- The application of these principles is often complicated, in part because of the complexity of underlying legal analysis and because of the need to apply applicable policies to nuanced facts. For example, the academic freedom of individual faculty members and students is to some extent rooted in the First Amendment (which protects against abuse of free speech rights by government entities such as public universities but not to action by private parties). The statements of the Association of American University Professors (an organization founded in the wake of events at Stanford University early in the 20th century, when Mrs. Leland Stanford caused the dismissal of a noted economics professor Edward Lovejoy with whose views she disagreed) have been widely endorsed by academic organizations. They reflect a "professional standard" that is regarded as a statement of good practice within the academy, and thus has policy significance (but not necessarily legal significance) even when the First Amendment might not have application. At the same time, however, most colleges and universities around the country have adopted policies and tenure regulations that incorporate the AAUP standard and in turn give rise to contractual rights and rights to due process hearings by those protected under such policies.

- Longstanding expectations about university autonomy and academic freedom have been challenged in recent years on a number of fronts. For example, David Horowitz and others have argued that legislation called the "Academic Bill of Rights" should be adopted by state legislatures in order to force universities to weigh political ideology as part of their hiring practices and to provide additional legal protection to students who fear that they may be receive poor grades based on ideological views. Several organizations such as Students for Academic Freedom and Campus Watch have also established websites that encourage students to report or "blacklist" their professors based on listed criteria. An initiative by a UCLA alumnus to pay students to record and submit details of classroom conversations was withdrawn in the face of legal challenge.

- There are also instances in which faculty members have also been disciplined or dismissed notwithstanding the protections of academic freedom. For example, a professor at the University of Colorado who made what many regard as irresponsible comments about the 9/11 terrorist attacks was subsequently found by an academic panel to have engaged in research misconduct. That university also recently conducted an extensive review in order to improve its policies on tenure and post-tenure review. Universities are also facing calls for greater public accountability from government leaders including the United States Department of Education and Congress. While academic institutions have traditionally been accorded great autonomy in setting academic standards and making operational decisions, growing concern to curb college costs and increase student learning and graduate rates may put these traditions to the test.

Liberal Education and the Curriculum

Faculty viewpoints on the role of religion and spirituality within the college classroom can also be discerned through academic decisions relating to nature of liberal education and the characteristics of the undergraduate curriculum.

- The American Association of Colleges and Universities defines "liberal education" as "a philosophy of education that empowers individuals with broad knowledge and transferable skills, and a strong sense of values, ethics, and civic engagement." In a 1998 statement, the Association expressed the goals of a liberal education in the following terms:

  > A truly liberal education is one that prepares us to live responsible, productive, and creative lives in a dramatically changing world. It is an education that fosters a well-grounded intellectual resilience, a disposition toward lifelong learning, and an acceptance of responsibility for the ethical consequences of our ideas and actions. Liberal education requires that we understand the foundations of knowledge and inquiry about nature, culture and society; that we master core skills of perception, analysis, and expression; that we cultivate a respect for truth; that we recognize the importance of historical and cultural context; and that we explore connections among formal learning, citizenship, and service to our communities. … Because liberal learning aims to free us from the constraints of ignorance, sectarianism, and myopia, it prizes curiosity and seeks to expand the boundaries of human knowledge. By its nature, therefore, liberal learning is global and pluralistic. It embraces the diversity of ideas and experiences that characterize the social, natural, and intellectual world. To acknowledge such diversity in all its forms is both an intellectual commitment and a social responsibility, for nothing less will equip us to understand our world and to pursue fruitful lives.

- Most colleges and universities adopt and periodically review general education requirements governing undergraduate study as a means of providing students with a shared foundation to guide their overall intellectual development. General education requirements often mandate that students take courses emphasizing moral reasoning, philosophy, history, cultural diversity, public policy, international affairs, psychology, sociology, literature, art or music and many other subjects in order to provide students with exposure to varied ways of thinking and a wide range of ideas. Many such courses touch at some point on the nature and role of faith and religion in the contexts in connection with the topics under consideration.

- Colleges and universities have increasingly incorporated "perspectives" or "diversity" requirements as part of their general education requirements to aid students in preparing for a complex world marked by increasing interchange among those from cultures that vary in language, history, political and religious beliefs and to bring to light the experiences of those who have often been burdened by historical injustice. In the humanities and social sciences, for example, critical analysis has thrown the spotlight on personal identity and scholars have increasingly examined the hidden history of people of color and women and the implications of sexual orientation. Developments in the sciences are also proceeding at a rapid pace. Biological sciences now rely heavily on findings rooted in modern understandings of natural selection and evolution, and new scientific discoveries raise important questions regarding the role of stem-cell research and the nature of the human genome. Expansion of the traditional "canon" to include topics outside students' prior experience with Western culture, local communities, and religious tenets may prove unsettling to those with deeply held traditional values and cultural views.

The World beyond the Campus

There can be little doubt that forces beyond campus walls influence the realities of American college campuses. These realties are therefore worth considering.

American Beliefs about Faith

The United States is a highly religious nation. A Gallup Poll conducted in December 2005 reported that 79% of American respondents said they were convinced that God exists, while an additional 12% said that they think God probably exists but have a little doubt. Regional differences were apparent, with 88% of Southerners expressing certainty about the existence of God, compared to 70% of Easterners, 71% of Westerners, and 77% of respondents from the Midwest. Those who attended church on a weekly basis were particularly likely to be certain God exists (94%) but 61% of those who seldom or never attended expressed similar sentiments. In contrast, however, a CBS News Poll conducted in April 2006, asked respondents whether they believed that traditional religions could answer all or most of today's problems or whether they were largely old-fashioned and out of date. Just over half (54%) of respondents said that traditional religions can answer such problems, while 32% said such religions are old-fashioned and 14% said they didn't know or didn't answer. The same poll also asked respondents how important religious was to their daily lives, and found that 26% of respondents regarded it as extremely important, 33% as very important, 26% as somewhat important, 13% as not at all important, with 2% saying they didn't know or giving no answer.

The United States Census does not collect information on religious affiliation so denominational information must be found by other means. The World Fact Book 2005 indicates that the American population is divided as follows: Protestant 52%, Roman Catholic 24%, Mormon 2%, Jewish 1%, Muslim 1%, other 10%, none 10% (2002 est.). The American Religious Identification Survey conducted using phone surveys by the researchers affiliated with the City University of New York in 2001 found that the proportion of those self-identifying as Christian had declined from 86.2% in 1990 to 76.5% in 2001. In 2001, 1.3% self-identified as Jewish, .5% as Muslim, .5% as Buddhist, .3% as Unitarian/Universalist, and .4% as Hindu. Others self-identified as atheists 9.4%), agnostic (0.5%) or refused to respond (5.4%). More nuanced polls have recently been conducted of those who are affiliated with Christian faiths. A poll conducted for National Public Radio in July 2006 of likely voters in the fall 2006 election found that 12% identified themselves as fundamentalist, 21% evangelical, 10% as charismatic/Pentecostal, 42% as moderate to liberal, 5% as something else, and 11% as unwilling to respond (or responding "don't know").

In contrast, to the United States, the 2005 World Fact Book reported that in the United Kingdom, the proportions are: Christian (Anglican, Roman Catholic, Presbyterian, Methodist) 71.6%, Muslim 2.7%, Hindu 1%, other 1.6%, unspecified or none 23.1% (2001 census). In France, the proportions are: Roman Catholic 83%-88%, Protestant 2%, Jewish 1%, Muslim 5%-10%, unaffiliated 4%. In Canada the proportions are: Roman Catholic 42.6%, Protestant 23.3% (including United Church 9.5%, Anglican 6.8%, Baptist 2.4%, Lutheran 2%), other Christian 4.4%, Muslim 1.9%, other and unspecified 11.8%, none 16% (2001 census).

Deeper insight about Americans' faith-based viewpoints can also be derived from public opinion polls and similar studies.

- Views on the role of the Bible and the relationship between religious belief and science vary. In Gallup surveys completed in May 2006, 28% of respondents indicated that they believed that the Bible is the actual word of god and is to be taken literally word for word; 49% said that it was the inspired word of God but not everything in it should be taken literally, and 19% regarded it as an ancient book of fables, legends, history, and moral precepts recorded by man. When asked about their views on the origin and development of human beings, 36% of respondents said that man developed over millions of years with God guiding the process, 13% said man developed over millions of years but God had no part in the process, 46% said that God had created man in his present form, and 5% gave other or no opinion. An April 2006 CBS news poll found that 26% of respondents believed the science and religion agreed with each other, 32% said they generally conflict with each other, 37% said they were not related in a meaningful way, and 5% said they didn't know or gave no answer.

- Americans' views of those affiliated with different religious beliefs vary. A July 2005 study by the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Affairs reported the following patterns regarding how favorably they viewed the following religions: Jews (77% favorable, 7% unfavorable, 16% no opinion); Catholics (73% favorable, 14% unfavorable, 13% no opinion), Evangelical Christians (57% favorable, 19% unfavorable, 24% no opinion), Muslim-Americans (55% favorable, 25% unfavorable, 20% no opinion), and atheists (35% favorable, 50% unfavorable, 15% no opinion).

- Americans' beliefs also appear to contrast with the views of Europeans. A June 2006 report by the Pew Research Center explained that in 2002 60% of Americans thought that belief in God is necessary in order "to be moral and have good values" (slightly smaller proportions expressed that view in 2004). In contrast in 2002 only 1/3 of German and 1/8 of French respondents expressed similar views. A survey conducted in connection with the Spring 2005 Pew Global Attitudes Project found, for example, a substantially higher proportion of respondents from Great Britain viewed Muslims favorably (compared to 72% favorable v. 57% favorable by respondents from the United States and 40% favorable by respondents from Germany).

- Americans' exposure to the religions beliefs and practices of others' also appears limited. A June 2005 poll by CBS News asked respondents whether any of their close friends or family members who were of a different religion had introduced them to different teachings or philosophies that had become part of their own religious or spiritual practices. Of those responding, 23% said yes, 48% said no, 18% said they had no close friends or family members of other religions, 10% said religion wasn't important to them, and 1% said they didn't know or declined to answer.

- Americans also appear to associate religion in certain respects with conflict. In a July 2005 poll by the Pew Research Center for People and the Press, respondents were asked how much of a role religion plays in causing most wars and conflicts in the world. Responses indicated that 40% believed that religion caused a great deal of conflict, 35% a fair amount, 13% only a little, 8% not at all, and 4% refused or said they didn't know. When asked a similar question about the role religion plays in causing political conflict in the United States, 30% responded that it caused a great deal of conflict, 35% said a fair amount, 27% said only a little, 4% said none at all, and 4% said they didn't know or refused to respond.

Legal Principles and Historical Perspectives

Americans are clearly a religious people. Significantly, however, the American constitutional experiment provided for the separation of church and state, a deliberate and unique departure from prior European tradition.

- The First Amendment states that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." The Founders thus rejected the European tradition that taxed all to support a single nationally-affiliated church, and sought to avoid sectarian strife that would likely arise from jockeying among the different religious affiliations prominent in the various states. They also barred government from intruding on individual religious beliefs and thereby protected freedom of conscience. These provisions of the United States Constitution have also been applied to the states, and many states have independently codified protections relation to religion as part of their state constitutions.

- It is helpful to bring a historical perspective to bear in considering how the law in this area has developed and might develop in the future. In his recent book Divided by God (Oxford University Press, 2005) and related writing in the New York Times, NYU Professor Noah Feldman has discussed the core dilemma created by the American constitutional experiment with the relationship between church and state: how to negotiate "the challenge of preserving the unity of the sovereign people in the face of their flourishing spiritual variety and often conflicting religious needs." Feldman traces the waves of immigration that have brought changing patterns of religious diversity to American shores, such as the 19th century influx of Catholics raised issues regarding the underlying tenets of public schools and the potential for funding parochial education that inculcated religious values. He also highlights critical world events such as World War II and the Holocaust which highlighted the risk that religious minorities can suffer discrimination or even persecution when the German government adopted a stance favoring Christianity and opposing those of Jewish faith. Through it all, Feldman believes, we acknowledge our religious diversity while at the same time "we strive to be a nation with a common identity and a common project."

- In Feldman's view, current tensions reflect two conflicting viewpoints about the proper relationship of religion and government On the one hand some people believe that "the right answers to questions of government policy must come from the wisdom of religious tradition." Feldman calls those who share this view "values evangelicals" and explains that "Not every values evangelical is, technically speaking, an evangelical or a born-again Christian, although many are. Values evangelicals include Jews, Catholics, Muslims and even people who do not focus on a particular religious tradition but care primarily about identifying traditional moral values that can in theory be shared by everyone." Feldman believes that "What all values evangelicals have in common is the goal of evangelizing for values: promoting a strong set of ideas about the best way to live your life and urging the government to adopt those values and encourage them wherever possible. To them, the best way to hold the United States together as a nation, not just a country, is for us to know what values we really hold and to stand up for them." Feldman characterizes the second competing viewpoint as one held by "legal secularists" who "see religion as a matter of personal belief and choice largely irrelevant to government and who are concerned that values derived from religion will divide us, not unite us." Such "legal secularists" may be active members of various religious faiths, but believe that government should be secular and be bounded by related legal constraints. According to Feldman, "legal secularists" believe that "full citizenship means fully sharing in the legal and political commitments of the nation. If the nation defines itself in terms of values drawn from religion, they worry, then it will inevitably tend to adopt the religious values of the majority, excluding religious minorities and nonreligious people from full citizenship."

- Feldman believes that neither "values evangelicals" nor "legal secularists" have been very effective in negotiating the core tension between the American desire to recognize religious diversity while also maintaining a sense of unity, particularly in the days since 9/11. In his view, the "values evangelicals want to find shared values, but that leads them to rely on the unexamined assumption that deep down, Americans agree on what matters. The trouble is that 'we' often do not agree." Such disagreement is particularly apparent on issues such as abortion where "values evangelicals" believe that they must stand for something and are generally unwilling to recognize that those with competing views may have legitimate claims to make decisions of their own. On the other hand, the belief by "legal secularists" that religious expression must be removed from the public sphere in order to make those of all faiths and viewpoints welcome has resulted in pressure to keep religious views private or at least outside of public settings associated with government (a matter of concern for example, for those who wish to see the Ten Commandments or Christmas crèches displayed). Banishing religious expressions from the public eye has in Feldman's view made "values evangelicals" feel excluded and undercut the hunger for public expression of shared values, even though that is not the intent. These underlying tensions have been fueled in part by confusing legal developments that have reversed the original intent of the Constitution's provisions on religion by eliminating religious expression in many public settings while at the same time allowing funding of faith-based activities (for example, attendance at religiously-affiliated schools using publicly-funded vouchers and allocation of government funds to religious groups as well as secular non-profit organizations in order to accomplish government objectives).

- Litigation involving the public schools has illustrated the complex application of legal precepts embodied in the First Amendment's "free exercise" and "establishment" clauses when applied to educational settings. One of the fundamental legal tests applied in this setting is that articulated in Lemon v. Kurtz, a 1971 decision by the United States Supreme Court that required government decisions in the schools to be motivated by a secular purpose, to have primarily secular effects and not to entangle the state with religious institutions. Applying this and other tests in ensuing years, the courts have addressed numerous issues. For example, cases have addressed school prayer and moments of silence (permissible if students opt to do so but not permissible if mandated), school-sponsored prayer in public settings (impermissible), religious expression by teachers in classrooms (may be deemed officially sanctioned and impermissible especially with younger students), use of school space for religiously affiliated student organizations (permissible under generally applicable neutral policies), release time for religiously-associated education off-site (permissible), required display of the Ten Commandments in school rooms (impermissible), instruction about religion (permissible), and distribution of flyers (permissible to include information relating to religious activities but impermissible for schools to screen content so as to prohibit religious content if unfettered discretion). Courts have also entered the fray in the "intelligent design" v. evolution controversy, most recently finding that mandates to teach intelligent design represented an impermissible effort to incorporate religious doctrine in the classroom. Many efforts have been made to distill more detailed guidelines from this evolving case law including efforts by the federal Department of Education (http://www.ed.gov/policy/gen/guid/religionandschools/prayer_guidance.html), a group of 17 organizations across the spectrum of faith-based and civil-liberties organizations (http://www.church-state.org/ritps-ajscl.htm), and organizations of journalists such as the Freedom Forum and its affiliated First Amendment Center at Vanderbilt University (http://www.firstamendmentcenter.org/rel_liberty/publicschools/Index.aspx).

- Colleges and universities have also faced litigation about the implications of the Constitution's religion clauses and related "free speech" provisions. For example, the United States Supreme Court has held that a public university must make campus facilities available to student religious groups in the same way and to the same extent that it makes its space available to non-religious student organizations. Public universities must also make student fees available on the same basis for student groups whether they have sponsor or support religious and non-religious activities. On the other hand, the United States Supreme Court has concluded that public universities may deny scholarship funds to college students majoring in theology, in situations where state constitutional provisions dictate such separation (through the Washington "Blaine Amendment" that states that "No public money or property shall be appropriated or applied to any religious worship, exercise or instruction, or the support of any religious establishment"). Current controversies have focused on such issues as the legality of public universities' efforts to limit recognition of student organizations which refuse to comply with non-discrimination policies on the basis of religious beliefs that object to homosexuality or that require that leadership positions be filled by those who comply with certain religious tenets. A variety of organizations have endeavored to keep universities on their toes with regard to civil liberties relating to speech and religious liberty. Such organizations have provided extensive information to interested individuals for example, though the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (http://www.thefire.org/index.php) and the Anti-Defamation League (http://www.adl.org/civil_rights/ab/free_Exer.asp) among others.

- The First Amendment also affords relevant protections beyond those found in the "free exercise" and "establishment" clauses. It also states that "Congress shall make no law ... abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble." The courts have interpreted these and other constitutional provisions to apply to the states and have also concluded that they protect freedom of association in intimate, expressive, and political contexts. These freedoms have some limitations, however. For example, the courts have said that freedom of speech does not allow someone to "cry fire in a crowded theatre" or to use "fighting words." The right to express oneself may depend on whether the setting for such expression has been established or treated as a "public forum," and whether the governmental entity has established reasonable, content-neutral "time, place, and manner" restrictions.

- Once again, the application of these additional First Amendment freedoms to public university campuses is more complex than might initially appear. For example, the University of Michigan had adopted a "speech code" that prohibited "Any behavior, verbal or physical, that stigmatizes or victimizes an individual on the basis of race, ethnicity, religion, sex, sexual orientation, creed … and that … Creates an intimidating, hostile, or demeaning environment for educational pursuits, employment or participation in University[-]sponsored extra-curricular activities." In a guide explaining its code, the university provided several examples of conduct that it regarded as harassment, such as "You exclude someone from a study group because that person is of a different race, sex, or ethnic origin than you are; …You display a confederate flag on the door of your room in your residence hall; …"You comment in a derogatory way about a particular person or group's physical appearance or sexual orientation, or their cultural origins, or religious beliefs." In 1989, a lower federal court found this policy to be vague and overbroad. In 1991, a University of Wisconsin policy that prohibited addressing a specific individual with "racist or discriminatory comments" was also struck down by a lower federal court because the policy was not narrowly enough stated to prohibit only "fighting words."

- Some colleges have endeavored to establish "free speech zones" in order to situate student protests, allow students to distribute flyers, and hold gatherings in areas that would not disrupt classes. This approach has brought challenges at West Virginia University and New Mexico State University in instances in which the designated areas for such activity were very small. Public universities also face issues regarding the rights of the student press on their campuses. The United States Supreme Court has held that in the context of public high schools, school administrators can treat a student newspaper as a "non-public forum" and can punish or censor students for their expression if necessary for educational reasons. It specifically reserved the question of the status of college newspapers. More recently a lower federal court has said that subsidized college student newspapers should be subject to the same legal framework as applicable in high schools. The United States Supreme Court declined to review the case, and some state legislatures are currently reviewing proposals to provide statutory protections to college student newspapers. Colleges are not, however, required to fund student papers.

While the First Amendment thus restrains government in a number of important ways it does not preclude other actions that interject religious belief or affiliation into the political arena.

Political Realities

The American electorate appears to have grown increasingly polarized and profoundly divided in recent years, with divergent religious beliefs and moral judgments playing significant roles in these developments.

- A study published in 2005 by the non-partisan research organization, Public Agenda, tracked changing attitudes relating to religion and politics over the four years from 2000 to 2004 (just prior to the 2004 Presidential election). One of the survey questions asked whether respondents agreed with the following statement: "Even elected officials who are deeply religious sometimes have to make compromises and set their conflictions aside to get results while in government." In 2000 84% of the general population, 82% of those who attended religious services once a week, and 79% of evangelicals agreed with the statement, but in 2004, only 74% of the general public, only 63% of those who attended services once a week, and only 63% of evangelicals agreed (representing a drop of 10%, 19% and 16% respectively). Another question asked whether respondents believed that deeply religious people should keep their faith private, be very careful about "spreading the word of God" so as not to offend others, or "spread the word of God whenever they can." In 2000, 18% of respondents said that deeply religious people should keep their faith private, while 46% said that people with such beliefs should be very careful, and 35% said that they should spread the word actively. By 2004, the total of those who believed that people should keep their faith private or proceed carefully had dropped to 57% and the number who believed that they should spread the word of God whenever they could rose to 41%.

- In 2005, the Pew Center for Religion and Public Life found that the closely-contested 2004 President election had been marked by a deep faith-based partisan divide. More specifically, they concluded that "Americans who regularly attend worship services and hold traditional religious views increasingly vote Republican, while those who are less connected to religious institutions and more secular in their outlook tend to outlook tend to vote Democratic." In addition, "traditionalists" affiliated with evangelical, mainline Protestant, and Catholic beliefs were particularly inclined to vote Republican, suggesting that the strong partisan divide was "defined by religious outlook rather than denominational labels."

- The Pew study also found that the most important cause of the church attendance gap was the "mix of social and cultural issues that have come to the fore in the modern era" including prayer in schools, abortion, homosexuality, and gay marriage which had a tendency to "push the religiously observant into one political corner and the more secular into the other." Regional differences have also contributed, with a "broad shift to the GOP among white voters in the Evangelical-heavy South." The Pew study cited poll data indicating that "more than 70% Americans want their president to have strong religious beliefs," while "only a quarter of voters said that politicians 'mention religious faith and prayer too much.'" At the same time 65% of poll respondents said they thought that churches should not endorse political candidates.

- Academic observers have debated whether shifts represent a form of "culture war" that will endure or change in coming days. At a recent forum conducted by the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life, Professors Alan Wolfe and James Davison Hunter highlighted competing viewpoints more fully aired in their new book, Is There a Culture War: A Dialogue on Values and American Public Life (Brookings Institution Press, 2006). Several important questions are worth considering such as: Does a small proportion of Americans (elites on both the left and right of the political spectrum) fuel the divide? What can be said about those situated in the vast center? Is there a growing tendency for religious denominations to splinter along ideological lines? Will there be a return to inter-religious conflicts rather than intra-religious conflicts? Will people of faith conclude that close alliance with political forces is inadvisable in the long run? Other scholars such as Pietro Nivola of the Brookings Institute have suggested that there are a variety of forces that contribute to America's polarization. While religion is one of these forces, others must be considered, including historical circumstances, regional political realignments, parity between the major political parties, the role of the media in fueling an artificial frenzy of attacks and counter-attacks, the tendency of new media and internet communication to provide more vehicles for ideological viewpoints to be expressed and find those of like minds, changing norms of civility, gerrymandering, and the nature of political primaries.

America's "Civil Religion" and Current Challenges

- Robert Bellah, the noted sociologist of religion who authored Habits of the Heart, a study of American values and patterns of interaction in a simpler day, has suggested that developments in the wake of the 9/11 terrorist attacks have deeply challenged Americans' sense of themselves and their country. In his view, an American "civil religion" has characterized America's earlier history. (The term is one term used by Rousseau to connote "the existence of God, the life to come, the reward of virtue and the punishment of vice, and the exclusion of religious intolerance"). In Bellah's view, this "religion" does not correspond to or substitute for Christianity but instead facilitated a "wide sphere of personal piety and voluntary social action… left to the churches… [which] were neither to control the state nor to be controlled by it."

- According to Bellah, America's "civic religion" faced its first crisis during the war for independence, and a second a crucial challenge at the time of the Civil War when the country had to face fundamental questions about slavery and its implications for the nation's core values. At that time, Bellah believes, the "theme of sacrifice was indelibly written into the civic religion." Now, in Bellah's view, the country stands at a third great crisis in which is must confront "the problem of responsible action in a revolutionary world, a world seeking to attain many of the things, material and spiritual that we [Americans] already have attained." For Bellah, the challenge that confronts Americans and our civil religion is how we will use our power and whether we will be able to contribute in a meaningful way to the "attainment of some kind of viable and coherent world order" built upon "an awareness that our nation stands under higher judgment." For Bellah, successful navigation of this third challenge would depend on the recognition that "the American civil religion is not the worship of the American nation but an understanding of the American experience in the light of ultimate and university reality, [resulting in a] reorganization [that] that need not disrupt the American civil religion's continuity" but could instead contribute to a better world beyond our shores.

Part II: CHOICES:

What should we (faculty, students, staff of a public university) do in the face of such tensions?

When it comes to personal faith and conscience: how, when, where, and with whom can we speak our minds on a public university campus?

In the section that follows, four possible approaches are outlined that allow considered discussion about the issues presented in the background reading above. These approaches were developed through repeated discussions that sought to "frame" a core question about what is currently troubling us on public university campuses, and to provide fair-minded alternatives that address some of our concerns. These are not the only alternatives, and there are likely to be ways in which those using this discussion guide will agree and disagree with each. They are presented in this format to facilitate careful consideration of multiple, authentic viewpoints in a deliberate way that informs and enlightens us.

Four principal approaches follow:

Approach 1: Pursue questions of personal faith and conscience in private and maintain the university's neutrality.
Approach 2: Enhance student options and engage outside the classroom.
Approach 3: Engage personal faith and conscience in the classroom, respectfully, if faculty choose
Approach 4: Engage questions of faith and conscience widely, actively, and deliberately

The materials that follow develop each of these approaches though a more detailed description, enumeration of pros and cons, references to the background reading, and presentation of illustrative scenarios drawn from real life.

Please probe and weigh these alternative approaches, but remember that the point of this discussion is to illuminate rather than to score debating points or to resolve things by a formal vote. You will also have an opportunity to suggest additional approaches toward the end of this conversation.

APPROACH 1
PURSUE IN PRIVATE AND MAINTAIN UNIVERSITY NEUTRALITY

Description: Speech about personal faith and conscience belongs in private settings or off campus, in keeping with public universities' secular character and obligations of neutrality. Under this approach, individual students and faculty who wish to explore faith-based beliefs and judgments of conscience could do so in private settings with friends and family, in faith-based communities, or in other groups. The university would respect the desire of community members to engage in such discussions, but would not make special efforts to encourage or discourage such discussions. Thus, students and faculty could continue to discuss such their beliefs and views over coffee, or attend gatherings or services with whomever they choose. The university as an institution would maintain its historical neutrality rather than giving more attention to faith-based beliefs or matters of conscience.

Pros: Those who support this approach tend to emphasize the following ideas in support of their views.

- Personal faith-based beliefs and judgments of conscience arise in the innermost hearts and minds of individuals. They're something that should be protected from intrusion and thus should best be addressed in settings that are private and voluntary, as has traditionally be the practice.
- Some students say that they're most comfortable in talking with peers about faith-based beliefs and judgments of conscience when they can do so very informally with those they trust in private settings.
- Many opportunities exist to explore faith-based and conscience-based viewpoints in private conversations with friends and family members, in churches and synagogues, or in other faith-based or community groups. Universities lack relevant expertise and should defer to others in these settings. In light of these options, there's no need for public universities to intervene.
- Public universities should focus on academic matters that are more properly within their expertise and should steer clear or involvement with matters of faith and conscience as they affect individual members of university communities. As a matter of policy, it's best to maintain neutrality in this arena and attempt to steer clear of the "culture wars" that trouble the larger society.
- Constitutional principles relating to the "wall" between church and state should be observed. Members of the public who are taxed to fund public universities expect that such institutions will observe legal requirements relating to separation of church and state, much as they expect such neutrality from public elementary and secondary schools. Faculty and students likewise choose public universities with a full understanding that they are different from other colleges and universities with faith-based affiliations.

Cons. Those who disagree with this approach tend to emphasize concerns such as the following:

- Personal faith and conscience cannot be readily separated from day-to-day life so this approach is artificial and impractical.
- Many students and faculty have deeply held beliefs rooted in personal faith and conscience and this approach would make the campus less hospitable and welcoming for them.
- Artificial efforts to encourage discussions of personal faith and conscience primarily in private settings marginalize such questions. Requiring discussion of personal faith and conscience to take place elsewhere is anti-intellectual since these are important topics that need to be engaged when they arise.
- Critical issues facing society are the proper subject of intellectual inquiry within university settings. Faculty members currently cover topics that raise issues of personal faith and conscience when relevant to their subject matter. More emphatic emphasis on neutrality might make it difficult for them to pursue the issues that they believe in their best judgment are appropriate, and might impinge on the academic freedom of them and their students.
- The "wall" between church and state is not clearly delineated. It is likely that conflicts will arise whether or not the university attempts to embrace "neutrality." The tensions found in the larger society will lead to litigation involving public universities whatever they do.

Particularly Relevant Reading: Approach 1

- Background on student religious affiliations and spirituality, teenage trends, political viewpoints
- Background on disciplinary perspectives and faculty viewpoints
- Background on American beliefs about faith, legal principles, historical perspectives, and political realities

Scenarios for Discussion: Approach 1

A. Admissions Decisions. A college admissions officer is facing a difficult decision in evaluating several prospective undergraduates' high school transcripts. One student had attended a religiously-oriented high school and sought to apply three courses toward required basic admissions requirements in English, history and government: "Christianity and Morality in American Literature," "Christianity's Influence on American History" and "Special Providence: American Government". Another student's transcript included courses on "Race, Class, and Gender in Modern America," "Feminist Issues throughout U.S. History," and "Introduction to Jewish Thought" toward the high school credits required (though not in required areas such as English, history, and government). (based on issues facing UC-Davis)

B. Personal Advice: A faculty member in a technical field is devout and reveals his own religious background to students on the first day of class. Many of the students write on their information sheets that one of their life goals is to develop a closer relationship with God. In a public forum on religion in his department, he asked whether it would be appropriate for him to suggest prayer to those struggling students who have revealed to him their own desire to connect to God. (based on University of Michigan "Difficult Dialogues" scenario).

C. Living and Learning. A resident adviser at the university has contacted students on her dorm floor inviting them to attend a study group she's created on Buddhism. Other students have decided to organize a standing dinner discussion group at the campus cafeteria to discuss Islam. (based in part on example from UW-Eau Claire)

APPROACH 2
ENHANCE STUDENT OPTIONS AND ENGAGE OUTSIDE THE CLASSROOM

Description: Students should have ample opportunities to explore issues of personal faith and conscience if they choose to do so, but such opportunities should be situated primarily outside the classroom. Consideration of such matters is particularly important during the college years. Many students express serious interest in developing meaningful philosophies of life and in deepening their sense of spirituality. The most suitable setting for such exploration lies outside the standard classroom so that students express their own beliefs without discomfiting challenges from professors and classmates in more formal settings. At the same time, students be provided with support structures and varied occasions in which issues of faith and conscience can be explored. Students could work with those involved in student affairs on campuses to develop additional supportive strategies, for example through public service options, housing choices, additional campus programming, leadership development programs, counseling opportunities, or "safe zone" training.

Pros.

- Students have important educational and developmental needs related to faith and conscience, and should have meaningful opportunities to work with these issues on campus rather than having to pursue them elsewhere.
- This approach allows campus ministries and student organizations to take leadership and to share their expertise, and respects the academic freedom of faculty to address other subjects in the classroom.
- Speech about personal faith and conscience on campus is best situated outside the classroom where faculty are not involved in judging or grading students' views.
- This approach accommodates the views of all members of the campus community, including those of varying faith-based traditions and those who are agnostic, atheistic, or non-religious.
- This approach emphasizes the potential for creative initiatives led by students in order to meet their most substantial interests and needs.

Cons

- People of faith who oppose compartmentalization might find this approach artificial since it precludes conversations about personal faith and conscience in the classroom.
- Faculty who wish to address such issues in the classroom might feel that this approach marginalizes opportunities for engaging with pressing issues in the classroom, or creates false impressions that addressing relevant issues in the classroom is undesirable.
- Those who have a very evangelistic view of their faith and wish to express it in all aspects of their life may believe the university is cutting into or policing their faith by encouraging discussions to be held outside the classroom rather than in classroom settings.
- Giving personal faith and belief an institutional place on campus in non-classroom settings might be seen by some as intruding on the principle of university neutrality.
- Students and student affairs professionals may find it difficult and uncomfortable to deal with the kinds of conflicts and contention that increasingly characterize religious and political debates going on outside campus walls.

Particularly Relevant Reading: Approach 2

- Background on student spirituality, intellectual and moral development
- Background on spirituality and the professoriate,
- Background on American beliefs about faith, legal principles, historical perspectives, and political realities

Scenarios for Discussion: Approach 2

D. Student Speaker. An elected student government leader has been asked to give a welcoming speech to incoming students at a public university. He urges them to set their sights high and goes on to say that he has accepted Christ as his savior and hopes they will as well. Other students criticized his actions, saying he had been elected to represent the whole student body, including those of diverse faith-related viewpoints. (based on Dartmouth incident)

E. Student Organizations. A university requires every student organization wishing to use university facilities and receive student fees in support of its activities to sign a pledge stating that the organization will not discriminate in its membership based on race, ethnicity, gender, creed, religion, nationality, age, disability, or sexual orientation. A student group affiliated with a particular religious sect refused to sign the statement, saying that its mission required it to admit only those who shared a particular religious faith. The group also approached Student Congress and requested funding for a proposed new student publication designed to encourage others to adopt the faith of its members. (based on examples at UNC-CH, and elsewhere)

F. Residence Hall Choices. A group of students has asked the university to establish a special dorm "theme floor" for students who are Roman Catholics or interested in Roman Catholicism. An evangelical Christian group has met with the dean of students and student government officers to demand that rules that currently prohibit solicitation in dormitories be changed so that their members can go door-to-door to distribute leaflets and talk with students living there about their beliefs. (based in part on example from UW-Madison).

APPROACH 3
ENGAGE PERSONAL FAITH AND CONSCIENCE IN THE CLASSROOM, RESPECTFULLY, IF FACULTY CHOOSE

Description. Speech about personal faith and conscience may occur on campus, including in the classroom, if conducted respectfully and if the professor believes it relevant. Some faculty members teach about topics that are directly relevant to personal faith and conscience, for example in courses in the sciences, literature, philosophy, public policy, gender and queer studies, history, journalism, political science, social work, nursing and medicine. Students would receive a poorer education if issues with implications for personal faith and conscience were not raised and addressed with a critical eye and an open mind in settings such as these. Faculty members have expertise in judging the relevance of topics and the best pedagogical techniques for exploring them. They should therefore be accorded considerable flexibility, in keeping with academic freedom principles, to determine when and in what ways issues of faith and conscience should be engaged. To encourage effective educational engagement in such settings, particularly in contentious times, faculty members should be provided with more extensive faculty development opportunities that help build skill in dealing with controversy in the classroom, and should be able to receive clear answers about their rights and responsibilities in such contexts. Students should also be given opportunities for training in handling "difficult dialogues" in the classroom so that they can actively participate and feel comfortable in doing so. Universities which believe that providing meaningful education on issues that intersect with personal faith and conscience might also find ways to encourage faculty members to incorporate such topics in their classes if relevant, and to flag classes raising such classes so that interested students can more readily enroll.

Pros.

- Faculty members whose courses touch on matters of faith and conscience should have the opportunity to introduce such topics as they believe relevant and wise.
- Classroom discussions provide for powerful learning opportunities by linking teaching with learning that takes place both inside and outside the classroom
- Inclusion of such discussions in the classroom allows faculty and students to engage with each other authentically rather than artificially separating matters of faith and conscience so as to compartmentalize their lives.
- This approach allows students to engage with faculty members if the students are conversant with their faith and ready to talk about it or are struggling with how their faith relates to issues raised in class.
- This approach is most consistent with universities' educational and intellectual mission, which anticipates active efforts to explore difficult questions and current issues including those relating to personal faith and conscience.

Concerns

- This approach may create blurry lines about what is relevant in class or what responses are "respectful," and leaves these decisions in professors' (rather than students') hands.
- This approach may give rise to expectations of in-class discussions when professors are hard-pressed to cover material in courses as it is or may reasonably believe that such discussions are not relevant or may feel that this approach intrudes upon their academic freedom.
- Professors and students may not be skilled in addressing challenging, hot-button issues where issues of faith and intellectual inquiry collide, so that it may be difficult to conduct such dialogues in ways that foster effective learning.
- Students and professors may feel put on the spot if asked to express their views on issues of this sort.
- This approach may result in faculty and students engaging with issues of faith and conscience in the classroom, when such issues might best be addressed in other settings (such as in student settings, dormitories, faith-based communities or with friends)

Relevant Background Reading: Approach 3

- Background reading regarding student religious affiliations and implications, intellectual and moral development in college, political viewpoints and student values
- Background reading on spirituality and the professoriate, disciplinary frameworks, academic freedom, liberal education and the curriculum
- Background reading on American beliefs about faith, legal principles, historical perspectives, and political perspectives
- Materials available from the UNC Center for Teaching and Learning ("For Your Consideration #21 [Managing Classroom Conflict] and #22 [Teaching Controversial Issues]), available at http://ctl.unc.edu/newctl.html

Scenarios for Discussion: Approach 3

G. Learning to Act. A Mormon woman applied for admission to an actor-training program at a public university. At the time she applied she told program officials that she would not be willing to use profane language or appear in the nude because of her religious beliefs. Initially, when classroom exercises included performing scripts that included profanity, she changed the words. Subsequently, her instructors told her that she needed to perform the scenes as written because copyright words of playwrights could not be changed without written permission for public performances, and because students needed to take on roles with characters unlike themselves (including characters such as a pregnant, unwed prostitute to whose lines the student objected). (based on an incident at the University of Utah).

H. Internship Placement. In a field placement at a faith-based organization, a student became aware that her supervisors understood faith to be an integral part of their patient counseling. The student is from a different faith tradition and not particularly religious. Although she was open to responding to discussions about religion initiated by patients, she felt uncomfortable raising the topic herself as her mentors expected her to do. (based on University of Michigan "Difficult Dialogues" scenario)

I. Recommendation Letter. A student approached the undergraduate adviser in the biology department, and requested a recommendation to medical school. The adviser reviewed her transcript and noted that she had not yet taken a required course in evolutionary biology. The student said that she declined to take the course because of her religious beliefs. The adviser then declined to give the requested recommendation noting that a student who had not taken that course would be poorly prepared for medical school and could not be recommended. (based on incident at Texas Tech)

J. Classroom Dialogues: A group of faculty and students recently began discussing some of the "tips" they'd offer others on dealing with controversy in the classroom. Some of their ideas are listed below. Are there other tips worth noting?
   - ✓ Respect for students is paramount, and it can't be faked. The message should be "feel free to disagree with me and support your point of view." It's important to know students and their backgrounds. It's important to discuss the value of open dialogue and conflict in the marketplace of ideas. Personal discomfort is inevitable are ideas are challenged. That is how we grow and why it is so valuable to engage with different viewpoints in the classroom.
   - ✓ Faculty and students need to work together to create a safe place for open discussion. Some faculty set "ground rules" while others encourage students to reach "group agreements." Students need to know what to expect regarding how controversial topics will be covered. Everyone's perspectives need to be welcomed and treated fairly. Controversial issues can be honored by covering different perspectives. Be sure students know the difference between personal attacks and honest discussion of one's own experiences, values and ideas. Faculty members should also avoid snide comments and should provide students with opportunities to talk with them outside class to raise questions about fairness in treatment of difficult issues.
   - ✓ Faculty members disagree about whether they should disclose their own opinions on controversial topics (some say disclosure dampens discussion, others state their opinion and reasons to encourage others to engage). They also need to appreciate that certain topics are very emotional for students and be prepared to handle such emotions. They should also be ready to deal with students who say something inflammatory.

APPROACH 4
ENGAGE QUESTIONS OF FAITH AND CONSCIENCE WIDELY, ACTIVELY AND DELIBERATELY

Description. Public universities should actively encourage more widespread conversation and engagement with issues of personal faith and conscience throughout their campuses, including in private, student, classroom, and academic settings. Personal faith and conscience are great personal importance as well as increasing social importance yet have led to increasing division within modern societies including the United States. Public universities, no less than their private counterparts, need to engage more actively with related issues and competing viewpoints in order to prepare students for global realities and future roles as citizens. University leaders, faculty and students have worked actively in recent years to engage with issues of multiculturalism and the implications of gender, race, ethnicity, sexuality. Questions of faith and spirituality may in some ways seem more personal, private, and fraught with political overtones. Nonetheless, current conflicts and misunderstandings between those of different faith- and conscience-based traditions unless there are active efforts build bridges that do not currently exist. Special care will be needed to proceed deliberately, creatively, and sensitively in meeting associated challenges. A comprehensive, active approach might include efforts relating to the curriculum, such as: strengthening curricular offerings relating to philosophy, religious studies, or faith-related components of varied courses; developing new courses; or draw on existing models used in other contexts (perhaps a new type of "Great Decisions" course that emphasizes issues of faith and conscience rather than international affairs). It might also be desirable to expand speaker programs focused on issues of faith and conscience featuring either campus-based on visiting speakers. Student affairs programming might be expanded in ways discussed under Approach 2. Campuses might also draw together members of the public from differing faith- and conscience-based viewpoints to engage with those on campus.

Pros

- This approach addresses the range of objectives noted with regard to earlier approaches.
- Public universities are appropriate settings in which to engage with the full-range of pressing social issues and competing viewpoints so that they can be understood more fully. They may be able to bring light (rather than heat) to matters currently confounding the larger society.
- Developing tools for and experience with discussion of deeply-felt differences is important for the future of society and civic life.
- Engaging respectfully with issues of faith and conscience allows students and faculty to learn from others' viewpoints without forcing one's beliefs on others. Issues of faith and conscience are of great importance to students and citizens and it is better to engage with them than to marginalize them in unhealthy ways.
- A multi-faceted, comprehensive approach that engage members of the campus community in a range of contexts are more likely to be effective in broadening understanding and respect than are approaches that limit related discussions to more narrow contexts such as those detailed in earlier approaches.

Cons

- Taking on issues of faith and conscience in a comprehensive way within a public university may create controversy and division. Some faculty, students, parents, and members of the larger community might experience this approach as overbearing and inappropriate in light of their own personal faith and conscience-based beliefs. This approach might also create risks of interference from external forces tied to religious or political viewpoints, or public opprobrium if good-faith efforts prove problematic in execution.
- Some faculty member might worry that this approach could compromise the intellectual ideals and secular nature of the universities or blur important distinctions between the type of critical thinking and intellectual inquiry that is central to a university education and more personal views rooted in conscience and faith-based beliefs. Intermingling issues of faith and conscience in public higher education institutional settings may prove difficult because of the multitude of diverse faith- and conscience-based perspectives or create concerns that such beliefs are not treated with equal respect or attention.
- The University may lack the capacity and competence to undertake such an effort, given other curricular obligations, academic priorities, and resource constraints. Faculty and students may also lack the skills, perspectives, and interests to be navigate challenging topics and conversations effectively.
- Depending on how it would be implemented, this approach might raise legal questions relating to the appropriate roles of publicly funded higher education, faith-based institutions, and individuals' freedom of conscience.
- This approach is less well-defined and may raise expectations that cannot be realized.

Relevant Background Reading: Approach 4

- Background reading on students (all)
- Background reading on faculty (all)
- Background reading on the world beyond the campus (all)
- Background on initiatives at other universities involved in the Ford Foundation's "Difficult Dialogues" initiative: http://difficultdialogues.org

Scenarios for Discussion: Approach 4

K. Learning Tolerance. Members of the faculty at the nation's military academies have significant responsibilities in preparing future military officers to endure the pressures of battle and the challenges of leading troops into harm's way. Recently, several students and faculty who held very strong Christian viewpoints encouraged students in their classes to adopt religious viewpoints similar to their own and began meetings and sports events attended by more junior cadets with prayers. The Academy recently clarified its rules on these issues and implemented a course on "religious tolerance" that is required of all cadets. (based on events at Air Force Academy)

L. Middle East Controversies. In the wake of growing tensions in the Middle East, a number of universities have faced their own Middle East controversies. A faculty member in Middle-Eastern studies was alleged to permit only those sharing his viewpoints on the Palestine/Israeli conflict in his class and to challenge Jewish students who disagreed with him repeatedly. A distinguished junior faculty member in the political science department was openly shunned and criticized on a colleague's blog as a result of her recent scholarship criticizing the role played by religious belief in recent diplomatic history (contrary to her colleague's view). A group of students proposed a very pro-Palestinian art exhibit while another group wanted to bring a very controversial pro-Israeli speaker to campus at the same time. Campus officials believed that these events would create adverse reaction and potential security issues, and accordingly told students they could not use campus facilities for these purposes unless they contributed to the costs of extra security measures (based on events at Columbia, Arizona State, UC-Berkeley and elsewhere).

Personal Faith and Conscience:
How, When, Where and With Whom Can We Speak Our Minds on a Public University Campus?

DISCUSSION GUIDE

Introduction

College communities around the country have in recent days experienced a growing pattern of religious intolerance, threatened restraints on free inquiry, and difficulties in sustaining informed political and civil discourse. As university populations have become more diverse, they are confronting new realities in which differing voices struggle to be heard and respected. Political forces have increasingly highlighted "wedge issues" that pit deeply held religious and moral judgments against emerging social and scientific trends. As polarization has increased outside university walls, it has been increasingly difficult to maintain the long tradition of open and respectful inquiry within university classrooms. New forms and norms for communication seem to fuel tendencies to attack and belittle competing viewpoints rather than to engage in open-minded exploration of ideas.

In 2005, the Ford Foundation announced its "Difficult Dialogues Initiative," inviting colleges and universities around the country to join it in addressing these concerns. As the Ford Foundation's President eloquently stated: "Open and honest dialogue is one of the defining characteristics of a vibrant academic community … [and] is an essential component of a strong civil society on which democracy depends. We must strive to ensure that all members of the community are treated as full and equal partners in the intellectual and institutional life of colleges and universities, especially those who may hold minority political views or religious beliefs. Campus leaders also must create an atmosphere of mutual respect, in which diversity is examined and seen in the context of a broader set of common values. We need to ensure that our discourse not only remains open but civil."

As one of the campus partners in the Difficult Dialogue Initiative, UNC Chapel Hill is endeavoring to make the practice of dialogue second nature on our campus, and invites colleagues elsewhere to do the same. Too often, matters of religious belief and academic inquiry seem to fall prey to a "clash of cultures" and a tendency for students and faculty to engage in verbal sparring matches, to "debate" rather than to discuss and learn from one another's experiences and views. A group of faculty, students, and student affairs leaders has worked intensively to develop a framework in which differing viewpoints on these issues can be engaged and explored in a respectful and open-minded way. Our goals are to foster freedom expression and respectful attention for a wide range of viewpoints, engage in intellectually serious analysis and defense of multiple viewpoints, and exploration of common ground without ignoring genuine differences among diverse viewpoints.

We invite you to engage with us in deep and candid conversation about Personal faith and conscience: how, when, where, and with whom can we speak our minds on a public university campus? This formulation is a powerful one in which each word has a deliberate meaning.

- We hope the conversation will draw forth genuine, personal views that will be respectfully treated and openly considered.

- We seek to grapple with the full range of faith- and conscience-based beliefs since such beliefs are rooted in personal values that include those held not only by individuals committed to traditional Judeo-Christian viewpoints but also by agnostics, atheists, and others with moral vantages that are arise from sources other than traditional religion.

- We emphasize the process of "speaking our minds" by which we intend a focus on oral and written communication (rather than the clothes one wears or other sorts of expression).

- We use the word "we" very deliberately, with the intent to exploring how all members of our campus community interact with each other (for example, students interacting with fellow students of similar or different faith traditions, faculty interacting with faculty and students in the classroom and elsewhere, and staff interacting with the full range of community members).

- Our discussion will explore varied approaches to this question, including some that have emerged from our work to date, but also others that will emerge in this Forum that involves a wider range of participants. We will deliberate--rather than debate--using safe and fair ground rules to be considered at the outset so that we can all speak, listen, and learn from each other. No votes will be taken. All viewpoints will be welcome.

This discussion guide is organized in three parts. Part I provides background information on the growing tensions relating to personal faith and conscience on college campuses. Part II outlines four approaches that members of college communities—individual students and faculty as well as campus leaders--might be taken in response to these tensions. Part III provides supplemental resources including ideas on how best to approach conversations about these difficult issues and sources of information on related topics.

Background

Campus Experiences

One University's Recent Experiences

Evidence of tensions relating to personal faith and conscience and academic inquiry may be found at numerous universities around the country. The University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill is merely one case in point:

- In 2002 the University chose Approaching the Koran: The Early Revelations by Michael Sells as its summer reading selection. The decision was roundly criticized by many legislators and members of the public. Subsequently the American Family Association's Center for Law and Policy brought suit on behalf of three students, an alumnus and a state citizen, claiming that their First Amendment rights have been violated. The federal district court subsequently concluded that the choice was permissible since it did not advance or endorse religion and did not compel students to engage in "religious exercise."

- In 2003 a three-member Christian fraternity lost its status as an officially recognized student organization when it refused to sign the University's standard non-discrimination policy. The fraternity's law suit in federal court alleging that the University had unlawfully abridged the students' First Amendment rights to freedom of association, freedom of speech, and free exercise of religion was ultimately dismissed as moot.

- In spring 2004 an instructor was disciplined by her department for publicly accusing a student of hate speech after he expressed in her class his objection to homosexuality based on his religious beliefs.

- A "diversity assessment" conducted during fall 2004 gave evidence of related concerns. (excerpts from qualitative comments to be inserted once available)

- In 2005-2006, the campus newspaper ran a student column that cast Arabs in a disparaging light as well as a cartoon featuring a depiction of the Prophet Mohammed. Later a recent graduate drove his SUV into a popular campus gathering spot, injuring nine people. He subsequently explained that he had done so to demonstrate his commitment to Islam and to protest American foreign policy. Some students protested, asserting that his action should be labeled "terrorist" while others held a vigil in sympathy for Muslim students and those who had been hurt.

- In the last several years, the University established programs in Jewish, Islamic, and Christian studies. In 2005 and 2006, many liberal arts faculty protested discussions with a potential donor who was considering a proposal for funding of an initiative in Western Cultures. The donor had ties with other groups with conservative views that had publicly ridiculed faculty members who taught courses that emphasized diversity themes. The University subsequently withdrew the proposal in order to permit additional faculty review.

UNC Chapel Hill has not been alone in facing challenges like these. The discussion guide that follows incorporates experiences reported in news from around the country.

Hate Crime

National statistics also demonstrate problematic levels of tension. For example, the United States Federal Bureau of Investigation indicated that it in 2004 had received reports of 7649 incidents involving 9035 offenses. Of the 7642 single-bias incidents, racially motivated crimes accounted for 52.9%, religious bias accounted for 18.0%, bias against sexual orientation accounted for 15.8% and bias against ethnicity or national origin accounted for 12.7%. Of the 1,374 incidents involving religious bias, anti-Jewish incidents predominated (954 incidents), with anti-Islamic incidents ranking second (156). Anti-Catholic incidents numbered 57, anti-Protestant incidents numbered 38, anti-other-religion incidents numbered 128. There had been 898 hate crimes reported on school or college campuses, including 492 related to race, 184 related to religion, 150 related to sexual orientation, 68 related to national origin, 2 related to disability and 2 with multiple biases.

In April 2006, the United States Commission on Civil Rights held hearings and issued a statement on growing anti-Semitism. The Commission found that > Many college campuses throughout the United States continue to experience incidents of anti-Semitism. This is a serious problem which warrants further attention. While incidents of threatened bodily injury, physical intimidation or property damage are now rare, they have been alleged on some campuses. On other campuses, students have alleged patterns of threatening or intimidating behavior, derogatory remarks, vandalism, and use of Swastikas and other symbols of hatred or bigotry….On many campuses, anti-Israeli or anti-Zionist propaganda has been disseminated that includes traditional anti-Semitic elements, including age-old anti-Jewish stereotypes and defamation. This has included, for example, anti-Israel literature that perpetuates the medieval anti-Semitic blood libel of Jews slaughtering children for ritual purpose, as well as anti-Zionist propaganda that exploits ancient stereotypes of Jews as greedy, aggressive, overly powerful, or conspiratorial.

Students on college campuses are increasingly diverse even in states where residents have a significant preference in admissions. Economic shifts have resulted in greater mobility of families from other states and other countries so that residency no longer means life-long ties to a particular state. In contrast to their parents' generation, college students today are more likely to encounter others with viewpoints rooted in cultures, faiths, and moral perspectives that differ from those at home. The mixture of religious backgrounds characterizing students may vary depending on the region of the country and admissions criteria. Depending on student characteristics, student viewpoints and controversies may vary.

Students

Student Religious Affiliations and Implications

For example, in 2005 nearly 2/3 of UNC Chapel Hill's entering students reported affiliation with the following religions: Baptist (19.3%), Methodist (13.6%), Roman Catholic (13.1%), Presbyterian (9.6%), and "Other Christian" (9.7%). Fewer than 5% reported Jewish (2.5%), Hindu (1.3%) or Islamic (.9%) affiliation, and16.9% reported no religious affiliation. In contrast, entering undergraduates at public flagship universities a much more heterogeneous mix, with more than double the percentage of Roman Catholics and Jewish students (27.5% and 5.9% respectively), far fewer Baptists, Methodists, and Presbyterians (5.2%, 5.3%, and 5.2% respectively), and even more students reporting no religious affiliation (22.6%).

Patterns of religious preference also appear to correspond in interesting ways with student experiences and viewpoints as demonstrated in the following chart, comparing the responses of undergraduates entering UNC-Chapel Hill in 2005 with their peers at public flagship universities. In particular, UNC-Chapel Hill students are more likely to have attended religious services, discussed religion, and prayed or meditated on a weekly basis during high school. They are also much more likely to regard "integrating spirituality into my life" as a high priority, and to believe that their religious beliefs will be strengthened during college. They are somewhat more socially conservative, and are more inclined to believe that dissent is an important part of the political process.

Questions:
1a: Attended religious service in past year
1b: Discussed religion

2a: Time in high school in prayer/mediation: none + less than one hour/week
2b: Time in high school in prayer/mediation: 1-5 hrs

3a: Very important reason to attend college…: find my purpose in life
3b: Objectives that are "essential" or "very important": integrating spirituality into my life
3c: Objectives that are "essential" or "very important": developing meaningful philosophy of life
3d: Chances "very good" that attending college will strengthen religious beliefs/convictions

4a: "Abortion should be legal" (agrees strongly or very strong)
4b: "If two people really like each other, it's all right for them to have sex, even if they've known each other for only a very short time" (agrees strongly or very strongly)
5a: "It is important to have laws prohibiting homosexual relationships" (agrees strongly or very strongly)
5b: "Same-sex couples should have the right to legal marital status" (agrees strongly or very strongly)

6a: "Colleges should prohibit racist/sexist speech on campus" (agrees strongly or very strongly)
6b: "Dissent is a critical component of the political process" (agrees strongly or very strongly)
6c: "Realistically, an individual can do little to bring about changes in our society" (agrees strongly or very strongly)

Study of Student Spirituality

In addition to the above insights, drawn from the annual American College Freshmen Survey (part of the Cooperative Institutional Research Program in which many universities and colleges participate), UCLA researchers with support of the John Templeton Foundation have been conducting survey research focused on the religious and spiritual lives of college students. An initial phase of the study relied upon surveys in fall 2004 of 112,000 entering students at 236 colleges, using questions that included many similar to those in the annual freshmen survey noted above. Longitudinal studies tracked a smaller universe of students (approximately 3680 at 46 colleges and universities) into their junior years. Some notable findings include the following:

- Among first-year students, 8 in 10 reported attending religious services during the past year. Nearly 8 in 10 said that they believed in God, with more than half perceiving God as "love" or as the "creator" and about half experiencing God as a "protector." Many reported deriving strength, support and comfort from their beliefs. Four in ten students reported that they felt "secure" in their beliefs, with one in four saying that they were "seeking," one in four reporting being "conflicted" or "doubting," and one in seven saying they were "not interested." Forty-seven percent reported that they "seek out opportunities to help [themselves] grow spirituality."

- The researchers also analyzed students with reference to "spirituality," "religiousness" (religious commitment, engagement, religious/social conservatism, religious skepticism, and religious struggle), and four other factors (charitable involvement, compassionate self-concept, ethic of caring, and ecumenical worldview). Using these variables, they found that religious commitment and engagement was closely correlated with religious/social conservatism and negatively correlated with religious skepticism. Those showing high levels of religious engagement tended to be conservative politically (self-identified conservatives outnumbered liberals by 3 to 1). Roughly equal proportions of politically conservative and liberal students earned high scores on either charitable involvement or compassionate self-concept, while liberals "substantially outnumber conservatives among those with high scores on ethic of caring (2 to 1) and ecumenical worldview (3 to 1).

- The researchers reported two clusters of religious preferences among entering students. Those identifying themselves as Mormons, Seventh-Day Adventists, Baptists and "other Christians" emerging as "strongly spiritual, religious, and religiously/socially conservative" and expressing little religious skepticism. A second cluster (including Unitarians, Buddhists, Hindus, Episcopalians, Eastern Orthodox and Jewish students), were found to score low on religiousness and high on religious skepticism, ecumenical worldview, ethic of caring and charitable involvement. Roman Catholics reportedly scored below the overall average on religious commitment, religious engagement, religious/social conservatism, and religious skepticism."

- Longitudinal studies of a much smaller set of college juniors reported a decline in attendance at religious services (52% had reported attending religious services frequently the year before entering college, but only 29% reported attending frequently in their junior year). There was a significant reduction in self-perceived "religiousness" and "spirituality" (only 9% said that their religiousness was much stronger and only 13% said their spirituality was much stronger), yet there was some growth in those who said it was "very important" to integrate spirituality into their lives, develop a meaningful philosophy of life, and help others in difficulty. Students who spend more time partying show larger-than-average declines in attendance at religious services during the first three years of college.

- By junior year, it appeared that levels of religious commitment (measured by finding religion personally helpful, gaining spiritual strength by trusting in a higher power, feeling loved by God and seeking to follow religious teachings in daily life) tracked student choices of major at least to some degree. Those who chose to major in the fine arts, education and humanities had the highest levels of religious commitment, with the lowest levels of religious commitment reported by those in biological sciences, history, political science and sociology. Only about 20% of juniors were "highly religious" while a similar proportion were found to have low levels of religious engagement (defined as a pattern of behavior that includes such things as attending religious services, reading sacred texts, attending religious/spiritual workshops or retreats, and joining a religious organization on campus).

- Among college juniors, religiosity and spirituality also correlated with self-identified political viewpoints. Those who identified themselves as politically conservative, were substantially more likely to show high levels of religious commitment (50% versus 18% for self-identified liberals) and religious engagement (37% versus 10%), and were also more likely to show high levels of equanimity (35% versus 23%) and self-esteem (37% versus 29%). Viewed in a somewhat different light, students who regarded themselves as "highly religious" were divided among 41% who described themselves as conservative or far right, 44% who described themselves as "middle-of-the-road" and 15% who described themselves as liberal or far left. Students who were "least religious" included only 9% of those who saw themselves as conservative or far right, 56% of those who were middle-of-the-road, and 35% of those who were liberal or far left. Substantial differences in views on social issues were also apparent as between highly religious students and least religious students, including differences on views about casual sex, abortion, and homosexuality.

Trends Among Teenagers

There are indications that surveys of entering college students do not tell the whole story or do not fully capture emerging trends, however. In a recent book, Soul Searching: The Religious and Spiritual Lives of American Teenagers, (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005), Professor Christian Smith and Melinda Lundquist Denton analyzed data and interviews from the National Survey of Youth and Religion begun in 2000. Some of the study's major findings about teenagers aged 13-17 include the following.

- Difficulty articulating beliefs: Very few of the teens interviewed could explain the tenets of their religion or what it means. The researchers concluded that this phenomenon was equally evident in devout and non-religious teens, and judged that it was not due to poor communication skills. Instead, in their view it appeared that, for many of the teens "our interview was the first time that any adult had ever asked them what they believed and how it mattered in their life."

- Religious outlook: The interviews suggested that many teens (whatever their religious affiliation) shared an outlook the researchers dubbed "Moralistic Therapeutic Deism" that embraced five major principles: (1) A God exists who created and orders the world and watches over human life on earth but from a distance; (2) God wants people to be good, nice, and fair to each other, as taught in the Bible and by most world religions; (3) The central goal of life is to be happy and to feel good about oneself; (4) God does not need to be particularly involved in one's life except when God is needed to resolve a problem; and (5) Good people go to heaven when they die. Moral relativism was also common among teenagers interviewed.

- Conversations in school: In school, 65% of religious US teens only express their religious faith only some or a little. 12% of the teens express their faith a lot and 23% do not express their faith at all. Mormons are the most likely to express their faith, followed by conservative and black Protestant teens. Half of Jewish teens and half of Catholics do not express their faith. However, it is not because school is viewed as being a hostile place to religious teenagers—fewer than 20% of teenagers report that schools look down on teens who are openly religious.

- Views of others: The researchers concluded that teens do not talk about religion very often amongst themselves. They tend to see religion as not a particularly contested or conflictive aspect of their lives, but instead something that simply is, that is just not the kind of thing worth getting worked up about one way or the other. In confronting issues of faith difference, most teens take an inclusive religious pluralism stance on the matter of religious truth claims—60% of all respondents state that many religions may be true. The researchers also noted that "nearly all U.S. teens seem to have adopted a posture of civility and a careful and ambiguous inclusiveness when discussing religion with possible 'others,' especially in public," perhaps because of the strong tradition of individualism in America as well as the public school system.

What Happens In College: Theories of Intellectual and Moral Development

Some of differences between teenagers still in high school and students who are nearing college graduation may be explained in part by the dynamics of intellectual and moral development during the college years. Numerous educational theories might be noted, but only a few will be mentioned here.

- Cognitive Development. Benjamin Bloom, of the University of Chicago, is widely regarded as among the foremost theorists of students' intellectual development. He developed a "taxonomy of educational objectives" which he derived based on the educational goals articulated by faculty colleagues and the types of questions posed on comprehensive examinations. His most well-known taxonomy relates to the "cognitive domain" and includes the following elements (listed from the simplest to the most complex): knowledge (the kind of intellectual capability that can be created even by rote memorization); comprehension (the ability to paraphrase, interpret and explain); application (the capacity to transfer ideas learned in one situation to use in another); analysis (the capacity to distinguish between subsidiary ideas that are part of a larger whole); synthesis (the capacity to bring disparate ideas together into a larger whole); and evaluation (the capacity to test or judge ideas against a set of larger standards).

- Affective Development. Bloom also considered the "affective" domain which concerns the way that people deal with emotional dimensions including feelings, values, appreciation, enthusiasms, motivations and attitudes. His five major elements in this taxonomy (ranging from the simplest to the most complex) include: receiving phenomena (awareness, willingness to hear and attend to others with respect), responding to phenomena (active participation with others in learning, willingness to respond and question new ideals and concepts in order to understand them); valuing (acceptance of values, attaching worth to particular values or phenomena, developing more complex commitments, acting on more complex commitments); organization (creates priorities from contrasting or conflict values, compares and synthesizes values); internalizing values (develops a value system that shapes personal behavior in a cohesive way, acts in self-reliant way that evidences commitment to ethical practice, consideration of others, weighing of new evidence).

- Intellectual and Moral Development. A major theory of intellectual and moral development in college students was developed by William Perry, based on interviews conducted among male students attending Harvard College some years ago. Perry focused on how students understand the nature of knowledge and what kinds of knowledge are to be valued. Perry identified several stages of development. The first three stages involve "dualism," a period in which a learner assumes that all questions have or can have "right" answers derived from external authorities; the absence of right answers is attributed to authority figures who lack relevant knowledge or to knowledge that has yet to be discovered. The next two stages involve "relativism," which treats knowledge as non-absolute in most cases, treats dominant knowledge as pertinent but not the absolute truth, sees most things as uncertain, finds no real basis for deciding absolute right and wrong, treats authorities as just individuals with opinions, and regards all ideas as having equal value before ultimately recognizing that learners must take responsibility for using and evaluating non-absolute knowledge in complicated settings. Perry's final three stages involve "commitment" and move beyond cognitive abilities to make judgments regarding one's values and identity, act on and balance associated commitments and responsibilities to self and others. Although Perry's work has been criticized a non-diverse population and as treating development as a linear process when it more likely involves cycles, his approach remains a standard framework for thinking about student development during the college years and beyond.

- Faith Stages. Dr. James Fowler, of Emory University, developed a framework for thinking about the stages through which approaches to faith and spirituality evolve across the lifespan (in contrast to the content of faith-based or spiritual beliefs). His most well-known work is Stages of Faith: The Psychology of Human Development and the Quest for Meaning (HarperCollins, 1981). Fowlerr's work was also influenced by that of other theorists who studied psychological development from childhood through adulthood. In Fowler's view "faith" encompasses an individual's beliefs about their relationship with the universal, something that evolves throughout one's life. Fowler regarded faith as an ongoing activity (rather than something one "has"), reflecting the interplay of "conversion" (major changes in one's values or core beliefs) and "development" (a gradual maturation process).

- According to Fowler, there are six major stages in faith development, which foster insight of one's development, but should not used to evaluate or judge. Stage 1 is the "intuitive-projective" stage in which children are centered on their own experiences, their imaginations and fantasies, and others' actions and stories. At this stage, they lack the internal means of understanding their experiences, the fantasies they develop, or the stories to which they're exposed. Stage 2 is the "mythical-literal" stage in which faith has a more definite cognitive component, which may be drawn from the values of one's family or from exposure to other influences such as those of teachers, peers, and the media. In Stage 2, individuals tend to associate with those who are like them and be critical of those who differ, believe in "justice" insofar as the good are rewarded and the bad punished, often give symbols very literal meanings and engage in little self-reflection.

Stage 3 is the "synthetic-conventional" stage in which individuals attempt to develop an integrated identity, based on values or beliefs typically derived from significant others without much internal examination. Those at stage 3 may have an "ideology" that involves a cluster of beliefs and values but may not be aware of it. They may also have internalized expectations in ways that make it difficult for them to manage the different roles and contexts in which they must function, and may be uncomfortable with conflict and controversy.

- Fowler describes stage 4 as the "individuative-reflective" stage, one that often involves critical assessment of prior experiences, values and beliefs. In stage 4, individuals move toward a grounding within an authentic self rather than relying most heavily on external expectations and roles, while also making explicit personal judgments about commitments based on deliberate examination of their core beliefs. Stage 5, the "conjunctive" stage is generally not reached until mid-life, when individuals experience significant tensions (for example at the point between being old and young), are able to deal with multiple perspectives and ambiguity, are drawn to the deeper levels of myth and symbolism, and are more open to others' faith traditions. Stage 6, "universalizing," takes varied forms but generally involves a more encompassing sense of truth that transcends group-based faith traditions.

- Another theorist, Sharon Parks, has extended Fowler's work in significant ways. She proposes an additional stage of faith development which she calls "young adult" (which includes many college students) and treats faith development as involving three components (the first involving forms of knowing or cognition, the second forms of dependence or affect, and the third forms of community or social interaction). During the early "young adult" stage, individuals facing new environments may regress to previous more comfortable states until they are more comfortable in the new settings. They may also take some time before developing "self-authority" and may need experience with a social group that provides mentoring before trusting their growing sense that they can stand on their own. Parks' approach is helpful in spotlighting both a critical stage of development and by providing a framework that speaks explicitly to the importance of "dependence" and social settings.

- Thoughtful observers also recognize that college students' experiences outside the classroom often help them learn important lessons that may be less easily imparted in the classroom. In his important book, Making the Most of College: Students Speak Their Minds (Harvard University Press, 2001), Richard Light highlights students' own judgments about the importance of religious diversity among their classmates and the ways in which such diversity contributes to their education. Students interviewed emphasized the importance of religious diversity in living arrangements, which allowed them to experience others' traditions and beliefs in ways they were unlikely to have done at home. One student commented: "Everything that I have learned by observing and interacting with my more religious roommates has helped me to decide what is important and not important to me in a belief system, or more generally in a spiritual outlook." Another said: "As a Catholic, I find there is a certain bond that exists for me with observant people of other religions. Inter-faith forums have certainly helped to develop this connection with the other side, such as Jewish students from Hillel with whom we share many events… I definitely feel comfortable talking about certain things, or taking certain things for granted, when I'm with other religious people, whatever their religion."

Political Viewpoints and Student Values

College students do not necessarily express the same blend of faith-based beliefs, social policy judgments, and political affinities as do older citizens, explored in more detail as part of the discussion of the world beyond the campus, below. A recent study by the Harvard Institute of Politics conducted phone interviews of a national sampling of college students in March 2006 provides some important insights about the relationship between these important dimensions of students' lives.

- The vast majority of student respondents indicated that religion played an important role in their lives (70%), and 25% said that they had grown more spiritual while in college. When asked about their top-most concern, 39% of respondents (compared to 20% of the public in general) cited the war in Iraq. On the other hand, 66% of respondents believed that the United States should use armed intervention if necessary in order to address genocide abroad. Respondents indicated that the United Nations should play a more significant role and favored multilateral approaches. Differences in political viewpoint correlated with views on how religion should play out in the public eye. Among Republican respondents, 56% wanted to hear candidates speak about their religious views, in contrast to 21% of Democratic respondents. Republican respondents also wanted religious values to play a more important role in government (38% compared to 16% among Democratic respondents). Republican respondents generally feared that religion was losing its influence in American life (62%) and felt that was a "bad thing" by a 7-1 margin, while 52% of Democratic respondents felt that religion's influence was increasing while concluding by a 2-1 margin that that was a bad thing. A majority of both Republican and Democratic respondents said that they were "concerned about the moral direction of the country," including 50% of white respondents, 74% of African-American respondents, 49% of men and 57% of women.

- The Harvard study found that college students believed that a larger range of issues had "moral" dimensions compared to those generally highlighted as raising questions "values" in recent political discourse. Majorities of both Republican and Democratic respondents regarded abortion (78% of Republican respondents and 59% of Democrats), gay marriage (64% and 54% respectively) and stem-cell research (64% and 54% respectively) as "moral issues." Notably, 38% to 48% of Republican and Democratic respondents believed that the government's response to Hurricane Katrina (48% and 45% respectively) and education (38% and 44% respectively) should also be viewed within a moral context. Other "moral issues" included the environment (30% of Republican and 42% of Democratic respondents respectively), healthcare (35% and 52% respectively), Iraq (44% and 39% respectively), and affirmative action (24% and 37% respectively).

- The Harvard poll emphasized that there appear to be four major clusters of college student political viewpoints (in contrast to traditional conservative/liberal labels) and recognized that faith-based and moral beliefs as well as gender and race have implications for policy judgments among this population. "Traditional conservatives" (16% of respondents) were more likely males from upper income families, are more optimistic about the future, believe the country is on the right track, are comfortable voting for candidates who speak about their religious beliefs and want religious values to play a more important role in government. "Religious centrists" (25% of respondents) included a large concentration of African-American and Hispanic students who are deeply concerned about the moral direction of the country, and regard the response to Hurricane Katrina, universal healthcare and the environment as moral issues. "Secular centrists" (15%) are more likely to be male, tend to optimistic about the future, do not regard abortion or homosexuality as morally wrong, do not factor religion into their world view and do not want religious values to play a more important role in government. Finally, traditional liberals (40%) are more likely female, support Roe v. Wade with regard to abortion, do not regard homosexuality as morally wrong, think universal healthcare should be a right for all, the environment should be protected, and immigration should be permitted.

Faculty

Spirituality and the Professoriate

Data on the viewpoints of college faculty are more limited, but some insight can be gained from periodic surveys of American college faculty and from research on spirituality within the professoriate that is part of the UCLA research on college spirituality noted above.

- Data from the 2004-05 survey of American college faculty found a substantial consensus in views regarding the goals of undergraduate education, with a high proportion of faculty respondents rating the following goals as "very important" or "essential: developing student's critical thinking abilities (99%), helping students master knowledge in a discipline (94%), and promoting students' ability to write effectively (87%). Other goals included preparing undergraduates for employment (73%), and for graduate or advanced study (61%) with substantial variation across types of institutions. Other goals included instilling a basic appreciation for the liberal arts (56%) and the development of moral character (59%), but only 30% believes that the chief benefit of a college education is to increase earning power. Perspectives on educational goals were also framed against a general concern that many students were poorly prepared academically (while 67% of faculty at private universities agreed "somewhat" or "strongly" that "most students are well-prepared academically, only 37% of public university faculty shared that view). In contrast, 70% of freshmen entering college in 2004 rated themselves as "above average" or in the "highest 10%" academically, and about half reported earning "A"s in high school.

- The recent study on "Spirituality and the Professoriate" conducted by UCLA with support of the John Templeton Foundation, surveyed 40,670 faculty at 421 colleges and universities across the country. Only 30% of respondents believed that "colleges should be concerned with facilitating students' spiritual development," but more than half regarded other related goals "essential" or "very important": enhancing students' self-understanding (60%), developing students' moral character (59%) and helping students develop personal values (53%). Academic field and institutional type correlated in interesting ways with faculty viewpoints. The highest level of agreement with the statement that "colleges should be concerned with facilitating students' spiritual development" were found among faculty in the health sciences (41%) and humanities (40%), with the lowest proportions in the biological sciences (22%), social sciences (24%) , physical sciences (24%) and agricultural/forestry (25%). Faculty members at public universities and colleges showed the lowest level of agreement with this statement (18% and 23% respectively).

- In light of the priority purposes of education and the concerns for student academic preparedness noted above, it is perhaps not surprising that emphasis on religion and spirituality is relatively rare in many classrooms. In reports by college juniors in the companion study of student spirituality described above, 62% indicated that their professors "never encouraged discussion of spirituality and religion" while 56% said that their professors "never provided opportunities to discuss the meaning or purpose of life."

- Faculty members' views on the role of religion and spirituality in the classroom differed from those held by faculty members regarding the place of religion and spirituality for faculty members within the academy. When asked to agree or disagree with the statement "the spiritual dimension of faculty members' lives has no place in the academy," 57% disagreed. Once again academic disciplines seemed to shape or reflect respondents' viewpoints, with the highest disagreement reported by those in the health sciences (67%), education (65%) and business (60%) and the lowest levels in social sciences (51%), physical sciences (50%), and biological sciences (49%). The highest level of disagreement was found in public universities (49%).

- Faculty members' reluctance to regard religion and spirituality as appropriate in the classroom or the academy did not, however, indicate that faculty members are not spiritual or religious, or that spirituality and religion does not play a role in their personal lives. Of those responding, 81% described themselves as "spiritual," while 64% regarded themselves as "religious" to some or a greater extent (29% and 37% respectively). Female faculty appeared to have a higher level of spirituality, with 87% of women describing themselves as "spiritual" (in contrast to 78% of male faculty members), endeavoring to integrate spirituality in life (54% of women compared to 42% of men), engaging in self-reflection (74% and 64% respectively), and seeking opportunities to grow spirituality (76% compared to 65%). The highest proportion of self-identification as "spiritual" was found for African-American faculty (66% regarded themselves as spiritual "to a great extent"), in contrast to American Indians/Alaska Natives (60%), Native Hawaiian/Pacific Islanders (59%), Puerto Ricans (59%), Mexican-Americans (53%), white/Caucasians (48%), and Asian-Americans (37%).

Disciplinary Frameworks and Faculty Viewpoints

Faculty perspectives must also be understood in a broader historical and sociological context. In a working paper, Professor Mark Edwards (former President of St. Olaf College and currently associate dean of Harvard Divinity School, and author of a new book entitled Religion on Our Campuses) offers crucial insights.

- Historical trends have shaped the development of colleges and universities in the last 150 years. In the first half of the nineteenth century natural sciences were closely associated with Christian theology. In time the sciences were seen to provide evidence of divine design in the guise of rational thought and inquiry and the study of science was viewed as a means of praising God. By mid-century, scientists were able to discern causal explanations that made it possible to offer explanations of phenomena other than by reference to supernatural intervention. What constituted an explanation changed and scientists turned to scientific inquiry as the best means of explaining natural phenomena rather than simply invoking God. Other disciplines followed suit, as the humanities departed from moral philosophy and social sciences claimed their own identity.

- By the beginning of the 20th century, research universities began to develop, with instructors drawn from those who had sophisticated substantive expertise in specialized fields. As belief in the scientific method grew and the extent of knowledge burgeoned, only those with "disciplined" knowledge had the necessary legitimacy to claim a place in the academy. Such disciplined expertise was provided through advanced education at top research universities which provided intensive mentoring, and required advanced levels of scholarly performance which in time resulted in the award of a Ph.D. Professional legitimacy for scholars awarded teaching positions at universities was increasingly tested by scholarly writing that was reviewed by national and international peers with similarly advanced expertise.

- In Edwards' view, faculty members are now inculcated by intensive experience that can be described as "professional formation," just as is true for those who undergo "formation" to profess their beliefs as members of the clergy. As undergraduates, they choose a major and increasingly assimilate the knowledge, values, and intellectual approaches that characterize the academic discipline in question. They go on to graduate work and spend more years within a specialized academic community that deepens and tests such expert knowledge and ways of knowing through comprehensive examinations and research on the Ph.D. They are evaluated and selected for academic appointments through a process that emphasizes their disciplinary focus. They then pass on their ways of knowing to their own students, and gain professional acclaim based upon their scholarly contributions to their chosen academic field.

- Edwards argues that there may be room to reintroduce religious perspectives within the academy in certain circumscribed respects. He contends that religious views may be most appropriate with regard to moral claims, claims regarding human nature, and claims regarding maximally comprehensive views of reality (certain kinds of "metaphysical" claims). In his view, it may be appropriate for certain religious insights to be offered in as an autobiographical explanation of "where I'm coming from," and suggests that the introduction of religious views in other settings should be undertaken with caution, and only in instances in which they contribute to the conversation and deepen understanding.

Academic Freedom

"Academic freedom," like academic disciplines, plays a central role in faculty members' understandings of the nature of American higher education. Academic freedom rests on core beliefs that the mission of higher education is to seek out and disseminate truth (however unpopular or inconvenient) and that the best way to accomplish this mission is to express ideas freely and subject them and to test them openly without fear of reprisal. It rests on a shared commitment to collegial interchange and a responsibility to maintain an open mind while testing one's own ideas as well as the ideas of others. Despite these core assumptions, the meaning and implications of the phrase and are surprisingly complex.

- The courts have recognized that academic institutions possess institutional academic freedom that is necessary > to provide that atmosphere which is most conducive to speculation, experiment, and creation. It is an atmosphere in which there prevail "the four essential freedoms" of a university--to determine for itself on academic grounds who may teach, what may be taught, how it shall be taught, and who may be admitted to study. (Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234, 263 (1957) (Frankfurter, J, concurring)

- Academic freedom for individual faculty members has been described in the following terms:

  > Teachers are entitled to full freedom in research and in the publication of the results, subject to the adequate performance of their other academic duties. . .

> Teachers are entitled to freedom in the classroom in discussing their subject, but they should be careful not to introduce into their teaching controversial matter that has no relation to their subject. . .
>
> College and university teachers are citizens, members of a learned profession, and officers of an educational institution. When they speak or write as citizens, they should be free from institutional censorship or discipline, but their special position in the community imposes special obligations. As scholars and educational officers, they should remember that the public may judge their profession and their institution by their utterances. Hence they should at all times be accurate, should exercise appropriate restraint, should show respect for the opinions of others, and should make every effort to indicate that they are not speaking for the institution. (Association of American University Professors, 1940 Statement)

- The academic freedom of students has likewise been recognized. In a joint statement issued in 1967, the Association of American University Professors, the United States National Student Association and other professional groups stated:

  > Freedom to teach and freedom to learn are inseparable facets of academic freedom. The freedom to learn depends upon appropriate opportunities and conditions in the classroom, on the campus, and in the larger community. Students should exercise their freedom with responsibility . . . .
  >
  > The professor in the classroom and in conference should encourage free discussion, inquiry, and expression. Student performance should be evaluated solely on an academic basis, not on opinions or conduct in matters unrelated to academic standards.
  >
  > 1. Protection of Freedom of Expression
  > Students should be free to take reasoned exception to the data or views offered in any course of study and to reserve judgment about matters of opinion, but they are responsible for learning the content of any course of study for which they are enrolled.
  >
  > 2. Protection Against Improper Academic Evaluation
  > Students should have protection through orderly procedures against prejudiced or capricious academic evaluation. At the same time, they are responsible for maintaining standards of academic performance established for each course in which they are enrolled.

- The application of these principles is often complicated, in part because of the complexity of underlying legal analysis and because of the need to apply applicable policies to nuanced facts. For example, the academic freedom of individual faculty members and students is to some extent rooted in the First Amendment (which protects against abuse of free speech rights by government entities such as public universities but not to action by private parties). The statements of the Association of American University Professors (an organization founded in the wake of events at Stanford University early in the 20th century, when Mrs. Leland Stanford caused the dismissal of a noted economics professor Edward Lovejoy with whose views she disagreed) have been widely endorsed by academic organizations. They reflect a "professional standard" that is regarded as a statement of good practice within the academy, and thus has policy significance (but not necessarily legal significance) even when the First Amendment might not have application. At the same time, however, most colleges and universities around the country have adopted policies and tenure regulations that incorporate the AAUP standard and in turn give rise to contractual rights and rights to due process hearings by those protected under such policies.

- Longstanding expectations about university autonomy and academic freedom have been challenged in recent years on a number of fronts. For example, David Horowitz and others have argued that legislation called the "Academic Bill of Rights" should be adopted by state legislatures in order to force universities to weigh political ideology as part of their hiring practices and to provide additional legal protection to students who fear that they may be receive poor grades based on ideological views. Several organizations such as Students for Academic Freedom and Campus Watch have also established websites that encourage students to report or "blacklist" their professors based on listed criteria. An initiative by a UCLA alumnus to pay students to record and submit details of classroom conversations was withdrawn in the face of legal challenge.

- There are also instances in which faculty members have also been disciplined or dismissed notwithstanding the protections of academic freedom. For example, a professor at the University of Colorado who made what many regard as irresponsible comments about the 9/11 terrorist attacks was subsequently found by an academic panel to have engaged in research misconduct. That university also recently conducted an extensive review in order to improve its policies on tenure and post-tenure review. Universities are also facing calls for greater public accountability from government leaders including the United States Department of Education and Congress. While academic institutions have traditionally been accorded great autonomy in setting academic standards and making operational decisions, growing concern to curb college costs and increase student learning and graduate rates may put these traditions to the test.

Liberal Education and the Curriculum

Faculty viewpoints on the role of religion and spirituality within the college classroom can also be discerned through academic decisions relating to nature of liberal education and the characteristics of the undergraduate curriculum.

- The American Association of Colleges and Universities defines "liberal education" as "a philosophy of education that empowers individuals with broad knowledge and transferable skills, and a strong sense of values, ethics, and civic engagement." In a 1998 statement, the Association expressed the goals of a liberal education in the following terms:

  > A truly liberal education is one that prepares us to live responsible, productive, and creative lives in a dramatically changing world. It is an education that fosters a well-grounded intellectual resilience, a disposition toward lifelong learning, and an acceptance of responsibility for the ethical consequences of our ideas and actions. Liberal education requires that we understand the foundations of knowledge and inquiry about nature, culture and society; that we master core skills of perception, analysis, and expression; that we cultivate a respect for truth; that we recognize the importance of historical and cultural context; and that we explore connections among formal learning, citizenship, and service to our communities. … Because liberal learning aims to free us from the constraints of ignorance, sectarianism, and myopia, it prizes curiosity and seeks to expand the boundaries of human knowledge. By its nature, therefore, liberal learning is global and pluralistic. It embraces the diversity of ideas and experiences that characterize the social, natural, and intellectual world. To acknowledge such diversity in all its forms is both an intellectual commitment and a social responsibility, for nothing less will equip us to understand our world and to pursue fruitful lives.

- Most colleges and universities adopt and periodically review general education requirements governing undergraduate study as a means of providing students with a shared foundation to guide their overall intellectual development. General education requirements often mandate that students take courses emphasizing moral reasoning, philosophy, history, cultural diversity, public policy, international affairs, psychology, sociology, literature, art or music and many other subjects in order to provide students with exposure to varied ways of thinking and a wide range of ideas. Many such courses touch at some point on the nature and role of faith and religion in the contexts in connection with the topics under consideration.

- Colleges and universities have increasingly incorporated "perspectives" or "diversity" requirements as part of their general education requirements to aid students in preparing for a complex world marked by increasing interchange among those from cultures that vary in language, history, political and religious beliefs and to bring to light the experiences of those who have often been burdened by historical injustice. In the humanities and social sciences, for example, critical analysis has thrown the spotlight on personal identity and scholars have increasingly examined the hidden history of people of color and women and the implications of sexual orientation. Developments in the sciences are also proceeding at a rapid pace. Biological sciences now rely heavily on findings rooted in modern understandings of natural selection and evolution, and new scientific discoveries raise important questions regarding the role of stem-cell research and the nature of the human genome. Expansion of the traditional "canon" to include topics outside students' prior experience with Western culture, local communities, and religious tenets may prove unsettling to those with deeply held traditional values and cultural views.

The World beyond the Campus

There can be little doubt that forces beyond campus walls influence the realities of American college campuses. These realties are therefore worth considering.

American Beliefs about Faith

The United States is a highly religious nation. A Gallup Poll conducted in December 2005 reported that 79% of American respondents said they were convinced that God exists, while an additional 12% said that they think God probably exists but have a little doubt. Regional differences were apparent, with 88% of Southerners expressing certainty about the existence of God, compared to 70% of Easterners, 71% of Westerners, and 77% of respondents from the Midwest. Those who attended church on a weekly basis were particularly likely to be certain God exists (94%) but 61% of those who seldom or never attended expressed similar sentiments. In contrast, however, a CBS News Poll conducted in April 2006, asked respondents whether they believed that traditional religions could answer all or most of today's problems or whether they were largely old-fashioned and out of date. Just over half (54%) of respondents said that traditional religions can answer such problems, while 32% said such religions are old-fashioned and 14% said they didn't know or didn't answer. The same poll also asked respondents how important religious was to their daily lives, and found that 26% of respondents regarded it as extremely important, 33% as very important, 26% as somewhat important, 13% as not at all important, with 2% saying they didn't know or giving no answer.

The United States Census does not collect information on religious affiliation so denominational information must be found by other means. The World Fact Book 2005 indicates that the American population is divided as follows: Protestant 52%, Roman Catholic 24%, Mormon 2%, Jewish 1%, Muslim 1%, other 10%, none 10% (2002 est.). The American Religious Identification Survey conducted using phone surveys by the researchers affiliated with the City University of New York in 2001 found that the proportion of those self-identifying as Christian had declined from 86.2% in 1990 to 76.5% in 2001. In 2001, 1.3% self-identified as Jewish, .5% as Muslim, .5% as Buddhist, .3% as Unitarian/Universalist, and .4% as Hindu. Others self-identified as atheists 9.4%), agnostic (0.5%) or refused to respond (5.4%). More nuanced polls have recently been conducted of those who are affiliated with Christian faiths. A poll conducted for National Public Radio in July 2006 of likely voters in the fall 2006 election found that 12% identified themselves as fundamentalist, 21% evangelical, 10% as charismatic/Pentecostal, 42% as moderate to liberal, 5% as something else, and 11% as unwilling to respond (or responding "don't know").

In contrast, to the United States, the 2005 World Fact Book reported that in the United Kingdom, the proportions are: Christian (Anglican, Roman Catholic, Presbyterian, Methodist) 71.6%, Muslim 2.7%, Hindu 1%, other 1.6%, unspecified or none 23.1% (2001 census). In France, the proportions are: Roman Catholic 83%-88%, Protestant 2%, Jewish 1%, Muslim 5%-10%, unaffiliated 4%. In Canada the proportions are: Roman Catholic 42.6%, Protestant 23.3% (including United Church 9.5%, Anglican 6.8%, Baptist 2.4%, Lutheran 2%), other Christian 4.4%, Muslim 1.9%, other and unspecified 11.8%, none 16% (2001 census).

Deeper insight about Americans' faith-based viewpoints can also be derived from public opinion polls and similar studies.

- Views on the role of the Bible and the relationship between religious belief and science vary. In Gallup surveys completed in May 2006, 28% of respondents indicated that they believed that the Bible is the actual word of god and is to be taken literally word for word; 49% said that it was the inspired word of God but not everything in it should be taken literally, and 19% regarded it as an ancient book of fables, legends, history, and moral precepts recorded by man. When asked about their views on the origin and development of human beings, 36% of respondents said that man developed over millions of years with God guiding the process, 13% said man developed over millions of years but God had no part in the process, 46% said that God had created man in his present form, and 5% gave other or no opinion. An April 2006 CBS news poll found that 26% of respondents believed the science and religion agreed with each other, 32% said they generally conflict with each other, 37% said they were not related in a meaningful way, and 5% said they didn't know or gave no answer.

- Americans' views of those affiliated with different religious beliefs vary. A July 2005 study by the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Affairs reported the following patterns regarding how favorably they viewed the following religions: Jews (77% favorable, 7% unfavorable, 16% no opinion); Catholics (73% favorable, 14% unfavorable, 13% no opinion), Evangelical Christians (57% favorable, 19% unfavorable, 24% no opinion), Muslim-Americans (55% favorable, 25% unfavorable, 20% no opinion), and atheists (35% favorable, 50% unfavorable, 15% no opinion).

- Americans' beliefs also appear to contrast with the views of Europeans. A June 2006 report by the Pew Research Center explained that in 2002 60% of Americans thought that belief in God is necessary in order "to be moral and have good values" (slightly smaller proportions expressed that view in 2004). In contrast in 2002 only 1/3 of German and 1/8 of French respondents expressed similar views. A survey conducted in connection with the Spring 2005 Pew Global Attitudes Project found, for example, a substantially higher proportion of respondents from Great Britain viewed Muslims favorably (compared to 72% favorable v. 57% favorable by respondents from the United States and 40% favorable by respondents from Germany).

- Americans' exposure to the religions beliefs and practices of others' also appears limited. A June 2005 poll by CBS News asked respondents whether any of their close friends or family members who were of a different religion had introduced them to different teachings or philosophies that had become part of their own religious or spiritual practices. Of those responding, 23% said yes, 48% said no, 18% said they had no close friends or family members of other religions, 10% said religion wasn't important to them, and 1% said they didn't know or declined to answer.

- Americans also appear to associate religion in certain respects with conflict. In a July 2005 poll by the Pew Research Center for People and the Press, respondents were asked how much of a role religion plays in causing most wars and conflicts in the world. Responses indicated that 40% believed that religion caused a great deal of conflict, 35% a fair amount, 13% only a little, 8% not at all, and 4% refused or said they didn't know. When asked a similar question about the role religion plays in causing political conflict in the United States, 30% responded that it caused a great deal of conflict, 35% said a fair amount, 27% said only a little, 4% said none at all, and 4% said they didn't know or refused to respond.

Legal Principles and Historical Perspectives

Americans are clearly a religious people. Significantly, however, the American constitutional experiment provided for the separation of church and state, a deliberate and unique departure from prior European tradition.

- The First Amendment states that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." The Founders thus rejected the European tradition that taxed all to support a single nationally-affiliated church, and sought to avoid sectarian strife that would likely arise from jockeying among the different religious affiliations prominent in the various states. They also barred government from intruding on individual religious beliefs and thereby protected freedom of conscience. These provisions of the United States Constitution have also been applied to the states, and many states have independently codified protections relation to religion as part of their state constitutions.

