is sent directly to us (Oasis). If you see an error message, please copy and paste it into the email along with some description of what you were trying to do (I typed in my response to the questions and clicked the save button and bam there's an error message). If you have a question on how to use the system please ask that in your email.

If you have feedback regarding the system itself, click the "Feedback" link. This will send an email to Oasis management who will address your comments or concerns.

Logging Off

A link is provided on the upper right hand corner of all pages. Clicking it will present you with a choice of "Quitting" or "Signing Out":

The distinction is explained in the box. The bottom line is that if you plan on doing some more work on the annual report system, choose "quit" instead of "sign out".

TONIGHT -- Tuesday April 19th at 8pm in the Richard White Auditorium (East Campus):
The Modern Cinemas of the Middle East series concludes with:

Women Without Men

(Shirin Neshat and Shoja Azari, 2009, 95 min, Iran, English & Persian w/ English Subtitles, Color, DVD)

Against the tumultuous backdrop of Iran's 1953 CIA-backed coup d'état, the destinies of four women converge in a beautiful orchard garden, where they find independence, solace and companionship. Adapted from Shahrnoush Parsipour's novel of the same name.

-- Winner of the Silver Lion and the UNICEF Award at the 2009 Venice Film Festival!
With this debut feature, the photographer-turned-director Shirin Neshat has made a picture with vision, poetry, sexual frankness and historical sinew.

GAIL DINES

SEX(ISM), IDENTITY AND INTIMACY IN PORNOGRAPHY CULTURE

lecture and presentation of the 2011 Women's Advocacy Awards

From Internet pornography to MTV, popular culture bombards us with sexualized images of idealized women and men, and conveys powerful messages that help shape our sexuality. These pictures jump off the screen and into our culture and are now so commonplace that they seep into our gender identity, our body image and especially our intimate relationships. The result is not a more liberated, edgy sexuality, but a mass produced vision of sex that is profoundly sexist—a vision that limits our ability to create authentic, equal relationships that are free of violence and degradation. In this powerful multi-media presentation, Dr. Gail Dines uses examples from pornography, magazines, television shows, and movies to explore how masculinity and femininity are shaped by a consumer-driven image-based culture, and the ways public images spill over into our most private worlds.

Julius,
I hope all is well and you are feeling better. I'm writing to see if you would be able to write a short piece about Ann Dunbar for the newsletter. We would like to include information about her contributions to the department and the university, as well as her teaching and professional accomplishments. Please let me know if you would be able to send something by next Monday.