- It is helpful to bring a historical perspective to bear in considering how the law in this area has developed and might develop in the future. In his recent book Divided by God (Oxford University Press, 2005) and related writing in the New York Times, NYU Professor Noah Feldman has discussed the core dilemma created by the American constitutional experiment with the relationship between church and state: how to negotiate "the challenge of preserving the unity of the sovereign people in the face of their flourishing spiritual variety and often conflicting religious needs." Feldman traces the waves of immigration that have brought changing patterns of religious diversity to American shores, such as the 19th century influx of Catholics raised issues regarding the underlying tenets of public schools and the potential for funding parochial education that inculcated religious values. He also highlights critical world events such as World War II and the Holocaust which highlighted the risk that religious minorities can suffer discrimination or even persecution when the German government adopted a stance favoring Christianity and opposing those of Jewish faith. Through it all, Feldman believes, we acknowledge our religious diversity while at the same time "we strive to be a nation with a common identity and a common project."

- In Feldman's view, current tensions reflect two conflicting viewpoints about the proper relationship of religion and government On the one hand some people believe that "the right answers to questions of government policy must come from the wisdom of religious tradition." Feldman calls those who share this view "values evangelicals" and explains that "Not every values evangelical is, technically speaking, an evangelical or a born-again Christian, although many are. Values evangelicals include Jews, Catholics, Muslims and even people who do not focus on a particular religious tradition but care primarily about identifying traditional moral values that can in theory be shared by everyone." Feldman believes that "What all values evangelicals have in common is the goal of evangelizing for values: promoting a strong set of ideas about the best way to live your life and urging the government to adopt those values and encourage them wherever possible. To them, the best way to hold the United States together as a nation, not just a country, is for us to know what values we really hold and to stand up for them." Feldman characterizes the second competing viewpoint as one held by "legal secularists" who "see religion as a matter of personal belief and choice largely irrelevant to government and who are concerned that values derived from religion will divide us, not unite us." Such "legal secularists" may be active members of various religious faiths, but believe that government should be secular and be bounded by related legal constraints. According to Feldman, "legal secularists" believe that "full citizenship means fully sharing in the legal and political commitments of the nation. If the nation defines itself in terms of values drawn from religion, they worry, then it will inevitably tend to adopt the religious values of the majority, excluding religious minorities and nonreligious people from full citizenship."

- Feldman believes that neither "values evangelicals" nor "legal secularists" have been very effective in negotiating the core tension between the American desire to recognize religious diversity while also maintaining a sense of unity, particularly in the days since 9/11. In his view, the "values evangelicals want to find shared values, but that leads them to rely on the unexamined assumption that deep down, Americans agree on what matters. The trouble is that 'we' often do not agree." Such disagreement is particularly apparent on issues such as abortion where "values evangelicals" believe that they must stand for something and are generally unwilling to recognize that those with competing views may have legitimate claims to make decisions of their own. On the other hand, the belief by "legal secularists" that religious expression must be removed from the public sphere in order to make those of all faiths and viewpoints welcome has resulted in pressure to keep religious views private or at least outside of public settings associated with government (a matter of concern for example, for those who wish to see the Ten Commandments or Christmas crèches displayed). Banishing religious expressions from the public eye has in Feldman's view made "values evangelicals" feel excluded and undercut the hunger for public expression of shared values, even though that is not the intent. These underlying tensions have been fueled in part by confusing legal developments that have reversed the original intent of the Constitution's provisions on religion by eliminating religious expression in many public settings while at the same time allowing funding of faith-based activities (for example, attendance at religiously-affiliated schools using publicly-funded vouchers and allocation of government funds to religious groups as well as secular non-profit organizations in order to accomplish government objectives).

- Litigation involving the public schools has illustrated the complex application of legal precepts embodied in the First Amendment's "free exercise" and "establishment" clauses when applied to educational settings. One of the fundamental legal tests applied in this setting is that articulated in Lemon v. Kurtz, a 1971 decision by the United States Supreme Court that required government decisions in the schools to be motivated by a secular purpose, to have primarily secular effects and not to entangle the state with religious institutions. Applying this and other tests in ensuing years, the courts have addressed numerous issues. For example, cases have addressed school prayer and moments of silence (permissible if students opt to do so but not permissible if mandated), school-sponsored prayer in public settings (impermissible), religious expression by teachers in classrooms (may be deemed officially sanctioned and impermissible especially with younger students), use of school space for religiously affiliated student organizations (permissible under generally applicable neutral policies), release time for religiously-associated education off-site (permissible), required display of the Ten Commandments in school rooms (impermissible), instruction about religion (permissible), and distribution of flyers (permissible to include information relating to religious activities but impermissible for schools to screen content so as to prohibit religious content if unfettered discretion). Courts have also entered the fray in the "intelligent design" v. evolution controversy, most recently finding that mandates to teach intelligent design represented an impermissible effort to incorporate religious doctrine in the classroom. Many efforts have been made to distill more detailed guidelines from this evolving case law including efforts by the federal Department of Education (http://www.ed.gov/policy/gen/guid/religionandschools/prayer_guidance.html), a group of 17 organizations across the spectrum of faith-based and civil-liberties organizations (http://www.church-state.org/ritps-ajscl.htm), and organizations of journalists such as the Freedom Forum and its affiliated First Amendment Center at Vanderbilt University (http://www.firstamendmentcenter.org/rel_liberty/publicschools/Index.aspx).

- Colleges and universities have also faced litigation about the implications of the Constitution's religion clauses and related "free speech" provisions. For example, the United States Supreme Court has held that a public university must make campus facilities available to student religious groups in the same way and to the same extent that it makes its space available to non-religious student organizations. Public universities must also make student fees available on the same basis for student groups whether they have sponsor or support religious and non-religious activities. On the other hand, the United States Supreme Court has concluded that public universities may deny scholarship funds to college students majoring in theology, in situations where state constitutional provisions dictate such separation (through the Washington "Blaine Amendment" that states that "No public money or property shall be appropriated or applied to any religious worship, exercise or instruction, or the support of any religious establishment"). Current controversies have focused on such issues as the legality of public universities' efforts to limit recognition of student organizations which refuse to comply with non-discrimination policies on the basis of religious beliefs that object to homosexuality or that require that leadership positions be filled by those who comply with certain religious tenets. A variety of organizations have endeavored to keep universities on their toes with regard to civil liberties relating to speech and religious liberty. Such organizations have provided extensive information to interested individuals for example, though the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (http://www.thefire.org/index.php) and the Anti-Defamation League (http://www.adl.org/civil_rights/ab/free_Exer.asp) among others.

- The First Amendment also affords relevant protections beyond those found in the "free exercise" and "establishment" clauses. It also states that "Congress shall make no law ... abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble." The courts have interpreted these and other constitutional provisions to apply to the states and have also concluded that they protect freedom of association in intimate, expressive, and political contexts. These freedoms have some limitations, however. For example, the courts have said that freedom of speech does not allow someone to "cry fire in a crowded theatre" or to use "fighting words." The right to express oneself may depend on whether the setting for such expression has been established or treated as a "public forum," and whether the governmental entity has established reasonable, content-neutral "time, place, and manner" restrictions.

- Once again, the application of these additional First Amendment freedoms to public university campuses is more complex than might initially appear. For example, the University of Michigan had adopted a "speech code" that prohibited "Any behavior, verbal or physical, that stigmatizes or victimizes an individual on the basis of race, ethnicity, religion, sex, sexual orientation, creed … and that … Creates an intimidating, hostile, or demeaning environment for educational pursuits, employment or participation in University[-]sponsored extra-curricular activities." In a guide explaining its code, the university provided several examples of conduct that it regarded as harassment, such as "You exclude someone from a study group because that person is of a different race, sex, or ethnic origin than you are; …You display a confederate flag on the door of your room in your residence hall; …"You comment in a derogatory way about a particular person or group's physical appearance or sexual orientation, or their cultural origins, or religious beliefs." In 1989, a lower federal court found this policy to be vague and overbroad. In 1991, a University of Wisconsin policy that prohibited addressing a specific individual with "racist or discriminatory comments" was also struck down by a lower federal court because the policy was not narrowly enough stated to prohibit only "fighting words."

- Some colleges have endeavored to establish "free speech zones" in order to situate student protests, allow students to distribute flyers, and hold gatherings in areas that would not disrupt classes. This approach has brought challenges at West Virginia University and New Mexico State University in instances in which the designated areas for such activity were very small. Public universities also face issues regarding the rights of the student press on their campuses. The United States Supreme Court has held that in the context of public high schools, school administrators can treat a student newspaper as a "non-public forum" and can punish or censor students for their expression if necessary for educational reasons. It specifically reserved the question of the status of college newspapers. More recently a lower federal court has said that subsidized college student newspapers should be subject to the same legal framework as applicable in high schools. The United States Supreme Court declined to review the case, and some state legislatures are currently reviewing proposals to provide statutory protections to college student newspapers. Colleges are not, however, required to fund student papers.

While the First Amendment thus restrains government in a number of important ways it does not preclude other actions that interject religious belief or affiliation into the political arena.

Political Realities

The American electorate appears to have grown increasingly polarized and profoundly divided in recent years, with divergent religious beliefs and moral judgments playing significant roles in these developments.

- A study published in 2005 by the non-partisan research organization, Public Agenda, tracked changing attitudes relating to religion and politics over the four years from 2000 to 2004 (just prior to the 2004 Presidential election). One of the survey questions asked whether respondents agreed with the following statement: "Even elected officials who are deeply religious sometimes have to make compromises and set their conflictions aside to get results while in government." In 2000 84% of the general population, 82% of those who attended religious services once a week, and 79% of evangelicals agreed with the statement, but in 2004, only 74% of the general public, only 63% of those who attended services once a week, and only 63% of evangelicals agreed (representing a drop of 10%, 19% and 16% respectively). Another question asked whether respondents believed that deeply religious people should keep their faith private, be very careful about "spreading the word of God" so as not to offend others, or "spread the word of God whenever they can." In 2000, 18% of respondents said that deeply religious people should keep their faith private, while 46% said that people with such beliefs should be very careful, and 35% said that they should spread the word actively. By 2004, the total of those who believed that people should keep their faith private or proceed carefully had dropped to 57% and the number who believed that they should spread the word of God whenever they could rose to 41%.

- In 2005, the Pew Center for Religion and Public Life found that the closely-contested 2004 President election had been marked by a deep faith-based partisan divide. More specifically, they concluded that "Americans who regularly attend worship services and hold traditional religious views increasingly vote Republican, while those who are less connected to religious institutions and more secular in their outlook tend to outlook tend to vote Democratic." In addition, "traditionalists" affiliated with evangelical, mainline Protestant, and Catholic beliefs were particularly inclined to vote Republican, suggesting that the strong partisan divide was "defined by religious outlook rather than denominational labels."

- The Pew study also found that the most important cause of the church attendance gap was the "mix of social and cultural issues that have come to the fore in the modern era" including prayer in schools, abortion, homosexuality, and gay marriage which had a tendency to "push the religiously observant into one political corner and the more secular into the other." Regional differences have also contributed, with a "broad shift to the GOP among white voters in the Evangelical-heavy South." The Pew study cited poll data indicating that "more than 70% Americans want their president to have strong religious beliefs," while "only a quarter of voters said that politicians 'mention religious faith and prayer too much.'" At the same time 65% of poll respondents said they thought that churches should not endorse political candidates.

- Academic observers have debated whether shifts represent a form of "culture war" that will endure or change in coming days. At a recent forum conducted by the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life, Professors Alan Wolfe and James Davison Hunter highlighted competing viewpoints more fully aired in their new book, Is There a Culture War: A Dialogue on Values and American Public Life (Brookings Institution Press, 2006). Several important questions are worth considering such as: Does a small proportion of Americans (elites on both the left and right of the political spectrum) fuel the divide? What can be said about those situated in the vast center? Is there a growing tendency for religious denominations to splinter along ideological lines? Will there be a return to inter-religious conflicts rather than intra-religious conflicts? Will people of faith conclude that close alliance with political forces is inadvisable in the long run? Other scholars such as Pietro Nivola of the Brookings Institute have suggested that there are a variety of forces that contribute to America's polarization. While religion is one of these forces, others must be considered, including historical circumstances, regional political realignments, parity between the major political parties, the role of the media in fueling an artificial frenzy of attacks and counter-attacks, the tendency of new media and internet communication to provide more vehicles for ideological viewpoints to be expressed and find those of like minds, changing norms of civility, gerrymandering, and the nature of political primaries.

America's "Civil Religion" and Current Challenges

- Robert Bellah, the noted sociologist of religion who authored Habits of the Heart, a study of American values and patterns of interaction in a simpler day, has suggested that developments in the wake of the 9/11 terrorist attacks have deeply challenged Americans' sense of themselves and their country. In his view, an American "civil religion" has characterized America's earlier history. (The term is one term used by Rousseau to connote "the existence of God, the life to come, the reward of virtue and the punishment of vice, and the exclusion of religious intolerance"). In Bellah's view, this "religion" does not correspond to or substitute for Christianity but instead facilitated a "wide sphere of personal piety and voluntary social action… left to the churches… [which] were neither to control the state nor to be controlled by it."

- According to Bellah, America's "civic religion" faced its first crisis during the war for independence, and a second a crucial challenge at the time of the Civil War when the country had to face fundamental questions about slavery and its implications for the nation's core values. At that time, Bellah believes, the "theme of sacrifice was indelibly written into the civic religion." Now, in Bellah's view, the country stands at a third great crisis in which is must confront "the problem of responsible action in a revolutionary world, a world seeking to attain many of the things, material and spiritual that we [Americans] already have attained." For Bellah, the challenge that confronts Americans and our civil religion is how we will use our power and whether we will be able to contribute in a meaningful way to the "attainment of some kind of viable and coherent world order" built upon "an awareness that our nation stands under higher judgment." For Bellah, successful navigation of this third challenge would depend on the recognition that "the American civil religion is not the worship of the American nation but an understanding of the American experience in the light of ultimate and university reality, [resulting in a] reorganization [that] that need not disrupt the American civil religion's continuity" but could instead contribute to a better world beyond our shores.

Part II: CHOICES:

What should we (faculty, students, staff of a public university) do in the face of such tensions?

When it comes to personal faith and conscience: how, when, where, and with whom can we speak our minds on a public university campus?

In the section that follows, four possible approaches are outlined that allow considered discussion about the issues presented in the background reading above. These approaches were developed through repeated discussions that sought to "frame" a core question about what is currently troubling us on public university campuses, and to provide fair-minded alternatives that address some of our concerns. These are not the only alternatives, and there are likely to be ways in which those using this discussion guide will agree and disagree with each. They are presented in this format to facilitate careful consideration of multiple, authentic viewpoints in a deliberate way that informs and enlightens us.

Four principal approaches follow:

Approach 1: Pursue questions of personal faith and conscience in private and maintain the university's neutrality.
Approach 2: Enhance student options and engage outside the classroom.
Approach 3: Engage personal faith and conscience in the classroom, respectfully, if faculty choose
Approach 4: Engage questions of faith and conscience widely, actively, and deliberately

The materials that follow develop each of these approaches though a more detailed description, enumeration of pros and cons, references to the background reading, and presentation of illustrative scenarios drawn from real life.

Please probe and weigh these alternative approaches, but remember that the point of this discussion is to illuminate rather than to score debating points or to resolve things by a formal vote. You will also have an opportunity to suggest additional approaches toward the end of this conversation.

APPROACH 1
PURSUE IN PRIVATE AND MAINTAIN UNIVERSITY NEUTRALITY

Description: Speech about personal faith and conscience belongs in private settings or off campus, in keeping with public universities' secular character and obligations of neutrality. Under this approach, individual students and faculty who wish to explore faith-based beliefs and judgments of conscience could do so in private settings with friends and family, in faith-based communities, or in other groups. The university would respect the desire of community members to engage in such discussions, but would not make special efforts to encourage or discourage such discussions. Thus, students and faculty could continue to discuss such their beliefs and views over coffee, or attend gatherings or services with whomever they choose. The university as an institution would maintain its historical neutrality rather than giving more attention to faith-based beliefs or matters of conscience.

Pros: Those who support this approach tend to emphasize the following ideas in support of their views.

- Personal faith-based beliefs and judgments of conscience arise in the innermost hearts and minds of individuals. They're something that should be protected from intrusion and thus should best be addressed in settings that are private and voluntary, as has traditionally be the practice.
- Some students say that they're most comfortable in talking with peers about faith-based beliefs and judgments of conscience when they can do so very informally with those they trust in private settings.
- Many opportunities exist to explore faith-based and conscience-based viewpoints in private conversations with friends and family members, in churches and synagogues, or in other faith-based or community groups. Universities lack relevant expertise and should defer to others in these settings. In light of these options, there's no need for public universities to intervene.
- Public universities should focus on academic matters that are more properly within their expertise and should steer clear or involvement with matters of faith and conscience as they affect individual members of university communities. As a matter of policy, it's best to maintain neutrality in this arena and attempt to steer clear of the "culture wars" that trouble the larger society.
- Constitutional principles relating to the "wall" between church and state should be observed. Members of the public who are taxed to fund public universities expect that such institutions will observe legal requirements relating to separation of church and state, much as they expect such neutrality from public elementary and secondary schools. Faculty and students likewise choose public universities with a full understanding that they are different from other colleges and universities with faith-based affiliations.

Cons. Those who disagree with this approach tend to emphasize concerns such as the following:

- Personal faith and conscience cannot be readily separated from day-to-day life so this approach is artificial and impractical.
- Many students and faculty have deeply held beliefs rooted in personal faith and conscience and this approach would make the campus less hospitable and welcoming for them.
- Artificial efforts to encourage discussions of personal faith and conscience primarily in private settings marginalize such questions. Requiring discussion of personal faith and conscience to take place elsewhere is anti-intellectual since these are important topics that need to be engaged when they arise.
- Critical issues facing society are the proper subject of intellectual inquiry within university settings. Faculty members currently cover topics that raise issues of personal faith and conscience when relevant to their subject matter. More emphatic emphasis on neutrality might make it difficult for them to pursue the issues that they believe in their best judgment are appropriate, and might impinge on the academic freedom of them and their students.
- The "wall" between church and state is not clearly delineated. It is likely that conflicts will arise whether or not the university attempts to embrace "neutrality." The tensions found in the larger society will lead to litigation involving public universities whatever they do.

Particularly Relevant Reading: Approach 1

- Background on student religious affiliations and spirituality, teenage trends, political viewpoints
- Background on disciplinary perspectives and faculty viewpoints
- Background on American beliefs about faith, legal principles, historical perspectives, and political realities

Scenarios for Discussion: Approach 1

A. Admissions Decisions. A college admissions officer is facing a difficult decision in evaluating several prospective undergraduates' high school transcripts. One student had attended a religiously-oriented high school and sought to apply three courses toward required basic admissions requirements in English, history and government: "Christianity and Morality in American Literature," "Christianity's Influence on American History" and "Special Providence: American Government". Another student's transcript included courses on "Race, Class, and Gender in Modern America," "Feminist Issues throughout U.S. History," and "Introduction to Jewish Thought" toward the high school credits required (though not in required areas such as English, history, and government). (based on issues facing UC-Davis)

B. Personal Advice: A faculty member in a technical field is devout and reveals his own religious background to students on the first day of class. Many of the students write on their information sheets that one of their life goals is to develop a closer relationship with God. In a public forum on religion in his department, he asked whether it would be appropriate for him to suggest prayer to those struggling students who have revealed to him their own desire to connect to God. (based on University of Michigan "Difficult Dialogues" scenario).

C. Living and Learning. A resident adviser at the university has contacted students on her dorm floor inviting them to attend a study group she's created on Buddhism. Other students have decided to organize a standing dinner discussion group at the campus cafeteria to discuss Islam. (based in part on example from UW-Eau Claire)

APPROACH 2
ENHANCE STUDENT OPTIONS AND ENGAGE OUTSIDE THE CLASSROOM

Description: Students should have ample opportunities to explore issues of personal faith and conscience if they choose to do so, but such opportunities should be situated primarily outside the classroom. Consideration of such matters is particularly important during the college years. Many students express serious interest in developing meaningful philosophies of life and in deepening their sense of spirituality. The most suitable setting for such exploration lies outside the standard classroom so that students express their own beliefs without discomfiting challenges from professors and classmates in more formal settings. At the same time, students be provided with support structures and varied occasions in which issues of faith and conscience can be explored. Students could work with those involved in student affairs on campuses to develop additional supportive strategies, for example through public service options, housing choices, additional campus programming, leadership development programs, counseling opportunities, or "safe zone" training.

Pros.

- Students have important educational and developmental needs related to faith and conscience, and should have meaningful opportunities to work with these issues on campus rather than having to pursue them elsewhere.
- This approach allows campus ministries and student organizations to take leadership and to share their expertise, and respects the academic freedom of faculty to address other subjects in the classroom.
- Speech about personal faith and conscience on campus is best situated outside the classroom where faculty are not involved in judging or grading students' views.
- This approach accommodates the views of all members of the campus community, including those of varying faith-based traditions and those who are agnostic, atheistic, or non-religious.
- This approach emphasizes the potential for creative initiatives led by students in order to meet their most substantial interests and needs.

Cons

- People of faith who oppose compartmentalization might find this approach artificial since it precludes conversations about personal faith and conscience in the classroom.
- Faculty who wish to address such issues in the classroom might feel that this approach marginalizes opportunities for engaging with pressing issues in the classroom, or creates false impressions that addressing relevant issues in the classroom is undesirable.
- Those who have a very evangelistic view of their faith and wish to express it in all aspects of their life may believe the university is cutting into or policing their faith by encouraging discussions to be held outside the classroom rather than in classroom settings.
- Giving personal faith and belief an institutional place on campus in non-classroom settings might be seen by some as intruding on the principle of university neutrality.
- Students and student affairs professionals may find it difficult and uncomfortable to deal with the kinds of conflicts and contention that increasingly characterize religious and political debates going on outside campus walls.

Particularly Relevant Reading: Approach 2

- Background on student spirituality, intellectual and moral development
- Background on spirituality and the professoriate,
- Background on American beliefs about faith, legal principles, historical perspectives, and political realities

Scenarios for Discussion: Approach 2

D. Student Speaker. An elected student government leader has been asked to give a welcoming speech to incoming students at a public university. He urges them to set their sights high and goes on to say that he has accepted Christ as his savior and hopes they will as well. Other students criticized his actions, saying he had been elected to represent the whole student body, including those of diverse faith-related viewpoints. (based on Dartmouth incident)

E. Student Organizations. A university requires every student organization wishing to use university facilities and receive student fees in support of its activities to sign a pledge stating that the organization will not discriminate in its membership based on race, ethnicity, gender, creed, religion, nationality, age, disability, or sexual orientation. A student group affiliated with a particular religious sect refused to sign the statement, saying that its mission required it to admit only those who shared a particular religious faith. The group also approached Student Congress and requested funding for a proposed new student publication designed to encourage others to adopt the faith of its members. (based on examples at UNC-CH, and elsewhere)

F. Residence Hall Choices. A group of students has asked the university to establish a special dorm "theme floor" for students who are Roman Catholics or interested in Roman Catholicism. An evangelical Christian group has met with the dean of students and student government officers to demand that rules that currently prohibit solicitation in dormitories be changed so that their members can go door-to-door to distribute leaflets and talk with students living there about their beliefs. (based in part on example from UW-Madison).

APPROACH 3
ENGAGE PERSONAL FAITH AND CONSCIENCE IN THE CLASSROOM, RESPECTFULLY, IF FACULTY CHOOSE

Description. Speech about personal faith and conscience may occur on campus, including in the classroom, if conducted respectfully and if the professor believes it relevant. Some faculty members teach about topics that are directly relevant to personal faith and conscience, for example in courses in the sciences, literature, philosophy, public policy, gender and queer studies, history, journalism, political science, social work, nursing and medicine. Students would receive a poorer education if issues with implications for personal faith and conscience were not raised and addressed with a critical eye and an open mind in settings such as these. Faculty members have expertise in judging the relevance of topics and the best pedagogical techniques for exploring them. They should therefore be accorded considerable flexibility, in keeping with academic freedom principles, to determine when and in what ways issues of faith and conscience should be engaged. To encourage effective educational engagement in such settings, particularly in contentious times, faculty members should be provided with more extensive faculty development opportunities that help build skill in dealing with controversy in the classroom, and should be able to receive clear answers about their rights and responsibilities in such contexts. Students should also be given opportunities for training in handling "difficult dialogues" in the classroom so that they can actively participate and feel comfortable in doing so. Universities which believe that providing meaningful education on issues that intersect with personal faith and conscience might also find ways to encourage faculty members to incorporate such topics in their classes if relevant, and to flag classes raising such classes so that interested students can more readily enroll.

Pros.

- Faculty members whose courses touch on matters of faith and conscience should have the opportunity to introduce such topics as they believe relevant and wise.
- Classroom discussions provide for powerful learning opportunities by linking teaching with learning that takes place both inside and outside the classroom
- Inclusion of such discussions in the classroom allows faculty and students to engage with each other authentically rather than artificially separating matters of faith and conscience so as to compartmentalize their lives.
- This approach allows students to engage with faculty members if the students are conversant with their faith and ready to talk about it or are struggling with how their faith relates to issues raised in class.
- This approach is most consistent with universities' educational and intellectual mission, which anticipates active efforts to explore difficult questions and current issues including those relating to personal faith and conscience.

Concerns

- This approach may create blurry lines about what is relevant in class or what responses are "respectful," and leaves these decisions in professors' (rather than students') hands.
- This approach may give rise to expectations of in-class discussions when professors are hard-pressed to cover material in courses as it is or may reasonably believe that such discussions are not relevant or may feel that this approach intrudes upon their academic freedom.
- Professors and students may not be skilled in addressing challenging, hot-button issues where issues of faith and intellectual inquiry collide, so that it may be difficult to conduct such dialogues in ways that foster effective learning.
- Students and professors may feel put on the spot if asked to express their views on issues of this sort.
- This approach may result in faculty and students engaging with issues of faith and conscience in the classroom, when such issues might best be addressed in other settings (such as in student settings, dormitories, faith-based communities or with friends)

Relevant Background Reading: Approach 3

- Background reading regarding student religious affiliations and implications, intellectual and moral development in college, political viewpoints and student values
- Background reading on spirituality and the professoriate, disciplinary frameworks, academic freedom, liberal education and the curriculum
- Background reading on American beliefs about faith, legal principles, historical perspectives, and political perspectives
- Materials available from the UNC Center for Teaching and Learning ("For Your Consideration #21 [Managing Classroom Conflict] and #22 [Teaching Controversial Issues]), available at http://ctl.unc.edu/newctl.html

Scenarios for Discussion: Approach 3

G. Learning to Act. A Mormon woman applied for admission to an actor-training program at a public university. At the time she applied she told program officials that she would not be willing to use profane language or appear in the nude because of her religious beliefs. Initially, when classroom exercises included performing scripts that included profanity, she changed the words. Subsequently, her instructors told her that she needed to perform the scenes as written because copyright words of playwrights could not be changed without written permission for public performances, and because students needed to take on roles with characters unlike themselves (including characters such as a pregnant, unwed prostitute to whose lines the student objected). (based on an incident at the University of Utah).

H. Internship Placement. In a field placement at a faith-based organization, a student became aware that her supervisors understood faith to be an integral part of their patient counseling. The student is from a different faith tradition and not particularly religious. Although she was open to responding to discussions about religion initiated by patients, she felt uncomfortable raising the topic herself as her mentors expected her to do. (based on University of Michigan "Difficult Dialogues" scenario)

I. Recommendation Letter. A student approached the undergraduate adviser in the biology department, and requested a recommendation to medical school. The adviser reviewed her transcript and noted that she had not yet taken a required course in evolutionary biology. The student said that she declined to take the course because of her religious beliefs. The adviser then declined to give the requested recommendation noting that a student who had not taken that course would be poorly prepared for medical school and could not be recommended. (based on incident at Texas Tech)

J. Classroom Dialogues: A group of faculty and students recently began discussing some of the "tips" they'd offer others on dealing with controversy in the classroom. Some of their ideas are listed below. Are there other tips worth noting?
   - ✓ Respect for students is paramount, and it can't be faked. The message should be "feel free to disagree with me and support your point of view." It's important to know students and their backgrounds. It's important to discuss the value of open dialogue and conflict in the marketplace of ideas. Personal discomfort is inevitable are ideas are challenged. That is how we grow and why it is so valuable to engage with different viewpoints in the classroom.
   - ✓ Faculty and students need to work together to create a safe place for open discussion. Some faculty set "ground rules" while others encourage students to reach "group agreements." Students need to know what to expect regarding how controversial topics will be covered. Everyone's perspectives need to be welcomed and treated fairly. Controversial issues can be honored by covering different perspectives. Be sure students know the difference between personal attacks and honest discussion of one's own experiences, values and ideas. Faculty members should also avoid snide comments and should provide students with opportunities to talk with them outside class to raise questions about fairness in treatment of difficult issues.
   - ✓ Faculty members disagree about whether they should disclose their own opinions on controversial topics (some say disclosure dampens discussion, others state their opinion and reasons to encourage others to engage). They also need to appreciate that certain topics are very emotional for students and be prepared to handle such emotions. They should also be ready to deal with students who say something inflammatory.

APPROACH 4
ENGAGE QUESTIONS OF FAITH AND CONSCIENCE WIDELY, ACTIVELY AND DELIBERATELY

Description. Public universities should actively encourage more widespread conversation and engagement with issues of personal faith and conscience throughout their campuses, including in private, student, classroom, and academic settings. Personal faith and conscience are great personal importance as well as increasing social importance yet have led to increasing division within modern societies including the United States. Public universities, no less than their private counterparts, need to engage more actively with related issues and competing viewpoints in order to prepare students for global realities and future roles as citizens. University leaders, faculty and students have worked actively in recent years to engage with issues of multiculturalism and the implications of gender, race, ethnicity, sexuality. Questions of faith and spirituality may in some ways seem more personal, private, and fraught with political overtones. Nonetheless, current conflicts and misunderstandings between those of different faith- and conscience-based traditions unless there are active efforts build bridges that do not currently exist. Special care will be needed to proceed deliberately, creatively, and sensitively in meeting associated challenges. A comprehensive, active approach might include efforts relating to the curriculum, such as: strengthening curricular offerings relating to philosophy, religious studies, or faith-related components of varied courses; developing new courses; or draw on existing models used in other contexts (perhaps a new type of "Great Decisions" course that emphasizes issues of faith and conscience rather than international affairs). It might also be desirable to expand speaker programs focused on issues of faith and conscience featuring either campus-based on visiting speakers. Student affairs programming might be expanded in ways discussed under Approach 2. Campuses might also draw together members of the public from differing faith- and conscience-based viewpoints to engage with those on campus.

Pros

- This approach addresses the range of objectives noted with regard to earlier approaches.
- Public universities are appropriate settings in which to engage with the full-range of pressing social issues and competing viewpoints so that they can be understood more fully. They may be able to bring light (rather than heat) to matters currently confounding the larger society.
- Developing tools for and experience with discussion of deeply-felt differences is important for the future of society and civic life.
- Engaging respectfully with issues of faith and conscience allows students and faculty to learn from others' viewpoints without forcing one's beliefs on others. Issues of faith and conscience are of great importance to students and citizens and it is better to engage with them than to marginalize them in unhealthy ways.
- A multi-faceted, comprehensive approach that engage members of the campus community in a range of contexts are more likely to be effective in broadening understanding and respect than are approaches that limit related discussions to more narrow contexts such as those detailed in earlier approaches.

Cons

- Taking on issues of faith and conscience in a comprehensive way within a public university may create controversy and division. Some faculty, students, parents, and members of the larger community might experience this approach as overbearing and inappropriate in light of their own personal faith and conscience-based beliefs. This approach might also create risks of interference from external forces tied to religious or political viewpoints, or public opprobrium if good-faith efforts prove problematic in execution.
- Some faculty member might worry that this approach could compromise the intellectual ideals and secular nature of the universities or blur important distinctions between the type of critical thinking and intellectual inquiry that is central to a university education and more personal views rooted in conscience and faith-based beliefs. Intermingling issues of faith and conscience in public higher education institutional settings may prove difficult because of the multitude of diverse faith- and conscience-based perspectives or create concerns that such beliefs are not treated with equal respect or attention.
- The University may lack the capacity and competence to undertake such an effort, given other curricular obligations, academic priorities, and resource constraints. Faculty and students may also lack the skills, perspectives, and interests to be navigate challenging topics and conversations effectively.
- Depending on how it would be implemented, this approach might raise legal questions relating to the appropriate roles of publicly funded higher education, faith-based institutions, and individuals' freedom of conscience.
- This approach is less well-defined and may raise expectations that cannot be realized.

Relevant Background Reading: Approach 4

- Background reading on students (all)
- Background reading on faculty (all)
- Background reading on the world beyond the campus (all)
- Background on initiatives at other universities involved in the Ford Foundation's "Difficult Dialogues" initiative: http://difficultdialogues.org

Scenarios for Discussion: Approach 4

K. Learning Tolerance. Members of the faculty at the nation's military academies have significant responsibilities in preparing future military officers to endure the pressures of battle and the challenges of leading troops into harm's way. Recently, several students and faculty who held very strong Christian viewpoints encouraged students in their classes to adopt religious viewpoints similar to their own and began meetings and sports events attended by more junior cadets with prayers. The Academy recently clarified its rules on these issues and implemented a course on "religious tolerance" that is required of all cadets. (based on events at Air Force Academy)

L. Middle East Controversies. In the wake of growing tensions in the Middle East, a number of universities have faced their own Middle East controversies. A faculty member in Middle-Eastern studies was alleged to permit only those sharing his viewpoints on the Palestine/Israeli conflict in his class and to challenge Jewish students who disagreed with him repeatedly. A distinguished junior faculty member in the political science department was openly shunned and criticized on a colleague's blog as a result of her recent scholarship criticizing the role played by religious belief in recent diplomatic history (contrary to her colleague's view). A group of students proposed a very pro-Palestinian art exhibit while another group wanted to bring a very controversial pro-Israeli speaker to campus at the same time. Campus officials believed that these events would create adverse reaction and potential security issues, and accordingly told students they could not use campus facilities for these purposes unless they contributed to the costs of extra security measures (based on events at Columbia, Arizona State, UC-Berkeley and elsewhere).

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, September 14, 2006 3:13 PM
To: MacLean, Douglas <maclean@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: John Broome Seminar

I would like a copy of Broome's "Ought" paper.
Thanks
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, September 14, 2006 3:23 PM
To: MacLean, Douglas <maclean@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: John Broome's paper

Thanks for both!
Jan

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, September 14, 2006 3:24 PM
To: Lance Westerlund <westy@email.unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: Re: John Broome Seminar]
Attach: Re John Broome Seminar.msg

I am not hooked up to a printer on this computer, so could you print this off for me.

thanks,
Jan
--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: MacLean, Douglas <maclean@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, September 14, 2006 3:15 PM
To: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: John Broome Seminar
Attach: ought.pdf

---

here it is.

Jan Boxill wrote:
>
> I would like a copy of Broome's "Ought" paper.
> Thanks
> Jan
>

--
Douglas MacLean
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
CB #3125 Caldwell Hall
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

Tel: 919-843-4500 (office)
919-942-2759 (home)
Fax: 919-843-3929

2
Ought

2.1 The central normative concept

The central normative concept is ought.

That is not a startling claim; many philosophers take it for granted. However, it needs some support for two reasons. One is that ought has a rival for the post of the central normative concept: the concept of a reason. Another is the idea that there is not a single normative concept of ought but several. For example, there is the subjective ought and the objective ought, there is the moral ought and the rational ought, and so on. I shall come to the concept of a reason in the next chapter. This chapter deals with the other challenge to the centrality of ought.

Why do I say the central normative concept is ought and not good? Only because I use the term 'normative' narrowly. Many authors include the evaluative within the normative; I do not. So for me good is not a normative concept at all. I am neither asserting nor denying that ought is in some way more central than good. The relative priority of ought and good is not an issue in this book.

In defending my claim that ought is the central normative concept, I need to identify which concept I have in mind. Our word 'ought' has a meaning that varies with the context, and it is sometimes ambiguous even in a single context. Only one of its meanings is the central normative concept. I need to identify which one that is. In the course of doing so, I shall explain why it, rather than some other concept designated by 'ought', is the central normative one.

I think the concept I identify is fairly called 'central', and I shall explain why. However, if you doubt that it is truly central, that does not matter much for my purposes. The important thing for me is to identify the concept I shall be using in this book.

I shall not try to identify it by analysing it. I do not think it can be analysed; it is primitive. But I contend that most people understand it well anyway, without analysis. So to home in on the central normative concept, I simply need to pick it out from among the various other concepts that 'ought' can designate. I shall set those other meanings aside. I do not need to analyse them either, because they are all familiar. I shall simply point them out.

2.2 Normative and non-normative oughts

First, there are non-normative senses of 'ought'. Examples appear in:

Pluto's orbit ought to be elliptic,

The plural of 'mouse' ought to be 'mouses',

We ought to have heard from the landing module ten minutes ago, and in These raspberries ought to ripen in June.

I cannot specify the non-normative meaning of 'ought' completely, but I can specify one of its implications. So far as I can tell, 'A ought to F' always implies that A would F if conditions were ideal in some respect. This is at least one part of the meaning of 'ought'. The context fixes the respect in which conditions might be ideal.

Ideal conditions are ones that are in some way refined or purified. In the landing module example, they are the conditions that would obtain if everything went as planned. In the Pluto example, they are the conditions that would obtain if there were no extraneous interfering factors. In the raspberry example they are the conditions that would obtain if things developed as normal. In the 'mouses' example, they are the conditions that would obtain if life was simple. And so on.

'Ideal' is not necessarily a normative word; ideal conditions are not necessarily ones that ought normatively to obtain. However, for normative as well as for non-normative senses of 'ought', 'A ought to F' implies that A would F if conditions were ideal in some respect – in this case, if they were the conditions that ought normatively to obtain. They conditions are ideal in what we may call the normative respect.

Since 'ought' always has this connection with an ideal, whether it is used normatively or non-normatively, we might suspect that its normative and non-normative senses are continuous with each other. Furthermore, some examples seem to lie on a borderline between the two. One is this:

Christine ought to know her seven-times table by the age of nine.

One implication of this sentence is the non-normative one that Christine would know her seven-times table by the age of nine if conditions were ideal in the respect that she developed as normal. On the other hand, the sentence also seems to carry some of the implications that go with normative uses of 'ought'. It seems to imply someone is at fault – perhaps Christine or perhaps her teachers – if Christine does not know her seven-times table by the age of nine. It implies that Christine would know her seven-times tables by the age of nine if conditions were ideal in the normative respect.

Even some of my previous examples can appear to lie on the borderline of the normative. The 'mouses' example could suggest a complaint against English grammar, that it is not as it normatively ought to be. Examples like this may suggest there is no sharp boundary between normative and non-normative uses of 'ought'.

But actually there is no continuity; the normative and non-normative senses are sharply distinct. These examples are ambiguous cases rather than borderline cases.

Suppose you believe children ought not to be taught arithmetic till they are teenagers, so you think no one ought to know their tables till they are fourteen. You certainly do not think Christine ought normatively to know her seven-times table by the age of nine. However, suppose you know that Christine is going through a standard education. You know that, if she developed normally in those surroundings, she would know her seven-times table by the age of nine. You can agree that, in a sense, she ought to know her seven-times table by the age of nine; she would know it if she developed normally.

Suppose you glory in the idiosyncrasies of English. You recognize that the plural of 'mouse' would be 'mouses' if grammar were idealized in one way. So you can agree that the plural of 'mouse' ought in one sense to be 'mouses'. But you do not think this idealization ought to obtain, so in another sense you do not think the plural of 'mouse' ought to be 'mouses'.

These examples show you using 'ought' in two quite different senses, a normative one and a non-normative one. The statement that the plural of 'mouse' ought to be 'mouses' and the statement that Christine ought to know her seven-times table by the age of nine are ambiguous. The 'ought' in them may have either sense, or it may waver between one and the other. But it is not on any borderline.

I call one of the senses of 'ought' the normative sense, but I cannot specify how to pick that one out from the others. It is the one that is given by what I called the normative ideal, as opposed to some other ideal. But I could not explain the term 'normative' except in terms of 'ought'. 'Normative' means to do with ought, but this ought has to be the normative one, of course. So this definition gets us nowhere if we cannot already identify the normative sense of 'ought'. I simply have to assume you know a normative 'ought' when you see one. I do assume that: I assume that you like most people understand the normative ought well.

The terminology in this area is confusing because so many words have both normative and non-normative senses. Even the word 'normative' has a non-normative (in my sense) sense. For instance, it may be used to mean to do with norms, and 'a norm' in turn may be used to mean a rule a requirement,[1] or alternatively something that normally happens. When I need to make the distinction, I shall tendentiously call normativity as I mean it 'true normativity'. I think it is what most moral philosophers and philosophers of normativity, if not other people, mean by 'normativity'.

Naturalism

In her Natural Goodness, Philippa Foot introduces the concept of natural normativity. She introduces it in the context of natural history. She says:

> We are, let us suppose, evaluating the roots of a particular oak tree, saying perhaps that it has good roots because they are as sturdy and deep as an oak's roots should be. ... Oak trees need to stay upright because, unlike creeping plants, they have no possibility of life on the ground, and they are tall, heavy trees. Therefore oaks need to have deep, sturdy roots: there is something wrong with them if they do not. ... The good of an oak is its individual and reproductive life cycle, and what is necessary for this in an Aristotelian necessity in its case. Since it cannot bend like a reed in the wind, an oak that is as an oak should be is one that has deep and sturdy roots.[2]

Foot takes the notion of 'Aristotelian necessity' from Elizabeth Anscombe: an Aristotelian necessity is 'that which is necessary because and in so far as good hangs on it'.[3] Foot says the good for an oak is to complete its life cycle: to survive for a few hundred years, acquire nutrition, reproduce, and so on. For this it needs deep sturdy roots. So an oak should have deep, sturdy roots. If I understand Foot right, 'A should F' in this sense simply means that *F*ing is an Aristotelian necessity for something of A's species. That is to say, *F*ing is necessary for the good of something of A's species.

'A should F' in this sense implies that A would F if conditions were ideal in a particular respect, namely if A achieved its good. So Foot's 'A should F' meets the condition I mentioned for 'A ought to F'. Foot more often uses 'should' where I use 'ought to', but these expressions are generally synonymous. In deference to her, I shall switch to 'should' in this discussion of her argument.

In 'An oak should have deep, sturdy roots', the 'should' refers to what Foot calls natural normativity. It is very reasonable for Foot to use the term 'natural normativity' as she does. That an oak has deep, sturdy roots could fairly be called 'a norm', and that is enough to justify the term. However, in the context of an oak, natural normativity is not what I call true normativity. To say an oak should, in the sense of natural normativity, have deep, sturdy roots is only to say it needs deep, sturdy roots to complete its life cycle. This is not a truly normative statement. One might consistently agree that an oak should in this sense have deep, sturdy roots, but think nevertheless that, in the truly normative sense of 'should', it is not the case that an oak should have deep, sturdy roots. I dare say that for many oaks it is not the case that they should in the truly normative sense have deep, sturdy roots.

Foot applies the same notion of natural normativity to human beings: a human being should F if *F*ing is necessary for the good of a member of the human species. Whereas the good of non-human living things is to complete their life-cycle, human beings have a much broader and more complex good. It includes living cooperatively, in caring relationships with other human beings. Being virtuous is necessary for this good. So being virtuous is an Aristotelian necessity for human beings. Each human being should be virtuous, therefore. 'Should' here has the same meaning as it has in 'an oak should have deep, sturdy roots'.

Foot hopes to derive the conclusion that each human being should be virtuous, where 'should' is truly normative. But this conclusion cannot be drawn. The assumption is that each human being should be virtuous, where this is a matter of natural normativity. This means simply that being virtuous is necessary to the good of human beings. This is not a truly normative claim. 'Good' is to be understood in the same way as the good of an oak. The good of an oak is completing its life-cycle; it is not a normative notion. The good of a human being is more complex but nevertheless a matter of the way human beings live their lives. It is not a normative notion either. So the claim that being virtuous is necessary to the good of human beings is not normative.

That human beings should in the sense of natural normativity be virtuous leaves it an open question whether they should in the truly normative sense be virtuous. The answer to the question is no doubt 'yes', but this conclusion cannot be derived from Foot's natural normativity.

Foot intends to exhibit a continuity between the natural and the normative. I think she fails in her intention. Her 'should' starts with a natural definition, and never goes beyond the natural to the truly normative. I have used against her the old objection to naturalism that stems ultimately from G. E. Moore.[4] No natural fact is truly normative.

2.3 Owned oughts

Compare the sentences

The prime minister ought to tell the truth and The meeting ought to start at ten.

The first ascribes ownership of an ought to the prime minister. I cannot accurately describe the sort of ownership I have in mind. As I said on page 8, I cannot analyse the concept of ought, but only point it out. I could say the prime minister bears the burden of the ought, or the responsibility for it, but the words 'burden' and 'responsibility' have various connotations that might lead you to misunderstand me. I hope you will just recognize the way in which oughts can be owned.

Owned oughts are well recognized within philosophy. Lloyd Humberstone describes ownership as a sort of agent-relativity.[5] That is certainly correct, but 'relative' is a very indeterminate term, and section 3.6 explains that 'agent-relativity' normally has a different meaning among moral philosophers. Humberstone's more specificic term is 'agent-implicating'. By that he means just what I mean by 'owned'.

On the other hand, 'The meeting ought to start at ten' does not ascribe ownership of the ought to the meeting, or to anyone. Some ought sentences ascribe ownership and others do not. However, we cannot tell from the grammar of a sentence whether or not it ascribes ownership. Indeed, extraordinarily, in strict grammar English does not provide any way of ascribing ownership. The appendix to this chapter explains why not.

Briefly, the source of the grammatical problem is that 'ought' is an auxiliary verb. It combines with a lexical verb to form a single, compound verb. One consequence is that constructions using 'ought' do not offer as many argument-places as we logically need for expressing ownership. We need places for two noun phrases: one to designate the owner of the ought and one to be the subject of the lexical verb. But we get only one place.

What we actually do in English to express ownership is adopt a device that is grammatically indefensible. I call it 'reparsing' and describe it in the appendix. Even reparsing leaves us with ambiguous sentences that may or may not ascribe ownership. Only the context tells us that 'The prime minister ought to tell the truth' ascribes ownership but 'The meeting ought to start at ten' does not.

It may be good enough in ordinary life to rely on the context, but it is not always good enough in philosophy. Sometimes I shall need to make ownership explicit. To do that, I shall adopt a grammatical innovation that is described in the appendix. I shall use a sentence of the form:

The prime minister ought that the prime minister tells the truth.

This is not grammatical. However, it very well could have been, and it is clear what it means. It ascribes ownership of the ought to the prime minister. It has two argument places, one to designate the owner, and one for the subject of 'tell'. In this example both places are occupied by the same phrase, 'the prime minister'. But in principle they need not be.

The state ought that children receive a better education.

is an example where the two argument places have different occupants.

In practice, it may turn out that we can always cast what we need to say into sentences in which both argument-places have the same occupant. For instance, perhaps we would loose nothing if we said, instead of the previous sentence:

The state ought that the state sees to it that children receive a better education.

This does not have exactly the same meaning, but it may equally well convey what we need to say. The appendix gives some more consideration to this question of whether our 'ought' sentences can always be recast in this way. But even if they can, my construction is not redundant. Its purpose is to distinguish statements that ascribe ownership, such as 'The prime minister ought to tell the truth', from those that do not, such as 'The meeting ought to start at ten'.

Nevertheless, in this book outside this section, I can generally rely on context to distinguish sentences that ascribe ownership. Indeed, I authorize you to take it for granted that all my 'ought' sentences outside this section ascribe ownership, unless I say otherwise. I shall rarely need to use the 'ought that' construction. However, I cannot avoid it in some situations. I shall have to use it when an 'ought' governs a conditional sentence, and I need to ascribe ownership of the ought to someone. The appendix explains that I cannot do this with any grammatical construction. I also have to use it where, in formal statements, I need to say such things as 'N ought that p'. On page 71, in describing an owned reason, I shall use the corresponding ungrammatical construction 'reason that'.

Owned and unowned oughts

Not all 'ought' sentences ascribe ownership. Nevertheless, the ought they describe may be owned by someone. For example, 'The meeting ought to start at ten' may be true because there is someone who ought that the meeting starts at ten. There may be several people who own an ought that is attached to the same proposition. Perhaps each member of the committee ought that the meeting starts at ten. Of some propositions, it may even be true that everyone in the world owns an ought attached to that proposition. Perhaps each of us ought that peace is promoted, say.

However, some 'ought' sentences appear to assert the existence of oughts that are owned by no one.

Life ought not be so unfair describes a plausible example. This sentence certainly does not ascribe ownership of the ought to life. If it describes an owned ought, then there must be somebody who ought that life is not so unfair. God seems the only candidate; yet it seems that even an atheist might sincerely say 'Life ought not to be so unfair'.

This example suggests we have the concept of an unowned ought. I do not insist this is so; it does not matter for my argument. But I shall allow for the possibility of unowned oughts. I shall make an unowned ought explicit by using a construction of the form

It ought to be the case that life is not so unfair.

Logically, I take both owned and unowned oughts to be properties of propositions. 'It ought to be the case that life is not so unfair' has the logical form $O_{unowned}p$. $O_{unowned}$ is a property of the proposition p – in this case, the proposition that life is not so unfair. 'The prime minister ought that the prime minister tells the truth' has the logical form $NO_{owned}p$. O_{owned} is a relation that holds between the person N and the proposition p – in this case, between the prime minister and the proposition that the prime minister tells the truth.[6] (I shall usually take N to be a person, but it might also be a supra-personal entity such as the state.)

Bernard Williams argues that all 'ought' sentences express unowned oughts.[7] He would think, for instance, that 'The prime minister ought to tell the truth' means simply that it ought to be the case that the prime minister tells the truth. But the following example shows he must be mistaken. It shows that an owned ought does not even entail the existence of a corresponding unowned ought. If you ought that you do something, it does not even follow that it ought to be the case that you do it.

Suppose Dan ought to marry Louise because she would make him happy. But suppose Louise ought not to marry Dan because she has a better option. For the moment I shall assume these assumptions make sense together; later I shall ask whether they really do.

Evidently, if they are true, two owned oughts obtain: Dan ought that Dan marries Louise, and Louise ought that Louise does not marry Dan. If owned oughts necessarily entailed corresponding unowned oughts, it would follow that it ought to be the case that Dan marries Louise, and it ought to be the case that Louise does not marry Dan. But the proposition that Dan marries Louise is presumably the same as the proposition that Louise marries Dan. (If not, I would find another example.) So it would follow that it ought to be the case that Dan marries Louise, and it ought to be the case that Dan does not marry Louise. These are both unowned oughts.

Some philosophers believe there can be deontic conflicts between owned oughts, in which a person both ought and ought not that she does some particular act.[8] For example, it is sometimes thought that a person might get herself into this position by acting wrongly. But in the case of Dan and Louise, no person faces a conflict. When that is so, I think it is safe to assume there can be no deontic conflicts between unowned oughts. So it cannot be true that the proposition that Dan marries Louise both ought and ought not to be the case. I conclude that owned oughts do not necessarily entail corresponding unowned oughts.

Is this example intelligible? I took a particular proposition with the property (in my language) that one person ought this proposition and another person ought its negation. This is to assume that the oughts are agent-relative in the sense established by Derek Parfit:[9] an ought may be owned by someone without being owned by everyone. If oughts could not be agent-relative in this sense, my example would be impossible. I do not insist there actually are agent-relative oughts. But even if there are not, I think this sort of agent-relativity plainly makes sense. I think we can make good sense of the claim that Dan ought to marry Louise but that Louise ought not to marry Dan, and that cannot be understood in any other way. We therefore have the concept of owned ought, and it is distinct from the concept of unowned ought.

Owned oughts are central

The concept of owned ought is the central normative concept. I shall explain why.

Our beliefs about what we ought to do play a particular vital part in our practical rationality. One central feature of rationality is that it requires you to intend to do what you believe you ought to do. More exactly: rationality requires of you that, if you believe you ought to do something, you intend to do it. I call this principle 'krasia'. But this statement of it is still not exact enough, in two respects.

Suppose you believe you ought to learn astral navigation, but you believe it is the mate's job to get you this training. You believe the mate ought that you learn astral navigation. Then you may be entirely rational even if you do not intend to learn astral navigation.

In general, if you believe you ought to do something, but you do not ascribe the ought to yourself, you may be entirely rational even if you do not intend to do that thing. Therefore, the formula for krasia is not correct unless we specify that your belief ascribes ownership of the ought to you. My grammatical innovation allows us to add this specification. The formula becomes: rationality requires of you that, if you believe you ought that you do something, you intend that you do it.

Next suppose you believe that the mate ought to learn astral navigation. Furthermore, suppose you believe it is the mate's own responsibility to learn, so you believe the mate ought that the mate learns astral navigation. Suppose also that you are the mate, but you do not know that; the previous mate has fallen overboard and the post has devolved on you, but no one has told you yet.

In a sense, you believe you ought that you learn astral navigation, since you are the mate and you believe the mate ought that the mate learns astral navigation. In a sense, your belief ascribes ownership of the ought to you. Nevertheless, you may be entirely rational even if you do not intend to learn astral navigation.

So the formula for krasia is nor correct unless we specify that you self-ascribe ownership of the ought. This does not just mean that you ascribe ownership to yourself. It means that you are able to express your ought-belief using the first-personal pronoun 'I'. You must be able to say 'I ought to learn astral navigation'. So long as you do not know you are the mate, you cannot express your belief this way.

We can incorporate this specification into krasia by employing the reflexive pronoun 'your yourself'. 'You yourself' corresponds in indirect speech to 'I' in direct speech.[10] We end up with the formulation:

> Krasia, roughly. Rationality requires of you that, if you believe you yourself ought that you F, you intend that you F.

Actually, yet another constraint needs to be added before this requirement krasia is stated exactly correctly. Furthermore, the formula also needs to be generalized a bit. The full, sharpened version is set out on page 85. But this rough version is good enough for now.

In it, 'you' stands for a generic person. In more formal statements I shall use the schematic letter 'N' instead, but I try not to use a letter for a person in less formal contexts. Unfortunately, English does not contain a generic verb that I can use informally instead of the schematic letter F. Instances of 'You ought to F' include 'You ought to be careful', 'You ought to know the capital of Idaho', and 'You ought to believe what I tell you and do as I say'. I shall also use 'You ought to F' to cover instances that strictly it does not cover, such as 'You ought not to dive here' and 'You ought either to leave Henry or stop mistrusting him'. No generic sentence in English has a meaning anything like as wide as I need. So I shall have to use that annoying 'F' throughout this book. I apologize for that.

The formula specifies that what you believe is that you yourself ought that you F. It is not that you yourself ought that you yourself F. Why not? Because there is no need for that second pronoun to be reflexive. So long as you self-ascribe ownership of the ought, rationality requires you to have the intention. You do need to self-ascribe anything else. I shall postpone the discussion of this point to page 85.

However, in English, when a pronoun can be reflexive, it generally is. So in informal contexts, the 'yourself' in 'you yourself' is generally redundant. When I can safely omit it, I often shall.

The requirement krasia is a central feature of our rationality because it constitutes one of the main bridges between theoretical rationality and practical rationality. We spend a lot of time deliberating about what we ought to do. Since this process brings us to acquire new beliefs – beliefs about what we ought to do – it is an exercise of our theoretical rationality. But we generally do it with a practical purpose. The beliefs that emerge engage our practical rationality. Specifically, they engage the requirement krasia. If we are practically rational, we end up intending to do what our theoretical deliberation brings us to believe we ought to do.

I shall make extensive use of krasia. It constitutes the principal criterion by which I shall identify the central normative concept of ought in the rest of this chapter. The central normative concept is the one that this requirement applies to. I have explained that the requirement applies only to an ought whose ownership is self-ascribed. Evidently, this must be an owned ought. So the central normative concept is the concept of an owned ought.

2.4 Conflicting oughts?

It can happen that you ought morally to do one thing, and ought rationally to do something else, and ought prudentially to do some third thing. Various oughts of different sorts can apply to you at the same time, and may conflict with each other. At least, that is a common opinion. It suggests we have a number of concepts, morally ought, rationally ought, prudentially ought, and so on. As well as that, we have ought all things considered. Does this plethora suggest I am wrong to say there is just one central concept of ought?

I agree we have these various concepts, but I give them different names. First, the concept of ought all things considered is really just the concept of ought. Saying you ought all things considered to do something is just to say you ought to do it. The phrase 'all things considered' emphasizes that the judgement is properly considered, taking into account everything that should be taken into account. I might say that the holiday was fun, all things considered. I would mean that, taking all the relevant considerations into account, the holiday was fun. I would not be attributing some property of all-things-considered funness to the holiday. In any case, whether called 'ought' or 'ought all things considered', this is the central normative concept. In this section, I shall explain why it is central, despite the plethora of competing concepts.

Let us call the expressions 'morally ought', 'rationally ought', and the rest 'adverbial 'ought's'. I prefer to use expressions that do not contain 'ought' at all. Rather than saying you morally ought to do something, I prefer to say morality requires you to do this thing. I say 'rationality requires' instead of 'rationally ought', and so on. My reasons will take a bit of space to explain.

Each of the terms 'morality', 'rationality', 'prudence' and so on have a sense in which they designate a property. If you are rational, you have the property of rationality; if you are prudent, you have the property of prudence, and so on. But these terms each have another sense in which they designate what I call a source of requirements. In this sense, they are analogous to the law, which is a source of requirements. The law requires you to pay your taxes. Similarly, morality requires you to be kind to strangers, rationality requires you not to believe contradictions, and prudence requires you to eat lots of vegetables. There are many other sources of requirements too. Convention is one; religion another.

In one wide sense of 'normative', requirement issuing from any source are normative. A requirement sets up a criterion of correctness; it is correct to satisfy a requirement and incorrect not to. For instance, one religious doctrine requires you to walk round the altar exactly three times after the catechism; it is incorrect to walk round the altar five times. 'Normativity' in this wide sense is attached to any sort of correctness.

However, I do not use 'normative' in this sense. When I say a requirement is normative, I mean it helps determine what you ought to do – or rather, it helps determine whether or not you ought to F, where 'F' stands for some verb phrase that does not necessarily designate something you do. The word 'requires' is not inherently normative in my narrower sense. If I say Catholicism requires people to abstain from meat on Fridays, I am not necessarily saying anything against people's eating meat on Fridays.

However, the requirements that issue from some particular sources are indeed normative. In this book, by 'a normative requirement' I mean a requirement that is normative. I have used the term differently in the past; I apologize for changing my terminology.

If a requirement on you to F is normative, it does not necessarily follow that you ought to F. A requirement on you to F may help determine whether or not you ought to F without actually determining that you ought to F. Often normative requirements from different sources conflict with each other. For instance, morality requires you to be kind to strangers, whilst prudence on some occasions requires you not to be. When there is a conflict of normative requirements, it is somehow resolved: whether or not you ought to F is somehow determined by the normative requirements on you to F and those on you not to F. The resolution might be that you ought to F, or that you ought not to F, or that neither of these things is so. I do not here need to say how the resolution emerges. It might be through some sort of weighing or balancing, or in might be in some different way. When a requirement on you to F is normative, it helps to determine whether or not you ought to F, and the determination may happen through the resolution of a conflict.

It is an important and difficult question which sources issue requirements that are normative. For example, chapter 5 in this book considers whether the requirements of rationality are normative, and does not reach a firm conclusion.

Now back to adverbial 'ought's. Whereas the word 'require' is not inherently normative, in this context the word 'ought' definitely is. To say 'you rationally ought to F' instead of 'Rationality requires you to F' implies that this requirement of rationality is normative. But there is a question whether that is so. So the 'ought' terminology begs a question that the 'requires' terminology does not beg. That is why I prefer the 'requires' terminology.

If you choose to use adverbial 'ought's, you need to bear two things in mind. First, you are not entitled to this terminology unless you are sure that your adverb refers to a source of requirements that is genuinely normative. Second, even if the source is normative, the fact that you adverbially ought to F does not entail that you ought to F. The fact that you prudentially ought to F is just the fact that prudence requires you to F. Even if the requirements of prudence are normative, it does not follow from this fact that you ought to F.

Another normative source may require you not to F. If so, whether or not you ought to F depends on the resolution of a conflict. Similarly, the fact that you ought morally to F does not entail that you ought to F.

Actually, in the particular case of morality, perhaps it might. It may be that conflicts between requirements of morality and other requirements are always resolved in favour of morality. Or it may be that morality subsumes other requirements in some way. Consequently, it may be that necessarily you ought to do as morality requires. But if this is so, it will take a substantive argument to show it.[11]

It is certainly not a part of the meaning of 'morally ought', 'rationally ought' and suchlike terms that they imply 'ought'. The 'ought's in these constructions cannot be detached from their adverbs. In that respect they are like 'innocent' in 'legally innocent'.

Some philosophers use 'ought' as a specifically moral word. By 'You ought to F' they mean what I mean by 'Morality requires you to F'. I think their usage is not standard English, but I cannot deny them the right to their own terminology. Moreover, if morality is normative as no doubt it is, their 'ought' is normative. So I recognize their usage as a normative sense of 'ought' that is not my own. It does not designate the central normative concept.

Why is my ought more central than adverbial *ought*s such as morally ought and the rest? It is, first, because the fact that you adverbially ought to F is normative, if it is, only because it contributes to determining whether or not you ought to F, where this last 'ought' designates my concept. That puts my concept in the centre.

But my main test for the central normative concept is that the rational requirement of krasia, set out on page 17, applies to it. Krasia does not apply to adverbial oughts, so no adverbial ought is the central normative concept. Take morally ought as an example. It is not the case that rationality requires of you that, if you believe you yourself morally ought that you F, you intend that you F. Even if you believe you morally ought to F, that leaves it open whether you believe you ought to F. You might believe you morally ought to F and at the same time not believe you ought to F. In that case, if you do not intend to F, you may not be irrational. So krasia does not apply to morally ought.

Here is the picture I have painted of the structure of normativity. There are various sources of requirements. The requirements that issue from some of these sources are normative. Separate normative requirements, issuing from different sources, feed into a central, overall ought; together they determine what you ought to do, ought to believe, ought to be, and so on. So in a way, normativity is broken into parts, but all the parts come together in a central ought. The different sources of requirements do not threaten the single central normative concept of ought.

There are no deontic conflicts

Normative requirements can conflict. On some occasion, morality may require you to be kind to strangers, but prudence may require you not to be kind. In the alternative terminology: you ought morally to be kind to strangers, but you ought prudentially not to be kind to strangers. However, it does not follow that you ought to be kind to strangers and also ought not to be kind to strangers. The 'ought's cannot be detached from their adverbs.

Let us call a case where you ought to F and you ought not to F a 'deontic conflict'. I have just said that a conflict of requirements is not a deontic conflict, even when the requirements are normative. This should remove one reason for thinking deontic conflicts exist. On the other hand, there is a reason for thinking they do not exist.

The reason is that oughts engage our practical rationality through the requirement krasia set out on page 85 and roughly on page 17. An even rougher formulation that will do here is: rationality requires you to intend to F if you believe you ought to F. If this is correct, there could be no deontic conflicts.

If krasia is correct, you could not be rational and believe you are facing a deontic conflict. Suppose you believe you ought to G and also believe you ought not to G. Then by krasia, you are not fully rational unless you intend to G and intend not to G. But, separately, it is plain that you are not fully rational if you intend to G and also intend not to G. Therefore, whatever you intend or do not intend, so long as you believe you ought to G and believe you ought not to G, you are inevitably not fully rational.

But suppose it was actually true that you ought to G and also that you ought not to G. It would be extraordinary if this were so but you could not have good evidence for it. So let us suppose also that you have good evidence that you ought to G and that you ought not to G. It must be possible to believe any pair of truths that you have good evidence for, and be fully rational; it cannot be that you are necessarily irrational just because you believe some truths that you have good evidence for. But I just argued that you cannot be rational if you believe you ought to G and believe you ought not to G. We have to conclude that it cannot both be true that you ought to G and also that you ought not to G.[12]

This adds further detail to my description of the central normative concept of ought: it does not permit deontic conflicts.

2.5 Objective and subjective oughts: Ewing's view

Many philosophers believe 'ought' has an objective and a subjective sense. I know of three distinct arguments that lead to this conclusion. Each generates a different distinction between the objective and the subjective senses of 'ought'. This section and the next two examines the three arguments in turn. To lighten the discussion, in these sections I shall concentrate mostly on oughts that are attached to actions.

The argument for Ewing's view. Suppose you believe you ought to do something, but you do not do it. Intuition tell us you are going wrong in some way; you are not being true to your beliefs. So it seems that, if you believe you ought to do something, in some sense or other you ought to do it. But the second 'ought' in that sentence cannot have the same sense as the first. If it did, it would mean your belief is infallible: whenever you believe you ought to do something, you ought to do it. That cannot be so. The two 'ought's must therefore have different senses, which we may call the 'objective' and the 'subjective' sense respectively. The conclusion emerges that:

> Ewing's view. If you believe you ought objectively to do something, you ought subjectively to do it.

I attribute this view to A. C. Ewing.[13]

The argument for Ewing's view is fallacious.[14] It sets out from this:

> Intuitive premise. If you believe you ought to do something, but do not do it, you are going wrong.

From this we could at most conclude that you ought in some sense not to be in the position of believing you ought to do something and not doing it. Put differently:

> Wide-scope view. You ought that, if you believe you ought to do something, you do it.

This sentence uses my construction for an owned ought in one place, where it is essential as I shall soon explain. In another place that construction is dispensable, and I have dispensed with it. I call this 'the wide-scope view' because the first 'ought' in this sentence has a wide scope. It governs the conditional sentence 'if you believe you ought to do something, you do it'.

The argument for Ewing's view depends on the further conclusion that:

> Narrow-scope view. If you believe you ought to do something, you ought to do it.

I call this 'the narrow-scope view', because the second 'ought' has a narrow scope; it governs the unconditional sentence 'you do the thing'. The two 'ought's in the narrow-scope view cannot have the same sense, because that would imply your ought belief is infallible. Once we recognize the 'ought's must have different senses, the narrow-scope view takes us to Ewing's view.

But the narrow-scope view simply does not follow from the intuitive premise. To think it does is an example of the so-called 'modal fallacy' or 'modal scope fallacy'.[15] It is easy to be caught out by this fallacy, because the grammar of English almost forces it on us. Start from the wide-scope view. It is not implausible that this does indeed follow from the intuitive premise, so let us assume for the moment that it does. My formulation of the wide-scope view is ungrammatical,[16] and we might naturally want to express it grammatically. To do so, we might adopt the nearest grammatical sentence, which is: 'You ought, if you believe you ought to do something, to do it'. But in this sentence, the condition 'if you believe you ought to do something' is grammatically a parenthesis within the sentence as a whole; it is not contained within the scope of 'ought'. Grammar consequently allows us to move it to the front of the sentence without changing the sentence's meaning. We get the narrow-scope view: 'If you believe you ought to do something, you ought to do it'. So in trying to express the wide-scope view grammatically, we end up actually expressing the narrow-scope one.

So long as we avoid fallacy, from the intuitive premise we can at most infer the wide-scope view. The two 'ought's in the this view may have the same meaning. Even if they do, the wide-scope view does not imply that your ought belief is infallible. The argument for Ewing's view is fallacious, and we have so far no grounds for thinking that 'ought' has an objective and a subjective sense.

This does not show that Ewing's view is false, but it does remove the only reason I know to believe it. Moreover, it offers the wide-scope view as a better alternative. In my statement of the wide-scope view, the two 'ought's have different scopes, but they need not have different senses. I think Ewing's view mistakes a difference in scope for a difference in sense.

I can also offer an separate argument against Ewing's view. Suppose you have conflicting ought beliefs: you believe you ought to do something and you believe you ought not to do it. According to Ewing's view, you ought subjectively to do this thing and you ought subjectively not to do it. So Ewing's view converts your conflict of beliefs about oughts into a conflict of actual oughts. That is paradoxical; it is hard to believe that actual oughts – even subjective ones – can conflict in this way.

Ewing's subjective oughts are in a way relative; they are relative to the person who is their subject. So, when a single person has conflicting ought beliefs, there will be conflicting oughts that are each relative to this one person. That creates the paradox. It is paradoxical for two oughts to conflict when they are each relative to the same thing.

The problem with subjective oughts is that they are relative to the wrong thing, a person. There is nothing wrong with relative oughts in general. Wide-scope oughts can also be thought of as relative oughts. The wide-scope view can be thought of as saying that, relative to your belief that you ought to do something, you ought to do it. Suppose again that you have conflicting beliefs: you believe you ought to do something and you believe you ought not to do it. Then, relative to your first belief you ought to do this thing, and relative to your second belief you ought not to do it. This is not paradoxical at all, because the two oughts are relative to two different things, your two different beliefs.

The wide-scope view is decidedly preferable to Ewing's view. But do not think I accept the wide-scope view; I do not. My aim has been to argue against Ewing's view, and to show that the putative argument that supports it is fallacious. Moreover, I aimed to show that this argument gives no sound reason for distinguishing subjective and objective senses of 'ought'.

Rather than the wide-scope view stated on page 23, I have already said that I accept the requirement krasia. Krasia is stated roughly on page 17 and more precisely on page 85. Here is a different rough formulation of it, adapted to the language of this section in order to make it easy to compare with the wide-scope view:

> Krasia, roughly. Rationality requires of you that, if you believe you ought to do something, you intend to do it.

It differs from the wide-scope view in two ways. Its governing modality is rationality requires rather than ought, and it has 'you intend to do it' where the wide-scope view has 'you do it'. It will become clear later in this book why I think krasia is true and the wide-scope view false.

2.6 Objective and subjective oughts: consequentialism

Now the second argument for making a distinction between objective and subjective oughts. It only applies to situations where you ought to do what will have the best consequences. These are situations where consequentialism (as I shall use the term) applies. Some philosophers believe consequentialism always applies; others that it sometimes applies; others again that it never applies. If you belong to the third group, you will not be interested in this argument.[17] Your view is that consequentialism is just plain false.

So let us suppose you are facing a situation where consequentialism applies. You have a choice between a number of alternative acts that you might do. Consequentialism says you ought to do an act if and only if the consequence of your doing it would be better than the consequence of your doing any of the alternatives, and you ought not to do an act X if and only if there is an alternative Y such that the consequence of your doing Y would be better than the consequence of your doing X.

This definition leaves it unspecified what is meant by 'consequence'. Different interpretations of this word give different versions of consequentialism.

One interpretation takes the consequence of your doing an act to be the state of the world as it would be if you did the act. I call this state the 'outcome' of your doing the act, and I call the version of consequentialism that results from this interpretation 'outcome consequentialism'.

Another interpretation takes the consequence of your doing an act to be the prospect for the world that would result from your doing it. I call the resulting version of consequentialism 'prospect consequentialism'. By a prospect, I mean a portfolio of possible outcomes, each associated with a probability. Suppose you give some money to a beggar. It may save her life and allow her to bring up her children, one of whom might later discover how to create boundless energy by nuclear fusion. Or the beggar might spend the money on heroin, and as a result die young. Or the money might save her life, and she might later become depressed and murder her mother. And so on; all sorts of outcomes might result from your gift. As a result of your gift, a probability will be associated with each of these possible outcomes, so your gift creates a prospect. Had you done something else, and not given the beggar this money, you would have created a different prospect.

Prospect consequentialism assumes that prospects have degrees of goodness. I think we should accept this assumption. Plainly, the goodness of a prospect will be a mathematical expectation of some sort. This means it will depend on probabilities, and there is plenty of scope for debate about what sort of probabilities are the right ones. How subjective should they be, and how related to the evidence? For my purposes here, I do not need to go into these details.[18]

Even without details, I am now in a position to try out

consequentialism on an example I take from Derek Parfit. As a result of an accident a hundred miners are trapped underground. They may be in tunnel A or in tunnel B. There is no way of telling which, and no evidence to suggest one possibility is more likely than the other. In your rescue effort, you have time to sink a shaft into one or the other of these tunnels, but not both. If you go to the tunnel where the miners are, you will save all of them, but if you go to the tunnel where they are not, you will save none. There is also a third, service tunnel C that you can sink a shaft into instead. If you do that, you will certainly save ninety of the miners, whether they are trapped in A or B, but ten will certainly die.

According to outcome consequentialism, either you ought to go to A, or you ought to go to B, but there is no way of telling which you ought to go to. Also, you ought not to go to C.

What does prospect consequentialism say? The prospect that will result from your going to A is a hundred miners saved or none saved, and nothing suggests one of these outcomes is more likely than the other. The prospect that will result from your going to C is ninety miners certainly saved. However the goodness of a prospect is determined, the latter prospect is obviously better than the former. The prospect that will result from your going to C is also obviously better than the prospect that will result from your going to B. Therefore, according to prospect consequentialism, you ought to go to C, and you ought not to go to A, and you ought not to go to B.

The two versions of consequentialism therefore make different claims about what you ought to do. In particular, one says that you ought not to go to C and the other that you ought to go to C. We could treat this as a demonstration that the two versions cannot both apply to the example.

But if you see merits in both versions, you might think that each can tell us the truth about what you ought, in some sense, to do. You might think that outcome consequentialism tells us what you ought objectively to do, and prospect consequentialism what you ought subjectively to do. This provides the second argument for making a distinction between a subjective and an objective sense of 'ought'. In the example, many consequentialists will say that you ought objectively not to go to C but you ought subjectively to go to C.

This consequentialist view about objective and subjective oughts is inconsistent with Ewing's view, stated on page 23. Ewing's view is that, if you believe you ought objectively to do something, you ought subjectively to do it. According to the consequentialist view, you ought objectively not to go to C in the example. If you have a true belief about this, you will believe you ought objectively not to go to C. So if your belief is true, Ewing's view implies you ought subjectively not to go to C. However, on the consequentialist view, you ought subjectively to go to C, and it is not the case that you ought subjectively not to go to C.

I rejected Ewing's view; what about this consequentialist alternative? Let us look more closely at the concept of ought that appears in the two consequentialist theories.

Prospect consequentialism and subjective ought

Start with prospect consequentialism. My requirement krasia from page 17 is evidently meant to apply to its ought. Suppose you form your beliefs about what you ought to do on the basis of prospect consequentialism, and suppose you do so correctly. A prospect consequentialist will think rationality requires of you that, if you believe you ought to F, you intend to F. In the mine example, you will believe you ought to go to C. A prospect consequentialist will think you are irrational if you do not intend to go to C.

She may think you ought not to form your intentions this way.[19] Many examples suggest it is not a good idea to make decisions by working out what prospect consequentialism says you ought to do, and deciding to do that. Most prospect consequentialists recognize that point. Some of them think that, instead, you ought to form your intentions on the basis of well-chosen rules. Some may even think you ought to have a false theory about what you ought to do, and make your decisions on the basis of that.

But none of this suggests the prospect consequentialist uses 'ought' in a sense that does not fit krasia. If, in the example, you form a belief that you ought to go to to C on the basis of prospect consequentialism, a prospect consequentialist might wish you had not done so. But she would nevertheless think you irrational if you do not then intend to go to C.

The ought of prospect consequentialism is evidently mean to be practical in the particular sense that it satisfies krasia. I principally identify the central normative concept of ought by this criterion. I conclude that the 'ought' that appears in prospect consequentialism refers to the central normative concept.

This does not mean I am endorsing prospect consequentialism. It is a theory about the central normative concept, but it may be false.

Am I saying that the central normative concept of ought is subjective? I am not. The central normative concept is the one that appears in prospect consequentialism. But even where prospect consequentialism applies, it would not follow that ought is subjective. True, prospect consequentialism's ought is often said to 'subjective', that term is not necessarily appropriate. Prospect consequentialism makes what you ought to do depend on the goodness of prospects, and this goodness will be an expectation of some sort. It will depend on probabilities. These might be probabilities of various sorts, and they need not be purely subjective ones.

Indeed, it is implausible that the appropriate probabilities are purely subjective. Go back to the mining example. I assumed the available evidence is symmetrical between the possibility that the miners are in tunnel A and the possibility that they are in B. Nevertheless, despite the evidence, you might attach a very high subjective probability to their being in A. You would do that if you had very strong Bayesian priors in that direction, say. Evaluated according to your subjective probabilities, the prospect that will result from your going to A might be better than the prospect that will result from your going to C. Even so, given the symmetry of the evidence, it is implausible that you ought to go to A.

So, in so far as subjective consequentialism is a true theory, the central normative concept will be relative to the evidence. But this does not mean it is subjective.

Outcome consequentialism and objective ought

Outcome consequentialism employs an objective concept of ought. An outcome consequentialist will not support krasia. She does not think that rationality requires of you that, when you believe you ought to F, you intend to F. Suppose you form your beliefs about what you ought to do on the basis of outcome consequentialism. Provided you do so correctly, in the example you will believe you ought not to go to C. But an outcome consequentialist would not insist you are irrational if, nevertheless, you intend to go to C. Indeed, I would expect an outcome consequentialist to go to C, just as any other sensible person would. So, since the objective ought of outcome consequentialism is not meant to fit krasia, it is not the central normative concept.

Is it nevertheless a genuine concept of ought? It is not meant to be directly practical. G. E. Moore, who adopted this concept, thought you could never know what you ought to do.[20] That makes his ought impractical in one way. The fact that it does not satisfy krasia makes it impractical in another way. I think a concept of ought that is not supposed to be directly practical is misleading. We mostly take ought to be practical, and in particular we assume it satisfies krasia. An example on page 34 illustrates the dangers of using this objective sort of ought and mistaking it for a practical one. I would prefer to reject this objective concept of ought and take outcome consequentialism to be false.

However, some things can be said for the objective ought. One is this. When you are wondering what you ought to do, you have good reason to look for new evidence and not just rely on the evidence that already exists. That would not be so if you were only wondering what you ought to do relative to the evidence. So it seems you must be interested in an ought that goes beyond the evidence.[21] That must be an objective ought. This shows that even an objective ought may be practically relevant. It is indirectly but not directly practical.[22]

Another piece of support for the objective ought comes from hindsight. In the mine example, suppose you believe you ought to go to C, and you do. Suppose that, once in tunnel C, you discover the miners are actually in tunnel A. You might then think you ought to have gone to A and not to C. By going to A you would have saved a hundred, whereas by going to C you save only ninety. Your thought seems true in some sense. It seems you ought, in some sense, to have gone to A and not to C.

The sense is not necessarily objective. Taken literally, your thought means it is now the case that you ought to have gone to A and not to C. This may indeed be what you think; you may think that, relative to the evidence you now have, you now ought to have gone to A and not to C. Your ought exists in the present, but its object is retrospective. This ought would not be objective. It would be relative to the evidence that you now have.

That is a literal reading, but it may be incorrect. Our grammar does not allow us to put the auxiliary 'ought' into the past tense. So as a surrogate, we may put the lexical verb into the past tense when truly it is the 'ought' that is in the past. Your thought 'I ought to have gone to A and not to C' may mean it was the case that you ought to go to A and not to C. If this is what it means, the ought is objective.

I do not wish to adjudicate between these two interpretations of your thought. More generally, I recognize the objective concept of ought can be defended. It may be a genuine concept of ought that is not the central normative concept. If so, this is another concept that I set aside in homing in on the central normative concept.[23]

To summarize: wherever consequentialism applies, it gives us some grounds for distinguishing two senses of 'ought'. One is appropriately called an objective sense. If it exists, it is not the central normative concept, and it is not directly practical. The other sense is relative to the evidence. It is sometimes called subjective, but this is not an appropriate name. It is the central normative concept.

2.7 Objective and subjective oughts: the need to decide

Suppose you have to decide whether or not to do some particular act.

But suppose you are not in a position to believe rationally that you ought to do it, nor to believe rationally that you ought not to do it. You have gathered evidence, but you recognize you have not acquired sufficient grounds to hold either of these beliefs rationally.

Now suppose the moment arrives when you must decide. Suppose you are determinedly rational, and want to make your decision on a rational basis. You would like to apply the principle krasia, that rationality requires you to intend to do what you believe you ought to do. You can only apply this principle if you believe you ought to do the act, or alternatively if you believe you ought not to do it. You may not be convinced by my precise formulation of krasia on page 85, but you nevertheless think you cannot decide rationally without holding one or other of these beliefs. But you are not in a position to hold either rationally. So it looks as though you cannot make your decision rationality.

But it is plausible to think rationality cannot let you down like that. Plausibly, you must always be able to respond rationally to whatever predicament you find yourself in. If that is so, you might conclude you must after all be able to hold one of those two beliefs rationally. Since you have to decide now, you cannot collect more evidence. So whichever belief you hold, it will have to be rationally based on the epistemic situation you now find yourself in. On this basis, you must be able to hold rationally either the belief that you ought to do the act, or the belief that you ought not to do it.

Yet you recognize already that you are not in a position to hold either of these beliefs rationally. So you have hit a contradiction: you cannot hold either of these beliefs rationally, yet you must be able to hold one of them rationally. A resolution is to recognize two senses of 'ought'. You cannot rationally hold either of these beliefs when 'ought' is meant in one sense, but you can hold one or the other when 'ought' is meant in the other sense. This second sense is fully subjective, because the only basis available for either of these beliefs is your own subjective state – the epistemic situation you happen to be in. Simply to make a contrast with this subjective sense, we might call the first sense of 'ought' objective. But nothing says that sense is particularly objective; it is merely less subjective than the first one.

This distinction between objective and subjective senses of 'ought' is distinct from the two I have mentioned already. It is not inconsistent with Ewing's view stated on page 23, since Ewing's view says nothing about what you ought subjectively to do when you have no belief about what you ought objectively to do. It can be seen as extending Ewing's distinction. But it is inconsistent with the consequentialist view, unless we give prospect consequentialism a very subjective interpretation in which the goodness of a prospect is determined only by your own epistemic condition. I said on page 29 that this very subjective interpretation is implausible.

Krasia is plainly supposed to apply to this new sort of subjective ought. The whole idea of it is that it gives you a belief that can mesh with practical rationality through some version of krasia. So it is a candidate for the central normative concept.

However, this sort of subjective ought does not actually exist. The argument that led to it is badly mistaken. It assumed that if you are to make a decision rationally about whether or not to do an act, the decision must be based on either a belief than you ought to do the act or a belief that you ought not to. But that is false. First, you can often make a decision rationally, even if the decision is not determined by any requirement of rationality. And second, even when a decision is determined by a requirement of rationality, the requirement need not be one that depends on your having a belief about whether you ought or ought not to do the act.

Buridan's ass did not understand the first of these points. The evidence available to it indicated that it was not the case that it ought to eat the left stack of hay, nor the case that it ought to eat the right stack. Being rational, it therefore could not form the belief that it ought to eat the left one, nor the belief that it ought to eat the right one. It thought that it could not rationally decide to eat either stack unless it believed it ought to eat that stack. Wishing to be rational, and holding this view about rationality, it died. Plainly its view about rationality was false.

The requirement krasia comes into play only if you believe you ought to do something. It does not imply you need to have such a belief in order to make a decision rationally. When you have no such belief, rationality may not determine a decision for you. It did not determine one for Buridan's ass.

Alternatively, rationality might determine a decision for you through some requirement of rationality other than krasia. Krasia is only one among many requirements that apply to your intentions. Another is the principle of instrumental rationality set out in (4, 9, 9) on page 83, 145, 145. No doubt there are many others too.

For instance, this may be one:

> Probabilistic requirement. Rationality requires of you that, if you assign a probability of more than one half to the proposition that you ought to F, then you do not intend not to F.

I do not certify this as a genuine requirement, and it is only a rough statement, but it seems plausible to me. The double negative in the final clause needs explaining. Presumably, in your doubtful epistemic situation, you might rationally neither intend to F nor intend not to

F.[24] However, at some point you may have to decide whether or not to F. At that point, rationality does not leave you free to decide either way. You will be irrational if you intend not to F, which means you will be irrational unless you intend to F.

In the example I described, you could not rationally believe you ought to do the act you were contemplating, because the evidence was insufficient. But the evidence might nevertheless be sufficient to lead you rationally to assign a probability of more than one half to the proposition that you ought to do the act. Suppose you do. Then when you come to decide, according to the probabilistic requirement, rationality does not leave you free to decide either way. Given your probability assignment, you will be irrational unless you decide to do the act. But this does not mean you have to believe you ought, in some subjective sense, to do it. You are not applying the probabilistic requirement, not krasia. The probabilistic requirement applies to you just because you assign a probability of more than one half to the proposition that you ought to do the act.

The conclusion of this section is that often you make a choice rationally without believing you ought to choose what you do choose. These are cases where krasia does not apply. You may not be able to form a belief about what you ought to choose, and nothing says that, nevertheless, in some sense or other, you do have a belief about what you ought to choose. There are no grounds here for distinguishing two senses of 'ought'.

Can the probabilistic requirement be correct?

The probabilistic requirement leaves a question to be answered. You might think it is plainly wrong. Take this example. You are a doctor, and your patient has a cold. You have a drug that the available evidence shows to have a 90% chance of curing your patient's cold. The available evidence also shows the drug to have a 10% chance of killing her. You might assign a 90% probability to the proposition that you ought to prescribe her the drug. Then according to the probabilistic requirement, you will be irrational if you decide not to prescribe it. Can this be right?

It can. You are mistaken in assigning a 90% probability to the proposition that you ought to prescribe the drug. The available evidence plainly shows you ought not to prescribe it. That is the implication of any sensible theory about what you ought to do, including any sensible version of prospect consequentialism. If you nevertheless assign a 90% probability to the proposition that you ought to prescribe the drug, you are going wrong in some way. You may have ignored the evidence, you may have processed it irrationally, or you may be in the grip of a bad theory about what you ought to do.

For instance, you may be in the grip of outcome consequentialism. Outcome consequentialism says you ought to prescribe the drug if and only if it will cure the patient. Since there is a 90% chance it will cure the patient, there is a 90% chance you ought to prescribe it. On page 29, I said I prefer to treat outcome consequentialism as false; this example helps to explain why. It shows that outcome consequentialism is dangerous. We would not want our doctors to base their decisions on it.

I recognized on page 30 that outcome consequentialism may not be false if we give 'ought' an objective sense that is not meant to be directly practical. Krasia does not apply to this sense. Nor does the probabilistic requirement. If you, the doctor, assign a 90% probability to the proposition that you ought in this objective sense to prescribe the drug, that does not mean you satisfy the condition mentioned in the requirement. Even if you do not intend to prescribe the drug, the requirement does not say you are irrational.

The 'ought's in krasia and in the probabilistic requirement refer to the central normative concept. So the problem arises if you assign a 90% probability to the proposition that you ought in the central normative sense to prescribe the drug. If you do, then according to the probabilistic requirement, you are indeed irrational if you do not intend to prescribe it. That is surely correct. Your mental state is not properly coherent; your intentions are not properly in step with your assignments of probabilities.

I am not saying you ought to intend to prescribe the drug. You ought not. You are wrong to assign a probability greater than one half to the proposition that you ought, in the central normative sense, to prescribe the drug. Given that you are in this mistaken state of belief, to be coherent you need to intend to prescribe the drug. But you ought not to be in that state of belief, and you ought not to have the intention.

So the probabilistic requirement may yet be correct.

Notes

1 See page 19
2 Natural Goodness, p. 46.
3 Natural Goodness, p. 15.
4 See Moore's Principia Ethica, pp. 16–17. Moore writes of good rather than should, and he therefore argues that the evaluative, rather than the normative, is not natural. But the argument is the same.

5 See his 'Two kinds of agent-relativity'. This paper contains references to earlier treatments of owned oughts.
6 In 'Ought and moral obligation', Bernard Williams assumes that a owned ought would have to be a property of an act rather than a proposition. But that seems to be an ungrounded assumption.
7 Williams, 'Ought and moral obligation'.
8 I disagree; I argue against conflicts among owned oughts on page 22
9 Parfit, Reasons and Persons, p. 143. See also section 3.6 below.
10 See particularly Hector–Neri Castañeda, 'On the logic of attributions of self-knowledge to others'.
11 Chapter 4 of Samuel Scheffler's Human Morality is a useful discussion of these arguments.
12 I was helped to formulate this argument by a useful conversation with James Dreier, and by useful correspondence with Lou Goble.
13 See his Ethics, pp. 144–5. Ewing argues there are two senses of 'ought', on the basis of the argument I gave. But he does not give the senses the names 'subjective' and 'objective'. Those terms come from Henry Sidgwick's Methods of Ethics, p. 207. Sidgwick's view is similar to Ewing's but expressed in terms of rightness. He thinks it is subjectively right for you to do what you believe is objectively right.
14 My way of dealing with this argument comes from Jonathan Dancy in 'The logical conscience'.
15 See the account on Norman Schwartz's web site: http://www.sfu.ca/philosophy/swartz/modal_fallacy.htm
16 The appendix explains on page 44 that there is actually no grammatical way of attaching an owned ought to a conditional proposition.
17 The remainder of this section has been strongly influenced by Michael Zimmerman's 'Is moral obligation objective or subjective?'
18 It is a mistake to assume, as most authors do, that the goodnesss of a prospect is its expected goodness – the expectation of the goodness of its possible outcomes. This is to ignore the possibility that risk to goodness may be good or bad. My account of the goodness of prospects is in my Weighing Goods, chapter 6.
19 James Morauta helpfully reminded me of this point.
20 Principia Ethica, p. 149.
21 See J. J. Thomson, 'Imposing risks'.
22 Thanks to Daniel Star for this point.
23 Toby Ord pointed out to me that Allan Gibbard similarly sets it aside in Wise Choices, Apt Feelings, p 42.
24 I am grateful to Arto Laitinen for pointing this out to me.

Appendix to chapter 2
The grammar of 'ought'

I have to spend some time on the English grammar of 'ought'.[1] This is not because we can learn from it, but because we cannot. The grammar of 'ought' is so impoverished that it obstructs philosophy. Accidental features of our grammar make it impossible to say some things that, at least on the face of it, we may need to say. Perhaps these things are actually impossible. But if they are, we need a substantive argument to demonstrate they are. We cannot learn they are impossible from the accidents of grammar.

First a minor point. The verb 'ought' has no nominalization such as 'oughtness', 'oughting' or something else. I simply use Roman 'ought' as a noun when I need to, to designate an instantiation of the concept ought. I use the italic 'ought' to designate the concept.

Other difficulties over grammar are more severe.

'Ought' is a modal auxiliary

The word 'ought' is an auxiliary verb, or just an auxiliary for short. It differs from most verbs, which are lexical verbs. 'Ought' is specifically a modal auxiliary. Others modal auxiliaries are 'will' as in 'She will buy a scarf', 'do' as in 'I do not intend to go', 'should' as in 'You should see the sky now', and 'used' as in 'James used to drink a lot of beer'. Some auxiliaries also have other senses in which they are lexical verbs, but 'ought' is always an auxiliary.

The role of an auxiliary is to combine with a lexical verb to form a compound verb. With a modal auxiliary, a compound verb is formed by taking the infinitive of the lexical verb and putting the auxiliary in front of it. We get 'will buy', 'do intend', 'should see', 'used to drink', and so on.

In forming a compound verb, the word 'to' is omitted from the infinitive of the lexical verb unless the auxiliary is either 'ought' or 'used'. With these two, the infinitive retains its 'to'. This means that sentences containing these auxiliaries look similar on the surface to sentences that actually have a quite different grammatical structure.

The meeting ought to start at ten looks similar to

The meeting happened to start at ten,

and different from

The meeting should start at ten.

But in fact 'happened' is a lexical verb, whereas 'ought' and 'should' are auxiliaries. The parsing of the second sentence is (The meeting)(happened)(to start at ten); 'happened' has 'the meeting' as its subject, and 'to start at ten' as its complement. In contrast, the first and third sentences contain auxiliaries. They are parsed respectively (The meeting)(ought to start)(at ten) and (The meeting)(should start)(at ten). Each of them contains a compound verb that has 'the meeting' as its subject and is adverbially qualified by 'at ten'.

There is an easy test that cuts through the surface similarity to distinguish an auxiliary from a lexical verb: turn the sentence into a question. To do that in modern English (with very few exceptions) we invert the order of the subject and the auxiliary. So the subject moves inside the compound verb, ending up after the auxiliary and before the infinitive. If the verb is not initially compound, it has no auxiliary to invert with the subject. In that case, to make the inversion possible, the verb has to be fitted up with some part of the all-purpose auxiliary 'do'. We get:

Ought the meeting to start at ten?
Did the meeting happen to start at ten?
Should the meeting start at ten?

This test shows 'ought' to be an auxiliary. It behaves like 'should' and not like 'happened'.

'Ought' is a auxiliary in a sort of disguise. That 'to' in the infinitive can make it seem like a lexical verb, which can lead to some confusion. The auxiliary 'should' does not wear this disguise. Moreover, it has much the same meaning as 'ought', so that I could have chosen to call the central normative concept should instead of ought. This would be an alternative name for the very same concept.

However, 'should' has all the ambiguities of 'ought' and some more of its own. It serves as the past participle of 'shall' in:

I told her I should be late and the present subjunctive of 'shall' in:

If I should die, think only this of me.

To minimize the degree of ambiguity, I think it best to stick with 'ought'.

Negating 'ought'

The fact that 'ought' is an auxiliary severely constrains what it can do grammatically. For philosophical purposes this is a pain. The most pervasively irritating consequence is that 'ought' does not allow enough places for negation. The sentence 'The meeting happened to start at ten' contains two verbs, either of which can be negated. The different negations have different meanings. Negating 'happened', we can say 'The meeting did not happen to start at ten'. (Perhaps it was tightly scheduled for ten.) Negating 'start', we can say 'The meeting happened not to start at ten'. (Perhaps it happened to start at eleven.) With 'The meeting ought to start at ten' we need similarly to be able to negate either 'ought' or alternatively 'start', because these negations would give us different meanings. But because 'ought to start' is a single compound verb, it allows only the one negation

The meeting ought not to start at ten.

The single negation of a compound verb is potentially ambiguous between the two alternative meanings that would result from negating the auxiliary and negating the lexical verb. For each auxiliary, a convention determines which meaning the negated sentence actually has. These conventions are largely arbitrary. For example, opposite conventions apply to the auxiliaries 'could' and 'should'. In

The meeting could not start at ten

'could' is negated and not 'start'. But in

The meeting should not start at ten

'start' is negated and not 'should'. 'Ought' follows the same convention as 'should'; it is the lexical verb rather than the auxiliary 'ought' that is negated. This means that, when we need to negate 'ought' rather than the lexical verb, we have to resort to saying:

It is not the case that the meeting ought to start at ten.

'Ought' modifies a whole clause

The difficulty over negation is an irritating feature of 'ought', but it is not seriously damaging, because we can get round it by using the phrase 'it is not the case that ...'. The fact that 'ought' is an auxiliary creates another problem that in the end turns out more damaging. The problem arises because, when an auxiliary is attached to the main lexical verb in a clause, modifying its meaning, it has the effect of modifying the clause as a whole.

For example, take a plain, non-modal sentence that is also a single clause, such as

The meeting starts at ten.

An auxiliary imposes on it some sort of modality. For instance, in the sentences

The meeting ought to start at ten and The meeting will start at ten an ought modality and a future modality are respectively imposed. It is plain that the auxiliaries modify the whole sentence, because these last two examples have the same meaning as, respectively,

It ought to be the case that the meeting starts at ten and It will be the case that the meeting starts at ten.

In these latter sentences, modifiers explicitly operate on the whole sentence 'the meeting starts at ten'.

To put it in terms of content rather than grammar: an auxiliary expresses an operation on the proposition that is expressed by a clause as a whole, in its non-modal form. When a clause contains an auxiliary, its meaning has the logical structure Mp, where p is the proposition expressed by the non-modal clause, and M is the modal operator designated by the auxiliary. With the auxiliary 'ought', the logical structure is Op, where O is the ought modality.

'Ought' cannot modify conditional sentences

A auxiliary such as 'ought' modifies a whole clause, and it does so by the grammatical means of modifying the clause's main verb. One effect is another grammatical limitation on what can be done with an auxiliary. It cannot cope properly with conditional sentences.

The main verb of a conditional sentence is also the main verb of one of the sentence's clauses – specifically the consequent. In the sentence

If lunch starts at one, the meeting finishes by twelve-thirty the main verb of the sentence is 'finishes', which is also the main verb of the consequent. Suppose we wish to apply the modality of necessity to this conditional sentence, using the auxiliary 'must'. The best we can do is to compound 'must' with the main verb 'finishes'. We get

If lunch starts at one, the meeting must finish by twelve-thirty.

But this has not achieved the meaning we want. It has attached the modality to the consequent clause, whereas we wanted to attach it to the whole sentence.

Adverbs provide a different means of adding modality to a sentence, and they have the advantage that they can be separated from the verb and placed in a position where they modify the whole of a conditional sentence. We can say

Necessarily, if lunch starts at one, the meeting finishes by twelve-thirty.

This flexibility is not available to an auxiliary verb.

The only direct way to add the ought modality to the conditional sentence about lunch is to say:

If lunch starts at one, the meeting ought to finish by twelve-thirty.

But this attaches the modality to the consequent and not the whole sentence. Unfortunately, whereas the necessity modality can be applied with the adverb 'necessarily', nothing similar can be done with the ought modality because there is no adverb that conveys the ought modality.

You might think of changing the position of the antecedent clause to make:

The meeting ought, if lunch starts at one, to finish by twelve-thirty.

But this manoeuvre does not succeed in putting the clause 'if lunch starts at one' within the scope of 'ought', as we need it to. That clause is grammatically a parenthesis within the sentence as a whole, so its position makes no difference to the meaning. This sentence has exactly the same meaning as the previous one, where the antecedent clause was placed at the beginning.

Only one expedient remains. We have to say

It ought to be the case that, if lunch starts at one, the meeting finishes by twelve-thirty.

This is inconvenient but adequate; it says exactly what we mean to say. So far we have not reached the limit of our grammar; we are still able to say what we need to say grammatically.

Reparsing

We reach the limit when we need to express the ownership of an ought. Take the sentence

Julie ought to have more work.

The ought modality in this sentence is grammatically attached to the whole sentence. The logical structure is Op, where p is the proposition that Julie has more work. So far as strict grammar is concerned, the sentence has the same meaning as

It ought to be the case that Julie has more work.

It does not ascribe ownership of the ought to Julie.

But suppose we want to ascribe ownership to Julie. Then the logical structure we need is NOp, where N is Julie. We want to say that a particular relation that holds between a subject and a proposition. Unfortunately, our sentence does not have this logical structure. Because 'ought' is an auxiliary compounded with 'to have', it has no subject of its own. The whole compound 'ought to have' is attached to Julie as its subject. 'Ought' has no separate attachment of its own to Julie.

In a construction such as 'Julie ought to have more work', we really need argument-places for two noun phrases. We need a place for one to designate the subject of the infinitive that is compounded with 'ought', in this case 'to have'. We need a place for a second to designate the owner of the ought. But because 'ought' is an auxiliary, we have only one place. A construction with an auxiliary does not give us enough argument-places.

This is extraordinary. Our central normative concept cannot be expressed literally by our language. This is the most serious damage that is done by the fact that 'ought' is an auxiliary verb.

Obviously we cannot live with this deficiency, and fortunately we have a means of patching over it. Compare a different sentence,

Julie wants to have more work, which contains the lexical verb 'wants' instead of the auxiliary 'ought'. This lexical verb governs its complement, which is the clause 'to have more work'. Unlike 'ought', it does not govern the whole sentence. 'Julie' is the subject of this verb. The grammatical fact that Julie's name is the verb's subject expresses the fact that the want is Julie's. She owns it. So this sentence expresses ownership.

Its logical structure is NWp. W is the relation of wanting, which holds between a subject N and a proposition p. In the example, the proposition is expressed by the clause 'to have more work'. Infinitives as well as 'that' clauses can express propositions, but if an infinitive is to express a proposition, it needs a subject. The subject of the infinitive is sometimes explicit, as it is in

The boss wants Julie to have more work,

but it is often only implicit. When it is implicit, the rule is that the infinitive's subject is borrowed from the governing verb; it is the governing verb's subject. So in 'Julie wants to have more work', the subject of 'to have' is 'Julie'. 'To have more work' therefore expresses the proposition that Julie has more work.

'Julie wants to have more work' is quite different grammatically from 'Julie ought to have more work'. The sentences are parsed, respectively, (Julie)(wants)(to have more work), and (Julie)(ought to have)(more work), Logically, the first has the form (Julie)W(Julie has more work), and the second the form O(Julie has more work).

However, 'Julie ought to have more work' has the same surface structure as 'Julie wants to have more work'. This offers us a devious expedient for expressing a private ought. We can treat the 'ought' sentence as though it genuinely has the same grammar as the 'want' sentence. We can reparse it, as I shall say. We can treat it as parsed (Julie)(ought)(to have more work). I do not mean that we change the sentence in any way; we leave it exactly as it is. We simply understand it differently, as having a different deep grammatical structure. Once we have done that, the sentence will ascribe ownership of the ought to Julie. In general, the logical structure of a reparsed sentence is NOp. By reparsing, we express the relation we need between a subject and a proposition.

In the example, the proposition p is the same as before, that Julie has more work. But in the new parsing it is expressed by a different part of the sentence. In the original, grammatical parsing 'ought' modifies the sentence 'Julie has more work', which expresses the proposition that Julie has more work. In the reparsed structure, 'ought' governs the infinitival phrase 'to have more work'. It is now this phrase that expresses the proposition that Julie has more work. To do so it borrows a subject from the subject of 'ought', which is 'Julie'.

In that way, reparsing overcomes the shortage of argument places, and is consequently able to express ownership of the ought. 'Ought' has a subject, which designates the owner of the ought, and the infinitive has an separate, implicit subject of its own. Unfortunately, the two argument-places have to be occupied by the same noun phrase. That is a limitation on reparsing that I shall come back to.

Reparsing is grammatically indefensible. However, by means of it, we can massage our language into expressing ownership of an ought. It is the only means we have. Without it, we cannot express our central normative concept.

See to it that

Is there really no alternative? The logical structure we are trying to express is NOp, in which the ought relation holds between a person and a proposition. The canonical way to express a proposition within a sentence is by means of a 'that' clause. So we need a way to attach a 'that' clause to a phrase that designates a person, through some expression of the ought modality. A popular idea is to use the 'see to it that' formula.

Adopting this idea, to express ownership of an ought we might say:

> Julie ought to see to it that Julie has more work.

But this device fails. First of all, this sentence does not express ownership at all, unless it is itself reparsed in the way I have described. Otherwise it simply expresses the public ought:

> It ought to be the case that Julie sees to it that Julie has more work.

So this formula is not an alternative to reparsing.

Second, once reparsed, the sentence says that Julie owns an ought governing the proposition that Julies sees to it that Julie has more work. But we are trying to express the fact Julie owns an ought governing the proposition that Julie has more work. The proposition that Julie sees to it that Julie has more work is different from the proposition that Julie has more work. The former describes an act; the latter a state.

Indeed, even if Julie ought to have more work, and this ought is owned by Julie, it may simply not be the case that Julie ought to see to it that Julie has more work. There may be nothing she can do to get more work. Perhaps she ought to have more work, not because she can now do something about it, but because she ought to have done some things in the past that would have ensured that she now has more work.

In general, the 'see to it that' formula gives us the wrong meaning. For example, suppose Blaise ought to believe in god, and this ought is owned by him. To say Blaise ought to see to it that he believes in god is to say something entirely different.

Limits on reparsing

We do not always reparse 'ought' sentences. We would not reparse 'The meeting ought to begin at ten', because this sentence is not intended to ascribe ownership of the ought to the meeting.

There is absolutely no way of indicating within a sentence whether it is to be reparsed or not. That depends entirely on the context. Grammar is unable to indicate whether ownership is being ascribed or not. 'Julie ought to have more work' may ascribe ownership to Julie, or it may not. It may be a complaint against Julie for failing to get more work, or it may be a complaint against someone else for failing to provide her with more. From the sentence, we cannot tell.

Furthermore, the device of reparsing is not always possible. It allows us to ascribe ownership of an ought only in limited circumstances. There are two limits. I shall describe them and then consider how significant they are.

The first arises from the fact that the infinitive borrows its subject from 'ought', so the subject of the infinitive has also to be the subject of 'ought'. We can therefore ascribe ownership of an ought only if the proposition governed by the ought can be expressed by a sentence whose subject designates the owner of the ought.

The second arises when we wish to ascribe ownership of an ought that governs a conditional proposition. There is no way of doing this in plain English. Suppose you own an ought that governs the proposition that, if you love animals, you do not eat meat. To state this fact, we would have to say

> You ought, if you love animals, not to eat meat.

But this sentence does not actually say what it is intended to say. The 'ought' forms a compound verb with 'to eat'. The 'if' clause is grammatically a parenthesis within the whole sentence; it is not within the scope of 'ought'. So far as grammar is concerned, that clause could be placed elsewhere in the sentence without changing the sentence's meaning. For instance, it could go to the front, giving us:

> If you love animals, you ought not to eat meat.

This does not express the intended meaning.

I said earlier that we can attach an ought to a conditional by means of a paraphrase. We can say:

> It ought to be the case that, if you love animals, you do not eat meat.

But this only succeeds in attaching an unowned ought to the conditional. An ought cannot be grammatically attached to a conditional and at the same time ascribed to an owner, even through the grammatically dubious device of reparsing.

Do the limits matter?

We do not run up against these two limits very often in our ordinary conversation, and when we do we have ways of evading them. If that were not so, our grammar would not have evolved as it has. 'Ought' started life as a lexical verb – the past participle of 'owe' – and evolved into an auxiliary. It would not have done so if its new grammatical status had often prevented people from saying what they needed to say.

But philosophy cannot concern itself only with those limited circumstances in which our grammar is adequate. Philosophers need to explore normativity more precisely and more thoroughly than other people do. For example, in ordinary conversation, it may rarely matter whether a conditional clause is within the scope of an 'ought' or outside it, but in philosophy it matters vitally.

Could it be that the two limits I have described make no difference even for philosophical purposes? Could it be that we never need to say anything that breaches them? I think this is arguable in the case of the first limit, but the argument would need to be a substantive one. The mere fact that we cannot say something without bending our grammar does not show it is false.

Take this example. Suppose Julie's work-load is the responsibility of the boss, so the boss owns an ought that governs the proposition that Julie has more work. The proposition cannot be expressed in a sentence that has 'the boss' as its subject, so we have hit the limit. The ownership of this ought cannot be expressed in grammatical English, even by means of reparsing.

However, it might be argued that this owned ought actually cannot exist, so we have no need to express it. The argument might be that a person can only own an ought that governs a proposition that describes something she does. The truth might instead be this:

The boss ought to see to it that Julie has more work.

The boss's ownership can in this case be properly express in grammatical English, with reparsing.

A real argument is needed for this claim, and there is a real counterargument. Suppose the boss is now out of contact, on holiday in Pitcairn. Then, since she cannot see to it that Julie has more work, we might plausibly doubt that she ought to see to it that Julie has more work. On the other hand, we might the boss owns an ought governing the proposition that Julie has more work. We might argue that, before she went, the boss ought to have arranged for Julie to have more work in her absence. Now that Julie is short of work, the boss is to blame.

The argument can continue; I do not mean to adjudicate it. I only mean to show that a substantive argument is needed. The grammar does not settle the question.

When we turn to the second limit, I think it is obvious that we sometimes need to breach it. It often happens that a person owns an ought that governs a conditional proposition. People certainly own oughts that govern compound propositions of other sorts. For example, it might be the case that

David ought to buy a horse and learn to ride it where the ought belongs to David. Obviously David might own an ought that governs a conditional proposition too.

The upshot is that, despite the device of reparsing, in some circumstances we still find ourselves in the extraordinary situation of being unable to express ownership of an ought.

An artificial construction

We therefore have to choose between correct grammar and correct philosophy. I sacrifice correct grammar. When I have to do so in order to express my meaning, I treat 'ought' as though it is a lexical verb. I shall treat it as a verb like 'intend', which can take as its complement a 'that' clause, as an alternative to an infinitive. For example, I shall say

The boss ought that Julie has more work and David ought that, if he buys a horse, he learns to ride it.

These sentences are ungrammatical but accurate. Moreover, they are ungrammatical only because of a historical accident; they easily could have been grammatical. They succeed in expressing ownership because they provide the necessary two argument places where correct grammar provides only one.

Notes

1 This appendix has benefited from extensive comments I received from Lloyd Humberstone, and from very useful discussions with Nicholas Everett. I have learnt a lot from English Grammar by Liliane Haegeman and Jacquelin Guéron,.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, September 14, 2006 3:24 PM
To: Lance Westerlund <westy@email.unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: John Broome's paper]
Attach: John Broome's paper.msg

Same--can you print this off for me as well.
Thanks,
Jan
--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: MacLean, Douglas <maclean@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, September 14, 2006 3:18 PM
To: Peter P Vanderschraaf <pvander@email.unc.edu>; Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: John Broome's paper

Peter and Jan,

I'm attaching a link to John Broome's paper, "Why Ethics Needs Moral Theory."

http://users.ox.ac.uk/~sfop0060/pdf/Why%20economics%20needs%20ethical%20theory.pdf

Doug
--
Douglas MacLean
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
CB #3125 Caldwell Hall
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

Tel: 919-843-4500 (office)
919-942-2759 (home)
Fax: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, September 18, 2006 1:59 PM
To: Roberts, John Thomas <jtrosap@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: [Fwd: [undergrad_studies_directors] COURSE OFFERINGS: SPRING 2007 FIRST YEAR SEMINARS]

Thanks John, Gucki and I are taking care of it--may aleady be done.

Jan

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, September 18, 2006 2:12 PM
To: Roberts, John Thomas <jtrosap@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: [Fwd: [undergrad_studies_directors] COURSE OFFERINGS: SPRING 2007 FIRST YEAR SEMINARS]

John,
Eventually the scheduling will be done by Marc as Associate Chair!!
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

John T Roberts wrote:
> Hi Jan,
>
> Did you get this message? You are still our scheduling officer, right?
> Will I take over that job at some point? Or will Marc take over that > job when he becomes Associate Chair?
>
> thanks,
> John
>
> ----------
>
> Subject:
> [undergrad_studies_directors] COURSE OFFERINGS: SPRING 2007 FIRST YEAR > SEMINARS
> From:
> Geraldine Taylor <gtaylor@email.unc.edu>
> Date:
> Wed, 13 Sep 2006 19:02:08 -0400
> To:
> "Directors of Undergraduate Studies"
> <undergrad_studies_directors@listserv.unc.edu>
>
> To:
> "Directors of Undergraduate Studies"
> <undergrad_studies_directors@listserv.unc.edu>
> CC:
> undergrad_studies_directors@listserv.unc.edu
>
>
> Scheduling Officers:
>
> Attached you will find a FYS Semester Course Offerings Form and the > listing of approved first year seminar courses for your department.
> Please identify your SPRING 2007 first year seminar offerings on the > form provided and return to FYS (CB# 3504 or fax 843-6557 or email > gtaylor@email.unc.edu) by Wednesday, September 20, 2006. Please note > that enrollment for FYS courses should be set at 20 tickets. Also, > please email me if there are any discrepancies on the listing of > approved first year seminars. Thank you for your assistance.
>
> Geraldine Taylor
> Undergraduate Education
>
> --- You are currently subscribed to undergrad_studies_directors as: johnroberts@unc.edu. To unsubscribe send a blank > email to leave-12773100-5550730C@listserv.unc.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, September 18, 2006 10:26 PM
To: Roberts, John Thomas <jtrosap@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: [Fwd: [undergrad_studies_directors] COURSE OFFERINGS: SPRING 2007 FIRST YEAR SEMINARS]

Indeed!!! I will be happy when I pass it on to Marc!

Jan

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, September 19, 2006 10:17 PM
To: Maureen Downey <mdowney@ajc.com>
Subject: Re: reporter's query

Hi Maureen,
I am very busy tomorrow but should be able to fit in some time to talk.
What article are you referring to--it wasn't attached!
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Maureen Downey wrote:
>
> Dr. Boxill,
> Do you have time tomorrow for a phone conversation about college > sports and corporate sponsors? I am an editorial writer and I am > preparing a piece based on a sports story we ran this week. (I wish I > could get to your program this week on sports.)
> I have attached the story. Thanks, Maureen Downey, editorial writer > for the AJC
>
> Library: TEXT 2005-09
> Word Count: 1931
>
> Prev Record
>
>
>
>
>
>
>
>
>
> Sunday, 9/17/2006
>
> No shoestring budget:
> Dek Head:
> $13 million from Nike pays for UGA sports gear and some of Richt's > compensation.
> Byline / Source:
> CARTER STRICKLAND / Staff
> Email:
> cstrickland@ajc.com
>
> * *
> Story:
> Athens --- Being new to Bulldog Nation, Matthew Stafford wasn't braced > for the reaction when he sauntered onto the University of Georgia > practice fields a few weeks ago dressed in an offensive T-shirt.
>
> Go Gators? I Love Spurrier? Nope, it was even worse.
>
> "He's got on Reebok," Mark Richt yelled to the other Georgia football > coaches. He sent the star freshman --- who made his first start Saturday > --- back to the locker room for a change of clothes.

>
> UGA is a Nike school. The Beaverton, Ore.-based athletic apparel > giant gives the university about $900,000 worth of gear a year for the > right to be the official outfitter of the Bulldogs, under a 10-year, $13 > million contract signed in 1999. It's the biggest deal among Georgia > schools.
>
> In addition, this month Richt will get his first check for > apparel-related compensation as outlined in his new contract, signed in > July. The contract gives him $530,000 a year --- doled out in two > payments --- for "equipment endorsement efforts," including Nike .
> Richt's last contract, signed in 2003, gave him $400,000 a year for > equipment endorsement. The money does not come directly from the shoe > company; UGA pays Richt. Such compensation has become standard in > high-profile coaches' contracts during the past 10 years.
>
> Nike also writes Georgia an annual check for $400,000 as part of its > contract with the UGA . The money goes straight to the athletics > department.
>
> In return for what it shells out to UGA , Nike expects its famous
> "swoosh" to be worn by players and coaches during "practices, games, > exhibitions, clinics, sports camps and other official or > university-sanctioned intercollegiate athletic program activities . . . > including but not limited to photo sessions and interviews," according > to the 28-page, detail-laden contract.
>
> Because it was signed so long ago, UGA 's contract is on the low end > nationally.
>
> The University of Texas, Florida State and Colorado all have Nike > deals that pay substantially more money. The company has outfitted its > local team, the University of Oregon, with enough gear for hundreds of > uniform combinations. Earlier this month, Nike came to terms with > Kansas State, an athletics department that generates significantly lower > apparel royalties than Georgia, for $12.3 million over five years.
>
> Nike isn't the only company on college campuses. Competitor Adidas > counts Notre Dame as a client. Under Armour recently struck a five-year, > $10.6 million deal to be the official outfitter of the Auburn Tigers.
>
> But when it comes to college sports marketing deals, everyone is > chasing the "swoosh."
>
> " Nike is the big dog," said Don Hinchey of the Bonham Group, a > Denver-based sports and entertainment marketing firm. "Everybody else > is just nipping at their heels."
>
> Nike is behind what's believed to be the largest deal out there --- a > seven-year, $25 million agreement it signed with the University of > Michigan in 2001, after a months-long spat between company and school > officials.
>
> " Nike has control of the market," said second-year UGA athletics > director Damon Evans said. "When you look at them and look at their > product, you understand why. It is what our players want to be in."
>
> The swoosh is everywhere
>
> Colleges say the deals allow them to put their players in high-end gear > without breaking the bank. But some critics question whether the > arrangements pressure campus athletics departments to operate like > for-profit teams.

>
> "Colleges and universities are slaves to it, and without it they can't > keep up in the arms race," said Bruce B. Svare, director of the National > Institute for Sports Reform at the State University of New York at > Albany. "Eventually, it is going to come back and bite the NCAA and its > member institutions."
>
> Svare's concern is that universities are becoming increasingly > commercialized as they try to make more money.
>
> UGA President Michael Adams said he fought the issue of allowing logos > on jerseys, telling then-NCAA President Cedric Dempsey as much in a > letter several years ago.
>
> Adams' main point: "Students shouldn't be billboards."
>
> "I lost that battle," said Adams, who earlier this year wrote a column > for the NCAA News suggesting guidelines for commercialism in college > sports . "Now, [putting manufacturers' logos on jerseys] is fairly > common, but we are discreet about it [at Georgia]."
>
> Evans said UGA 's relationship with Nike has nothing to do with > keeping up with other colleges. UGA isn't hurting for money, he > pointed out. The athletics department cleared $23.9 million in fiscal > 2005 from ticket sales, donations, television appearances and more. That > was the largest of any college athletics department in the nation, > according to U.S. Department of Education figures.
>
> Georgia's athletic budget for 2006-07 is $63.39 million.
>
> "In the whole scheme of things, [the Nike money] is a relatively > minor amount of our athletic budget," Adams said. "It is not enough to > buy us or influence us."
>
> Nike officials wouldn't discuss the ins and outs of their deals, only > saying they're pleased to be in business with teams like UGA .
>
> " Nike is honored to be the athletic footwear, apparel and equipment > supplier of choice for the Bulldogs," said Kit Morris, Nike 's > director of college sports marketing. "And we look forward to working > with the university for years to come."
>
> Nike has a presence outside Athens, too.
>
> Georgia Tech does business with the company, but its primary apparel > outfitter is Russell Athletic, an Atlanta company. Unlike UGA , Tech > has separate Nike deals for football, men's basketball and women's > basketball. They range in length from two to four years and total about > $325,000, Tech athletics director Dan Radakovich said.
>
> But at UGA , the swoosh is splashed everywhere, from players' pant > legs to the footballs the Bulldogs use in games.
>
> What it buys
>
> So what exactly does it mean to be a Nike school?
>
> For football players, Nike provides all kinds of cool stuff. Athletes > can choose from one of six cleat styles. They also get high-end running > shoes, a sweat suit, gloves, wristbands, socks, shorts. And more.
>
> Add it all up, and Nike ships Georgia $268,550 worth of football > products alone each year. Other athletic programs also benefit.
>
> Women's basketball gets $144,315 in gear. Men's basketball gets > $143,415, and baseball $38,504.

>
> "You get this big stack of stuff at the beginning, and it's like,
> 'Whoa,' " said Bulldogs junior Kelin Johnson, thinking back to his days > at Mainland High in Daytona Beach, Fla., where the equipment was "dirty, > wasn't yours. Your parents had to get you things.
>
> "You get here, and there it all is," Johnson said.
>
> For big-name football coaches, it means that hefty boost in > compensation. Texas' Mack Brown gets even more than Richt. His > compensation for "athletic products and endorsement" is $580,000 a year.
> South Carolina's Steve Spurrier is due no less than $500,000 a year, > according to his contract.
>
> And coaches get the goodies, too. Richt may receive up to $3,600 in > Nike shoes, apparel or equipment each calendar year, according to his > contract.
>
> Svare, director of the sports reform institute, said the deals > between apparel companies and coaches are especially troubling. He > worries that coaches will put their relationships with the companies > that write the checks over the well-being of their athletes.
>
> "They [coaches] get the endorsement money in order to promote the > product," Svare said. "How can ethics not be compromised? How can clear > independent, objective decisions ever be made in that culture?"
>
> Bernie Machen, president of the University of Florida, another Nike > school, said, "Yes, there is a lot of money involved, but I don't see > any evidence of 'compromise.' "
>
> "There are other sources of money and influence that are more > problematic than the shoe companies," Machen said.
>
> Such as?
>
> "TV and boosters," Machen said.
>
> Exposure adds up
>
> So what is in all this for Nike ?
>
> Well, mainly exposure. Take January's Nokia Sugar Bowl, played at the > Georgia Dome. On one side: Georgia. On the other: West Virginia, another > Nike school.
>
> The product placement, on the front of every jersey and the side of > every shoe --- the swoosh displayed prominently in countless video > replays and newspaper and magazine photographs --- more than pays for > Nike 's nominal investment, according to Joyce Julius and Associates, > which documents broadcast product exposure.
>
> During the Sugar Bowl, the Nike logo had 21 minutes, 26 seconds of > on-screen time, said Eric Wright, vice president for research and > development for Joyce Julius. That's equal to $22.5 million of > comparable exposure value, he said.
>
> College football's national championship game --- a one-for-the-ages
> Rose Bowl showdown between two Nike schools, Southern Cal and Texas
> --- garnered the company $31.9 million of comparable exposure value.
>
> "As you can see, they obviously know what they are doing," Wright said.
>
> It's been this way since the mid-1990s, when Nike , taking a hint > from what was happening with corporate branding in NASCAR, aligned > itself with top teams.

>
> Players have to wear gear
>
> Svare, of the sports reform institute, said, "There is so much money > involved and so much compromise that it is preposterous that we call > this 'amateur athletics.' Increasingly, these sports apparel companies > are calling the shots."
>
> In April 2000, Nike stopped negotiations on contract renewal with the > University of Michigan. At the time, university President Lee Bollinger > accused Nike of retaliating against Michigan for its involvement with > the Worker Rights Consortium, a student-driven coalition that demanded > Nike improve conditions for overseas workers.
>
> Nine months later, the company and university signed the $25 million > deal, which was more than double the original contract agreed to in > 1994. Some students were furious.
>
> Alan Thomas, UGA 's associate athletics director, said the reality is > that if colleges aren't given the gear by apparel companies, they > purchase it --- and it still comes from the same place.
>
> "What I tell people all the time is, 'You are going to have to buy it > somewhere,' " Thomas said.
>
> "If you don't get it from Nike , you are going to have to go to the > store and buy it. And guess what? That logo is still going to be on there."
>
> How both sides benefit
>
> A look at some of the items Nike and the University of Georgia get > out of their 10-year partnership:
>
> Nike gets ...
>
> > Tickets: Four "VIP" season tickets and two sideline passes for every > football game, plus 50 additional tickets to every game, 10 to bowl > games and 10 to whatever bowl game the Bulldogs play in.
>
> > Premium parking: Four "VIP" parking passes to all football (and > basketball) games. The football spaces are valued at $2,500 apiece.
>
> > Exposure and advertising: The swoosh appears on every uniform, ball > and cleat, showing up on TV and in newspaper and magazine photos. Plus, > Nike gets a full-page color ad in every UGA game program.
>
> Georgia gets ...
>
> > Gear: Nike outfits the Bulldogs teams --- including the coaches --- > from head to toe. All told, the gear is valued at about $900,000 > annually, with $268,550 of it going to the football team (including > $42,500 worth of shoes).
>
> > Cash: Every year until 2009, Nike is contractually obligated to > write a $400,000 check to Georgia. Football coach Mark Richt gets two > checks a year for $260,000 apiece for "equipment endorsement efforts," > which includes Nike money.
>
> > Bonuses: Among them: If Georgia's perennial power men's and women's > swim teams win the national title, Nike will pay Georgia's athletic > association an additional $10,000.
>
> Sources: University of Georgia, staff reports

>
>
>

From: nobody@notify.unc.edu on behalf of connect@schsr.unc.edu
Sent: Tuesday, September 19, 2006 9:10 PM
To: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: INFORMATIONAL: Project CONNECT Addresses Minority Participation in Research

---

APPROVED by UNC BIOMEDICAL IRB-Study # 02-SHEPS-587

Project CONNECT Addresses Minority Participation in Research

Black Americans have disproportionately high rates of disease and disproportionately poor health outcomes. Recent emphasis on increased representation of minority populations in all research has challenged investigators to find ways to diversify the populations that are recruited to participate in prevention and treatment trials.

Project CONNECT is recruiting volunteers who want to learn more about opportunities to participate in health research.

While we are focusing on African Americans, 18 years or older, any adult is welcome to participate.

If you participate your name will be placed on a confidential listing. If volunteers are eligible for a future research study they will be contacted and offered the opportunity to participate. The confidential registry will collect basic participant data including contact information, age, education level and basic health status.

To join the Project CONNECT listing, please reply with your name, and a phone number or mailing address so that we may get in touch with you. Or, you may choose to contact us directly by calling toll free at 1-866-849-1579.

If you know someone else who is eligible, and may be interested, please feel free to forward this information to them also.

Joining the registry does NOT mean one is volunteering for any particular study.

For additional information, please contact us at 919-966-7107 or via email at connect@schsr.unc.edu.

This email is sponsored by: Project CONNECT: the Bridge to Healthy Communities Through Research, UNC Sheps Center for Health Services Research

If you have concerns about taking part in research please contact the Committee on the Protection of the Rights of Human Subjects (Medical IRB) at UNC at (919) 966-1344.

This email is sponsored by: Sheps Center for Health Services Research

==========

"INFORMATIONAL:" email will only be sent to those who have indicated that they do want to receive mass email. To set your informational mass email preference, logon to the on-line directory web site at https://dir.unc.edu/dir/update.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, September 20, 2006 11:23 PM
To: anelson@unc.edu
Subject: Re: Spring teaching assignments

Hi Alan,
We worked on the schedule today, and since I last communicated with you, you indicated that British Empiricism might be better than doing modern again, so we switched it to British empiricism. We did however, have to leave the schedule times as they were. We can make sure we get your times right for the Fall.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Alan Nelson wrote:
> Hi Jan,
>
> Our schedules seem not to mesh so I'm having trouble catching you in > your office.
> As I said before, I'm happy with the schedule as it stands. I'm a > little concerned, however, that the "rationalism" following this > semester's seminar will be overkill for our grads. Should I circulate a > questionnaire about what they'd like to take? I'm thinking that > Wittgenstein might go down a little better.
> Or perhaps I am wrong to think that the main clientele for these 400 > classes is grads? (When I did one two years ago it was almost all grad > students).
>
> Thanks,
> Alan
>
> Jan Boxill wrote:
>
>> Hi Alan,
>> The Spring assignments were done before you arrived! But I think we >> can make changes sometime this month. I understand you are not used >> to having morning classes. I can change that for the Spring.
>> Presently we have you scheduled to teach:
>> PHIL 154: Philosophy of Social science-- a 36 student undergraduate >> class;
>> Tues/Thurs 9:30
>> PHIL 421: Rationalism-- an 25 student advanced undergrad/grad class
>> Thurs 1-3:30
>>
>> We can discuss changes.
>> Jan
>>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, September 22, 2006 2:57 PM
To: brenda merrill <brenda@buildingmenandwomen.org>
Subject: Joe Ehrmann

Hi Brenda,
I just wanted to follow up and let you know how wonderful Joe's talk was and his participation on our panel. The evening was a great success; the room was overflowing. I like everyone else in the room was mesmerized. The audience was a great mixture of faculty, administrators, and students, many of whom were student athletes. All the feedback I have received has been overwhelmingly positive. It set a high standard for future events the Parr Center will sponsor; it will be hard to duplicate. The panel that followed his discussion was very open and fit nicely with Joe's talk. I think what impressed the panel as well was not only Joe's contribution to the discussion but his keen interest in what they had to say. His presence, graciousness and message was felt by everyone in the room.

Thank you so much for all your help in helping us make this happen. Jere is a link to the Daily Tar Heel article the day after.

All the paper work has been processed, so you should receive payment soon.

Thanks again,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, September 26, 2006 6:08 PM
To: Roberts, John Thomas <jtrosap@email.unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: French Baccalaureate Credit]
Attach: French Baccalaureate Credit.msg

Can you take care of this.
Jan
--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: Felder, Andrea D <afelder@admissions.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, September 26, 2006 5:16 PM
To: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: French Baccalaureate Credit
Attach: Le Bac request to review credit.doc; French Bac equivalencies.doc; ihs_course_catalogue.pdf

---

Dear Professor Boxill,

Greetings from the Office of Undergraduate Admissions!

In June, I sent a letter to your attention asking about French Baccalaureate credit. Currently, we offer credit to students who have completed Advanced Placement and International Baccalaureate exams. We are trying to offer similar credit to students who have completed the French Baccalaureate. We received information from a few departments on campus, but we did not receive word from philosophy. Could you please review the attached letter and form sent earlier this summer and let me know if you are able offer credit to students completing the French Baccalaureate. In the PDF document, you will find information about the philosophy curriculum on page 49. If I have emailed the incorrect person, please let me know as well. Thank you for your quick response on this matter!

Sincerely,

Andrea Felder

Andrea Felder
Senior Assistant Director
Office of Undergraduate Admissions
The University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill CB #2200, Jackson Hall Chapel Hill, NC 27599
Phone: 919.843.6156 Fax: 919.962.3045
Visit us on the web: http://www.admissions.unc.edu

June 9, 2006

We are writing to ask your assistance in updating undergraduate credit received for foreign secondary school curricula. In particular, we are considering credit awarded to students who will have completed the French Baccalaureate or Le Baccalaureate.

We treat Le Baccalaureate similar to the way we handle the International Baccalaureate or IB program, which is already recognized by the University and for which credit is awarded. For example, students earning grade 12 or higher (the equivalent of a grade B+ or higher) on the Le Baccalaureate would receive credit similar to credit awarded for grades 5 or higher on the Higher Level International Baccalaureate exams.

Attached you will find information about the material covered by the French Baccalaureate in your specific discipline. We ask that you review this information and compare it to other secondary school curricula within your field. After your review, we ask that you then specify which UNC course a student should receive credit for upon earning grade 12 or higher on the French Baccalaureate in this subject. For your convenience, we have attached the courses under consideration within Le Baccalaureate. In the space provided, please approve, disapprove, or add credits to be awarded.

Please return the attached form to:

Andrea Felder
Office of Undergraduate Admissions
Campus Box # 2200, Jackson Hall

Thank you for your time and attention to this matter.

Sincerely,

Andrea Felder

In the space provided, please approve, disapprove, or add credits to be awarded. Return form to:

Andrea Felder
Senior Assistant Director of International Admissions
Office of Undergraduate Admissions
CB #2200, Jackson Hall
Chapel Hill, NC 27599

Thank you for your assistance!

IB Exam	Equivalent French Baccalaureate Course	UNC Awarded Credit for IB Exams (Potential Credit for Le Baccalaureate. Please signify your approval or make corrections in this column)	Credit Hours
HL IB Biology	Adv. Biology 11 Adv. Biology 12	Biology 101, 101L 279, 279L	8
HL IB Chemistry	Adv. Chemistry 11 Adv. Chemistry 12	Chemistry 101, 101L, 102, 102L	8
HL IB Economics	Economics 11 Economics 12	Economics 101	3
HL IB English	IB English A1 HL	English 190	3
HL IB European History	World History 11 World History 12	History 152 and General Elective	6

HL IB French A1	IB French A1 11 HL IB French A1 12 HL	French 203, 204, 260	9
HL IB Math	IB Math HL	Math 231, 232	6
HL IB Philosophy	Philosophy 12	Philosophy 101	3
HL IB Physics	Adv. Physics 11 Adv. Physics 12	Contact the department
HL IB Spanish B	IB Spanish B 11 HL IB Spanish B 12 HL	Spanish 203, 204	6

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, September 26, 2006 6:42 PM
To: Bredemeier, Brenda <bredemeierb@umsl.edu>; Sharon Stoll <sstoll@uidaho.edu>
Subject: Re: thank you

Hi Brenda and Sharon,
Thanks to and for both of you. I'm excited to be a part of this. I too think we make a good team and I look forward to the November symposium. Thanks for the "White Paper" -- it contained a lot of helpful resource information, and it did give some base for the philosophical positions we have. I too am very passionate about teaching ethics in sports to all people at all levels. I hope I didn't dominate too much, but I do think the discussion today gave a some focus to what we are trying to do. And working with the two of you and Jennifer can only have a good outcome.

Speaking of teaching ethics in sports at all levels, the Parr Center just sponored an evening symposium which I titled, "The Challenge of Ethics in Sports." Our featured speaker was Joe Ehrmann, and then I assembled a panel: Bill Friday [Knight Commission Chair, and President Emeritus of UNC system], our Athletic Director, the Exec Vice Chancellor of NC Central [a traditional Black School], the Faculty Rep from Duke, and a coach and student athlete from UNC. Assembling such a panel you never know how it will work out, but it was awesome, and the auditorium was completely filled with a wide cross section of university people. The good part was getting so much support from other people on this campus and on surrounding universities, from Exercise Sports Science Dept, the Carolina Leadership Academy and the Office of Diversity and Minority Affairs. What it showed was how many other people are wanting to learn and to make a difference.

Thanks again and can't wait to see you in November--I'm even missing a women's basketball game!! Last year I gave up the PA and am now the radio broadcast analyst for all games.

Regards,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, September 27, 2006 3:02 PM
To: Crain, Marion G <mcrain@email.unc.edu>; Laura Hogshead <laurah@email.unc.edu>
Cc: Postema, Gerald J <gpostema@email.unc.edu>; Robustelli, Carlo <carlo@email.unc.edu>; Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>; Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Thanks

Marion and Laura,
I join with Jerry Postema in thanking you for taking the time to meet with us. It was a very informative and productive meeting, and I am excited about the possibilty of future collaborations between the Parr Center for Ethics and the Poverty Center. In that vein thanks for sending the information on The Compassionate Community. This sounds like a very worthwhile venture, something that the Parr Center would be very interested in. Interestingly I think it also fits nicely with the Difficult Dialogues Initiative.

I also met with staff to discuss the disability workshop I mentioned. This could take on different forms, but one we discussed was to have a 2-day workshop, opening with an interdisciplinary panel for a roundtable discussion/community forum and then the second day a workshop where the book contributors present and discuss their papers, applying ideas of disability to traditional debates in moral and political philosophy. The panel could include some of the faculty who submitted proposals to you. One thing the Parr Center tries to do is recognize the outstanding faculty we have on this campus who have a lot to offer and this is one of those opportunities.

I'd like to discuss both these possibilities.

Thanks again,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, September 28, 2006 12:46 PM
To: Chapel Hill Philosophy <hobler@email.unc.edu>
Subject: For grad students
Attach: TA-Pref Spring 07.doc; TA Req Memo Spring 07.DOC

Can you send out the attachments for TA Assignments for me to all grad students saying:

Attached is a TA preference forms for Spring 2007. If you are on a non teaching fellowship, please indicate that on the form and return the form to me.

If you have any questions please feel free to come talk to me.

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

TA ASSIGNMENT REQUEST FORM FOR SPRING 2007

NAME:_____

I intend to return to the Department and I wish to be considered for a teaching assignment: Yes No

I intend to return to the Department and will be funded by a non teaching fellowship: Yes No

I will be a fifth year student next year and wish to be considered for a dissertation fellowship: Yes No
Specify Term

If you answered "yes" please rank all of the following assignments, taking into account your qualifications, your own educational needs and the seminars you plan to take. A Teaching Fellow must have been a TA at UNC for at least two semesters. Let "1" stand for your first choice, etc:

TEACHING ASSISTANT

_____	101 [20]	Intro to Main Problems	Large Section (4)	Neta	9 MW F- 9 & 10
_____	160 [22]	Intro to Ethics	Large Section (6)	Sayre McCord	11 MW F- 10 & 11
_____	163 [30]	Practical Ethics	Large Section (4)	Maclean	12 MW F- 10 & 12
_____	275 [46]	Phil Issues in Feminism	Large Section (3)	J. Boxill	10 MW F- 11 & 12

TEACHING FELLOWS

_____	101 [20]	Intro: Main Problems	TR 8
_____	110 [24]	Great Works	TR 8
_____	112 [26]	Making Sense of Ourselves	TR 3:30
_____	155 [21]	Intro to Logic	TR 9:30
_____	165 [34]	Bioethics	MWF 9
_____	134E [32]	Phil of Religion-Evening	MW 6-7:15
_____	230 [38]	Experience & Reality	MW 2
_____	272 [42]	Peace, War, Defense	MWF 2
_____	272 [42]	Peace, War, Defense	TR 3:30

Please indicate your relevant teaching experience to date and any other considerations you would like us to keep in mind when determining your assignment for next term. E.g. If you have not been a TA for a course, but believe you are qualified to teach it, please explain. (Use space below or back of this sheet for other considerations) Feel free to add additional comments.

PLEASE RETURN TO JAN BOXILL NO LATER THAN: October 13, 2006

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, September 28, 2006 12:48 PM
To: Lange, Marc B <mlange@email.unc.edu>
Subject: TA Assignments
Attach: TA Req Memo Spring 07.DOC; TA-Pref Spring 07.doc

Marc,
I am not sure if this will turn over to you next year, but I'm sending you what I am sending out to the grad students for Spring 07 TA Assignments.

Jan
--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

TA ASSIGNMENT REQUEST FORM FOR SPRING 2007

NAME:_____

I intend to return to the Department and I wish to be considered for a teaching assignment: Yes No

I intend to return to the Department and will be funded by a non teaching fellowship: Yes No

I will be a fifth year student next year and wish to be considered for a dissertation fellowship: Yes No
Specify Term

If you answered "yes" please rank all of the following assignments, taking into account your qualifications, your own educational needs and the seminars you plan to take. A Teaching Fellow must have been a TA at UNC for at least two semesters. Let "1" stand for your first choice, etc:

TEACHING ASSISTANT

_____	101 [20]	Intro to Main Problems	Large Section (4)	Neta	9 MW F- 9 & 10
_____	160 [22]	Intro to Ethics	Large Section (6)	Sayre McCord	11 MW F- 10 & 11
_____	163 [30]	Practical Ethics	Large Section (4)	Maclean	12 MW F- 10 & 12
_____	275 [46]	Phil Issues in Feminism	Large Section (3)	J. Boxill	10 MW F- 11 & 12

TEACHING FELLOWS

_____	101 [20]	Intro: Main Problems	TR 8
_____	110 [24]	Great Works	TR 8
_____	112 [26]	Making Sense of Ourselves	TR 3:30
_____	155 [21]	Intro to Logic	TR 9:30
_____	165 [34]	Bioethics	MWF 9
_____	134E [32]	Phil of Religion-Evening	MW 6-7:15
_____	230 [38]	Experience & Reality	MW 2
_____	272 [42]	Peace, War, Defense	MWF 2
_____	272 [42]	Peace, War, Defense	TR 3:30

Please indicate your relevant teaching experience to date and any other considerations you would like us to keep in mind when determining your assignment for next term. E.g. If you have not been a TA for a course, but believe you are qualified to teach it, please explain. (Use space below or back of this sheet for other considerations) Feel free to add additional comments.

PLEASE RETURN TO JAN BOXILL NO LATER THAN: October 13, 2006

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, September 28, 2006 1:33 PM
To: Prinz, Jesse J <prinz@email.unc.edu>
Cc: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>; Lange, Marc B <mlange@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Spring Teaching Assignment

Dear Jesse,
I believe you are aware of your Spring 2007 teaching assignment, but just to confirm. You will be teaching:

PHIL 53H: Theories of Human Nature--Honors First Year Seminar
Thursdays 3:30-6 in GM 212

PHIL 805: Kenan Seminar-Philosophy of Psychology
co-taught with Joshua Knobe
Wednesdays 4-6:30 in CW 213

If you have any questions please feel free to contact me. In the meantime please give your book orders to Gucki.

Thanks,
Jan
--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, September 28, 2006 1:35 PM
To: Knobe, Joshua M <knobe@email.unc.edu>
Cc: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>; Lange, Marc B <mlange@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Spring 2007 Teaching Assignments

Hi Joshua,

I believe you are aware of your Spring 2007 teaching assignment, but just to confirm. You will be teaching:

PHIL 230: Experience and Reality
Tues/Thurs 9:30 in PE 216

PHIL 805: Kenan Seminar-Philosophy of Psychology
co-taught with Jesse Prinz
Wednesdays 4-6:30 in CW 213

If you have any questions please feel free to contact me. In the meantime please give your book orders to Gucki.

Thanks,
Jan
--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, October 2, 2006 11:18 AM
To: Knobe, Joshua M <knobe@email.unc.edu>
Cc: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Spring 2007 Teaching Assignment

Hi Joshua,
I hope your Fall semester is going well. You may be aware of your Spring 2007 Teaching Assignment, but to confirm. Your assignments are:

PHIL 230: Experience and Reality--undergrad class of 36
TR 9:30-10:45 in PE 216

PHIL 805: Kenan Seminar-Phil of Psychology with Jesse Prinz
Wednesdays 4-6:30 in CW 213

If you have any questions or concerns please feel free to come see me.
In the meantime please give your book orders to Gucki.

Thanks,
Jan
--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, October 2, 2006 11:22 AM
To: Postema, Gerald J <gpostema@email.unc.edu>
Cc: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>; Lance Westerlund <westy@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Spring 2007 Teaching Assignment

Hi Jerry,
I hope your Fall semester is going as well as can be expected with being Interim Chair and with Linda's health difficulties. I'm sure you are aware of your Spring 2007 Teaching Assignment, but to confirm. Your assignments are:

PHIL 280H: Morality and Law-Honors.
TR 11-12:15 in GM 038

PHIL 770: Seminar on International Law w/ Buchanan
Tuesdays 4:25-6:55 in CW 213 (and Duke TBA)

If you have any questions or concerns please feel free to come see me. In the meantime please give your book orders to Gucki and a course description to Lance.

Thanks,
Jan
--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, October 2, 2006 11:37 AM
To: Jay F. Rosenberg <jfr@email.unc.edu>
Cc: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>; Lance Westerlund <westy@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Spring Teaching Assignments

Hi Jay,
I hope you are enjoying this semester in Germany and are looking forward to returning for your last semester at UNC! You may be aware of your Spring 2007 Teaching Assignment, but to confirm. Your assignments are:

PHIL 335 [old 73] Theory of Knowledge--advanced undergrad class
Wednesdays 1-3:30 in CW 213

PHIL 705 [0ld 205] Systematic Phil: Sellars Grad seminar
Mondays 1-3:30 in CW 208

If you have any questions or concerns please feel free to come see me.
In the meantime please give your book orders to Gucki and course descriptions to Lance [copied on this email.]

Thanks,
Jan
--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, October 2, 2006 11:47 AM
To: Wolf, Susan R <susanw@unc.edu>
Cc: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>; Lance Westerlund <westy@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Spring Teaching

Hi Susan,
I hope your Seminar this Fall semester is going well. I'm quite sure you are aware of your Spring 2007 Teaching Assignment, but to confirm. Your assignments is:

PHIL 805 [old 305] Graduate seminar in Ethics
Thursdays 4-6:30 in CW 208

If you have any questions or concerns please feel free to come see me.
In the meantime please give your book orders to Gucki and a course description to Lance.

Thanks,
Jan
--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, October 3, 2006 11:15 AM
To: Murphy, James L <murphyj@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Summer School Administrative Board

Hi Jim,
I only realized today that the meeting is scheduled during my teaching time. My computer crashed a month ago, and I lost everything despite the fact that I thought I had backed up everything. This meant I also lost my calendar.

So unfortunately I will not be able to make today's meeting. I have a first year seminar which goes from 2-4:30, so it wouldn't make sense for me to even come for a few minutes.

I apologize for this conflict.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, October 5, 2006 1:42 PM
To: Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: Grading Papers]
Attach: Grading Papers.msg

Could you please send him the website?

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, October 5, 2006 2:26 PM
To: Wolf, Susan R <susanw@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Spring Teaching

Hi Susan,
I know--being upstairs I don't come down to the first floor very often!!
I only put Ethics as that is what Geoff told me a while back. We can change it on our schedule, and it will be reflected on your course description, which you send to Lance.

Yes, I did send you an email about Margo's biblio-sometime around 9/5 or
6. In any case, if not, I approve, even though she removed Frye's Politics of reality and Railton's piece.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Susan Wolf wrote:
> Hi, Jan,
>
> I hardly ever see you, especially since your office has moved > upstairs. Perhaps, this weekend, at the colloquium...
> Meanwhile, I'm writing on business, about two things:
> First, I don't think I ever heard from you about approval of Margo
> C.'s revised request for substitutions on the ethics bibliography > exam. May I assume you accept them?
>
> Second, about my graduate seminar in the spring: the time and place > is fine - but I wondered about its being classified as an Ethics seminar.
> The seminar, which I will be co-teaching with Maria Di Battista, from > Princeton, is on Character, using philosophy, film, and fiction.
> (Perhaps, titled "Understanding character through philosophy, film, > and fiction.)
> It is as much philosophy of mind as ethics, or philosophy and > literature and film. Let me know if this matters to its numbering and > its generic title.
>
> Thanks,
> Susan
>
> Jan Boxill wrote:
>> Hi Susan,
>> I hope your Seminar this Fall semester is going well. I'm quite sure >> you are aware of your Spring 2007 Teaching Assignment, but to >> confirm. Your assignments is:
>>
>> PHIL 805 [old 305] Graduate seminar in Ethics
>> Thursdays 4-6:30 in CW 208
>>
>> If you have any questions or concerns please feel free to come see >> me. In the meantime please give your book orders to Gucki and a >> course description to Lance.
>>
>> Thanks,
>> Jan

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, October 5, 2006 2:29 PM
To: Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: [Fwd: Grading Papers]

Thanks!
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, October 5, 2006 4:09 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: Re: Thanks]
Attach: Re Thanks.msg

I've responded to her with a possible date change. the other program sounds good for a possible CLE credit program--what do you think?

Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: Laura Hogshead <laurah@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, October 5, 2006 3:28 PM
To: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Thanks
Attach: Posner on rights-1.doc; BRIAN E resume 2.doc

It's on my calendar! Thanks for the advance notice. When you get a chance, can you or Carlo fill me in on what you're planning? We'll be happy to help in any way possible.

Also, I got an email from a law student here (member of the student ACLU chapter at the law school), asking if we would be interested in co-sponsoring a program, described in the attachment. It's too far afield from our area, but I wondered if you all would be willing to put it on your listserv/website, or if you want to be involved. The speaker has a JD and a PhD in Philosophy. It sounds quite interesting.

Let me know if you're at all interested, and how we can help!
Laura

Jan Boxill wrote:

> Hi Laura,
> Thanks for the names of the folks interested in disabilities. We have > set a date for Friday, April 20th for the workshop. I hope this will > work for you all. Details yet to be worked out. Hopefully we can meet > to discuss these.
>
> Thanks,
> Jan
>
> Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
> Department of Philosophy
> Phone: 919-962-3317
> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

--
Laura H. Hogshead, MPA
Assistant Director
Center on Poverty, Work and Opportunity
University of North Carolina
CB# 3380
Van Hecke-Wettach Hall
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3380

(919) 843-9032
laurah@email.unc.edu

Brian E. Butler

Posner on Rights: Economics on Stilts - A lecture on contemporary instrumentalist conceptions of rights. From Posner's economic analysis, through his recent "conversion" to pragmatism, he has emphasized that rights talk in law should be critiqued on instrumentalist grounds. There is much to be admired in this stance, in this presentation it will be argued that legal stances should be evaluated more along instrumentalist lines than is done in current practice. But, on the other hand, Posner's instrumentalism, whether founded upon economic or pragmatic concerns is too narrow. What is needed is an instrumentalist conception of rights that allows for a more pluralistic set of aims.

Brian Butler has graduate degrees in fine art (MFA) and philosophy (PhD) from Claremont and a degree in law (JD with honors) from the University of Chicago. While in law school he worked as research assistant for Catharine MacKinnon and Judge Richard Posner. Recent articles include: "Law's Image of Pragmatism-Another Legal Fiction" (Contemporary Pragmatism), "Rorty, the First Amendment and Antirealism: Is Reliance Upon Truth Viewpoint-Based Speech Regulation?" (Journal of Moral Philosophy), "Aesthetics and American Law" (Legal Studies Forum), "All Rights Are Affirmative" (Radical Philosophy Review), "Legal Pragmatism: Banal or Beneficial as a Jurisprudential Position?" (Essays in Philosophy), "There are Peoples and There are Peoples: A Critique of Rawls' Law of Peoples (Florida Philosophical Review), "Is All Law Unavoidably Interpretive?" (Legal Studies Forum), and "Posner's Problem with Moral Philosophy" (The University of Chicago Law School Roundtable). In addition, he has written two articles for The Internet Encyclopedia of Philosophy: "Law and Economics" and "Legal Pragmatism."

From: nobody@notify.unc.edu on behalf of Allden, Andrew J </O=UNC EXCHANGE/OU=EXCHANGE ADMINISTRATIVE GROUP (FYDIBOHF23SPDLT)/CN=RECIPIENTS/CN=ALLDEN>
Sent: Tuesday, October 10, 2006 9:10 PM
To: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: INFORMATIONAL: Interested in becoming UNC Track Official?

Dear Faculty, Staff, and Students:

The UNC Track & Field Team is looking for individuals interested in becoming UNC Track & Field Officials. We host 6-8 track meets per year at the Eddie Smith Field House and the Fetzer Field-Belk Track. This is a great activity for all who are interested in athletics, including those with little to no experience in Track and Field. We will provide the necessary training to become a certified USA Track & Field Official. Certified officials are paid an honorarium for working our meets and can choose to work as few or as many meets as desired. Questions can be forwarded to Andrew Allden at 962-5195 or at Allden@uncaa.unc.edu.

If you are interested simply return the form below via email, fax or mail.

Allden@uncaa.unc.edu

Fax: 919-962-4903

To: Andrew Allden
UNC Track - Athletics
P.O. Box 2126
UNC-Chapel Hill NC
Or
Andrew Allden
Track - UNC Athletics
CB # 8600

Name _____

Email_____

Phone_____

Street Address_____

City _____

State_____

Zip_____

Please detail any experience with track & field as a competitor or official:

_____

_____

This email is sponsored by: UNC Track & Field Team

==========

"INFORMATIONAL:" email will only be sent to those who have indicated that they do want to receive mass email. To set your informational mass email preference, logon to the on-line directory web site at https://dir.unc.edu/dir/update.

From: nobody@notify.unc.edu on behalf of Allden, Andrew J </O=UNC EXCHANGE/OU=EXCHANGE ADMINISTRATIVE GROUP (FYDIBOHF23SPDLT)/CN=RECIPIENTS/CN=ALLDEN>
Sent: Tuesday, October 10, 2006 9:10 PM
To: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: INFORMATIONAL: Interested in becoming UNC Track Official?

Dear Faculty, Staff, and Students:

The UNC Track & Field Team is looking for individuals interested in becoming UNC Track & Field Officials. We host 6-8 track meets per year at the Eddie Smith Field House and the Fetzer Field-Belk Track. This is a great activity for all who are interested in athletics, including those with little to no experience in Track and Field. We will provide the necessary training to become a certified USA Track & Field Official. Certified officials are paid an honorarium for working our meets and can choose to work as few or as many meets as desired. Questions can be forwarded to Andrew Allden at 962-5195 or at Allden@uncaa.unc.edu.

If you are interested simply return the form below via email, fax or mail.

Allden@uncaa.unc.edu

Fax: 919-962-4903

To: Andrew Allden
UNC Track - Athletics
P.O. Box 2126
UNC-Chapel Hill NC
Or
Andrew Allden
Track - UNC Athletics
CB # 8600

Name _____

Email_____

Phone_____

Street Address_____

City _____

State_____

Zip_____

Please detail any experience with track & field as a competitor or official:

_____

_____

This email is sponsored by: UNC Track & Field Team

==========

"INFORMATIONAL:" email will only be sent to those who have indicated that they do want to receive mass email. To set your informational mass email preference, logon to the on-line directory web site at https://dir.unc.edu/dir/update.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, October 11, 2006 12:00 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Parr Center

As you may have noticed from the Parr Center website, we have been very busy this term, despite the disruptions with the move. Our new quarters are great, especially as we are all together and can easily communicate and coordinate to get things done.

Our two most successful programs presented to large audiences have been the Community Genetics Forum and the Challenge of Ethics in Sports. Both of these programs played to full houses. Other events have been presented to smaller groups with great success. We are very pleased with how our programming is going, as it is reaching across academic disciplines and into the larger community. We continue to work together with other units on campus to reach an even broader audience. One in particular is with the Difficult Dialogues Initiative, headed by law Professor Judith Wegner. This is an initiative designed to provide discussion and dialogue within the university with the intent on understanding diverse viewpoints and framing core questions about our communityâ€™s seeming rifts. All of these involve ethical issues, so it was appropriate that as the Director of the Parr Center, I am a member of the steering committee. The discussions take place within small groups of 12-20, as this provides more opportunity for meaningful dialogue. The dialogue the committee framed for this year is: /Personal faith and conscience: how, when, where, and with whom can we speak our minds on a public university campus?/ The Parr Center will sponsor three forums with our faculty and graduate student fellows. One has taken place with a set of graduate student fellows. This is an ongoing initiative that the Parr Center will be involved.

Another ongoing project we are working on is our "Ethics in the Professions" series. Last year as you know we sponsored an enormously successful Business Ethics workshop. Its success has spawned a great deal of interest in other disciplines. As a result, this year, we are set to sponsor at least four workshops: Bioethics, Ethics in Education, Disability and Disadvantage [being co-sponsored with the Poverty Center], and Legal Ethics, which satisfies Continuing Legal Education (CLE).

Also on February 20th and 21st, we are fortunate to have Daniel Gilbert, Harvard Psychology Professor and author of /Stumbling on Happiness/, to give a public lecture and attend a graduate seminar.

These are some of what we are doing and working on for this academic year. We continue to be open to new projects that will bring attention to ethics across the campus and larger community. Our staff is amazingly creative and energetic, which makes so much of this happen. And we thank you for all your support.

Gary, I understand that you are going to be in Chapel Hill this week, I would love to have the opportunity to have breakfast or lunch, or for you to come to the Center.

Once again, thank you so much for your continued support. The Center is vibrant and thriving thanks to you.

Jan

//

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, October 11, 2006 12:15 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: See attached letter
Attach: Greetings for packet.doc

Let me know what you think.

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

The University
of North Carolina
at Chapel Hill
Caldwell Hall, CB# 3125
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

Jan Boxill 919.962.3317 jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Greetings from the Director:

As you may notice from the Parr Center website, we have been very active. Our new quarters are great, especially as we are all together and can easily communicate and coordinate to get things done.

Our two most successful programs presented to large audiences have been the Community Genetics Forum [co-sponsored with Genomic Sciences among others] and the Challenge of Ethics in Sports. Both of these programs played to full houses. Other events have been presented to smaller groups with equal success. We are very pleased with how our programming is going, as it is reaching across academic disciplines and into the larger community. We continue to work together with other units on campus to reach an even broader audience. One in particular is with the Difficult Dialogues Initiative, headed by law Professor Judith Wegner. This is an initiative designed to provide discussion and dialogue within the university with the intent on understanding diverse viewpoints and framing core questions about our community's seeming rifts. As all of these involve ethical issues, it was appropriate that as the Director of the Parr Center, I serve on the steering committee. The discussions take place within small groups of 12-20, as this provides more opportunity for meaningful dialogue. The dialogue the committee framed for this year is: Personal faith and conscience: how, when, where, and with whom can we speak our minds on a public university campus? The Parr Center is sponsoring three sessions with our faculty and graduate student fellows. This is an ongoing initiative that the Parr Center will be involved.

Another ongoing project of the Center is our "Ethics in the Professions" series. Last year we sponsored an enormously successful Business Ethics workshop. Its success has spawned a great deal of interest in other disciplines. As a result, this year, we are set to sponsor at least four workshops: Bioethics, Ethics in Education, Disability and Disadvantage [being co-sponsored with the Poverty Center], and Legal Ethics, which satisfies Continuing Legal Education (CLE).

Also on February 20th and 21st, we are fortunate to have Daniel Gilbert, Harvard Psychology Professor and author of Stumbling on Happiness, to give a public lecture and attend graduate seminars in philosophy and biology.

These are some of what we are doing and working on for this academic year. We continue to be open to new projects that will bring attention to ethics across the campus and larger community. Our staff is amazingly creative and energetic, which makes so much of this happen. And we thank the Parr Family Foundation for all their support.

Sincerely,

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.

Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, October 11, 2006 1:23 PM
To: Lange, Marc B <mlange@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Summer School Maymester

Marc,
If you want to fit this in a regular course, that would be good. It can't be a first year seminar. So could you fit it say in Phil of religion or Phil of Science, using the course description from the bulletin and then enhancing it to fit the FYS title.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Marc Lange wrote:
> Well, what about some adaptation of my freshman seminar: Reason, > religion, and rationality in the Copernican revolution?
>
> Marc
>
> Quoting Jan Boxill <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>:
>
>> Same as teaching any summer course--1/9th of your salary.
>>
>> Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
>> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
>> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
>> Department of Philosophy
>> Phone: 919-962-3317
>> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>>
>>
>> Marc Lange wrote:
>>> Is there any financial incentive for offering such a course?
>>>
>>> Marc
>>>
>>> Quoting Jan Boxill <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>:
>>>
>>>> Summer School is asking for proposals from Philosophy to offer one >>>> or more Maymester courses. These are 3-credit hour courses that >>>> meet for 3 weeks, 3 hours per day at the beginning of the first >>>> summer session.
>>>>
>>>> They are hoping for courses with some flair and initiatives that >>>> would be especially appealing to students, not standard offerings >>>> simply moved to the shorter calendar. Or at least, the teacher >>>> should think of a way to infuse it with a unique component, taking >>>> advantage of some local area resources, or focusing on something >>>> that at least sounds interesting, not repeating the general wording >>>> of the official course description. Introductory courses are not >>>> particularly desired.

>>>>
>>>> If you are interested, please let me know as soon as possible.
>>>>
>>>> Thanks,
>>>> Jan
>>>>
>>>>
>>>
>>>
>>>
>>> Marc Lange
>>> Professor of Philosophy
>>> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
>>> Caldwell Hall
>>> CB#3125
>>> Chapel Hill, NC USA 27599-3125
>>
>>
>
>
>
> Marc Lange
> Professor of Philosophy
> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
> Caldwell Hall
> CB#3125
> Chapel Hill, NC USA 27599-3125

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, October 11, 2006 2:02 PM
To: Gary Comstock <gcomstock@ncsu.edu>
Subject: Re: Thanks
Attach: Parr Overview letter.doc

Hi Gary,
Thanks for your email. It was very good meeting with you on Saturday. I would very much like to get together to discuss each of our programs. I'm pretty flexible, with the exception of Tuesdays.
The proposal is very interesting and is very much what we are doing in our Ethics in Professions series. I also run a Scholars for Tomorrow program for first year grad students, which is just what your proposal addresses. I'm attaching a letter for our administration people that you might find helpful. Also, I'm sure you've visited our website, at parrcenter.unc.edu

My daughter, Lisa Boxill and her husband, Jim Ruth both are Fellows working in the Library.
Do you have Fall break next week? We are on break next week, so I could meet you on Friday the 20th for lunch.

Looking forward to talking.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

>

The University
of North Carolina
at Chapel Hill
Caldwell Hall, CB# 3125
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

Jan Boxill 919.962.3317 jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Greetings from the Director

As you may notice from our website, the Parr Center has been very active. Our new quarters in Caldwell 207 have brought together ethics faculty and staff creating a dynamic and productive environment. Let me share with you some of our accomplishments and exciting ventures.

This semester our programs have seen tremendous success. Two programs presented to large audiences have been the Community Genetics Forum [co-sponsored with Genomic Sciences among others] and the Challenge of Ethics in Sports. Both of these programs played to full houses. Other events have been presented to smaller groups with equal success. We are very pleased with how our programming is going, as it is reaching across academic disciplines and into the larger community. We continue to work together with other units on campus to reach an even broader audience. One in particular is with the Difficult Dialogues Initiative, headed by law Professor Judith Wegner. This is an initiative designed to provide discussion and dialogue within the university with the intent on understanding diverse viewpoints and framing core questions about seeming rifts within our community. As all of these difficult dialogues involve ethical issues, it was appropriate that as the Director of the Parr Center, I serve on the steering committee. The discussions take place within small groups of 12-20, as this provides more opportunity for meaningful dialogue. The dialogue framed for this year is: Personal faith and conscience: how, when, where, and with whom can we speak our minds on a public university campus? The Parr Center is sponsoring three sessions with our faculty and graduate student fellows. This is an ongoing initiative with which the Parr Center will be involved.

Another ongoing project of the Center is our "Ethics in the Professions" series. Last year we sponsored an enormously successful Business Ethics workshop. Its success spawned a great deal of interest in other disciplines. As a result, this year, we are set to sponsor at least four workshops: Bioethics, Ethics in Education, Disability and Disadvantage [being co-sponsored with the Poverty Center], and Legal Ethics, which satisfies Continuing Legal Education (CLE).

On February 20-21, 2007, we are fortunate to host Daniel Gilbert, Harvard Psychology Professor and author of Stumbling on Happiness, who will give a public lecture and attend graduate seminars in philosophy, psychology, and biology.

One other exciting venture we are sponsoring is the Intercollegiate Ethics Bowl (IEB), which combines the excitement and fun of a competitive tournament with a valuable educational experience for undergraduate students. Recognized widely by educators, the IEB has received special commendation for excellence and innovation from the American Philosophical Association. The format, rules, and procedures of the IEB all have been developed to model widely acknowledged best methods of reasoning in practical and professional ethics.

These are just some of the activities of the Parr Center for this academic year. We continue to be open to new projects that will bring attention to ethics across the campus and larger community. Our staff is amazingly creative and energetic, which makes so much of this happen. But we especially thank the Parr Family Foundation for their generous support.

Sincerely,

Jan Boxill, Ph.D., Director
Senior Lecturer in Philosophy

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, October 11, 2006 2:50 PM
To: Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>
Subject: letter attached
Attach: Parr Overview letter.doc

Greeting letter attached

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

The University
of North Carolina
at Chapel Hill
Caldwell Hall, CB# 3125
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

Jan Boxill 919.962.3317 jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Greetings from the Director

As you may notice from our website, the Parr Center has been very active. Our new quarters in Caldwell 207 have brought together ethics faculty and staff creating a dynamic and productive environment. Let me share with you some of our accomplishments and exciting ventures.

This semester our programs have seen tremendous success. Two programs presented to large audiences have been the Community Genetics Forum [co-sponsored with Genomic Sciences among others] and the Challenge of Ethics in Sports. Both of these programs played to full houses. Other events have been presented to smaller groups with equal success. We are very pleased with how our programming is going, as it is reaching across academic disciplines and into the larger community. We continue to work together with other units on campus to reach an even broader audience. One in particular is with the Difficult Dialogues Initiative, headed by law Professor Judith Wegner. This is an initiative designed to provide discussion and dialogue within the university with the intent on understanding diverse viewpoints and framing core questions about seeming rifts within our community. As all of these difficult dialogues involve ethical issues, it was appropriate that as the Director of the Parr Center, I serve on the steering committee. The discussions take place within small groups of 12-20, as this provides more opportunity for meaningful dialogue. The dialogue framed for this year is: Personal faith and conscience: how, when, where, and with whom can we speak our minds on a public university campus? The Parr Center is sponsoring three sessions with our faculty and graduate student fellows. This is an ongoing initiative with which the Parr Center will be involved.

Another ongoing project of the Center is our "Ethics in the Professions" series. Last year we sponsored an enormously successful Business Ethics workshop. Its success spawned a great deal of interest in other disciplines. As a result, this year, we are set to sponsor at least four workshops: Bioethics, Ethics in Education, Disability and Disadvantage [being co-sponsored with the Poverty Center], and Legal Ethics, which satisfies Continuing Legal Education (CLE).

On February 20-21, 2007, we are fortunate to host Daniel Gilbert, Harvard Psychology Professor and author of Stumbling on Happiness, who will give a public lecture and attend graduate seminars in philosophy, psychology, and biology.

One other exciting venture we are sponsoring is the Intercollegiate Ethics Bowl (IEB), which combines the excitement and fun of a competitive tournament with a valuable educational experience for undergraduate students. Recognized widely by educators, the IEB has received special commendation for excellence and innovation from the American Philosophical Association. The format, rules, and procedures of the IEB all have been developed to model widely acknowledged best methods of reasoning in practical and professional ethics.

These are just some of the activities of the Parr Center for this academic year. We continue to be open to new projects that will bring attention to ethics across the campus and larger community. Our staff is amazingly creative and energetic, which makes so much of this happen. But we especially thank the Parr Family Foundation for their generous support.

Sincerely,

Jan Boxill, Ph.D., Director
Senior Lecturer in Philosophy

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, October 11, 2006 3:05 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: Buzz Bissinger Lecture]
Attach: Buzz Bissinger Lecture.msg

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, October 13, 2006 11:57 AM
To: Roberts, John Thomas <jtrosap@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Honors course registration

This should not happen. Gucki and I went through the courses to put the necessary restrictions on, I'm surprised this happened. I'll check on it asap.

Also, John, are you interested in working with the group of majors on the Ethics Bowl? We have met and have a good group, but we need a faculty member to travel with them to St. Petersburg on for the Nov. 18th competition.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

John T Roberts wrote:
> Hey Jan and Gucki,
>
> A student registered himself for 691 next semester (the first semester > of the honor thesis course). He didn't realize that it wasn't a > regular course. I've spoken to him, and he knows he should drop it.
>
> But the reason why I'm writing is that the registration system did not > stop him from registering for it. He tells me he just used Caroline > and registered himself for it. Should that class be on controlled > enrollment?
>
> best,
> John

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, October 13, 2006 12:12 PM
To: Roberts, John Thomas <jtrosap@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Honors course registration

I have taken care of this--both 691 now read "controlled enrollment"
I tested it to make sure it works!
Thanks for letting us know.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

John T Roberts wrote:
> Hey Jan and Gucki,
>
> A student registered himself for 691 next semester (the first semester > of the honor thesis course). He didn't realize that it wasn't a > regular course. I've spoken to him, and he knows he should drop it.
>
> But the reason why I'm writing is that the registration system did not > stop him from registering for it. He tells me he just used Caroline > and registered himself for it. Should that class be on controlled > enrollment?
>
> best,
> John

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, October 13, 2006 1:04 PM
To: Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: meeting w/Gary

Indeed--I figured I'd drive him to wherever he needs to go.
Good Luck and have fun with your seminar.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Geoff Sayre-McCord wrote:
> Excellent. I think he will be trying to get down for the seminar, > which starts at 4. If you are able, it might be good to offer him a > ride back to the Inn (if you think that will be quicker than walking, > which it might not be...), so that he can get his car to come to where > the seminar will be.
> -- Geoff
>
>
> At 11:46 AM 10/13/2006, you wrote:
>> Hi,
>> Gary is coming by the office at 3:30 for about 15 minutes. He is >> near here, so he said he'd just walk over.
>> Jan
>>
>> Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
>> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
>> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
>> Department of Philosophy
>> Phone: 919-962-3317
>> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>>
>>
>>
>> Geoff Sayre-McCord wrote:
>>> Jan --
>>> I haven't heard back from you re meeting with Gary. Will it work >>> well for you to meet him at 3:30 out near the Friday Center or would >>> you rather meet in the Center? Either way, I need to let him know >>> soon...
>>> -- Geoff
>>>
>>> _____
>>> Geoffrey Sayre-McCord
>>> Professor and Department Chair
>>> Department of Philosophy, CB #3125
>>> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
>>> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
>>> USA
>>>
>>> Phone: (919) 962-2695
>>> email: sayre-mccord@unc.edu
>>> http://philosophy.unc.edu/smccord.htm

>>>
>
> _____
> Geoffrey Sayre-McCord
> Professor and Department Chair
> Department of Philosophy, CB #3125
> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
> USA
>
> Phone: (919) 962-2695
> email: sayre-mccord@unc.edu
> http://philosophy.unc.edu/smccord.htm
>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Saturday, October 14, 2006 2:04 PM
To: Hofweber, Thomas <hofweber@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: your talk

Hi Thomas,
My meeting went very well, but I understand so did your paper. In fact from ALL reports it was outstanding!!! Bernie said I would have really liked it. He thoroughly enjoyed it and we talked a lot about it last night. I'm sorry I missed it. He gave me the argument you presented, and I think I have a question about it, but I'll wait to see you as it isn't easily written in an email!

Good job.

Jan

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, October 16, 2006 12:47 PM
To: Stevenson, Debbie Deese <debbie_stevenson@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Teaching Award Nominations

Debbie,
I have a question. One of our 10 finalists was a TA last year, has now received her Ph.D. and is this term a Lecturer. Does she qualify?

thanks,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Debbie Stevenson wrote:
> Dear Members,
>
> I've deleted all the nominations that did not include a letter or were > duplicates.
> Let your work begin! We had a total of 293 nominations to consider > for this year's awards.
> Please review all nominations submitted through Oct. 2 - if the date > appears after the 2nd these will be considered in next year's pool.
>
> Please let me know if you need any assistance!
>
> Sincerely,
>
> Debbie

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, October 16, 2006 11:25 PM
To: McMillan, Tim <tjm1@email.unc.edu>
Subject: tutor/Honorary coach
Attach: WBB 2006-07 Invitation.doc

Thanks Tim.
Also I am attaching an invitation to serve as an Honorary Coach for Women's Basketball.
I know the women in your class would be excited to have you as an honorary coach.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

tjm1@email.unc.edu wrote:
> Hello Ms. Willingham --
>
> I'll be glad to have Mr. Yount come as a note taker and tutor. Our > midterm is tomorrow so there's no need for him to come then, but we'll > be starting back up after Fall Break. The course syllabus is on-line > at http://www.unc.edu/~tjm1/af101.htm and includes the on-line slave > narratives that the students will be reading for their upcoming essay > assignment.
>
> Have a great day.
>
> -Tim McMillan
>
>
> Quoting Mary Willingham <mwillingham@uncaa.unc.edu>:
>
>> Dr. McMillan,
>>
>> Dr. Jan Boxill may have already spoken with you. I wanted a chance to >> confirm my understanding of the possibility of sending a tutor to your >> class (AFAM 101, 01). Tony Yount, who is one of our history tutors (a >> retired High School teacher) is available to come and audit your class >> in order to assist some students. Since we are not starting this at the >> beginning of the semester, it is really not an official Supplemental >> Instruction class, however Tony is trained as an SI leader as well as >> current on his NCAA tutor compliance training. Tony will be holding >> regular review sessions for the remainder of the semester and other >> students (besides student-athletes) are welcome to join the sessions.
>> They will focus on study skills using your course content. Does this >> meet with your expectations, and is this acceptable? Please let me >> know.
>>
>> Thank you so much,
>> Mary
>>
>> Mary C. Willingham
>> Learning Specialist/SI Coordinator

>> University of North Carolina - Chapel Hill
>> Academic Support Program for Student Athletes
>> (919)843-6029
>> mwillingham@uncaa.unc.edu
>>
>
>

Chapel Hill Philosophy
UNIVERSITY OF NORTH CAROLINA

Department of Philosophy CB #3125, Caldwell Hall UNC Chapel Hill Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

Jan Boxill 919.962.3317 jmboxill@email.unc.edu

October 16, 2006

Dear Tim,

It's that exciting time of the year when basketball becomes the sport that enhances our lives, in particular Women's Basketball! As you may know the Women's Basketball program has an Honorary Coach program that has proven to be a very enjoyable experience both for the participants and the players. I would like to invite you to serve as an Honorary Coach for the 2006-2007 Women's Basketball program.

The experience and leadership of seniors Ivory Latta and Camille Little, juniors Erlana Larkins, Alex Miller, Megan Austin, and LaToya Pringle, sophomores Iman McFarlan, Heather Claytor, Rashanda McCants, Martina Wood, and Christina DeWitt, combined with the two first year players, McDonald's All American Jessica Breland and Trinity Bursey, makes this year's team an exciting team to watch.. Last year's team was outstanding making it to the Final Four, but the expectations for this year's team is to emerge as Champions in Cleveland. I know you'll find them amazing to watch. With all this talent and experience, the Tar Heels have set their goals high, expecting their season to culminate in a trip to the Final Four in Cleveland, Ohio. in April 2007, returning to Chapel Hill with the trophy.

The Tar Heels start their season with two exhibition games and then a strong non-conference schedule, which includes Tennessee and UConn, to take them into the ACC Conference games.

If you can find time in your busy schedule to participate in the Honorary Coaching program, I invite you to look over the home schedule and let me know which games would be most suitable for you. Every effort will be made to accommodate one of your first choices.

Please fill out the enclosed form and return your preferences to me as soon as possible. If you have any questions or need further information, please feel free to contact me at the Philosophy Department, CB #3125, or call me at 962-3317, or email me at: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

I look forward to hearing from you; and we are all looking forward to another great year.

Sincerely,

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Honorary Coach Coordinator
WCHL Radio Commentator

WOMEN'S BASKETBALL 2006-2007—HOME GAMES

Tuesday	October 31	7:00 p.m.	PREMIER PLAYERS-Exhibition
Sunday	November 6	2:00 p.m.	CARSON-NEWMAN-Exhibition
Friday	November 10	9:00 p.m.	EAST TENNESSEE STATE
Sunday	November 12	5:00 p.m.	WINSTON SALEM STATE [not available]
Friday	November 17	5:00 p.m.	ELON
Thursday	November 30	7:00 p.m.	UNC-GREENSBORO
Sunday	December 3	8:00 p.m.	TENNESSEE (ESPN) [not available]
Wednesday	December 6	7:00 p.m.	WOFFORD
Sunday	December 10	2:00 p.m.	WESTERN CAROLINA
Saturday	December 16	5:00 p.m.	SOUTH CAROLINA STATE
Thursday	December 28	2:00 p.m.	DELAWARE STATE
Saturday	December 30	2:00 p.m.	TENNESSEE TECH
Thursday	January 4	7:00 p.m.	VIRGINIA TECH
Monday	January 8	7:00 p.m.	VIRGINIA (RSN)
Monday	January 15	7:00 p.m.	CONNECTICUT (ESPN2) [not available]
Thursday	January 18	7:00 p.m.	GEORGIA TECH
Sunday	January 21	2:00 p.m.	NC STATE [not available]
Thursday	February 8	7:00 p.m.	DUKE (ESPN2)
Sunday	February 18	7:00 p.m.	MIAMI
Thursday	February 22	7:00 p.m.	WAKE FOREST

PREFERENCES (List three in order of preference)

1._____

2._____

3._____

NAME: _____
ADDRESS: _____
_____
EMAIL: _____
PHONE: _____

Return to Jan Boxill, Dept of Philosophy, UNC-CH, Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125.
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu or Fax: 843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, October 17, 2006 8:48 AM
To: Taft, Tim <timothy_taft@med.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Drug talk

Hi,
Meet us at the Student Athlete Academic Center in the Auditorium at 2.This is a smaller group--it is a First Year seminar of 21 students.
See you then.
Thanks so much.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Tim Taft wrote:
> Where should I be and when? T

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, October 17, 2006 1:08 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: [Fwd: URGENT Southeast Regional Ethics Bowl]]
Attach: [Fwd URGENT Southeast Regional Ethics Bowl].msg

I think you got this, but just in case. Also, Susan is checking on a van for Nov 16-20th.

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: Clark, Susan C <scclark@EMAIL.UNC.EDU>
Sent: Tuesday, October 17, 2006 12:47 PM
To: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>; Terry Price <tlprice@EMAIL.UNC.EDU>
Subject: [Fwd: URGENT Southeast Regional Ethics Bowl]
Attach: URGENT Southeast Regional Ethics Bowl.msg

FYI
I have paid our entry fee. They are concerned as to if you have rooms reserved?
Susan

--
Susan Clark, UAM 1
Philosophy,Admin. Manager
UNC-Chapel Hill
102-A Caldwell Hall CB 3125
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
919-962-3311
919-843-3929 Fax
scclark@email.unc.edu

REGIONAL ETHICS BOWL CASES

FALL 2006

Prepared by:
Rhiannon Dodds, Interim Chair
Edward Carr
Raquel Diaz-Sprague
Brenda Dillard
Jeremy Jones
Mark Matalski
Richard Miller
Adam Potthast
Terry Russell

© Association for Practical and Professional Ethics 2006

Case #1

Dr. B., a Professor of Psychology at a large research institution, Ohio State University (OSU), has a long distinguished record of working with chimpanzees. In the 1970s, she taught chimps to communicate, first by using American Sign Language and later using graphic symbols. In the last decade, under her direction, two young chimps, Keeli and Ivy, have learned to count and to recognize simple written words. Another chimp, Bobby, has shown an uncanny ability to learn number sequences and even to fill in missing numbers in a sequence. She has learned that chimps can do simple arithmetic, behave similarly to preschoolers, and (along with humans) have the ability to perceive the knowledge state of a peer.

Dr. B., who has dedicated her entire professional life to the study of cognition in chimpanzees, has won international acclaim for her work and was named one of the top 50 women researchers in the nation by Discover Magazine in 2002. Her chimps have been featured on Discovery Channel. However, as funding to support the research center has been hard to come by in the last five years, the university decided to close the research center and send the chimps away. OSU abruptly seized the professor's laboratory on February 28, 2006, changed all the locks, and hired a truck to send all 12 primates (nine chimps and three monkeys) to Primarily Primates, a controversial Texas sanctuary. The university gave the sanctuary a $324,000 trust fund for the animal's care.

Dr. B. vigorously protested the decision. When a restraining order she filed failed to prevent the university from implementing its decision, Dr. B. chained herself to the center's gate to prevent the transport trucks from leaving. Her efforts were unsuccessful and one of the chimps, 25-year old Kermit, died during the 38-hour transport in early March. Bobby was found dead in his enclosure on April 20. One of the monkeys escaped and was never recovered. Dr. B sued OSU to win custody of the remaining chimps. PETA also joined the suit on behalf of the remaining seven chimps and two monkeys and in June a Texas judge ordered that an independent trustee should oversee the $324,000 funding to ensure that it be used to house and benefit the remaining OSU primates.

Case #2

Wisconsin State Representative Dan LeMahieu (R-Oostburg) was outraged when the University of Wisconsin-Madison's University Health Services (UHS) featured ads in the two student newspapers suggesting that students consider receiving prescriptions for emergency contraception (EC) prior to leaving for spring break. UHS services are available to any student at the UW-Madison, and as such they offer health expertise to students in the areas of medical treatment for illnesses and injuries, counseling for stress reduction, smoking cessation, nutrition, dermatology, sports medicine, as well as confidential testing and treatment of sexually transmitted diseases (STDs). Although a part of the state-funded University of Wisconsin System, the ads were paid for using student segregated fees which are not part of taxpayer dollars or academic tuition funds.

Following the publication of the ads, which were part of a series also advising students to protect themselves from sun exposure and limit their intake of alcohol, Representative LeMahieu initiated drafting legislation to ban any university health center in Wisconsin from advertising or distributing the morning-after pill (EC). LeMahieu contends, "I think it's offensive that the university is trying to tell young women to be prepared and to plan ahead so they can have promiscuous activities on spring break. I don't think that it's the role of the university to promote that type of activity, and I believe that's what their ad is asking young people to do." LeMahieu also added that the UW should be "made aware" that many people who are paying state taxes do not appreciate the offensive advertisements.

On June 16, 2005, Wisconsin's State Assembly voted 49-41 in favor of a bill prohibiting University of Wisconsin System health centers from advertising, prescribing or dispensing emergency contraception, making it the first state in the country to move towards banning EC on all state college campuses.

Case #3

Near the end of its fall season, a top executive from the popular reality television competition, Idol Starz, appeared on the Today Show and revealed that the program's contestants either advanced or were cut based on producers' decisions rather than being selected through the program's public text-messaging voting system. The executive went on to state that the show's winners and losers were selected by producers on a round-by-round basis in the hopes that certain "controversial" or "questionable" choices would positively influence ratings, increase fervor for underdog candidates, and create a more developed fan-base which would return to view the show during both current and future seasons.

Given the show's popularity and viewers' commitment to their favorite contestants, the revelation led to a large public outcry condemning the show for dishonesty and false advertising. Many claimed to have been cheated and explained that the show had a responsibility to adhere to the public's decisions about which candidates they preferred. Given special attention during this debate was the show's slogan: "You vote. You decide. Who should be the next Idol Star?"

During ensuing interviews, the show's producers explained that their decisions were based on the fact that they were in the entertainment business and that certain unpredictable events helped to keep the audience invested in the show and provided increased entertainment value. They also argued that, more often that not, their decisions about who should advance or win were in line with the public's desires. When questioned about the program's slogan, one producer was quoted as saying, "Look at it carefully. There is a difference between telling someone to vote and decide who should be the next Idol Star and telling them that their votes will decide the next Idol Star."

Case #4

In a recent case, Florida authorities declined to file charges against a Miami Herald columnist for surreptitiously recording a phone call from a city commissioner who later committed suicide in the newspaper's lobby. Authorities cited the unusual circumstances that led to the taping as the basis for not filing charges against the columnist. These circumstances were not enough for the Miami Herald, who took immediate action to fire the columnist for violating a company policy that prohibited the taping of sources and interviewees without the subject's consent.

State laws related to the recording of phone calls and the courts interpretation of these laws vary widely in the United States. Many of these laws are intentionally written with ambiguous terms and interpretation is typically required on a case by case basis.

The firing of this popular columnist caused much protest around the world. Many members of the Herald staff signed a petition requesting the decision to fire the columnist be rescinded. The columnist was friends with the city commissioner, and the commissioner provided regular sources for stories to the columnist.

According to the columnist, the commissioner was despondent over public allegations about his sex life and the tone of his voice on the phone conversation was so alarming that the columnist impulsively decided to record the conversation. The tape records the columnist's attempts to calm the commissioner. Throughout their 20-minute conversation, the columnist attempted to steer the conversation to less volatile subjects in the hopes of lifting the commissioner's spirits. But the call ended with the commissioner still despondent. A few minutes later, the commissioner shot himself.

Following the suicide, the columnist told editors of the Miami Herald that he had been interviewing the commissioner earlier in the day and had recorded part of the conversation without the commissioner's consent.

After being fired, the columnist was quoted as saying "In a tense situation I made a mistake. The Miami Herald executives only learned about it because I came to them and admitted it. I told them I was willing to accept a suspension and apologize both to the newsroom and our readers. Unfortunately, the Herald decided on the death penalty instead."

The Miami Herald editors have taken the position that there must be an absolute prohibition of the paper's reporters taping conversations without a party's consent, and not just because it is against the law in Florida, as it is in many states. An executive of the Herald has stated that the policy is necessary to protect the paper's integrity, as well as to foster trust from news sources.

Journalists at the Miami Herald have pointed out that at least one other reporter surreptitiously taped an interview, but was not fired. The journalists also have also stated that there is no written policy on taping conversations and that any verbal policy on expectations of reporters is unclear. The Miami Herald responded to the alleged case of a previous surreptitious taping by saying “we understand this happened 18 years ago”. They went onto state that the recent decision to fire the columnist was clearly guided by the environment in which journalists operate today; which is much more constrained in terms of the latitude given for violation of law and policy.

Case #5

Beginning in 2005, protests at funerals for military personnel killed in Iraq have been increasing – and have received much media attention. In particular, members of the Westboro Baptist Church, in Topeka, Kansas, have been especially visible and vocal at many of these military funerals. Reverend Fred Phelps and his protesters claim that U.S. military deaths in Iraq are because America tolerates homosexuals and that they are a sign of divine punishment for America's tolerance of homosexuality. For over a year now, members of this anti-gay church have been crisscrossing the United States, holding more than one hundred protests outside the funerals of U.S. soldiers killed in Iraq.

They wave placards with such expressions as: "You're Going to Hell," "Fag Vets, God Hates You," and "Thank God for IEDs" (the improvised explosive devices responsible for killing many military personnel in Iraq). Phelps contends that all American soldiers are guilty by association – because they are fighting in the service of the U.S. government.

By Spring, 2006, twenty-eight states and Congress were rushing to pass laws to restrict protests outside military funerals. On May 17, 2006, Illinois Governor Rod Blagojevich signed a state law – "Let Them Rest in Peace Act" – that prohibits disruptive and inflammatory protesting 30 minutes before a funeral, during the service, and 30 minutes after a funeral while remaining 200 feet from the funeral site. This new Illinois law drew immediate scorn from Shirley Phelps-Roper, attorney for the Westboro Baptist Church: "The law is impotent. You've done nothing to change that God is killing your children and sending them home in body bags. Keep your big, fat snout out of our religion."

In the U.S. Congress, Representative Mike Rogers (R-Mich.) sponsored a House bill to address this matter. He said that he took up the issue after attending a military funeral in his home state, where mourners were greeted by "chants and taunting and some of the most vile things I have ever heard. Families deserve the time to bury their American heroes with dignity and in peace." On May 24, 2006, Congress passed legislation that would bar demonstrators from disrupting military funerals at national cemeteries.

The "Respect for America's Fallen Heroes Act" prohibits protests within 300 feet of the entrance of a national cemetery and within 150 feet of a road into the cemetery from 60 minutes before to 60 minutes after a funeral. Those violating the act would face up to a $100,000 fine and up to a year in prison. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said that this act "will protect the sanctity of all 122 of our national cemeteries as shrines to their gallant dead. It's a sad but necessary measure to protect what should be recognized by all reasonable people as a solemn, private and deeply sacred occasion."

In response to this federal legislation, Phelps has said that Congress was "blatantly violating the First Amendment rights to free speech" in passing the bill. He said that he will continue to demonstrate but would abide by the restrictions. Constitutional experts are warning that protest restrictions – such as those passed in Illinois and in Congress – appear overly broad and are likely to be overturned if challenged in court. Eugene Volokh, a law professor at the University of California-Los Angeles and an authority on the First Amendment, said: "You can't treat speech as a breach of peace simply because it offends people. These protests are tremendously offensive and hard to ignore. But ignoring them or counter-protesting is unfortunately the only remedy the 1st Amendment allows." And, the American Civil Liberties Union has filed a lawsuit against a new Kentucky law, saying that it goes too far in limiting freedom of speech and expression. Additional lawsuits are expected to be filed.

U.S military veterans find Phelps' beliefs and actions particularly abhorrent, and in November, 2005, veterans' motorcycle groups began showing up at military funerals to oppose the protesters and to show support for the families of the deceased soldiers. Calling themselves the Patriot Guard Riders, these motorcycle groups have organized hundreds of counter-protesters to wave American flags and stand silently in front of the Westboro picketers, to pay respects to the fallen soldier, and to protect the soldier's family from disruptions.

Case #6

Alejandro Toledo, President of Peru, has launched a public campaign demanding that Yale University return to Peru Incan artifacts excavated at Machu Picchu in 1912. Yale professor Hiram Bingham III, guided by a native Peruvian, came upon the Incan city of Machu Picchu in 1911. Bingham secured backing from the National Geographic Society and support from Peru's government for archeological excavations at Machu Picchu in 1912 and again in 1914-15.

In October 1912, Bingham gained the Peruvian government's permission to bring to Yale for research the contents of 170 tombs in Machu Picchu. The decree allowed that Peru reserve the right to ask for the return of the objects.

By 1916, Peru, suspecting Bingham of secretly taking Incan gold, ended Bingham's work at Machu Picchu. The items taken to Yale from the 1914-15 excavations were loaned for only 18 months. Yale has refused several Peruvian requests for return of the artifacts.

Today, Yale claims that they have complied with the 1912 and the 1916 agreements, returning the objects to Peru during the 1920's. Yale sees no similar responsibility to return the items taken from earlier work. National Geographic Society records show that about half of the items were returned to Peru, with no mention of the remaining artifacts.

Luis Guillermo Lumbreras, the director of Peru's National Institute of Culture in Lima, claims that Yale has had 90 years to complete research on the objects, and now Peru wants the items returned. Peru elected its first indigenous president–Alejandro Toledo, who honored the nation's Incan heritage by holding part of his inauguration ceremony at Machu Picchu in 2001. In part due to his influence, Peru wants possession of the artifacts, which have formed the core of Yale's impressive, scholarly exhibition: Unveiling the Mystery of the Incas. After traveling to six cities and attracting over a million visitors, the exhibit now resides at Yale's Peabody Museum of Natural History in Connecticut.

The recent research of Yale professors Lucy Salazar and her husband Richard L. Burger, including extensive scientific analysis of burials, has provided the most reasonable explanation for the existence of Machu Picchu. Rather than supporting the earlier ideas of the city as a center for religious activity including the sacrifice of virgins, the professors' research has suggested that the city served as a simple country retreat from the Inca capital of Cuzco.

The number and kinds of artifacts taken to Yale from Machu Picchu is in dispute. Yale has offered to return some of the pieces to Peru, if Peru allows it to keep others at the Peabody Museum of Natural History, where Machu Picchu is the prize exhibit.

Case #7

In October of 2002, after the overdose of one of its workers, management at a Weyerhaeuser, a multinational corporation in the pulp and paper industry located in Valliant, Oklahoma, became concerned that employees were not following drug and safety regulations in its parking lot. Management decided to have the parking lot searched with gun and drug sniffing dogs. While the dogs found no drugs, they did find firearms in twelve vehicles, including shotguns and automatic weapons. The owners of these vehicles, including a 23-year veteran shift manager, were fired in the next two days.

Weyerhaeuser and many other businesses have had long standing bans on firearms brought into the plant in order to protect workers and prevent workplace violence. In 2002, Weyerhaeuser extended this ban to the parking lot. Many workers claim they were not told of the extension of the ban, though management claims they informed workers. Some of the fired workers have filed suits claiming they were not informed. The initial suit was thrown out, but the decision is being appealed.

Since this and other incidents, many states -- beginning with Oklahoma -- have enacted laws protecting workers who want to keep firearms in their cars. The latest state to consider such a law is Florida, home to Walt Disney World, which does not allow any of its 50,000+ employees to bring guns onto company property.

A number of corporations have joined federal lawsuits against these new state laws. These companies include ConocoPhillips (petroleum), Halliburton (energy), and the Nordam Group (aircraft manufacture). They state that they cannot provide a safe and secure workplace without the ban on guns in the parking lot, and they see state laws allowing guns as infringing on the right of private property owners to decide what is and is not allowed on their property. Even aside from their property rights, companies claim that the laws would disregard public safety. The Bureau of Labor Statistics Census of Fatal Occupational Injuries states that in 2004, there were 551 workplace homicides out of 5703 workplace fatalities. A study at the University of North Carolina claims that such killings are five times more likely to occur at workplaces that allow guns compared to those who do not.

The National Rifle Association (NRA) has been the primary champion of laws that allow workers to have guns in cars in company parking lots. The NRA claims that prohibiting lawful gun owners to keep guns in their car dramatically diminishes their right to own firearms and defend themselves. All 50 states allow the transportation of firearms for lawful purposes. The laws also restrict workers who may want to hunt or target shoot after work from engaging in these lawful activities. They also claim that one's car should enjoy the same protections that one's home enjoys with regards to being able to keep lawful weapons and immunity to unlawful searches.

The NRA claims that the state laws already have commonsense provisions in them that prevent abuse. For instance, anyone wanting to transport a firearm and park their car in a company lot must keep the automobile locked, and at no time is it permissible to take the firearm out of the car on company property. Against the property rights claims of business owners, the NRA claims that business owners are already under extensive federal, state, and local regulations about what they can do with their property and that striking down these state laws would allow companies to "micro-manage" the contents of an employee's automobile. The NRA also cites statistics that 84% of workplace murders are committed by strangers, and anyone determined to commit a crime will not be discouraged from bringing the gun onto company property by a company regulation prohibiting guns in parking lots.

Case #8

After several years of miscarriages, Edward and Susan turn to in vitro fertilization as a means of screening embryos for genetic defects. More than two years elapse, with all the attendant discomfort and expense, but finally an "acceptable" embryo is produced and implanted. To their joy, nine months later they are blessed by Michelle, an apparently happy, healthy baby.
They decide that they will not tempt fate by trying to increase their family, instead choosing to relish the raising of their daughter. Five years pass and they eagerly anticipate Michelle's starting kindergarten. They have elected to enroll her in a well-respected private school so as to realize her fullest potential. Part of the school's pre-entry preparation is an extremely thorough set of physical examinations. (The physical examinations are not done to screen for admission, but rather to anticipate potential health issues while the student is enrolled.)

To their horror, the examinations determine that Michelle has early symptoms of a particularly virulent form of Acute Childhood Lymphoid Leukemia. Nothing in the embryonic screening could have predicted its occurrence. They begin immediate conventional treatments which prove to be ineffective. At their oncologist's recommendation they enroll her in the nation's premier pediatric oncology program. She gives them the bad news that Michelle shows evidence of having Philadelphia chromosome-positive ALL. The most successful treatment involves hematopoietic stem cell transplantation from matching relatives. The oncology clinic tests both Edward and Susan, but finds neither of them compatible. Since neither of them (nor Michelle) has any siblings, it looks as if they will have to hope for a million-to-one chance of finding a well-matched unrelated donor.

While waiting in the lounge of the clinic, the mother of another child under treatment introduces herself and suggests that they do have another option – they could have another child, via in vitro, selecting among possible embryos for compatibility for transplant. Initially they are horrified at the idea of producing another child as a "biological stockpile" for Michelle, but the more they think about it the better the idea seems. After all, they really had wanted more children. The new child wouldn't be seriously injured by the procedure needed to provide Michelle with the transplant material she so desperately needs. Given their history of medical procedures needed to have Michelle, the screening required to make sure the new child would be a compatible donor is almost the same as if they were just having another child as a family expansion.

When they raise the possibility with Michelle's physician, she explains that the screening technology has improved sufficiently since Michelle's birth to guard against the new child's having the same disposition toward this disease. But, before she will go further, she tells them they must speak with the clinic's counselor. The counselor asks them to consider what their true motives are in proposing the conception of this second child, whether they would be treating her as a person or as an object and how they will explain to her the reason for her conception.

Case #9

After 25-30 years of service, ships are at the end of their sailing life and are sold as "End of Life Vessels" to be dismantled primarily to recover the valuable steel which makes up about 95% of the ship. Ship breaking (or ship demolition) is the process of dismantling the structure of an obsolete vessel for scrapping or disposal and includes a wide range of activities, from removing all gear and equipment to cutting down and recycling the ship's infrastructure. However, the only ones who profit from ship breaking are the ship owners. They extract an average of $1.9 million profit per "End of Life Vessel." Ship breaking is also a challenging and controversial process, due to the structural complexity of ships and the many environmental, safety, and health issues involved.

Ship breaking is dangerous and has the reputation of being one of the dirtiest jobs on earth. For minimal dollars a day, workers with little protective gear tear out pipes insulated with asbestos, transformers covered with PCBs, and leaky diesel tanks. Until the late twentieth century, ship breaking took place primarily in port cities in developed countries – including the United States and Europe. Today, however, most ship breaking yards are in developing countries – especially India, China, Bangladesh, and Pakistan. This is due to rules dealing with lead paint and toxic substances. The industry was such a disgrace that, in 2000, Congress acted to stop U.S. registered ships from being sent overseas for scrap. Ship breaking remains an international environmental and labor concern - because ship breaking now occurs mostly in underdeveloped countries where working conditions and environmental impact are not regulated. Also, many ships being scrapped now were made before many international environmental laws were enacted.

In late 2005, a Virginia-based company, Bay Bridge Enterprises, visited the small coastal town of Newport, Oregon, and proposed opening a ship breaking plant on the banks of Yaquina Bay. The company offered up to 125 jobs paying $20 an hour. Their spokesperson indicated that the company had no environmental violations since they have been doing this work, and that they had zero lost-time injuries since 2001. Also, he noted that there is no large-scale ship breaking yard on the West Coast, and that there are about 60 ships anchored in a California bay – just waiting to be moved to a scrap yard. Therefore, there would be plenty of work available at a new ship breaking plant in Newport – for some time to come.

A strong coalition of interested parties in the Newport area emerged in opposition to this proposal. The "Friends of Yaquina Bay" were the group of people most responsible for rallying the community together to try to stop this ship breaking proposal. The Oregon Coast Aquarium and the Oregon State University Hatfield Marine Science Center – both located in Newport – also added major support to the effort to block the proposed plant. Some of the major issues raised by these opponents to the proposal included: the world-wide negative reputation of ship breaking; the safety of towing "ghost ships" (some with a length of up to 540 feet) from San Francisco Bay in California to Newport, Oregon; potential infestation of as many as 100 invasive species on the ships in California that are not in Yaquina Bay; toxins on and in the ships that would escape into the bay and the air, affecting the seafood industry – especially crabbing – as well as the fear of pollution runoff at the Hatfield Marine Science Center and the Oregon Coast Aquarium; and visual pollution. Yaquina Bay is a continentally Important Bird Area – with several endangered species present. There are 15 or more blue heron nests and other bird species on the tide flats near the proposed ship breaking site. The local tides extend 15 miles up the Yaquina River and thus the largest oyster farm in Oregon could be affected. Plus there is fear that money-spending tourists would not view these rusting ships as an asset to the beautiful Oregon coast.

On January 24, 2006, about 200 people packed a meeting room in Newport, Oregon, to hear Mr. Don Mann, general manager of the Port of Newport, announce that "some projects are a good fit, or not a fit at all. Bay Bridge's plan for a ship breaking facility in Yaquina Bay does not qualify in our test for a good fit." Thus, quite surprisingly, it seems, the ship breaking plan for Newport was ended. Mr. Mann continued: "This was not a good business deal for the company, or for the Port. I believe that the environmental issues could have been resolved, but our financial concerns could not be adequately addressed." The vast majority of persons at the meeting were very pleased with this decision.

While this issue was being considered by the town of Newport, Oregon, the office of the Port Commissioners received hundreds of telephone calls of concern – from all over the country. As one commissioner said: "We have gained much free advertising – for the port and community. The whole world knows we're here. This issue is bringing this concern to Oregon, and to the nation." Bay Bridge's next move on the West Coast remains to be seen. The company is still looking for a possible Oregon or Washington port.

Case #10

Ardent R. Porter is an investigatory journalist with a respected Washington-area newspaper, Capitol News Briefly. As a reporter working in and around the D.C. area, Mr. Porter often relies on his long list of contacts in order to glean information that might be useful for the various articles he publishes on corruption within politics and government. By establishing relationships with individuals at all levels of government, Ardent has provided himself with valuable human sources that are often capable of providing him with names, tips, or other information that he could not extract from other channels. Furthermore, a few of Mr. Porter's key contacts are able to pass along hard-to-come-by information about questionable or downright illegal actions taken by government employees or agencies.

One such contact is Ian Stalwart, a mid-level agency administrator who works with individuals who do government "groundwork" as well as with high-level government bureaucrats. As a middleman of sorts, Ian is in a position uniquely suited to evaluating the actions of those who work both below and above him. One of Mr. Stalwart's responsibilities is to watch for and report any illegal activity that he might encounter. Mr. Stalwart takes this role very seriously and his responsibilities as a watchdog were what originally led him to seek out Ardent, a like-minded opponent of corruption and illegality within public service.

It so happened that Mr. Stalwart discovered that many individuals within his agency were working to cover up illegally-awarded, over-billed, or otherwise fraudulent government contracts awarded during the early months of the Iraq War, actions which were in violation of several federal laws, in addition to many agency standards. Upon presenting his discovery to his superiors, Mr. Stalwart was told to disregard his findings and to refrain from further discussing the subject. After pressing for a more sophisticated explanation, he was informed that the contracts in question had been deemed classified through appropriate agency and congressional channels and that because the contracts had been deemed to serve a compelling national security interest, it would be against agency policy (as well as illegal) to discuss them, regardless of any questionable procedural or substantive aspects.

Fully knowing that he was in violation of laws regarding the disclosure of classified information, Mr. Stalwart approached Mr. Porter and revealed everything he knew about the dubious contracts. He also provided Mr. Porter with the names of the individuals implicated in the cover-ups and the names of the administrators who had ordered him to remain silent.

After composing a lengthy and revealing story, Mr. Porter approached his editor about publishing the story, explaining the dilemma presented by the fact that much, if not all, of the story's core material was classified. Following a discussion about publishing the article by the paper's editorial board it was decided that the story would run in the paper's next issue.

Case #11

Students in schools of medicine, nursing, dentistry and veterinary medicine are required to observe actual surgeries (and other procedures) early in their educations as a preliminary exposure to the practices of their field. In fact, such study is thought to be essential in confirming the students' choice of profession. Of course, the observation takes place with the informed consent of the patients (or their guardians). Many pre-medical, pre-nursing, pre-dentistry, and pre-veterinary programs, especially at schools with associated hospitals, are beginning to recommend (or even require) similar observation programs.

The State University Museum has one of the nation's premier exhibits of the history of medicine and allied fields. They include displays replicating Leonardo's anatomy studies, teaching materials from Charles University (in Prague) dating from the 16th century, 18th century "bleeding," and 19th century nutrition studies (among many other presentations).
One of the most popular offerings at the museum is the "surgery room" where films of common surgical procedures can be viewed. Like the student viewing in medical schools, the patients shown have given their informed consent. Not surprisingly, the most identifiable attendees are people who are considering having the operations shown in the pictures. The films have been "sanitized" so that excess gore is avoided, but the surgeries are shown in detail.

Dr. Suarez, curator of the museum and retired professor of neurosurgery, has proposed to the board that rather than using films, which are hard to make and quickly become outdated, observers should be allowed to observe actual, in process surgeries on persons who have consented. After all, the University Hospital is adjacent to the museum and access is convenient. The hospital's operating theaters are set up above the surgical floor but separated from the patient and surgical team by sound- and atmosphere-proof windows. Dr. Suarez suggests that such watching could become a significant educational revenue-generating operation. He points out that special exhibits commonly serve as important financial resources for museums.

When Dr. Suarez proposes this program to the Museum's board of directors, Katherine Osborn (one of the community members of the board) objects vigorously. Although Dr. Suarez's proposal clearly restricts participation to persons "15 and older," Ms. Osborn argues that teens, and perhaps others, will attend surgeries not as education but as entertainment. Her position is that such "exhibitions" will be little better than the "bum fights" and ultraviolent films that have gained popularity in recent years. Ms. Osborn claims that teens will watch surgeries as a replacement for the gore seen while attending the Halloween and Nightmare on Elm Street movies. Her claim is that such actions are exploitative more than educational.

Dr. Suarez responds that actual surgeries come nowhere near the gore commonly shown on TV and in the movies. He points out that we seldom know what motivates people to act as they do in the presence of human affliction. "Do people slow their cars when passing accidents in order to see whether they can help or to see blood and gore? How would we know? Even if an adolescent attended a surgery out of a desire to see gore, might the experience not shift his or her perspective, creating an interest in becoming a medical professional?"

Case #12

Politicians have crossed the floor, or switched parties for as long as political parties have been in place—famous switches include those of Strom Thurmond, Ronald Reagan, Condoleezza Rice, Howard Dean, Hilary Clinton and most recently, Joe Lieberman. In 2001, nine serving members of Congress had switched parties while in office. Various reasons are cited for changing parties, including ideological disagreement with one's current party and moving to improve power and legislative efficacy, among others. U.S. Representative Ralph Hall of the Fourth Congressional District in Texas cites both reasons.

Ralph Hall was first elected in 1980 as a Democrat and has been re-elected each succeeding year. Hall has made a reputation for himself as a rogue Democrat, willing to "cross the aisle" and vote with Republicans when he agreed with their position. He also has been an avid supporter of President Bush, opposed to Democratic bids to unseat him. But it was more than mere ideological agreement that encouraged a decision to switch parties in early 2004 before his bid for reelection.

As Hall stated in a January 2004 press release that announced his decision to switch parties, "This year I was denied requests for district appropriations because I was a Democrat who voted against the bill. I have always stated that … if being a Democrat hurt my district, I would either resign or switch parties." The bill to which he was referring was a "foreign operations bill" which, according to Hall, gave, "financial support to those countries that continue to vote against [the U.S.] in the United Nations."

Another motivation may be found in Hall's appreciation for being spared a potentially career devastating blow in the redistricting that cost many Democrats their seats in 2003. According to a CNN article, "…Hall's move comes after Republican state lawmakers in Austin spared him in a redistricting map that targets every other Anglo Democrat in the House. His district, based in the city of Tyler, was largely untouched by the GOP-drawn map, which is currently facing a Democratic court challenge."

PROCEDURE and RULES

FOR THE

SECOND ANNUAL SOUTHEAST REGIONAL ETHICS BOWL

at

THE UNIVERSITY OF SOUTH FLORIDA, ST. PETERSBURG
140 7TH AVENUE SOUTH, DAVIS HALL
ST. PETERSBURG, FLORIDA

ON SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 2006

Sponsored by:

For more information:
(727) 553-4857
(813) 382-8170
elliott@stpt.usf.edu

SCHEDULE

(All rooms listed will be in Davis Hall, unless otherwise noted.)

7:00-8:15 a.m.	Registration	Davis Lobby
7:00-8:15 a.m.	Continental breakfast for teams and coaches	Café
7:30 -8:15 a.m.	Breakfast meeting for judges and moderators	Room 130
8:30-9:00 a.m.	Plenary session	Steidinger Auditorium
9:15-10:30 a.m.	Round #1	Rooms assigned
10:30-10:45 a.m.	Break
10:45 a.m.- Noon	Round #2	Rooms assigned
12:00-12:15 p.m.	Break
12:15-1:30 p.m.	Round #3	Rooms assigned
1:30-1:45 p.m.	Final Calculations and Announcement of Semifinalists	Davis Lobby
1:30-2:15 p.m.	Participants' and coaches' lunch	Café
1:30-2:15 p.m.	Judges and moderators lunch	Room 130
2:15-3:30 p.m.	Semifinals	Rooms assigned
3:30-5:00 p.m.	Finals and Trophy presentation	Steidinger Auditorium

PROCEDURE AND RULES

The Second Annual Southeast Regional Ethics Bowl will take place on Saturday, November 18, 2006 at the University of South Florida, St. Petersburg campus. It is being sponsored by University of South Florida, St. Petersburg College, and Eckerd College. At the plenary, to be held at 8:45 a.m. in Steidinger Auditorium, a review of the rules and procedures and distribution of classroom assignments for the morning rounds will occur; classroom assignments will be made through a random impartial process.

Each team will participate in 3 matches in the morning, competing with a different team in each match. Semi-finals are concurrent and will begin at 2:15 p.m.; finals will take place in Steidinger Auditorium at 3:30 p.m. There will be souvenirs for all participants. Awards for the winners will be presented at the conclusion of the final round.

There are no limits to the resources that may be used in researching the questions prior to the competition. Students are encouraged to consult all resources, including professors to understand the full breadth of the cases, determine their positions, and make the strongest possible presentation.

1) Each round will begin with a coin toss. The team that wins the coin toss may elect to present first (to be the team designated as Team A) or to have the other team present first (and thus to be the team designated as Team B).
2) Copies of the first case and question will be distributed to the competitors and to the judges. Neither the judges nor the team members will have advance knowledge of which case will be presented or which question will be asked.
3) The moderators will then read the question. Scratch paper will also be provided for the competitors to make notes during the round, but outside notes are prohibited.
4) Team A will then have up to one minute to confer, after which a single spokesperson for Team A may speak for up to 8 minutes in response to the moderator's question, based on the team's research and critical analysis. This is known as the presentation period.
5) Next Team B will have up to one minute to confer, after which Team B may speak for up to 5 minutes in response to Team A's presentation and to the moderator's question. This is known as the commentary period. Any number of team members may contribute to the commentary.
6) Team A will then have up to one minute to confer, followed by 5 minutes to respond to Team B's challenge. This is known as the response period. Any number of team members may contribute to the response.
7) The judges will then begin their 10 minute question and answer session with Team A. Before asking questions, the judges may confer briefly (no more than 30 seconds).
8) At this time, more than one team member may respond to a given judge's question. Team members are not expected to confer for longer than 20 to 30 seconds after a question has been asked.
9) Each judge should have time for one question and one follow-up. Judges may ask more questions if time permits. Judges may confer briefly before asking questions (no more than 30 seconds). More than one team member may respond to any judge's questions.

10) Each judge will then give Team A a score on a scale of 1 to 15 with 15 being the highest score. They will also give Team B a score on a scale of 1 to 5, with 5 being the highest score. Judges will base their analyses on the following criteria:
    a. CONSISTENCY
    b. CLARITY AND INTELLIGIBILITY
    c. COMPREHENSION OF ETHICALLY RELEVANT FACTORS
    d. AVOIDANCE OF ETHICALLY IRRELEVANT ISSUES
    e. COMPLETENESS IN ANALYSIS

    The judges are not permitted to discuss their scoring decisions with each other; each judge is to rely on his or her own private judgment.
11) After the judges have made their scoring decisions, the moderator will give a second case and question to the same two teams.
12) The competition will proceed as above, with the Team B presenting in the second half, Team A offering commentary, Team B responding, and then Team B participating in the judge's question and answer session.
13) At the end of the round, the judges will announce the scores for both the first half and for the second half. Thus, in each round, each team will have the opportunity to present one case and to respond to the other team's presentation of another case, for a total of 20 points possible.

The winner of the round will be the team with the greater number of total points. A tie will not count as a win or a loss for either team. Moderators will validate scores with the teams and judges and pass score sheets to the competition coordinator for tallying with scores from the other rounds.

At the end of the third round, the four teams with the greatest number of wins (out of 3 possible) will advance to the semi-finals; in the event that a tie takes place, ties will take precedence over losses. If two teams have the same number of wins, the team with the greatest total point differential will advance. Then teams will advance based on point totals for all three rounds (out of 60 possible). In the event that even further delineation is necessary, the team whose lowest score for any of the three morning rounds is higher than the other team's lowest score for any of the three morning rounds will advance. If the teams are still tied, the team with the higher scores based solely on its own presentations (not commentary to the other team) will advance. If there is no other way of breaking the tie, the winner will be determined by coin toss.

Also, please note that in the unlikely event that a team is unable to attend the competition, certain alternative procedures may be adopted to allow everyone to participate, including the adoption of a "placebo team," usually consisting of students or recent graduates with some prior knowledge of the cases. In such a case, teams pitted against the placebo team may be scored but will not receive a win or loss, and for the purposes of advancement to the finals will be assessed assuming neither a win nor loss (thus, similar to a tie), but special weight added to their performance against actual teams. If you have any questions concerning this process, please inquire.

Semi-final and final rounds will be scored the same way as the morning rounds. Each of these will be a single elimination competition in which the team with the higher score will be declared the winner.

Please note that we need to adhere strictly to the schedule to accomplish the day's agenda in a timely fashion. Deni Elliott, as administrator of this year's competition, will be the final arbiter of any disputes. And remember that the competition is all about having fun and exchanging ideas.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, October 17, 2006 7:15 PM
To: Crowe, Asta E <acrowe@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: COURSE CHANGE

Oka--I'll take care of it this week.
thanks,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Asta Crowe wrote:
> Thanks. I've sent the paperwork over there. Asta
>
> Douglas Maclean wrote:
>> Asta,
>>
>> I'll let Jan handle this, in order to conform to our department's >> normal procedures for prerequisites. I'm happy to make it open to >> any graduate student in my department or in yours.
>>
>> Doug
>>
>> Asta Crowe wrote:
>>> Doug, I am still waiting to hear back on the attached -- No. 6f:
>>> what the prereqs are. The form came to me with #6 saying "Yes" but >>> the second part has no info.
>>>
>>> I'm going to send the form as it currently is, signed by Pete, over >>> to Susan Clark. If you and Jan think it's OK as is, then just send >>> it forward. I should get a copy of the finally signed form. I >>> don't have a copy of the proposed syllabus. Jan, should that be >>> attached to the form when it goes to the Grad School?
>>>
>>>
>>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, October 17, 2006 8:47 PM
To: Postema, Gerald J <gpostema@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: course evals

Yes, I can do this easily for you. Is tomorrow morning okay?

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Gerald J. Postema wrote:
> Jan,
> I have tried several times, on several different days, but after I am
> "authenticated" and choose a semester, I get an error message saying > that I have been shut out to avoid compromising the security of the > site. Is there any way you can get the on-line evaluations for me. I > need fall 2001-spring 2005 (and not every semester in that group, > since a couple of semesters I was teaching only law or grad or faculty > ethics seminar courses).
> Thanks,
> Jerry
>
> Jan Boxill wrote:
>> We can access, and I think you can too all the summaries.
>> You can go to: https://onyen.unc.edu/cgi-bin/unc_id/cce/cce.pl
>>
>> Jan
>>
>> Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
>> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
>> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
>> Department of Philosophy
>> Phone: 919-962-3317
>> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>>
>>
>>
>> Gerald J. Postema wrote:
>>> Jan,
>>> I am being PTR'd--reviewed post-tenure. I need student evaluations >>> for all my undergrad courses since Fall, 2001. Summaries are >>> prepared every semester, I believe. Do you have them? I don't seem >>> to have them, or at least not a complete set. Would you please dig >>> them up for me, if you do have them? (If not, I guess I'll have to >>> make up something--so don't tell Bernie!)
>>> Jerry
>>>
>>
>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, October 17, 2006 9:17 PM
To: Postema, Gerald J <gpostema@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: course evals
Attach: Postema-Phil 41S02.doc

Jerry,
This is the only undergrad course I could find.
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, October 18, 2006 9:23 AM
To: Crowe, Asta E <acrowe@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: COURSE CHANGE

---

thanks--you too; enjoy the break for whatever it is!!

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Asta Crowe wrote:
> Thanks. Hope you get some time off over the fall break. ASta
>
>
> Jan Boxill wrote:
>> Oka--I'll take care of it this week.
>> thanks,
>> Jan
>>
>> Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
>> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
>> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
>> Department of Philosophy
>> Phone: 919-962-3317
>> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>>
>>
>>
>> Asta Crowe wrote:
>>> Thanks. I've sent the paperwork over there. Asta
>>>
>>> Douglas Maclean wrote:
>>>> Asta,
>>>>
>>>> I'll let Jan handle this, in order to conform to our department's >>>> normal procedures for prerequisites. I'm happy to make it open to >>>> any graduate student in my department or in yours.
>>>>
>>>> Doug
>>>>
>>>> Asta Crowe wrote:
>>>>> Doug, I am still waiting to hear back on the attached -- No. 6f:
>>>>> what the prereqs are. The form came to me with #6 saying "Yes" >>>>> but the second part has no info.
>>>>>
>>>>> I'm going to send the form as it currently is, signed by Pete, >>>>> over to Susan Clark. If you and Jan think it's OK as is, then >>>>> just send it forward. I should get a copy of the finally signed >>>>> form. I don't have a copy of the proposed syllabus. Jan, should >>>>> that be attached to the form when it goes to the Grad School?
>>>>>
>>>>>
>>>>
>>>
>>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, October 18, 2006 9:34 AM
To: Postema, Gerald J <gpostema@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Evaluations
Attach: PHIL105 Spr 04.doc; Postema 213.doc

Hi Jerry,
I got the same error that you got for all but the one I gave you. I've attached the graduate level eval, and I attached a hard copy to the info you gave me. Gucki should have copies of the other summaries that we couldn't access. I'll show Lance where they might be and have him make copies if they are there.

Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, October 18, 2006 12:16 PM
To: ywoldeab@email.unc.edu
Subject: Re: Short list

No problem. See you at 1:30
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

ywoldeab@email.unc.edu wrote:
> Oh my gosh...I just realized that I was emailing YOU for the > appointment today!! That's really funny--I emailed the department > chair and was instructed to email you for a student roster instead. I > didn't even realize. I must be so absent-minded at times. I'll see > you at 1:30.
>
> Yvonne
>
>
>
> Quoting Jan Boxill <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>:
>
>> Hi All,
>> I have given the clearance that all of our top 10 candidates are >> eligible.
>> Beth-including the one you had that you asked about.
>>
>> If you are like me you may be a bit behind in your contacts. Let me >> know how you are all doing to see if we have to reschedule.
>>
>> Have a good Fall Break!
>>
>> Jan
>>
>> --
>> Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
>> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
>> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
>> Department of Philosophy
>> Phone: 919-962-3317
>> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>>
>>
>>
>
>

Marc Lange
Philosophy 150: Philosophy of Science
Maymester 2007

Reason, Religion, and Reality in the Copernican Revolution

The reasoning by which Galileo and his contemporaries defended the Copernican model of the solar system (with the Earth orbiting the Sun rather than the reverse) can puzzle us even today. Here are some of the questions that we could ask about these arguments.

- Was the heliocentric model of the solar system sufficiently well-supported by Copernicus's arguments to justify believing it true?
- Or was it unjustified until Galileo amassed telescopic evidence for it?
- Or was it unjustified until even later – when Newtonian physics was developed? Or did it remain unjustified until even later – when various mechanical and optical discoveries were made in the nineteenth century?
- Was the Catholic Church justified at the time of Galileo in regarding Copernicus's theory as just one among many fairly successful techniques for predicting the night sky's appearance? Did Galileo bring his sentence on himself?
- Could Galileo argue for his telescope's reliability?
- Could Galileo use mere thought-experiments to defend Copernicanism?

In this course, we will grapple with these and related questions in order to arrive at a more nuanced understanding of the logic by which scientific theories are tested, confirmed, and disconfirmed.

At various points during our discussions, each student will submit in written form his or her own best reconstruction of some of the arguments we have examined. In other words, each student will offer his or her best advice regarding how a given scientist might have argued for or against Copernicanism, anticipating possible objections and responses. Students will occasionally form groups to examine and to critique one another's proposals, with each group finally presenting its best thoughts orally to the rest of the class for further discussion. Students will, in effect, be putting Galileo on trial once again – not for heresy or for disobeying authority, but for having insufficient evidence for his Copernicanism.

In this way, we will learn how to appreciate sympathetically the competing scientific theories from the perspective of the 16th and 17th centuries, when the truth was in some doubt. Along the way, we will wrestle with some of the puzzles and apparent paradoxes arising even from today's best philosophical accounts of the logic of theory testing.

To get a better grip on the evidence available to Galileo and his contemporaries, students may have an opportunity to view the planets through a telescope like Galileo's and to compare the result to what's visible through my own backyard telescope.

There will be a final exam to bring the various strands of the course together. It will have been preceded by shorter written assignments, group work, and oral presentations.

Introduction

Cardinal Bellarmine's letter to Foscarini, 21 April 1615, in Maurice A. Finocchiaro, The Galileo Affair: A Documentary History (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1989), pp. 67-9

Carl G. Hempel, Philosophy of Natural Science (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice Hall, 1966), chs. 2 ("Scientific Inquiry: Invention and Test") and 3 ("Test of a Hypothesis: Its Logic and Its Force")

Classical astronomy: realist vs. instrumentalist interpretations of the goals of astronomy

Bellarmine to Foscarini, Ibid.

Robert K. DeKosky, Knowledge and Cosmos (Washington, DC: University Press of America, 1976), ch. 6 ("The Development of Astronomy: A Mathematico-Descriptive Approach to Heavenly Phenomena")

Samir Okasha, Philosophy of Science: A Very Short Introduction (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002), ch. 4 ("Realism and Anti-Realism").

Selected Readings from Copernicus, Osiander, Gemma Frisius, Erasmus Reinhold, Alessandro Piccolomini

Copernicus, Kepler, and their reasoning

DeKosky, chs. 15 ("Copernicus"), 16 ("Reaction to Copernicus"), and 17 ("Kepler").

Thomas Kuhn, The Copernican Revolution (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1957), pp. 165-181 ("Copernicus's Innovation").

Owen Gingerich, "'Crisis' vs. Aesthetic in the Copernican Revolution," in Arthur Beer and K. Aa. Strand (eds.), Copernicus: Yesterday and Today – Vistas in Astronomy 17 (Oxford: Pergamon, 1975), pp. 85-93.

Kuhn, "Objectivity, Value Judgments, and Theory Choice", from The Essential Tension (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1977), pp. 320-339.

Philosophical accounts of theory testing

John Earman and Wesley Salmon, "Confirmation of Scientific Hypotheses," in Salmon et al., An Introduction to the Philosophy of Science (New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1992), pp. 43-55, 66-74, 89-99.

Clark Glymour, "Explanations, Tests, Unity, and Necessity," Nous 14 (1980): 31-50.

Galileo's telescopic evidence for the Copernican theory

Dudley Shapere, Galileo: A Philosophical Study (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1974), pp. 11-21 ("Galileo and the Interpretation of Science").

DeKosky, ch. 18 ("Galileo and Astronomy: Conflict Over World Systems").

Kuhn, The Copernican Revolution, pp. 219-25 ("Assimilation of Copernican Astronomy").

Vasco Ronchi, "The General Influence of the Development of Optics in the Seventeenth Century on Science and Technology," Vistas in Astronomy 9 (1967): 123-33.

Ian Hacking, "Do We See Through a Microscope?" in Images of Science, ed. Paul Churchland and Clifford Hooker (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1967), pp. 132-52.

Paul Feyerabend, Against Method (London: Verso, 1978), pp. 100-8, 121-43.

Harold Brown, "Galileo on the Telescope and the Eye," Journal of the History of Ideas 46 (1985): 487-501.

Albert von Helden, "Telescopes and Authority from Galileo to Cassini," Osiris 9 (1994): 9-29.

Owen Gingerich, "Dissertatio cum Professore Righini et Sidereo Nuncio," in Reason, Experiment, and Mysticism in the Scientific Revolution, ed. M.L. Righini Bonelli and William Shea (New York: Science History Publications, 1975), pp. 77-87.

Galileo's tower argument and theory-laden observation

Galileo, Dialogue Concerning the Two Chief World Systems, tr. S. Drake (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1967), pp. 114 (line 3) – 117 (end of first paragraph of Salv., in middle of page), 126 (line 2) – 127 (end of Simp.'s last remark), 129 (line 2) –

140 (just before Sagr. speaks) (see also notes on p. 475), p. 144 (line 3) – 149 (end Salv.), 171 (line 2) – 173 (end of Simpl., 2/3 of the way down), 186 (second paragraph, "For a final…") – 188 (end of speech, at the top)

Feyerabend, Ibid., pp. 69-92. ("Chapter 6", "Chapter 7".)

Galileo's thought experiments and real experiments

Rom Harre, "The Law of Descent", Great Science Experiments, (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1981), ch. 6 (pp. 68-73).

Thomas Settle, "An Experiment in the History of Science," Science 133 (1961), pp. 19-23.

Michael Segre, "Galileo, Viviani, and the Tower of Pisa," Studies in the History and Philosophy of Science 20 (1989): 435-51.

Galileo, Two New Sciences, tr. S. Drake, National Edition pages 107-110. (University of Wisconsin Press, 1974, pp. 66-69)

Thomas Kuhn, "A Function for Thought Experiments," from The Essential Tension (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1977), pp. 240-265.

James Robert Brown and John Norton, "Debate: Do Thought Experiments Transcend Empiricism?", in Christopher Hitchcock (ed.), Contemporary Debates in Philosophy of Science (Malden, MA: Blackwell, 2004), pp. 21-65. (Brown: "Do Thought Experiments Transcend Empiricism?"; Norton: "Why Thought Experiments Do Not Transcend Empiricism.")

The trial of Galileo

Maurice A. Finocchiaro, The Galileo Affair: A Documentary History (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1989), pp. 27-39 ("Introduction: 6. The Earlier Incidents, 7. The Later Incidents").

Documents in the above book:

pp. 67-9 (Cardinal Bellarmine to Foscarini, 21 April 1615)

pp. 87-118 (Letter to Grand Duchess Christina, 1615)

"Earlier Inquisition Proceedings": pp. 147-148 (Inquisition Minutes of 25 February 1616, Special Injunction of 26 February 1616), p. 153 (Cardinal Bellarmine's Certificate, 26 May 1616)

"Miscellaneous Documents": p. 212 (Vatican Secretary to Florentine Inquisitor, 24 May 1631), p. 213 (ditto, 19 July 1631), pp. 214-7 (Preface to the Dialogue), pp. 217-8 (end of the Dialogue), pp. 218-22 (Special Commission Report, September 1632)

pp. 256-62 (Galileo's First Deposition)

pp. 277-8 (Galileo's Second Deposition)

pp. 286-7 (Galileo's Fourth Deposition)

pp. 287-291 (The Sentence of the Inquisition)

pp. 292-3 (Galileo's Abjuration, 22 June 1633)

Instructor: Marc Baer Summer 2007

Ayn Rand: Fiction, Philosophy and Film

COURSE DESCRIPTION

Ayn Rand is a dramatic and controversial figure in American cultural and intellectual life. In her novels, Rand projects her distinctive conception of the ideal man—the uncompromising individualist who places nothing above his own judgment, happiness and freedom. In her non-fiction work, she explains and defends this vision.

In this course, we will explore primarily the moral and political thought of this iconoclastic figure by reading her magnum opus, Atlas Shrugged, as well as her novella, Anthem, and several essays from her popular philosophical works, most particularly, The Virtue of Selfishness and Capitalism: the Unknown Ideal. We will look at such topics as Rand's conception of human nature, her defense of self-interest as the only rationally defensible code of ethics, and the argument that laissez-faire capitalism alone is the social system compatible with individual rights and the principles of justice.

The video component of the course will include viewings of: the Italian-made movie version of Rand's first novel, We the Living; the 1940s Hollywood film "Love Letters," for which she wrote the screenplay; the recent screen adaptation of her posthumously published play "Ideal"; interviews with Ayn Rand; and excerpts from both the 1998 Academy Award Nominee for Best Documentary, "Ayn Rand: a Sense of Life," and the 1940s Hollywood version of Rand's classic novel The Fountainhead, starring Gary Cooper.

COURSE REQUIREMENTS

The grading breakdown is as follows: (a) participation: 10%; (b) regular assignments on the readings: 15%; (c) essay paper: 30% and final exam: 45%.

BOOKS

Atlas Shrugged (AS)
Anthem (ANT)
The Virtue of Selfishness (VOS)
Capitalism: the Unknown Ideal (CUI)
The Romantic Manifesto (RM)
Philosophy: Who Needs It (PWNI)
The New Left: The Anti-Industrial Revolution (NL)

SCHEDULE

Week I

Mon, 5/14	Introduction
	In-class video: "Mike Wallace Interview"
Tue., 5/15	ANT pp. 17-105
	NL "The 'Inexplicable Personal Alchemy'" pp. 114-126
	AS pp. 11-47
	RM "The Esthetic Vacuum of Our Age" pp. 123-128
	RM "Basic Principles of Literature" pp. 80-98
	In-class video: "Love Letters" (part 1)
Wed., 5/16	AS pp. 48-124
	RM "What is Romanticism?" pp. 99-122
	In-class video: "Love Letters" (part 2)
Thu., 5/17	AS pp. 124-206

	RM "Philosophy and a Sense of Life" 25-33
	RM "Art and a Sense of Life" pp. 34-44
	In-class video: "Ideal"
Fri., 5/18	AS pp. 207-277
	NL "The Anti-Industrial Revolution" pp. 127-151

Week II

Mon., 5/21	AS pp. 278-465
	CUI "America's Persecuted Minority: Big Business" pp. 44-62
	In-class video: "We the Living" (part 1)
Tue., 5/22	AS pp. 466-531
	CUI "The Anatomy of Compromise" pp. 144-149
	In-class video: "We the Living" (part 2)
Wed. 5/23	AS pp. 531-591
	NL "The Age of Envy" pp. 152-86
	In-class video: "We the Living" (part 3)
Thu., 5/24	AS pp. 591-650
	VOS "Collectivized Ethics" pp. 80-85
	In-class video: "We the Living" (part 4)
Fri., 5/25	AS pp. 652-726
	In-class video: "We the Living" (part 5)

Week III

Mon., 5/28	AS pp. 726-893
	PWNI "Selfishness Without a Self" pp. 46-51
	VOS "The Ethics of Emergencies" pp. 43-49
Tue., 5/29	AS pp. 893-993
	PWNI "Faith and Force: Destroyers of the Modern World" pp. 58-76
Wed., 5/30	AS pp. 993-1084
	CUI "Is Atlas Shrugging?" pp. 150-166
	RM "The Goal of My Writing" pp. 162-172
	In-class video: "Ayn Rand and the 'New Intellectual'"
Thu., 5/31	VOS "Introduction" pp. vii-xi
	VOS "The Objectivist Ethics," pp. 13-35
	PWNI "Causality vs. Duty" pp. 95-101
	VOS "The 'Conflicts' of Men's Interests" pp. 50-56
	VOS "Doesn't Life Require Compromise?" pp. 68-70
	VOS "How Does One Lead a Rational Life in an Irrational Society?" pp. 71-74
	VOS "The Cult of Moral Grayness" pp. 75-79
	In-class video: excerpts from "The Fountainhead"
Fri., 6/1	CUI "What is Capitalism?" pp. 11-34
	CUI "Man's Rights" pp. 320-328
	CUI "The Nature of Government" pp. 329-337
	CUI "Collectivized 'Rights'" pp. 101-107
	CUI "Conservativism: an Obituary" pp. 192-201
	CUI "Requiem for Man" pp. 297-319
	CUI "Let Us Alone!" pp. 140-143
	In-class video: excerpts from "Donahue Interview"
	In-class video: excepts Ayn Rand: a Sense of Life"

Proposal for Maymester Course.

The Philosophy of Erotic Love

An examination of the concept of erotic love as it is developed in classical and recent philosophy and literature. Questions to be considered include: How is erotic love distinguished from other forms of love?; Is erotic love more centrally a kind of psychological state or a kind of behavior?; Is sexual attraction a necessary component of erotic love?; To what extent is the expression of erotic love conditioned by culture?; Is the concept of erotic love connected with oppression based on gender or class?

Readings will include works by: Plato, Spinoza, Freud, Proust, Beauvoir, Sartre, and contemporary writers.

Texts: Symposium, Plato
Swann in Love, Marcel Proust
The Philosophy of Erotic Love, R. Solomon and K. Higgins, editors.

Evaluation: There will be two short papers (20% each), one of which will be a partial draft of a term paper (60%). Extra credit is given for meaningful participation in class, on the Blackboard discussion forum, and in office hours.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, October 18, 2006 2:46 PM
To: Roberts, John Thomas <jtrosap@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: [Fwd: Re: metaphysics]

We can fill out the necessary paper work and get in it by January for the Fall. All I need is course description and syllabus.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

John T Roberts wrote:
> Hey Jerry,
>
> You mean we are now committed (rather than not committed), right?
>
> The PHIL course doesn't have a new number; we didn't carry it over.
> We'll need to do whatever we need to do to get it on the books in time > for next year.
>
> Jan, what I can do to help with that?
>
> best,
> John
>
> Gerald J. Postema wrote:
>
>> Jan and John,
>> We are not committed to offering the Roberts/VanDam physics/phil >> course fall 2007. Please plan accordingly.
>> What is the new PHIL number of the course?
>> Jerry
>>
>>
>> ----------
>>
>> Subject:
>> Re: metaphysics
>> From:
>> Laurie McNeil <mcneil@physics.unc.edu>
>> Date:
>> Tue, 17 Oct 2006 10:45:19 -0400
>> To:
>> "Gerald J. Postema" <gpostema@email.unc.edu>
>>
>> To:
>> "Gerald J. Postema" <gpostema@email.unc.edu>
>> CC:
>> John Roberts <jtrosap@email.unc.edu>
>>
>>
>> Thanks, Jerry. I'll inform Henk and have him communicate with John >> about preparing for the course. I'll put it into our schedule for >> the fall. What is the PHIL course number? --Laurie

>>
>> --On Monday, October 16, 2006 5:00 PM -0400 "Gerald J. Postema" >> <gpostema@email.unc.edu> wrote:
>>
>>> Laurie,
>>> I raised the issue of the course jointly taught by Henk Van Dam and one >>> of our phil science people with John Roberts (who taught the course >>> last >>> with Van Dam) and Marc Lange. We have not moved fully into the planning >>> phase for fall 2007 yet, so it has taken just a little time to sort out >>> what might be going on next year. I am happy to say that John >>> Roberts is >>> very interested in teaching the course again with Prof Van Dam, if the >>> offer is still open. This will be a good opportunity to strengthen ties >>> between our departments and, we hope, lay the base for further >>> collaboration in future.
>>>
>>> I am copying Jan Boxill and Marc Lange, one or both of whom will be >>> involved in setting the teaching schedule for next year so they can >>> make >>> a note of our commitment.
>>>
>>> Please let me know if you need anything more from me or John regarding >>> the teaching of this course.
>>>
>>> Cordially,
>>> Jerry Postema
>>> Interim Chair
>>> Department of Philosophy
>>> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
>>>
>>> Laurie McNeil wrote:
>>>
>>>> Gerry--This is a reminder that we talked last night at the >>>> post-rehearsal social about the possibility of a joint offering of the >>>> "Space and Time in Physics and Philosophy" course by John Roberts and >>>> Henk Van Dam in Fall 2007. That will be the last semester of Henk's >>>> phased retirement, so I would like to schedule the course if John >>>> would be available for the purpose. It was always a favorite with our >>>> BA majors. The new number on our side is PHYS 313, I'm not sure what >>>> you numbered it. --Laurie
>>>>
>>>> Laurie E. McNeil, Chair
>>>> Dept. of Physics and Astronomy
>>>> Univ. of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
>>>> Phillips Hall CB #3255
>>>> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3255
>>>> (919) 962-2079 (voice), -0480 (fax)
>>>> mcneil@physics.unc.edu >>>> http://www.physics.unc.edu/~mcneil/home.html
>>>
>>>
>>>
>>>
>>> --
>>> Gerald J. Postema
>>> Cary C. Boshamer Professor of Philosophy and Professor of Law
>>> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
>>> CB# 3125, Caldwell Hall
>>> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
>>> 919-962-3310
>>>
>>>
>>>

>>>
>>>
>>> --
>>>
>>
>>
>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, October 20, 2006 3:49 PM
To: Boxill, Bernard R <brboxill@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Paper grid
Attach: Philpapers.xls

Attached is the grid I use for my papers.

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

PHILOSOPHY PAPERS

	A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H
1	PAPER CRITERIA	Excellent	Good	Fair	Poor	Failed to do	Not applicable	Comments
2
3	Introductory paragraph
4	Clear thesis/position statement
5	Argument for position taken
6	Adequate philosophical support
7	Use of examples
8	Defined concepts
9	Objections to your argument
10	Development of objections
11	Adequate philosophical support
12	Response to objections
13	Avoided irrelevancies
14	Creativity/originality
15	Spelling/Grammar
16	Clearly Written
17	Sources cited
18
19	Other
20
21	GENERAL COMMENTS:
22							Grade:
23	NAME:
24	HONOR PLEDGE:

Instructor: Marc Baer Summer 2007

Ayn Rand: Fiction, Philosophy and Film

COURSE DESCRIPTION

Ayn Rand is a dramatic and controversial figure in American cultural and intellectual life. In her novels, Rand projects her distinctive conception of the ideal man—the uncompromising individualist who places nothing above his own judgment, happiness and freedom. In her non-fiction work, she explains and defends this vision.

In this course, we will explore primarily the moral and political thought of this iconoclastic figure by reading her magnum opus, Atlas Shrugged, as well as her novella, Anthem, and several essays from her popular philosophical works, most particularly, The Virtue of Selfishness and Capitalism: the Unknown Ideal. We will look at such topics as Rand's conception of human nature, her defense of self-interest as the only rationally defensible code of ethics, and the argument that laissez-faire capitalism alone is the social system compatible with individual rights and the principles of justice.

The video component of the course will include viewings of: the Italian-made movie version of Rand's first novel, We the Living; the 1940s Hollywood film "Love Letters," for which she wrote the screenplay; the recent screen adaptation of her posthumously published play "Ideal"; interviews with Ayn Rand; and excerpts from both the 1998 Academy Award Nominee for Best Documentary, "Ayn Rand: a Sense of Life," and the 1940s Hollywood version of Rand's classic novel The Fountainhead, starring Gary Cooper.

COURSE REQUIREMENTS

The grading breakdown is as follows: (a) participation: 10%; (b) regular assignments on the readings: 15%; (c) essay paper: 30% and final exam: 45%.

BOOKS

Atlas Shrugged (AS)
Anthem (ANT)
The Virtue of Selfishness (VOS)
Capitalism: the Unknown Ideal (CUI)
The Romantic Manifesto (RM)
Philosophy: Who Needs It (PWNI)
The New Left: The Anti-Industrial Revolution (NL)

SCHEDULE

Week I

Mon, 5/14	Introduction
	In-class video: "Mike Wallace Interview"
Tue., 5/15	ANT pp. 17-105
	NL "The 'Inexplicable Personal Alchemy'" pp. 114-126
	AS pp. 11-47
	RM "The Esthetic Vacuum of Our Age" pp. 123-128
	RM "Basic Principles of Literature" pp. 80-98
	In-class video: "Love Letters" (part 1)
Wed., 5/16	AS pp. 48-124
	RM "What is Romanticism?" pp. 99-122
	In-class video: "Love Letters" (part 2)
Thu., 5/17	AS pp. 124-206

	RM "Philosophy and a Sense of Life" 25-33
	RM "Art and a Sense of Life" pp. 34-44
	In-class video: "Ideal"
Fri., 5/18	AS pp. 207-277
	NL "The Anti-Industrial Revolution" pp. 127-151

Week II

Mon., 5/21	AS pp. 278-465
	CUI "America's Persecuted Minority: Big Business" pp. 44-62
	In-class video: "We the Living" (part 1)
Tue., 5/22	AS pp. 466-531
	CUI "The Anatomy of Compromise" pp. 144-149
	In-class video: "We the Living" (part 2)
Wed. 5/23	AS pp. 531-591
	NL "The Age of Envy" pp. 152-86
	In-class video: "We the Living" (part 3)
Thu., 5/24	AS pp. 591-650
	VOS "Collectivized Ethics" pp. 80-85
	In-class video: "We the Living" (part 4)
Fri., 5/25	AS pp. 652-726
	In-class video: "We the Living" (part 5)

Week III

Mon., 5/28	AS pp. 726-893
	PWNI "Selfishness Without a Self" pp. 46-51
	VOS "The Ethics of Emergencies" pp. 43-49
Tue., 5/29	AS pp. 893-993
	PWNI "Faith and Force: Destroyers of the Modern World" pp. 58-76
Wed., 5/30	AS pp. 993-1084
	CUI "Is Atlas Shrugging?" pp. 150-166
	RM "The Goal of My Writing" pp. 162-172
	In-class video: "Ayn Rand and the 'New Intellectual'"
Thu., 5/31	VOS "Introduction" pp. vii-xi
	VOS "The Objectivist Ethics," pp. 13-35
	PWNI "Causality vs. Duty" pp. 95-101
	VOS "The 'Conflicts' of Men's Interests" pp. 50-56
	VOS "Doesn't Life Require Compromise?" pp. 68-70
	VOS "How Does One Lead a Rational Life in an Irrational Society?" pp. 71-74
	VOS "The Cult of Moral Grayness" pp. 75-79
	In-class video: excerpts from "The Fountainhead"
Fri., 6/1	CUI "What is Capitalism?" pp. 11-34
	CUI "Man's Rights" pp. 320-328
	CUI "The Nature of Government" pp. 329-337
	CUI "Collectivized 'Rights'" pp. 101-107
	CUI "Conservativism: an Obituary" pp. 192-201
	CUI "Requiem for Man" pp. 297-319
	CUI "Let Us Alone!" pp. 140-143
	In-class video: excerpts from "Donahue Interview"
	In-class video: excepts Ayn Rand: a Sense of Life"

Marc Lange
Philosophy 150: Philosophy of Science
Maymester 2007

Reason, Religion, and Reality in the Copernican Revolution

The reasoning by which Galileo and his contemporaries defended the Copernican model of the solar system (with the Earth orbiting the Sun rather than the reverse) can puzzle us even today. Here are some of the questions that we could ask about these arguments.

- Was the heliocentric model of the solar system sufficiently well-supported by Copernicus's arguments to justify believing it true?
- Or was it unjustified until Galileo amassed telescopic evidence for it?
- Or was it unjustified until even later – when Newtonian physics was developed? Or did it remain unjustified until even later – when various mechanical and optical discoveries were made in the nineteenth century?
- Was the Catholic Church justified at the time of Galileo in regarding Copernicus's theory as just one among many fairly successful techniques for predicting the night sky's appearance? Did Galileo bring his sentence on himself?
- Could Galileo argue for his telescope's reliability?
- Could Galileo use mere thought-experiments to defend Copernicanism?

In this course, we will grapple with these and related questions in order to arrive at a more nuanced understanding of the logic by which scientific theories are tested, confirmed, and disconfirmed.

At various points during our discussions, each student will submit in written form his or her own best reconstruction of some of the arguments we have examined. In other words, each student will offer his or her best advice regarding how a given scientist might have argued for or against Copernicanism, anticipating possible objections and responses. Students will occasionally form groups to examine and to critique one another's proposals, with each group finally presenting its best thoughts orally to the rest of the class for further discussion. Students will, in effect, be putting Galileo on trial once again – not for heresy or for disobeying authority, but for having insufficient evidence for his Copernicanism.

In this way, we will learn how to appreciate sympathetically the competing scientific theories from the perspective of the 16th and 17th centuries, when the truth was in some doubt. Along the way, we will wrestle with some of the puzzles and apparent paradoxes arising even from today's best philosophical accounts of the logic of theory testing.

To get a better grip on the evidence available to Galileo and his contemporaries, students may have an opportunity to view the planets through a telescope like Galileo's and to compare the result to what's visible through my own backyard telescope.

There will be a final exam to bring the various strands of the course together. It will have been preceded by shorter written assignments, group work, and oral presentations.

Introduction

Cardinal Bellarmine's letter to Foscarini, 21 April 1615, in Maurice A. Finocchiaro, The Galileo Affair: A Documentary History (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1989), pp. 67-9

Carl G. Hempel, Philosophy of Natural Science (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice Hall, 1966), chs. 2 ("Scientific Inquiry: Invention and Test") and 3 ("Test of a Hypothesis: Its Logic and Its Force")

Classical astronomy: realist vs. instrumentalist interpretations of the goals of astronomy

Bellarmine to Foscarini, Ibid.

Robert K. DeKosky, Knowledge and Cosmos (Washington, DC: University Press of America, 1976), ch. 6 ("The Development of Astronomy: A Mathematico-Descriptive Approach to Heavenly Phenomena")

Samir Okasha, Philosophy of Science: A Very Short Introduction (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002), ch. 4 ("Realism and Anti-Realism").

Selected Readings from Copernicus, Osiander, Gemma Frisius, Erasmus Reinhold, Alessandro Piccolomini

Copernicus, Kepler, and their reasoning

DeKosky, chs. 15 ("Copernicus"), 16 ("Reaction to Copernicus"), and 17 ("Kepler").

Thomas Kuhn, The Copernican Revolution (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1957), pp. 165-181 ("Copernicus's Innovation").

Owen Gingerich, "'Crisis' vs. Aesthetic in the Copernican Revolution," in Arthur Beer and K. Aa. Strand (eds.), Copernicus: Yesterday and Today – Vistas in Astronomy 17 (Oxford: Pergamon, 1975), pp. 85-93.

Kuhn, "Objectivity, Value Judgments, and Theory Choice", from The Essential Tension (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1977), pp. 320-339.

Philosophical accounts of theory testing

John Earman and Wesley Salmon, "Confirmation of Scientific Hypotheses," in Salmon et al., An Introduction to the Philosophy of Science (New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1992), pp. 43-55, 66-74, 89-99.

Clark Glymour, "Explanations, Tests, Unity, and Necessity," Nous 14 (1980): 31-50.

Galileo's telescopic evidence for the Copernican theory

Dudley Shapere, Galileo: A Philosophical Study (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1974), pp. 11-21 ("Galileo and the Interpretation of Science").

DeKosky, ch. 18 ("Galileo and Astronomy: Conflict Over World Systems").

Kuhn, The Copernican Revolution, pp. 219-25 ("Assimilation of Copernican Astronomy").

Vasco Ronchi, "The General Influence of the Development of Optics in the Seventeenth Century on Science and Technology," Vistas in Astronomy 9 (1967): 123-33.

Ian Hacking, "Do We See Through a Microscope?" in Images of Science, ed. Paul Churchland and Clifford Hooker (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1967), pp. 132-52.

Paul Feyerabend, Against Method (London: Verso, 1978), pp. 100-8, 121-43.

Harold Brown, "Galileo on the Telescope and the Eye," Journal of the History of Ideas 46 (1985): 487-501.

Albert von Helden, "Telescopes and Authority from Galileo to Cassini," Osiris 9 (1994): 9-29.

Owen Gingerich, "Dissertatio cum Professore Righini et Sidereo Nuncio," in Reason, Experiment, and Mysticism in the Scientific Revolution, ed. M.L. Righini Bonelli and William Shea (New York: Science History Publications, 1975), pp. 77-87.

Galileo's tower argument and theory-laden observation

Galileo, Dialogue Concerning the Two Chief World Systems, tr. S. Drake (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1967), pp. 114 (line 3) – 117 (end of first paragraph of Salv., in middle of page), 126 (line 2) – 127 (end of Simp.'s last remark), 129 (line 2) –

140 (just before Sagr. speaks) (see also notes on p. 475), p. 144 (line 3) – 149 (end Salv.), 171 (line 2) – 173 (end of Simpl., 2/3 of the way down), 186 (second paragraph, "For a final…") – 188 (end of speech, at the top)

Feyerabend, Ibid., pp. 69-92. ("Chapter 6", "Chapter 7".)

Galileo's thought experiments and real experiments

Rom Harre, "The Law of Descent", Great Science Experiments, (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1981), ch. 6 (pp. 68-73).

Thomas Settle, "An Experiment in the History of Science," Science 133 (1961), pp. 19-23.

Michael Segre, "Galileo, Viviani, and the Tower of Pisa," Studies in the History and Philosophy of Science 20 (1989): 435-51.

Galileo, Two New Sciences, tr. S. Drake, National Edition pages 107-110. (University of Wisconsin Press, 1974, pp. 66-69)

Thomas Kuhn, "A Function for Thought Experiments," from The Essential Tension (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1977), pp. 240-265.

James Robert Brown and John Norton, "Debate: Do Thought Experiments Transcend Empiricism?", in Christopher Hitchcock (ed.), Contemporary Debates in Philosophy of Science (Malden, MA: Blackwell, 2004), pp. 21-65. (Brown: "Do Thought Experiments Transcend Empiricism?"; Norton: "Why Thought Experiments Do Not Transcend Empiricism.")

The trial of Galileo

Maurice A. Finocchiaro, The Galileo Affair: A Documentary History (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1989), pp. 27-39 ("Introduction: 6. The Earlier Incidents, 7. The Later Incidents").

Documents in the above book:

pp. 67-9 (Cardinal Bellarmine to Foscarini, 21 April 1615)

pp. 87-118 (Letter to Grand Duchess Christina, 1615)

"Earlier Inquisition Proceedings": pp. 147-148 (Inquisition Minutes of 25 February 1616, Special Injunction of 26 February 1616), p. 153 (Cardinal Bellarmine's Certificate, 26 May 1616)

"Miscellaneous Documents": p. 212 (Vatican Secretary to Florentine Inquisitor, 24 May 1631), p. 213 (ditto, 19 July 1631), pp. 214-7 (Preface to the Dialogue), pp. 217-8 (end of the Dialogue), pp. 218-22 (Special Commission Report, September 1632)

pp. 256-62 (Galileo's First Deposition)

pp. 277-8 (Galileo's Second Deposition)

pp. 286-7 (Galileo's Fourth Deposition)

pp. 287-291 (The Sentence of the Inquisition)

pp. 292-3 (Galileo's Abjuration, 22 June 1633)

Proposal for Maymester Course.

The Philosophy of Erotic Love

An examination of the concept of erotic love as it is developed in classical and recent philosophy and literature. Questions to be considered include: How is erotic love distinguished from other forms of love?; Is erotic love more centrally a kind of psychological state or a kind of behavior?; Is sexual attraction a necessary component of erotic love?; To what extent is the expression of erotic love conditioned by culture?; Is the concept of erotic love connected with oppression based on gender or class?

Readings will include works by: Plato, Spinoza, Freud, Proust, Beauvoir, Sartre, and contemporary writers.

Texts: Symposium, Plato
Swann in Love, Marcel Proust
The Philosophy of Erotic Love, R. Solomon and K. Higgins, editors.

Evaluation: There will be two short papers (20% each), one of which will be a partial draft of a term paper (60%). Extra credit is given for meaningful participation in class, on the Blackboard discussion forum, and in office hours.

PROPOSAL TO TEACH A COURSE IN THE 2007 MAYMESTER

_____ _____ _____

[your name] (email) school/dept.

If team teaching, add extra instructor names and academic units:

If the course you propose to teach is being developed for the new curriculum, or if you envision it having some off-campus component or additional class activities beyond the regular classes, ALSO send the syllabus and related material describing the total educational experience to Jim Murphy, CB 3340, Summer School.
Please continue and return your response, e-copy or hard copy.

1. Title and number (new/old) of the course (and cross-listings).

2. Have you taught this course in a recent summer session? If so, when was your most recent offering and enrollment?

3. Consider that the Maymester would have 13 extended class sessions of over three hours each, including the last day for a final examination. Not every course is suitable for this format; some adaptation is expected.
a) Circle which teaching block you prefer? 9:00 am - 12:15 pm; 1:15 - 4:30 pm.

b) What students would the course serve (level, majors, etc.)?

c) How many students would you anticipate in the class?

d) Briefly give any highlights of this course that would make it an exciting, valuable, or distinctive offering for our students?

4. By your signature below, and that of your Chair/Dean, each certifies that the credit and grades earned for this course in the Maymester meet the usual standard in your Department/School.

_____ _____

signature instructor signature Chair/Dean

TA ASSIGNMENT REQUEST FORM FOR SPRING 2007

NAME:_____

I intend to return to the Department and I wish to be considered for a teaching assignment: Yes No

I intend to return to the Department and will be funded by a non teaching fellowship: Yes No

I will be a fifth year student next year and wish to be considered for a dissertation fellowship: Yes No
Specify Term

If you answered "yes" please rank all of the following assignments, taking into account your qualifications, your own educational needs and the seminars you plan to take. A Teaching Fellow must have been a TA at UNC for at least two semesters. Let "1" stand for your first choice, etc:

TEACHING ASSISTANT

_____	101 [20]	Intro to Main Problems	Large Section (4)	Neta	9 MW F- 9 & 10
_____	160 [22]	Intro to Ethics	Large Section (6)	Sayre McCord	11 MW F- 10 & 11
_____	163 [30]	Practical Ethics	Large Section (4)	Maclean	12 MW F- 10 & 12
_____	275 [46]	Phil Issues in Feminism	Large Section (3)	J. Boxill	10 MW F- 11 & 12

TEACHING FELLOWS

_____	101 [20]	Intro: Main Problems	TR 8
_____	110 [24]	Great Works	TR 8
_____	112 [26]	Making Sense of Ourselves	TR 3:30
_____	155 [21]	Intro to Logic	TR 9:30
_____	165 [34]	Bioethics	MWF 9
_____	134E [32]	Phil of Religion-Evening	MW 6-7:15
_____	230 [38]	Experience & Reality	MW 2
_____	272 [42]	Peace, War, Defense	MWF 2
_____	272 [42]	Peace, War, Defense	TR 3:30

Please indicate your relevant teaching experience to date and any other considerations you would like us to keep in mind when determining your assignment for next term. E.g. If you have not been a TA for a course, but believe you are qualified to teach it, please explain. (Use space below or back of this sheet for other considerations) Feel free to add additional comments.

PLEASE RETURN TO JAN BOXILL NO LATER THAN: October 13, 2006

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, October 23, 2006 4:16 PM
To: Church, Frank C <fchurch@med.unc.edu>
Cc: Postema, Gerald J <gpostema@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Lange class roll
Attach: Phil 06F-Fall 04.doc; MARC LANGEPHIL 38H.doc

Here are two more class rolls: One is a First Year Seminar

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Jan Boxill wrote:
> Dear Frank,
> Per Jerry Postema's request, I am attaching you Marc Lange's class > roll for this semester's course: PHIL 130H
> I will be getting the other names as soon as I can.
> Jan
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, October 24, 2006 8:52 PM
To: Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: sample papers

Will do. Thanks,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Geoff Sayre-McCord wrote:
> Jan --
> Could you remind the people teaching the relevant courses that our > Assessment Plan calls for copies of the papers/exams handed in by > advanced students who are majors. Also, could you update the attached > with the new course numbers?
> Thanks,
> Geoff
>
> _____
> Geoffrey Sayre-McCord
> Professor and Department Chair
> Department of Philosophy, CB #3125
> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
> USA
>
> Phone: (919) 962-2695
> email: sayre-mccord@unc.edu
> http://philosophy.unc.edu/smccord.htm

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, October 24, 2006 9:24 PM
To: Roberts, John Thomas <jtrosap@email.unc.edu>; Jesse Prinz <jesse@subcortex.com>; Boyd, Derek William <dwboyd@email.unc.edu>; Hofweber, Thomas <hofweber@unc.edu>; Peter Vanderschraaf <pvander@email.unc.edu>; Chris Grau <cgrau@email.unc.edu>; Reeve, David <cdcreeve@email.unc.edu>; Hill, Thomas E Jr <thill@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Undergraduate Majors' papers

You are receiving this email because you teach an undergraduate class in the 300-400 range that is likely to have senior philosophy majors.

According to our Department's Assessment plan, a sample paper of each of the senior philosophy majors in your class is to be submitted to the Director of Undergraduate Studies at the end of the term. These papers will be evaluated by an Outcome Assessment Committee [appointed by the Chair].

Quoting the Assessment plan:
*The Committee will submit a report to the Chair that assesses whether Upon graduation, philosophy majors should demonstrate the ability both to analyze and critique philosophical arguments of others and to generate philosophical arguments of their own. Specifically, majors should be able to demonstrate that:

a. they can: *

i. present and explain each premise of a philosophical argument,

ii. evaluate the argument's validity and soundness,

*iii. explain any problems that are found, and *

iv. suggest ways to remedy the problems.

If you assign a term paper, you might ask Gucki or Lance to make copies before you put comments and grades on them. If you have any questions, please feel free to come talk with me. We need only collect papers from phil majors who are seniors.

Thanks,
Jan
--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: Gary Comstock <gcomstock@ncsu.edu>
Sent: Friday, October 20, 2006 9:43 AM
To: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Invitation, Oct. 27

Dear Jan,

You are cordially invited to participate in a seminar, "Challenges for Research Ethics at Land Grant Universities," at NC State on Friday, Oct 27 at 3:30.

A group of graduate faculty and the Dean of the Graduate School will meet to discuss the issue in the Faculty Senate Chambers (DH Hill Library room 2320). I will briefly introduce some of the obstacles to the institutionalization of research ethics education and LANGURE's novel strategy to overcome them.

Karen and I are also hoping you can come to an informal reception immediately afterwards at our house, 118 Buckden Pl., Cary, before you return to Chapel Hill. May I send directions?

Many thanks,
Gary

--
Gary Comstock
Research and Professional Ethics Program
NC State U., Raleigh, NC 27695-8103
919 513 5131

Please visit the Ethics Program website: www.ncsu.edu/ethics and LANGURE: www.ncsu.edu/langure

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, October 25, 2006 2:04 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: Checking in re plan for Parr Fellows/students/scenarios DDI Event--Monday 11/13 from 4-6]
Attach: 13 from 4-6.msg

It looks like I'm supposed to be checking on the room at Bynum. Can you take care of this.
thanks,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From Academe Online
http://www.aaup.org/publications/Academe/index.htm

June-July 2006
Volume 92, Number 4

The Difficult Dialogues Initiative

Academic freedom takes center stage in the multicampus projects from which this issue's feature articles are drawn.

By Robert M. O'Neil

The Ford Foundation announced its Difficult Dialogues initiative in spring 2005 in response to reports of growing intolerance and efforts to curb academic freedom on U.S. campuses. Program planners anticipated that their invitation to submit proposals, extended to all accredited U.S. institutions of higher education enrolling undergraduates, might draw as many as three hundred applications. In fact, nearly seven hundred institutions responded—almost a quarter of those invited—each forwarding brief statements describing how their college or university would address campus tensions, with special emphasis on promoting pluralism and enhancing academic freedom.

The volume of proposals necessitated recruiting additional preliminary reviewers. Following a first round of reviews, Ford invited 136 institutions to submit much more detailed proposals, from which it planned to select twenty to twenty-five institutions to receive funding. Of the finalists, all but four responded with full submissions; one of those that dropped out at this stage was a New Orleans university that found it impossible to prepare a proposal while trying to recover from Hurricane Katrina. A rigorous process of external review, followed by a final internal stage, resulted in the selection of twenty-seven colleges and universities to receive full funding, which amounted to $100,000 for a two-year period. There were, in addition, sixteen runners-up, each of which received a more modest $10,000 but were eligible to participate in planned regional conferences and other facets of the program.

The uniqueness of Difficult Dialogues was manifest in several ways. The Ford Foundation sponsored a similar competition in 1990, although with two major differences: only a small group of selective institutions were invited to apply, and the 1990 program focused almost exclusively on racial and ethnic tensions. The letter that launched Difficult Dialogues—from Ford's president, Susan Beresford, and a dozen current and two former university presidents—began by noting rising tensions over Middle Eastern issues on campuses and stressed the importance of protecting, on the college campus of all places, "the expression of a wide diversity of viewpoints" on these and other contentious issues. "In times like these," wrote the letter's authors to their fellow presidents and chancellors, "we need to be especially vigilant in maintaining and nurturing a free and open campus environment."

Above all, the central focus on academic freedom marked Difficult Dialogues as a singular initiative. In their letter, the presidents reminded their colleagues that colleges and universities "bear a special responsibility to protect and respect academic freedom, not only in shaping their own policies, but also in supporting faculty members and students whose freedoms are threatened." The letter stressed the central ingredient of that freedom: professors' rights to speak and write freely without institutional constraint or sanction. It also emphasized, however, essential qualifications: "If . . . professors seek to exploit students, coerce the views of students, or display a demonstrable lack of competence in their discipline, their academic colleagues may conclude that their expression exceeds the limits of academic freedom." This juxtaposition concluded by cautioning that "academic freedom must always be accompanied by academic responsibility."

The letter became more specific as it developed this central theme, stressing the recent increase in anti-Semitism and anti-Arab or anti-Muslim incidents on too many campuses. Given these hostile forces, as well as the steadily growing diversity of student populations, the presidents called on their fellow campus leaders to "create an atmosphere of mutual respect, in which diversity is examined and seen in the context of a broader set of common values." As an especially appropriate response to such challenges, the letter urged development of "academic programs to engage students in constructive dialogue around difficult religious, political, racial or ethnic, and cultural issues." It was in this context that the letter invited submission of responsive proposals.

The very process of crafting proposals invited campus dialogue— occasionally even difficult dialogue—across departmental, disciplinary, and other lines that so often separate and divide academic colleagues. The "teams" that took shape on the successful campuses were diverse, bringing together colleagues who may never have interacted with one another before. What was striking at many of the institutions that ultimately received grants was a realization of the value of such interdependence in the course of achieving a shared and desirable goal. Also remarkable in this respect was the amount of such interaction that the quest for a foundation grant evoked.

The range of grant recipients runs the gamut of American higher education—public and private institutions, two-year and liberal arts colleges, and comprehensive and doctoral universities, spanning the nation from Anchorage to Miami and from Tempe to Hanover. Some programs emphasize racial tensions, and others stress religious conflicts, while Middle East tensions represent a predictably pervasive theme. The specific approaches different institutions selected vary as widely as the types of institutions and the programs of focus. The development of new course offerings is a common element, but workshops, town-gown interactions, overseas study programs, and lecture series also figure prominently in the successful proposals.

The structures of the funded programs are no less diverse than their subjects of focus. No two programs are identical, and in fact they differ much more than one would have predicted. The principal investigator at one doctoral campus is an academic vice provost; at another, it is the chief student affairs officer. At still another, it is a senior English professor, while superficially comparable programs elsewhere are guided by a former law school dean and, in one instance, a senior staff member in the learning resources center. These variations make eminently good sense; they reflect the character and structure of each institution, validating

Ford's early insight that the invitation should not have been sent automatically to a religious studies department or a student affairs office but to whichever office or person could best marshal and aggregate the resources vital to crafting a responsive program. Hence the remarkable diversity and variety in structure, which is quite as impressive as the eclectic array of themes and methods.

Although not all the funded proposals give central emphasis to academic freedom, a substantial number of grantees and runners-up did respond specifically to the challenge of the presidents' letter by making an institutional commitment to enhance protection for academic freedom. The programs described in the articles that follow reflect a consistently high level of such commitment. Happily, they also reflect the diversity of the participating institutions—from a northeastern liberal arts college to public and private doctoral institutions in the Southeast, to a Midwestern research university, to a community college in the Pacific Northwest. An additional article describes a unique program that was developed at the behest of the national AAUP office at a meeting of the Virginia state conference of the AAUP.

Because many of the Difficult Dialogues programs do not really begin until summer or early fall 2006, it is much too early to offer any assessment. All that can be said at this stage—and this much is vitally important, whatever happens as the program matures—is that both the Ford Foundation and the institutions that sought foundation support recognized to an unprecedented degree the central value of protecting the academic freedom of faculty and students. Whatever else comes from Difficult Dialogues, that much alone would validate the hopes of the program's sponsors.

O'Neil, guest editor of this issue of Academe, is professor of law and former president of the University of Virginia, where he directs the Thomas Jefferson Center for Protection of Free Expression.

The View from Chapel Hill

Addressing the underlying conflicts between faith and reason in the wake of violence.

By Judith Welch Wegner

Difficult dialogues" and "Chapel Hill." Are these words synonymous? It has surely seemed so in recent days. At noon on March 3, a recent Chapel Hill graduate drove a sport-utility vehicle through the center of campus. Revving his car to thirty-five miles per hour, he drove through the free-speech zone near the student union (known as the "Pit"), deliberately striking nine people before speeding away. Police arrived immediately to assist the victims, six of whom were hospitalized for minor injuries. The assailant, meanwhile, called 911 to report where he could be found and to give his name (which the dispatcher had trouble deciphering and which he asked the assailant to repeat again and again). The dispatcher asked the assailant why he had done what he did. The assailant said that he acted to "punish the government of the United States for [its] actions around the world." His name? Mohammad Taheri-azar, a native of Iran.

The campus stopped, frozen in its tracks. Psychological services were made available to students who were still reeling from the death of a well-loved resident assistant who had fallen through a dorm window just days before. Public safety officials proceeded admirably in providing information as it could properly be disclosed. So, too, did the local courts, setting bail at $5.5 million, after reading out nine counts of assault and attempted murder.

Some students immediately organized a "protest" rally at the Pit—complete with American flags—asserting that the university had wrongly refused to label the Pit incident as "terrorism." One of the rally's leaders had sued the university as an incoming first-year undergraduate, challenging the selection of Michael Sells's 1999 book, Approaching the Qur'an: The Early Revelations, as the summer reading book for his class. Another had been fired from her position as a columnist for the student newspaper the previous fall after calling for Arab men to be strip-searched. The newspaper covered the March 3 incident heavily, just weeks after it published a cartoon of the prophet Mohammed that it asserted was warranted as part of its responsibility to promote free speech.

In succeeding days, many sought to support Muslim students. Educational programs and panels were presented, and the student government organized a "take back the Pit" event, complete with a bluegrass band. Later in the month, faculty and students gathered for an evening event called "Vigilance Against Hate." All these travails made one thing clear: we lacked the perspectives, words, and tools we needed to make sense of what has happened at our university.

But even before we experienced our own version of "March madness" this spring, we were seeking ways to improve the potential for respectful exchange of ideas on campus. Last year, I worked with our Faculty Council, leaders in the College of Arts and Sciences, and colleagues in the Division of Student Affairs to craft a proposal for the Ford Foundation's Difficult Dialogues initiative. Ford's call for proposals noted that college and university presidents had cited worrisome trends on their campuses, including religious intolerance and challenges to academic freedom. Defining these trends as symptoms of the nation's difficulty in sustaining informed political and civil discourse, the call sought promising approaches for fostering a free and open campus community. Linking academic freedom directly to academic responsibility, the call also pointed to the need to create an atmosphere of mutual respect in which "diversity is examined and seen in the context of a broader set of common values" and means are found to address controversy by "engag[ing] with those with whom one disagrees." Our proposal built on what we'd learned in our ongoing efforts to grapple with difficult dialogues that had occurred over the past year at UNC. In spring 2004, we had faced an investigation by the federal Office of Civil Rights in the aftermath of an English instructor's e-mail response to a student who had expressed discomfort with homosexuality on religious grounds. In fall 2004, we had negotiated faculty concerns about a possible gift to the College of Arts and Sciences from a conservative foundation with connections to people who had mocked progressive views.

We proposed a multifaceted strategy for our Difficult Dialogues project, which began early in 2006 and will continue through spring 2008. First, we aim to develop a deeper appreciation for the underlying tensions that fuel conflict on our campus when faith-based convictions and the church of reason come face to face. The UNC Chapel Hill campus differs from colleges and universities in other parts of the country when it comes to religious and spiritual beliefs, partly because 82 percent of entering undergraduates are drawn from North Carolina, a state whose population has strong ties to churches with conservative Protestant views. Not surprisingly, surveys indicate that a high proportion of Carolina students hold religious belief as fundamentally important to their lives. Faculty members, however, are drawn from around the nation and the world, and they often have religious and spiritual viewpoints that differ from the students'. At the same time, the percentage of Carolina students who study abroad is among the highest in the nation, making it imperative for students to appreciate the pluralistic societies they will encounter.

In light of this mix of student and faculty viewpoints, we believed it important to begin by fully exploring underlying views on campus about the intersection of personal belief and intellectual inquiry. These views predicated current controversies, and we felt they needed to be examined before we proceeded to discuss symptoms, be they associated with conflicts about sexual orientation, "intelligent design," or international events.

We proposed to collaborate with colleagues versed in the powerful approach to deliberation espoused by the Kettering Foundation and the National Issues Forums. That is, we wanted to "name" and "frame" issues as a community on the deeper question of how belief and intellectual inquiry are interrelated in a public university such as our own. (Naming and framing involve choosing an issue to explore, researching it, identifying and categorizing people's concerns, recognizing the tensions among different viewpoints, and reflecting on the benefits and drawbacks of different approaches to the issue. See www.nifi.org.)

Building on this initial collaboration, we will take several additional steps. Professional development opportunities will help faculty gain skill in constructively shaping discussion of controversial issues in the classroom. In addition, we will enrich our new general education curriculum by incorporating more opportunities for faculty and students to discuss diverse opinions, scientific inquiries, religious and spiritual beliefs, and ethics in a respectful environment. We are also planning extra-curricular student-life activities to stimulate informed discussions of controversial subjects and encourage the exchange of ideas and beliefs.

Scholarly Lessons

We hope that by identifying important scholarly contributions to date, our work will contribute to a national dialogue. We have already learned of notable research that illuminates the culture of higher education and its intersection with religious belief. For example, the Higher Education Research Institute at the University of California, Los Angeles, has been conducting studies on spirituality among college students and college faculty with the support of the John Templeton Foundation (http://spirituality.ucla.edu).

The study's findings show how complex the dimensions of religious belief are. Based on information from 3,680 college juniors, the institute reports that 41 percent of students who regard themselves as "highly religious" also view themselves as "conservative or far right." Forty-four percent identify themselves as "middle of the road" politically, and 15 percent see themselves as "liberal or far left." African Americans had the highest scores on seven of twelve measures of spirituality and religiousness (religious commitment, religious engagement, ethic of caring, and religious or social conservatism). Whites had the lowest scores on five of twelve indicators (ethic of caring, ecumenical worldview, charitable involvement, spiritual quest, and compassionate self-concept).

More than 80 percent of faculty members surveyed (40,670 individuals on 421 campuses) regarded themselves as "spiritual." About 18 percent of faculty members at public universities agreed with the statement that "colleges should be concerned with facilitating students' spiritual development," compared with 62 percent of faculty members at Catholic colleges. Asked to respond to the statement, "the spiritual dimension of faculty members' lives has no place in the academy," about half of faculty at public universities disagreed. Across the whole study population, about half of those in the social sciences, physical sciences, and biological sciences disagreed, as did nearly two-thirds of those in health sciences, education, and business fields.

What do these findings mean in the lives of students? UNC Chapel Hill sociologist Christian Smith, working with sociology graduate student Melinda Lundquist Denton, drew on work from the National Study of Youth and Religion to research the 2005 book Soul Searching: The Religious and Spiritual Lives of American Teenagers. Smith and Denton found that American adolescents experience and represent in their lives an immense variety of religious and spiritual beliefs. For a significant number of adolescents, religion and spirituality serve as defining features of their lives. For many others, religious practices appear to be important.

Smith and Denton report that many teenagers are inarticulate and confused in talking about religion and spirituality even though they are committed to their religious beliefs. They also found that parents and other adults help to shape teenagers' religious faith, and they detected a correlation between religious involvement and positive life outcomes for teenagers. In addition, Smith and Denton say that most American teenagers resemble their parents when it comes to religion and that religious youth groups are an important part of the religious and spiritual experiences of a substantial minority of American adolescents.

End to Name-Calling

We have already begun collaborating with colleagues conversant with the techniques recommended by the Kettering Foundation and the National Issues Forums, taking into account the unique characteristics and challenges facing our university. We want to build a capacity for "perspective taking" in sophisticated ways that go to the heart of what we profess. Our most recent work with Margaret Holt, an emeritus professor at the University of Georgia and a Kettering and National Issues associate, has led us deeper into the process of naming and framing the tensions that we have experienced on our campus and that we imagine others have witnessed on theirs.

In exploring the tensions at Chapel Hill, we've used words and phrases such as "marginalization," "academic freedom," and a range of "convictions" (religious, personal, faith-based, and spiritually derived). In a faculty-student working group, we've also discussed concepts like the freedom to express divergent views, tolerance, professional and academic ethics, personal ideologies, intellectual inquiry, and critical thinking. We believe that civil dialogue and the search for common ground are crucial, as are diversity and respect for the "social contract." Our challenge has been to explore the relationship of powerful touchstones such as these.

At this juncture, we are asking questions such as, Can Chapel Hill faculty and students talk about matters of faith and conscience on this campus? And how should a public university respond to the intersection of faith convictions and intellectual inquiry? We believe that we must explore where, how, and with whom dialogues on these core questions should take place and determine the ground rules that should apply. We want to make deliberation rather than name-calling a habit for students and faculty on our campus.

We take as a given that such deliberation must occur in a context in which academic freedom and mutual respect are accepted as fundamental. These values are integrated into our faculty policies, our student honor code, and our institutional fabric. Now is the time to reiterate their significance and give them renewed life.

We believe we can identify certain legitimate, though disparate, approaches to our core question about the role of faith and conscience in a public university. Some of the approaches we hope to develop and articulate include the following:

- Students in higher education should be familiar with conversations in society about controversies (students will have to identify and engage in difficult discussions once they leave campus and assume their role in civil society, so we need to practice such skills with relevant opportunities while on campus).

- Public higher education should separate church and state; church-related institutions are the proper milieu for sacred discussions.

- Personal and spiritual beliefs don't belong in classrooms but should be engaged actively in other settings on the campus.

We plan to develop discussion materials and a moderator's manual to facilitate discussions on these and related issues. Once we have tested and perfected the materials on a small scale, we will test them on campus. We hope to do so in fall 2006, after which we will be happy to share our materials with others around the country as we move toward increasing our shared capacity to deal with difficult dialogues nationwide.

March Madness takes many forms at Chapel Hill, as it does at other institutions around the country. The events of this past March helped us recognize the need to face the fact that we now live in a deeply divided society whose sharp differences often spill over onto our once-tranquil campus environs. It's time to talk frankly about the problems facing our campuses and our society. We hope that our exploration of the intersection of religious belief and intellectual inquiry in the public square will be a model for further discussions beyond our campus.

Wegner is professor of law and outgoing chair of the faculty at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. She is co-principal investigator with William Andrews, senior associate dean and E.Maynard Adams Professor of English, for the Difficult Dialogues project Wegner writes about. She can be reached at judith_wegner@unc.edu.

(Re)Writing the History of Race at Emory

Born out of controversy, the Transforming Community Project draws staff, students, and faculty into discussing the history of race on campus.

By Leslie M. Harris

In spring 2005, forty people from all sectors of Emory University gathered for a weekend retreat to devise an ambitious roadmap for a five-year project on race and racism. The Transforming Community Project will engage Emory's faculty and staff members, students, and alumni in conversations about the meaning of race and racism on campus and in the United States. It will also lead to the development of a community-based public history of race relations at Emory.

The project's creation followed a difficult year of racial strife and suspicion at Emory that was unprecedented in its recent history. The turmoil began at a fall 2003 departmental celebration in which a white professor used a racist epithet to describe conditions during the department's early days. An African American professor who had attended the event subsequently filed a complaint with the university's Office of Equal Opportunity Programs.

After that, several worrisome incidents occurred in succession. Two non-Emory students attended a campus Halloween party dressed in blackface. When Mary Robinson, the former United Nations high commissioner for human rights, was invited to speak at Emory's 2004 commencement ceremonies, campus unrest ensued based on remarks Robinson had made at the 2001 United Nations International Conference Against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia, and Related Intolerance. Some people accused Robinson of anti-Semitism. Tensions rose again when conservative activist David Horowitz was invited to campus to speak about the Robinson incident and to comment on race and political correctness.

The strain generated by these events erupted into a host of fiery debates across the campus, revealing deep divisions regarding the responsibility of the university to address such incidents. A multiracial coalition of undergraduate and graduate students demanded that the university initiate diversity training for the campus community. Several faculty members, however, spoke out vociferously against any kind of diversity training for faculty members. When the professor who used the racist phrase was reprimanded based on Emory's discriminatory harassment policy, a faculty group presented a motion at a faculty meeting to remove regulations in the policy against discriminatory speech, because they said the regulations limited academic freedom. The motion didn't pass, but, as one faculty member noted at the meeting, more than an up-or-down vote on such issues was sorely needed.

Toward a Resolution

Over ensuing months, the university attempted to ease the tension through different tactics. It sponsored five public dialogues on "race, diversity, and community" that involved more than two hundred faculty and staff members. Emory's general counsel, in consultation with faculty members holding diverse views about the university's discriminatory harassment policy, revised the policy to bring it into better alignment with national law, to clarify its relationship to academic freedom, and to improve the process by which the university community addresses problems of discriminatory harassment.

Concurrently, Emory's president, James Wagner, who had been on the job for only about two months when the professor used the racial epithet at the departmental function, led the development of the university's first vision statement, which includes a clear declaration about Emory's commitment to diversity. Many who commented on the vision statement during its development expressed great pride in their sense of Emory as a diverse community and argued persuasively to feature diversity prominently in the statement. Also at the administrative level, Earl Lewis, who was appointed provost in July 2004, approved the creation of a new position at the rank of vice provost dedicated exclusively to promoting and ensuring diversity on campus. Lewis is Emory's first African American provost and the highest-ranking African American in the university's history.

In late 2003, an ad hoc group of faculty, staff, and students began meeting to discuss the issues afflicting the campus. They came to believe that the actions taken by the administration, while constructive, could not alone create or guarantee true community. They noted that the events of the previous fall had revealed that many at Emory felt ill-equipped to discuss racial difference; ill-informed about the history of race relations on campus and elsewhere; and unable to find constructive ways to address either exceptional circumstances or regular occurrences. They concluded that the university needed new approaches to addressing issues of diversity. United by the desire to make real and sustainable institutional progress, these individuals began the development of the Transforming Community Project.

I led the initial development of the project with Catherine S. Manegold, who was then the James M. Cox, Jr., Professor of Journalism at Emory. Each of us had separately been involved in discussions within and across departments about the racial issues that had disrupted the campus. We had also each written a working paper exploring an aspect of the problem.

I developed a plan to create small groups of arts and sciences faculty to discuss race and racism at Emory within the context of the history of race in the United States, especially the South, and to create concrete plans to address the problems identified. Manegold had particular concerns about the multiple stories about race that circulated throughout Emory along racialized paths—that is, that blacks had one story about race and what it meant at Emory, whites another, and so on. She proposed a four-year program in which students and faculty in the arts and sciences would investigate Emory's culture of race from the university's founding amid slavery in 1836 to the present. Together, members of the Emory community would create a more complete record of race in the university's history than had existed before, one that would enable the university to engage in a "fact-based dialogue" about race.

We looked to several models as we developed the Transforming Community Project. The Brown University Steering Committee preceded Emory's efforts within academia, providing one model. We also identified templates for creating community-based histories and linking them to plans for transforming the prevailing racial climate. Our models included the work of organizations such as Hope in the Cities, based in Richmond, Virginia; the Tulsa Race Riot Commission in Oklahoma; the Greensboro

Truth and Reconciliation Commission and the Wilmington Race Riot Commission in North Carolina; and the Southern Truth and Reconciliation Commission in Georgia.

All of these projects owe a large debt to South Africa's Truth and Reconciliation Commission. The South African process demonstrated that public acknowledgement of deep hurts and heinous crimes can go a long way toward healing community fissures that many had believed could never be resolved peacefully. Since the mid-1990s, Emory University has had a series of relationships with South Africa: study-abroad programs for undergraduates, residency programs for South African faculty members and graduate students, and a residency by Bishop Desmond Tutu from 1998 to 2000, following his service as chair of the South African Truth and Reconciliation Commission. In addition, in summer 2003, Manegold and I led a group of undergraduate students on an interdisciplinary internship program in South Africa.

An Expanded Project

Manegold and I discussed our proposed projects with faculty, staff, administrators, and students between May and December 2004. Earl Lewis, Emory's provost, suggested that we expand our Transforming Community Project, initially conceived of as a college-wide affair, to include the entire university system. Encouraged, we articulated several preliminary objectives. We wanted to involve as broad and diverse a constituency as possible in the project and to explore Emory's involvement in the world that blacks and whites created together in the South, from African American enslavement, segregation, and integration to the present day.

We decided the project should run for five years, from 2005 to 2010, a timeframe long enough to permit different individuals and groups to make their way into the project and develop long-term goals. At the same time, the project is sufficiently limited to permit at least one undergraduate class to experience a large part of the project as its members move through the university. The timeframe is also short enough to instill a sense of urgency in individuals and departments about the need to participate sooner rather than later.

Although Manegold and I had extensive experience in researching and writing about race, neither of us had familiarity with organizing an endeavor of this kind. As we began in 2004 to share our ideas with others across the university, we realized not only that they shared our enthusiasm, but also that, together, the Emory community had more than sufficient experience to turn the project into a reality.

Many administrators, faculty members, and graduate students had knowledge of facilitation and mediation that would prove useful for initiating a dialogue with the larger community. Alumni groups said they were interested in documenting Emory's history, and faculty members and students expressed enthusiasm for devoting parts of courses to excavating that history. A host of others offered advice, suggestions, and assistance as the project moved forward.

As we met with more people, ideas for the project grew and changed to incorporate a broader vision. Founded as the jewel of the cotton-and-slave South, Emory was designed to educate the white elite and thus uphold one kind of racial superiority. But its history mirrors and embraces a wider array of interracial histories and legacies. The project has developed a creative and continuing conversation about the relationship between what is seen in the South as the fundamental racial dynamic—that between blacks and whites—and the multiracial and multiethnic reality that has existed throughout Emory's history.

We knew from the start that to focus only on faculty members and students would be to ignore the long history of workers who have made and continue to make Emory what it is. Indeed, most of the attendees at five "town hall" meetings on race that took place in 2003–04 were neither faculty nor students, but staff members who wanted to share their experiences of race at Emory.

The transformative power of recognizing the work and influence of university staff members had already been demonstrated in 2000 at Oxford College, the two-year junior college affiliated with Emory. Mark Auslander, who was then an anthropology professor at Oxford, led a series of classes in restoring and documenting a nearby municipal cemetery in which the segregated black section had fallen into disrepair. As part of the project, the students constructed a museum exhibition and organized accompanying evening celebrations that included several African American families who had worked, sometimes for generations, on the Oxford and Emory campuses. The project's success among staff, who appreciated having their contributions recognized and celebrated by the Emory community, demonstrated the importance of expanding the Transforming Community Project to include any current or former employees of the Emory community who wanted to participate.

Next Steps

In March 2005, following our initial research and conversations, the project's steering committee held the weekend retreat mentioned at the beginning of this article. More than forty faculty and staff members, students, alumni, and administrators gathered from across the university to devise a template for the project. We had representatives from the anthropology, biology, political science, psychology, religion, and Spanish departments; the medical and business schools; the Graduate School of Arts and Sciences; the facilities management and campus life offices; the university libraries; and the president's office.

The group decided that the project's first goal would be to launch a series of "community dialogues" beginning in fall 2005. The group stated that the events would provide a "unique opportunity to engage the Emory University community in . . . open, honest, and civil discussions concerning the multifaceted meanings, histories, and experiences of race at Emory and beyond." Participants would begin to envision concrete ways in which the Emory community could act to create a new future around race.

Over summer 2004, fifteen faculty and staff members, students, and alumni met to design syllabi for the dialogues and to refine the goals of the discussions. Twelve people from the project's steering committee stepped forward to serve as facilitators, including faculty members from the biology, history, and political science departments; the Office of Religious Life; and the Office of Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, and Transgender Life. Staff from the facilities management and alumni services offices, administrators from the Campus Life Program, and undergraduate and graduate students also served as facilitators.

The first four community dialogues attracted a total of sixty participants. In spring 2006, we accommodated growing demand by organizing five dialogues and allowing twenty participants in each one. Each group has been diverse in terms of race and employment status. We have been less successful in achieving gender and political diversity; women have far outnumbered men in the groups, and few to no conservative voices have participated despite specific invitations to conservative constituencies.

Each dialogue group meets eight times during a semester. Over lunch or dinner, group members discuss short assigned readings or a film about race and racism. The readings and films introduce participants to general ideas about race and racism in the United States and include material on occurrences at Emory. In spring 2006, the nearly two hundred people who participated in the first year of community dialogues met in a weekend workshop to develop concrete actions based on their discussion that will benefit the Emory community.

Spring 2006 also marked the beginning of the second phase of the Transforming Community Project: the excavation of Emory's history. A "gathering the tools" working group, which met on the same schedule as other community dialogue groups this spring, developed basic tools to help those interested in Emory's racial heritage to engage in historical research about it. Three faculty members who have experience in oral history and archival research lead the working group. Four staff members, one student, and one Emory alumnae make up the rest of the group.

Emory's racial history will also be excavated through other means. Undergraduate classes and honors theses will explore it, and it will be the subject of summer research projects sponsored by the Office of Undergraduate Education's Summer Research Program, which pays a stipend and provides campus housing to students working on research projects with a faculty member. Some students have developed their own research projects independent of these models. This spring, students involved in the Transforming Community Project began work on a research effort that will encourage fraternity and sorority members to interview one another about their experiences of race at Emory and explore the history of their organizations.

To encourage faculty involvement in the project, the Ford Foundation awarded Emory a $100,000 grant in March 2006 as part of its Difficult Dialogues initiative. I am a co-investigator for the grant, along with Gary Hauk, vice president and deputy to the president of Emory. He wrote A Legacy of Heart and Mind: Emory Since 1836, the most definitive history of the university to date. Hauk replaced Manegold as co-chair of the project's steering committee when Manegold stepped down in 2005. The Ford Foundation grant will underwrite faculty participation in community dialogues as well as two faculty pedagogy seminars on Emory's racial history. Through these pedagogy seminars, faculty will design new courses or add material to existing courses that address Emory's racial past and present. These seminars will be held during summer 2006 and summer 2007.

The community dialogues and research on Emory's past will continue through the five years of the project. We hope that our community deliberations and our research will help us move from the ambiguous reality of integration to the challenge of lasting transformation. Creating a shared history will help Emory reshape its policies and deepen its commitment to acting in a reflective and thoughtful way about issues of race.

Harris is associate professor of history and African American studies and chair of the Department of African American Studies at Emory University. She is also principal investigator for the Difficult Dialogues project at Emory. The project's e-mail address is tcp@learnlink.emory.edu; Harris can be reached at lharr04@emory.edu.

Campus Religious Conflict Should Go Public

A Barnard project moves debates about religion out of the private sphere.

By Janet R. Jakobsen

These are difficult times for faculty members and others who are committed to academic freedom. Among a number of examples, consider the following:

- In early 2006, Andrew Jones, an alumnus of the University of California, Los Angeles, offered to pay students to report professors who express "wrong" political views in class. According to the February 13, 2006, issue of The Nation, the incorrect views listed on Jones's Web site included supporting affirmative action and opposing the confirmation of John Roberts to the U.S. Supreme Court.

- Over the past few years, state legislatures across the country have introduced bills that aim to restrict faculty activity in the name of protecting student freedom.1 A bill introduced earlier this year in Arizona would have required institutions of higher education to provide alternatives if "the course, coursework, learning material, or [class] activity conflict[ed] with the student's beliefs or practices in sex, morality, or religion."

Although such legislative initiatives have thus far failed, they remain a matter for concern, because they use the language of academic freedom in their effort to constrain expression. In so doing, they threaten to turn the meaning of academic freedom away from its traditional sense as the freedom to express diverse viewpoints toward the idea that academic freedom is a freedom from hearing any views that might cause offense. This new meaning is hardly that of a principle supporting free and open inquiry in the academy, nor is it one that supports the enterprise of democracy.

Given this climate, it is vitally important that we defend academic freedom and recall its founding principles. Defense of academic freedom on its own, however, can set up a scenario that has become all too familiar over the past twenty years of "culture wars," in which attack and defense play themselves out in ways that are highly regularized and almost scripted, with little shift in the terrain and no end in sight. Such an impasse makes for a depressing state of affairs. It seems that those of us who support academic freedom are condemned to defend ourselves ad nauseam and to see our own principles repeatedly used against us.

There is another possibility, however. We could take up the challenge of the current moment as an opportunity to rethink the meaning of academic freedom. Too often, we hesitate to question its meaning for fear that doing so will open the door to even greater demands for self-policing and censorship in the classroom than those we already face. Yet the modern concept of freedom on which our claims to freedom are based has its own problems, even contradictions, all of which can be exploited by those who have little or no concern for freedom of expression. Rethinking freedom can help us address these problems in ways that enrich and strengthen the power of the term.

A Special Case

The inherent contradictions of freedom are particularly acute when it comes to one of the hottest of the hot-button issues now invoked in debates over academic freedom: that of religion. Religious freedom and academic freedom pose an apparent contradiction. The historical development of the concept of academic freedom is one in which free inquiry has often been defined in opposition to religious authority or dogma. If in defending academic freedom, we simply hold on to one side of this opposition, we will have no language for the ways in which academic and religious freedom might be mutually maintained. We leave ourselves open to charges of bias and the abrogation of religious freedom. If, however, we develop a means of talking about religious freedom in relation to academic freedom, we take a major step toward shifting a debate that is currently structured so that one form of freedom can be perpetually posed against another.

Because the relationship between freedom and religion is so fraught, Barnard College chose to make questions of religion, in conjunction with the politics of identity, the focus of its Difficult Dialogues project, which began in spring 2005 with discussions about what makes for "difficult dialogues." The project, which will continue through spring 2008, will involve a faculty seminar that will extend for the length of the grant, an undergraduate seminar, and an addition to an existing program that relies on role-playing to explore the history of social conflicts.

We began this undertaking by soliciting faculty participation. Faculty members privately expressed strong and often negative views of others' positions in various campus conflicts, particularly those involving religion. This response initially surprised us, because the faculty had never expressed such views publicly, despite the fact that many had been longtime and active participants in the cultural life of the college. Upon reflection, however, this response did not seem so unusual, because it reflects the current structure of freedom in the United States—a structure that contributes to and maintains the problems that a project like Difficult Dialogues is meant to address. In particular, freedom in the United States is built on the concept of privatization: potentially conflictual differences are privatized—they are removed from the public square—and a patina of tolerance and civility is maintained.

The idea that public freedom should be established through the privatizing of differences is reflective of the modern period and is often narrated in terms of historical responses to religious difference. The modern response to the "wars of religion" in Europe sparked by the Protestant Reformation was to establish public religious "tolerance." The public peace was enforced by restricting religious differences and the potential conflicts induced by such differences to the private sphere. Public religious tolerance, however, is perfectly compatible with the domination of one particular religion in the way that the Church of England was established as part of the state while all other religious practices were the subjects of public toleration.

Maintaining Civility

This model of maintaining civility through privatization of difference and public expression of tolerance, especially tolerance granted by a dominant majority toward a minority, is often invoked as the best means of addressing social conflicts. Even religious conservatives who oppose gay rights express tolerance for homosexuals as individual (and private) people. But once conflict moves out of the private sphere and into the public arena, it looks irresolvable. There are no public mechanisms for the resolution of such conflicts. The only possibility is reprivatization.

In a community like that of a college campus, the imperative for privatization means that a certain space of protection is created. Controversial and even offensive views are not expressed publicly and hence do not fuel potentially destructive conflicts. But this structure of civility also means that these views are never engaged and, most important, never questioned or changed.

The Barnard project will explore alternative possibilities. Participants in the faculty seminar will consider how particular ideas about freedom structure the available means of engagement and thus the possible outcomes for conflicts. We will ask whether different approaches might allow for different resolutions.

To give an idea of how such a project might yield an alternative approach to difficult dialogues, I will briefly lay out one understanding of the problem and how it might be shifted. This particular model is based on work that Ann Pellegrini and I developed in our 2003 book about sexuality and religious freedom, Love the Sin: Sexual Regulation and the Limits of Religious Tolerance. I present this model because it provides a concept of religious freedom that might be positively conjoined with academic freedom and that provides an alternative method of engaging conflict.

Engaging Difference

The idea of religious freedom as outlined in the U.S. Constitution provides a means of conceptualizing freedom that depends not on privatization but on public engagement with differences. Religious freedom in the United States was supposed to be a step forward from a model in which a single church is the established religion of a state (for example, the Church of England) and "other" religions are granted tolerance. Religion in the United States was to be the subject not of tolerance, but of freedom and equality.

The First Amendment to the Constitution delineates religious freedom in two parts. The first, commonly known as "disestablishment," guarantees that there should be no single religion established by the government; the second, termed "free practice," guarantees freedom for all persons to practice their religion (or to refuse to practice any religion) free from government interference.

In practice, however, religious freedom in the United States has failed to live up to the promise of democratic—free and equal—treatment for all people regardless of religious commitment. Christianity, specifically Protestantism, has consistently dominated American public life, including the U.S. government, even though there is not supposed to be any established religion. This reality has led to a situation more akin to religious tolerance than religious freedom.

It has also been extremely difficult to uphold and hold together the constitutional guarantees of disestablishment and free practice. Instead, interpretations of religious freedom have tended to split between those who favor disestablishment and a strict "separation of church and state" and those who favor the free practice of religion. In battles over religious freedom, supporters of disestablishment often ignore free exercise and tend to argue that religious differences are irresolvably conflictual and so must be removed to the private sphere while the public sphere remains secular. Those who support free practice are rarely concerned with disestablishment and argue that strictures of privatization unfairly restrain religious expression and so put people with religious worldviews at a disadvantage in relation to their secular counterparts.

This split also tends to reflect a division between secularists who support disestablishment and proponents of religion who support free exercise. But disestablishment and secularism are not synonymous; religionists might well support disestablishment precisely to protect the free exercise of their religion. And free exercise can work on behalf of those secularists who seek the freedom not to exercise any religion at all, just as it can protect particular religious practices. Thus we need not have another battle in which each side holds tightly to its single principle with no means of shifting the terrain between the two sides.

Multiple Visions

If the two sides of religious freedom as outlined in the First Amendment are held together, a new vision of freedom emerges, one in which free exercise includes not just the right to privately "hold" certain beliefs, but the public right to enact and embody one's commitments, while disestablishment ensures that the government does not use its power to establish one particular religion as dominant.

Maintaining the full principle of religious freedom would, however, significantly change the current practice of both disestablishment and free exercise. If disestablishment were taken seriously in this way, the American government could no longer use its power in ways both direct and indirect to maintain Christian dominance in the United States. So, too, public advocates of the free exercise of religion would need to significantly change how they articulate their positions. As matters stand now, most religious advocates argue that their position should be established in law and that it should be so established on the basis of their claim to religious authority. Members of the U.S. Senate, for example, regularly make use of Christian language and quote from the Christian bible in advocating legislation. Were disestablishment in force, public religious expression could become even more profuse, but lawmakers could not make laws by claiming religious truth. In simultaneously respecting disestablishment and free exercise, such expression would have to own itself as religious, and it would also face limits created by other forms of expression.

Taking free exercise seriously would also necessarily challenge the Christian dominance of U.S. public life in so far as free expression is currently claimed most often on behalf of dominant forms of Christianity. As legal scholar Frederick Mark Geddicks reports in his 1995 book, The Rhetoric of Church and State: A Critical Analysis of Religion Clause Jurisprudence, "No Jewish, Muslim, or Native American plaintiff has ever prevailed on a free exercise claim before the Supreme Court." Truly embracing free expression means that ideas from more perspectives would be available in the public sphere. All religious points of view would be expressed in relation to others, and none could claim dominance simply because it represents the supposed view of the majority or because of the supposed Christian or Judeo-Christian heritage of the United States. Such claims do not take seriously the robust nature of religious freedom when free exercise is conjoined with disestablishment.

The idea of multiple visions of the good life is central to democracy. And yet we have not been able to integrate this idea fully into the practice of American democracy. Rather, we shift back and forth between a commitment to a multiplicity of visions and an assumption that majority rule means that those who don't share the dominant tradition should assimilate into it. The protection of minorities—not just of minority rights but of minority participation in public debate—is essential, because the concept of freedom itself depends on it.

I have presented only one alternative interpretation of religious freedom, one that might permit more religious expression in public (something desired by religious advocates). This expression would, however, differ from current practice in that it would support a broader sense of free expression, and it would be within the parameters of an actual rather than a putative disestablishment (something desired by advocates of church-state separation).

Such changes would alter the structure of contemporary debates and shift affinities and alliances. They would not, however, make all participants in the debates happy, especially those who desire the establishment of their particular ideas of Christianity in U.S. government. We must ask whether we as a society are willing to embrace the demands of freedom or whether we prefer a version of freedom that is structured to reinforce dominance.

The ethos of public engagement encouraged by this version of religious freedom also brings it more in line with meanings of academic freedom that focus on free expression (rather than freedom from expression). Legislative efforts like that in Arizona seek to privatize views that might offend students' religious perceptions by offering potentially less offensive "alternatives." Through these means, the students' freedom is supposed to be protected, but the view of freedom that I have sketched out suggests that such a move violates both academic and religious freedom. The Arizona proposal would have limited expression in the classroom, forcing controversial discussion out of the public sphere and into the private one. Students would have been protected from conflict, but they would also have lost the opportunity for public engagement with those who hold different views. Academic engagement with religious viewpoints is part of a free and fair public life, but it is not the approach that proponents of the new freedom" seek. They seek to limit expression by privatizing some views so as to establish dominance for their own.

New Possibilities

As part of our Difficult Dialogues project, Barnard will sponsor a faculty seminar that will ask whether there are other ways to envision freedom, ways that might allow us to pursue a broader effort to create new forms of free public expression and, in so doing, create new avenues for defending academic freedom. We hope to bring out differences that have, until now, been privately held, and create change through mutual exchange.

Rethinking academic freedom will not stop those who wish to use the language of freedom for cynical political purposes, nor will it assuage the resentment of those who believe that the academy is fundamentally opposed to their worldview. Rethinking the meaning of freedom can, however, open new possibilities for those who want to promote free inquiry and respect religious commitment.

In its first year, the seminar will explore why religion presents such a quintessential problem to modern freedom and how the predicament it presents might produce different means of approaching the question of freedom. In its second year, the focus of the seminar will expand beyond the question of religion to other types of conflict, such as those arising over gender, race, ethnicity, nationalism, and language. Intellectually, the seminar will provide a new framework (or frameworks) that will allow for changes in the structure of the conflicts themselves.

The participants will drive the content and conversation by exploring cases they have experienced in their classrooms, research, and conversations with colleagues. Have they been attacked by those who would limit their freedom, for example? Do they have questions about how allowing freedom to others might limit their own expression? Which venues are appropriate for exploring which types of questions?

By moving back and forth between the specifics of the cases and the more abstract questions of freedom and religion, the seminar will remain both grounded in the realities of contemporary conflict and open to expansive possibilities that are often hard to see, and even harder to realize, amid conflict.

The seminar will shape both ongoing research projects and the teaching of each faculty member participant, extending the impact of the seminar well beyond those immediately involved. Not only will all of the students taught by the faculty participants benefit from the insights produced through the seminar, but these discussions will also become part of the life of the Barnard community as a whole.

In the end, our project aims to change the culture of Barnard so that civility is seen not as a reason to avoid difficult conversations but as a rule of engagement for such interactions; freedom and mutual respect—not simply "tolerance"—for difference are the goals.

Important curricular efforts that expand the intellectual scope and impact of the project will accompany the seminar. Barnard religion scholars John Stratton Hawley and Randall Balmer will develop and team-teach a seminar titled "Religion Versus the Academy," which will address the challenges of teaching about religion (specifically Hinduism and Christianity) in an academic setting. Religion professors must apply the same rigorous critical sensibilities to their subject as they would to any other in the academy. At the same time, they must recognize that the classroom will probably include some people (the instructor among them) whose histories, identities, practices, and beliefs are implicated in the subjects being studied.

Educating students about religion in a world where religion matters deeply to many people requires extraordinary sensitivity, and the process often generates conflict. Religion professors cannot, however, shrink from these conflicts, a fact that will be covered in the seminar. Hawley will share with students specific challenges he has faced in teaching a course titled "Hinduism Here," and Balmer will explore the "intelligent design" debate.

Another key component of the Barnard project will be the development of an addition to a program called "Reacting to the Past." Pioneered by Barnard, the program consists of elaborate games, set in the past, in which students are assigned "roles" with "victory objectives" informed by classic texts in the history of ideas. Existing games in the "Reacting" series include a trial of Socrates, set in fifth-century

Greece, B.C.E., with Plato's Republic as the main evidentiary text and a game about defining India as a nation, set in 1945, with the Koran and the literature of Hindu revival and Islamic nationalism as the main texts. The program's founder, historian Mark Carnes, will direct a team of scholars, activists, and members of international organizations in developing a new game, "The Founding of Israel, 1947–48." Student roles will be developed and documents gathered to inform and enrich the game in a safe but challenging environment. The "Reacting" pedagogy will help to break down myths and immerse students in the different politics that shaped Middle Eastern identities.

These curricular efforts take on some of the most difficult dialogues in the world today, but such challenging topics are the necessary testing grounds for any concept of academic freedom robust enough to sustain public engagement in the current climate. As Barnard's initial explorations around this project showed, mainstream understandings of conflict encourage community members to maintain views that sustain conflicts without engaging in any communal process around them. As a result, issues tend to "flare up" periodically as some incident pierces the patina of civility.

But these flare-ups typically lead to little or no change in either the positions or the relations of the participants. By engaging in conversations around conflicts, the project hopes to move below the surface of civility before another incident makes further conversation more difficult. In addition, the goal is to lay a groundwork for continuing engagement long after the project's conclusion.

Engaging with difference in a spirit of curiosity, integrity, and courage is basic to the academic freedom that defines the intellectual life of great academic institutions. Such institutions must be spaces within which faculty and students can freely express minority points of view and controversial ideas and engage in difficult conversations in an atmosphere of mutual respect. Graduates of such institutions will, in turn, be better prepared to provide leadership to question—What is the meaning of academic freedom?—we hope to create opportunities for public engagement that challenge this polarization and increase free exchange.

Notes

1. For a list of state bills, see the AAUP Web site.

2. See Love the Sin: Sexual Regulation and the Limits of Religious Tolerance, the 2003 book I co-authored with Ann Pellegrini. Many other examples appear regularly in the conduct of the U.S. government, from debates over whether the congressional chaplain can be a non-Protestant, to the Bible reading by Sen. Robert Byrd on the floor of the U.S. Senate to support his vote in favor of the 1996 Defense of Marriage Act, to U.S. Supreme Court decisions that depend on religious or Christian morality.

Jakobsen is director of the Center for Research on Women and principal investigator for the Difficult Dialogues project at Barnard College, the subject of her Academe article. She can be reached at jjakobsen@barnard.edu.

Getting Religion in the PublicResearch University

Michigan tackles religious diversity at many levels in this Difficult Dialogues project.

By Matthew L Kaplan

Related Item
Campus Conflicts

The University of Michigan has been at the forefront of efforts to create a campus learning environment in which all students, faculty, and staff feel respected and valued. In two widely publicized cases decided in 2003, the university defended its affirmative action policies before the U.S. Supreme Court on the premise that racial and ethnic diversity contributes significantly to student learning and prepares students for life in a diverse democracy.1 Recent developments involving higher education and religion have made it clear that religious diversity is equally important for student learning. Last January, we received a grant from the Ford Foundation, as part of its Difficult Dialogue initiative, to help us create an environment on campus in which religious difference is seen as an opportunity for study and exchange, rather than a source of silence, animosity, or fear. The grant period runs through February 2008.

Like most other public institutions today, Michigan conceives of itself as largely secular. Although religion played a defining role for students and faculty early in the university's history—it was not until the late nineteenth century, under the leadership of President James Angell, that students were released from mandatory daily attendance at chapel—religion lost its central role on campus as Michigan increasingly modeled itself on the German research university and articulated its dedication to academic freedom. The activities of intellectual inquiry and the transmission of knowledge came to be seen as separate from issues of religious faith: dispassionate investigation entails purposefully suspending individual beliefs in the pursuit of knowledge, and a critical perspective on all fixed beliefs became central to disciplinary inquiry. Such a perspective has been particularly important in the sciences, where research sometimes challenges religious explanations of the origins and nature of the natural world.

Today, religion is certainly not absent from our campus. Michigan has a strong academic program in religion that includes several nationally recognized scholars. But these disciplines take an academic approach to religion, not the faith-based approach relied upon at seminaries and universities with strong religious affiliations. Institutional funds do not support the various campus chaplaincies and religious organizations at Michigan, and personal religious views, practices, and identities have been treated as private matters. This tradition of institutional separation from issues of faith is, however, being challenged by growing political and social movements that emphasize the importance of religious faith in all aspects of intellectual life, including the sciences.

On January 27, 2006, the online magazine Inside Higher Ed captured this perspective in an article titled "Faith on the Quad." The article quoted William M. Sullivan, a senior scholar at the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, who explained why twenty-five scholars from different disciplines and faiths have been working on a new statement about the role of religion on campus. "To live in America is to live in a religiously charged atmosphere," Sullivan said, "and that includes colleges—whether they like it or not."

News stories about religion and higher education are now common. Whether they concern specific incidents (such as when residence assistants at the University of Wisconsin were first denied permission then allowed to offer Bible study in their dorm rooms) or national trends (surveys finding increased spirituality and religiosity among first-year students), these reports highlight the timeliness of the Ford Foundation's efforts to stimulate productive dialogue about religion.

Campus Conflicts

Recently, Michigan's Center for Research on Learning and Teaching held the first event under the Difficult Dialogues banner, a seminar for faculty titled "Student Religion, Faith, and Spirituality in the Classroom and Beyond: How Do Faculty Respond?" A group of thirty faculty members from across campus showed up to share their perspectives, struggles, and strategies. The problems reported were truly striking. See "Campus Conflicts," the sidebar accompanying this article, for details.

On a larger scale, the campus climate at Michigan sometimes leads to tensions based not solely on religion but also on the intersection of multiple identities and viewpoints, such as sexual orientation, ethnicity, or political conviction. For example, a 2004 ballot initiative in Michigan to ban gay marriage exposed tensions between and within campus religious communities and those related to sexual orientation. Conflicts have also arisen in connection with the political situation in the Middle East, which is especially fraught at Michigan. The campus has one of the largest Jewish student bodies in the country and is part of a geographical area that is home to the biggest Arab-heritage community outside the Middle East. Like many other universities, Michigan has seen vandalism and hate speech directed against Muslim, Jewish, and Arab students.

The implications for academic freedom are clear. We have already witnessed ways in which campus tensions might have a chilling effect on topics covered in classes and the freedom of faculty and students to express their viewpoints or engage students in critical reflection. For example, one faculty member teaching a course on a sacred text was confronted by a student who disagreed with his approach and wanted to record lectures in order to document "bias." Conservative activist David Horowitz, who operates a well-funded campaign alleging bias in the classroom, listed several scholars of religion—Marc Ellis (Jewish liberation theology), Amina McCloud (Islam), and Michael Eric Dyson (race, religion, and African American culture)—in his recent book, The Professors: The 101 Most Dangerous Academics in America.

Although such threats of surveillance and exposure to political notoriety may not affect a tenured senior professor, what impact do they have on a junior faculty member, a graduate student new to the classroom, or a student at any level who is considering a field of study? Courses in the life sciences or courses that treat religion from an academic perspective may challenge students' worldviews and lead them to reconcile their preconceptions and beliefs with new and unfamiliar points of view. How do faculty remain intellectually honest and help students who are struggling to make sense of what they are learning? And what is the position of students and faculty who are not connected to a faith tradition? Do we need to ensure that expanded dialogue about religion and spirituality does not impinge on their freedom from religion, on both a personal and a curricular level?

As a result of such uncertainties and tensions, the role of religion and personal faith in civic and scientific life often remains unexplored, and important learning opportunities are missed. The timing of our Difficult Dialogues grant turned out to be auspicious. When we received the grant, we had just completed a campus-wide "theme semester" that explored the cultural treasures of the Arab Middle East across many disciplines. For the past fifteen years, Michigan has successfully organized theme semesters on topics ranging from conflict and community to Brown v. Board of Education. Theme semesters are sponsored by Michigan's College of Literature, Science, and the Arts, the largest undergraduate college on campus. They consist of course offerings as well as co-curricular activities focused on the chosen topic.

We decided to build on the cross-campus success of theme semesters by embedding grant-funded activities within a planned winter 2006 theme semester titled "Exploring Evolution." The activities included a university-wide seminar titled "When Faith Meets Science: An Evolving Dialogue on New Choices and New Technologies." We will incorporate additional grant-funded activities within the theme for fall 2006 and winter 2007, "The Theory and Practice of Citizenship: From the Local to the Global," including roundtables on the role of faith in prompting community service.

Grant Activities

The Center for Research on Learning and Teaching will take the lead in coordinating the activities funded by Difficult Dialogues. The center collaborates with all nineteen schools and colleges at the university to encourage and support good teaching on the Ann Arbor campus. The grant activities described below will involve faculty and staff members, students, and community members.

The Ford Faculty Fellows Program will bring together faculty members from different disciplines who will pursue projects related to religion in their disciplines. One group will critically examine aspects of religion and faith, a type of inquiry now common for subjects such as race, ethnicity, gender, and sexual orientation. Many of these projects will involve course development on topics such as the role of Islam in the African American community, ties between secularity and modernity, and the relationship between religion, nationalism, and violence. Other faculty fellows will collect data on the role of religion in professional schools and develop suggestions for pedagogies suited to the examination of difficult issues related to religion.

The Center for Research on Learning and Teaching's Players Theatre Program, which develops interactive performances on diversity and institutional transformation for faculty and graduate students, will create a sketch about religious pluralism. Research for the sketch will rely on focus groups and interviews with faculty members, students, and community members. The final sketch will be presented to audiences of instructors (faculty and teaching assistants) at campus-wide and disciplinary-specific events (such as departmental retreats).

Through a series of roundtable discussions, the Edward Ginsberg Center for Community Service and Learning will explore the complex relationship between faith communities and university-sponsored community service. One set of round tables will invite faculty members, students, and community members to discuss the relationship between specific religious traditions and the idea of service. In a second set of roundtables, an invited group will discuss the involvement of public universities with faith-based organizations engaged in community service.

The Life Sciences and Society Program will host forum discussions with students, faculty members, and community religious leaders on ethical and religious concerns associated with advances in the life sciences, such as genetics, genomics, stem cell research, and prenatal genetic testing. Each forum will encourage discussion of the diversity of perspectives and ethical, moral, and ethnic considerations related to the topic at hand. One such forum was offered as part of "When Faith Meets Science," the seminar mentioned above. The program will create a set of curricular modules on forum topics that can be used in classes as stand-alone presentations.

The Program on Intergroup Relations sponsors dialogues that bring together students across identity groups—race, class, religion, or sexual orientation, for example—to work toward a greater understanding of group identity, explore intergroup conflicts, and imagine ways to build multicultural communities. For the Difficult Dialogues project, the program will create new dialogue courses with an explicit focus on understanding religious pluralism in a diverse democracy. Dialogues might bring together members of different religious groups or those interested in analyzing the intersection of faith and social identity.

Faculty members from the Michigan Community Scholars Program will focus on religion in their monthly seminar, aiming to develop or revise undergraduate courses. They will also sponsor exchanges about pedagogical strategies for facilitating difficult dialogues, navigation of religious differences within the university community, and conflicts between personal religious practice and the demands of academia. All residence assistants at the university must participate in a ten-week intensive course titled "Social Psychology in Community Settings." The Office of Residence Education will revise this course to focus more explicitly on religion and sexual orientation so that residence assistants are better prepared to facilitate productive exchanges on these topics.

Since 1994, Provost's Seminars on Teaching have brought together between 100 and 150 faculty members semiannually for lively and substantive discussion of teaching and learning. In winter 2007, at the end of the Difficult Dialogues project, we will hold a provost's seminar on the role of religion in teaching and learning to share the results of the project with the campus community and, we hope, to stimulate further activity on campus after the grant period concludes. We will include students and community leaders in this seminar to broaden the dialogue.

Taken together, these activities represent an ambitious attempt to explore the role of religion and religious pluralism at a public research university. Although the time frame of the grant is relatively short, it is helping us to build on the university's solid record of grappling with difficult issues. Only by engaging with these conflicts can we fulfill the highest aspirations of the university: to prepare students to assume leadership roles on campus and in their communities and to embrace and model respect for diversity, including religious pluralism.

Note

1. In Grutter v. Bollinger and Gratz v. Bollinger, white students filed class-action challenges to the University of Michigan's affirmative action policies and the admissions processes of its law and undergraduate schools. The students alleged that the university discriminated against them by using different standards to admit students of different races. On June 23, 2003, the U.S. Supreme Court upheld in a 5 to 4 decision the law school admissions program, finding diversity in higher education to be a compelling state interest. The Court noted the individuality of review in the law school admissions process and held that diversity can be a "plus" factor in admissions if it is considered in the context of a "highly individualized, holistic review of each applicant's file, giving serious consideration to all the ways an applicant might contribute to a diverse educational environment." In contrast, in a 6 to 3 decision in Gratz, the Court struck down Michigan's undergraduate admissions program. The decision upheld, however, the concept of affirmative action and diversity as a compelling interest. But it found Michigan's consideration of race in its undergraduate admissions not to be tailored narrowly enough to "achieve the interest in educational diversity" that the university claimed as the justification for its program.

Kaplan is associate director of the Center for Research on Learning and Teaching at the University of Michigan. He is principal investigator for the university's Difficult Dialogues project, the subject of his Academe article. The project's Web address is http://www.crlt.umich.edu/DD. Kaplan can be reached at mlkaplan@umich.edu.

Acting Against Oppression

The Practicing Pluralism project uses interactive theater to address campus climate issues in Portland.

By Jeannie LaFrance And Jan Abu Shakrah

The lone African American student in a classroom sinks lower in her chair as the class watches a movie about the history of racism against African Americans in Oregon. When a racist cartoon image appears on the screen, the class erupts into laughter. The laughter quickly subsides to an uncomfortable silence, and all eyes turn to the African American student, who hastily gathers her books and leaves the room. The teacher chases the student and awkwardly apologizes. "Stop!" yells someone from the audience. The audience?

The scene is actually Portland Community College, and the students are participating in the Illumination Project, a yearlong academic theater program that tackles issues of oppression through interactive classroom and community performances. Participants write original interactive plays depicting incidents of oppression in students' lives. The project is a central aspect of Practicing Pluralism, for which Portland Community College received a Ford Foundation Difficult Dialogues grant. Practicing Pluralism, which began in March 2006, aims to create an atmosphere of open inquiry on our increasingly diverse campus in which controversial topics can be discussed with respect for different people and perspectives.

The program will build on the Illumination Project by extending its influence and integrating its principles in new initiatives, including a component focused on religious pluralism and academic freedom. New features will include campus-wide forums and workshops on academic freedom and religious and cultural pluralism; development of a pre- and post-performance curriculum to accompany performances; introduction of a Web site from which faculty can download curricular materials; and development of learning communities that concentrate on religious and cultural pluralism.

A Place of Dichotomies

Historically, Oregon has been home to a predominantly white, Christian population. Over the past several years, however, the metropolitan Portland area's religious and racial diversity has increased significantly, as has debate over the connection between sexuality and religion. Between 1990 and 2000, the area's ethnic minority population increased 119 percent, a much higher rate of increase than that in the overall U.S. population during the same time.

Over 20 percent of the Portland area's population belongs to a minority group, and more than 80 percent of the immigrants who arrive in Oregon each year come to Portland.

Portland has become a place of dichotomies. It is the cradle of the Patriot Movement, the project of a white supremacist Christian-identified group. At the same time, it is one of the most welcoming havens for trans-gendered people in the country. Similarly, Multnomah County, which encompasses most of Portland, was one of the first U.S. jurisdictions to offer same-sex marriage licenses even though Oregon has an extensive history of legal attempts to deny civil rights to the sexual-minority community. More than twenty-five local and statewide ordinances and ballot measures proposed over seventeen years attempted to accomplish this purpose, culminating with a 2004 amendment to the Oregon constitution outlawing same-sex marriage. The rise of these dichotomies and the growing diversity of our community has increased the debate on campus about religion, culture, and homophobia and accentuated the need for our faculty, students, and staff to hone their ability to engage in constructive dialogues.

Portland Community College is the largest postsecondary institution in Oregon and one of the biggest community colleges in the country, enrolling over 91,000 students in 2004–05. It is a public, two-year college with three campuses (Cascade, Rock Creek, and Sylvania), and it offers lower-division college transfer and professional-technical programs and adult, community, and developmental education. The college is the most racially and ethnically diverse institution of higher education in Oregon; more than 25 percent of its enrollees are students of color.

The college serves many students from groups that have been historically underrepresented in higher education: not only are 25 percent of its students of color, but nearly 60 percent of its degree-seeking enrollees are first-generation college students. Five thousand are enrolled in English as a Second Language and English as a Non-Native Language programs, and one out of every five students attending the college at least half time is from a low-income family.

The college's mission is "to provide education in an atmosphere that encourages the full realization of each individual's potential, by offering students of all ages, races, cultures, economic levels, and previous educational experience opportunities for personal growth and attainment of their goals." The college cannot achieve this mission if students and faculty do not feel comfortable discussing controversial issues.

Theater of the Oppressed

The Illumination Project was founded in 2001 by Deborah Evind, coordinator of the college's Sylvania Women's Resource Center; Claire Oliveros, coordinator of the Multicultural Center; and Jeannie LaFrance, founding director of Act for Action, a nonprofit organization dedicated to the use of theater for education and social justice.

Each year, the project trains twenty student educators, who in turn educate the college community. Student educators take a three-term course covering issues of race, class, gender, community building, conflict resolution, and civic engagement. They then write and perform plays on topics such as anti-Arab or anti-Muslim bias in the United States following the attacks of September 11, 2001; hate crimes against sexual minorities; date rape; "coming out" as a sexual minority; and problems of race and class for first-generation college students. By the time they begin their performances, the students are prepared to provide education and leadership around difficult issues.

Performances are based on a nontraditional theater style called "theater of the oppressed," which is used to promote community-centered problem solving. Student educators first perform a play once without interruption. The second time around, members of the audience are invited to stop the action when they see an act of oppression, substitute themselves for members of the cast, and start the action again with the intent to find a way to deal with the situation effectively. Cast and audience members improvise the new situation as it develops. The intended result is a new understanding among everyone about how to recognize, confront, and resolve oppressive situations as they occur.

After each intervention, a facilitator debriefs everyone involved—the audience member who intervened, the actors, and the rest of the audience—and then the play continues to the next "intervenable" scene. In a realistic yet safe atmosphere, actors and audience members rehearse situations so as to build communication skills and understand alternatives.

Since its inception, the project has involved more than 4,500 audience members, approximately 95 percent of whom felt the performances prepared them to take action during difficult situations and to create a more inclusive academic community. "Personally, when looking at racism, I had my opinion on how things were, and I didn't really think there was anything I could do about it," says student educator Chauntey Cruz, who played the African American student in the play described at the beginning of this article. "Race used to be something where I'd hope it wouldn't come up in conversation. But in doing the Illumination Project, I know there is something I can do about racism. I can talk to my friends. I can have open discussion with anybody."

By involving so many members of the campus community in such problem solving, the project creates a unique, experiential foundation for teaching and learning about difficult issues. The project's approach has garnered enthusiastic support from faculty members. "I have taken most of my classes to the Illumination Project plays, and they are a tremendous learning tool," comments S. Rowan Wolf. "The plays open up dialogue and get students thinking about oppression in their lives and environment. . . . A student shared during class that during a conflict at her apartment complex, she was able to step forward and stop it thanks to what she learned from the Illumination Project."

Difficult Dialogue

As noted above, Practicing Pluralism will build on the Illumination Project by making possible campus-wide forums and workshops, new curricular materials, and the development of a Web site and learning communities focusing on religious and cultural pluralism. By encouraging professors to engage with these new features, Practicing Pluralism will help the Illumination Project cement a stronger relationship with the college's faculty. It will also help faculty improve their skills in facilitating difficult conversations and their ability to reinforce the competencies addressed by Illumination Project performances in the classroom.

On the institutional level, the college expects Practicing Pluralism to improve the campus climate, creating an environment that better supports different religions and cultures and academic freedom. Anticipated long-term changes include fewer incidents of bias and censorship and more student unions and clubs serving diverse cultures and religions. Evaluation of project activities will also inform the ongoing work of the President's Diversity Committee. To help others replicate the success of the Illumination Project, the college will develop a training DVD and guidebook, disseminate materials to other educational institutions, and develop a Web site featuring updated project curricula and resources. Project leaders will also take performances and materials to local high schools and colleges in the Portland area and local, regional, and national conferences.

Exposure to the work of Practicing Pluralism and the Illumination Project will help students, staff, and faculty become active and inclusive members of Portland Community College and our greater community. We also anticipate a ripple effect as thousands of our students matriculate to four-year institutions and take jobs. We'll close with the words of one student, Erin-Aja Grant, who gives us hope that our goals are within reach:

When I first entered the Illumination Project, I was unclear on how this class and the plays could teach me about oppression, since as a woman of color, I live this life everyday. I was wrong. What I didn't realize was for the first time I would see how good the world could be without shame. . . . The Illumination Project creates a classroom that is truly hate-free. . . . [It] has allowed me to learn with my brain and act with my heart. I am privileged that I was part of a group that can confidently say we are more enlightened today and we have created and will continue to create positive social change.

LaFrance coordinates Portland Community College's Illumination Project, an academic theater program that tackles issues of oppression through interactive classroom and community performances. The college received a Difficult Dialogues grant to extend the influence of this successful project on the campus and beyond. The project's Web site is http://www.pcc.edu/resources/illumination. LaFrance can be reached at jlafranc@pcc.edu. Shakrah is the faculty chair of the economics, political science, and sociology department of Portland Community College's Sylvania campus. She is staff adviser to the Muslim Student Association and has been a leader in peace and conflict resolution in the Middle East and in Portland. She can be reached at jabushak@pcc.edu.

Inquiry, Respect, and Dissent

This initiative at Irvine combines coursework, public events, and leadership training to foster respect for divergent views.

By Manuel N. Gómez

Like most other research universities, the University of California, Irvine, has found its way into the headlines over the years. Most of our coverage has been favorable, but some of it has concerned and perplexed us. Take two events held on campus this past February 27 and 28. The first was a discussion between the Palestinian ambassador to the United Kingdom, Manuel Hassassian, and Edward Kaufman, former executive director of the Harry S. Truman Research Institute for the Advancement of Peace at Hebrew University. The two men explored the possibilities for peace between Israel and Palestine, often forwarding distinctly opposing viewpoints with the civility one would expect in an academic setting.

The following evening, the UCI College Republicans and the United American Committee (an external organization) co-hosted an exhibition of the Danish cartoons that had so recently been the focus of rioting and international controversy. The UCI Muslim Student Union strongly opposed this event, and campus administrators received multiple calls and e-mail messages from community members protesting it. Exchanges inside the event were decidedly spirited and coalesced primarily around articulations of outrage, insult, and unmediated conflicts of opinion.

Although participants addressed many of the same issues on February 27 and 28, the atmosphere at the two gatherings was palpably different. One fostered thoughtful and civil discourse, while the other gave rise to resentment and hostility. While the dialogue between Hassassian and Kaufman received no press coverage beyond the UCI student newspaper and a local newspaper, the second event found its way into media outlets in London, Taipei, Tel Aviv, Washington, and elsewhere and brought CNN and other television news stations to the campus.

That the media found only the second event—the "unveiling" of the Danish cartoons—newsworthy reveals an irony perhaps missed by our society: despite compelling, lamenting, dramatic calls for more avenues to understanding and reconciliation, we tend to congregate most habitually at the intersections of conflict and controversy. We seem to have become, paradoxically, more comfortable in our distress and in the disturbance of others than in those places where common ground and reconciliation are more likely to occur.

Although the price higher education pays for becoming the focus of discord is not as steep as the cost of conflict to societies, the toll on colleges and universities is rising. Campuses like UCI are increasingly seen as trouble spots of intolerance and boiling pots of extremist ideologies, as exemplified by conservative activist David Horowitz's recently published book, The Professors: The 101 Most Dangerous Academics in America. Increasingly, professors like the ones Horowitz targets are characterized as anti-American and, in some circles, even terrorism sympathizers.

The intervention of interested constituencies external to the university has meant that our university's educational programming and conscientious attention to the state of our campus community and security are often overlooked. Instead, the public sometimes perceives us as woefully out of balance or on the wrong moral path. The academic freedom we know to be fundamental to our mission and our educational purpose is at times seen as "dangerous."

The bitterest irony for higher education is that it is the very freedom of our forum that permits a hearing for extremist ideas. But only when we have a true diversity of ideas—even those that offend our most basic sense of decency and democracy—can we find the balance that promotes peaceful resolution of the most contentious conflicts facing us, whether they are religious, social, or political. Of course, the openness of the public higher education forum also allows members of the broader community to engage issues of interest to them. Over the years, UCI has increasingly reached out to individuals, organizations, and groups off campus.

Toward Common Ground

It is fortunate that although universities often find themselves at the center of controversy and conflict these days, they are also uniquely positioned to work openly and directly toward dialogue and common ground. With funding from the Ford Foundation's Difficult Dialogues initiative, UCI has embarked on "Imagining the Future: Dissent, Dialogue, and the Freedom to Inquire," a comprehensive intra-campus partnership designed to model and maintain our tradition of free intellectual inquiry, open debate, and dissent.

The idea for the project arose gradually over the past few years, as tensions on our campus increased following the attacks of September 11, 2001. Although political and ideological conflict had erupted from time to time on the campus before September 11, the arguments became increasingly contentious afterward, especially over the Israel-Palestine conflict and differences among Christian, Jewish, and Muslim ideologies nationally and internationally.

Campus debates also attracted more attention from organizations and individuals external to the campus community, some of whom have taken a keen interest in how students and faculty have handled these issues. Questions about the limits of free speech and academic freedom have been posed, often with strong opinions on the subject, attended by concerns about how the university administration has managed, negotiated, mediated, or otherwise responded to demands that various student-sponsored programs, protests, and other expressive events on campus be forbidden, intervened in, or condemned.

The events of February 27 and 28 only underlined the purpose and need for "Imagining the Future." The February 27 dialogue between Manuel Hassassian and Edward Kaufman was one of the first "Imagining the Future" events. It was well attended by a diverse audience, including some members of the press (local media had been invited).During an intense, engaging, and civil discussion, Kaufman offered a striking and ambitious proposition: he suggested that instead of "importing" the conflict between Israelis and Palestinians to UCI, we should all be striving to "export" the values of civil dialogue and mutual understanding to the Middle East.

This "paradigm shift" (Kaufman's terms) is, of course, part of what "Imagining the Future" is meant to facilitate. But even if we do not aim so high as to influence Middle Eastern society and politics, we hope to instill respect for the values intrinsic to academic communities—free inquiry, rigorous and rational analysis and debate, and diversity of viewpoints and intellectual interests—in discussions of provocative, complex, and all-too often polarizing issues and events.

The Project

"Imagining the Future" involves several academic and administrative departments and incorporates coursework, public events and forums, undergraduate student leadership development, and graduate teaching assistant training. It started in January 2006 with three new undergraduate study options. The first undergraduate component, a lower-division survey course, "Religious Diversity and Conflict," was developed by religious studies professor Joseph McKenna and UCI's conflict resolution faculty. The second is a two-quarter pilot seminar, "Imagining the Future," and the third is an upper-division seminar series, the "Politics and Ethics of Difference," taught by Kristen Renwick Monroe, who describes the seminar elsewhere in this issue of Academe. Edward Kaufman and Manuel Hassassian are also participating in "Imagining the Future" as visiting faculty from the University of Maryland, where they have co-taught a course titled "Conflict Resolution: The Israeli-Palestinian Experiment" since 1992. Because conflict resolution is central to the prospect of furthering dialogue, Paula Garb, an expert on conflict resolution and co-director of UCI's Center for Citizen Peace-building, is developing teaching seminars for faculty and graduate teaching assistants.

The campus was fortunate to already have an infrastructure in which to situate this program, although the level of coordination, support, and participation the Difficult Dialogues initiative makes possible is a model on our campus. It is also helpful that the project's goals coincide with our overall academic mission: we aim to foster academic engagement and civic leadership among our students, create a greater understanding of academic freedom, sustain intellectual diversity and vitality within the UCI community, and promote ties between the campus and the larger community.

One of the project's first major events touched on several parts of this mission. In May, UCI hosted a conference titled "Why Israel? Why Palestine?" It was co-sponsored by the National Jewish Center for Learning and Leadership (CLAL), the American Society for Muslim Advancement (ASMA), the UCI Difficult Dialogues initiative, the UCI Center for Citizen Peace-building, and the Cordoba Initiative, a multi-faith organization that aims to improve the relationship between the Islamic world and America. Conceptualized by John Bennett of Cordoba in collaboration with Rabbi Bradley

Hirschfield of CLAL and Iman Feisel Abdul Rauf of ASMA, this ambitious conference included participants from around the world. It aimed to bridge some of the gaps in political, social, and historical understanding between Palestinians and Israelis. Like all other activities included in "Imagining the Future," it was about airing controversial views in a way that allows for passionate debate and mutual respect and about subjecting those views to the rigors of scholarly analysis. Although some of the ideas put forward offended those strongly opposed to them, we facilitated an environment in which the expression of such feelings was channeled into productive exchange instead of disintegrating into unanswered accusations and unchallenged monologues.

Not surprisingly, as the event drew near, questions were asked about the appropriateness of the title and other details. We understand that our commitment to free and open inquiry means that little will go unchallenged within "Imagining the Future," either internally or externally. Responding to queries, Hirschfield pointed to the potential of such events, couched in the context of Irvine's own development. "If it is possible to transform this space [UCI] in forty years," he said, "then, by definition, if we applied that kind of imagination to the Middle East, imagine what the next forty years would bring." As for the event's title, Rauf provided this insightful analysis: "There is a power in asking why that no other question unlocks, because, at the end of the day, to ask other people why is to tell them that they count more than their ideology."

And although "Why Israel? Why Palestine?"—like the exchange last February between Kaufman and Hassassian—enjoyed less media coverage than the College Republicans' unveiling of the Danish cartoons, we will continue to foster meetings on the common ground of free expression and passionate participation, convinced that we can build stronger community ties in dialogue rather than in conflict.

*Gómez is vice chancellor for student affairs at the University of California, Irvine. He is also principal investigator for the campus Difficult Dialogues project about which he writes in*Academe*. He can be reached at mngomez@uci.edu.*

Can Empathy Be Taught?

Irvine students learned to combat prejudice by thinking themselves into another's position.

By Kristen Renwick Monroe

If you just learn a single trick . . . you'll get along a lot better with all kinds of folks.You never really understand a person until you consider things from his point of view . . . until you climb inside of his skin and walk around in it.

—Harper Lee

To Kill a Mockingbird

Prejudice and discrimination are ugly cousins, haunting humankind like the evil fairy who appears unbidden to curse the young princess.1 Is education the good fairy, bestowing tools to overcome this curse? A course I taught in winter 2006 at the University of California, Irvine—one of the most ethnically diverse campuses in the United States—addressed this question.2

The course, part of a pilot program funded by the Ford Foundation's Difficult Dialogues initiative, asked why some differences— ethnicity, race, religion—become politically significant while others—height, hair color, weight—do not. Why are linguistic differences sometimes politically relevant and sometimes not? What about gender or sexual orientation? What encourages respect for or tolerance of differences judged to be ethically and politically salient, leading some to reach out across divides that isolate others? These questions take on a poignant immediacy when we read news reports about continuing prejudice and discrimination at home and abroad and ongoing ethnic, religious, and sectarian violence, including genocide and war. Students need to consider these questions as they enter a shrinking world that will expose them to people from diverse cultures, religions, and ethnicities.

In the course, I encouraged students to think deeply about their own attitudes toward people judged to be "different." Students began by measuring their own awareness of prejudice toward different groups, using quantitative and qualitative measures. On the first day of the course, they explored this topic in an in-class essay, which they rewrote and expanded over the next week. Students also completed—in private—a series of implicit-association tests designed to measure the difference between conscious and subconscious attitudes toward prejudice. Students were encouraged to discuss their reactions to these tests in class, but they were not required to talk about their personal results unless they felt comfortable doing so.

The course itself considered prejudice within a political framework, asking about the political and ethical response to difference. The pedagogical premises were threefold:

1. The key to understanding prejudice and discrimination is not to think of differences as intrinsic and immutable; instead, one should think about why moral salience is accorded to some differences;

2. The psychological literature on prejudice suggests that seeing the world from another's perspective is critical to determining why and how our perceptions of others shape our treatment of them; and

3. Differences appear to become politicized through the cognitive categorization and classification of others in relation to ourselves.3

I thus designed the course to encourage the empathic involvement that leads to seeing the world through the eyes of the "other," hoping that this process would increase understanding and tolerance of "differences."

Different Vantage Point

Another pedagogical premise of the course was that students learn best not by listening to lectures but by being forced to examine their own preconceptions in the light of empirical evidence. The class read traditional material on differences, such as social psychological work on prejudice, discrimination, and identity. I gave special attention to social identity theory and self-categorization theory and also assigned novels to supply the personal link that psychologists now tell us provides the emotional clout to change opinions. We read Amy Tan's The Joy Luck Club (on the experience of Asian women, since UCI is 49 percent Asian) and Ralph Ellison's Invisible Man (on prejudice against African Americans). One typical assignment linked philosophical work in ethics (Immanuel Kant), social psychological work on identity, and self-categorization theory to Invisible Man by asking students to describe a time when they were made to feel invisible and a time when they made someone else feel invisible. Students were encouraged—but not required—to share their essays with the class.

Because much work in ethics suggests that empathic involvement with another heightens awareness of the other's humanity, I also required students to interview a member of a group that is often omitted in discussions of the politics of difference and that is often underrepresented or discriminated against in contemporary American society: the elderly. None of us is born into this group, each of us fears becoming part of it, but most of us—if we are lucky—eventually move into and out of it, depending on chance, situation, and the kindness of strangers. My goal was to see if empathic involvement would help students see the world through another person's eyes and thus change the students' views of members of this group.

Many of my students were first-generation immigrants from Asia or the Middle East. Many lived in extended families and were highly sensitized to the ways elders are treated differently by different cultures. Our study of these cultural differences attempted to disentangle what is "intrinsic" and immutable about becoming old (the loss of physical vigor, for example) from what is not. I designed the study specifically to help students see that although some attributes exist independently of social construction, many are culturally imposed and hence are neither intrinsic nor immutable.

Before beginning their interviews, students considered what part of the "elderly identity" relates to differences that are "real," such as declining health and the deaths of a spouse or friends, and which differences exist mainly in the eyes of others, such as when an otherwise spry elderly person is treated as elderly simply because of white hair. Do other groups have attributes that are "real" and that threaten our identity, as the literature often suggests is the belief underlying prejudice? Or do we have more in common with, and thus less to fear from, others than we realize?4 Answering this key question helped students understand the importance of categorization and the according of moral salience to other groups in our society.

The importance of approaching differences this way, of course, is normative as well as intellectual. To the extent that such differences are a function of cognitive construction, their ethical and political impact can be muted and reshaped through the kind of contact and understanding we hoped to foster in this course.

Chipping Away at Prejudice

Students did extensive writing as part of the course and were trained in interviewing, editing, and the writing of narratives as a tool for understanding the psychology of another. After training in this technique, students focused closely on one person whom they would interview. Each student constructed a list of questions, conducted and transcribed the interview, edited the transcription to capture the speaker's voice, and developed the interview into a paper that used the speaker's voice to inform the student's analysis of the speaker's mindset, emotional terrain, values, beliefs, and worldview.

We began with age because it is a relatively noncontroversial difference associated with prejudice. I hoped that it would act as a wedge to open broader discussions of prejudice that might be too tough to tackle in a group of students who would not know whether they could trust either the professor or their fellow students. The process seemed to work well, and the general consensus was that "old people are just young people who've been around a long time." Perhaps more important, the exercise helped us have surprisingly frank discussions about the nature of prejudice, which seemed to consist— students decided—of denying others their individuality and rights as individuals.

Prejudice, students felt, is related to fear, often of the unknown. "When we live in separate enclaves, we never get to know people as individuals. We always see them as 'the other,' and it's easier to believe what people say about people you don't know," one African American man said. Students described the eye-opening aspect of prejudice, arguing that most people do not want to admit they have prejudice.

"Can we change it?" I asked.

Ronald (Jewish male): No. Prejudice will always be there. You can't overcome hate with a few classes.

Arnia (Armenian female): I disagree. You can unlearn anything you want to unlearn.

Ronald: But the problem is that you have to want to change it. What is it that makes you want to change?

Arnia: Look at my case. I'm Armenian, and I lost family in the genocide [perpetrated by Turks against Armenians] early in the twentieth century. I hated Turks as a result of this. I had to confront my prejudice, learn that not all Turks are bad. I did it, so I know that people can change.

Ronald: But there is always prejudice in your subconscious.

Arnia: Maybe. But you can change the behavior, and that's what is important.

Ronald: Well, then, what makes people want to change, if this desire is the critical factor?

Arnia had several answers to this question: First, you have to realize that prejudice limits you. It traps you in a cycle of anger and hate and keeps you from knowing people in the despised group as individuals, some of whom might be individuals you would like, once you got beyond your prejudice and saw them as individuals. Second, empathy. Would you like someone to clump you into a group and not see you as an individual? Would you want to be discriminated against, treated badly, not for anything you had done, but rather for things other people like you might have done? Or just because you were a Turk or an Armenian? Third, you don't want to hurt someone else. When you do that, it makes you feel bad about yourself.

"Does it help to talk about prejudice?" I asked.

Janie (Chinese female): Saying it out loud is embarrassing. It makes you ashamed of what the prejudice says about you. Opening up in class was tough at first, and it helped to have to write essays about a time when you were made to feel invisible but also when you made someone else feel invisible. Pairing the two acts this way helped me to see that everyone does it, that there wasn't something intrinsically evil in me. And writing it, not having to talk about it first, let me think about it in private and then show it to someone I trusted—in this case, my sister—before I was ready to talk about it in class.

Sheri (Iranian female): Establishing trust was important. I now feel that I can openly talk about prejudice, my prejudice, in front of other class members, and they won't look down on me. But I was never made to volunteer information before I was ready, and that was important.

"So a class can help in this regard?" I asked.

"Yes," they agreed. They said a class heightens awareness of prejudice, which leads to the phenomenon

Janie noted. The process of chipping away at prejudice seemed slow, one that took some students unaware.

Natasha (Iraqi female): I didn't take this class because it was about prejudice. I took it because it fulfilled the upper-division writing requirement, so I wasn't someone who knew I had a problem and thought I needed to deal with it. The class kind of sneaked up on me in that regard. But using the example of discrimination and prejudice against the elderly was a good idea, partly because it's not a prejudice that's particularly ugly—not like racism or religious or ethnic prejudice. But it did kind of open things up, pried loose my set ideas and got me thinking differently.

Patty (Japanese female): I think it helped to begin by talking about something not too difficult, not too threatening. That helped build the trust and let me learn that prejudice is a widespread phenomenon. That made it easier to move on to talk about other forms of prejudice, ones that are often off limits in our society.

An African American student wrote his in-class essay, which he initially asked to have kept private, about his self-loathing as he internalized the racial prejudice in his society. Don later said, "The classes showed me prejudice is broader than race. Prejudice is more about how you respond to someone who is different.

It's important to set one kind of prejudice in a broader context. It's useful to focus on an 'easy' prejudice because it makes it safer to then examine other forms of prejudice." Don had never read Invisible Man before this class. He decided that it was the best book he'd ever read, not just because it described so much of his own experience, but also because he identified with the character's difficulties in dealing with his own prejudice. Ironically, he linked his experience with Ellison's novel to reading Doris Lessing's The Summer Before the Dark, which he said helped him understand how his mother felt about getting old.

Lessons Learned

"What is the heart of prejudice?" I asked students as the term was ending. They focused on the inability to see an individual as an individual and the failure to respond to a person on the basis of who he or she is instead of according to the person's group identity. What causes this prejudice? "Fear, anger, rejection, ignorance, repression, oppression, poverty," the students agreed. "Prejudice essentially is denying the individuality of a person. That's why 'don't ask, don't tell' was a bad policy. It lets people be homosexual, but only if they hide it. And prejudice is about identity. If we can't be who we are, then we are diminished. Stereotypes limit your interactions and growth." So, the class concluded, "everybody loses, not just the person discriminated against."

"How do we establish trust in an environment?" I asked. This question was important to me as a professor wanting to do just that in a classroom setting but also not wanting to impose my own views on others. I feel strongly that real change has to come from within; political correctness was not one of the class's goals.

Leila (Indian female): Establish a safe space. It's very important to have other students speak up, too.

The professor should be a moderator, encouraging people to share their personal views, but not forcing them. And make sure no one is intimidated or ridiculed. Try to get the students out of their comfort zone, but do it in a positive way. The professor can have her own views—in fact, that can be good, especially if you're willing to admit having prejudices—but she should not force them on people.

Finally, I asked the students how they felt about being asked to take pretests to examine their own prejudices. As I initially designed the course, I thought the pretests were a great idea. I liked the concept of having an independent measurement to capture any changes resulting from the course. But I found that the practical reality of asking students to take such tests made me uncomfortable. I worried that I would intrude on their privacy or make them feel bad about themselves and that the standard psychological tests might be too crude a tool to measure the subtle shifts in prejudice that mattered to me.

Natalia (Iranian female): The writing was a good idea. The tests that psychologists design, the ones to get at subconscious prejudice, these are trickier because sometimes they may not really be doing that. But it was good to be allowed to take tests that dealt with a wide variety of prejudice, from race and religion to age and even fatness, and to do this in private.

"How do we overcome stereotypes?" I asked.

Leila: Meet someone from that stereotyped group. Labeling and categorization can push individuals into that category. It's pigeonholing.

As the course was ending, we discussed the worldwide protests that had occurred recently among Muslims in reaction to the publication in Denmark of editorial cartoons depicting the prophet Mohammed. When UCI's College Republicans sponsored an exhibition of the cartoons, the Muslim Student Union on campus organized a protest. Two people engaged in a scuffle and were ejected, but otherwise the event was peaceful. When we discussed it in class, I found that although most class members had strong opinions about the event, few knew many details about what had actually happened. Feelings were high, however; one of several Islamic students in the class had written an article about it for the student paper.

We took the opportunity to discuss the matter, acknowledging that the issue was not simply free speech, but also what the university should permit to be said on its campus.

I was impressed by how nuanced the discussion became. Is a university endorsing views, even implicitly, when it provides space for speakers and events? Does a university have an obligation, then, to make sure the speakers are bona fide? What does that mean? What is the role of student groups? Is there a difference between a kind of Hyde Park speakers' corner and a debate hosted by a university in one of its buildings? How far does free speech extend, and when does it become incitement to action or hate?

We developed a long typology beginning with the general: I am a gay person, a Muslim, a religious Jew, and so on. The next step was slightly more opinionated: I don't like a certain group. Eventually, the typology extended to the point of inciting action: we should kill gays, Muslims, religious Jews, and so on. Ironically, the students tended to cluster at the classic lines of tolerance. Most "speech" was acceptable to them, and they felt it should be permitted by a university on its campus. But as speech moved toward inciting action, student support for permitting it on campus declined.

Would they have had this position before the class? Did the class permanently change anyone's views? I'm not sure. The students told me the class had helped them learn more about "others" and that they would now have more compassion for the plight of others. But I was giving them grades and feared they might have told me what I wanted to hear. Still, I took heart from one young woman, an American of Irish descent, who came to tell me that she didn't understand one of the essay assignments.

"I know I'm supposed to talk about a time I was made to feel invisible, and a time I did that to someone else," she said. "But I don't see how that's related to the readings. I mean, I see the Invisible Man link, but I don't see what this has to do with Kant."

"Well, what did you use for your personal example?" I asked.

"I talked about my parents' divorce. I was pretty bummed out, but my dad would give me really nice presents and so would my mom, so I felt like they understood how upset I was and were trying to make it up to me. Then, later, I realized dad just wanted to make mom feel bad, because she hadn't done something that nice for me. And mom was using the presents to make dad feel bad. You know. They were just using me to get to the other parent. The presents weren't really about me at all."

"How did that make you feel?" I asked.

"Invisible, like the book. I get that. But what has that got to do with Kant?"

"Well, can you think a minute about what Kant's trying to tell us, in general terms about ethics and how we treat others?"

She thought a minute. "Hmm. The categorical imperative, the idea that we all should ask if our actions can be generalized. Otherwise, we shouldn't take them."

"Is there anything else to the categorical imperative?"

This time I could see the wood burning. "Well, we're not supposed to use . . . Oh!" Her eyes suddenly flew wide open. "That's what Kant's talking about when he says we're not supposed to use people as a means only. That's what my parents were doing to me! They were using me as a means to get to each other. They didn't care about me at all, not then. And that's what Kant is saying is wrong!"

Maybe it was the eyes. But I like to think that this young woman now knows in her bone what Kant was telling us, and that she will think long and hard before treating another human being the way her parents treated her, because she knew how bad it had made her feel. Empathy. ¨

Notes

1. My thanks to my students in the winter 2006 "Politics of Difference" class and to members of the Ford Foundation's Difficult Dialogues program.

2. In 2005, the 20,061 undergraduates at UCI identified themselves as Asian (49 percent), African American (2 percent), Chicano (12 percent), Caucasian (26 percent), other (8 percent), and foreign (2 percent). Other statistics are not available, but approximately one-third of the undergraduate class that I was teaching was Muslim, and two-thirds were female.

3. For a fuller description of this psychological process, see my 1996 book, The Heart of Altruism, and my 2006 book, The Hand of Compassion.

4. This kind of contrast is evident in many areas, including immigration: "Will immigrants steal American jobs or enrich our economy?" people ask.

Monroe is professor of political science and philosophy and director of the Interdisciplinary Center for the Study of Ethics and Morality at the University of California, Irvine. She is teaching one course and running a summer internship for her Irvine's Difficult Dialogues initiative. She can be reached at krmonroe@uci.edu.

Difficult Silences

Encouraging dialogue about sexuality issues on Virginia's campuses can be tricky business.

By Janet Winston

In December 2005, the Ford Foundation awarded Hollins University and the American Association of University Professors $10,000 to participate in the foundation's Difficult Dialogues initiative. The project supported by this grant brings together a consortium of academics, including me, from three separate institutions in Virginia and the AAUP.1 What led me to help form this consortium? What challenges do we face in carrying out this initiative? What have I learned so far? In what follows, I will briefly sketch answers to these questions as a bid toward broadening the dialogue.

Having been born and raised in the San Francisco Bay area, whose progressive gay politics are well known, I accepted with apprehension an academic position at Virginia Commonwealth University, a state institution located in the capital city of Richmond. After signing my contract in February 1999, I promptly called Mary Gay Hutcherson, an ambassador of sorts to Richmond's lesbian community. What I remember most clearly from that conversation was her caveat that, although there was a thriving local lesbian and gay community (actually several communities, I would soon learn, divided by race and class and, to a lesser extent, age and sex), one was expected to be discreet. Discreet. What exactly would that entail, I wondered. And what happens to those who are indiscreet?

Several weeks later, I caught a partial glimpse. The Village Voice featured an article in April 1999 on Henry Edward Northington, a homeless gay man living in Richmond who had been murdered in a public park. He had been decapitated, his head carried half a mile and then prominently displayed on a footbridge leading to an area known for gay cruising. Apparently, he had not been discreet enough. "Eddie," who had been known to address people using sexual and racial epithets, and who, coincidentally, audited classes at my soon-to-be academic home, was not especially beloved. No one from the local gay community mobilized around the incident. (In September 2000, however, after a man shot seven people, killing one, in a Roanoke, Virginia, gay bar, the local, state, and national gay communities mobilized to end hate crimes targeting those perceived to be gay.)

Flash forward several years to a packed auditorium at my university. I am one of six panelists addressing the question, Can science or religion define what is natural or normal for sexual behavior and orientation? The evening is one event in "a four-part series of presentations and conversations with local experts," according to the announcement of its sponsor, the Life Sciences and Religion Community Forum of Central Virginia. The forum's advisory committee, of which I am a member, is made up of university and community leaders.

Local queers came out in force for the event. Judging from the panelists present and the audience's response, most folks in the room held fairly liberal views on the subject of homosexuality. Seated next to me, a local minister and adjunct faculty member was the lone social conservative on the panel. During his scholarly exegesis, he explained why early Christians, like their present-day followers, consider sex between men a sinful behavior. The atmosphere in the room became tense. Perhaps it was because of our close physical proximity or our shared status as professors explaining the history of ideas, but I felt empathic toward him. He finished talking and was bombarded with questions. According to your beliefs, one woman asked, is it also sinful for a woman in love with another woman to write her a love letter? The crowd erupted in applause.

Later that evening, a gay community activist and practicing Christian (a young white man) asked me about my cool-headedness during the minister's remarks. "You sat right next to him," he said. "How did you keep your composure?" Being an atheist helps, I thought to myself (I may be "out" as a lesbian in Virginia but not as a nonbeliever). Then, thinking about his observation, I recalled the words of another speaker that evening, a graduate seminary student at Virginia Union University, a historically black, Baptist-affiliated institution in Richmond, who shared her moving story of spiritual wounding as an African American lesbian of faith. Given the ethos of white supremacy in this country, not to mention in Richmond (the former "Capital of the Confederacy"), being white and middle class also helps. After all, a scant thirty-six years before the U.S. Supreme Court dealt a blow to state sodomy laws in Lawrence v. Texas in 2003, it reluctantly decriminalized interracial marriage in Loving v. Virginia in 1967. (Many states still had their antimiscegenation laws years later, however.)

I begin with these vignettes because they illustrate some salient characteristics of the discursive terrain in Virginia on the subject of homosexuality as well as what is at stake—life, liberty, and faith. Any initiative to create dialogue in Virginia on issues of sexuality and gender expression must take into account the reality of violence in the state, the centrality of religion, and the history of race.

These incidents also show that the climate in Virginia, although repressive, is not monolithically so. The community forum at which I spoke represents some progress at initiating a conversation across differences. I contend, however, that in order to see the whole picture, we must address the silences as carefully as we do the dialogues themselves.2

Polarized Atmosphere

For people residing in large urban centers with sizeable gay enclaves or in small college towns in so-called blue states, Virginia may appear to be a perilous place to address those silences, whether by teaching queer studies, by publicly supporting those of us who do, or simply by refusing to be closeted. The state is widely considered to be one of the most homophobic in the nation. Despite the Supreme Court's ruling in Lawrence v. Texas, rendering Virginia's 214-year-old sodomy law unconstitutional, the state's "crimes against nature" statute remains on the books, making oral and anal sex between consenting adults a felony. This law has been cited as the basis on which to outlaw or attempt to outlaw a host of other activities, including gay-straight alliances in high schools; inclusion of gay people, and those perceived as gay, as a protected class in hate-crimes legislation; and provision of insurance by private companies to the same-sex partners of gay, lesbian, and bisexual employees. Virginia currently has two laws invalidating any form of legal recognition for same-sex partnerships and is currently poised to amend its state constitution over the issue.3

Virginia made national headlines in the 1990s for two incidents involving lesbians. One was the 1996 Shenandoah National Park slayings of hikers Julianne Williams and Lolie Winans, whose throats were slit, federal prosecutors originally alleged, by a man who later told prosecutors that they "deserved to die because they were lesbian whores." In the other case, Sharon Bottoms lost custody of her biological daughter largely because, according to the judge's interpretation of Virginia law, her lesbianism was "illegal" and "immoral," and it made her an "unfit parent." In the judge's eyes, the fact that she was a working-class lesbian only made things worse.

Aware of this climate and wanting to reduce homophobia and genderphobia on Virginia's college campuses, several academics from across the state came together in spring 2005, with the help of representatives from the national office of the American Association of University Professors, to form a consortium in response to the Ford Foundation's Difficult Dialogues initiative. In our initial proposal, we described the situation at Virginia's universities and our objectives for seeking funding:

Virginia's college campuses have been in the news as places where issues of sexuality and religion are polarized. Among the many occurrences are (a) the removal of the phrase "sexual orientation" from Virginia Tech University's nondiscrimination policy (subsequently restored due to student protest); (b) [Virginia] Tech's Board of Visitors' revoking a female professor's signed contract for permanent employment after it learned she was the partner of a newly hired woman dean (she is now tenured at Virginia Tech following campus protests); (c) arrest threats when members of Soul Force, a Virginia-based religious activist group, attempted to donate gay-themed books to the library at Jerry Falwell's Liberty University; (d) picketing by Fred "God Hates Fags" Phelps's followers at formerly Baptist-affiliated Averett University in Danville Against its new gay-straight student alliance.

State-sanctioned anti-gay initiatives, coupled with fundamentalist Christian views on homosexuality as "sinful behavior" and "an abomination," have contributed to a campus climate hostile toward gays and lesbians and have rendered sexuality in general an unacceptable topic of discussion.4

How can we move beyond this polarized atmosphere to initiate respectful dialogue on our college campuses about sexual identity and gender expression? How do we broaden the conversation to include a range of religious and secular scholarly perspectives on sexuality and gender that takes into consideration the wide spectrum of people's experiences and cultural traditions, disciplinary differences that govern one's approach to truth-seeking and evidence gathering, and the complexities of personal and communal ethics? How can civil and rational conversation improve the climate for gays and lesbians on Virginia's college campuses?

Thanks to the Ford Foundation grant, we are organizing a statewide conference aimed at building a network of people at Virginia's colleges and universities to promote civil and rational dialogue on lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender-related campus issues.

Long before we secured this funding, however, I and my fellow project leaders had realized that the process we needed to go through to seek funding had become the difficult dialogue itself. What happened was this. When we sought institutional sponsorship from our home universities, they expressed support for the project's ideas but then declined to participate. Fearing backlash for being seen to endorse a politically sensitive topic in conservative Virginia, these state-funded institutions would not authorize their names to be attached to our proposal as written. As Roger Bowen, the AAUP's general secretary, wrote in the cover letter accompanying our initial proposal:

Sexuality is such a volatile issue in Virginia that even the relatively liberal administrations of the consortium institutions, both of which support the concept of the proposal, have refused to serve as lead agency for a project with sexuality as a main focus. Ironically, the refusal of Virginia administrations to deal frankly with questions of sexuality underscores the very need for the project proposed. Only a national organization like the AAUP working with a network of faculty at the local level can provide the insulation from political pressure needed to allow dialogue to occur.

Overcoming Fear

Our closed-door discussions with university administrators over the Difficult Dialogues initiative are too involved to elaborate on here. Their importance, however, lies in the fact that they were dialogues, they were difficult, and there was pressure to leave much unsaid. In other words, we learned that the silences that occurred during these conversations, both what we were advised to omit from our proposal and what we ourselves were afraid to say, spoke more forcefully than the speech itself. For example, one high-level university administrator, a strong ally of lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer issues on his campus, worried about offending his boss's sensibilities and the potential backlash from state legislators, who control the institution's public funding. Before he would put our proposal forward for consideration, he asked us to delete specific mention of homophobic incidents on Virginia's campuses and a reference to the state's history of "massive resistance" to school desegregation. For a day or two, we uneasily agreed. Soon, however, it became clear that even this concession—a difficult silence to be sure—could not rally firm institutional support for our proposal.

In the end, we sought and eventually found institutional legitimacy from a private secular institution, Hollins University in Roanoke. Yet the memory of those conversations and the insights illuminated by them—that to anticipate others' fear is to succumb to one's own, that our responsibility to address antigay hatred must not be severed from our responsibility to address racial hatred—remain with us today. As poet and essayist Audre Lorde wrote in "The Transformation of Silence into Language and Action," published in Sister Outsider in 1984, "Your silence will not protect you. . . . For we have been socialized to respect fear more than our own needs for language and definition, and while we wait in silence for that final luxury of fearlessness, the weight of that silence will choke us."

To initiate campus dialogue on the subject of homophobia in Virginia (and, possibly, in the majority of U.S. states), one need not bring together individuals holding polarized positions. Although a debate between, on one side, antigay religious activists Jerry Falwell (Liberty University) and Pat Robertson (Regent University) and, on the other, gay community activists Mel White (Soul Force) and Dyana Mason (Equality Virginia) would generate sparks, it is not the only available path, nor, I believe, the most intellectually honest one. The difficult dialogue I want to have will tease out the complexities of the issues and acknowledge and begin to address the difficult silences that are bound to unfold. On Virginia's college campuses, it is a dialogue already begun.5

Notes

1. I am a co-leader of the project "A Civil Voice: Difficult Dialogues on Sexuality, Gender Expression, and Homophobia on Virginia's College Campuses." The other co-leaders are Jen Boyle (Hollins University), Leeray Costa (Hollins University), Elizabeth Cramer (Virginia Commonwealth University), Charles Ford (Norfolk State University), Darla Schumm (Hollins University), and Martin Snyder (AAUP). We are organizing a statewide conference titled "NetworkVA: Building LGBTQ Coalitions for Change on Campus," to be held in Charlottesville, Virginia, on March 3, 2007. For details, visit the conference Web site at http://www1.hollins.edu/depts/ford.

2. As evidence of both the long and impressive history of Virginia student activism on lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer issues and the significance of addressing silence, the national Day of Silence, which just celebrated its ten-year anniversary, was instigated by students at the University of Virginia. (It is now sponsored nationwide by the Gay, Lesbian, and Straight Education Network.) During the Day of Silence, held in April, students, faculty, and staff from around the country voluntarily stop speaking for one day to punctuate the silencing that lesbians, gays, bisexuals, transgender, and queer people experience on a daily basis due to homophobia, biphobia, and transphobia.

3. For a complete description of the Affirmation of Marriage Act, as well as details about other recent and pending legislation affecting the lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer community, see Equality Virginia's Web site at www.EqualityVirginia.org. See also Virginia—Hostile Climate, a report published by People for the American Way (www.pfaw.org).

4. Receiving considerably less attention are the quotidian strains lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer students, faculty, and staff face. For example, at my own university, students have been subjected to everything from antigay diatribes to physical violence—two students suffered head trauma in September 2002 when they were attacked after attending a meeting sponsored by the Sexual Minority Student Alliance, one of the campus's two lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer student groups. In 2005, the athletics department abruptly canceled a dance competition scheduled to occur during men's basketball games when students from Queer Action, the activist student group, and concerned faculty and staff asked to meet with the department to discuss why only co-ed couples were invited to participate.

5. For their valuable comments on an earlier draft of this essay, I want to thank Liz Canfield, Elizabeth Cramer, Jeremy Kidd, Patricia Perry, and especially Mary Jane Smith.

Winston is assistant professor of English and women's studies at Virginia Commonwealth University. She is project co-leader of the Difficult Dialogues initiative she writes about in Academe*. The project's Web site is http://www1.hollins.edu/depts/ford. For an annotated version of her article, write to Winston at jmwinsto@vcu.edu.*

Personal Faith and Conscience:
How, When, Where and With Whom Can We Speak Our Minds on a Public University Campus?

DRAFT DISCUSSION GUIDE (Abridged Version 9/14/06)

INTRODUCTION

College communities around the country have in recent days experienced a growing pattern of religious intolerance, threatened restraints on free inquiry, and difficulties in sustaining informed political and civil discourse. As university populations have become more diverse, they are confronting new realities in which differing voices struggle to be heard and respected. Political forces have increasingly highlighted "wedge issues" that pit deeply held religious and moral judgments against emerging social and scientific trends. As polarization has increased outside university walls, it has been increasingly difficult to maintain the long tradition of open and respectful inquiry within university settings. New forms and norms for communication seem to fuel tendencies to attack and belittle competing viewpoints rather than to engage in open-minded exploration of ideas.

In 2005, the Ford Foundation announced its "Difficult Dialogues Initiative," inviting colleges and universities around the country to join it in addressing these concerns. As the Ford Foundation's President eloquently stated: "Open and honest dialogue is one of the defining characteristics of a vibrant academic community … [and] is an essential component of a strong civil society on which democracy depends. We must strive to ensure that all members of the community are treated as full and equal partners in the intellectual and institutional life of colleges and universities, especially those who may hold minority political views or religious beliefs. Campus leaders also must create an atmosphere of mutual respect, in which diversity is examined and seen in the context of a broader set of common values. We need to ensure that our discourse not only remains open but civil."

As one of the campus partners in the Difficult Dialogue Initiative, UNC Chapel Hill is endeavoring to make the practice of dialogue second nature on our campus, and invites colleagues elsewhere to do the same. A group of faculty, students, and student affairs leaders has worked intensively to develop a framework in which differing viewpoints on these issues can be engaged and explored in a respectful and open-minded way. Our goals are to foster freedom expression and respectful attention for a wide range of viewpoints, engage in intellectually serious analysis and defense of multiple viewpoints, and explore common ground without ignoring genuine differences.

We invite you to engage with us in deep and candid conversation about Personal faith and conscience: how, when, where, and with whom can we speak our minds on a public university campus? This formulation is a powerful one in which each word has a deliberate meaning.

- We hope the conversation will draw forth genuine, personal views that will be respectfully treated and openly considered.

- We seek to grapple with the full range of faith- and conscience-based beliefs since such beliefs are rooted in personal values that include those held not only by individuals committed to traditional Judeo-Christian viewpoints but also by those who embrace other religious traditions, agnostics, atheists, and those with moral vantages that arise from sources other than traditional religion.

- We emphasize the process of "speaking our minds" by which we intend a focus on oral and written communication (rather than the clothes one wears or other sorts of expression).

- We use the word "we" very deliberately, with the intent to exploring how all members of our campus community interact with each other—including students interacting with fellow students of similar or different faith traditions, faculty interacting with faculty and students in the classroom and elsewhere, and staff interacting with all.

- Our discussion will explore varied approaches to this question, including some that have emerged from our work to date, but also others that will emerge in this Forum that involves a wider range of participants. We will deliberate--rather than debate--using safe and fair ground rules to be considered at the outset so that we can all speak, listen, and learn from each other. No votes will be taken. All viewpoints will be welcome.

USING THE DISCUSSION GUIDE AND PARTICIPATING IN A DISCUSSION FORUM

This discussion guide is organized in two parts. Part I important background information that bears on the growing tensions relating to personal faith and conscience on college campuses. Part II outlines four approaches that members of college communities—individual students and faculty as well as campus leaders--might be taken in response to these tensions.

Background Information. Part I includes background information designed to help fuel the conversation that follows. Forum participants have found that meaningful discussion and deliberation depends on sharing some baseline information and recognizing their own operating assumptions (as well as others' assumptions they may not share). The background information provided here has been culled from many sources and viewpoints in an effort to grasp the reasons that dialogues about personal faith and conscience can prove so difficult. This material will serve as a good starting point for discussion, since it provides fresh facts and viewpoints that not everyone may have encountered before. The forum moderator will help introduce participants to relevant background information at the start of the discussion so that everyone will feel comfortable, and a short video will be shown in order to help participants engage with the challenging issues raised. Participants in forums that use this discussion guide will also be an important source of ideas and insights. Suggestions for augmenting the appendix will be welcome so that the discussion guide can be improved over time.

Discussion Not Debate. This discussion guide and related discussion forums are intended to foster deeper reflection and insight about challenging issues. It uses an approach developed by the National Issues Forums in cooperation with citizens and communities across the country in connection with difficult questions such as immigration policy, end-of-life decisions, and racial tensions. In these settings it has proved important to clarify the differences between discussion and debate. For example, in the experience of the National Issues Forums:

- Debate involves a deep investment in and defense of the rightness of a particular position, a search for weaknesses in another's position, a focus on "winning," an emphasis on oppositional reasoning, and a treatment of key assumptions as truth.

- Deliberative discussion involves an effort to understand the basis and nature for disagreement, an honest effort to hear and explore insights from many vantages, a focus on understanding rather than "winning," an emphasis on collaboration, and a willingness to re-evaluate key assumptions (including ones own) where warranted.

Participants in discussion forums using this guide will therefore develop additional insights and skills that should add to their repertoire in deciding how best to deal with difficult dialogues in other settings as well as the one at hand.

Group Agreements and Group Ground Rules. The forum moderator will start the discussion by share a set of proposed group process guidelines that have been found useful in other contexts when discussion address challenging topics. Participants will be asked whether they find these guidelines acceptable and whether there are other guidelines they'd propose to help shape the discussion they are about to undertake. Here are some of the possible guidelines:

- Everyone is encouraged to participate.
- The purpose is to have an open dialogue rather than a debate.
- Every individual will make an effort not to dominate the discussion, and will try to self-monitor the duration of his or her comments.
- An atmosphere of respectful listening is desired. It is fine for participants to choose to be silent, but it is not okay for anyone to feel they are silenced.
- No one is ever expected to disclose information that is private or personal in the forum, but they may choose to do so if they wish.
- All comments are to be respected and welcomed.
- The responsibility for doing the work of deliberative discussion belongs to the group.

PART I: BACKGROUND INFORMATION. What do we know about recent experiences on college campuses with issues of personal faith and conscience? What factors may contribute to the views of students, faculty, and members of the public about the role that personal faith and conscience should play in campus life?

Campus Experiences.

Recurring Tensions. Evidence of tensions relating to personal faith and conscience and academic inquiry may be found at numerous universities around the country. The University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill is merely one case in point.

- In 2002 the University chose Approaching the Qur'an: The Early Revelations by Michael Sells as its summer reading selection. The decision was roundly criticized by many legislators and members of the public. Subsequently the American Family Association's Center for Law and Policy brought suit on behalf of three students, an alumnus and a state citizen, claiming that their First Amendment rights have been violated. The federal district court subsequently concluded that the choice was permissible since it did not advance or endorse religion and did not compel students to engage in a "religious exercise."

- In 2003 a three-member Christian fraternity lost its status as an officially recognized student organization when it refused to sign the University's standard non-discrimination policy. The fraternity's law suit in federal court alleging that the University had unlawfully abridged the students' First Amendment rights to freedom of association, freedom of speech, and free exercise of religion was ultimately dismissed as moot.

- In spring 2004 an instructor was disciplined by her department for publicly accusing a student of hate speech after he expressed in her class his objection to homosexuality based on his religious beliefs.

- In 2005-2006, the campus newspaper ran a student column that cast Arabs in a disparaging light as well as a cartoon featuring a depiction of the Prophet Mohammed. Later a recent graduate drove his SUV into a popular campus gathering spot, injuring nine people and explaining that he had acted to demonstrate his commitment to Islam and to protest American foreign policy. Some students protested, asserting that his action should be labeled "terrorist" while others held a vigil in sympathy for Muslim students and those who had been hurt.

- In the last several years, the University established programs in Jewish, Islamic, and Christian studies. In 2005 and 2006, many liberal arts faculty protested discussions with a potential donor who was considering a proposal for funding of an initiative in Western Cultures. The donor had ties with other groups with conservative views that had publicly ridiculed faculty members who taught courses that emphasized diversity themes. The University subsequently withdrew the proposal in order to permit additional faculty review.

Hate Crime. UNC Chapel Hill has not been alone in facing challenges like these. Hate crime remains a problem.

- The United States Federal Bureau of Investigation indicated that in 2004 had received reports of 7649 hate crime incidents (of these, 52.9% reflected racial bias, 18.0% religious bias, 15.8% bias against sexual orientation, and 12.7% bias against ethnicity or national origin). Of the 1,374 incidents involving religious bias, anti-Jewish incidents predominated (954 incidents), with anti-Islamic incidents ranking second (156). Other incidents involved anti-Catholic sentiment (57), anti-Protestant sentiment (38), and anti-other-religion (128). Of the 898 hate crimes reported on school or college campuses, 492 related to race, 184 to religion, 150 to sexual orientation, 68 to national origin, 2 to disability and 2 to multiple biases.

- In April 2006, the United States Commission on Civil Rights held hearings and issued a statement on growing anti-Semitism. The Commission found that on some campuses, "students have alleged patterns of threatening or intimidating behavior, derogatory remarks, vandalism, and use of Swastikas and other symbols of hatred or bigotry….On many campuses, anti-Israeli or anti-Zionist propaganda has been disseminated that includes traditional anti-Semitic elements, including age-old anti-Jewish stereotypes and defamation. This has included, for example, anti-Israel literature that perpetuates the medieval anti-Semitic blood libel of Jews slaughtering children for ritual purpose, as well as anti-Zionist propaganda that exploits ancient stereotypes of Jews as greedy, aggressive, overly powerful, or conspiratorial."

Students. Students on college campuses are increasingly diverse even in states where residents have a significant preference in admissions. Economic shifts have resulted in greater mobility of families from other states and other countries so that residency no longer means life-long ties to a particular state. In contrast to their parents' generation, college students today are more likely to encounter others with viewpoints rooted in cultures, faiths, and moral perspectives that differ from those at home.

Student Religious Affiliations, Attitudes and Implications

- Student religious preferences may vary from one campus to another. In 2005 UNC Chapel Hill's entering students reported affiliation with the following religions: Baptist (19.3%), Methodist (13.6%), Roman Catholic (13.1%), Presbyterian (9.6%), and "Other Christian" (9.7%). Fewer than 5% reported that they were Jewish (2.5%), Hindu (1.3%) or Islamic (.9%), while 16.9% reported no religious affiliation. In contrast, entering undergraduates at public flagship universities a much more heterogeneous mix, with more than double the percentage of Roman Catholics and Jewish students (27.5% and 5.9% respectively), far fewer Baptists, Methodists, and Presbyterians (5.2%, 5.3%, and 5.2% respectively), and even more students reporting no religious affiliation (22.6%).

- Patterns of religious preference correspond in interesting ways with student experiences and viewpoints. When compared to other flagship public universities, students entering UNC-Chapel Hill are more likely to have attended religious services, discussed religion, and prayed or meditated on a weekly basis during high school. They are also much more likely to regard "integrating spirituality into my life" as a high priority, and to believe that their religious beliefs will be strengthened during college. They are somewhat more socially conservative, and are more inclined to believe that dissent is an important part of the political process.

- A national study by UCLA researchers (with the support of the John Templeton Foundation) has provided other important insights about college students' beliefs. Nearly 8 in 10 first-year college students in the sample reported that they believed in God, with more than half perceiving God as "love" or as the "creator" and about half experiencing God as a "protector." Many reported deriving strength, support and comfort from their beliefs. Four in ten students reported that they felt "secure" in their beliefs, with one in four saying that they were "seeking," one in four reporting being "conflicted" or "doubting," and one in seven saying they were "not interested." Forty-seven percent reported that they "seek out opportunities to help [themselves] grow spirituality."

- The UCLA researchers also analyzed students with reference to "spirituality," "religiousness" (religious commitment, engagement, religious/social conservatism, religious skepticism, and religious struggle), and four other factors (charitable involvement, compassionate self-concept, ethic of caring, and ecumenical worldview). Using these variables, they found that religious commitment and engagement were closely correlated with religious/social conservatism and negatively correlated with religious skepticism. Those showing high levels of religious engagement tended to be conservative politically (self-identified conservatives outnumbered liberals by 3 to 1). Roughly equal proportions of politically conservative and liberal students earned high scores on either charitable involvement or compassionate self-concept, while liberals "substantially outnumber conservatives among those with high scores on ethic of caring (2 to 1) and ecumenical worldview (3 to 1).

- The UCLA research includes longitudinal studies of a much smaller set of college juniors. The juniors reported a decline in attendance at religious services (52% had reported attending religious services frequently the year before entering college, but only 29% reported attending frequently in their junior year). There was a significant reduction in self-perceived "religiousness" and "spirituality" (only 9% said that their religiousness was much stronger and only 13% said their spirituality was much stronger), yet there was some growth in those who said it was "very important" to integrate spirituality into their lives, develop a meaningful philosophy of life, and help others in difficulty. Students who spend more time partying show larger-than-average declines in attendance at religious services during the first three years of college. By junior year, it appeared that levels of religious commitment tracked student choices of major at least to some degree. Those who chose to major in the fine arts, education and humanities had the highest levels of religious commitment, with the lowest levels of religious commitment reported by those in biological sciences, history, political science and sociology. Only about 20% of juniors were "highly religious" while a similar proportion were found to have low levels of religious engagement (defined as a pattern of behavior that includes such things as attending religious services, reading sacred texts, attending religious/spiritual workshops or retreats, and joining a religious organization on campus).

Teenagers. To understand college student viewpoints and experiences more deeply, it is important to consider the rising generation of teenagers In a recent book, Soul Searching: The Religious and Spiritual Lives of American Teenagers, (Oxford University Press, 2005), UNC Professor Christian Smith and graduate student Melinda Lundquist Denton analyzed data and interviews of teenagers aged 13-17 as part the National Survey of Youth and Religion. They found:

- Difficulty articulating beliefs: Very few of either devout or non-religious teens interviewed could explain the tenets of their religion or what it means. The researchers concluded that this difficult did not stem from communications difficulties, but rather from the fact that "our interview was the first time that any adult had ever asked them what they believed and how it mattered in their life."

- Religious outlook: The interviews suggested that many teens (whatever their religious affiliation) shared an outlook the researchers dubbed "Moralistic Therapeutic Deism" that embraced five major principles: (1) A God exists who created and orders the world and watches over human life on earth but from a distance; (2) God wants people to be good, nice, and fair to each other, as taught in the Bible and by most world religions; (3) The central goal of life is to be happy and to feel good about oneself; (4) God does not need to be particularly involved in one's life except when God is needed to resolve a problem; and (5) Good people go to heaven when they die. Moral relativism was also common among teenagers interviewed.

- Conversations in school: In school, 65% of religious US teens express their religious faith only some or a little. 12% of the teens express their faith a lot and 23% do not express their faith at all. The researchers also found that school is not viewed as being a hostile place to religious teenagers—fewer than 20% of teenagers reported that schools look down on teens who are openly religious.

- Views of others: Teenagers tend to see religion as not a particularly contested or conflictive aspect of their lives, but instead something that simply is, that is just not the kind of thing worth getting worked up about one way or the other. In confronting issues of faith difference, most teens take an inclusive religious pluralism stance on the matter of religious truth claims—60% of all respondents state that many religions may be true. The researchers noted that "nearly all U.S. teens seem to have adopted a posture of civility and a careful and ambiguous inclusiveness when discussing religion with possible 'others,' especially in public," perhaps because of America's strong tradition of individualism.

Intellectual Development in College. Students make important strides in intellectual development while in college, particularly when it comes to critical thinking. Often, however, neither they nor their faculty have clear frameworks for recognizing the challenges that such development creates.

- Benjamin Bloom, of the University of Chicago, is widely regarded as among the foremost theorists of students' intellectual development. He developed a "taxonomy" of educational objectives in the "cognitive domain" including: knowledge (the kind of intellectual capability that can be created even by rote memorization); comprehension (the ability to paraphrase, interpret and explain); application (the capacity to transfer ideas learned in one situation to use in another); analysis (the capacity to distinguish between subsidiary ideas that are part of a larger whole); synthesis (the capacity to bring disparate ideas together into a larger whole); and evaluation (the capacity to test or judge ideas against a set of larger standards).

- Bloom also considered the "affective" domain which concerns the way that people deal with emotional dimensions including feelings, values, appreciation, enthusiasms, motivations and attitudes. His five major elements in this taxonomy include: receiving phenomena (awareness, willingness to hear and attend to others with respect), responding to phenomena (responding to and questioning new ideals and concepts in order to understand them); valuing (attaching worth to particular values or phenomena, developing and acting on more complex commitments); organization (creating priorities from contrasting or conflicting values); and internalizing values (developing a value system that shapes personal behavior in a cohesive way, and acting in self-reliant ways that evidences commitment to ethical practice, consideration of others, weighing of new evidence). Development within the affective domain is often not addressed explicitly in college classrooms, and emotion in classrooms is often regarded as out of place.

The Nature of Knowledge and Authority, and the Stages of Faith Development

- During college, students must grapple with the nature of knowledge and how different sorts and sources of knowledge are valued in the context of intellectual reasoning. One of the most widely known theories of intellectual and moral development in college students was developed by William Perry, based on interviews conducted among male students attending Harvard College some years ago. Perry identified several stages of development. The first three stages involve "dualism," a period in which a learner assumes that all questions have or can have "right" answers derived from external authorities; the absence of right answers is attributed to authority figures who lack relevant knowledge or to knowledge that has yet to be discovered. The next two stages involve "relativism," which treats knowledge as non-absolute in most cases, treats dominant knowledge as pertinent but not the absolute truth, sees most things as uncertain, finds no real basis for deciding absolute right and wrong, treats authorities as just individuals with opinions, and regards all ideas as having equal value before ultimately recognizing that learners must take responsibility for using and evaluating non-absolute knowledge in complicated settings. Perry's final three stages involve "commitment" and move beyond cognitive abilities to make judgments regarding one's values and identity, act on and balance associated commitments and responsibilities to self and others. Although Perry's work has been criticized a non-diverse population and as treating development as a linear process when it more likely involves cycles, his approach remains a standard framework for thinking about student development during the college years and beyond.

- Dr. James Fowler, of Emory University, developed a framework for thinking about the stages through which approaches to faith and spirituality evolve across the lifespan (in contrast to the content of faith- based or spiritual beliefs). His most well-known work is Stages of Faith: The Psychology of Human Development and the Quest for Meaning (HarperCollins, 1981). In Fowler's view "faith" encompasses an individual's beliefs about their relationship with the universal, something that evolves throughout one's life. Fowler regarded faith as an ongoing activity (rather than something one "has"), reflecting the interplay of "conversion" (major changes in one's values or core beliefs) and "development" (a gradual maturation process). According to Fowler, there are six major stages in faith development, which foster insight of one's development, but should not used to evaluate or judge. College students may most commonly cluster in one of the three middle stages of Fowler's framework. Stage 2 is the "mythical-literal" stage in which faith has a more definite cognitive component drawn from the values of one's family or from exposure to other influences such as those of teachers, peers, and the media. In Stage 2, individuals tend to associate with those who are like them and be critical of those who differ, believe in "justice" insofar as the good are rewarded and the bad punished, often give symbols very literal meanings and engage in little self-reflection. Stage 3 is the "synthetic-conventional" stage in which individuals attempt to develop an integrated identity, based on values or beliefs typically derived from significant others without much internal examination. Those at stage 3 may have an "ideology" that involves a cluster of beliefs and values but may not be aware of it. They may also have internalized expectations in ways that make it difficult for them to manage the different roles and contexts in which they must function, and may be uncomfortable with conflict and controversy. Fowler describes stage 4 as the "individuative-reflective" stage, one that often involves critical assessment of prior experiences, values and beliefs. In stage 4, individuals move toward a grounding within an authentic self rather than relying most heavily on external expectations and roles, while also making explicit personal judgments about commitments based on deliberate examination of their core beliefs. Later stages are generally not reached until mid-life.

Values and Political Vantages. Observers of the American scene have in recent years noted a growing nexus between some dimensions of religious belief, political and policy positions. A recent study by the Harvard Institute of Politics conducted phone interviews of a national sampling of college students in March 2006 provides some important insights about the relationship between these important dimensions of students' lives.

- Differences in political viewpoint correlated with college students' views on how religion should play out in the public eye. Among Republican respondents, more than half wanted to hear candidates speak about their religious views, compared to about 1/5 of Democratic respondents. Republican respondents also wanted religious values to play a more important role in government. College students believed that a larger range of issues had "moral" dimensions compared to those generally highlighted as raising questions "values" in recent political discourse, referencing not only abortion, gay marriage and stem-cell research, but also the government's response to Hurricane Katrina, support for education, environmental policy, health care, Iraq and affirmative action (cited by between about a quarter and a half of both Republican and Democrat college student respondents in each case).

Faculty

Faculty Members' Personal Beliefs about Religion, Spirituality and Their Role on College Campuses

- Recent research on spirituality and the professoriate found that spirituality and religion plays a part in many faculty members' lives. Of those responding to a UCLA survey funded by the John Templeton Foundation, 81% described themselves as "spiritual," while 66% regarded themselves as "religious" to some or a greater extent (29% and 37% respectively). When asked to agree or disagree with the statement "the spiritual dimension of faculty members' lives has no place in the academy," 57% of all respondents disagreed (including 49% of respondents from public universities). Academic disciplines seemed to shape or reflect respondents' viewpoints, with the highest disagreement reported by those in the health sciences, education, and business, and the lowest levels in social sciences, physical sciences, and biological sciences.

- Data from the 2004-05 survey of American college faculty found a substantial consensus in views regarding the goals of undergraduate education. Substantial proportions of faculty respondents rating the following goals as "very important" or "essential: developing student's critical thinking abilities (99%), helping students master knowledge in a discipline (94%), and promoting students' ability to write effectively (87%). For many faculty other goals included: enhancing students' self-understanding (60%), instilling a basic appreciation for the liberal arts (56%), the development of students' moral character (59%) and helping students develop personal values (53%). Only 30% agreed that "colleges should be concerned with facilitating students' spiritual development." Faculty members at public universities and colleges showed the lowest level of agreement with this statement (18%).

- Perspectives on educational goals were also framed against a general concern that many students were poorly prepared academically (while 67% of faculty at private universities agreed "somewhat" or "strongly" that "most students are well-prepared academically, only 37% of public university faculty shared that view). In light of the priority purposes of education and the concerns for student academic preparedness noted above, it is perhaps not surprising that emphasis on religion and spirituality is relatively rare in many classrooms.

Liberal Education and the Curriculum. Faculty viewpoints on the role of religion and spirituality within the college classroom can also be discerned through academic decisions relating to nature of liberal education and the characteristics of the undergraduate curriculum.

- The American Association of Colleges and Universities defines "liberal education" expressed the goals of a liberal education in the following terms: "A truly liberal education is one that prepares us to live responsible, productive, and creative lives in a dramatically changing world. It is an education that fosters a well-grounded intellectual resilience, a disposition toward lifelong learning, and an acceptance of responsibility for the ethical consequences of our ideas and actions." Many faculty, particularly those in Arts and Sciences disciplines, would agree with statements such as this.

- Colleges and universities adopt and periodically review general education requirements governing undergraduate study as a means of providing students with a shared foundation to guide their overall intellectual development. General education requirements often mandate that students take courses emphasizing moral reasoning, philosophy, history, cultural diversity, public policy, international affairs, psychology, sociology, literature, art or music and many other subjects in order to provide students with exposure to varied ways of thinking and a wide range of ideas. Many such courses touch at some point on the nature and role of faith and religion in the contexts in connection with the topics under consideration.

- Colleges and university curricula are also evolving rapidly. Many schools have incorporated "perspectives" or "diversity" requirements as part of their general education requirements to aid students in preparing for a complex world marked by interchange with those raised in cultures that vary in language, history, political and religious beliefs. Other courses bring to light the many dimensions of personal identity and historic injustice, for example by examining the hidden history of people of color and women and the implications of sexual orientation. Biological sciences rely heavily on modern understandings of natural selection and evolution, and new scientific discoveries raise important questions regarding the role of stem-cell research and the nature of the human genome. Expansion of the traditional "canon" to include topics outside students' prior experience with Western culture, local communities, and religious tenets may prove unsettling to those with deeply held traditional values and cultural views.

Disciplinary Frameworks. Faculty perspectives must also be understood in a broader historical and sociological context. In a working paper, Professor Mark Edwards (former President of St. Olaf College and currently associate dean of Harvard Divinity School, and author of a new book entitled Religion on Our Campuses) offers crucial insights.

- Historical trends have shaped the development of colleges and universities in the last 150 years. In the first half of the nineteenth century natural sciences were closely associated with Christian theology. In time the sciences were seen to provide evidence of divine design in the guise of rational thought and inquiry and the study of science was viewed as a means of praising God. By mid-century, scientists were able to discern causal explanations that made it possible to offer explanations of phenomena other than by reference to supernatural intervention. What constituted an explanation changed and scientists turned to scientific inquiry as the best means of explaining natural phenomena rather than simply invoking God. Other disciplines followed suit, as the humanities departed from moral philosophy and social sciences claimed their own identity.

- By the beginning of the 20th century, research universities began to develop, with instructors drawn from those who had sophisticated substantive expertise in specialized fields. As belief in the scientific method grew and the extent of knowledge burgeoned, only those with "disciplined" knowledge had the necessary legitimacy to claim a place in the academy. Such disciplined expertise was provided through advanced education at top research universities which provided intensive mentoring, and required advanced levels of scholarly performance which in time resulted in the award of a Ph.D. Professional legitimacy for scholars awarded teaching positions at universities was increasingly tested by scholarly writing that was reviewed by national and international peers with similarly advanced expertise.

- In Edwards' view, faculty members are now inculcated by intensive experience that can be described as "professional formation," just as is true for those who undergo "formation" to profess their beliefs as members of the clergy. As undergraduates, they choose a major and increasingly assimilate the knowledge, values, and intellectual approaches that characterize the academic discipline in question. They go on to graduate work and spend more years within a specialized academic community that deepens and tests such expert knowledge and ways of knowing through comprehensive examinations and research on the Ph.D. They are evaluated and selected for academic appointments through a process that emphasizes their disciplinary focus. They then pass on their ways of knowing to their own students, and gain professional acclaim based upon their scholarly contributions to their chosen academic field.

- Edwards argues that there may be room to reintroduce religious perspectives within the academy in certain circumscribed respects. He contends that religious views may be most appropriate with regard to moral claims, claims regarding human nature, and claims regarding maximally comprehensive views of reality (certain kinds of "metaphysical" claims). In his view, it may be appropriate for certain religious insights to be offered in as an autobiographical explanation of "where I'm coming from," and suggests that the introduction of religious views in other settings should be undertaken with caution, and only in instances in which they contribute to the conversation and deepen understanding.

Academic Freedom. "Academic freedom," like academic disciplines, plays a central role in faculty members' understandings of the nature of American higher education. Academic freedom rests on core beliefs that the mission of higher education is to seek out and disseminate truth (however unpopular or inconvenient) and that the best way to accomplish this mission is to express ideas freely and subject them and to test them openly without fear of reprisal. It rests on a shared commitment to collegial interchange and a responsibility to maintain an open mind while testing one's own ideas as well as the ideas of others. Despite these core assumptions, the meaning and implications of the phrase and are surprisingly complex.

- The courts have recognized that academic institutions possess institutional academic freedom that is necessary: "to provide that atmosphere which is most conducive to speculation, experiment, and creation. It is an atmosphere in which there prevail "the four essential freedoms" of a university--to determine for itself on academic grounds who may teach, what may be taught, how it shall be taught, and who may be admitted to study." (Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234, 263 (1957) (Frankfurter, J, concurring)

- Academic freedom for individual faculty members has been described by the Association of American University Professors in the following terms: "Teachers are entitled to full freedom in research and in the publication of the results, subject to the adequate performance of their other academic duties. . . [1] Teachers are entitled to freedom in the classroom in discussing their subject, but they should be careful not to introduce into their teaching controversial matter that has no relation to their subject. . . [2] College and university teachers are citizens, members of a learned profession, and officers of an educational institution. When they speak or write as citizens, they should be free from institutional censorship or discipline, but their special position in the community imposes special obligations. As scholars and educational officers, they should remember that the public may judge their profession and their institution by their utterances. Hence they should at all times be accurate, should exercise appropriate restraint, should show respect for the opinions of others, and should make every effort to indicate that they are not speaking for the institution.

- The academic freedom of students has likewise been recognized. In a joint statement issued in 1967, the Association of American University Professors, the United States National Student Association and other professional groups stated: "Freedom to teach and freedom to learn are inseparable facets of academic freedom. The freedom to learn depends upon appropriate opportunities and conditions in the classroom, on the campus, and in the larger community. Students should exercise their freedom with responsibility.... The professor in the classroom and in conference should encourage free discussion, inquiry, and expression. Student performance should be evaluated solely on an academic basis, not on opinions or conduct in matters unrelated to academic standards. 1. Protection of Freedom of Expression. Students should be free to take reasoned exception to the data or views offered in any course of study and to reserve judgment about matters of opinion, but they are responsible for learning the content of any course of study for which they are enrolled. 2. Protection Against Improper Academic Evaluation. Students should have protection through orderly procedures against prejudiced or capricious academic evaluation. At the same time, they are responsible for maintaining standards of academic performance established for each course in which they are enrolled.

- The application of these principles is often complicated, in part because of the complexity of underlying legal analysis and because of the need to apply applicable policies to nuanced facts. For example, the academic freedom of individual faculty members and students is to some extent rooted in the First Amendment (which protects against abuse of free speech rights by government entities such as public universities but not to action by private parties). The statements of the Association of American University Professors (an organization founded in the wake of events at Stanford University early in the 20th century, when Mrs. Leland Stanford caused the dismissal of a noted economics professor Edward Lovejoy with whose views she disagreed) have been widely endorsed by academic organizations. They reflect a "professional standard" that is regarded as a statement of good practice within the academy, and thus has policy significance (but not necessarily legal significance) even when the First Amendment might not have application. At the same time, however, most colleges and universities around the country have adopted policies and tenure regulations that incorporate the AAUP standard and in turn give rise to contractual rights and rights to due process hearings by those protected under such policies.

- Longstanding expectations about university autonomy and academic freedom have been challenged in recent years on a number of fronts. For example, David Horowitz and others have argued that legislation called the "Academic Bill of Rights" should be adopted by state legislatures in order to force universities to weigh political ideology as part of their hiring practices and to provide additional legal protection to students who fear that they may be receive poor grades based on ideological views. Several organizations such as Students for Academic Freedom and Campus Watch have also established websites that encourage students to report or "blacklist" their professors based on listed criteria. An initiative by a UCLA alumnus to pay students to record and submit details of classroom conversations was withdrawn in the face of legal challenge.

- There are also instances in which faculty members have also been disciplined or dismissed notwithstanding the protections of academic freedom. For example, a professor at the University of Colorado who made what many regard as irresponsible comments about the 9/11 terrorist attacks was subsequently found by an academic panel to have engaged in research misconduct. Universities are also facing calls for greater public accountability from government leaders including the United States Department of Education and Congress. While academic institutions have traditionally been accorded great autonomy in setting academic standards and making operational decisions, growing concern to curb college costs and increase student learning and graduate rates may put these traditions to the test.

The World beyond the Campus. There can be little doubt that forces beyond campus walls influence the realities of American college campuses. These realties are therefore worth considering.

Americans' Personal Faiths

- The United States is a highly religious nation. A Gallup Poll conducted in December 2005 reported that 79% of American respondents said they were convinced that God exists, while an additional 12% said that they think God probably exists but have a little doubt. Regional differences were apparent, with 88% of Southerners expressing certainty about the existence of God, compared to 70% of Easterners, 71% of Westerners, and 77% of respondents from the Midwest. Those who attended church on a weekly basis were particularly likely to be certain God exists (94%) but 61% of those who seldom or never attended expressed similar sentiments. In contrast, however, a CBS News Poll conducted in April 2006, asked respondents whether they believed that traditional religions could answer all or most of today's problems or whether they were largely old-fashioned and out of date. Just over half (54%) of respondents said that traditional religions can answer such problems, while 32% said such religions are old-fashioned and 14% said they didn't know or didn't answer. The same poll also asked respondents how important religious was to their daily lives, and found that 26% of respondents regarded it as extremely important, 33% as very important, 26% as somewhat important, 13% as not at all important, with 2% saying they didn't know or giving no answer.

- The United States Census does not collect information on religious affiliation so denominational information must be found by other means. The World Fact Book 2005 indicates that the American population is divided as follows: Protestant 52%, Roman Catholic 24%, Mormon 2%, Jewish 1%, Muslim 1%, other 10%, none 10% (2002 est.). The American Religious Identification Survey conducted using phone surveys by the researchers affiliated with the City University of New York in 2001 found that the proportion of those self-identifying as Christian had declined from 86.2% in 1990 to 76.5% in 2001. In 2001, 1.3% self-identified as Jewish, .5% as Muslim, .5% as Buddhist, .3% as Unitarian/Universalist, and .4% as Hindu. Others self-identified as atheists (9.4%), agnostic (0.5%) or refused to respond (5.4%). More nuanced polls have recently been conducted of those who are affiliated with Christian faiths. A poll conducted for National Public Radio in July 2006 of likely voters in the fall 2006 election found that 12% identified themselves as fundamentalist, 21% evangelical, 10% as charismatic/Pentecostal, 42% as moderate to liberal, 5% as something else, and 11% as unwilling to respond (or responding "don't know").

- Views on the role of the Bible and the relationship between religious belief and science vary. In Gallup surveys completed in May 2006, 28% of respondents indicated that they believed that the Bible is the actual word of God and is to be taken literally word for word; 49% said that it was the inspired word of God but not everything in it should be taken literally, and 19% regarded it as an ancient book of fables, legends, history, and moral precepts recorded by man. When asked about their views on the origin and development of human beings, 36% of respondents said that man developed over millions of years with God guiding the process, 13% said man developed over millions of years but God had no part in the process, 46% said that God had created man in his present form, and 5% gave other or no opinion. An April 2006 CBS news poll found that 26% of respondents believed the science and religion agreed with each other, 32% said they generally conflict with each other, 37% said they were not related in a meaningful way, and 5% said they didn't know or gave no answer.

- Americans' exposure to the religions beliefs and practices of others' also appears limited. A June 2005 poll by CBS News asked respondents whether any of their close friends or family members who were of a different religion had introduced them to different teachings or philosophies that had become part of their own religious or spiritual practices. Of those responding, 23% said yes, 48% said no, 18% said they had no close friends or family members of other religions, 10% said religion wasn't important to them, and 1% said they didn't know or declined to answer.

- Americans also appear to associate religion in certain respects with conflict. In a July 2005 poll by the Pew Research Center for People and the Press, respondents were asked how much of a role religion plays in causing most wars and conflicts in the world. Responses indicated that 40% believed that religion caused a great deal of conflict, 35% a fair amount, 13% only a little, 8% not at all, and 4% refused or said they didn't know. When asked a similar question about the role religion plays in causing political conflict in the United States, 30% responded that it caused a great deal of conflict, 35% said a fair amount, 27% said only a little, 4% said none at all, and 4% said they didn't know or refused to respond.

Legal Principles: Historical Perspectives. Americans are clearly a religious people. Significantly, however, the American constitutional experiment provided for the separation of church and state, a deliberate and unique departure from prior European tradition.

- The First Amendment states that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." The Founders thus rejected the European tradition that taxed all to support a single nationally-affiliated church, and sought to avoid sectarian strife that would likely arise from jockeying among the different religious affiliations prominent in the various states. They also barred government from intruding on individual religious beliefs and thereby protected freedom of conscience. These provisions of the United States Constitution have also been applied to the states, and many states have independently codified protections relation to religion as part of their state constitutions.

- In his recent book Divided by God (Oxford University Press, 2005) and related writing in the New York Times, NYU Professor Noah Feldman has discussed the core dilemma created by the American constitutional experiment with the relationship between church and state: how to negotiate "the challenge of preserving the unity of the sovereign people in the face of their flourishing spiritual variety and often conflicting religious needs." Feldman notes the important ways in which social realities have impacted legal developments, including waves of immigration that have brought changing patterns of religious diversity to American shores, the 19th century influx of Catholics which raised issues public and parochial education, and the importance World War II and the Holocaust in highlighting the risk that religious minorities can suffer discrimination or even persecution when the German government adopted a stance favoring Christianity and opposing those of Jewish faith. Through it all, Feldman believes, we acknowledge our religious diversity while at the same time "we strive to be a nation with a common identity and a common project."

- In Feldman's view, current tensions reflect two conflicting viewpoints about the proper relationship of religion and government. Feldman describes "values evangelicals" who believe that "the right answers to questions of government policy must come from the wisdom of religious traditions," and notes that those with such viewpoint can be found across the range of religious traditions. Feldman believes that "What all values evangelicals have in common is the goal of evangelizing for values: promoting a strong set of ideas about the best way to live your life and urging the government to adopt those values and encourage them wherever possible. To them, the best way to hold the United States together as a nation, not just a country, is for us to know what values we really hold and to stand up for them." Feldman characterizes the second competing viewpoint as one held by "legal secularists" who "see religion as a matter of personal belief and choice largely irrelevant to government and who are concerned that values derived from religion will divide us, not unite us." Such "legal secularists" may be active members of various religious faiths, but believe that government should be secular and be bounded by related legal constraints. According to Feldman, "legal secularists" believe that "full citizenship means fully sharing in the legal and political commitments of the nation. If the nation defines itself in terms of values drawn from religion, they worry, then it will inevitably tend to adopt the religious values of the majority, excluding religious minorities and nonreligious people from full citizenship."

- Feldman believes that neither "values evangelicals" nor "legal secularists" have been very effective in negotiating the core tension between Americans' desire to recognize religious diversity while also maintaining a sense of unity, particularly in the days since 9/11. In his view, the "values evangelicals want to find shared values, but that leads them to rely on the unexamined assumption that deep down, Americans agree on what matters. The trouble is that 'we' often do not agree." Such disagreement is particularly apparent on issues such as abortion where "values evangelicals" believe that they must stand for something and are generally unwilling to recognize that those with competing views may have legitimate claims to make decisions of their own. On the other hand, the belief by "legal secularists" that religious expression must be removed from the public sphere in order to make those of all faiths and viewpoints welcome has resulted in pressure to keep religious views private or at least outside of public settings associated with government (a matter of concern for example, for those who wish to see the Ten Commandments or Christmas crèches displayed). Banishing religious expressions from the public eye has in Feldman's view made "values evangelicals" feel excluded and undercut the hunger for public expression of shared values, even though that is not the intent. These underlying tensions have been fueled in part by confusing legal developments that have reversed the original intent of the Constitution's provisions on religion by eliminating religious expression in many public settings while at the same time allowing funding of faith-based activities.

Legal Principles and the Courts.

- Litigation involving the public schools has illustrated the complex application of legal precepts embodied in the First Amendment's "free exercise" and "establishment" clauses when applied to educational settings. One of the fundamental legal tests applied in this setting is that articulated in Lemon v. Kurtz, a 1971 decision by the United States Supreme Court that required government decisions in the schools to be motivated by a secular purpose, to have primarily secular effects and not to entangle the state with religious institutions. Applying this and other tests in ensuing years, the courts have addressed numerous issues. For example, cases have addressed school prayer and moments of silence (permissible if students opt to do so but not permissible if mandated), school-sponsored prayer in public settings (impermissible), religious expression by teachers in classrooms (may be deemed officially sanctioned and impermissible especially with younger students), instruction about religion (permissible), and distribution of flyers (permissible to include information relating to religious activities but impermissible for schools to screen content so as to prohibit religious content if unfettered discretion). Courts have also entered the fray in the "intelligent design" v. evolution controversy, most recently finding that mandates to teach intelligent design represented an impermissible effort to incorporate religious doctrine in the classroom.

- Colleges and universities have also faced litigation about the implications of the Constitution's religion clauses and related "free speech" provisions. For example, the United States Supreme Court has held that a public university must make campus facilities available to student religious groups in the same way and to the same extent that it makes its space available to non-religious student organizations. Public universities must also make student fees available on the same basis for student groups whether they have sponsor or support religious and non-religious activities. On the other hand, the United States Supreme Court has concluded that public universities may deny scholarship funds to college students majoring in theology, in situations where state constitutional provisions dictate such separation (through the Washington "Blaine Amendment" that states that "No public money or property shall be appropriated or applied to any religious worship, exercise or instruction, or the support of any religious establishment"). Current controversies have focused on such issues as the legality of public universities' efforts to limit recognition of student organizations which refuse to comply with non-discrimination policies on the basis of religious beliefs that object to homosexuality or that require that leadership positions be filled by those who comply with certain religious tenets.

- The First Amendment also affords relevant protections beyond those found in the "free exercise" and "establishment" clauses. It also states that "Congress shall make no law ... abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble." The courts have interpreted these and other constitutional provisions to apply to the states and have also concluded that they protect freedom of association in intimate, expressive, and political contexts. These freedoms have some limitations, however. For example, the courts have said that freedom of speech does not allow someone to "cry fire in a crowded theatre" or to use "fighting words." The right to express oneself may depend on whether the setting for such expression has been established or treated as a "public forum," and whether the governmental entity has established reasonable, content-neutral "time, place, and manner" restrictions.

- Once again, the application of these additional First Amendment freedoms to public university campuses is more complex than might initially appear. For example, the University of Michigan had adopted a "speech code" that prohibited "Any behavior, verbal or physical, that stigmatizes or victimizes an individual on the basis of race, ethnicity, religion, sex, sexual orientation, creed … and that … Creates an intimidating, hostile, or demeaning environment for educational pursuits, employment or participation in University[-]sponsored extra-curricular activities." A university guide provided examples of conduct that were regarded as harassment, such as "You exclude someone from a study group because that person is of a different race, sex, or ethnic origin than you are." In 1989, a lower federal court found this policy to be vague and overbroad. In 1991, a University of Wisconsin policy that prohibited addressing a specific individual with "racist or discriminatory comments" was also struck down by a lower federal court because the policy was not narrowly enough stated to prohibit only "fighting words." Some colleges have endeavored to establish "free speech zones" in order to situate student protests, allow students to distribute flyers, and hold gatherings in areas that would not disrupt classes, and these strategies have brought challenges when the designated areas for such activity were very small. Public universities also face issues regarding the rights of the student press on their campuses. The United States Supreme Court has held that in the context of public high schools, school administrators can treat a student newspaper as a "non-public forum" and can punish or censor students for their expression if necessary for educational reasons. It specifically reserved the question of the status of college newspapers.

Religion and Politics. While the First Amendment thus restrains government in a number of important ways it does not preclude other actions that interject religious belief or affiliation into the political arena. The American electorate appears to have grown increasingly polarized and profoundly divided in recent years, with divergent religious beliefs and moral judgments playing significant roles in these developments.

- A recent study by the non-partisan research organization, Public Agenda, tracked changing attitudes relating to religion and politics over the four years from 2000 to 2004 (just prior to the 2004 Presidential election). One of the survey questions asked whether respondents agreed with the following statement: "Even elected officials who are deeply religious sometimes have to make compromises and set their conflictions aside to get results while in government." The organization found a substantial drop in those agreeing with this statement between 2000 and 2004: the proportion of the general population agreeing fell from 84% to 74%, while the proportion of those attending church services weekly dropped from 82% to 63% and the proportion of evangelicals dropped from 79% to 63%. Another question asked whether respondents believed that deeply religious people should keep their faith private, be very careful about "spreading the word of God" so as not to offend others, or "spread the word of God whenever they can." In 2000, 18% of respondents said that deeply religious people should keep their faith private, while 46% said that people with such beliefs should be very careful, and 35% said that they should spread the word actively. By 2004, the total of those who believed that people should keep their faith private or proceed carefully had dropped to 57% and the number who believed that they should spread the word of God whenever they could rose to 41%.

- In 2005, the Pew Center for Religion and Public Life found that the closely-contested 2004 President election had been marked by a deep faith-based partisan divide. More specifically, they concluded that "Americans who regularly attend worship services and hold traditional religious views increasingly vote Republican, while those who are less connected to religious institutions and more secular in their outlook tend to outlook tend to vote Democratic," and that the divide was most marked by the difference between "traditionalist" religious outlook rather than denominational label. The Pew study also found that the most important cause of the church attendance gap was the "mix of social and cultural issues" such as abortion and gay marriage which have pushed "the religiously observant into one political corner and the more secular into the other." Regional differences have also contributed, with a "broad shift to the GOP among white voters in the Evangelical-heavy South." The Pew study also cited poll data indicating that "more than 70% Americans want their president to have strong religious beliefs," while "only a quarter of voters said that politicians 'mention religious faith and prayer too much.'" At the same time 65% of poll respondents said they thought that churches should not endorse political candidates.

- Academic observers have debated whether shifts represent a form of "culture war" that will endure or change in coming days. At a recent forum conducted by the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life, Professors Alan Wolfe and James Davison Hunter highlighted competing viewpoints more fully aired in their new book, Is There a Culture War: A Dialogue on Values and American Public Life (Brookings Institution Press, 2006). Several important questions are worth considering such as: Does a small proportion of Americans (elites on both the left and right of the political spectrum) fuel the divide? What can be said about those situated in the vast center? Is there a growing tendency for religious denominations to splinter along ideological lines? Will there be a return to inter-religious conflicts rather than intra-religious conflicts? Will people of faith conclude that close alliance with political forces is inadvisable in the long run?

- Robert Bellah, the noted author of Habits of the Heart, a study of American values and patterns of interaction in a simpler day, has suggested that developments in the wake of the 9/11 terrorist attacks have deeply challenged Americans' sense of themselves, their country, and the "civil religion" (a term used by Rousseau to connote "the existence of God, the life to come, the reward of virtue and the punishment of vice, and the exclusion of religious intolerance"). In Bellah's view, this "religion" does not correspond to or substitute for Christianity but instead facilitated a "wide sphere of personal piety and voluntary social action… left to the churches… [which] were neither to control the state nor to be controlled by it." Bellah has recently argued that the events of 9/11 present a challenge comparable to that of the Civil War when the country had to face fundamental questions about slavery and its implications for the nation's core values, and ultimately integrated the theme of sacrifice into its civic religion. Now, in Bellah's view, the challenge that confronts Americans and our civil religion is how we will use our power and whether we will be able to contribute in a meaningful way to the "attainment of some kind of viable and coherent world order" built upon "an awareness that our nation stands under higher judgment."

Part II: CHOICES:

WHAT SHOULD WE (FACULTY, STUDENTS, STAFF OF A PUBLIC UNIVERSITY) DO IN THE FACE OF SUCH TENSIONS?

In the section that follows, four possible approaches are outlined that allow considered discussion about the issues presented in the background reading above.

Please bear in mind that these possibilities are addressed to faculty, students, and other members of college communities, and are not suggested as formal policies that universities themselves should adopt. Instead, they are offered as possible responses by individuals who are prepared to grapple with the difficult question:

> When it comes to personal faith and conscience: how, when, where, and with whom can we speak our minds on a public university campus?

These approaches were developed through repeated discussions that sought to "frame" a core question about what is currently troubling us on public university campuses, and to provide fair-minded alternatives that address some of our concerns. These are not the only alternatives, and there are likely to be ways in which those using this discussion guide will agree and disagree with each. They are presented in this format to facilitate careful consideration of multiple, authentic viewpoints in a deliberate way that informs and enlightens us.

In very brief terms, the four principal approaches are as follows:

Approach 1: Pursue questions of personal faith and conscience in private and maintain the university's neutrality.
Approach 2: Enhance student options and engage outside the classroom.
Approach 3: Engage personal faith and conscience in the classroom, respectfully, if faculty choose
Approach 4: Engage questions of faith and conscience widely, actively, and deliberately

The materials that follow develop each of these approaches though a more detailed description and enumeration of pros and cons. Please probe and weigh these alternative approaches, but remember that the point of this discussion is to illuminate rather than to score debating points or to resolve things by a formal vote. You will also have an opportunity to suggest additional approaches toward the end of this conversation.

A set of "scenarios" culled from recent events are provided following the four approaches. These scenarios are designed to provide a "reality check" and an opportunity to test participants' thinking as they consider actual events that have occurred on campuses around the country in the last few years.

APPROACH 1
PURSUE IN PRIVATE AND MAINTAIN UNIVERSITY NEUTRALITY

Description: Speech about personal faith and conscience belongs in private settings or off campus, in keeping with public universities' secular character and obligations of neutrality. Under this approach, individual students and faculty who wish to explore faith-based beliefs and judgments of conscience could do so in private settings with friends and family, in faith-based communities, or in other groups. The university would respect the desire of community members to engage in such discussions, but would not make special efforts to encourage or discourage such discussions. Thus, students and faculty could continue to discuss such their beliefs and views over coffee, or attend gatherings or services with whomever they choose. The university as an institution would maintain its historical neutrality rather than giving more attention to faith-based beliefs or matters of conscience.

Pros: Those who support this approach tend to emphasize the following ideas in support of their views.

- Personal faith-based beliefs and judgments of conscience arise in the innermost hearts and minds of individuals. They're something that should be protected from intrusion and thus should best be addressed in settings that are private and voluntary, as has traditionally be the practice.
- Some students say that they're most comfortable in talking with peers about faith-based beliefs and judgments of conscience when they can do so very informally with those they trust in private settings.
- Many opportunities exist to explore faith-based and conscience-based viewpoints in private conversations with friends and family members, in churches and synagogues, or in other faith-based or community groups. Universities lack relevant expertise and should defer to others in these settings. In light of these options, there's no need for public universities to intervene.
- Public universities should focus on academic matters that are more properly within their expertise and should steer clear or involvement with matters of faith and conscience as they affect individual members of university communities. As a matter of policy, it's best to maintain neutrality in this arena and attempt to steer clear of the "culture wars" that trouble the larger society.
- Constitutional principles relating to the "wall" between church and state should be observed. Members of the public who are taxed to fund public universities expect that such institutions will observe legal requirements relating to separation of church and state, much as they expect such neutrality from public elementary and secondary schools. Faculty and students likewise choose public universities with a full understanding that they are different from other colleges and universities with faith-based affiliations.

Cons. Those who disagree with this approach tend to emphasize concerns such as the following:

- Personal faith and conscience cannot be readily separated from day-to-day life so this approach is artificial and impractical.
- Many students and faculty have deeply held beliefs rooted in personal faith and conscience and this approach would make the campus less hospitable and welcoming for them.
- Artificial efforts to encourage discussions of personal faith and conscience primarily in private settings marginalize such questions. Requiring discussion of personal faith and conscience to take place elsewhere is anti-intellectual since these are important topics that need to be engaged when they arise.
- Critical issues facing society are the proper subject of intellectual inquiry within university settings. Faculty members currently cover topics that raise issues of personal faith and conscience when relevant to their subject matter. More emphatic emphasis on neutrality might make it difficult for them to pursue the issues that they believe in their best judgment are appropriate, and might impinge on the academic freedom of them and their students.
- The "wall" between church and state is not clearly delineated. It is likely that conflicts will arise whether or not the university attempts to embrace "neutrality." The tensions found in the larger society will lead to litigation involving public universities whatever they do.

APPROACH 2
ENHANCE STUDENT OPTIONS AND ENGAGE OUTSIDE THE CLASSROOM

Description: Students should have ample opportunities to explore issues of personal faith and conscience if they choose to do so, but such opportunities should be situated primarily outside the classroom. Consideration of such matters is particularly important during the college years. Many students express serious interest in developing meaningful philosophies of life and in deepening their sense of spirituality. The most suitable setting for such exploration lies outside the standard classroom so that students express their own beliefs without discomfiting challenges from professors and classmates in more formal settings. At the same time, students be provided with support structures and varied occasions in which issues of faith and conscience can be explored. Students could work with those involved in student affairs on campuses to develop additional supportive strategies, for example through public service options, housing choices, additional campus programming, leadership development programs, counseling opportunities, or "safe zone" training.

Pros.

- Students have important educational and developmental needs related to faith and conscience, and should have meaningful opportunities to work with these issues on campus rather than having to pursue them elsewhere.
- This approach allows campus ministries and student organizations to take leadership and to share their expertise, and respects the academic freedom of faculty to address other subjects in the classroom.
- Speech about personal faith and conscience on campus is best situated outside the classroom where faculty are not involved in judging or grading students' views.
- This approach accommodates the views of all members of the campus community, including those of varying faith-based traditions and those who are agnostic, atheistic, or non-religious.
- This approach emphasizes the potential for creative initiatives led by students in order to meet their most substantial interests and needs.

Cons

- People of faith who oppose compartmentalization might find this approach artificial since it precludes conversations about personal faith and conscience in the classroom.
- Faculty who wish to address such issues in the classroom might feel that this approach marginalizes opportunities for engaging with pressing issues in the classroom, or creates false impressions that addressing relevant issues in the classroom is undesirable.
- Those who have a very evangelistic view of their faith and wish to express it in all aspects of their life may believe the university is cutting into or policing their faith by encouraging discussions to be held outside the classroom rather than in classroom settings.
- Giving personal faith and belief an institutional place on campus in non-classroom settings might be seen by some as intruding on the principle of university neutrality.
- Students and student affairs professionals may find it difficult and uncomfortable to deal with the kinds of conflicts and contention that increasingly characterize religious and political debates going on outside campus walls.

APPROACH 3
ENGAGE PERSONAL FAITH AND CONSCIENCE IN THE CLASSROOM, RESPECTFULLY, IF FACULTY CHOOSE

Description. Speech about personal faith and conscience may occur on campus, including in the classroom, if conducted respectfully and if the professor believes it relevant. Some faculty members teach about topics that are directly relevant to personal faith and conscience, for example in courses in the sciences, literature, philosophy, public policy, gender and queer studies, history, journalism, political science, social work, nursing and medicine. Students would receive a poorer education if issues with implications for personal faith and conscience were not raised and addressed with a critical eye and an open mind in settings such as these. Faculty members have expertise in judging the relevance of topics and the best pedagogical techniques for exploring them. They should therefore be accorded considerable flexibility, in keeping with academic freedom principles, to determine when and in what ways issues of faith and conscience should be engaged. To encourage effective educational engagement in such settings, particularly in contentious times, faculty members should be provided with more extensive faculty development opportunities that help build skill in dealing with controversy in the classroom, and should be able to receive clear answers about their rights and responsibilities in such contexts. Students should also be given opportunities for training in handling "difficult dialogues" in the classroom so that they can actively participate and feel comfortable in doing so. Universities which believe that providing meaningful education on issues that intersect with personal faith and conscience might also find ways to encourage faculty members to incorporate such topics in their classes if relevant, and to flag classes raising such classes so that interested students can more readily enroll.

Pros.

- Faculty members whose courses touch on matters of faith and conscience should have the opportunity to introduce such topics as they believe relevant and wise.
- Classroom discussions provide for powerful learning opportunities by linking teaching with learning that takes place both inside and outside the classroom
- Inclusion of such discussions in the classroom allows faculty and students to engage with each other authentically rather than artificially separating matters of faith and conscience so as to compartmentalize their lives.
- This approach allows students to engage with faculty members if the students are conversant with their faith and ready to talk about it or are struggling with how their faith relates to issues raised in class.
- This approach is most consistent with universities' educational and intellectual mission, which anticipates active efforts to explore difficult questions and current issues including those relating to personal faith and conscience.

Concerns

- This approach may create blurry lines about what is relevant in class or what responses are "respectful," and leaves these decisions in professors' (rather than students') hands.
- This approach may give rise to expectations of in-class discussions when professors are hard-pressed to cover material in courses as it is or may reasonably believe that such discussions are not relevant or may feel that this approach intrudes upon their academic freedom.
- Professors and students may not be skilled in addressing challenging, hot-button issues where issues of faith and intellectual inquiry collide, so that it may be difficult to conduct such dialogues in ways that foster effective learning.
- Students and professors may feel put on the spot if asked to express their views on issues of this sort.
- This approach may result in faculty and students engaging with issues of faith and conscience in the classroom, when such issues might best be addressed in other settings (such as in student settings, dormitories, faith-based communities or with friends)

APPROACH 4

ENGAGE QUESTIONS OF FAITH AND CONSCIENCE WIDELY, ACTIVELY AND DELIBERATELY

Description. Public universities should actively encourage more widespread conversation and engagement with issues of personal faith and conscience throughout their campuses, including in private, student, classroom, and academic settings. Personal faith and conscience are great personal importance as well as increasing social importance yet have led to increasing division within modern societies including the United States. Public universities, no less than their private counterparts, need to engage more actively with related issues and competing viewpoints in order to prepare students for global realities and future roles as citizens. University leaders, faculty and students have worked actively in recent years to engage with issues of multiculturalism and the implications of gender, race, ethnicity, sexuality. Questions of faith and spirituality may in some ways seem more personal, private, and fraught with political overtones. Nonetheless, current conflicts and misunderstandings between those of different faith- and conscience-based traditions unless there are active efforts build bridges that do not currently exist. Special care will be needed to proceed deliberately, creatively, and sensitively in meeting associated challenges. A comprehensive, active approach might include efforts relating to the curriculum, such as: strengthening curricular offerings relating to philosophy, religious studies, or faith-related components of varied courses; developing new courses; or draw on existing models used in other contexts (perhaps a new type of "Great Decisions" course that emphasizes issues of faith and conscience rather than international affairs). It might also be desirable to expand speaker programs focused on issues of faith and conscience featuring either campus-based on visiting speakers. Student affairs programming might be expanded in ways discussed under Approach 2. Campuses might also draw together members of the public from differing faith- and conscience-based viewpoints to engage with those on campus.

Pros

- This approach addresses the range of objectives noted with regard to earlier approaches.
- Public universities are appropriate settings in which to engage with the full-range of pressing social issues and competing viewpoints so that they can be understood more fully. They may be able to bring light (rather than heat) to matters currently confounding the larger society.
- Developing tools for and experience with discussion of deeply-felt differences is important for the future of society and civic life.
- Engaging respectfully with issues of faith and conscience allows students and faculty to learn from others' viewpoints without forcing one's beliefs on others. Issues of faith and conscience are of great importance to students and citizens and it is better to engage with them than to marginalize them in unhealthy ways.
- A multi-faceted, comprehensive approach that engage members of the campus community in a range of contexts are more likely to be effective in broadening understanding and respect than are approaches that limit related discussions to more narrow contexts such as those detailed in earlier approaches.

Cons

- Taking on issues of faith and conscience in a comprehensive way within a public university may create controversy and division. Some faculty, students, parents, and members of the larger community might experience this approach as overbearing and inappropriate in light of their own personal faith and conscience-based beliefs. This approach might also create risks of interference from external forces tied to religious or political viewpoints, or public opprobrium if good-faith efforts prove problematic in execution.
- Some faculty member might worry that this approach could compromise the intellectual ideals and secular nature of the universities or blur important distinctions between the type of critical thinking and intellectual inquiry that is central to a university education and more personal views rooted in conscience and faith-based beliefs. Intermingling issues of faith and conscience in public higher education institutional settings may prove difficult because of the multitude of diverse faith- and conscience-based perspectives or create concerns that such beliefs are not treated with equal respect or attention.
- The University may lack the capacity and competence to undertake such an effort, given other curricular obligations, academic priorities, and resource constraints. Faculty and students may also lack the skills, perspectives, and interests to be navigate challenging topics and conversations effectively.
- Depending on how it would be implemented, this approach might raise legal questions relating to the appropriate roles of publicly funded higher education, faith-based institutions, and individuals' freedom of conscience.
- This approach is less well-defined and may raise expectations that cannot be realized.

SCENARIOS FOR DISCUSSION

Approach 1: Pursue questions of personal faith and conscience in private and maintain the university's neutrality.

A. Admissions Decisions. A college admissions officer is facing a difficult decision in evaluating several prospective undergraduates' high school transcripts. One student had attended a religiously-oriented high school and sought to apply three courses toward required basic admissions requirements in English, history and government: "Christianity and Morality in American Literature," "Christianity's Influence on American History" and "Special Providence: American Government". Another student's transcript included courses on "Race, Class, and Gender in Modern America," "Feminist Issues throughout U.S. History," and "Introduction to Jewish Thought" toward the high school credits required (though not in required areas such as English, history, and government). (based on issues facing UC-Davis)

B. Personal Advice: A faculty member in a technical field is devout and reveals his own religious background to students on the first day of class. Many of the students write on their information sheets that one of their life goals is to develop a closer relationship with God. In a public forum on religion in his department, he asked whether it would be appropriate for him to suggest prayer to those struggling students who have revealed to him their own desire to connect to God. (based on University of Michigan "Difficult Dialogues" scenario).

C. Living and Learning. A resident adviser at the university has contacted students on her dorm floor inviting them to attend a study group she's created on Buddhism. Other students have decided to organize a standing dinner discussion group at the campus cafeteria to discuss Islam. (based in part on example from UW-Eau Claire)

Approach 2: Enhance student options and engage outside the classroom.

D. Student Speaker. An elected student government leader has been asked to give a welcoming speech to incoming students at a public university. He urges them to set their sights high and goes on to say that he has accepted Christ as his savior and hopes they will as well. Other students criticized his actions, saying he had been elected to represent the whole student body, including those of diverse faith-related viewpoints. (based on Dartmouth incident)

E. Student Organizations. A university requires every student organization wishing to use university facilities and receive student fees in support of its activities to sign a pledge stating that the organization will not discriminate in its membership based on race, ethnicity, gender, creed, religion, nationality, age, disability, or sexual orientation. A student group affiliated with a particular religious sect refused to sign the statement, saying that its mission required it to admit only those who shared a particular religious faith. The group also approached Student Congress and requested funding for a proposed new student publication designed to encourage others to adopt the faith of its members. (based on examples at UNC-CH, and elsewhere)

F. Residence Hall Choices. A group of students has asked the university to establish a special dorm "theme floor" for students who are Roman Catholics or interested in Roman Catholicism. An evangelical Christian group has met with the dean of students and student government officers to demand that rules that currently prohibit solicitation in dormitories be changed so that their members can go door-to-door to distribute leaflets and talk with students living there about their beliefs. (based in part on example from UW-Madison).

Approach 3: Engage personal faith and conscience in the classroom, respectfully, if faculty choose

G. Recommendation Letter. A student approached the undergraduate adviser in the biology department, and requested a recommendation to medical school. The adviser reviewed her transcript and noted that she had not yet taken a required course in evolutionary biology. The student said that she declined to take the course because of her religious beliefs. The adviser then declined to give the requested recommendation noting that a student who had not taken that course would be poorly prepared for medical school and could not be recommended. (based on incident at Texas Tech)

H. Internship Placement. In a field placement at a faith-based organization, a student became aware that her supervisors understood faith to be an integral part of their patient counseling. The student is from a different faith tradition and not particularly religious. Although she was open to responding to discussions about religion initiated by patients, she felt uncomfortable raising the topic herself as her mentors expected her to do. (based on University of Michigan "Difficult Dialogues" scenario)

I. Learning to Act. A Mormon woman applied for admission to an actor-training program at a public university. At the time she applied she told program officials that she would not be willing to use profane language or appear in the nude because of her religious beliefs. Initially, when classroom exercises included performing scripts that included profanity, she changed the words. Subsequently, her instructors told her that she needed to perform the scenes as written because copyright words of playwrights could not be changed without written permission for public performances, and because students needed to take on roles with characters unlike themselves (including characters such as a pregnant, unwed prostitute to whose lines the student objected). (based on an incident at the University of Utah).

J. Classroom Dialogues: A group of faculty and students recently began discussing some of the "tips" they'd offer others on dealing with controversy in the classroom. Some of their ideas are listed below. Are there other tips worth noting?

- ✓ Respect for students is paramount, and it can't be faked. The message should be "feel free to disagree with me and support your point of view." It's important to know students and their backgrounds. It's important to discuss the value of open dialogue and conflict in the marketplace of ideas. Personal discomfort is inevitable are ideas are challenged. That is how we grow and why it is so valuable to engage with different viewpoints in the classroom.
- ✓ Faculty and students need to work together to create a safe place for open discussion. Some faculty set "ground rules" while others encourage students to reach "group agreements." Students need to know what to expect regarding how controversial topics will be covered. Everyone's perspectives need to be welcomed and treated fairly. Controversial issues can be honored by covering different perspectives. Be sure students know the difference between personal attacks and honest discussion of one's own experiences, values and ideas. Faculty members should also avoid snide comments and should provide students with opportunities to talk with them outside class to raise questions about fairness in treatment of difficult issues.
- ✓ Faculty members disagree about whether they should disclose their own opinions on controversial topics (some say disclosure dampens discussion, others state their opinion and reasons to encourage others to engage). They also need to appreciate that certain topics are very emotional for students and be prepared to handle such emotions. They should also be ready to deal with students who say something inflammatory.

Approach 4: Engage questions of faith and conscience widely, actively, and deliberately

K. Learning Tolerance. Members of the faculty at the nation's military academies have significant responsibilities in preparing future military officers to endure the pressures of battle and the challenges of leading troops into harm's way. Recently, several students and faculty who held very strong Christian viewpoints encouraged students in their classes to adopt religious viewpoints similar to their own and began meetings and sports events attended by more junior cadets with prayers. The Academy recently clarified its rules on these issues and implemented a course on "religious tolerance" that is required of all cadets. (based on events at Air Force Academy)

L Middle East Controversies. In the wake of growing tensions in the Middle East, a number of universities have faced their own Middle East controversies. A faculty member in Middle-Eastern studies allegedly to permited only those sharing his viewpoints on the Palestine/Israeli conflict in his class and repeatedly challenged Jewish students who disagreed with him. A distinguished junior faculty member was openly shunned and criticized on a colleague's blog as a result of her recent scholarship criticizing the role played by religious belief in recent diplomatic history (contrary to her colleague's view). One student group proposed a pro-Palestinian art exhibit while another group wanted to host a controversial pro-Israeli speaker on campus at the same time. Campus officials believed that these events would create controversy and potential security issues, and wanted students to contribute to the cost of special security measures. (based on events at Columbia, Arizona State, and elsewhere).

Personal Faith and Conscience: How, When, Where and With Whom Can We Speak Our Minds on a Public University Campus? ("Placemat" 9/6/06)

Approach 1. PURSUE IN PRIVATE AND MAINTAIN UNIVERSITY NEUTRALITY	Approach 2. ENHANCE STUDENT OPTIONS AND ENGAGE OUTSIDE THE CLASSROOM	Approach 3. ENGAGE PERSONAL FAITH AND CONSCIENCE IN THE CLASSROOM, RESPECTFULLY, IF FACULTY CHOOSE	Approach 4. ENGAGE QUESTIONS OF FAITH AND CONSCIENCE WIDELY, ACTIVELY AND DELIBERATELY
Description:* Speech about personal faith and conscience belongs in private settings or off campus, in keeping with public universities' secular character and obligations of neutrality.	Description: Students should have ample opportunities to explore issues of personal faith and conscience if they choose to do so, but such opportunities should be situated primarily outside the classroom.	Description. Speech about personal faith and conscience may occur on campus, including in the classroom, if conducted respectfully and if the professor believes it relevant.	Description. Public universities should actively encourage more widespread conversation and engagement with issues of personal faith and conscience throughout their campuses, including in private, student, classroom and academic settings.
Who supports this approach and why? Those who think *public institutions should remain neutral on matters of faith and conscience given the wide range of individual perspectives *other institutions (churches, family/friends) are better situated to deal with such matters * public higher education is funded by taxpayers who expect neutrality *there should be a wide margin separating church and state *universities shouldn't intrude upon or dictate anyone's beliefs	Who supports this approach and why? Those who think *students have educational and developmental needs related to faith and conscience that should not be ignored or pushed off-campus *speech about faith and conscience belongs outside the classroom where faculty are not involved in judging or grading students' views *campus-based activities should incorporate the range of student interests including those related to personal faith and conscience *the best approach is one that honors individual student interests on a voluntary basis *creative initiatives about faith and conscience should be led by students in order to meet their most substantial interests and needs.	Who supports this approach and why? Those who think *faculty members are best situated to determine the extent to which matters of faith and conscience are relevant to the academic program *classroom discussions provide powerful learning opportunities that link learning inside and outside the classroom *inclusion of such discussions in the classroom allows faculty and students to engage with each other authentically about key issues such as the nature of authority *students should have opportunities to engage with faculty members about how their faith relates to issues raised in class. *universities' educational and intellectual missions calls for active efforts to explore difficult questions	Who supports this approach and why? Those who think *a comprehensive approach is needed to engage with pressing social issues and competing viewpoints *a multi-faceted approach is more likely to lead to understanding and respect *developing tools for and experience with discussion of deeply-felt differences is important for the future of society and civic life. *engaging respectfully with issues of faith and conscience allows students and faculty to learn from others' viewpoints without forcing one's beliefs on others *discussion of issues of faith and conscience cannot be artificially pigeonholed and should be appropriately addressed wherever they arise
Who is opposed to this approach and why? Those who think *separating personal faith and conscience from day-to-day life is artificial and impractical. *such separation marginalizes these issues and makes the campus inhospitable to some *students are at a life stage when it's important to engage in such discussions in many settings	Who is opposed to this approach and why? Those who think *compartmentalization of this sort is artificial *faculty who wish to address such issues in the classroom should not be discouraged from doing so * giving personal faith and conscience an institutional place on campus might compromise the principle of university neutrality	Who is opposed to this approach and why? Those who think this approach *may create blurry lines about what is relevant in class or what responses are "respectful" *gives professors too much unilateral power to decide what is relevant or respectful *creates expectations of in-class discussions when professors are hard-pressed to cover relevant material in	Who is opposed to this approach and why? Those who think this approach *might feel overbearing and inappropriate in light of their personal beliefs or might subject the university to public opprobrium if not well-implemented *creates risks of interference from external forces tied to religious or political viewpoints *could compromise the intellectual *this approach is anti-intellectual and perhaps contrary to academic freedom	* the university might appear to intrude upon their expressions of faith by encouraging discussions to be held outside the classroom rather than in classrooms *students and student affairs professionals may find it difficult to deal with conflicts and contention that increasingly characterize religious and political debates going on outside campus walls	courses *intrudes on professors' or students' academic freedom and puts students or professors on the spot to express their views on personal beliefs *creates the risk that professors and students will have difficulty in addressing challenging, hot-button issues where issues of faith and intellectual inquiry collide	ideals and secular nature of the university or blur important distinctions between the type of critical thinking and more personal views *is risky because the university community may lack the competence to implement it * is poorly defined and may raise expectations that cannot be realized.

What are some of the tradeoffs and consequences of this approach? *This approach may seem clear but would be difficult to communicate or enforce *The "wall" between church and state is not clearly delineated and this approach may lead to litigation. *Neutrality may be experienced as hostility by some.	What are some of the tradeoffs and consequences of this approach? *This approach creates an artificial separation between non-classroom and classroom conversations *This approach allows students to associate with those who share their particular viewpoints but doesn't help bridge gaps in understanding	What are some of the tradeoffs and consequences of this approach? *More intensive efforts may be needed in order to prepare faculty and students for meaningful dialogue *Increased tension between faith- and conscience-based beliefs and intellectual inquiry in the classroom may arise if such discussions occur more frequently	What are some of the tradeoffs and consequences of this approach? This approach may *lead to greater division within the university community. *create concerns that not all faith- or conscience-based perspectives are treated even-handedly *raise legal questions
What facts, research or additional action is important to this approach? *Clarifying understandings of separation of church and state and related legal principles *Considering the impact of this approach on some members of the campus community who believe they should "witness" or expound on their faith outside church settings.	What facts, research or additional action are important to this approach? *Providing ample support for non-classroom initiatives	What facts, research or additional action are important to this approach? *Developing greater "cultural competence" that allows faculty and students to address difficult questions in a meaningful way. *Supporting faculty in careful efforts to assess student learning when critical thinking is required at the intersection of faith- or conscience-based beliefs and intellectual inquiry	What facts, research or additional action is important to this approach? *Developing a range of learning opportunities (such as additional courses, course sections, modules, speaker programs, and student engagement opportunities) *Providing clear information to the university community and the public about rationale and strategies

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Saturday, October 28, 2006 11:06 PM
To: Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: MBA cheaters

Thanks. There was a big article on this in USA Today a few weeks ago, and the meeting I went to at NCSU on Friday also discussed this.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Geoff Sayre-McCord wrote:
> FYI,
> http://biz.yahoo.com/weekend/mbacheat_1.html
> -- Geoff
>
> _____
> Geoffrey Sayre-McCord
> Professor and Department Chair
> Department of Philosophy, CB #3125
> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
> USA
>
> Phone: (919) 962-2695
> email: sayre-mccord@unc.edu
> http://philosophy.unc.edu/smccord.htm
>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Sunday, October 29, 2006 8:34 PM
To: Jesse Prinz <jesse@subcortex.com>; Chapel Hill Philosophy <hobler@email.unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: Open Position in Philosophy]
Attach: Open Position in Philosophy.msg

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: Matos, Yalidy M. <ymatos@conncoll.edu>
Sent: Sunday, October 29, 2006 7:10 PM
To: Bar-On, Dorit <dbar@email.unc.edu>; Boxill, Bernard R <brboxill@email.unc.edu>; Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>; Geoffrey.Brennan@anu.edu.au; Corrado, Michael L <mlcorrad@email.unc.edu>; Hill, Thomas E Jr <thill@email.unc.edu>; Hofweber, Thomas <hofweber@unc.edu>; Lange, Marc B <mlange@email.unc.edu>; Long, Douglas C <dlong@email.unc.edu>; Lycan, William G <ujanel@isis.unc.edu>; maclean@unc.edu; anelson@unc.edu; Neta, Ram <neta@email.unc.edu>; Walker, Rebecca L <rebecca_l_walker@med.unc.edu>; Wolf, Susan R <susanw@unc.edu>
Subject: Open Position in Philosophy
Attach: Philosophy Final Ad.doc

Dear Professor

I am hoping that you will alert potential candidates that Connecticut College is seeking to fill a tenure-track position in Philosophy to begin in the fall of 2007 at the rank of Assistant Professor. The areas of specialization are political, social and feminist philosophy and the philosophy of law, and the relevance within all these areas to issues of gender, race, ethnicity, age, class and globalization. A Ph.D. is required. A more detailed job description is attached. Applications received by November 15, 2006 will receive full consideration.

I am trying to ensure that we attract a richly diverse pool of candidates, and I hope that you will send the job description to potential candidates whose backgrounds are a strong match, even to those who are not actively searching but who might be interested if they were to learn about this position. Thank you for your assistance! If you wish to respond to me, my email address is jkkir@conncoll.edu <mailto:jkkir@conncoll.edu> .

Judy Kirmmse

Affirmative Action Officer

Connecticut College

270 Mohegan Avenue

New London, CT 06320-4196

CONNECTICUT COLLEGE, New London, CT. The Philosophy Department invites applications for a full-time, tenure-track position at the rank of Assistant Professor to begin in fall, 2007. Ph.D. required. Areas of specialization are political, social and feminist philosophy and the philosophy of law. We are especially interested in candidates whose work explores issues of gender, race, ethnicity, age, class and/or globalization.

Connecticut College is a private, highly selective college with a strong commitment to the liberal arts tradition and an emphasis on broad interdisciplinary teaching and research. The normal teaching load is five courses annually, and faculty members are expected to contribute to the College's general education program, which includes a first year seminar component. Salary is competitive. Tenure-track faculties receive a research stipend for their first two summers and a semester's leave at full salary after their third year if they are reappointed for the full probationary period. A distinctive feature of the academic structure of the College is its six interdisciplinary centers, which focus on international studies and the liberal arts, arts and technology, the comparative study of race and ethnicity, conservation biology and environmental studies, community action and public policy, and teaching and learning. The College is a member of the Academic Career Network, a resource for dual-career couples (http://acn.fivecolleges.edu), and is an Affirmative Action/Equal Opportunity Employer. The College is committed by mission to developing diversity and sustaining a diverse faculty and staff.

Applications received by November 15, 2006 will receive full consideration. Candidates will be interviewed at the Eastern APA in December. The dossier should include a letter of interest; current detailed CV; graduate transcript; syllabi of courses taught; teaching evaluations; a writing sample; and three recent letters of reference giving the name, address, telephone number and e-mail address of the writer.

Apply to Professor Lawrence Vogel, Chair, Department of Philosophy, Box 5628, Connecticut College, 270 Mohegan Avenue, New London, CT 06320

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, October 30, 2006 12:09 PM
To: Baer, Marc Vincent <mbaer@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Ethics in the News
Attach: Ethics in News-gallery owner.doc

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

The Role of the Gallery Owner in Times of War

In times of war, it is often easier to criticize one's own country by way of analogy to other political systems (whether those systems are fictional—as we see in Orwell, or real—as we see with recent documentarians). In finding flaws in other political systems, we can sometimes find flaws in our own. Take contemporary Russia as an example. Egregious incidents of the reckless uses of power are ubiquitous, and they have been throughout Putin's tenure as President of the Russian Federation (though they are increasing with alarming frequency). As many people have become aware, the journalist Anna Politkovskaya, was recently gunned down in her apartment building; a particularly alarming indication that Russia has become the third most dangerous nation in the world for journalists.

(http://www.cbsnews.com/blogs/2006/10/09/publiceye/entry2074174.shtml)

Other cases of the reckless abuse of power in the Russian Federation, however, have retained a lower profile. Take, for example, the case of Marat Guelman, the owner of an art gallery in Moscow. Mr. Guelman hung an anti-fascist art exhibit, displaying some works depicting leaders such as Vladimir Putin, Osama Bin Laden, and George Bush lounging together in boxer shorts. Several pieces of art (including the aforementioned piece) from the display were on consignment and were sold to a gallery in London. However, when London based gallery owner Matthew Bown attempted to acquire the works in order to bring them back to London on October 20, Russian officials at Sheremetyevo-2 airport confiscated 11 of these pieces. Presumably, this confiscation was not meant to ensure that Russian culture stay within the borders of Russia as when Soviet administrations detained cultural icons for propagandistic purposes (cf., the case of Lev Sergeyvich Termen—the inventor of the Theremin). Presumably, Russian officials were acting on the assumption that the free expression embodied in such works would have deleterious effects on Russian society. Thus, although Russian officials retained the artworks, Mr. Bown was allowed to return to England unharmed.

Mr. Guelman did not get off so easily. The following day, thugs burst into Mr. Guelman's gallery, attacked him, and destroyed some work by a Georgian based artist. Though their motives for the attack are unknown, it is plausible that the attacks were related to Mr. Guelman's anti-fascist politics; after all, his irreverent artwork had previously angered the more orthodox elements of Russian society, and particularly the Russian Orthodox Church.

(http://www.nytimes.com/2006/10/22/world/europe/22russia.html?pagewanted=print)

Depicting the Russian Federation as a totalitarian state, becoming increasingly repressive of free expression, is an easy task. So is decrying the acts of the thugs who attacked Mr. Guelman. However, this case is also instructive in the way that it speaks to other, freer societies, where reporters do not fear for their lives (even if they do fear being jailed for concealing their sources).

In 1999, Mayor Rudolph Giuliani revoked the Brooklyn Museum of Art's 7.2 million dollar per year city subsidy because the museum showed a work of art depicting a painting of the Virgin Mary covered in elephant dung; subsequently, the city of New York sued the Brooklyn Museum of Art in state court in an attempt to evict the museum and remove its governing board. And all of this happened without Mr. Giuliani ever seeing the work of art. New York City, a paragon of artistic freedom, responded in this case not just with the confiscation of works of art, but with an attempt to shut down an entire museum. Such actions are a large-scale violation of freedom of expression, similar in many respects, though in important ways different (we mustn't forget that the curators of the show were not physically attacked and that the museum is still in operation), from Mr. Guelman's case.

(http://www.pbs.org/newshour/bb/entertainment/july-dec99/art_10-8.html)

The American response to the reckless abuse of power in the Russian Federation is also quite revealing. The American government has not threatened diplomatic sanctions against Russia, nor has there been any public censorship of Putin for his role in this repressive regime as well as his lack of control over local politics. In fact, the Bush administration has repeatedly noted that although Russia has problems, they are moving in the right direction. Why has our administration refused to censor the Russian Federation, especially when this administration routinely notes that the values of a free society are worth going to war to protect? Why are we willing to allow sanctions of free expression in our own country? Despite the soft rhetoric with which we are constantly bombarded, our government has not typically addressed such concerns.

Yet we do still live in a society where we have a wide degree of freedom of expression. Keeping this in mind, we have the opportunity to ensure an even wider range of such freedoms. But how can we as American citizens protect our own freedom of expression? One way to think through this issue is by considering the role of the artist, the gallery owner, and the academic in times of war. Such responsibilities have often been discussed in some small circles, but they haven't been widely publicized.

(Arguments on this point have been offered from such diverse positions as that of John Stuart Mill—especially in his book On liberty, Mark Twain, Albert Camus, and Noam Chomsky—especially in his 1967 paper in the New York review of books called "The responsibility of intellectuals)

In a truly free society, our politicians would stand up for the freedom of artists and writers to express their thoughts, even when these thoughts are not in line with our own views. And at least in principle, this freedom of expression is enshrined in the founding documents of our country in a way that guarantees the freedom to express views that people might not like. Contrary to the apparently prevailing view, dissent is not unpatriotic; it is one of the most patriotic capacities that we as citizens possess. If our government tells us that open discussion of some sorts fosters terrorism, it is using deplorable tactics. These are precisely the sorts of tactics that have been fashionable in numerous regimes throughout history. They are prevalent in Putin's Russia and they were prevalent in Nazi Germany—even Goebels was in favor of free speech so long as it was speech that he agreed with.

We find ourselves at a moment in history where academics, artists, and gallery owners need to speak out on all sides of various issues, even if they espouse opinions that some of us find deplorable. What we must learn from the current situation in Russia is that as a free society we have a moral obligation to express opinions that are contrary to the mainstream. Those of us that are granted the most time for thought, academics and artists, must be on the forefront of the fight to keep America free, for if we are not a society that allows its members the freedom to fully express themselves, then how could importing our values overseas, whether by diplomacy or bloodshed, make other countries free?

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, October 31, 2006 12:58 PM
To: Gary Comstock <gcomstock@ncsu.edu>
Subject: Re: reception

Hi Gary,
Thanks for your email. I too am sorry I didn't make it to your reception.
Also, I wish I could attend the conference at the Humanities Center.
Unfortunately I will be in Airizona at a US Anti-Doping Symposium.

I am swamped this week and next, so won't be coming over to NCSU for a while. However, I could make time to come Thursday, Nov 16th. Would that fit for you?

I am quite interested in working with you on Research Ethics, and very much appreciated your presentation. On the day before I had just given a workshop to the Chapel Hill/Carrboro Chamber of Commerce on "Ethical Decision-Making" and used some similar approaches.
Also, the Parr Center has an "Ethics in the News" section on the website, and since cheating, especially in business schools, has been in several newspapers in the past 2-3 weeks, we are going to do a piece on that.

See you soon.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

>>
>

From: nobody@notify.unc.edu on behalf of muic@unc.edu
Sent: Tuesday, October 31, 2006 8:08 PM
To: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: INFORMATIONAL: Informational: Attention: Breast Cancer Survivors Under the Age of 50

BREAST CANCER SURVIVORS UNDER AGE 50 are needed as volunteers for focus groups to get feedback on audio and written materials designed for a research study to help younger breast cancer survivors to manage fears of recurrence and long term treatment side effects. The focus groups will be held on November 14th 6:00-8:00 PM and November 16th 6:30-8:30 at the Psychology Research Center and Clinic on Finley Golf Course Road.

If you:
*completed treatment for localized breast cancer 2 to 4 years ago
*are under 50 years old
You are qualified to participate in a focus group.

Qualified participants will receive payment of $20 cash or check for participating in a focus group.

If interested, call 919-966-6610.

This message was approved by the Public Health-Nursing Review Board (IRB) on 10/27/2006, IRB # 05-1500

This email is sponsored by: Managing Uncertainty in Cancer Studies, School of Nursing, UNC-Chapel Hill

This email is sponsored by: School of Nursing

==========

"INFORMATIONAL:" email will only be sent to those who have indicated that they do want to receive mass email. To set your informational mass email preference, logon to the on-line directory web site at https://dir.unc.edu/dir/update.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, November 2, 2006 11:46 AM
To: Postema, Gerald J <gpostema@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Emailing: caps.unc.edu
Attach: caps.unc.edu.htm

Here's the website.
http://caps.unc.edu/

<BASE HREF="http://caps.unc.edu/">
<?xml version="1.0"?><!DOCTYPE html PUBLIC "-//W3C//DTD XHTML 1.0 Transitional//EN"
"http://www.w3.org/TR/xhtml1/DTD/xhtml1-transitional.dtd">
<html xmlns="http://www.w3.org/1999/xhtml">
<head>
<title>UNC Counseling & Wellness Services</title>
<meta http-equiv="Content-Type" content="text/html; charset=iso-8859-1" />
<title>UNC Counseling & Wellness Services - Home</title>
<meta name="description" content="Counseling and Wellness Services at UNC Chapel Hill"
/>
<meta name="keywords" content="counseling, therapy, mental health" />
<meta name="Generator" content="Mambo - Copyright 2000 - 2005 Miro International Pty Ltd. All rights reserved." />
<meta name="robots" content="index, follow" />
<base href="http://cws.unc.edu/" />
<link rel="shortcut icon" href="http://cws.unc.edu/images/favicon.ico" />
<script language="JavaScript" type="text/javascript">
<!--
function MM_reloadPage(init) { //reloads the window if Nav4 resized if (init==true) with (navigator) {if ((appName=="Netscape")&&(parseInt(appVersion)==4)) { document.MM_pgW=innerWidth; document.MM_pgH=innerHeight; onresize=MM_reloadPage; }}
  else if (innerWidth!=document.MM_pgW || innerHeight!=document.MM_pgH) location.reload();
}
MM_reloadPage(true);
//-->
</script>
<link href="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/css/template_css.css" rel="stylesheet" type="text/css" />
<link rel="shortcut icon" href="http://cws.unc.edu/images/favicon.ico" />

</head>
<body class="body">

<table border="0" cellspacing="0" cellpadding="0" width="760">
<tr bgcolor="#9999FF">
<td><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/pix.gif" border="0" alt="border" height="1" width="1" /></td>
<td><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/pix.gif" border="0" alt="border" height="1" width="760" /></td>
<td><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/pix.gif" border="0" alt="border" height="1" width="1" /></td>
<td><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/shadow1.gif" border="0" alt="border" height="1" width="8" /></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td bgcolor="#9999FF"><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/pix.gif"

```
border="0" alt="border" height="1" width="1" /></td>
<td>

    <table border="0" cellspacing="0" cellpadding="0" width="100%">
    <tr bgcolor="#9999FF">
    <td><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/pix.gif" border="0"
alt="border" height="10" width="1" /></td>
    <td><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/pix.gif" border="0" alt="border" height="10" width="1" /></td>
    </tr>
    <tr valign="top">
    <td width="478">
                        <table cellpadding="0" cellspacing="0" class="moduletable">
                                    <tr>
                              <td>

                  <img src="http://cws.unc.edu/images/stories/banners/walkingacrosscampus.jpg" border="0" width="480" height="170" alt="walkingacrosscampus.jpg" />
                                        </td>
                        </tr>
                        </table>
                        <!--
<img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/.jpg" border="0" alt="old well image" height="172" width="478" />
-->
</td>
    <td align="center" valign="center">
Counseling and Wellness Services (CWS)

<img src="http://cws.unc.edu/images/stories/unc_logo.jpg" border="0" alt="UNC Chapel Hill Logo">
</td>
    </tr>
    <tr bgcolor="#9999FF">
    <td><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/pix.gif" border="0"
alt="border" height="10" width="1" /></td>
    <td><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/pix.gif" border="0" alt="border" height="10" width="1" /></td>
    </tr>
    </table>

    <table border="0" cellspacing="0" cellpadding="0" width="100%">
    <tr>
```

```
    <td colspan="2">   Home
</td>
    </tr>
    <tr bgcolor="#333333">
    <td><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/pix.gif" border="0"
alt="border" height="1" width="1" /></td>
    <td><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/pix.gif" border="0" alt="border" height="1" width="1" /></td>
    </tr>
    </table>

    <table border="0" cellspacing="0" cellpadding="0" width="100%" height="600">
    <tr>
    <td valign="top" width="2" bgcolor="#6666CC"> </td>
    <td valign="top" width="160" bgcolor="#6666CC">                                <table cellpadding="0" cellspacing="0" class="moduletable">
                                                    <tr>
                                        <th valign="top">
                                                                                Main Menu
Menu                                    </th>
                                <td>

<table width="100%" border="0" cellpadding="0" cellspacing="0">
<tr align="left"><td>Home</td></tr>
<tr align="left"><td><a href="http://cws.unc.edu/content/category/4/13/27/" class="mainlevel"
>Welcome and News</td></tr>
<tr align="left"><td><a href="http://cws.unc.edu/content/category/4/15/33/" class="mainlevel"
>Services for Students</td></tr>
<tr align="left"><td><a href="http://cws.unc.edu/content/category/4/38/80/" class="mainlevel"
> CWS Wellness Outreach</td></tr>
<tr align="left"><td><a href="http://cws.unc.edu/content/category/4/18/37/" class="mainlevel"
>Urgent Care and Crises</td></tr>
<tr align="left"><td><a href="http://cws.unc.edu/content/category/4/37/79/" class="mainlevel"
>Suicide Prevention and Intervention Network</td></tr>
<tr align="left"><td><a href="http://cws.unc.edu/content/view/14/55/" class="mainlevel"
>Diversity-Cultural Competency</td></tr>
<tr align="left"><td>For Faculty and Staff</td></tr>
<tr align="left"><td><a href="http://cws.unc.edu/content/category/4/19/38/" class="mainlevel"
>For Parents</td></tr>
<tr align="left"><td><a href="http://cws.unc.edu/content/category/4/20/43/" class="mainlevel"
>Self-help & Wellness</td></tr>
<tr align="left"><td><a href="http://cws.unc.edu/content/view/49/42/" class="mainlevel"
>Groups and Workshops</td></tr>
<tr align="left"><td><a href="http://cws.unc.edu/component/option,com_contact/catid,31/Itemid,52/"
```

class="mainlevel" >Meet the CWS Team</td></tr>
<tr align="left"><td>Business Matters</td></tr>
<tr align="left"><td>Calendar</td></tr>
<tr align="left"><td>Contact Us</td></tr>
<tr align="left"><td>Documents</td></tr>
</table> </td>
</tr>
</table>
</td>
<td valign="top">

<table border="0" cellspacing="0" cellpadding="0" width="95%">
<tr>
<td valign="top" align="left"><table class="blog" cellpadding="0" cellspacing="0"><tr><td valign="top"> <table class="contentpaneopen">
<tr>
<td class="contentheading" width="100%">
Welcome
</td>
</tr>
</table>

<table class="contentpaneopen">
<tr>
<td valign="top" colspan="2">
Center for Healthy Student Behavior (CHSB) and Counseling and Psychological Services (CAPS) have merged and are now Counseling and Wellness Services (CWS). Our websites are in the process of being integrated. For information on wellness and health education follow this link to the current CWS Wellness Outreach page .

Welcome to the web site for Counseling and Wellness Services (CWS) a Campus Health Services department, within the Division of Student Affairs at The University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

Our staff is available to help UNC-Chapel Hill students solve personal, social, and academic problems by providing individual evaluation, counseling, and urgent consultation.

We help students who are dealing with everyday problems related to college life, as well as students with more serious concerns. Same day crisis intervention is available through the CWS Urgent Care and Consultation Teams' On-Call Therapists to help students manage acute personal crises.

If you would like to talk with us here at CWS, call (919) 966-3658 to make an appointment, or visit us on the third floor of Campus Health Services in the James A. Taylor Building located between the UNC

Hospitals and UNC's Kenan Football Stadium.

/><< Regular Office Hours:
CWS is open from 8:00 am to 5:00 pm, Monday through Friday,
(919) 966-3658.
After 5:00 pm, please call 919-966-2281 for assistance, the UNC-Chapel Hill Campus Health Services and the Afterhours HealthLink offer crisis intervention.

Counseling and Wellness Services (CWS)
Campus Health Services
James A. Taylor Building
Campus Box 7470
Chapel Hill, N.C. 27599-7470
Phone: 919-966-3658 Fax: 919-966-4605

The material provided in this website is not meant to replace a face-to-face consultation with a trained counselor or therapist, nor does this service provide "online" counseling. Please review the "News and Events" page for updates and announcements.
</td>
</tr>
</table>
</td></tr></table>
</td>
</tr>
</table>

</td>
<!-- Show only on non content pages -->

<td valign="top" width="2" bgcolor="#eeeeee"></td>
<td valign="top" width="160" bgcolor="#eeeeee">
<table cellpadding="0" cellspacing="0" class="moduletable">
<tr>
<th valign="top">
Polls
</th>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>
<form name="form2" method="post" action="http://cws.unc.edu/component/option,com_poll/Itemid,1/">
<table width="95%" border="0" cellspacing="0" cellpadding="1" align="center">
<tr>
<td colspan="2" class="poll">How did you learn about our name change?</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td align="center">
<table class='pollstableborder' cellspacing='0' cellpadding='0' border='0'>
<tr>
<td class='sectiontableentry2' valign="top"><input type="radio" name="voteid" id="voteid37" value="37" alt="37" /></td>
<td class='sectiontableentry2' valign="top"><label for="voteid37">web site</label></td>

</tr>
<tr>
<td class='sectiontableentry1' valign="top"><input type="radio" name="voteid" id="voteid38" value="38" alt="38" /></td>
<td class='sectiontableentry1' valign="top"><label for="voteid38">phone call</label></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td class='sectiontableentry2' valign="top"><input type="radio" name="voteid" id="voteid39" value="39" alt="39" /></td>
<td class='sectiontableentry2' valign="top"><label for="voteid39">orientation session</label></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td class='sectiontableentry1' valign="top"><input type="radio" name="voteid" id="voteid40" value="40" alt="40" /></td>
<td class='sectiontableentry1' valign="top"><label for="voteid40">other student</label></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td class='sectiontableentry2' valign="top"><input type="radio" name="voteid" id="voteid41" value="41" alt="41" /></td>
<td class='sectiontableentry2' valign="top"><label for="voteid41">faculty member</label></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td class='sectiontableentry1' valign="top"><input type="radio" name="voteid" id="voteid42" value="42" alt="42" /></td>
<td class='sectiontableentry1' valign="top"><label for="votei d42">advisor</label></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td class='sectiontableentry2' valign="top"><input type="radio" name="voteid" id="voteid43" value="43" alt="43" /></td>
<td class='sectiontableentry2' valign="top"><label for="voteid43">other...</label></td>
</tr>
</table>
</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td colspan="2" align="center">
<input type="submit" name="task_button" class="button" value="Vote" />
<input type="button" name="option" class="button" value="Results" onclick="document.location.href='http://cws.unc.edu/component/option,com_poll/task,results/i d,17/';" />
</td>

```
                    </tr>
                </table>
                <input type="hidden" name="id" value="17" />
                <input type="hidden" name="task" value="vote" /> </form>
                                    </td>
                    </tr>
                    </table>
                                            <table cellpadding="0" cellspacing="0" class="moduletable">
                                            <tr>
                                <td>

<form action="http://cws.unc.edu/" method="post">

<input alt="search" class="inputbox" type="text" name="searchword" size="20" value="search...''  onblur="if(this.value==='') this.value='search...';'' onfocus="if(this.value==='search...') this.value='';'' />

<input type="hidden" name="option" value="search" /> </form>                                 </td>
                    </tr>
                    </table>
                    </td>

   </tr>
    </table>

    <table border="0" cellspacing="0" cellpadding="0" width="100%">
    <tr bgcolor="#333333">
    <td><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/pix.gif" border="0"
alt="border" height="1" width="1" /></td>
    <td><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/pix.gif" border="0" alt="border" height="1" width="1" /><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/pix.gif" border="0" alt="border"
height="1" width="439" /></td>
    <td><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/pix.gif" border="0" alt="border" height="1" width="1" /></td>
    </tr>
    <tr>
    <td> </td>
    <td> </td>
    <td> </td>
    </tr>
    <tr bgcolor="#9999FF">
    <td><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/pix.gif" border="0"
alt="border" height="10" width="1" /></td>
    <td align="center">UNC Counseling and Wellness Services | <a
```

```
href="http://studentaffairs.unc.edu">Division of Student Affairs | University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill</td>
    <td><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/pix.gif" border="0"
alt="border" height="10" width="1" /></td>
    </tr>
    </table>

</td>
<td bgcolor="#9999FF"><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/pix.gif" border="0" alt="border" height="1" width="1" /></td>
<td background="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/shadow2.gif"><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/pix.gif" border="0" alt="border" height="1" width="8" /></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td bgcolor="#9999FF"><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/pix.gif" border="0" alt="border" height="1" width="1" /></td>
<td bgcolor="#9999FF"><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/pix.gif" border="0" alt="border" height="1" width="760" /></td>
<td bgcolor="#9999FF"><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/pix.gif" border="0" alt="border" height="1" width="1" /></td>
<td><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/shadow3.gif" border="0" alt="border" height="1" width="8" /></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/shadow4.gif" border="0"
alt="border" height="6" width="1" /></td>
<td><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/shadow5.gif" border="0"
alt="border" height="6" width="760" /></td>
<td><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/shadow6.gif" border="0"
alt="border" height="6" width="1" /></td>
<td><img src="http://cws.unc.edu/templates/unc_caps/images/shadow7.gif" border="0" alt="border" height="6" width="8" /></td>
</tr>
</table>

</center> </body>
</html><!-- 1162485921 -->
```

Free Expression and the Role of the Intellectual, the Artist and the Gallery Owner in Times of War

In times of war, we need to reflect on the importance of criticizing our own country and the right which makes that possible—the right to free speech. Looking at other countries' flaws in this regard can help spotlight problems in our own. Take contemporary Russia, for example, where abuse of power has characterized Putin's tenure as president. Indeed, such events are increasing in frequency. One recent high profile case is that of journalist Anna Politkovskaya, who was recently gunned down in her apartment building. This signaled the alarming state of free speech in the Russian Federation, recently identified as the third most dangerous nation in the world for journalists.

(http://www.cbsnews.com/blogs/2006/10/09/publiceye/entry2074174.shtml)

Other cases of abuse of free speech haven't received as much attention, yet they, too, are ominous. Take, for example, the case of Marat Guelman, owner of an art gallery in Moscow. Just days ago, Mr. Guelman held an anti-fascist art exhibit displaying some works depicting Putin, Osama Bin Laden, and George Bush lounging together in boxer shorts. Several pieces of art from the display were on consignment and were subsequently sold to a gallery in London. When gallery owner Matthew Bown attempted to collect the works to take them back to London, however, eleven of the pieces were confiscated at the local airport. It seems beyond doubt that Russian officials were acting on the assumption that the free expression of the works would have had deleterious effects on Russian society. Although officials retained the artworks, Mr. Bown was allowed to return to England unharmed.

Mr. Guelman did not get off so easily. The following day, thugs burst into his gallery, attacked him, and destroyed various works of art. Though the motives of the attack are not known for certain, it seems overwhelmingly likely that they were a response to Guelman's anti-fascist politics.

(http://www.nytimes.com/2006/10/22/world/europe/22russia.html?pagewanted=print)

The evil of the thugs who attacked Mr. Guelman is clear, as is the fact that the Russian Federation is an authoritarian state that increasingly oppresses freedom of expression. These conditions in Russia invite us to reflect on the issue of freedom of expression in freer societies, such as our own, where even though reporters do not fear for their lives, free expression is under attack.

In 1999, New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani revoked the Brooklyn Museum of Art's $7.2 million annual subsidy because the museum showed a painting of the Virgin Mary covered in elephant dung. The city then sued the museum in state court attempting to evict it and remove its governing board. All of this happened without Mr. Giuliani ever seeing the work of art. New York City, long known as a bastion of artistic freedom, responded in this case not just with the confiscation of works of art, but with an attempt to shut down an entire museum. Such actions are a large-scale violation of freedom of expression, similar in important respects to Mr. Guelman's case.

(http://www.pbs.org/newshour/bb/entertainment/july-dec99/art_10-8.html)

To take the issue to a larger scale, the American response to the abuse of power in the Russian Federation is dishearteningly revealing. Our government has neither threatened diplomatic sanctions against Russia, nor publicly censured Putin for his role in this repressive regime. In fact, the Bush administration has repeatedly claimed that although Russia has problems, they are moving in the right direction. Why has our administration done so little when they routinely note that the values of a free society are worth going to war to protect? And why are we willing to allow violations of free expression in our own country? Despite the rhetoric with which we are constantly bombarded, our government has not typically addressed such concerns.

Yet we do live in a society where we still have a wide degree of freedom of expression. With this in mind, we should consider opportunities to protect and expand the range of such freedoms. How can we as American citizens protect our own freedom of expression? One way to think through this issue is by considering the role of the artist, the gallery owner, and the academic in times of war. Seldom widely discussed, the role of these segments of society in the battle for free expression needs to be more appreciated.

A truly free society would uphold the freedom of artists and writers to express their thoughts—and publishers and gallery-owners to present them to the public—even when these thoughts are not in line with our own views. This right is enshrined in the founding documents of our country in a way that guarantees the freedom of expression even for views—such as the condemnation of the current war—that people might not like. Contrary to what some think, dissent is not unpatriotic; it is one of the most patriotic actions a citizen can take. If our government tells us that open discussion of some sort fosters terrorism, it is using deplorable tactics—tactics worthy of Nazi Germany or Putin's Russia—as this constitutes an implicit denial of the right to free expression.

(Arguments on this point have been offered from such diverse positions as that of John Stuart Mill—especially in his book On liberty, Mark Twain, Albert Camus, and Noam Chomsky—especially in his 1967 paper in the New York Review of Books entitled "The Responsibility of Intellectuals.")

We find ourselves at a moment in history where academics, artists, and gallery owners need to speak out on all sides of various issues, even if they espouse opinions that some of us find deplorable. What we must learn from the current situation in Russia is that, as a free society, we have a moral obligation to protect opinions that are contrary to the mainstream. Those of us who deal with ideas—academics, artists, gallery owners, writers, publishers—must be on the forefront of the fight to keep America free, for if we do not, we will neither be able to export the ideal of free expression to countries overseas nor will we be able to retain it here at home.

Free Expression and the Role of the Intellectual, the Artist and the Gallery Owner in Times of War

In times of war, we need to reflect on the importance of criticizing our own country and the right which makes that possible—the right to free speech. Looking at other countries' flaws in this regard can help spotlight problems in our own. Take contemporary Russia, for example, where abuse of power has characterized Putin's tenure as president. Indeed, such events are increasing in frequency. One recent high profile case is that of journalist Anna Politkovskaya, who was recently gunned down in her apartment building. This signaled the alarming state of free speech in the Russian Federation, recently identified as the third most dangerous nation in the world for journalists.

(http://www.cbsnews.com/blogs/2006/10/09/publiceye/entry2074174.shtml)

Other cases of abuse of free speech haven't received as much attention, yet they, too, are ominous. Take, for example, the case of Marat Guelman, owner of an art gallery in Moscow. Just days ago, Mr. Guelman held an anti-fascist art exhibit displaying some works depicting Putin, Osama Bin Laden, and George Bush lounging together in boxer shorts. Several pieces of art from the display were on consignment and were subsequently sold to a gallery in London. When gallery owner Matthew Bown attempted to collect the works to take them back to London, however, eleven of the pieces were confiscated at the local airport. It seems beyond doubt that Russian officials were acting on the assumption that the free expression of the works would have had deleterious effects on Russian society. Although officials retained the artworks, Mr. Bown was allowed to return to England unharmed.

Mr. Guelman did not get off so easily. The following day, thugs burst into his gallery, attacked him, and destroyed various works of art. Though the motives of the attack are not known for certain, it seems overwhelmingly likely that they were a response to Guelman's anti-fascist politics.

(http://www.nytimes.com/2006/10/22/world/europe/22russia.html?pagewanted=print)

The evil of the thugs who attacked Mr. Guelman is clear, as is the fact that the Russian Federation is an authoritarian state that increasingly oppresses freedom of expression. These conditions in Russia invite us to reflect on the issue of freedom of expression in freer societies, such as our own, where even though reporters do not fear for their lives, free expression is under attack.

In 1999, New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani revoked the Brooklyn Museum of Art's $7.2 million annual subsidy because the museum showed a painting of the Virgin Mary covered in elephant dung. The city then sued the museum in state court attempting to evict it and remove its governing board. All of this happened without Mr. Giuliani ever seeing the work of art. New York City, long known as a bastion of artistic freedom, responded in this case not just with the confiscation of works of art, but with an attempt to shut down an entire museum. Such actions are a large-scale violation of freedom of expression, similar in important respects to Mr. Guelman's case.

(http://www.pbs.org/newshour/bb/entertainment/july-dec99/art_10-8.html)

To take the issue to a larger scale, the American response to the abuse of power in the Russian Federation is dishearteningly revealing. Our government has neither threatened diplomatic sanctions against Russia, nor publicly censured Putin for his role in this repressive regime. In fact, the Bush administration has repeatedly claimed that although Russia has problems, they are moving in the right direction. Why has our administration done so little when they routinely note that the values of a free society are worth going to war to protect? And why are we willing to allow violations of free expression in our own country? Despite the rhetoric with which we are constantly bombarded, our government has not typically addressed such concerns.

Yet we do live in a society where we still have a wide degree of freedom of expression. With this in mind, we should consider opportunities to protect and expand the range of such freedoms. How can we as American citizens protect our own freedom of expression? One way to think through this issue is by considering the role of the artist, the gallery owner, and the academic in times of war. Seldom widely discussed, the role of these segments of society in the battle for free expression needs to be more appreciated.

A truly free society would uphold the freedom of artists and writers to express their thoughts—and publishers and gallery-owners to present them to the public—even when these thoughts are not in line with our own views. This right is enshrined in the founding documents of our country in a way that guarantees the freedom of expression even for views—such as the condemnation of the current war—that people might not like. Contrary to what some think, dissent is not unpatriotic; it is one of the most patriotic actions a citizen can take. If our government tells us that open discussion of some sort fosters terrorism, it is using deplorable tactics—tactics worthy of Nazi Germany or Putin's Russia—as this constitutes an implicit denial of the right to free expression.

(Arguments on this point have been offered from such diverse positions as that of John Stuart Mill—especially in his book On liberty, Mark Twain, Albert Camus, and Noam Chomsky—especially in his 1967 paper in the New York Review of Books entitled "The Responsibility of Intellectuals.")

We find ourselves at a moment in history where academics, artists, and gallery owners need to speak out on all sides of various issues, even if they espouse opinions that some of us find deplorable. What we must learn from the current situation in Russia is that, as a free society, we have a moral obligation to protect opinions that are contrary to the mainstream. Those of us who deal with ideas—academics, artists, gallery owners, writers, publishers—must be on the forefront of the fight to keep America free, for if we do not, we will neither be able to export the ideal of free expression to countries overseas nor will we be able to retain it here at home.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, November 7, 2006 11:18 PM
To: Lange, Marc B <mlange@email.unc.edu>; MacLean, Douglas <maclean@email.unc.edu>; Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>
Subject: Academic year 07-08
Attach: Course Needs-07-08.doc; Course Preferences 07-08.doc

Attached are the forms I am about to send out for course preferences for next year. Could you look them over to see if I need to make any changes. Does the preference form serve our purposes?
Have I left anything off the course needs--especially for grad distributions?

If you could get back with me on this quickly, then I can get it out to the faculty.
We need to have a schedule complete and in place in the computer by the first week in January.

Thanks so much,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

2007-2008 COURSE NEEDS

FALL:			SPRING
SERVICE COURSES:
PHIL 101 – LARGE	Intro		PHIL 101 – LARGE
PHIL 160 – LARGE	Intro Ethics		PHIL 160 – LARGE
PHIL 112 – LARGE	Making Sense of Ourselves		PHIL 163 – LARGE	Practical Ethics
PHIL 165 – LARGE	Bioethics
PHIL 110	Intro: Great Books		PHIL 110
PHIL 155	Intro Logic		PHIL 155
PHIL 150	Phil of Science		PHIL 150
PHIL 134	Phil of Religion		PHIL 145	Philosophy of Language
PHIL 185	Aesthetics	OR	PHIL 185
PHIL 154	Phil of Social Science	OR	PHIL 154
PHIL 170	Social & Political		PHIL 170
PHIL 230	Experience & Reality		PHIL 230
PHIL 280	Morality and Law		PHIL 280
PHIL 272	Peace,War, Defense		PHIL 272
PHIL 275	Feminism		PHIL 275
PHIL 210	Ancient Philosophy		PHIL 220	Modern Philosophy
PERK COURSES:
FIRST YEAR SEMINARS (2)			FIRST YEAR SEMINARS (2)
HONORS COURSES (2)			HONORS SEMINARS (2)
Courses 300-400 designed for Junior/Senior Philosophy Majors
PHIL 356	Topics in Math Logic		PHIL 360, 3622, or 370 (1)
PHIL 360, 362 or 370	Ethics/Political (1)		PHIL 330,335,340,345,353 (2)
PHIL 330,335,340,345,353	Metaphysics/Epistemology (2)		PHIL 384	Gateway PPE
PHIL 351, 352	Science		PHIL 484	Capstone PPE
PHIL 390	Topics		PHIL 397	Colloquium for Majors
GRADUATE LEVEL COURSES
PHIL 460	History of Ethics	or	PHIL 462	Contemporary Ethical Theory
PHIL 470	Hobbes, Locke, Rousseau	or	PHIL 470
PHIL 480	Phil of Law	or	PHIL 476	Recent Political
PHIL 445	Phil of Language	or	PHIL 440	Mind
PHIL 455	Advanced Logic		PHIL 453	Phil of Psychology
PHIL 480	Advanced Phil of Law		PHIL 432 or 433	Analytic Phil
PHIL 450,451,452	Science	or	PHIL 450,451,452	Science
PHIL 411	Plato		PHIL 412	Aristotle

AREAS EITHER 300, 700 or 800:

ANCIENT PHILOSOPHY	MODERN PHILOSOPHY
PHILOSOPHY OF SCIENCE/LOGIC	PHILOSOPHY OF MIND
EPISTEMOLOGY	METAPHYSICS

PROTO in Spring—to be taught in the in the morning (Tues, Wed, or Thurs)

NOTES:

Large classes= 200 students with 4 teaching assistants
FYS = 20 students max; must already have been approved by FYS committee
Honors: 25 person max
Other regular service courses 100-200 = 30-35 students (no teaching assistants)

300 = courses for majors; 25 students

Course descriptions: http://www.unc.edu/ugradbulletin/depts/phil.html

Chapel Hill Philosophy
UNIVERSITY OF NORTH CAROLINA

Department of Philosophy CB #3125, Caldwell Hall UNC Chapel Hill Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

Jan Boxill 919.962.3317 jmboxill@email.unc.edu

TO: ALL FACULTY
FROM: Jan Boxill, Associate Chair & Teaching Coordinator
DATE: November 7, 2006
RE: Class Schedule for 2007-2008
Fall Semester: August 21-December 16; Spring Semester: January 9-May 11.

Among all the other things you have to do, it is time to consider the course schedule for the next academic year. I have attached a list of course needs for the year. The normal assignments for a standard teaching load are: two service courses, one perk course; one graduate-level course. Variations are possible from time to time, but the average must come very close to this norm if we to meet our enrollment obligations and secure fairness in teaching assignments.

I encourage those of you with overlapping interests (ethics/political philosophy; philosophy of language/philosophy of mind) to work out together how you wish to cover necessary courses, as well as to spread the wealth of graduate students.

Please look over the list and outlines of course schedules, and then give me your course and time preferences. If there are any special considerations that I need to take into account in putting the schedule together, please note them, (especially those who have to offer a course for which they received a grant), and let me know if you expect to have a leave of any sort or a reduced course load.

Teaching time information:

Please keep in mind that not all courses can be taught during prime hours or on Tuesday and Thursday. In an effort to avoid conflicts, graduate classes that meet once a week are offered during two time slots per day: 1-3:30 and 4-6:30. Unfortunately, despite our best efforts, there may still be conflicts. Please indicate a preference when requesting graduate level (400 and up) courses. Keep in mind we reserve Monday 1-3 for Department meetings.

Proto and Logic:

Given that first year graduate students all have fellowships and therefore do not teach, Proto will likely be scheduled 10-12:30 on either Tuesday or Thursday; and PHIL 455 will likely be taught MW 10-11:15

Summa Seminars

Fall: Placement person Spring: Admissions person

Please submit your preferences to me no later than Friday, December 1 , 2006
You can submit your preferences in the old numbers; but your assignments will be given in the new numbers.

Thank you all for your help and patience.

NAME: _____

FALL 2007: (List courses in order of preference 1-4)

1. COURSE: _____ Time pref: 1._____ 2._____ 3. _____
2. COURSE: _____ Time pref: 1._____ 2._____ 3. _____
3. COURSE: _____ Time pref: 1._____ 2._____ 3. _____
4. COURSE: _____ Time pref: 1._____ 2._____ 3. _____

COMMENTS and SPECIAL CONSIDERATIONS:

SPRING 2008:

1. COURSE:_____Time pref: 1._____ 2._____ 3. _____
2. COURSE: _____ Time pref: 1._____ 2._____ 3. _____
3. COURSE:_____Time pref: 1._____ 2._____ 3. _____
4. COURSE:_____Time pref: 1._____ 2._____ 3. _____

COMMENTS and SPECIAL CONSIDERATIONS:

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, November 8, 2006 3:36 PM
To: Metzguer, Karen R <metzguer@med.unc.edu>
Cc: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Suntrust

Thanks so much.

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Karen Metzguer wrote:
> I have reserved the room for 15 February 2007. Karen
>
> ----------
> From: Patricia
> Sent: Tuesday, November 07, 2006 11:06 AM
> To: Karen Metzguer
>
>
> Youâ€™ve got it. Have a good day!
>
> Pat
>
> ----------
>
> From: Karen Metzguer [mailto:metzguer@med.unc.edu]
> Sent: Tuesday, November 07, 2006 11:01 AM
>
> I am writing to see if we can get the boardroom reserved on 15
> February from 3:30 -8 pm.
>
> we will be doing an ethics seminar from 4-7:30. Thanks in advance for > checking on it.
>
> Karen Metzguer
>
> LEGAL DISCLAIMER
> The information transmitted is intended solely for the individual or > entity to which it is addressed and may contain confidential and/or > privileged material. Any review, retransmission, dissemination or > other use of or taking action in reliance upon this information by > persons or entities other than the intended recipient is prohibited.
> If you have received this email in error please contact the sender and > delete the material from any computer.
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, November 8, 2006 7:26 PM
To: Lange, Marc B <mlange@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Academic year 07-08

Hi Marc,
I spoke with Geoff today and we think it would be good for a meeting which includes you, me, Doug-as DGS, John Roberts-as DUS, and Geoff and Jerry. I think with all the changes in command, and with all the new people in the department, this is a good idea. I actually thought the Summa seminars was common knowledge, especially as this is an exact copy of what I sent out last year!

I am out of town until Monday, so we should find a time sometime next week, as the following week I leave town again--and it's Thanksgiving.

Thanks for responding,
Jan

Personal Faith and Conscience:
How, When, Where and With Whom Can We Speak Our Minds on a Public University Campus?

INTRODUCTION

College communities around the country have in recent days experienced a growing pattern of religious intolerance, threatened restraints on free inquiry, and difficulties in sustaining informed political and civil discourse. As university populations have become more diverse, they are confronting new realities in which differing voices struggle to be heard and respected. Political forces have increasingly highlighted "wedge issues" that pit deeply held religious and moral judgments against emerging social and scientific trends. As polarization has increased outside university walls, it has been increasingly difficult to maintain the long tradition of open and respectful inquiry within university settings. New forms and norms for communication seem to fuel tendencies to attack and belittle competing viewpoints rather than to engage in open-minded exploration of ideas.

In 2005, the Ford Foundation announced its "Difficult Dialogues Initiative," inviting colleges and universities around the country to join it in addressing these concerns. As the Ford Foundation's President eloquently stated: "Open and honest dialogue is one of the defining characteristics of a vibrant academic community … [and] is an essential component of a strong civil society on which democracy depends. We must strive to ensure that all members of the community are treated as full and equal partners in the intellectual and institutional life of colleges and universities, especially those who may hold minority political views or religious beliefs. Campus leaders also must create an atmosphere of mutual respect, in which diversity is examined and seen in the context of a broader set of common values. We need to ensure that our discourse not only remains open but civil."

As one of the campus partners in the Difficult Dialogue Initiative, UNC Chapel Hill is endeavoring to make the practice of dialogue second nature on our campus, and invites colleagues elsewhere to do the same. A group of faculty, students, and student affairs leaders has worked intensively to develop a framework in which differing viewpoints on these issues can be engaged and explored in a respectful and open-minded way. Our goals are to foster freedom expression and respectful attention for a wide range of viewpoints, engage in intellectually serious analysis and defense of multiple viewpoints, and explore common ground without ignoring genuine differences.

We invite you to engage with us in deep and candid conversation about Personal faith and conscience: how, when, where, and with whom can we speak our minds on a public university campus? This formulation is a powerful one in which each word has a deliberate meaning.

- We hope the conversation will draw forth genuine, personal views that will be respectfully treated and openly considered.

- We seek to grapple with the full range of faith- and conscience-based beliefs since such beliefs are rooted in personal values that include those held not only by individuals committed to traditional Judeo-Christian viewpoints but also by those who embrace other religious traditions, agnostics, atheists, and those with moral vantages that arise from sources other than traditional religion.

- We emphasize the process of "speaking our minds" by which we intend a focus on oral and written communication (rather than the clothes one wears or other sorts of expression).

- We use the word "we" very deliberately, with the intent to exploring how all members of our campus community interact with each other—including students interacting with fellow students of similar or different faith traditions, faculty interacting with faculty and students in the classroom and elsewhere, and staff interacting with all.

- Our discussion will explore varied approaches to this question, including some that have emerged from our work to date, but also others that will emerge in this Forum that involves a wider range of participants. We will deliberate--rather than debate--using safe and fair ground rules to be considered at the outset so that we can all speak, listen, and learn from each other. No votes will be taken. All viewpoints will be welcome.

Discussion Not Debate. This discussion guide and related discussion forums are intended to foster deeper reflection and insight about challenging issues. It uses an approach developed by the National Issues Forums in cooperation with citizens and communities across the country in connection with difficult questions such as immigration policy, end-of-life decisions, and racial tensions. In these settings it has proved important to clarify the differences between discussion and debate. For example, in the experience of the National Issues Forums:

- Debate involves a deep investment in and defense of the rightness of a particular position, a search for weaknesses in another's position, a focus on "winning," an emphasis on oppositional reasoning, and a treatment of key assumptions as truth.

- Deliberative discussion involves an effort to understand the basis and nature for disagreement, an honest effort to hear and explore insights from many vantages, a focus on understanding rather than "winning," an emphasis on collaboration, and a willingness to re-evaluate key assumptions (including ones own) where warranted.

Participants in discussion forums using this guide will therefore develop additional insights and skills that should add to their repertoire in deciding how best to deal with difficult dialogues in other settings as well as the one at hand.

Group Agreements and Group Ground Rules. The forum moderator will start the discussion by share a set of proposed group process guidelines that have been found useful in other contexts when discussion address challenging topics. Participants will be asked whether they find these guidelines acceptable and whether there are other guidelines they'd propose to help shape the discussion they are about to undertake. Here are some of the possible guidelines:

- Everyone is encouraged to participate.
- The purpose is to have an open dialogue rather than a debate.
- Every individual will make an effort not to dominate the discussion, and will try to self-monitor the duration of his or her comments.
- An atmosphere of respectful listening is desired. It is fine for participants to choose to be silent, but it is not okay for anyone to feel they are silenced.
- No one is ever expected to disclose information that is private or personal in the forum, but they may choose to do so if they wish.
- All comments are to be respected and welcomed.
- The responsibility for doing the work of deliberative discussion belongs to the group.

APPROACHES AND BACKGROUND

Over the past year, faculty and students at UNC have held hours of discussion about how we might respond to the overarching question: Personal Faith and Conscience: How, When, Where and With Whom Can We Speak Our Minds on a Public University Campus? We listened actively to each other and consciously raised viewpoints likely to be held by those not in the room. In the course of these conversations, four different approaches surfaced. Each of the approaches has its pros and cons, and might command support from different individuals or from the same individual in different contexts. Bear in mind that none of these approaches is intended as a policy recommendation for universities, but is instead reflective of a possible personal stance.

Approach 1: Pursue questions of personal faith and conscience in private and maintain the university's neutrality.
Approach 2: Enhance student options and engage outside the classroom.
Approach 3: Engage personal faith and conscience in the classroom, respectfully, if faculty choose
Approach 4: Engage questions of faith and conscience widely, actively, and deliberately

A chart follows, highlighting some of the pros and cons of each of these approaches, and an overview of the four approaches will be offered at the beginning of the discussion session. We hope that this framework will be useful in highlighting a range of fair-minded approaches to the scenarios that follow. In addition, forum participants have found that meaningful discussion depends on sharing baseline information and recognizing their own operating assumptions (as well as others' assumptions they may not share). The Appendix includes background information culled from many sources and viewpoints in an effort to grasp the forces that shape dialogues about personal faith and conscience.

For additional information, please see the appendix.

Approach	1. PURSUE IN PRIVATE AND MAINTAIN UNIVERSITY NEUTRALITY	2. ENHANCE STUDENT OPTIONS AND ENGAGE OUTSIDE THE CLASSROOM
Description	Speech about personal faith and conscience belongs in private settings or off campus, in keeping with public universities' secular character and obligations of neutrality.	Students should have ample opportunities to explore issues of personal faith and conscience if they choose to do so, but such opportunities should be situated primarily outside the classroom.
Who supports this approach and why? Those who think…	*public institutions should remain neutral on matters of faith and conscience given the wide range of individual perspectives *other institutions (churches, family/friends) are better situated to deal with such matters * public higher education is funded by taxpayers who expect neutrality *there should be a wide margin separating church and state *universities shouldn't intrude upon or dictate anyone's beliefs	*students have educational and developmental needs related to faith and conscience that should not be ignored or pushed off-campus *speech about faith and conscience belongs outside the classroom where faculty are not involved in judging or grading students' views *campus-based activities should incorporate the range of student interests including those related to personal faith and conscience *the best approach is one that honors individual student interests on a voluntary basis *creative initiatives about faith and conscience should be led by students in order to meet their most substantial interests and needs.
Who is opposed to this approach and why? Those who think…	*separating personal faith and conscience from day-to-day life is artificial, impractical. *such separation marginalizes these issues and makes campus inhospitable to some *students are at a life stage when it's important to engage in such discussions in many settings *this approach is anti-intellectual and perhaps contrary to academic freedom	*compartmentalization of this sort is artificial *faculty who wish to address such issues in the classroom should not be discouraged from doing so * giving personal faith and conscience an institutional place on campus might compromise the principle of university neutrality * the university might appear to intrude upon their expressions of faith by encouraging discussions to be held outside the classroom rather than in classrooms *students and student affairs professionals may find it difficult to deal with conflicts and contention that increasingly characterize religious and political debates going on outside campus walls
What are some of the tradeoffs and consequences?	*Approach seems clear but would be difficult to communicate or enforce *The "wall" between church and state is not clearly delineated and this approach may lead to litigation. *Neutrality may be experienced as hostility by some.	*This approach creates an artificial separation between non-classroom and classroom conversations *This approach allows students to associate with those who share their particular viewpoints but doesn't help bridge gaps in understanding
What facts, research or additional action is important to this approach?	*Clarifying understandings of separation of church and state and related legal principles *Considering the impact of this approach on members of the campus community who believe they should "witness" or expound on their faith outside church settings.	*Providing ample support for non-classroom initiatives

For additional information, please see the appendix.

Approach	3. ENGAGE PERSONAL FAITH AND CONSCIENCE IN THE CLASSROOM, RESPECTFULLY, IF FACULTY CHOOSE	4. ENGAGE QUESTIONS OF FAITH AND CONSCIENCE WIDELY, ACTIVELY AND DELIBERATELY
Description	Speech about personal faith and conscience may occur on campus, including in the classroom, if conducted respectfully and if the professor believes it relevant.	Public universities should actively encourage more widespread conversation and engagement with issues of personal faith and conscience throughout their campuses, including in private, student, classroom and academic settings.
Who supports this approach and why? Those who think…	*faculty are best situated to determine the extent to which matters of faith and conscience are relevant to the academic program *classroom discussions provide powerful learning opportunities that link learning inside and outside the classroom *inclusion of such discussions in the classroom allows faculty and students to engage authentically about key issues such as the nature of authority *students should have opportunities to engage with faculty about how their faith relates to issues raised in class. *universities' missions call for active exploration of difficult questions	*a comprehensive approach is needed to engage with pressing social issues and competing viewpoints *a multi-faceted approach is more likely to lead to understanding and respect *developing tools for and experience with discussion of deeply-felt differences is important for the future of society and civic life. *engaging respectfully with issues of faith and conscience allows students and faculty to learn from others' viewpoints without forcing one's beliefs on others *discussion of issues of faith and conscience cannot be artificially pigeonholed and should be appropriately addressed wherever they arise
Who is opposed to this approach and why? Those who think…	*may create blurry lines about what is relevant in class or what responses are "respectful" *gives professors too much unilateral power to decide what is relevant or respectful *creates expectations of in-class discussions when professors are hard-pressed to cover relevant material in courses *intrudes on professors' or students' academic freedom and puts students or professors on the spot to express their views on personal beliefs *creates the risk that professors and students will have difficulty in addressing challenging, hot-button issues where issues of faith and intellectual inquiry collide	*might feel overbearing and inappropriate in light of their personal beliefs or might subject the university to public opprobrium if not well-implemented *creates risks of interference from external forces tied to religious or political viewpoints *could compromise the intellectual ideals and secular nature of the university or blur important distinctions between the type of critical thinking and more personal views *is risky because the university community may lack the competence to implement it * is poorly defined and may raise expectations that cannot be realized.
What are some of the tradeoffs and consequences?	*More intensive efforts may be needed in order to prepare faculty and students for meaningful dialogue *Increased tension between faith- and conscience-based beliefs and intellectual inquiry in the classroom may arise if such discussions occur more frequently	This approach may *lead to greater division within the university community. *create concerns that not all faith- or conscience-based perspectives are treated even-handedly *raise legal questions
What facts, research or additional action is important to this approach?	*Developing greater "cultural competence" that allows faculty and students to address difficult questions in a meaningful way. *Supporting faculty in careful efforts to assess student learning when critical thinking is required at the intersection of faith- or conscience-based beliefs and intellectual inquiry	*Developing a range of learning opportunities (such as additional courses, course sections, modules, speaker programs, and student engagement opportunities) *Providing clear information to the university community and the public about rationale and strategies

SCENARIOS FOR CONSIDERATION

A. Admissions Decisions. A college admissions officer is facing a difficult decision in evaluating several prospective undergraduates' high school transcripts. One student had attended a religiously-oriented high school and sought to apply three courses toward required basic admissions requirements in English, history and government: "Christianity and Morality in American Literature," "Christianity's Influence on American History" and "Special Providence: American Government". Another student's transcript included courses on "Race, Class, and Gender in Modern America," "Feminist Issues throughout U.S. History," and "Introduction to Jewish Thought" toward the high school credits required (though not in required areas such as English, history, and government). (based on issues facing UC-Davis)

B. Personal Advice: A faculty member in a technical field is devout and reveals his own religious background to students on the first day of class. Many of the students write on their information sheets that one of their life goals is to develop a closer relationship with God. In a public forum on religion in his department, he asked whether it would be appropriate for him to suggest prayer to those struggling students who have revealed to him their own desire to connect to God. (based on University of Michigan "Difficult Dialogues" scenario).

C. Living and Learning. A resident adviser at the university has contacted students on her dorm floor inviting them to attend a study group she's created on Buddhism. Other students have decided to organize a standing dinner discussion group at the campus cafeteria to discuss Islam. (based in part on example from UW-Eau Claire)

D. Student Speaker. An elected student government leader has been asked to give a welcoming speech to incoming students at a public university. He urges them to set their sights high and goes on to say that he has accepted Christ as his savior and hopes they will as well. Other students criticized his actions, saying he had been elected to represent the whole student body, including those of diverse faith-related viewpoints. (based on Dartmouth incident)

E. Student Organizations. A university requires every student organization wishing to use university facilities and receive student fees in support of its activities to sign a pledge stating that the organization will not discriminate in its membership based on race, ethnicity, gender, creed, religion, nationality, age, disability, or sexual orientation. A student group affiliated with a particular religious sect refused to sign the statement, saying that its mission required it to admit only those who shared a particular religious faith. The group also approached Student Congress and requested funding for a proposed new student publication designed to encourage others to adopt the faith of its members. (based on examples at UNC-CH, and elsewhere)

F. Residence Hall Choices. A group of students has asked the university to establish a special dorm "theme floor" for students who are Roman Catholics or interested in Roman Catholicism. An evangelical Christian group has met with the dean of students and student government officers to demand that rules that currently prohibit solicitation in dormitories be changed so that their members can go door-to-door to distribute leaflets and talk with students living there about their beliefs. (based in part on example from UW-Madison).

G. Recommendation Letter. A student approached the undergraduate adviser in the biology department, and requested a recommendation to medical school. The adviser reviewed her transcript and noted that she had not yet taken a required course in evolutionary biology. The student said that she declined to take the course because of her religious beliefs. The adviser then declined to give the requested recommendation noting that a student who had not taken that course would be poorly prepared for medical school and could not be recommended. (based on incident at Texas Tech)

H. Internship Placement. In a field placement at a faith-based organization, a student became aware that her supervisors understood faith to be an integral part of their patient counseling. The student is from a different faith tradition and not particularly religious. Although she was open to responding to discussions about religion initiated by patients, she felt uncomfortable raising the topic herself as her mentors expected her to do. (based on University of Michigan "Difficult Dialogues" scenario)

For additional information, please see the appendix.

I. Learning to Act. A Mormon woman applied for admission to an actor-training program at a public university. At the time she applied she told program officials that she would not be willing to use profane language or appear in the nude because of her religious beliefs. Initially, when classroom exercises included performing scripts that included profanity, she changed the words. Subsequently, her instructors told her that she needed to perform the scenes as written because copyright words of playwrights could not be changed without written permission for public performances, and because students needed to take on roles with characters unlike themselves (including characters such as a pregnant, unwed prostitute to whose lines the student objected). (based on an incident at the University of Utah).

J. Classroom Dialogues: A group of faculty and students recently began discussing some of the "tips" they'd offer others on dealing with controversy in the classroom. Some of their ideas are listed below. Are there other tips worth noting?

- ✓ Respect for students is paramount, and it can't be faked. The message should be "feel free to disagree with me and support your point of view." It's important to know students and their backgrounds. It's important to discuss the value of open dialogue and conflict in the marketplace of ideas. Personal discomfort is inevitable are ideas are challenged. That is how we grow and why it is so valuable to engage with different viewpoints in the classroom.
- ✓ Faculty and students need to work together to create a safe place for open discussion. Some faculty set "ground rules" while others encourage students to reach "group agreements." Students need to know what to expect regarding how controversial topics will be covered. Everyone's perspectives need to be welcomed and treated fairly. Controversial issues can be honored by covering different perspectives. Be sure students know the difference between personal attacks and honest discussion of one's own experiences, values and ideas. Faculty members should also avoid snide comments and should provide students with opportunities to talk with them outside class to raise questions about fairness in treatment of difficult issues.
- ✓ Faculty members disagree about whether they should disclose their own opinions on controversial topics (some say disclosure dampens discussion, others state their opinion and reasons to encourage others to engage). They also need to appreciate that certain topics are very emotional for students and be prepared to handle such emotions. They should also be ready to deal with students who say something inflammatory.

K. Learning Tolerance. Members of the faculty at the nation's military academies have significant responsibilities in preparing future military officers to endure the pressures of battle and the challenges of leading troops into harm's way. Recently, several students and faculty who held very strong Christian viewpoints encouraged students in their classes to adopt religious viewpoints similar to their own and began meetings and sports events attended by more junior cadets with prayers. The Academy recently clarified its rules on these issues and implemented a course on "religious tolerance" that is required of all cadets. (based on events at Air Force Academy)

L Middle East Controversies. In the wake of growing tensions in the Middle East, a number of universities have faced their own Middle East controversies. A faculty member in Middle-Eastern studies allegedly to permited only those sharing his viewpoints on the Palestine/Israeli conflict in his class and repeatedly challenged Jewish students who disagreed with him. A distinguished junior faculty member was openly shunned and criticized on a colleague's blog as a result of her recent scholarship criticizing the role played by religious belief in recent diplomatic history (contrary to her colleague's view). One student group proposed a pro-Palestinian art exhibit while another group wanted to host a controversial pro-Israeli speaker on campus at the same time. Campus officials believed that these events would create controversy and potential security issues, and wanted students to contribute to the cost of special security measures. (based on events at Columbia, Arizona State, and elsewhere).

Appendix – Difficult Dialogues Initiative

Background Information. This Appendix supplements the summary of approaches and scenarios included in the Discussion Guide itself. It includes background information designed to help fuel the shared conversation. Forum participants have found that meaningful discussion and deliberation depends on sharing some baseline information and recognizing their own operating assumptions (as well as others' assumptions they may not share). The background information provided here has been culled from many sources and viewpoints in an effort to grasp the reasons that dialogues about personal faith and conscience can prove so difficult. This material will serve as a good starting point for discussion, since it provides fresh facts and viewpoints that not everyone may have encountered before.

The forum moderator will help introduce participants to relevant background information at the start of the discussion so that everyone will feel comfortable, and a short video will be shown in order to help participants engage with the challenging issues raised. Participants in forums that use this discussion guide will also be an important source of ideas and insights. Suggestions for augmenting the appendix will be welcome so that the discussion guide can be improved over time.

BACKGROUND INFORMATION. What do we know about recent experiences on college campuses with issues of personal faith and conscience? What factors may contribute to the views of students, faculty, and members of the public about the role that personal faith and conscience should play in campus life?

Campus Experiences.

Recurring Tensions. Evidence of tensions relating to personal faith and conscience and academic inquiry may be found at numerous universities around the country. The University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill is merely one case in point.

- In 2002 the University chose Approaching the Qur'an: The Early Revelations by Michael Sells as its summer reading selection. The decision was roundly criticized by many legislators and members of the public. Subsequently the American Family Association's Center for Law and Policy brought suit on behalf of three students, an alumnus and a state citizen, claiming that their First Amendment rights have been violated. The federal district court subsequently concluded that the choice was permissible since it did not advance or endorse religion and did not compel students to engage in a "religious exercise."

- In 2003 a three-member Christian fraternity lost its status as an officially recognized student organization when it refused to sign the University's standard non-discrimination policy. The fraternity's law suit in federal court alleging that the University had unlawfully abridged the students' First Amendment rights to freedom of association, freedom of speech, and free exercise of religion was ultimately dismissed as moot.

- In spring 2004 an instructor was disciplined by her department for publicly accusing a student of hate speech after he expressed in her class his objection to homosexuality based on his religious beliefs.

- In 2005-2006, the campus newspaper ran a student column that cast Arabs in a disparaging light as well as a cartoon featuring a depiction of the Prophet Mohammed. Later a recent graduate drove his SUV into a popular campus gathering spot, injuring nine people and explaining that he had acted to demonstrate his commitment to Islam and to protest American foreign policy. Some students protested, asserting that his action should be labeled "terrorist" while others held a vigil in sympathy for Muslim students and those who had been hurt.

- In the last several years, the University established programs in Jewish, Islamic, and Christian studies. In 2005 and 2006, many liberal arts faculty protested discussions with a potential donor who was considering a proposal for funding of an initiative in Western Cultures. The donor had ties with other groups with conservative views that had publicly ridiculed faculty members who taught courses that emphasized diversity themes. The University subsequently withdrew the proposal in order to permit additional faculty review.

Hate Crime. UNC Chapel Hill has not been alone in facing challenges like these. Hate crime remains a problem.

- The United States Federal Bureau of Investigation indicated that in 2004 had received reports of 7649 hate crime incidents (of these, 52.9% reflected racial bias, 18.0% religious bias, 15.8% bias against sexual orientation, and 12.7% bias against ethnicity or national origin). Of the 1,374 incidents involving religious bias, anti-Jewish incidents predominated (954 incidents), with anti-Islamic incidents ranking second (156). Other incidents involved anti-Catholic sentiment (57), anti-Protestant sentiment (38), and anti-other-religion (128). Of the 898 hate crimes reported on school or college campuses, 492 related to race, 184 to religion, 150 to sexual orientation, 68 to national origin, 2 to disability and 2 to multiple biases.

- In April 2006, the United States Commission on Civil Rights held hearings and issued a statement on growing anti-Semitism. The Commission found that on some campuses, "students have alleged patterns of threatening or intimidating behavior, derogatory remarks, vandalism, and use of Swastikas and other symbols of hatred or bigotry….On many campuses, anti-Israeli or anti-Zionist propaganda has been disseminated that includes traditional anti-Semitic elements, including age-old anti-Jewish stereotypes and defamation. This has included, for example, anti-Israel literature that perpetuates the medieval anti-Semitic blood libel of Jews slaughtering children for ritual purpose, as well as anti-Zionist propaganda that exploits ancient stereotypes of Jews as greedy, aggressive, overly powerful, or conspiratorial."

Students. Students on college campuses are increasingly diverse even in states where residents have a significant preference in admissions. Economic shifts have resulted in greater mobility of families from other states and other countries so that residency no longer means life-long ties to a particular state. In contrast to their parents' generation, college students today are more likely to encounter others with viewpoints rooted in cultures, faiths, and moral perspectives that differ from those at home.

Student Religious Affiliations, Attitudes and Implications

- Student religious preferences may vary from one campus to another. In 2005 UNC Chapel Hill's entering students reported affiliation with the following religions: Baptist (19.3%), Methodist (13.6%), Roman Catholic (13.1%), Presbyterian (9.6%), and "Other Christian" (9.7%). Fewer than 5% reported that they were Jewish (2.5%), Hindu (1.3%) or Islamic (.9%), while 16.9% reported no religious affiliation. In contrast, entering undergraduates at public flagship universities a much more heterogeneous mix, with more than double the percentage of Roman Catholics and Jewish students (27.5% and 5.9% respectively), far fewer Baptists, Methodists, and Presbyterians (5.2%, 5.3%, and 5.2% respectively), and even more students reporting no religious affiliation (22.6%).

- Patterns of religious preference correspond in interesting ways with student experiences and viewpoints. When compared to other flagship public universities, students entering UNC-Chapel Hill are more likely to have attended religious services, discussed religion, and prayed or meditated on a weekly basis during high school. They are also much more likely to regard "integrating spirituality into my life" as a high priority, and to believe that their religious beliefs will be strengthened during college. They are somewhat more socially conservative, and are more inclined to believe that dissent is an important part of the political process.

- A national study by UCLA researchers (with the support of the John Templeton Foundation) has provided other important insights about college students' beliefs. Nearly 8 in 10 first-year college students in the sample reported that they believed in God, with more than half perceiving God as "love" or as the "creator" and about half experiencing God as a "protector." Many reported deriving strength, support and comfort from their beliefs. Four in ten students reported that they felt "secure" in their beliefs, with one in four saying that they were "seeking," one in four reporting being "conflicted" or "doubting," and one in seven saying they were "not interested." Forty-seven percent reported that they "seek out opportunities to help [themselves] grow spirituality."

- The UCLA researchers also analyzed students with reference to "spirituality," "religiousness" (religious commitment, engagement, religious/social conservatism, religious skepticism, and religious struggle), and four other factors (charitable involvement, compassionate self-concept, ethic of caring, and ecumenical worldview). Using these variables, they found that religious commitment and engagement were closely correlated with religious/social conservatism and negatively correlated with religious skepticism. Those showing high levels of religious engagement tended to be conservative politically (self-identified conservatives outnumbered liberals by 3 to 1). Roughly equal proportions of politically conservative and liberal students earned high scores on either charitable involvement or compassionate self-concept, while liberals "substantially outnumber conservatives among those with high scores on ethic of caring (2 to 1) and ecumenical worldview (3 to 1).

- The UCLA research includes longitudinal studies of a much smaller set of college juniors. The juniors reported a decline in attendance at religious services (52% had reported attending religious services frequently the year before entering college, but only 29% reported attending frequently in their junior year). There was a significant reduction in self-perceived "religiousness" and "spirituality" (only 9% said that their religiousness was much stronger and only 13% said their spirituality was much stronger), yet there was some growth in those who said it was "very important" to integrate spirituality into their lives, develop a meaningful philosophy of life, and help others in difficulty. Students who spend more time partying show larger-than-average declines in attendance at religious services during the first three years of college. By junior year, it appeared that levels of religious commitment tracked student choices of major at least to some degree. Those who chose to major in the fine arts, education and humanities had the highest levels of religious commitment, with the lowest levels of religious commitment reported by those in biological sciences, history, political science and sociology. Only about 20% of juniors were "highly religious" while a similar proportion were found to have low levels of religious engagement (defined as a pattern of behavior that includes such things as attending religious services, reading sacred texts, attending religious/spiritual workshops or retreats, and joining a religious organization on campus).Teenagers. To understand college student viewpoints and experiences more deeply, it is important to consider the rising generation of teenagers In a recent book, Soul Searching: The Religious and Spiritual Lives of American Teenagers, (Oxford University Press, 2005), UNC Professor Christian Smith and graduate student Melinda Lundquist Denton analyzed data and interviews of teenagers aged 13-17 as part the National Survey of Youth and Religion. They found:

- Difficulty articulating beliefs: Very few of either devout or non-religious teens interviewed could explain the tenets of their religion or what it means. The researchers concluded that this difficult did not stem from communications difficulties, but rather from the fact that "our interview was the first time that any adult had ever asked them what they believed and how it mattered in their life."

- Religious outlook: The interviews suggested that many teens (whatever their religious affiliation) shared an outlook the researchers dubbed "Moralistic Therapeutic Deism" that embraced five major principles: (1) A God exists who created and orders the world and watches over human life on earth but from a distance; (2) God wants people to be good, nice, and fair to each other, as taught in the Bible and by most world religions; (3) The central goal of life is to be happy and to feel good about oneself; (4) God does not need to be particularly involved in one's life except when God is needed to resolve a problem; and (5) Good people go to heaven when they die. Moral relativism was also common among teenagers interviewed.

- Conversations in school: In school, 65% of religious US teens express their religious faith only some or a little. 12% of the teens express their faith a lot and 23% do not express their faith at all. The researchers also found that school is not viewed as being a hostile place to religious teenagers—fewer than 20% of teenagers reported that schools look down on teens who are openly religious.

- Views of others: Teenagers tend to see religion as not a particularly contested or conflictive aspect of their lives, but instead something that simply is, that is just not the kind of thing worth getting worked up about one way or the other. In confronting issues of faith difference, most teens take an inclusive religious pluralism stance on the matter of religious truth claims—60% of all respondents state that many religions may be true. The researchers noted that "nearly all U.S. teens seem to have adopted a posture of civility and a careful and ambiguous inclusiveness when discussing religion with possible 'others,' especially in public," perhaps because of America's strong tradition of individualism.

Intellectual Development in College. Students make important strides in intellectual development while in college, particularly when it comes to critical thinking. Often, however, neither they nor their faculty have clear frameworks for recognizing the challenges that such development creates.

- Benjamin Bloom, of the University of Chicago, is widely regarded as among the foremost theorists of students' intellectual development. He developed a "taxonomy" of educational objectives in the "cognitive domain" including: knowledge (the kind of intellectual capability that can be created even by rote memorization); comprehension (the ability to paraphrase, interpret and explain); application (the capacity to transfer ideas learned in one situation to use in another); analysis (the capacity to distinguish between subsidiary ideas that are part of a larger whole); synthesis (the capacity to bring disparate ideas together into a larger whole); and evaluation (the capacity to test or judge ideas against a set of larger standards).

- Bloom also considered the "affective" domain which concerns the way that people deal with emotional dimensions including feelings, values, appreciation, enthusiasms, motivations and attitudes. His five major elements in this taxonomy include: receiving phenomena (awareness, willingness to hear and attend to others with respect), responding to phenomena (responding to and questioning new ideals and concepts in order to understand them); valuing (attaching worth to particular values or phenomena, developing and acting on more complex commitments); organization (creating priorities from contrasting or conflicting values); and internalizing values (developing a value system that shapes personal behavior in a cohesive way, and acting in self-reliant ways that evidences commitment to ethical practice, consideration of others, weighing of new evidence). Development within the affective domain is often not addressed explicitly in college classrooms, and emotion in classrooms is often regarded as out of place.

The Nature of Knowledge and Authority, and the Stages of Faith Development

- During college, students must grapple with the nature of knowledge and how different sorts and sources of knowledge are valued in the context of intellectual reasoning. One of the most widely known theories of intellectual and moral development in college students was developed by William Perry, based on interviews conducted among male students attending Harvard College some years ago. Perry identified several stages of development. The first three stages involve "dualism," a period in which a learner assumes that all questions have or can have "right" answers derived from external authorities; the absence of right answers is attributed to authority figures who lack relevant knowledge or to knowledge that has yet to be discovered. The next two stages involve "relativism," which treats knowledge as non-absolute in most cases, treats dominant knowledge as pertinent but not the absolute truth, sees most things as uncertain, finds no real basis for deciding absolute right and wrong, treats authorities as just individuals with opinions, and regards all ideas as having equal value before ultimately recognizing that learners must take responsibility for using and evaluating non-absolute knowledge in complicated settings. Perry's final three stages involve "commitment" and move beyond cognitive abilities to make judgments regarding one's values and identity, act on and balance associated commitments and responsibilities to self and others. Although Perry's work has been criticized a non-diverse population and as treating development as a linear process when it more likely involves cycles, his approach remains a standard framework for thinking about student development during the college years and beyond.
- Dr. James Fowler, of Emory University, developed a framework for thinking about the stages through which approaches to faith and spirituality evolve across the lifespan (in contrast to the content of faith- based or spiritual beliefs). His most well-known work is Stages of Faith: The Psychology of Human Development and the Quest for Meaning (HarperCollins, 1981). In Fowler's view "faith" encompasses an individual's beliefs about their relationship with the universal, something that evolves throughout one's life. Fowler regarded faith as an ongoing activity (rather than something one "has"), reflecting the interplay of "conversion" (major changes in one's values or core beliefs) and "development" (a gradual maturation process). According to Fowler, there are six major stages in faith development, which foster insight of one's development, but should not used to evaluate or judge. College students may most commonly cluster in one of the three middle stages of Fowler's framework. Stage 2 is the "mythical-literal" stage in which faith has a more definite cognitive component drawn from the values of one's family or from exposure to other influences such as those of teachers, peers, and the media. In Stage 2, individuals tend to associate with those who are like them and be critical of those who differ, believe in "justice" insofar as the good are rewarded and the bad punished, often give symbols very literal meanings and engage in little self-reflection. Stage 3 is the "synthetic-conventional" stage in which individuals attempt to develop an integrated identity, based on values or beliefs typically derived from significant others without much internal examination. Those at stage 3 may have an "ideology" that involves a cluster of beliefs and values but may not be aware of it. They may also have internalized expectations in ways that make it difficult for them to manage the different roles and contexts in which they must function, and may be uncomfortable with conflict and controversy. Fowler describes stage 4 as the "individuative-reflective" stage, one that often involves critical assessment of prior experiences, values and beliefs. In stage 4, individuals move toward a grounding within an authentic self rather than relying most heavily on external expectations and roles, while also making explicit personal judgments about commitments based on deliberate examination of their core beliefs. Later stages are generally not reached until mid-life.

Values and Political Vantages. Observers of the American scene have in recent years noted a growing nexus between some dimensions of religious belief, political and policy positions. A recent study by the Harvard Institute of Politics conducted phone interviews of a national sampling of college students in March 2006 provides some important insights about the relationship between these important dimensions of students' lives.

- Differences in political viewpoint correlated with college students' views on how religion should play out in the public eye. Among Republican respondents, more than half wanted to hear candidates speak about their religious views, compared to about 1/5 of Democratic respondents. Republican respondents also wanted religious values to play a more important role in government. College students believed that a larger range of issues had "moral" dimensions compared to those generally highlighted as raising questions "values" in recent political discourse, referencing not only abortion, gay marriage and stem-cell research, but also the government's response to Hurricane Katrina, support for education, environmental policy, health care, Iraq and affirmative action (cited by between about a quarter and a half of both Republican and Democrat college student respondents in each case).

Faculty

Faculty Members' Personal Beliefs about Religion, Spirituality and Their Role on College Campuses

- Recent research on spirituality and the professoriate found that spirituality and religion plays a part in many faculty members' lives. Of those responding to a UCLA survey funded by the John Templeton Foundation, 81% described themselves as "spiritual," while 66% regarded themselves as "religious" to some or a greater extent (29% and 37% respectively). When asked to agree or disagree with the statement "the spiritual dimension of faculty members' lives has no place in the academy," 57% of all respondents disagreed (including 49% of respondents from public universities). Academic disciplines seemed to shape or reflect respondents' viewpoints, with the highest disagreement reported by those in the health sciences, education, and business, and the lowest levels in social sciences, physical sciences, and biological sciences.

- Data from the 2004-05 survey of American college faculty found a substantial consensus in views regarding the goals of undergraduate education. Substantial proportions of faculty respondents rating the following goals as "very important" or "essential: developing student's critical thinking abilities (99%), helping students master knowledge in a discipline (94%), and promoting students' ability to write effectively (87%). For many faculty other goals included: enhancing students' self-understanding (60%), instilling a basic appreciation for the liberal arts (56%), the development of students' moral character (59%) and helping students develop personal values (53%). Only 30% agreed that "colleges should be concerned with facilitating students' spiritual development." Faculty members at public universities and colleges showed the lowest level of agreement with this statement (18%).

- Perspectives on educational goals were also framed against a general concern that many students were poorly prepared academically (while 67% of faculty at private universities agreed "somewhat" or "strongly" that "most students are well-prepared academically, only 37% of public university faculty shared that view). In light of the priority purposes of education and the concerns for student academic preparedness noted above, it is perhaps not surprising that emphasis on religion and spirituality is relatively rare in many classrooms.

Liberal Education and the Curriculum. Faculty viewpoints on the role of religion and spirituality within the college classroom can also be discerned through academic decisions relating to nature of liberal education and the characteristics of the undergraduate curriculum.

- The American Association of Colleges and Universities defines "liberal education" expressed the goals of a liberal education in the following terms: "A truly liberal education is one that prepares us to live responsible, productive, and creative lives in a dramatically changing world. It is an education that fosters a well-grounded intellectual resilience, a disposition toward lifelong learning, and an acceptance of responsibility for the ethical consequences of our ideas and actions." Many faculty, particularly those in Arts and Sciences disciplines, would agree with statements such as this.

- Colleges and universities adopt and periodically review general education requirements governing undergraduate study as a means of providing students with a shared foundation to guide their overall intellectual development. General education requirements often mandate that students take courses emphasizing moral reasoning, philosophy, history, cultural diversity, public policy, international affairs, psychology, sociology, literature, art or music and many other subjects in order to provide students with exposure to varied ways of thinking and a wide range of ideas. Many such courses touch at some point on the nature and role of faith and religion in the contexts in connection with the topics under consideration.

- Colleges and university curricula are also evolving rapidly. Many schools have incorporated "perspectives" or "diversity" requirements as part of their general education requirements to aid students in preparing for a complex world marked by interchange with those raised in cultures that vary in language, history, political and religious beliefs. Other courses bring to light the many dimensions of personal identity and historic injustice, for example by examining the hidden history of people of color and women and the implications of sexual orientation. Biological sciences rely heavily on modern understandings of natural selection and evolution, and new scientific discoveries raise important questions regarding the role of stem-cell research and the nature of the human genome. Expansion of the traditional "canon" to include topics outside students' prior experience with Western culture, local communities, and religious tenets may prove unsettling to those with deeply held traditional values and cultural views.

Disciplinary Frameworks. Faculty perspectives must also be understood in a broader historical and sociological context. In a working paper, Professor Mark Edwards (former President of St. Olaf College and currently associate dean of Harvard Divinity School, and author of a new book entitled Religion on Our Campuses) offers crucial insights.

- Historical trends have shaped the development of colleges and universities in the last 150 years. In the first half of the nineteenth century natural sciences were closely associated with Christian theology. In time the sciences were seen to provide evidence of divine design in the guise of rational thought and inquiry and the study of science was viewed as a means of praising God. By mid-century, scientists were able to discern causal explanations that made it possible to offer explanations of phenomena other than by reference to supernatural intervention. What constituted an explanation changed and scientists turned to scientific inquiry as the best means of explaining natural phenomena rather than simply invoking God. Other disciplines followed suit, as the humanities departed from moral philosophy and social sciences claimed their own identity.

- By the beginning of the 20th century, research universities began to develop, with instructors drawn from those who had sophisticated substantive expertise in specialized fields. As belief in the scientific method grew and the extent of knowledge burgeoned, only those with "disciplined" knowledge had the necessary legitimacy to claim a place in the academy. Such disciplined expertise was provided through advanced education at top research universities which provided intensive mentoring, and required advanced levels of scholarly performance which in time resulted in the award of a Ph.D. Professional legitimacy for scholars awarded teaching positions at universities was increasingly tested by scholarly writing that was reviewed by national and international peers with similarly advanced expertise.

- In Edwards' view, faculty members are now inculcated by intensive experience that can be described as "professional formation," just as is true for those who undergo "formation" to profess their beliefs as members of the clergy. As undergraduates, they choose a major and increasingly assimilate the knowledge, values, and intellectual approaches that characterize the academic discipline in question. They go on to graduate work and spend more years within a specialized academic community that deepens and tests such expert knowledge and ways of knowing through comprehensive examinations and research on the Ph.D. They are evaluated and selected for academic appointments through a process that emphasizes their disciplinary focus. They then pass on their ways of knowing to their own students, and gain professional acclaim based upon their scholarly contributions to their chosen academic field.

- Edwards argues that there may be room to reintroduce religious perspectives within the academy in certain circumscribed respects. He contends that religious views may be most appropriate with regard to moral claims, claims regarding human nature, and claims regarding maximally comprehensive views of reality (certain kinds of "metaphysical" claims). In his view, it may be appropriate for certain religious insights to be offered in as an autobiographical explanation of "where I'm coming from," and suggests that the introduction of religious views in other settings should be undertaken with caution, and only in instances in which they contribute to the conversation and deepen understanding.

Academic Freedom. "Academic freedom," like academic disciplines, plays a central role in faculty members' understandings of the nature of American higher education. Academic freedom rests on core beliefs that the mission of higher education is to seek out and disseminate truth (however unpopular or inconvenient) and that the best way to accomplish this mission is to express ideas freely and subject them and to test them openly without fear of reprisal. It rests on a shared commitment to collegial interchange and a responsibility to maintain an open mind while testing one's own ideas as well as the ideas of others. Despite these core assumptions, the meaning and implications of the phrase and are surprisingly complex.

- The courts have recognized that academic institutions possess institutional academic freedom that is necessary: "to provide that atmosphere which is most conducive to speculation, experiment, and creation. It is an atmosphere in which there prevail "the four essential freedoms" of a university--to determine for itself on academic grounds who may teach, what may be taught, how it shall be taught, and who may be admitted to study." (Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234, 263 (1957) (Frankfurter, J, concurring)

- Academic freedom for individual faculty members has been described by the Association of American University Professors in the following terms: "Teachers are entitled to full freedom in research and in the publication of the results, subject to the adequate performance of their other academic duties. . . [1] Teachers are entitled to freedom in the classroom in discussing their subject, but they should be careful not to introduce into their teaching controversial matter that has no relation to their subject. . . [2] College and university teachers are citizens, members of a learned profession, and officers of an educational institution. When they speak or write as citizens, they should be free from institutional censorship or discipline, but their special position in the community imposes special obligations. As scholars and educational officers, they should remember that the public may judge their profession and their institution by their utterances. Hence they should at all times be accurate, should exercise appropriate restraint, should show respect for the opinions of others, and should make every effort to indicate that they are not speaking for the institution.

- The academic freedom of students has likewise been recognized. In a joint statement issued in 1967, the Association of American University Professors, the United States National Student Association and other professional groups stated: "Freedom to teach and freedom to learn are inseparable facets of academic freedom. The freedom to learn depends upon appropriate opportunities and conditions in the classroom, on the campus, and in the larger community. Students should exercise their freedom with responsibility…. The professor in the classroom and in conference should encourage free discussion, inquiry, and expression. Student performance should be evaluated solely on an academic basis, not on opinions or conduct in matters unrelated to academic standards. 1. Protection of Freedom of Expression. Students should be free to take reasoned exception to the data or views offered in any course of study and to reserve judgment about matters of opinion, but they are responsible for learning the content of any course of study for which they are enrolled. 2. Protection Against Improper Academic Evaluation. Students should have protection through orderly procedures against prejudiced or capricious academic evaluation. At the same time, they are responsible for maintaining standards of academic performance established for each course in which they are enrolled.

- The application of these principles is often complicated, in part because of the complexity of underlying legal analysis and because of the need to apply applicable policies to nuanced facts. For example, the academic freedom of individual faculty members and students is to some extent rooted in the First Amendment (which protects against abuse of free speech rights by government entities such as public universities but not to action by private parties). The statements of the Association of American University Professors (an organization founded in the wake of events at Stanford University early in the 20th century, when Mrs. Leland Stanford caused the dismissal of a noted economics professor Edward Lovejoy with whose views she disagreed) have been widely endorsed by academic organizations. They reflect a "professional standard" that is regarded as a statement of good practice within the academy, and thus has policy significance (but not necessarily legal significance) even when the First Amendment might not have application. At the same time, however, most colleges and universities around the country have adopted policies and tenure regulations that incorporate the AAUP standard and in turn give rise to contractual rights and rights to due process hearings by those protected under such policies.

- Longstanding expectations about university autonomy and academic freedom have been challenged in recent years on a number of fronts. For example, David Horowitz and others have argued that legislation called the "Academic Bill of Rights" should be adopted by state legislatures in order to force universities to weigh political ideology as part of their hiring practices and to provide additional legal protection to students who fear that they may be receive poor grades based on ideological views. Several organizations such as Students for Academic Freedom and Campus Watch have also established websites that encourage students to report or "blacklist" their professors based on listed criteria. An initiative by a UCLA alumnus to pay students to record and submit details of classroom conversations was withdrawn in the face of legal challenge.

- There are also instances in which faculty members have also been disciplined or dismissed notwithstanding the protections of academic freedom. For example, a professor at the University of Colorado who made what many regard as irresponsible comments about the 9/11 terrorist attacks was subsequently found by an academic panel to have engaged in research misconduct. Universities are also facing calls for greater public accountability from government leaders including the United States Department of Education and Congress. While academic institutions have traditionally been accorded great autonomy in setting academic standards and making operational decisions, growing concern to curb college costs and increase student learning and graduate rates may put these traditions to the test.

The World beyond the Campus. There can be little doubt that forces beyond campus walls influence the realities of American college campuses. These realties are therefore worth considering.

Americans' Personal Faiths

- The United States is a highly religious nation. A Gallup Poll conducted in December 2005 reported that 79% of American respondents said they were convinced that God exists, while an additional 12% said that they think God probably exists but have a little doubt. Regional differences were apparent, with 88% of Southerners expressing certainty about the existence of God, compared to 70% of Easterners, 71% of Westerners, and 77% of respondents from the Midwest. Those who attended church on a weekly basis were particularly likely to be certain God exists (94%) but 61% of those who seldom or never attended expressed similar sentiments. In contrast, however, a CBS News Poll conducted in April 2006, asked respondents whether they believed that traditional religions could answer all or most of today's problems or whether they were largely old-fashioned and out of date. Just over half (54%) of respondents said that traditional religions can answer such problems, while 32% said such religions are old-fashioned and 14% said they didn't know or didn't answer. The same poll also asked respondents how important religious was to their daily lives, and found that 26% of respondents regarded it as extremely important, 33% as very important, 26% as somewhat important, 13% as not at all important, with 2% saying they didn't know or giving no answer.

- The United States Census does not collect information on religious affiliation so denominational information must be found by other means. The World Fact Book 2005 indicates that the American population is divided as follows: Protestant 52%, Roman Catholic 24%, Mormon 2%, Jewish 1%, Muslim 1%, other 10%, none 10% (2002 est.). The American Religious Identification Survey conducted using phone surveys by the researchers affiliated with the City University of New York in 2001 found that the proportion of those self-identifying as Christian had declined from 86.2% in 1990 to 76.5% in 2001. In 2001, 1.3% self-identified as Jewish, .5% as Muslim, .5% as Buddhist, .3% as Unitarian/Universalist, and .4% as Hindu. Others self-identified as atheists (9.4%), agnostic (0.5%) or refused to respond (5.4%). More nuanced polls have recently been conducted of those who are affiliated with Christian faiths. A poll conducted for National Public Radio in July 2006 of likely voters in the fall 2006 election found that 12% identified themselves as fundamentalist, 21% evangelical, 10% as charismatic/Pentecostal, 42% as moderate to liberal, 5% as something else, and 11% as unwilling to respond (or responding "don't know").

- Views on the role of the Bible and the relationship between religious belief and science vary. In Gallup surveys completed in May 2006, 28% of respondents indicated that they believed that the Bible is the actual word of God and is to be taken literally word for word; 49% said that it was the inspired word of God but not everything in it should be taken literally, and 19% regarded it as an ancient book of fables, legends, history, and moral precepts recorded by man. When asked about their views on the origin and development of human beings, 36% of respondents said that man developed over millions of years with God guiding the process, 13% said man developed over millions of years but God had no part in the process, 46% said that God had created man in his present form, and 5% gave other or no opinion. An April 2006 CBS news poll found that 26% of respondents believed the science and religion agreed with each other, 32% said they generally conflict with each other, 37% said they were not related in a meaningful way, and 5% said they didn't know or gave no answer.

- Americans' exposure to the religions beliefs and practices of others' also appears limited. A June 2005 poll by CBS News asked respondents whether any of their close friends or family members who were of a different religion had introduced them to different teachings or philosophies that had become part of their own religious or spiritual practices. Of those responding, 23% said yes, 48% said no, 18% said they had no close friends or family members of other religions, 10% said religion wasn't important to them, and 1% said they didn't know or declined to answer.

- Americans also appear to associate religion in certain respects with conflict. In a July 2005 poll by the Pew Research Center for People and the Press, respondents were asked how much of a role religion plays in causing most wars and conflicts in the world. Responses indicated that 40% believed that religion caused a great deal of conflict, 35% a fair amount, 13% only a little, 8% not at all, and 4% refused or said they didn't know. When asked a similar question about the role religion plays in causing political conflict in the United States, 30% responded that it caused a great deal of conflict, 35% said a fair amount, 27% said only a little, 4% said none at all, and 4% said they didn't know or refused to respond.

Legal Principles: Historical Perspectives. Americans are clearly a religious people. Significantly, however, the American constitutional experiment provided for the separation of church and state, a deliberate and unique departure from prior European tradition.

- The First Amendment states that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." The Founders thus rejected the European tradition that taxed all to support a single nationally-affiliated church, and sought to avoid sectarian strife that would likely arise from jockeying among the different religious affiliations prominent in the various states. They also barred government from intruding on individual religious beliefs and thereby protected freedom of conscience. These provisions of the United States Constitution have also been applied to the states, and many states have independently codified protections relation to religion as part of their state constitutions.

- In his recent book Divided by God (Oxford University Press, 2005) and related writing in the New York Times, NYU Professor Noah Feldman has discussed the core dilemma created by the American constitutional experiment with the relationship between church and state: how to negotiate "the challenge of preserving the unity of the sovereign people in the face of their flourishing spiritual variety and often conflicting religious needs." Feldman notes the important ways in which social realities have impacted legal developments, including waves of immigration that have brought changing patterns of religious diversity to American shores, the 19th century influx of Catholics which raised issues public and parochial education, and the importance World War II and the Holocaust in highlighting the risk that religious minorities can suffer discrimination or even persecution when the German government adopted a stance favoring Christianity and opposing those of Jewish faith. Through it all, Feldman believes, we acknowledge our religious diversity while at the same time "we strive to be a nation with a common identity and a common project."

- In Feldman's view, current tensions reflect two conflicting viewpoints about the proper relationship of religion and government. Feldman describes "values evangelicals" who believe that "the right answers to questions of government policy must come from the wisdom of religious traditions," and notes that those with such viewpoint can be found across the range of religious traditions. Feldman believes that "What all values evangelicals have in common is the goal of evangelizing for values: promoting a strong set of ideas about the best way to live your life and urging the government to adopt those values and encourage them wherever possible. To them, the best way to hold the United States together as a nation, not just a country, is for us to know what values we really hold and to stand up for them." Feldman characterizes the second competing viewpoint as one held by "legal secularists" who "see religion as a matter of personal belief and choice largely irrelevant to government and who are concerned that values derived from religion will divide us, not unite us." Such "legal secularists" may be active members of various religious faiths, but believe that government should be secular and be bounded by related legal constraints. According to Feldman, "legal secularists" believe that "full citizenship means fully sharing in the legal and political commitments of the nation. If the nation defines itself in terms of values drawn from religion, they worry, then it will inevitably tend to adopt the religious values of the majority, excluding religious minorities and nonreligious people from full citizenship."

- Feldman believes that neither "values evangelicals" nor "legal secularists" have been very effective in negotiating the core tension between Americans' desire to recognize religious diversity while also maintaining a sense of unity, particularly in the days since 9/11. In his view, the "values evangelicals want to find shared values, but that leads them to rely on the unexamined assumption that deep down, Americans agree on what matters. The trouble is that 'we' often do not agree." Such disagreement is particularly apparent on issues such as abortion where "values evangelicals" believe that they must stand for something and are generally unwilling to recognize that those with competing views may have legitimate claims to make decisions of their own. On the other hand, the belief by "legal secularists" that religious expression must be removed from the public sphere in order to make those of all faiths and viewpoints welcome has resulted in pressure to keep religious views private or at least outside of public settings associated with government (a matter of concern for example, for those who wish to see the Ten Commandments or Christmas crèches displayed). Banishing religious expressions from the public eye has in Feldman's view made "values evangelicals" feel excluded and undercut the hunger for public expression of shared values, even though that is not the intent. These underlying tensions have been fueled in part by confusing legal developments that have reversed the original intent of the Constitution's provisions on religion by eliminating religious expression in many public settings while at the same time allowing funding of faith-based activities.

Legal Principles and the Courts.

- Litigation involving the public schools has illustrated the complex application of legal precepts embodied in the First Amendment's "free exercise" and "establishment" clauses when applied to educational settings. One of the fundamental legal tests applied in this setting is that articulated in Lemon v. Kurtz, a 1971 decision by the United States Supreme Court that required government decisions in the schools to be motivated by a secular purpose, to have primarily secular effects and not to entangle the state with religious institutions. Applying this and other tests in ensuing years, the courts have addressed numerous issues. For example, cases have addressed school prayer and moments of silence (permissible if students opt to do so but not permissible if mandated), school-sponsored prayer in public settings (impermissible), religious expression by teachers in classrooms (may be deemed officially sanctioned and impermissible especially with younger students), instruction about religion (permissible), and distribution of flyers (permissible to include information relating to religious activities but impermissible for schools to screen content so as to prohibit religious content if unfettered discretion). Courts have also entered the fray in the "intelligent design" v. evolution controversy, most recently finding that mandates to teach intelligent design represented an impermissible effort to incorporate religious doctrine in the classroom.

- Colleges and universities have also faced litigation about the implications of the Constitution's religion clauses and related "free speech" provisions. For example, the United States Supreme Court has held that a public university must make campus facilities available to student religious groups in the same way and to the same extent that it makes its space available to non-religious student organizations. Public universities must also make student fees available on the same basis for student groups whether they have sponsor or support religious and non-religious activities. On the other hand, the United States Supreme Court has concluded that public universities may deny scholarship funds to college students majoring in theology, in situations where state constitutional provisions dictate such separation (through the Washington "Blaine Amendment" that states that "No public money or property shall be appropriated or applied to any religious worship, exercise or instruction, or the support of any religious establishment"). Current controversies have focused on such issues as the legality of public universities' efforts to limit recognition of student organizations which refuse to comply with non-discrimination policies on the basis of religious beliefs that object to homosexuality or that require that leadership positions be filled by those who comply with certain religious tenets.

- The First Amendment also affords relevant protections beyond those found in the "free exercise" and "establishment" clauses. It also states that "Congress shall make no law ... abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble." The courts have interpreted these and other constitutional provisions to apply to the states and have also concluded that they protect freedom of association in intimate, expressive, and political contexts. These freedoms have some limitations, however. For example, the courts have said that freedom of speech does not allow someone to "cry fire in a crowded theatre" or to use "fighting words." The right to express oneself may depend on whether the setting for such expression has been established or treated as a "public forum," and whether the governmental entity has established reasonable, content-neutral "time, place, and manner" restrictions.

- Once again, the application of these additional First Amendment freedoms to public university campuses is more complex than might initially appear. For example, the University of Michigan had adopted a "speech code" that prohibited "Any behavior, verbal or physical, that stigmatizes or victimizes an individual on the basis of race, ethnicity, religion, sex, sexual orientation, creed … and that … Creates an intimidating, hostile, or demeaning environment for educational pursuits, employment or participation in University[-]sponsored extra-curricular activities." A university guide provided examples of conduct that were regarded as harassment, such as "You exclude someone from a study group because that person is of a different race, sex, or ethnic origin than you are." In 1989, a lower federal court found this policy to be vague and overbroad. In 1991, a University of Wisconsin policy that prohibited addressing a specific individual with "racist or discriminatory comments" was also struck down by a lower federal court because the policy was not narrowly enough stated to prohibit only "fighting words." Some colleges have endeavored to establish "free speech zones" in order to situate student protests, allow students to distribute flyers, and hold gatherings in areas that would not disrupt classes, and these strategies have brought challenges when the designated areas for such activity were very small. Public universities also face issues regarding the rights of the student press on their campuses. The United States Supreme Court has held that in the context of public high schools, school administrators can treat a student newspaper as a "non-public forum" and can punish or censor students for their expression if necessary for educational reasons. It specifically reserved the question of the status of college newspapers.

Religion and Politics. While the First Amendment thus restrains government in a number of important ways it does not preclude other actions that interject religious belief or affiliation into the political arena. The American electorate appears to have grown increasingly polarized and profoundly divided in recent years, with divergent religious beliefs and moral judgments playing significant roles in these developments.

- A recent study by the non-partisan research organization, Public Agenda, tracked changing attitudes relating to religion and politics over the four years from 2000 to 2004 (just prior to the 2004 Presidential election). One of the survey questions asked whether respondents agreed with the following statement: "Even elected officials who are deeply religious sometimes have to make compromises and set their conflictions aside to get results while in government." The organization found a substantial drop in those agreeing with this statement between 2000 and 2004: the proportion of the general population agreeing fell from 84% to 74%, while the proportion of those attending church services weekly dropped from 82% to 63% and the proportion of evangelicals dropped from 79% to 63%. Another question asked whether respondents believed that deeply religious people should keep their faith private, be very careful about "spreading the word of God" so as not to offend others, or "spread the word of God whenever they can." In 2000, 18% of respondents said that deeply religious people should keep their faith private, while 46% said that people with such beliefs should be very careful, and 35% said that they should spread the word actively. By 2004, the total of those who believed that people should keep their faith private or proceed carefully had dropped to 57% and the number who believed that they should spread the word of God whenever they could rose to 41%.

- In 2005, the Pew Center for Religion and Public Life found that the closely-contested 2004 President election had been marked by a deep faith-based partisan divide. More specifically, they concluded that "Americans who regularly attend worship services and hold traditional religious views increasingly vote Republican, while those who are less connected to religious institutions and more secular in their outlook tend to outlook tend to vote Democratic," and that the divide was most marked by the difference between "traditionalist" religious outlook rather than denominational label. The Pew study also found that the most important cause of the church attendance gap was the "mix of social and cultural issues" such as abortion and gay marriage which have pushed "the religiously observant into one political corner and the more secular into the other." Regional differences have also contributed, with a "broad shift to the GOP among white voters in the Evangelical-heavy South." The Pew study also cited poll data indicating that "more than 70% Americans want their president to have strong religious beliefs," while "only a quarter of voters said that politicians 'mention religious faith and prayer too much.'" At the same time 65% of poll respondents said they thought that churches should not endorse political candidates.

- Academic observers have debated whether shifts represent a form of "culture war" that will endure or change in coming days. At a recent forum conducted by the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life, Professors Alan Wolfe and James Davison Hunter highlighted competing viewpoints more fully aired in their new book, Is There a Culture War: A Dialogue on Values and American Public Life (Brookings Institution Press, 2006). Several important questions are worth considering such as: Does a small proportion of Americans (elites on both the left and right of the political spectrum) fuel the divide? What can be said about those situated in the vast center? Is there a growing tendency for religious denominations to splinter along ideological lines? Will there be a return to inter-religious conflicts rather than intra-religious conflicts? Will people of faith conclude that close alliance with political forces is inadvisable in the long run?

- Robert Bellah, the noted author of Habits of the Heart, a study of American values and patterns of interaction in a simpler day, has suggested that developments in the wake of the 9/11 terrorist attacks have deeply challenged Americans' sense of themselves, their country, and the "civil religion" (a term used by Rousseau to connote "the existence of God, the life to come, the reward of virtue and the punishment of vice, and the exclusion of religious intolerance"). In Bellah's view, this "religion" does not correspond to or substitute for Christianity but instead facilitated a "wide sphere of personal piety and voluntary social action… left to the churches… [which] were neither to control the state nor to be controlled by it." Bellah has recently argued that the events of 9/11 present a challenge comparable to that of the Civil War when the country had to face fundamental questions about slavery and its implications for the nation's core values, and ultimately integrated the theme of sacrifice into its civic religion. Now, in Bellah's view, the challenge that confronts Americans and our civil religion is how we will use our power and whether we will be able to contribute in a meaningful way to the "attainment of some kind of viable and coherent world order" built upon "an awareness that our nation stands under higher judgment."

Appendix – Difficult Dialogues Initiative

APPROACH 1

PURSUE IN PRIVATE AND MAINTAIN UNIVERSITY NEUTRALITY

Description: Speech about personal faith and conscience belongs in private settings or off campus, in keeping with public universities' secular character and obligations of neutrality. Under this approach, individual students and faculty who wish to explore faith-based beliefs and judgments of conscience could do so in private settings with friends and family, in faith-based communities, or in other groups. The university would respect the desire of community members to engage in such discussions, but would not make special efforts to encourage or discourage such discussions. Thus, students and faculty could continue to discuss such their beliefs and views over coffee, or attend gatherings or services with whomever they choose. The university as an institution would maintain its historical neutrality rather than giving more attention to faith-based beliefs or matters of conscience.

Pros: Those who support this approach tend to emphasize the following ideas in support of their views.

- Personal faith-based beliefs and judgments of conscience arise in the innermost hearts and minds of individuals. They're something that should be protected from intrusion and thus should best be addressed in settings that are private and voluntary, as has traditionally be the practice.
- Some students say that they're most comfortable in talking with peers about faith-based beliefs and judgments of conscience when they can do so very informally with those they trust in private settings.
- Many opportunities exist to explore faith-based and conscience-based viewpoints in private conversations with friends and family members, in churches and synagogues, or in other faith-based or community groups. Universities lack relevant expertise and should defer to others in these settings. In light of these options, there's no need for public universities to intervene.
- Public universities should focus on academic matters that are more properly within their expertise and should steer clear or involvement with matters of faith and conscience as they affect individual members of university communities. As a matter of policy, it's best to maintain neutrality in this arena and attempt to steer clear of the "culture wars" that trouble the larger society.
- Constitutional principles relating to the "wall" between church and state should be observed. Members of the public who are taxed to fund public universities expect that such institutions will observe legal requirements relating to separation of church and state, much as they expect such neutrality from public elementary and secondary schools. Faculty and students likewise choose public universities with a full understanding that they are different from other colleges and universities with faith-based affiliations.

Cons. Those who disagree with this approach tend to emphasize concerns such as the following:

- Personal faith and conscience cannot be readily separated from day-to-day life so this approach is artificial and impractical.
- Many students and faculty have deeply held beliefs rooted in personal faith and conscience and this approach would make the campus less hospitable and welcoming for them.
- Artificial efforts to encourage discussions of personal faith and conscience primarily in private settings marginalize such questions. Requiring discussion of personal faith and conscience to take place elsewhere is anti-intellectual since these are important topics that need to be engaged when they arise.
- Critical issues facing society are the proper subject of intellectual inquiry within university settings. Faculty members currently cover topics that raise issues of personal faith and conscience when relevant to their subject matter. More emphatic emphasis on neutrality might make it difficult for them to pursue the issues that they believe in their best judgment are appropriate, and might impinge on the academic freedom of them and their students.
- The "wall" between church and state is not clearly delineated. It is likely that conflicts will arise whether or not the university attempts to embrace "neutrality." The tensions found in the larger society will lead to litigation involving public universities whatever they do.

Appendix – Difficult Dialogues Initiative

APPROACH 2

ENHANCE STUDENT OPTIONS AND ENGAGE OUTSIDE THE CLASSROOM

Description: Students should have ample opportunities to explore issues of personal faith and conscience if they choose to do so, but such opportunities should be situated primarily outside the classroom. Consideration of such matters is particularly important during the college years. Many students express serious interest in developing meaningful philosophies of life and in deepening their sense of spirituality. The most suitable setting for such exploration lies outside the standard classroom so that students express their own beliefs without discomfiting challenges from professors and classmates in more formal settings. At the same time, students be provided with support structures and varied occasions in which issues of faith and conscience can be explored. Students could work with those involved in student affairs on campuses to develop additional supportive strategies, for example through public service options, housing choices, additional campus programming, leadership development programs, counseling opportunities, or "safe zone" training.

Pros.

- Students have important educational and developmental needs related to faith and conscience, and should have meaningful opportunities to work with these issues on campus rather than having to pursue them elsewhere.
- This approach allows campus ministries and student organizations to take leadership and to share their expertise, and respects the academic freedom of faculty to address other subjects in the classroom.
- Speech about personal faith and conscience on campus is best situated outside the classroom where faculty are not involved in judging or grading students' views.
- This approach accommodates the views of all members of the campus community, including those of varying faith-based traditions and those who are agnostic, atheistic, or non-religious.
- This approach emphasizes the potential for creative initiatives led by students in order to meet their most substantial interests and needs.

Cons

- People of faith who oppose compartmentalization might find this approach artificial since it precludes conversations about personal faith and conscience in the classroom.
- Faculty who wish to address such issues in the classroom might feel that this approach marginalizes opportunities for engaging with pressing issues in the classroom, or creates false impressions that addressing relevant issues in the classroom is undesirable.
- Those who have a very evangelistic view of their faith and wish to express it in all aspects of their life may believe the university is cutting into or policing their faith by encouraging discussions to be held outside the classroom rather than in classroom settings.
- Giving personal faith and belief an institutional place on campus in non-classroom settings might be seen by some as intruding on the principle of university neutrality.
- Students and student affairs professionals may find it difficult and uncomfortable to deal with the kinds of conflicts and contention that increasingly characterize religious and political debates going on outside campus walls.

Appendix – Difficult Dialogues Initiative

APPROACH 3

ENGAGE PERSONAL FAITH AND CONSCIENCE IN THE CLASSROOM, RESPECTFULLY, IF FACULTY CHOOSE

Description. Speech about personal faith and conscience may occur on campus, including in the classroom, if conducted respectfully and if the professor believes it relevant. Some faculty members teach about topics that are directly relevant to personal faith and conscience, for example in courses in the sciences, literature, philosophy, public policy, gender and queer studies, history, journalism, political science, social work, nursing and medicine. Students would receive a poorer education if issues with implications for personal faith and conscience were not raised and addressed with a critical eye and an open mind in settings such as these. Faculty members have expertise in judging the relevance of topics and the best pedagogical techniques for exploring them. They should therefore be accorded considerable flexibility, in keeping with academic freedom principles, to determine when and in what ways issues of faith and conscience should be engaged. To encourage effective educational engagement in such settings, particularly in contentious times, faculty members should be provided with more extensive faculty development opportunities that help build skill in dealing with controversy in the classroom, and should be able to receive clear answers about their rights and responsibilities in such contexts. Students should also be given opportunities for training in handling "difficult dialogues" in the classroom so that they can actively participate and feel comfortable in doing so. Universities which believe that providing meaningful education on issues that intersect with personal faith and conscience might also find ways to encourage faculty members to incorporate such topics in their classes if relevant, and to flag classes raising such classes so that interested students can more readily enroll.

Pros.

- Faculty members whose courses touch on matters of faith and conscience should have the opportunity to introduce such topics as they believe relevant and wise.
- Classroom discussions provide for powerful learning opportunities by linking teaching with learning that takes place both inside and outside the classroom
- Inclusion of such discussions in the classroom allows faculty and students to engage with each other authentically rather than artificially separating matters of faith and conscience so as to compartmentalize their lives.
- This approach allows students to engage with faculty members if the students are conversant with their faith and ready to talk about it or are struggling with how their faith relates to issues raised in class.
- This approach is most consistent with universities' educational and intellectual mission, which anticipates active efforts to explore difficult questions and current issues including those relating to personal faith and conscience.

Concerns

- This approach may create blurry lines about what is relevant in class or what responses are "respectful," and leaves these decisions in professors' (rather than students') hands.
- This approach may give rise to expectations of in-class discussions when professors are hard-pressed to cover material in courses as it is or may reasonably believe that such discussions are not relevant or may feel that this approach intrudes upon their academic freedom.
- Professors and students may not be skilled in addressing challenging, hot-button issues where issues of faith and intellectual inquiry collide, so that it may be difficult to conduct such dialogues in ways that foster effective learning.
- Students and professors may feel put on the spot if asked to express their views on issues of this sort.
- This approach may result in faculty and students engaging with issues of faith and conscience in the classroom, when such issues might best be addressed in other settings (such as in student settings, dormitories, faith-based communities or with friends)

Appendix – Difficult Dialogues Initiative

APPROACH 4

ENGAGE QUESTIONS OF FAITH AND CONSCIENCE WIDELY, ACTIVELY AND DELIBERATELY

Description. Public universities should actively encourage more widespread conversation and engagement with issues of personal faith and conscience throughout their campuses, including in private, student, classroom, and academic settings. Personal faith and conscience are great personal importance as well as increasing social importance yet have led to increasing division within modern societies including the United States. Public universities, no less than their private counterparts, need to engage more actively with related issues and competing viewpoints in order to prepare students for global realities and future roles as citizens. University leaders, faculty and students have worked actively in recent years to engage with issues of multiculturalism and the implications of gender, race, ethnicity, sexuality. Questions of faith and spirituality may in some ways seem more personal, private, and fraught with political overtones. Nonetheless, current conflicts and misunderstandings between those of different faith- and conscience-based traditions unless there are active efforts build bridges that do not currently exist. Special care will be needed to proceed deliberately, creatively, and sensitively in meeting associated challenges. A comprehensive, active approach might include efforts relating to the curriculum, such as: strengthening curricular offerings relating to philosophy, religious studies, or faith-related components of varied courses; developing new courses; or draw on existing models used in other contexts (perhaps a new type of "Great Decisions" course that emphasizes issues of faith and conscience rather than international affairs). It might also be desirable to expand speaker programs focused on issues of faith and conscience featuring either campus-based on visiting speakers. Student affairs programming might be expanded in ways discussed under Approach 2. Campuses might also draw together members of the public from differing faith- and conscience-based viewpoints to engage with those on campus.

Pros

- This approach addresses the range of objectives noted with regard to earlier approaches.
- Public universities are appropriate settings in which to engage with the full-range of pressing social issues and competing viewpoints so that they can be understood more fully. They may be able to bring light (rather than heat) to matters currently confounding the larger society.
- Developing tools for and experience with discussion of deeply-felt differences is important for the future of society and civic life.
- Engaging respectfully with issues of faith and conscience allows students and faculty to learn from others' viewpoints without forcing one's beliefs on others. Issues of faith and conscience are of great importance to students and citizens and it is better to engage with them than to marginalize them in unhealthy ways.
- A multi-faceted, comprehensive approach that engage members of the campus community in a range of contexts are more likely to be effective in broadening understanding and respect than are approaches that limit related discussions to more narrow contexts such as those detailed in earlier approaches.

Cons

- Taking on issues of faith and conscience in a comprehensive way within a public university may create controversy and division. Some faculty, students, parents, and members of the larger community might experience this approach as overbearing and inappropriate in light of their own personal faith and conscience-based beliefs. This approach might also create risks of interference from external forces tied to religious or political viewpoints, or public opprobrium if good-faith efforts prove problematic in execution.
- Some faculty member might worry that this approach could compromise the intellectual ideals and secular nature of the universities or blur important distinctions between the type of critical thinking and intellectual inquiry that is central to a university education and more personal views rooted in conscience and faith-based beliefs. Intermingling issues of faith and conscience in public higher education institutional settings may prove difficult because of the multitude of diverse faith- and conscience-based perspectives or create concerns that such beliefs are not treated with equal respect or attention.
- The University may lack the capacity and competence to undertake such an effort, given other curricular obligations, academic priorities, and resource constraints. Faculty and students may also lack the skills, perspectives, and interests to be navigate challenging topics and conversations effectively.
- Depending on how it would be implemented, this approach might raise legal questions relating to the appropriate roles of publicly funded higher education, faith-based institutions, and individuals' freedom of conscience.
- This approach is less well-defined and may raise expectations that cannot be realized.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, November 13, 2006 3:16 PM
To: Chapel Hill Philosophy <hobler@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re:

GREAT--thanks

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Chapel Hill Philosophy wrote:
> Jan:
>
> You have now a recitation, PHIL 275 603, in your name, at 11 am, in GA 007, > controlled enrollment, for 10 people.
>
> Gucki
>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, November 15, 2006 9:26 AM
To: Stevenson, Debbie Deese <debbie_stevenson@unc.edu>
Subject: Tanner finalists

Hi Debbie,
I am having the finalists delivered to you this morning. I have assigned each committee member to write the blurb that we need. Could you please send a couple of samples that I can distribute to my committee so they have an idea what we are looking for.

Also you may notice that on our final finalists there is a name I omitted from the original list. I hope this doesn't present any problems. If so we have an alternate.

Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, November 15, 2006 9:46 AM
To: Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>; Lange, Marc B <mlange@email.unc.edu>; MacLean, Douglas <maclean@email.unc.edu>; Roberts, John Thomas <jtrosap@email.unc.edu>; Postema, Gerald J <gpostema@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Meeting re courses
Attach: Course Preferences 07-08.doc; Course Needs-07-08.doc

I will be out of town from Monday Nov 20-Tuesday Nov 28. Geoff suggested that we meet regarding courses for next year. If we are going to do this, it will have to be very soon--this week. We need to get the requests from the faculty by Dec 8 at the very latest, as Gucki will have to start entering them in the computer on December 15th. This is quite labor intensive especially given all the other things going on during finals,etc. That doesn't give me much time to put the schedule together.

Is there some time today before 2:45; tomorrow anytime except lunch; Friday 10:30-1.
I'm attaching the forms the way I have sent them in the past [with current info]. If these are fine with everyone, then I can just send them out as is, but if we want to be more specific in our course needs, then I need to change them.

Thanks,

Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Chapel Hill Philosophy
UNIVERSITY OF NORTH CAROLINA

Department of Philosophy CB #3125, Caldwell Hall UNC Chapel Hill Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

Jan Boxill 919.962.3317 jmboxill@email.unc.edu

TO: ALL FACULTY
FROM: Jan Boxill, Associate Chair & Teaching Coordinator
DATE: November 7, 2006
RE: Class Schedule for 2007-2008
Fall Semester: August 21-December 16; Spring Semester: January 9-May 11.

Among all the other things you have to do, it is time to consider the course schedule for the next academic year. I have attached a list of course needs for the year. The normal assignments for a standard teaching load are: two service courses, one perk course; one graduate-level course. Variations are possible from time to time, but the average must come very close to this norm if we to meet our enrollment obligations and secure fairness in teaching assignments.

I encourage those of you with overlapping interests (ethics/political philosophy; philosophy of language/philosophy of mind) to work out together how you wish to cover necessary courses, as well as to spread the wealth of graduate students.

Please look over the list and outlines of course schedules, and then give me your course and time preferences. If there are any special considerations that I need to take into account in putting the schedule together, please note them, (especially those who have to offer a course for which they received a grant), and let me know if you expect to have a leave of any sort or a reduced course load.

Teaching time information:

Please keep in mind that not all courses can be taught during prime hours or on Tuesday and Thursday. In an effort to avoid conflicts, graduate classes that meet once a week are offered during two time slots per day: 1-3:30 and 4-6:30. Unfortunately, despite our best efforts, there may still be conflicts. Please indicate a preference when requesting graduate level (400 and up) courses. Keep in mind we reserve Monday 1-3 for Department meetings.

Proto and Logic:

Given that first year graduate students all have fellowships and therefore do not teach, Proto will likely be scheduled 10-12:30 on either Tuesday or Thursday; and PHIL 455 will likely be taught MW 10-11:15

Summa Seminars

Fall: Placement person Spring: Admissions person

Please submit your preferences to me no later than Friday, December 1 , 2006
You can submit your preferences in the old numbers; but your assignments will be given in the new numbers.

Thank you all for your help and patience.

NAME: _____

FALL 2007: (List courses in order of preference 1-4)

1. COURSE: _____ Time pref: 1._____ 2._____ 3. _____
2. COURSE: _____ Time pref: 1._____ 2._____ 3. _____
3. COURSE: _____ Time pref: 1._____ 2._____ 3. _____
4. COURSE: _____ Time pref: 1._____ 2._____ 3. _____

COMMENTS and SPECIAL CONSIDERATIONS:

SPRING 2008:

1. COURSE:_____Time pref: 1._____ 2._____ 3. _____
2. COURSE: _____ Time pref: 1._____ 2._____ 3. _____
3. COURSE:_____Time pref: 1._____ 2._____ 3. _____
4. COURSE:_____Time pref: 1._____ 2._____ 3. _____

COMMENTS and SPECIAL CONSIDERATIONS:

2007-2008 COURSE NEEDS

FALL:			SPRING
SERVICE COURSES:
PHIL 101 – LARGE	Intro		PHIL 101 – LARGE
PHIL 160 – LARGE	Intro Ethics		PHIL 160 – LARGE
PHIL 112 – LARGE	Making Sense of Ourselves		PHIL 163 – LARGE	Practical Ethics
PHIL 165 – LARGE	Bioethics
PHIL 110	Intro: Great Books		PHIL 110
PHIL 155	Intro Logic		PHIL 155
PHIL 150	Phil of Science		PHIL 150
PHIL 134	Phil of Religion		PHIL 145	Philosophy of Language
PHIL 185	Aesthetics	OR	PHIL 185
PHIL 154	Phil of Social Science	OR	PHIL 154
PHIL 170	Social & Political		PHIL 170
PHIL 230	Experience & Reality		PHIL 230
PHIL 280	Morality and Law		PHIL 280
PHIL 272	Peace,War, Defense		PHIL 272
PHIL 275	Feminism		PHIL 275
PHIL 210	Ancient Philosophy		PHIL 220	Modern Philosophy
PERK COURSES:
FIRST YEAR SEMINARS (2)			FIRST YEAR SEMINARS (2)
HONORS COURSES (2)			HONORS SEMINARS (2)
Courses 300-400 designed for Junior/Senior Philosophy Majors
PHIL 356	Topics in Math Logic		PHIL 360, 3622, or 370 (1)
PHIL 360, 362 or 370	Ethics/Political (1)		PHIL 330,335,340,345,353 (2)
PHIL 330,335,340,345,353	Metaphysics/Epistemology (2)		PHIL 384	Gateway PPE
PHIL 351, 352	Science		PHIL 484	Capstone PPE
PHIL 390	Topics		PHIL 397	Colloquium for Majors
GRADUATE LEVEL COURSES
PHIL 460	History of Ethics	or	PHIL 462	Contemporary Ethical Theory
PHIL 470	Hobbes, Locke, Rousseau	or	PHIL 470
PHIL 480	Phil of Law	or	PHIL 476	Recent Political
PHIL 445	Phil of Language	or	PHIL 440	Mind
PHIL 455	Advanced Logic		PHIL 453	Phil of Psychology
PHIL 480	Advanced Phil of Law		PHIL 432 or 433	Analytic Phil
PHIL 450,451,452	Science	or	PHIL 450,451,452	Science
PHIL 411	Plato		PHIL 412	Aristotle

AREAS EITHER 300, 700 or 800:

ANCIENT PHILOSOPHY	MODERN PHILOSOPHY
PHILOSOPHY OF SCIENCE/LOGIC	PHILOSOPHY OF MIND
EPISTEMOLOGY	METAPHYSICS

PROTO in Spring—to be taught in the in the morning (Tues, Wed, or Thurs)

NOTES:

Large classes= 200 students with 4 teaching assistants
FYS = 20 students max; must already have been approved by FYS committee
Honors: 25 person max
Other regular service courses 100-200 = 30-35 students (no teaching assistants)

300 = courses for majors; 25 students

Course descriptions: http://www.unc.edu/ugradbulletin/depts/phil.html

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, November 15, 2006 10:10 AM
To: Stevenson, Debbie Deese <debbie_stevenson@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Tanner finalists

Thanks so much; just what I need.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

debbie_stevenson@unc.edu wrote:
> Thanks Jan! I've attached the banquet program from last year with all > the citations that were written. I will let you know if for some > reason the other finalist is not eligible otherwise it should not be a > problem.
>
> I hope this helps!
>
> Debbie
>
>
> Quoting Jan Boxill <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>:
>
>> Hi Debbie,
>> I am having the finalists delivered to you this morning. I have >> assigned each committee member to write the blurb that we need. Could >> you please send a couple of samples that I can distribute to my >> committee so they have an idea what we are looking for.
>>
>> Also you may notice that on our final finalists there is a name I >> omitted from the original list. I hope this doesn't present any >> problems. If so we have an alternate.
>>
>> Jan
>>
>> --
>> Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
>> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
>> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
>> Department of Philosophy
>> Phone: 919-962-3317
>> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>>
>>
>>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, November 15, 2006 10:17 AM
To: Stevenson, Debbie Deese <debbie_stevenson@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Tanner finalists

When do we need the blurbs to you?

Jan
>>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, November 15, 2006 10:49 AM
To: Stevenson, Debbie Deese <debbie_stevenson@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Tanner finalists

Thanks,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, November 15, 2006 2:31 PM
To: Chapel Hill Philosophy <hobler@email.unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: [health-disparities] Two Student Positions within the Orange County Department of Helath]
Attach: [health-disparities] Two Student Positions within the Orange County Department of Helath.msg

---

Can you send this out to the grad students.
Jan

From: Nicole Snowden-Taylor <taylorsn@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, November 15, 2006 1:43 PM
To: List-Serv to distribute health disparities news and event information <health-disparities@listserv.unc.edu>
Subject: [health-disparities] Two Student Positions within the Orange County Department of Helath

---

I. Orange County Health Department Seeks Community Outreach Assistant
<>
<>Date posted October 30, 2006
Time period of service Nov 1, 2006 through May 31, 2007

Job Description <>
Seeking graduate level student to assist in a faith-based community health promotion project in Orange County, NC. This is a great opportunity to gain community level experience. Tasks will include assisting local churches in health promotion program development focused on physical activity and nutrition. Technical assistance to churches writing simple grant proposals and creating health programs for their churches. Knowledge of Orange County is beneficial but not required. Must be available now through May 2007. <>
Stipend of $3,500 will be paid for completion of duties. <>
Flexible schedule. Approximately 10 hours per week required. May need to work nights, weekends but also some availability during weekdays will be required for meetings with agency representatives.

<><>Skills preferred:
- Experience working with faith-communities
- Excellent writing skills
- Experience in organizing community meetings and group facilitation
- Comfort in working in community settings with diverse populations
- Experience with grant writing and completion
- Experience in developing health promotion programs<!--[if !supportLists]--><!--[endif]--><!--[if !supportLists]--><!--[endif]--><!--[if !supportLists]--><!--[endif]--><!--[if !supportLists]--><!--[endif]--><!--[if !supportLists]--><!--[endif]--><!--[if !supportLists]--><!--[endif]--><!--[if !supportLists]--><!--[endif]-->

Please send resume with cover letter to:
Maria Hitt at mhitt@co.orange.nc.us or by mail to:
Southern Human Services Center
2501 Homestead Road
Chapel Hill, NC 27516
No phone calls please

II. Orange County Health Department
Seeks student to assist in 2007
Community Health Assessment

Date posted November 13, 2006
Time period of service Nov 15, 2006 through May 15, 2007
(Potential for extension through summer and /or December 2007) <>

<>Job Description

Seeking graduate level student able to assist in community health assessment. Students in Public Health, Public Policy and Administration and other associated fields preferred. This is a great opportunity to gain community level experience and practice in collecting, analyzing and describing qualitative and quantitative data. Tasks will include assistance in developing, implementing and tabulating a community wide survey. May have an opportunity to utilize GIS and hand held devices for data collection. Review of secondary data will be needed as well. Assistance to help coordinate community health issue teams. Knowledge of Orange County is beneficial but not required. Must be available now through May 2007. (Potential for extension through summer and /or December 2007). Great chance for a masters level project or paper .<> <>Stipend of $3,500 will be paid for completion of duties.
Flexible schedule. Approximately 10 hours per week required. May need to work nights, weekends but also some availability during weekdays will be required for meetings with agency representatives.

<><>Skills required/preferred:

- Experience with survey development, administration, and tabulation
- Expertise at compiling and analyzing secondary data
- Excellent writing skills
- Experience in organizing community meetings and group facilitation
- Bilingual in Spanish a plus
- Comfort in working in community settings with diverse populations<!--[if !supportLists]--><!--[endif]--><!--[if !supportLists]--><!--[endif]--><!--[if !supportLists]--><!--[endif]--><!--[if !supportLists]--><!--[endif]--><!--[if !supportLists]--><!--[endif]--><!--[if !supportLists]--><!--[endif]--><!--[if !supportLists]--><!--[endif]--> <>

Please send resume with cover letter to:
<><>Maria Hitt at mhitt@co.orange.nc.us or by mail to:
Southern Human Services Center
2501 Homestead Road
Chapel Hill, NC 27516 <>
No phone calls please

-

- -- You are currently subscribed to health-disparities as: jmboxill@email.unc.edu . To unsubscribe send a blank email to leave-13476056-2305516U@listserv.unc.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, November 16, 2006 10:39 AM
To: Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: scheduling
Attach: Faculty Overview Nov 15,2006.xls; Faculty Assign 07-08.doc

---

Geoff,
Thanks for this. With regard to Doug as DGS, he has one course off this year--Spring 07.
Attached is the form we have been using--I think you actually put it together originally! Also is an updated Faculty overview.
What I don't have up to day is the course offering overview. In fact I don't have my original document. I am looking to see if I ever sent it to you.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Faculty	Fall 2007		Spring 2008
Bar-On
Boxill, Bernard
Boxill, Jan	Parr Center		Parr Center
Brennan			PHIL 698: PPE Capstone
Corrado
Hill
Hofweber
Knobe
Lange	Assoc Chair
Lesher	PHIL 210: Ancient		PHIL 210: Ancient Lycan
MacLean	DGS
Nelson
Neta
Nord
Pettit
Postema	Possible Leave	Possible Leave	Possible Leave	Possible Leave
Prinz
Reeve
Roberts	DUGS
Sayre McCord	Chair		Chair
Simmons
Walker
Wolf
New Hire-1
New Hire-2
Visitor 1: PPE	PHIL 384: PPE Gateway
Visitor 2: Parr	Ethics	Ethics	Ethics	Ethics
Visitor 3: BBT	PHIL 164: Business Ethics
Visitor 4:

First Year Seminars:	Fall:	Spring:	DUS: Roberts
Honors:	Fall:	Spring:	DGS: McLean
Proto:			Placement:
Research Reading Group:	Fall	Spring	Admissions:
Kenan Seminars:
Summa	Fall	Spring

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, November 16, 2006 11:14 AM
To: Lance Westerlund <westy@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Project
Attach: Courses F00-S07.xls

Lance,
Can you open up the xls sheet and update the course numbers for me, and fix the sheet as well, if you can.
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

	A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I	J	K	L	M	N	O	P
1								COURSE OFFERINGS
2
3					F 2000	S 2001	F 2001	S 2002	F 2002	S 2003	F 2003	S 2004	F 2004	S 2005	F 2005	S 2006
4
5		6F		First Year Seminar-1	Rosenberg		Long		Resnik	Hill	Simmons	BarOn	Lange	Lycan	Lycan	H-Hill
6		6F		First Year Seminar-2		Hill		Boxill B	Hill	Garrett		Boxill J	Reeve	Rosenberg	Roberts	Rosenberg
7		6F		First Year Seminar-3				Galligan
8		20	101-L	Intro: Large class	Garrett	Lycan	Rosen	Garrett	Neta	BarOn	Prinz	Neta	Bar On	Neta	no lge	Neta
9		20	101	Intro: Main Problems				BarOn					TA		BarOn
10		20H	101H	Intro: Honors				Resnik		Prinz	Hofweber	Lange			Knobe
11		21	155-L	Logic: Large class	Munsat	Simmons	Lycan	Munsat	Simmons		Lycan	Roberts	Hofweber		no lge	no lge
12		21	155	Logic					Boxill J	Munsat			TA	2-TA	H-Resnik
13		22	160-L	Intro Ethics:Large	Boxill B	GSM	GSM	GSM	GSM	GSM	Wolf	GSM	Lycan	GSM	GSM	Lycan
14		22	160	Intro to Ethics				Zaffron			Gert
15		22	160
16		22H	160H	Intro Ethics Honors	Boxill J			Lycan
17		24	110	Great Works		Gallig	Reeve		MacLean				TA	TA	Miller
18		26	112-L	Making Sense-Large									Reeve		Reeve	r-TA
19		26	112	Making Sense-regular										TA		TA
20		30	163-L	Applied Ethics:Large		Jboxill		Jboxill		MacLean		MacLean		MacLean	no lge	no lge
21		30	163	Applied Ethics					Jboxill				TA
22		31	150	Phil of Science	Roberts					Resnik	Roberts		Roberts			Roberts
23		32	134	Phil of Religion				Nord			Pettit		Pettit/Nord	Nord	Pettit	Nord
24		33		Aesthetics	Vance
25		34	165-L	Bioethics:Large class	Long		Long		Long		Gert		Long		Walker
26		34	165	Bioethics-regular										TA
27		34	165
28		34H	165-H	Bioethics: Honors						Long		Long
29		35	145	Phil of Language						Bar On-H		Pettit		Pettit	Long
30		36		Phil Social Sci	Zaffron		Zaffron			Zaffron
31		37	170	Social & Political	Resnik		Resnik			Postema			Resnik	May	Tubert	TA-Turner
32		37	170	Social & Political									May	TA	TA-Wilson
33		37H	170H	Honors							Hill					Hill
34		38		Experience & Reality		Rosenberg		BarOn		Neta	Lange		Simmons	TA	Knobe	Knobe
35		38H		Experience & Reality	BarOn						Bar On				Lange
36		39		Business Ethics									Peikoff	Piekoff	Hassoun	Kelly
37		41		Morality & Law				Postema-H			Gert		Peikoff	Piekoff
38		42		PWAD			Boxill B				Boxill B		B.Boxill	TA	Boxill	Lge-Boxill
39		45		Phil of Education											Nord
40		46		Feminism		Boxill J			Wolf		Boxill J		TA	TA-2		Tubert
41		46H		Feminism			Boxill J			Wolf
42		47		Ethics of Sports				Boxill-H			Boxill J			J Boxill
43		55		Afro-American Phil			Boxill B		Boxill B			Boxill B		B Boxill-H
44		56		Ancient Phil	Galligan	Galligan	Galligan	Galligan		Reeve	Miller	Miller		Reeve-L	TA-Bowers
45		57		Medieval
46		58		Modern	Garrett		Garrett		Garrett		Neta	Sreedh	Neta	Russell		Miller
47		59		American Phil							Boxill B
48
49				EVENING CLASS	22	20	34	30	20	37	34	38	34	37	32	34
50
51
52					F 2000	S 2001	F 2001	S 2002	F 2002	S 2003	F 2003	S 2004	F 2004	S 2005	F 2005	S 2006
53

COURSE OFFERINGS

	Q	R
1
2
3	F 2006	S 2007
4
5
6
7
8 9 10 11 12 13 14
15
16
17
18 19 20 21
22
23 24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31 32
33 34 35
36 37
38
39 40
41 42
43
44
45
46
47 48
49
50
51
52	F 2006	S 2007
53

	A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I	J	K	L	M	N	O	P
54		60		Kant to Nietzsche										TA
55		64		Existentialism
56
57		65		20th Cent Phil
58		66		Social & Econ Justice									J Boxill		Kelly
59		67		Ethics & Economics									Fisher		Kahn
60		68		Environmental Ethics		Amoni	MacLean				Baker		TA		Raterman
61		69		Induction & Probability										Lange
62		70		History of Ethics						MacLean
63		71		Logic				Resnik	Resnik		Simmon		Resnik		Resnik
64		72		Cont Ethic Theory	Hill							Hill
65		73		Theory of Knowledge				Rosenberg				Rosenberg
66		74		Reference & Meaning							Lycan					Pettit
67		75		Meta Systems	Roberts							Roberts
68		76		Phil of Mind						Long					Long
69		77		Cognitive Science								Bar On		Prinz
70		78		Political			MacLean								B Boxill
71		80-1			Munsast	Zaffon	Lycan		Boxill B	Zaffron	Prinz		B Boxill			B.Boxill
72		80-2		Topics			Zaffron			Munsat	Hofweber		Long
73		80-3		Topics
74
75		84		Intro to PPE										Brennan	Gaus	Brennan
76		96		Colloquium for Majors		Bar On		Hill		Lycan		MacLean
77
78
79 80
81

	Q	R
54
55
56
57
58
59 60
61
62
63
64
65
66
67
68
69
70
71
72
73
74
75 76
77
78
79 80
81

COURSE OFFERINGS

	A	B	C	D	E	F	COURSE OFFERINGS		I	J	K	L	M	N	O	P
82
83
84				Advanced UG/Grad
85					F 2000	S 2001	F 2001	S 2002	F 2002	S 2003	F 2003	S 2004	F 2004	S 2005	F 2005	S 2006
86
87
88		101		Logic	Resnik		Resnik		Simmons		Resnik		Hofweber		Hofweber
89		102		History of Ethics	Hill		Hill		Hill
90		103		Phil of Art
91		104		Hegel
92		105		Political Phil	Boxill B							Postema			Gaus
93		106		Phil of Math		Resnik				Resnik
94		107		Social Sciences				Zaffron
95		108		Phil of Science				Roberts							Roberts
96		109		Phil of Psychology	Long/BarOn				Zaffron	Prinz					Reeve	Knobe
97		110		Phil of Language			BarOn								Pettit
98		111		Advanced Logic									Simmons
99		112		Cont Moral Phil		GSM				GSM		Hill				GSM
100		113		Phil of Law					Corrado		Corrado		Corrado		Corrado
101		114		Analytic -Begin						Neta
102		115		Found of Math
103		116		Current Analytical					Long				Prinz		Bar On
104		117		Phil of Mind					Neta				Lycan
105		120		Cont Moral & Social										MacLean	Gaus
106		121		Space & Time		Roberts
107		122		Phil of Physics
108		123		Phil of Biology									Lange
109		130		Recent Political				Postema			Brennan					Brennan
110		142		Phil of Literature
111		145		History of Aesthetics
112		150		Plato	Galligan				Galligan		Reeve
113		151		Aristotle			Galligan		Reeve
114		152		Medieval
115		153		Cont Rationalism		Garrett
116		154		British Empiricism	Blackburn			Munsat		Munsat			Nelson
117		155		Kant	Rosenberg						Rosenberg			Russell		Rosenberg
118		156		Hegel					Postema
119		159		American Phil
120		165		Feminst Philosophy				Boxill B
121		168		Risk & Society				MacLean
122		178		Health Care & Phil										Walker		Walker
123		190		Set Theory & Logic
124
125
126

COURSE OFFERINGS

	Q	R
82 83
84
85	F 2006	S 2007
86
87
88 89
90
91 92
93
94
95
96
97
98
99
100
101
102
103
104
105
106
107
108
109
110
111
112
113
114
115
116
117
118
119
120
121 122
123
124
125
126

	A	B	C	D	E	F	COURSE OFFERINGS		I	J	K	L	M	N	O	P
127
128		GRADUATE COURSES
129
130					F 2000	S 2001	F 2001	S 2002	F 2002	S 2003	F 2003	S 2004	F 2004	S 2005	F 2005	S 2006
131
132
133		200		PROTO		Garrett/Rosenberg		Rosenburg/Lycan		Lycan/Reeve		Long/Neta		Lange/Lycan		Lange/Simmons
134		205		Advanced-Systematic			Rosenberg							Rosenberg
135		210		Ancient Philosophy							Reeve			Reeve
136		215		Medieval
137		220		Modern						Garrett
138		225		19th Century
139		230		Metaphysics									Bar On
140		235		Epistemology
141		240		Phil of Mind												Lycan
142		245		Phil of Language							Bar On
143		250		Phil of Science							Roberts
144		255		Logic									Resnik
145		260		Moral Theory		Hill				Hill					Hill
146		265		Value Theory
147		270		Political Philosophy		B Boxill								B Boxill
148		275		Philosophy of Law			Postema
149		280		Feminism
150		290		Directed Readings									Neta	MacLean
151		290		Colloquium Seminar									Postema	Prinz
152
153
154 155 156
157
158

COURSE OFFERINGS

	Q	R
127
128
129
130	F 2006	S 2007
131
132
133
134
135
136
137
138
139
140
141
142
143
144
145
146
147
148
149
150
151 152
153
154 155 156
157
158

	A	B	C	D	E	F	COURSE OFFERINGS		I	J	K	L	M	N	O	P
159		GRADUATE SEMINARS
160
161					F 2000	S 2001	F 2001	S 2002	F 2002	S 2003	F 2003	S 2004	F 2004	S 2005	F 2005	S 2006
162
163		300		Pre-Dissertation Seminar							Rosenberg	Prinz	Neta	Prinz		Simmons
164		305-1		Systematic Philosophy	Blackburn	Baron/Lyc	BarOn	Lycan	Reeve	Simmons	Postema		Wolf	Neta	Simmons	Reeve
165		305-2		Systematic Philosophy		Simmons	GSM		Wolf					Wolf	Hofweber
166		310		Ancient Philosophy
167		315		Medieval Philosophy
168		320		Modern Philosophy
169		325		19th Century
170		330		Metaphysics
171		335		Epistemology
172		340		Philosophy of Mind
173		345		Phil of Language
174		350		Phil of Science
175		355		Logic
176		360		Moral Theory							Wolf
177		365		Value Theory							GSM		Postema
178		370		Political Philosophy
179		375		Phil of Law
180		380		Feminism
181		390-1		Current Research							Hill	Boxill B	Prinz	Hofweber	Lycan	Lange
182		390-2		Current Research							Neta	Prinz		Postema		Hill
183		393		Master's Thesis
184		394		Ph.D. Dissertation

COURSE OFFERINGS

	Q	R
159
160
161	F 2006	S 2007
162
163
164
165
166
167
168
169
170
171
172 173
174
175
176
177
178
179
180
181
182
183
184

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, November 17, 2006 10:54 PM
To: Lange, Marc B <mlange@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Preference form

Thanks--I agree with you about "needs". I can make the changes. I actually don't think many people will put in for the summa seminars. I deliberately left numbers off on the grad courses, I just put areas and people can indicate a course in that area.

Jan

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, November 17, 2006 11:05 PM
To: Lange, Marc B <mlange@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Course needs
Attach: Course Needs-07-08.doc

Does this make any better sense?
Jan

2007-2008 COURSE NEEDS

These are the specified needs to consider in your preferences.
Other courses are also needed and will be offered per your desire to teach them.

FALL:			SPRING
SERVICE COURSES:
PHIL 101 – LARGE	Intro: Main Problems		PHIL 110 – LARGE	Intro: Great Works
PHIL 160 – LARGE	Intro Ethics		PHIL 160 –LARGE
PHIL 112 – LARGE	Making Sense of Ourselves		PHIL 163 –LARGE	Practical Ethics
PHIL 165 – LARGE	Bioethics		PHIL 165
PHIL 155 - LARGE	Intro Logic		PHIL 155
PHIL 134	Phil of Religion		PHIL 145	Philosophy of Language
PHIL 170	Social & Political		PHIL 170
PHIL 230	Experience & Reality		PHIL 230
PHIL 280	Morality and Law	or	PHIL 280
PHIL 272	Peace,War, Defense		PHIL 272
PHIL 275	Feminism	or	PHIL 275
PHIL 210	Ancient Philosophy		PHIL 220	Modern Philosophy
PERK COURSES:
FIRST YEAR SEMINARS (2)			FIRST YEAR SEMINARS (2)
HONORS COURSES (2)			HONORS SEMINARS (2)
ADVANCED UNDERGRADUATE COURSES
PHIL 384	Gateway PPE		ANY 300-level
ANY 300-level			PHIL 397	Colloquium for Majors
GRADUATE LEVEL COURSES
PHIL 445	Philosophy of Language		Mind
PHIL 455	Advanced Logic		Epistemology
PHIL 450	Philosophy of Science		Metaphysics
PHIL 411 or 412	Ancient		Ancient
PHIL 421 or 422	Modern		Modern
			PROTO

OTHER DESIRED AREAS EITHER 400, 700 or 800:

ANCIENT PHILOSOPHY	MODERN PHILOSOPHY
PHILOSOPHY OF SCIENCE/LOGIC	PHILOSOPHY OF MIND
EPISTEMOLOGY	METAPHYSICS
PHIL 805 Kenan Summa Seminar	PHIL 805 Kenan Summa Seminar
PHIL 990 Research Reading Group	PHIL 990 Research Reading Group

NOTES:

Large classes= 200 students with 4 teaching assistants
FYS = 20 students max; must already have been approved by FYS committee
Honors: 25 person max
Other regular service courses 100-200 = 30-35 students (no teaching assistants)
300 = courses for majors; 25 students
400 = courses for advanced undergraduate and graduate students 700-900 = courses for graduate students only

990: If the course does not get sufficient enrollment, you will be assigned a service course.

Course descriptions: http://www.unc.edu/ugradbulletin/depts/phil.html

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, November 22, 2006 12:26 PM
To: Bickford, Donna M <dbickford@unc.edu>
Cc: Carson, Virginia S <vcarson@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Parents Council Grant

I think we should go ahead with the Parents Council grant. I am out of town until next Wednesday, but I am on email contact now.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Donna Bickford wrote:
> Hi Jan and Virginia:
>
> I swear I already asked you about this, but now I can't find any of my > notes. What do you think about the possiblity of adapting our Core > Connections grant idea for the Parents Council Grant? (The deadline > is next Friday-Dec. 1).
>
> I'm sure Virginia told me about some specific things that the PC looks > for, but I may have lost my mind in the mass of papers on my desk.
> What are your thoughts? If you don't think it's a good strategy, > that's fine and the CWC will use the possibility of the PC grant for > another project -- but I thought this would be a good way to jump > start the small discussion groups, and I'm trying not to be racing > around like a maniac next Friday afternoon.
>
> Sorry for my discombobulation!!!
> Happy Thanksgiving-
> Donna

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, November 27, 2006 7:07 PM
To: Clark, Susan C <scclark@email.unc.edu>; Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: My class

Carlo,
I need you to take my class for me on Tuesday, November 28th at 2 p.m. at the Kenan Academic Center. All you need to do is collect their papers and have them fill out the evaluation forms. Be sure to take pencils with you for them. There are only 20 in the class. All this should take about a half hour, but it takes a good 10-15 minutes to walk there.

Thanks so much,
I will be in flight until 4 p.m. your time Tuesday.

Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, November 29, 2006 10:46 AM
To: Shalonda Arnold <shalonda_arnold@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Conference Room

Thanks so much.

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Shalonda Arnold wrote:
> You are scheduled for use of the conference room (room 104) in Bynum > Hall on the following date(s): Friday, December 8 at 11:30-2:00 p.m..
> If you have any changes or questions please contact me. Thank you.
>
> *ATTN: *EFFECTIVE November 15, 2006 whoever sets up the reservation > must give a valid phone number and email address. The receptionist > will send out email confirmations prior to reservations and > follow-up emails after reservations as well. _The follow-up email > will detail whether or not the policies for use of the conference room > have been followed_. We have a diverse group of people who utilize > the conference room, from the Provost on down, so we must ensure that > the room is kept tidy.
> Remember that you must _sign out and sign in_ the key at the > receptionist desk every time you have a reservation. We will hold the > last reservation known responsible for the appearance of the room and > possession of the keys. So, do not pass off keys to anyone but the > receptionist.
>
> Lastly, if your meeting is going to last after 5:00 p.m., you must > return the keys _BEFORE_ 5:00 p.m.
>
> The conference room is free for your use and we wish to keep it a > clean and pleasant venue for you to meet and conduct your business.
> Thank you for your understanding and cooperation!
>
> Katie Meyer wrote:
>
>> Hi, please reserve the conference room for Jan Boxill on Friday,
>> December 8, 11:30-2pm. Please call the meeting the Ethics in Society
>> Fellows seminar.
>>
>> Dr. Boxill, I put a half hour on each side for the cater to come set >> up and if needed tear down. I'll let you know if I am not able to >> get Marcelle's.
>>
>> Katie
>>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, November 29, 2006 10:46 AM
To: Biasi, Katie <meyerk@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Conference Room

Great, thanks so much for your help.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Katie Meyer wrote:
> Hi, please reserve the conference room for Jan Boxill on Friday,
> December 8, 11:30-2pm. Please call the meeting the Ethics in Society
> Fellows seminar.
>
> Dr. Boxill, I put a half hour on each side for the cater to come set > up and if needed tear down. I'll let you know if I am not able to get > Marcelle's.
>
> Katie
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, November 29, 2006 1:17 PM
To: Hartwell, Leigh Ann <hartwell@dev.unc.edu>
Subject: Commencement form
Attach: Commencement 07.doc

Attached is our form for PHILOSOPHY

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Hartwell, Leigh Ann wrote:
>
> This is your final reminder to please submit your May 2007
> Commencement space request forms to me by THIS FRIDAY. Please feel > free to contact me with any questions or concerns. â€"Leigh Ann
>
> TO: Departmental Commencement Contacts
>
> FROM: Jane C. Smith, Associate Director of University Events
>
> DATE: November 1, 2006
>
> SUBJECT: Commencement Space Reservations for May 2007
>
> It is time to reserve space for Commencement 2007. Commencement > weekend will be May 11, 12 and 13, 2007. Please indicate your plans on > the attached form. As in the past, during Commencement weekend, all > space on campus is allocated by the Commencement Committee. Your > request for building space, as well as outdoor courtyards, the Old > Well, etc., must be made to the committee. All requests will be > reviewed and you will receive a confirmation of your space in early > January. When there are multiple requests for the same space, > consideration is given to the department whose request was received > first.
>
> In the spring of 1993, the Commencement Committee adopted a rotation > schedule to allow more schools/departments to have access to prime > locations for their ceremonies. If your school is one of those in the > rotation, I will send your space and time assignment via campus mail. **
>
> Contact Jill Hartman Crowder at Grounds Division (962-0785) early to > arrange for podiums, tables, chairs, or sound systems. There will be a > charge for most of these services. If you plan to use a tent, please > contact Jill to make those arrangements as well. This is necessary to > prevent damage to the brick sidewalks and the underground sprinkler > system. Submit your requests to her no later than January 19, 2007.
>
> Contact Deborah Hawkins in Public Safety at 962-5026 to reserve > parking for your ceremony. Contact Jim Kessler at 962-8299 if you have > requests for Disability Services.
>
> Commencement is a very special time for your graduates and their > families. Anticipating the needs of your department and planning ahead > will eliminate a lot of anxiety next spring. Be sure to look at the > Commencement web site at www.unc.edu/commencement > <http://www.unc.edu/commencement>. We make every effort to keep it > updated so that it can be a good resource for graduates, parents and > faculty.

>
> ~~~

For Office of Events Use Only
Date: _____
Time: _____

MAY 2007 COMMENCEMENT SPACE REQUEST

1. Department/School_____PHILOSOPHY_____
   List the name of your department/school as you would like it to appear in the calendar of events for Commencement Weekend.

2. Contact Person: __Jan Boxill_____ Phone ___962-3317

   E-mail Address_____jmboxill@email.unc.edu_____
   Fax_____843-3929_____
   Campus Box _____3125_____

3. Date of Ceremony: _____May 13, 2007_____

4. Location of Ceremony: ____105 Caldwell Hall_____

5. Time of Ceremony: Begins ___Noon_____ Ends _____1:00 p.m.

   Set up begins at ___11___ Clean up ends at ___3:00 p.m.

   The time of your ceremony is the time that will be listed in the Commencement brochure and on the Commencement web site.

6. Please list a second choice if your first location is not available: _____

7. Reception Location (if applicable): ____Foyer of Caldwell Hall_____

   Time ___1-2 p.m._____

8. Number of Graduates and Guests Expected: _____100_____

9. Rehearsal Location (if applicable): _____

   Date & Time _____

10. Ceremony Speaker: _____TBA_____

Please complete by December 1 and return to Jane Smith or Leigh Ann Hartwell at CB 2050 or fax to 843-6319. You can also email your completed form to hartwell@unc.edu.

If you have questions, please call Jane at 962-0045 or Leigh Ann at 962-1996.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, December 4, 2006 11:04 PM
To: Beth Kurtz-Costes <bkcostes@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: disregard last email

Great, thanks,
Jan

Beth Kurtz-Costes wrote:
> no problem! FYI, I also sent them to Debbie.
> Beth
>
>
> -- Begin original message --
>
> From: Jan Boxill <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
> Date: Mon, 04 Dec 2006 15:10:49 -0500
> Subject: disregard last email
> To: bkcostes@email.unc.edu
>
> I just found them. I was looking under a different email!
> Thanks
>
> Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
> Department of Philosophy
> Phone: 919-962-3317
> FAX: 919-843-3929
> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>
>
>
>
>
> -- End original message --
>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, December 5, 2006 10:01 AM
To: Stevenson, Debbie Deese <debbie_stevenson@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Final Teaching Awards Meeting

I'll be there,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Debbie Stevenson wrote:
> Dear Members,
>
> Please let me know if you will attend the lunch meeting on Thursday, > December 7 - noon - 1:30. I will need to know how many will attend to > plan the lunch menu.
>
> Also once you have finished your written citations please email me an > electronic copy.
>
> Thanks!
>
> Debbie
>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, December 5, 2006 12:48 PM
To: Andrew Calder <acalder@mail.uncaa.unc.edu>
Subject: Final Exam Schedules
Attach: FINALS-Fall 06.doc

Here are the exam schedules. I hope they are right.
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, December 5, 2006 8:42 PM
To: MacLean, Douglas <maclean@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: courses

Thanks, this is good. I can work from this.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Douglas MacLean wrote:
> Hi Jan,
>
> Sorry to be late with this, but here are my preferences for courses.
>
> Next year I have a two-course reduction as DGS (because I didn't take > a course reduction this year).
>
> In addition, we've already worked out that I'm teaching a graduate > seminar in philosophy and public policy (whatever the name is) jointly > with the Public Policy department. So that leaves me with one > additional course.
>
> I guess my first preference would be to do Practical Ethics in the > Spring. I could do the very large one, but since I'm writing a book > on this stuff, I also wouldn't mind doing an honors section instead.
> But I'm happy to do the large one.
>
> If you need something else instead, then I'm willing to do the > following (in no particular preference, except for semester):
>
> Environmental ethics (fall or spring)
> Intro. to ethics (preferably an honors section), spring
> Intro. to philosophy (preferably an honors section), spring > Skepticism , spring (I used to teach this course regularly, but > haven't since I came here).
> I could also do political philosophy, if really needed, in the spring.
>
> Can you work from this? I can't find the form you sent out.
>
> Thanks,
> Doug

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, December 5, 2006 8:49 PM
To: Calder, Andrew G <acalder@uncaa.unc.edu>
Subject: Final exams
Attach: FINALS-Fall 06.doc

Here's the finals update. The GEOG is still up in the air.

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Andrew Calder wrote:
> http://www.ncaa.org/stats/w_basketball/index.html
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, December 6, 2006 9:15 AM
To: ywoldeab@email.unc.edu
Subject: Re: Blurbs

Hi Yvonne,
I completely understand your stress!!!
I didn't ever receive a blurb from you, so if you can send it to me and Debbie Stevenson that would be good.
thanks,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

ywoldeab@email.unc.edu wrote:
> Jan,
> Hi, hope all is going well. I was just looking through my sent mail to > re-read the blurb I sent, and I don't see anything! I'm so sorry, I'm > not sure if I've sent it to you or not. If you never received an > email, I'm sorry to keep you in the dark all this time. Right now I'm > on a campus computer so the blurb is not here, but I will resend it as > soon as I get home today (around 5) Hope that's not too late! I blame > it all on the stress of finals!
>
> See you tomorrow at the lunch meeting,
> Yvonne
>
>
> Quoting Jan Boxill <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>:
>
>> Hi all,
>> How are the blurbs going? Please email me them as soon as possible.
>> Jan
>>
>> --
>> Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
>> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
>> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
>> Department of Philosophy
>> Phone: 919-962-3317
>> FAX: 919-843-3929
>> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>>
>>
>>
>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, December 6, 2006 11:30 PM
To: Stevenson, Debbie Deese <debbie_stevenson@unc.edu>
Subject: Tanner TA Blurbs
Attach: Tanner- McAlpine.doc; Tanner-Aguilar & Bruno.doc; Tanner-Allsep.doc; Tanner-Waddell.doc

---

I've attached all the blurbs. I think the writers may have already sent some.
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Teresa McAlpine
Department of Communication Studies

Teresa McAlpine is an exceptional teacher who is truly dedicated to her students. Teresa's courses have been described by students as "fun," "unparalleled" and "engaging." These praises are attributed to her creative use of field trips and exciting group activities. One student admires her for her "confidence in the front of the class and her ability to always find a way to keep things interesting, no matter the subject being taught." She is devoted to every student, as voiced by a former student, "She is respectful to all students. [Teresa is] enthusiastic about the subject matter and is concerned that students learn the material. She truly is one of the best teachers at the University because of her intelligent, bright character and her caring attitude towards her students."

Teresa is not only respected by her students, Teresa's colleagues also admire her brilliance. A peer evaluation states that "Teresa should be assigned to teach whatever she feels capable of teaching. Period. She is that good." After observing one of Teresa's courses, a coworker commented on her talent, "I don't believe I've ever seen a teacher (faculty or graduate student) who works as thoughtfully with student comments as she does. What she does really encourages students to look behind the obvious and see assumptions. Superb!"

Teresa McAlpine's excellence in undergraduate teaching has been previously acknowledged. In 2005, Teresa received the Martha Nell Hardy Award for outstanding teaching in the Department of Communication Studies and in 2002 she earned the International Communication Association's Award for excellence in teaching by a graduate student. Teresa's commitment to her students and distinguished teaching ability are undeniable. For these reasons, "the Tanner Award would be a capstone achievement of her time here at Carolina, and one of which she is thoroughly deserving."

The classroom is always very open to ideas and she's very accepting of everyones input. she encourages everyone to be involved in the class discussion IX.
In
a word or short phrase, describe this person:
well-rounded

TANNER AWARD FOR EXCELLENCE IN UNDERGRADUATE TEACHING BY GRADUATE ASSISTANTS

MICHAEL AGUILAR
Department of Economics

Mike Aguilar is in his fourth year of graduate studies at UNC, and during that time he has served as a teaching assistant for the large enrollment introductory economics course, has independently taught smaller sections of the same course, and has served as a teaching assistant for two graduate courses in economics. At the end of the 2004-2005 academic year Mike received the Economics Graduate Student Teaching Award for the Best Graduate TA in a Graduate Level Course, and he also won the Economics Department's Vijay Bhagawan Award for the Best TA in an Econ 10 recitation. According to a faculty nomination letter, Mike is the only graduate student who has ever received both of those awards. Last fall, he also earned the distinction of receiving the most nominations for a Tanner Graduate Assistant Award of anyone on campus. It is clear from those nominations that Michael is an outstanding instructor.

In their nomination letters, professors in the Department of Economics noted that Mike may be the best and most effective graduate TA that their department has had in several years. One recent recitation section evaluated him overall at 4.93 on the 5-point scale, an astounding score, given that Econ 10 is a demanding course that is required for many students who take the class only very reluctantly. Mike's unique combination of "real-world" experience and the "academic" perspective make him a unique teacher. He has a gift of presenting complex ideas clearly and concisely. He has great communication skills, he is open-minded, and he develops an atmosphere in class where students are not hesitant to pose questions.

Both faculty and students noted that Mike relates to students extremely well. A number of undergraduates stated that he is the best TA they have had at UNC. One student commented that Mike never talks down to any students, and "he personally made me feel like an ECON 10 genius."

Mike is also very much appreciated by his fellow graduate students, who commented, "Mike helped many of us through our demanding first two years in the Economics PhD program. He had excellent explanations for very difficult subject matter and was always willing to go above and beyond in helping us. . . .His students are some of the luckiest on the campus of UNC."

TANNER AWARD FOR EXCELLENCE IN UNDERGRADUATE TEACHING BY GRADUATE ASSISTANTS

ELIZABETH BRUNO
Department of Romance Languages

Elizabeth Bruno is known in the Department of Romance Languages as one of the most dedicated, hardworking instructors in the department. She is extremely versatile and excels at teaching language and literature courses. According to her students, Elizabeth embodies every quality and characteristic of teaching excellence. She is exceptionally skilled at facilitating intellectual class discussions and debate, and successfully solicits opinions from every student without embarrassing or putting anyone on the spot. She does so by creating a supportive atmosphere where students don't worry about making grammatical or pronunciation errors as they speak Spanish. One student commented, "Everyone in her class wanted to share their opinions so badly that I remember them waving their hands to speak next."

She makes lessons fun and interesting with topics that are parallel to the main class discussion. Her creative teaching methods enliven the class and help students to think deeply. She understands the individual needs of her students and is adaptable, blending several teaching styles to better accommodate the learning styles of everyone in the classroom. She is always readily available for assistance or communication outside of class. "Inspirational," "fabulous," and "caring" were adjectives that students used repeatedly in describing her.

One of the upper-level Spanish classes Elizabeth teaches is a service learning class in which students conduct volunteer work in the community as part of the course requirements. Many students sing praises of the value of their service learning experiences and Elizabeth's role in that piece of their education. For example, one student volunteered about 3 hours a week assisting two political refugees from Colombia. The student helped them learn to function in the U.S. and to learn English. Through this assignment, the two newcomers to our community improved their English language skills, and the student learned not only much more Spanish (using the grammar lessons from Elizabeth's Spanish class) but also acquired some valuable knowledge about Columbia and the lives of refugees.

Elizabeth is a valuable asset to Carolina. Among the many excellent instructors at UNC, Elizabeth stands out as one of the best. In the words of one student, "UNC is very fortunate to have such an inspirational teacher."

Michael Allsep, History Department
Tanner Teaching Award for Undergraduate Teaching

Michael Allsep's exceptional dedication to teaching is reflected in the enthusiasm of his students. "He brings history to life," said one student who admittedly came into the World History course with low expectations. "He's a commander of his subject and he's so committed to making sure we learn the material. He constantly challenges us to dig deeper."

Michael came to UNC after a successful career as a trial attorney in South Carolina and certainly brings the pizzazz of his profession into the classroom. He stimulates classroom discussion through provocative questions and detailed historic accounts. One student noted that he "had never thought of history in the context that Michael taught it" and that Michael's course actually inspired him to pursue a history minor.

Michael is also recognized for his innovative teaching techniques. When first serving as a teaching assistant for a Peace War and Defense course, Michael came up with the idea of having the students choose a piece of art in the Ackland Museum, research it, and then explain a short paper about how that art illustrates war and conflict in a culture or society. Because of his creative foresight and guidance, the students had the tools to carry out a successful assignment. This kind of innovative approach is what keeps his students enthralled in learning history. In fact, many of his students proclaim Michael as one of the most engaging teachers they have had at Carolina.

An on looking professor said of him: "his understanding, judgment and wisdom demonstrated to me that he will not only be a superb professor but has the skill and cast of mind to be a real leader in a history department and indeed a college."

TANNER AWARD FOR EXCELLENCE IN UNDERGRADUATE TEACHING BY GRADUATE ASSISTANTS

STACY-LYNN WADDELL
Department of Art

"From the moment she walks into the classroom, she infuses the space with her unbounded energy and contagious enthusiasm," wrote one of Stacy-Lynn Waddell's art students. Many others in her Basic Drawing and 3-D Design classes attest how her magnetic ability inspires them to work very hard at developing new technical skills and artistic perspectives as they strive to refine their own creative vision.

Whether teaching an 8:00 am class, working with students late into the night in the studio lab, or being available by cell phone, Stacy makes time and place for her students and supports them in their quest to make art meaningful in their lives. She is open-minded, empathetic, and flexible and these qualities enable her to create an inclusive sense of community in the classroom that students find engaging, exciting, and even therapeutic. She shares the delight of her students when they learn new skills leaving students to feel an extraordinary level of care and investment in their growth as learners and creators.

She relates the passion of her own prolific artistry and her insights into works by other artists in ways that one student called "wonderfully knowledgeable." Her diverse assignments challenge her students to engage with a broad array of materials (tree leaves, spray paint, corrugated boxes, decaying shingles, old books, etc) in fun ways that stimulate both the refinement of their craftsmanship and the expansion of their aesthetic and critical sensibilities. She also encourages students to think outside the box and engage the historical and social contexts of the meaning of art. Her boundless optimism and rigorous standards encourage her students to generate an extraordinary level of achievement in their work, even if they are beginning artists in an introductory class. Many students credit her class with magnifying their interest in their own creativity as well as their appreciation for the vitality of art. For her exceptional dedication and special talents, she is awarded the Tanner Award for Teaching Excellence by Graduate Assistants.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, December 6, 2006 11:34 PM
To: Lance Westerlund <westy@email.unc.edu>
Subject: print attachments
Attach: Tanner Award Winners.doc; Tanner- McAlpine.doc; Tanner-Aguilar & Bruno.doc; Tanner-Allsep.doc; Tanner-Waddell.doc

---

Hi Lance,
I have an early meeting on Thursday morning. Could you please print off the attachments for me so I can have them for the meeting.

Thanks,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

FINALISTS FOR TANNER GRAD STUDENT AWARD

Michael Aguilar	Economics
Stacy-Lynn Waddell	Art
Teresa McAlpine	Communications
Elizabeth Bruno	Romance Languages
Michael Allsep	History

Teresa McAlpine
Department of Communication Studies

Teresa McAlpine is an exceptional teacher who is truly dedicated to her students. Teresa's courses have been described by students as "fun," "unparalleled" and "engaging." These praises are attributed to her creative use of field trips and exciting group activities. One student admires her for her "confidence in the front of the class and her ability to always find a way to keep things interesting, no matter the subject being taught." She is devoted to every student, as voiced by a former student, "She is respectful to all students. [Teresa is] enthusiastic about the subject matter and is concerned that students learn the material. She truly is one of the best teachers at the University because of her intelligent, bright character and her caring attitude towards her students."

Teresa is not only respected by her students, Teresa's colleagues also admire her brilliance. A peer evaluation states that "Teresa should be assigned to teach whatever she feels capable of teaching. Period. She is that good." After observing one of Teresa's courses, a coworker commented on her talent, "I don't believe I've ever seen a teacher (faculty or graduate student) who works as thoughtfully with student comments as she does. What she does really encourages students to look behind the obvious and see assumptions. Superb!"

Teresa McAlpine's excellence in undergraduate teaching has been previously acknowledged. In 2005, Teresa received the Martha Nell Hardy Award for outstanding teaching in the Department of Communication Studies and in 2002 she earned the International Communication Association's Award for excellence in teaching by a graduate student. Teresa's commitment to her students and distinguished teaching ability are undeniable. For these reasons, "the Tanner Award would be a capstone achievement of her time here at Carolina, and one of which she is thoroughly deserving."

The classroom is always very open to ideas and she's very accepting of everyones input. she encourages everyone to be involved in the class discussion IX.
In
a word or short phrase, describe this person:
well-rounded

TANNER AWARD FOR EXCELLENCE IN UNDERGRADUATE TEACHING BY GRADUATE ASSISTANTS

MICHAEL AGUILAR
Department of Economics

Mike Aguilar is in his fourth year of graduate studies at UNC, and during that time he has served as a teaching assistant for the large enrollment introductory economics course, has independently taught smaller sections of the same course, and has served as a teaching assistant for two graduate courses in economics. At the end of the 2004-2005 academic year Mike received the Economics Graduate Student Teaching Award for the Best Graduate TA in a Graduate Level Course, and he also won the Economics Department's Vijay Bhagawan Award for the Best TA in an Econ 10 recitation. According to a faculty nomination letter, Mike is the only graduate student who has ever received both of those awards. Last fall, he also earned the distinction of receiving the most nominations for a Tanner Graduate Assistant Award of anyone on campus. It is clear from those nominations that Michael is an outstanding instructor.

In their nomination letters, professors in the Department of Economics noted that Mike may be the best and most effective graduate TA that their department has had in several years. One recent recitation section evaluated him overall at 4.93 on the 5-point scale, an astounding score, given that Econ 10 is a demanding course that is required for many students who take the class only very reluctantly. Mike's unique combination of "real-world" experience and the "academic" perspective make him a unique teacher. He has a gift of presenting complex ideas clearly and concisely. He has great communication skills, he is open-minded, and he develops an atmosphere in class where students are not hesitant to pose questions.

Both faculty and students noted that Mike relates to students extremely well. A number of undergraduates stated that he is the best TA they have had at UNC. One student commented that Mike never talks down to any students, and "he personally made me feel like an ECON 10 genius."

Mike is also very much appreciated by his fellow graduate students, who commented, "Mike helped many of us through our demanding first two years in the Economics PhD program. He had excellent explanations for very difficult subject matter and was always willing to go above and beyond in helping us. . . .His students are some of the luckiest on the campus of UNC."

TANNER AWARD FOR EXCELLENCE IN UNDERGRADUATE TEACHING BY GRADUATE ASSISTANTS

ELIZABETH BRUNO
Department of Romance Languages

Elizabeth Bruno is known in the Department of Romance Languages as one of the most dedicated, hardworking instructors in the department. She is extremely versatile and excels at teaching language and literature courses. According to her students, Elizabeth embodies every quality and characteristic of teaching excellence. She is exceptionally skilled at facilitating intellectual class discussions and debate, and successfully solicits opinions from every student without embarrassing or putting anyone on the spot. She does so by creating a supportive atmosphere where students don't worry about making grammatical or pronunciation errors as they speak Spanish. One student commented, "Everyone in her class wanted to share their opinions so badly that I remember them waving their hands to speak next."

She makes lessons fun and interesting with topics that are parallel to the main class discussion. Her creative teaching methods enliven the class and help students to think deeply. She understands the individual needs of her students and is adaptable, blending several teaching styles to better accommodate the learning styles of everyone in the classroom. She is always readily available for assistance or communication outside of class. "Inspirational," "fabulous," and "caring" were adjectives that students used repeatedly in describing her.

One of the upper-level Spanish classes Elizabeth teaches is a service learning class in which students conduct volunteer work in the community as part of the course requirements. Many students sing praises of the value of their service learning experiences and Elizabeth's role in that piece of their education. For example, one student volunteered about 3 hours a week assisting two political refugees from Colombia. The student helped them learn to function in the U.S. and to learn English. Through this assignment, the two newcomers to our community improved their English language skills, and the student learned not only much more Spanish (using the grammar lessons from Elizabeth's Spanish class) but also acquired some valuable knowledge about Columbia and the lives of refugees.

Elizabeth is a valuable asset to Carolina. Among the many excellent instructors at UNC, Elizabeth stands out as one of the best. In the words of one student, "UNC is very fortunate to have such an inspirational teacher."

Michael Allsep, History Department
Tanner Teaching Award for Undergraduate Teaching

Michael Allsep's exceptional dedication to teaching is reflected in the enthusiasm of his students. "He brings history to life," said one student who admittedly came into the World History course with low expectations. "He's a commander of his subject and he's so committed to making sure we learn the material. He constantly challenges us to dig deeper."

Michael came to UNC after a successful career as a trial attorney in South Carolina and certainly brings the pizzazz of his profession into the classroom. He stimulates classroom discussion through provocative questions and detailed historic accounts. One student noted that he "had never thought of history in the context that Michael taught it" and that Michael's course actually inspired him to pursue a history minor.

Michael is also recognized for his innovative teaching techniques. When first serving as a teaching assistant for a Peace War and Defense course, Michael came up with the idea of having the students choose a piece of art in the Ackland Museum, research it, and then explain a short paper about how that art illustrates war and conflict in a culture or society. Because of his creative foresight and guidance, the students had the tools to carry out a successful assignment. This kind of innovative approach is what keeps his students enthralled in learning history. In fact, many of his students proclaim Michael as one of the most engaging teachers they have had at Carolina.

An on looking professor said of him: "his understanding, judgment and wisdom demonstrated to me that he will not only be a superb professor but has the skill and cast of mind to be a real leader in a history department and indeed a college."

TANNER AWARD FOR EXCELLENCE IN UNDERGRADUATE TEACHING BY GRADUATE ASSISTANTS

STACY-LYNN WADDELL
Department of Art

"From the moment she walks into the classroom, she infuses the space with her unbounded energy and contagious enthusiasm," wrote one of Stacy-Lynn Waddell's art students. Many others in her Basic Drawing and 3-D Design classes attest how her magnetic ability inspires them to work very hard at developing new technical skills and artistic perspectives as they strive to refine their own creative vision.

Whether teaching an 8:00 am class, working with students late into the night in the studio lab, or being available by cell phone, Stacy makes time and place for her students and supports them in their quest to make art meaningful in their lives. She is open-minded, empathetic, and flexible and these qualities enable her to create an inclusive sense of community in the classroom that students find engaging, exciting, and even therapeutic. She shares the delight of her students when they learn new skills leaving students to feel an extraordinary level of care and investment in their growth as learners and creators.

She relates the passion of her own prolific artistry and her insights into works by other artists in ways that one student called "wonderfully knowledgeable." Her diverse assignments challenge her students to engage with a broad array of materials (tree leaves, spray paint, corrugated boxes, decaying shingles, old books, etc) in fun ways that stimulate both the refinement of their craftsmanship and the expansion of their aesthetic and critical sensibilities. She also encourages students to think outside the box and engage the historical and social contexts of the meaning of art. Her boundless optimism and rigorous standards encourage her students to generate an extraordinary level of achievement in their work, even if they are beginning artists in an introductory class. Many students credit her class with magnifying their interest in their own creativity as well as their appreciation for the vitality of art. For her exceptional dedication and special talents, she is awarded the Tanner Award for Teaching Excellence by Graduate Assistants.

PHILOSOPHY 47	ETHICS IN SPORTS	Dr. Jan Boxill

REQUIRED TEXTS:

Fair Play: Sports, Values, and Society, by Robert Simon (FP)
Sports Ethics: An Anthology, by Jan Boxill (SE)

"To whom much is given, much is required."
"You can discover more about a person in an hour of play than in a year of conversation."

Sports play a significant role in the lives of millions of people throughout the world, as participants, fans, spectators, and critics. Sport provides a unique model for understanding our own society. We certainly see this during the Olympics, as well as other major sporting events. Even those who are uninvolved, bored or critical of sports are often affected by them. Because sports are significant forms of social activities, they raise a wide range of issues, some factual, some explanatory. E.g. sociologists may be concerned with whether or not sports affect society; psychologists may be concerned with personality features which contribute to success or failure in sport. In addition to these questions, sports also raise philosophical issues that are conceptual and ethical in nature. Conceptual questions ask how we understand the concepts and ideas that apply to the world of sports. What are sports? What is involved in competition? Ethical questions raise moral concerns many of us have about sports. Is there too much emphasis on winning and competition? Are college sports getting out of hand? Indeed do competitive athletics belong on campus? Has commercialization of sports undermined their integrity?

This course will examine these and other ethical issues in American sports, including, but not limited to, Title IX, gender equity, racism, sexism, cheating, violence, and drug use. My concern will be to gain an understanding of the moral significance of sport through readings and class discussion. We may not be able to resolve the issues, but we should at least gain a greater understanding of the issues, which should serve as beginnings to resolutions.

CLASS REQUIREMENTS: All work will be posted on Blackboard.

Assigned Readings:	(See schedule—also see Blackboard for any changes.
Quizzes:	6 in class quizzes on the readings; lowest will be dropped; NO MAKEUPS
Paper:	One paper (5-7 pages) Topics will be posted on Blackboard. NO LATE PAPERS ACCEPTED
Class Participation:	Participation makes for a much more enjoyable and interesting class
Outside Assignments:	Attend three different athletic events or lectures, or read current articles on ethics in sports. Write a one page reaction paper showing how it fits with any ethical issue covered in the course.
In Class Final Exam:	Exam Format: Multiple Choice; Short answer; Essay.

GRADE IN COURSE:

Paper:	75 points
Quizzes: (5)	50 points (10 points each)
Participation/Attendance	10 points
Outside Assignments (3)	15 points (5 points each)
Final Exam	100 points
TOTAL:	250 points

THE HONOR CODE The Honor Code is, as always, in effect in this course, and will be taken very seriously. If you have any questions at all about these matters, please do not hesitate to ask me.

It shall be the responsibility of every student at UNC to obey and to support the enforcement of the Honor Code, which prohibits lying, cheating, or stealing when these actions involve academic processes or University, student, or academic personnel acting in an official capacity. It shall be the further responsibility of every student to abide by the Campus Code; namely, to conduct oneself so as not to impair significantly the welfare or the educational opportunities of others in the University Community.

With this in mind: NO CELL PHONES OR OTHER ELECTRONIC DEVICES ARE PERMITTED IN CLASS

READINGS/ASSIGNMENTS: Readings may change, check Blackboard for any changes

Week 1 Jan 13 — Introduction to the course. Open discussion; significance of above quotes

Week 2: Jan 18-20 — Sports Ethics (SE), Introduction: The Moral Significance of Sport, pages 1-12

Week 3 Jan 25-27 — Fair Play (FP), Chapter 1: Introduction: Philosophy of Sport, pages 1-12;
Ethical Theories – lectures; outline on Blackboard

Week 4 Feb 1-3 — Sport and Education
SE: Section I: Readings, pages 16-60
- Robert Simon, "Sports, Relativism, and Moral Education"
- Janice Moulton, "Why Everyone Deserves a Sporting Chance: Education, Justice, and School Sports"
- Peter Neinegg, "Philosopher in the Playground"
- Francine Hardaway, "Foul Play: Sports Metaphors as Public Doublespeak"

Week 5 Feb 8-10 — Sport and Competition
FP: Chapter 2, The Ethics of Competition, pages 13-36
SE: Section III: Essays 11-16 pages 107-171
- Jan Boxill, "The Ethics of Competition"
- Nicholas Dixon, "On Winning and Athletic Superiority"
- R.Scott Kretchmar, In Defense of Winning"
- Dean Smith, "Winding Down, Looking Ahead"
- Robert Butcher and Angela Schneider, "Fair Play as Respect for the Game"

Week 6 Feb 15-17 — Sport and Sportspersonship
FP: Chapter 3, Cheating and…, Part I, pages 37-51
SE: Section II: Essays 6-10, pages 63-103
- James Keating, "Sportsmanship as a Moral Category"
- Peter Arnold, "Three Approaches Toward an Understanding of Sportsmanship"
- Kathleen Pearson, "Deception, Sportsmanship, and Ethics"
- Nicholas Dixon, "On Sportsmanship and 'Running up the Score'"

Week 7 Feb 22-24 — Sport and Drugs
FP: Chapter 4, Enhancing Performance through drugs, Part I, pages 71-92
Guest Lecture by Dr. Tim Taft, Professor of Orthopaedics & Head of Sports Medicine
SE: Section IV: Essays 17-19, pages 175-196
- Robert Simon, "Good Competition and Drug-Enhanced Performance"
- Laura Morgan, "Enhancing Performance in Sports: What is Morally Permissible"
- Michael Lavin, "Sports and Drugs: Are the Current Bans Justified?"

Week 8 Mar 1-3 — Sport and Violence
FP: Chapter 3, Cheating and Violence, Part II, pages 51-70
SE: Section V, Essays 20-22, pages 199-222
- Michael Smith, "What is Sports Violence?"
- Brenda Jo Bredemeier, et al, "Values and Violence in Sports Today…"
- Robert Leach, "Violence and Sports"

Week 9 Mar 8-10 — Catch up; Film; 2 outside events papers due

SPRING BREAK March 14-18

Week 10 Mar 22-24 Sport and Gender

Week 11 Mar 19-31
FP: Chapter 5, Equality and Excellence in Sports; pages 93-121
FP: Chapter 6: Sex Equality in Sports, pages 123-149
SE: Section VI: Essays 23,25,26,28, 29; pages 226-288
- Jane English, "Sex Equality in Sports"
- Robert Simon, "Gender Equity and Inequity in Athletics"
- Jan Boxill, "Title IX and Gender Equity"
- Catharine MacKinnon, "Women, Self-Possession, and Sport"
- Mariah Burton Nelson, "Stronger Women"

Paper due: March 29—NO LATE PAPERS ACCEPTED

Week 12 Apr 5-7 — Sport and Racial Issues
SE: Section VII: Essays 31-33, pages 297-329
- Albert Mosley, "Racial Differences in Sports: What's Ethics Got to Do With It?"
- Richard E. Lapchick, "Race and College Sport: A Long Way to Go"
- Mike Marqusee, "Sport and Stereotype: From Role Model to Muhammed Ali"

Week 13 Apr 12-14 — Sport and Role Models
SE: Section VIII: Essays 34, 35, pages 333-338
- Christopher Wellman, "Do Celebrated Athletes have Special Responsibilities to be Good Role Models?"
- Rick Reilly, "Get the Message?"

Week 14 Apr 19-21 — Sport and Education Revisited
FP: Chapter 7: Do Intercollegiate Sports Belong on Campus?, pages 151-186

Week 15 Apr 25-28 — Sports & Social Values
FP: Chapter 8, Sports and Social Values, pages 187-201
Jeffrey Marx, Season of Life

April 28: Last day of class; wrap up and review for final

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, December 11, 2006 2:19 PM
To: Lance Westerlund <westy@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Summa Seminar Spring 2007

---

yes, but I don't think we need to put this on the course descriptions.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Lance Westerlund wrote:
> Hi Jan,
>
> Is an instructor assigned for the Summa Seminar (Phil 800)? I'm > working on completing the course page on the Philosophy Dept. website.
>
> Thanks,
> Lance
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, December 11, 2006 4:09 PM
To: Lange, Marc B <mlange@email.unc.edu>
Cc: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: 06-07 schedule
Attach: Faculty Assign 07-08.doc

Marc,
Thanks for your patience this morning. I realize that it is not easy to explain something that I've done for so many years. In case you want to look at where we are, I'm attaching what we did, and I've added a few that we didn't have. All is tentative.

Thanks again,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Faculty	Fall 2007		Spring 2008
Bar-On	PHIL 230: Experience & Reality	PHIL 445: Phil of Language	HNRS 354: Self Knowledge	KENAN w/ Neta
Boxill, Bernard	Phil 272-Large: PWAD	PHIL 390: Topics for majors	PHIL 274: Afro-Ameri	PHIL 7?? w/ Hill
Boxill, Jan	Parr Center	PHIL 163: Practical Ethics	Parr Center	PHIL 266: Ethics in Sports
Brennan	XXX	XXX	PHIL 698: PPE Capstone
Corrado	XXX	XXX	PHIL 480: Phil of Law	XXX
Hill	PHIL 170H: Social & Political	PHIL 362: Contemporary Ethics	PHIL 397: Colloquium for Majors	PHIL 7??? w/ B. Boxill
Hofweber	Paternity Leave	PHIL 455: Advanced Logic	PHIL 155 large: Intro to Logic	PHIL 700-Logic
Knobe	PHIL 160: Intro to Ethics	PHIL 453: Phil of Psychology	FYS-Honors
Lange	ASSOC CHAIR	PHIL 450: Phil of Science	FYS	PHIL 150Large:Intro Phil of Sci
Lesher	PHIL 210: Ancient	XXX	PHIL 210: Ancient	XXX
Lycan
MacLean	DGS	Public Policy Seminar	DGS
Nelson				Sem w/Reeve
Neta	PHIL 101 Large: Intro to Phil			Kenan Sem w/ BarOn
Nord		XXX		XXX
Pettit	XXX	XXX	XXX	XXX
Postema	Possible Leave or PHIL 170	Possible Leave or in LAW	Possible Leave	Possible Leave
Prinz	PHIL 185: Aesthetics	PHIL 353: Cognitive Science		Grad Sem: Consciousness
Reeve	PHIL 112 large:Making Sense	PHIL 411: Plato		Sem w/ Nelson
Roberts	FYS	PHIL 451: Phil of Physics	Possible Research leave
Sayre McCord	Chair	Kenan Seminar	PHIL 16O Large: Intro to Ethics	CHAIR
Simmons				PROTO
Walker	XXX	XXX	XXX	PHIL 495: Health Care
Wolf	400 LEVEL	790: Summa		PROTO
New Hire-1
New Hire-2
Visitor 1: PPE	PHIL 384: PPE Gateway	PPE course	PPE course	PPE course
Visitor 2: Parr	Ethics	Ethics	Ethics	Ethics
Visitor 3: BBT	PHIL 164: Business Ethics
Visitor 4:

First Year Seminars:	Fall:	Spring:	DUS: Fall: Roberts; Spring:
Honors:	Fall:	Spring:	DGS: McLean
Proto:		Spring: Simmons/Wolf	Placement:
Research Reading Group:	Fall	Spring	Admissions:
Kenan Seminars:	Fall Sayre McCord	Spring: Bar-On/Neta	Assoc Chair: Lange
Summa	Fall: Wolf	Spring

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, December 11, 2006 7:12 PM
To: Lange, Marc B <mlange@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: F?YS

Marc,
You read it correctly. There are many courses that do this, and some of these can count double! And as students have figured out, they can take very few courses to fulfill their perspectives.
Yes, we should take a look at our courses. I guess when we put them in, we were under the impression they could only count for one approach/perspective. I will consult with the requisite people to find out if we can submit some changes, which I have to do already anyway.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Marc Lange wrote:
> Dear Jan,
>
> As I was exploring the university's byzantine course structure to > check that the phil sci 150 course counts for science (it does), I > encountered this one:
>
> ASTR 006G ASTR 061 North Atlantic World (NA) Physical and Life
> Sciences (PL) The World Before 1750 (WB) 1ST YEAR SEM PRE-1700 H
>
> Now if I understand this correctly, here we have a first-year seminar > in the astro department that satisfies not only PL, but also WB and NA > requirements. (Perhaps it cannot be triply counted, but it can be used > for any of them.) If this is the going standard, then I think we can > do a lot better in making our courses count to satisfy things. Take my > first-year seminar on the Copernican revolution. (I mention it only by > way of example -- because I know it best.) Seems to me that by the > above standard, it could count for everything that this astro course > counts for. Shouldn't we pursue this sort o fthing?
>
> Marc
>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, December 12, 2006 11:43 AM
To: M.Moehler@lse.ac.uk
Subject: Re: Application: Visiting Assistant Professor

Dear Michael,
Thanks for your email. With regard to the writing sample, I prefer a short paper.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

M.Moehler@lse.ac.uk wrote:
> Dear Professor Boxill,
> I would like to apply for the position as a Visiting Assistant Professor > that is advertised on your web page. I have one question with regard to > the writing sample: as I understand, it is possible to submit only one > writing sample. Do you prefer a short paper, a whole draft of my PhD > Thesis, or a pdf file that encompasses a selection of papers including > the PhD thesis? Many thanks in advance.
>
> Best,
>
> Michael
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, December 12, 2006 8:58 PM
To: Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>
Subject: attach
Attach: Faculty Assign 07-08.doc

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Faculty	Fall 2007		Spring 2008
Bar-On	PHIL 230: Experience & Reality	PHIL 445: Phil of Language	HNRS 354: Self Knowledge	KENAN w/ Neta
Boxill, Bernard	Phil 272-Large: PWAD-2	PHIL 390: Topics for majors	PHIL 274H Afro-American Poli	PHIL 770 w/ Hill
Boxill, Jan	Parr Center	PHIL 163: Practical Ethics	Parr Center	PHIL 266: Ethics in Sports
Brennan	XXX	XXX	PHIL 484: PPE Gateway	PHIL 698: PPE Capstone
Corrado	XXX	XXX	PHIL 480: Phil of Law	XXX
Hill	PHIL 170H: Social & Political	PHIL 362: Contemporary Ethics	PHIL 397: Colloquium for Majors	PHIL 770 w/ B. Boxill
Hofweber	Paternity Leave	PHIL 455: Advanced Logic	PHIL 155 large: Intro to Logic-4	PHIL 700-Logic
Knobe	PHIL 160: Intro to Ethics	PHIL 453: Phil of Psychology	FYS-Honors	PHIL 990: Reading Group
Lange	ASSOC CHAIR	PHIL 450: Phil of Science	FYS	PHIL 150Large:Intro Phil of Sci
Lesher	PHIL 210: Ancient	XXX	PHIL 210: Ancient	XXX
Lycan	PHIL 101H	PHIL 730: Metaphysics	PHIL 340-Mind	400-level
MacLean	DGS	Public Policy Seminar	DGS	PHIL 468: Risk & Society
Nelson	PHIL 229: 20th Century	PHIL 423: Kant	PHIL 220: Modern	Sem w/Reeve
Neta	PHIL 101 Large: Intro to Phil-4	PHIL 990: Reading Group	PHIL 335: Theory of Knowledge	Kenan Sem w/ BarOn
Nord	PHIL 134: Phil of Religion	XXX	PHIL 285: Phil of Education	XXX
Pettit	XXX	XXX	XXX	XXX
Postema	Possible Leave or PHIL 170	Possible Leave or in LAW	Possible Leave	Possible Leave
Prinz	PHIL 185: Aesthetics	PHIL 353: Cognitive Science	PHIL 485: Phil of Art	Grad Sem: Consciousness
Reeve	PHIL 112 large:Making Sense-4	PHIL 412: Plato	PHIL 390-topics/or new submission	Sem w/ Nelson
Roberts	FYS	PHIL 451: Phil of Physics	Possible Research leave	Possible Research Leave
Sayre McCord	CHAIR	Kenan Seminar	PHIL 16O Large: Intro to Ethics-4	CHAIR
Simmons	FYS	PHIL 356:Topics in Math Logic	ADMISSIONS (?)	PROTO
Walker	XXX	XXX	XXX	PHIL 495: Health Care
Wolf	PHIL 460: Topics in Moral Phil	790: Colloquium		PROTO
New Hire-1
New Hire-2
Visitor 1: PPE	PHIL 384: PPE Gateway	PPE course	PPE course	PPE course
Visitor 2: Parr	PHIL 160: Intro to Ethics	PHIL Ethics	Ethics	Ethics
Visitor 3: BBT	PHIL 164: Business Ethics	PHIL 273: Social & Economic Justice	PHIL
Visitor 4:

First Year Seminars:	Fall:Roberts,Simmons	Spring: Knobe, Lange	DUS: Fall: Roberts; Spring: ??
Honors:	Fall: Hill, Lycan	Spring: Boxill, Knobe	DGS: McLean
Proto:		Spring: Simmons/Wolf	Placement:
Research Reading Group:	Fall: Neta	Spring: Knobe	Admissions:

Kenan Seminars:	Fall Sayre McCord	Spring: Bar-On/Neta	Assoc Chair: Lange
Summa	Fall: Wolf	Spring

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, December 13, 2006 9:31 AM
To: Lance Westerlund <westy@email.unc.edu>
Subject: attach
Attach: Faculty Assign 07-08.doc

Lance, Can you print off the attachment for me--2 copies and bring it in to the seminar room
thanks,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Faculty	Fall 2007		Spring 2008
Bar-On	PHIL 230: Experience & Reality	PHIL 445: Phil of Language	HNRS 354: Self Knowledge	PHIL 735 w/ Neta
Boxill, Bernard	Phil 272-Large: PWAD-2	PHIL 390: Topics for majors	PHIL 274H Afro-American Poli	PHIL 770 w/ Hill
Boxill, Jan	Parr Center	PHIL 163: Practical Ethics	Parr Center	PHIL 266: Ethics in Sports
Brennan	XXX	XXX	PHIL 484: PPE Gateway	PHIL 698: PPE Capstone
Corrado	XXX	XXX	PHIL 480: Phil of Law	XXX
Hill	PHIL 170H: Social & Political	PHIL 362: Contemporary Ethics/990	PHIL 397: Colloquium for Majors	PHIL 770 w/ B. Boxill
Hofweber	PHIL 790: Colloquium Series	PHIL 455: Advanced Logic	PHIL 155 large: Intro to Logic-4	PHIL 700-Logic
Knobe	PHIL 160: Intro to Ethics	PHIL 453: Phil of Psychology	FYS-Honors	PHIL 990: Reading Group
Lange	ASSOC CHAIR	PHIL 450: Phil of Science	FYS	PHIL 150Large:Intro Phil of Sci
Lesher	PHIL 210: Ancient	XXX	PHIL 210: Ancient	XXX
Lycan	PHIL 101H	PHIL 730: Metaphysics	PHIL 340-Mind	400-level
MacLean	DGS	Public Policy Seminar	DGS	PHIL 468: Risk & Society
Nelson	PHIL 229: 20th Century	PHIL 423: Kant	PHIL 220: Modern	Sem w/Reeve
Neta	PHIL 101 Large: Intro to Phil-4	PHIL 990: Reading Group	PHIL 335: Theory of Knowledge	PHIL 735 w/ BarOn
Nord	PHIL 134: Phil of Religion	XXX	PHIL 285: Phil of Education	XXX
Pettit	XXX	XXX	XXX	XXX
Postema	Possible Leave or PHIL 170	Possible Leave or in LAW	Possible Leave	Possible Leave
Prinz	PLACEMENT	PHIL 353: Cognitive Science	PHIL 485: Phil of Art	PROTO
Reeve	PHIL 112 large:Making Sense-4	PHIL 412: Plato	PHIL 390-topics/or new submission	Sem w/ Nelson
Roberts	FYS	PHIL 451: Phil of Physics	Possible Research leave	Possible Research Leave
Sayre McCord	CHAIR	Seminar in ethics	PHIL 16O Large: Intro to Ethics-4	CHAIR
Simmons	FYS	PHIL 356:Topics in Math Logic	ADMISSIONS	PROTO
Walker	XXX	XXX	XXX	PHIL 495: Health Care
Wolf	PHIL 460: Topics in Moral Phil	790: Colloquium
New Hire-1
New Hire-2
Visitor 1: PPE	PHIL 384: PPE Gateway	PPE course	PPE course	PPE course
Visitor 2: Parr	PHIL 160: Intro to Ethics	PHIL 165: Bioethics	Ethics	Ethics
Visitor 3: BBT	PHIL 164: Business Ethics	PHIL 273: Social & Economic Justice	PHIL
Visitor 4:

First Year Seminars:	Fall:Roberts,Simmons	Spring: Knobe, Lange	DUS: Fall: Roberts; Spring: ??
Honors:	Fall: Hill, Lycan	Spring: Boxill, Knobe	DGS: McLean
Proto:		Spring: Simmons/Wolf	Placement:
Research Reading Group:	Fall: Neta	Spring: Knobe	Admissions:

Kenan Seminars:	Fall Sayre McCord	Spring: Bar-On/Neta	Assoc Chair: Lange
Summa	Fall: Wolf	Spring

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, December 13, 2006 3:53 PM
To: Chapel Hill Philosophy <hobler@email.unc.edu>; Lange, Marc B <mlange@email.unc.edu>; Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>
Subject: Schedule
Attach: Fall 2007 Schedule Dec 13,2006.xls

I think I have finished the Fall 2007 schedule.
I've attached it, but it is also in the admin file under "Courses" 2007-2008.

Gucki--the class rooms may not be right, but I think I've got all the times right. I hope we're not too far off in prime time hours.

Marc, THANKS for all your help.

Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

PHILOSOPHY CLASSES FALL 2006

	A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I	J	K	L	M	N	O
1				December 13 2006		FALL 2007 SCHEDULE
2	PHIL				On Leave:
3
4	HNRS32	HNRS 354	3	Bar On	Honors-Philosophical			11 TR				20		GM 210
5	6F	54		Roberts	Thinking About Time			3:30-4:45 MW				20
6	6F	68	1	Simmons	Paradoxes			2-4:30 W				20		MU 304
7	20	101	1	Neta	Intro: Main Problems			11 MWF				200		CW 103	4
8					Recitations: F: 10 & 11
9	20	101E	1	Staff	Intro: Main Problems: Evening			6-7:15 MW				40		CW 105	1
10	24	110	1	Staff	Great Works			3:30 TR				36		PE 216	1
11	26	112	1	Reeve	Making Sense of Ourselves			12 MW				188		MA 209	4
12					Recitations F: 12 & 1
13	32	134	1	Nord	Phil of Religion			2 TR				40		CW105
14	35	134	2	Staff	Phil of Religion			MWF 2				40		PE 216	1
15	21	155	1	Staff	Intro Symbolic Logic			8 TR				50		CW 105	1
16	21	155	2	Staff	Intro Symbolic Logic			11TR				50		CW 105	1
17	22	160	1	Staff	Intro to Ethics			8 TR				40		CW 105	1
18	22	160	2	Staff	Intro to Ethics			2 MWF				40		CW 105	V-1
19	22	160	3	Staff	Intro to Ethics			2 TR				36		CW 103	1
20	30	163	1	J.Boxill	Practical Ethics			11 TR				35
21	39	164	1	Staff	Morality and Business			12:30 TR				40			V-2
22	34	165	1	Staff	Bioethics			9 MWF				40			V-1
23	34	165	2	Staff	Bioethics			9:30 TR				40			1
24	34	165	3	Staff	Bioethics			6-7:15 TR				40		CW 105	1
25	37	170	1	Postema	Social Ethics & Pol Thought			9:30 TR				35
26	37H	170H	1	Hill	Social Ethics & Pol Thought-Hon			11-12:15 MW				25		CW 213
27		229	1	Nelson	20th Century Phil			2 TR				40
28	38	230	1	Staff	Experience and Reality			3:30 TR				40		CW 105	1
29	38	230	2	Staff	Experience and Reality			8 TR				40		CW 105	1
30	42	272	1	B. Boxill	Ethics Peace, War, Defense			MW 10				100		GA 008	2
31					Recitations F: 9 & 10							25		SC 210
32	66	273	1	Staff	Social & Econ Justice			1MWF				45		CW 105	V-3
33	46	275	1	Staff	Phil Issues Feminism (WMST 46)			3:30 TR				40		CW 105	1
34	41	280	1	Staff	Phil of Law			3:30 TR				40			V-2
35	77	353	1	Prinz	Cognitive Science			12:30 TR				25		CW 103
36	71	356	1	Simmons	Topics in Logic			9:30-10:45 MW				25		CW 213
37	84	384	1	Staff	PPE: Gateway			4:35-5:40 MW				35			V-3
38	80	390	1	B. Boxill	Special Topics-Liberty & Equality			2-4:30- W				25		CW 213
39	96	396	1	J. Boxill	Directed Readings			6-8:30 T				5		CW 208
40	96	396	2	J. Boxill	Readings: Ethics Bowl			6-8:30 T				10		CW 208
41	150	412	1	Reeve	Plato			4-6:30 M				25		CW 103
42	155	423	1	Nelson	Kant			11-12:15 TR				25
43	110	445	1	BarOn	Phil of Language			4-6:30 R				25		CW 213
44	108	450	1	Lange	Phil of Science			1-3:30 R				25		CW 208
45		451	1	Roberts	Phil of Physics/Physics 313			11-12:15 MW				25
46	109	453	1	Knobe	Phil of Psychology			T 1-3:30				25		CW 213
47	101	455	1	Hofweber	Advanced Symbolic Logic			10-11:15 MW				25		PE 216
48		691	1	Roberts	Honors			6-8:30 W						CW 213
49	230	730	1	Lycan	Metaphysics:Modalities			1-3:30 W				15		CW 213
50	260	760	1	Wolf	Moral Theory:Utilitarianism			4-6:30 T				15		CW 213
51		785	1	Maclean	Policy Analysis/PLCY 780			2 TR				25
52	290	790	1	Hofweber	Colloquium Seminar			TBA				15
53	290	790	2	Wolf	Colloquium Ceminar			TBA				15
54	300	800	1	Staff	Bibliography			TBA

PHILOSOPHY CLASSES FALL 2006

	A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I	J	K	L	M	N	O
55	360	860	1	Sayre McCord	Seminar:Ethical Theory			4-6:30 M				15		CW 213
56	390	990	1	Neta	Reading Group			TBA
57	390	990	2	Staff	Reading Group			TBA
58
59	Hnrs 32	Hnrs 354	3	Bar On	Self Knowledge			11 TR				25
60	22	160H	1	Lycan	Intro Ethics: Honors			2 TR				25
61	37H	170H	1	Hill	Social & Poltiical Honors			10-11:15 MW				25		CW 213
62	20	101E	1	Staff	Intro:Main Problems Evening			6 MW				40		CW 105	1
63
64
65
66					RECITATIONS
67
68	20	PHIL 101	601					10F				25		AL 205
69			602					10F				25		MU 105
70			603					10F				25		HN 307
71			604					10F				25
72			605					10F				25
73			606					11F				25		PH 222
74			607					11F				25		SM 107
75			608					11F				25		CW 105
76			605					11F				25		WG 301A
77			606					11F				25		GA 103
78			607					11F				25		MT 305
79			608					11F				25		PE 204
80
81	26	PHIL 112	601					12F				25		SM 107
82			602					12F				25		AL 203
83			603					12F				25		GA 001
84			604					12F				25		PH 228
85			605					1F				25		GA 103
86			606					1F				25		GA 009
87			607					1F				25		PE 216
88			608					1F
89												25		SC 209
90	42	PHIL 272	601					9F				25		MT 205
91			602					9F				25		PE 010
92			603					10F				25
93			604					10F				25		PE 215

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, December 14, 2006 10:27 AM
To: Andrew Calder <acalder@mail.uncaa.unc.edu>
Subject: grades/schedule
Attach: Spring 2007 Schedules.doc

There are no more grades than what I sent you last night. I'll keep checking throughout the day. They are coming in much,much slower than usual.
I've attached the schedules as they are now. There of course will be changes.

Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, December 14, 2006 3:00 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: lETTER
Attach: Israeloff.doc

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

The University
of North Carolina
at Chapel Hill
Caldwell Hall, CB# 3125
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

Jan Boxill 919.962.3317 jmboxill@email.unc.edu

December 14, 2006

Roberta Israeloff
20 Gramed Place
East Northport, NY 11231

Dear Ms. Israeloff,

Thank you for inquiring about the Parr Center for Ethics at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. As you may notice from our website, the Parr Center has been very active. Housed in the Department of Philosophy, our new quarters have brought together ethics faculty and staff creating a dynamic and productive environment. Let me share with you some of our accomplishments and exciting ventures which coincide with your mission.

This semester our programs have seen tremendous success. Two programs were presented to large audiences: the Community Genetics Forum (co-sponsored with Genomic Sciences among others) filled a 1000 seat auditorium, and the Challenge of Ethics in Sports overflowed a 200 seat auditorium. Other events have been presented to smaller groups with equal success. Each has reached across academic disciplines and into the larger community, including high school teachers and administrators. We continue to work together with other units on campus to involve an even broader audience.

Among our new projects is the Difficult Dialogues Initiative, headed by Law Professor Judith Wegner. This initiative provides opportunities for people within the university to organize discussions addressing controversial issues, all of which are bound up with questions of ethics. This year a series of discussions, each involving 20 or fewer people, has the following focus: Personal faith and conscience: how, when, where, and with whom can we speak our minds on a public university campus? The Parr Center is sponsoring three sessions with our Fellows. These discussions are designed to train graduate students and future teachers, especially in public schools, to be prepared to discuss not just this difficult dialogue but others as well.

Two ongoing projects of the Center which I believe would be of particular interest to the Squira Foundation are our "Ethics in the Professions" series and our Outreach programs. Last year we sponsored an enormously successful Business Ethics workshop. Its success spawned a great deal of interest in other disciplines. As a result, this year, we are set to sponsor at least four workshops: Medical ethics, Ethics in Education, Disability and Disadvantage (co-sponsored with the Poverty Center), and Legal Ethics (which satisfies Continuing Legal Education). The Ethics in Education workshop will be designed for present and future public school teachers to prepare young people entering a complex and fast-changing world to think creatively while reaffirming the core values of democratic citizenship and ethical action upon which the well-being of our society depends.

Outreach programs work directly with local high schools throughout the area. The Parr Center, working closely with the Department of Philosophy, develops programs that allow students to work on critical thinking and informal logic. Using these philosophical skills the students then apply what they have learned for the remainder of the course, whereby students explore various theories through consideration of some classical texts use these to critically evaluate ethical dilemmas. This ethics training is designed to help students develop skills for understanding their own positions on ethical matters, as well as understanding others, but perhaps more importantly to help students critically evaluate these positions.

From what I have learned of your newly formed foundation, the mission of promoting high schools to adopt ethics training is directly in line with our mission and our hopes for the future. We at the Parr Center believe that by training teachers along with working directly with students we reinforce the importance of ethical decision making and reach a broader context of schooling that is essential to educational development. Our concern is not with character building but with ethics based training programs that center on ethical decision making. While character building is important, this kind of training goes far beyond character development.

We have several other events pending. One special event that we expect to attract a great deal of attention across campus, we have invited Daniel Gilbert, Harvard Psychology Professor and author of Stumbling on Happiness, to campus. He will be giving a public lecture and attending graduate seminars in philosophy, psychology, and biology.

I hope the Parr Center mission excites you and that the enclosed information fills in more details. I look forward to working with you, as I believe our missions coincide very nicely. If you would like more information, please don't hesitate to call me or my program assistant, Carlo Robustelli, who I believe you have already spoken to.

Sincerely,

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, December 14, 2006 4:26 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>; Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>
Subject: Israeloff letter
Attach: Israeloff.doc

Could you please read over the letter as it is now edited. I will send it only after I have spoken to her to get all the names and spellings correct.

Thanks,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

The University
of North Carolina
at Chapel Hill
Caldwell Hall, CB# 3125
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

Jan Boxill 919.962.3317 jmboxill@email.unc.edu

December 14, 2006

Roberta Israeloff
20 Gramed Place
East Northport, NY 11231

Dear Ms. Israeloff,

Thank you for inquiring about the Parr Center for Ethics at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. Let me congratulate you on your new position and the Foundation. I am excited about the creation of the Foundation, as I believe its mission and proposed projects are directly in line with the mission and projects of the Parr Center. As you may notice from our website, the Parr Center has been very active in carrying out its mission, and I can envision our projects working in harmony with yours. Let me share with you some of our accomplishments and exciting ventures which coincide with your mission.

This semester our programs have seen tremendous success. Two programs were presented to large audiences: the Community Genetics Forum (co-sponsored with Genomic Sciences among others) filled a 1000 seat auditorium, and the Challenge of Ethics in Sports overflowed a 200 seat auditorium. Other events have been presented to smaller groups with equal success. Each has reached across academic disciplines and into the larger community, including high school teachers and administrators. We continue to work together with other units on campus to involve an even broader audience to engage them into thinking clearly about ethics.

Among our new projects is the Difficult Dialogues Initiative, headed by Law Professor Judith Wegner. This initiative provides opportunities for people within the university to organize discussions addressing controversial issues, all of which are bound up with questions of ethics. This year a series of discussions, each involving 20 or fewer people, has the following focus: Personal faith and conscience: how, when, where, and with whom can we speak our minds on a public university campus? These discussions are designed to train faculty, graduate students and future teachers, both university and public schools, to be prepared to discuss not just this difficult dialogue but others as well.

Two ongoing projects of the Center which I believe would be of particular interest to the Squira Foundation are our "Ethics in the Professions" series and our Outreach programs. Last year we sponsored an enormously successful Business Ethics workshop. Its success spawned a great deal of interest in other disciplines. As a result, this year, we are set to sponsor at least four workshops: Medical ethics, Ethics in Education, Disability and Disadvantage (co-sponsored with the Poverty Center), and Legal Ethics (which satisfies Continuing Legal Education). The Ethics in Education workshop will be designed for present and future public school teachers to prepare young people entering a complex and fast-changing world to think creatively while reaffirming the core values of democratic citizenship and ethical action upon which the well-being of our society depends.

Outreach programs work directly with local high schools throughout the area. The Parr Center, working closely with the Department of Philosophy, develops programs that allow students to work on critical thinking and informal logic. Using these philosophical skills the students then apply what they have learned for the remainder of the course, whereby students explore various theories through consideration of some classical texts use these to critically evaluate ethical dilemmas. This ethics training is designed to help students develop skills for understanding their own positions on ethical matters, as well as understanding others, but perhaps more importantly to help students critically evaluate these positions.

From what I have learned of your newly formed foundation, the mission of promoting high schools to adopt ethics training is directly in line with our mission and our hopes for the future. We at the Parr Center believe that by training teachers along with working directly with students we reinforce the importance of ethical decision making and reach a broader context of schooling that is essential to educational development. Our concern is not with character building but with ethics based training programs that center on ethical decision making. While character building is important, this kind of training goes far beyond character development.

We have several other events pending. One special event that we expect to attract a great deal of attention across campus, we have invited Daniel Gilbert, Harvard Psychology Professor and author of Stumbling on Happiness, to campus. He will be giving a public lecture and attending graduate seminars in philosophy, psychology, and biology.

I hope the Parr Center mission excites you and that the enclosed information fills in more details. I look forward to working with you, as I believe our missions coincide very nicely. If you would like more information, please don't hesitate to call me or my Program Coordinator, Carlo Robustelli, with whom I believe you have already spoken.

Sincerely,

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Saturday, December 16, 2006 11:30 AM
To: Chapel Hill Philosophy <hobler@email.unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: Re: PLCY 780/PHI 785 Fall 2007]
Attach: PHI 785 Fall 2007.msg

I think we took care of this, but I couldn't find it in the computer, so could you respond to both Asta and Doug about the time and place.
Thanks
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: MacLean, Douglas <maclean@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Saturday, December 16, 2006 7:55 AM
To: Crowe, Asta E <acrowe@email.unc.edu>
Cc: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>; Lennis Carrier <lcarrier@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: PLCY 780/PHI 785 Fall 2007

Asta,

I'm happy to go with this time, but I've also had a change in heart, and I'm no longer opposed to teaching the course as a once per week seminar. So, if that would be easier, and if you think that would be better for the policy science students, I would do it. Part of my reason for thinking that I should do it as a seminar is that it would make it easier for philosophy graduate students to take the course, should any of them be interested.

Doug

Quoting Asta Crowe <acrowe@email.unc.edu>:

> Doug and Jan, we are VERY constrained on when we can put our courses > in on a two day/week schedule. Here's what we've done with this one:
>
> Tues/Thurs 3:30 - 4:45 p.m.
>
> Do you need any special equipment? We could move it to the same time > on Mon/Wed. Tues/Thurs mornings are prime time and hard to get but we > could try for it. We can't do anything on a Mon/Wed before 3:30 p.m.
> unless we have our own classroom, which we do not!
>
> How does this work? We need to wrap this up before the holidays as > we have only till Jan 5 to enter these and also I'm leaving > (retiring) Jan. 1! Lennis Carrier will be handling class scheduling.
>
> Asta
>
> --
> Asta E. Crowe, Administrative/Student Services Manager
> Department of Public Policy
> The University of North Carolina
> CB #3435
> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3435
> Tel: 919-962-2788; Fax: 919-962-5824
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, December 18, 2006 10:07 PM
To: Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>; Westerlund, Lance S <lancew@unc.edu>
Cc: Clark, Susan C <scclark@email.unc.edu>; MacLean, Douglas <maclean@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: renumbering graduate document

Lance,
If you go in my office in the blue folder on the desk labled schedule, there is a list of all courses, undergrad and grad. But if you can't find it I know that Gucki has a list and can give you a copy.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Geoff Sayre-McCord wrote:
> Lance --
> We have a document describing our graduate program, detailing various > requirements, etc. Right now, when a course is mentioned the OLD > course number is used. That needs to be changed, and I hope you will > be the person to change it. I am attaching the relevant document.
> What I am asking you to do is to go through the document and in every > place a course number is listed as, say, Proto-Seminar (PHIL 200), > change it to Proto-Seminar (PHIL 700 [200]), putting the old course > number in square brackets after the new number. Many of the relevant > new numbers can be found on our coure offering page; but not all.
> There may be a Grad School Bulletin that has all the numbers. Can > you check for that? Otherwise, I suspect Jan has a list. Special > care needs to be taken to ensure that all the right course numbers are > listed. Thanks in advance for the work I know this will take.
> -- Geoff

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, December 19, 2006 1:25 PM
To: Postema, Gerald J <gpostema@email.unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: The Return]
Attach: The Return.msg

Reed Richter might be a possible for NC State. He's back

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

From: Reed Richter <rrichter1@mac.com>
Sent: Tuesday, December 19, 2006 12:48 PM
To: Bar-On, Dorit <dbar@email.unc.edu>; Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>; Hill, Thomas E Jr <thill@email.unc.edu>; Long, Douglas C <dlong@email.unc.edu>; Lycan, William G <ujanel@isis.unc.edu>; resnik@email.unc.edu; Simmons, Keith E <ksimmons@email.unc.edu>; Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>; jfr@email.unc.edu; Postema, Gerald J <gpostema@email.unc.edu>
Subject: The Return
Attach: ReedRichterCV.12.06.pdf; ATT00001.htm

See attached CV:

PHILOSOPHY 47 ETHICS IN SPORTS Dr. Jan Boxill
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Phone: 962-3317

REQUIRED TEXTS:

Fair Play: Sports, Values, and Society, by Robert Simon (FP)
Sports Ethics: An Anthology, by Jan Boxill (SE)

"To whom much is given, much is required."

Sports play a significant role in the lives of millions of people throughout the world, as participants, fans, spectators, and critics. Sport provides a unique model for understanding our own society. We certainly saw this during the Sydney Olympics. Even those who are uninvolved, bored or critical of sports are often affected by them. Because sports are significant forms of social activities, they raise a wide range of issues, some factual, some explanatory. E.g. sociologists may be concerned with whether or not sports affect society; psychologists may be concerned with personality features which contribute to success or failure in sport. In addition to these questions, sports also raise philosophical issues that are conceptual and ethical in nature. Conceptual questions ask how we understand the concepts and ideas that apply to the world of sports. What are sports? What is involved in competition? Ethical questions raise moral concerns many of us have about sports. Is there too much emphasis on winning and competition? Are college sports getting out of hand? Indeed do competitive athletics belong on campus?

This course will examine these and other ethical issues in American sports, including, but not limited to, Title IX, gender equity, racism, sexism, cheating, violence, and drug use. My concern will be to gain an understanding of the moral significance of sport through readings and class discussion. We may not be able to resolve the issues, but we should at least gain a greater understanding of the issues, which should serve as beginnings to resolutions.

CLASS REQUIREMENTS: All work will be posted on Blackboard.

Assigned Readings: (See schedule—also see Blackboard for any changes.
Quizzes: 5 in class quizzes; 1 will be dropped; some unannounced; likely every 2 weeks
Papers: Two short papers (3-5 pages) Topics will be posted on Blackboard
Class Participation: Participation makes for a much more enjoyable and interesting class; but discussion is also crucial to understanding and reasoning. You should be prepared to discuss the essays assigned.
Final Exam: Format: Multiple Choice; Short answer; Short essay exam.

GRADE IN COURSE:

Short Papers: 35% (Paper 1=15%; Paper 2=20%)
Quizzes: 20% (5% each)
Participation: 10% (Attendance & Outside assignments--TBA on Blackboard)
Final Exam 35%

\

READINGS/ASSIGNMENTS

Week 1 Introduction to the course. Open discussion; significance of above quote.
Aug 26-28 Sports Ethics (SE), Introduction: The Moral Significance of Sport, pages 1-12

Week 2 Fair Play (FP), Chapter 1: Introduction, pages 1-12
Sept 2-4

Week 3 & 4 Sport and Education
Sept 9-11, 16-18 SE: Section I: Essays 1-5 pages 15-60

Week 5 & 6 Sports and Competition
Sept 23-25 SE: Section III: Essays 11-16 pages 107-171
Sept 30-Oct 2 FP: Chapter 2, pages 13-36

Week 7 Sport and Sportspersonship
Oct 7-9 SE: Section II: Essays 6-10, pages 63-103
FP: Chapter 3, pages 15-51

Paper #1 due October 9 (Topics will be posted on Blackboard)

Week 8 Sport and Violence
Oct 14-16 SE: Section V, Essays 20-22, pages 199-222
FP: Chapter 3, pages 51-70

Week 9: Catch up; Film; guest speaker
Oct 21

Oct 23 Fall Break

Week 10Sport and Drugs
Oct 28-30 SE: Section IV: Essays 17-19, pages 175-196
FP: Chapter 4, pages 71-92

Week 11& 12 Equality in Sports
Nov 4-6 SE: Section VI: Essays 23-30, pages 226-293
Nov 11-12 FP: Chapter 6, pages 123-149

Week 13Sport and Racial Issues
Nov 18-20 SE: Section VII: Essays 31-33, pages 297-329

Week 14Intercollegiate Sports
Nov 25 FP: Chapter 7: Do Intercollegiate Athletics Belong on Campus, pages 151-186

Paper #2 due November 25 (Topics will be posted on Blackboard)

Nov 27 Thanksgiving Break

Week 15Sports & Social Values
Dec 2-4 FP: Chapter 8, pages 187-201
SE: Section VII: Essays 34-35, pages 333-338

Dec 4 LAST DAY OF CLASS – Wrap up; open discussion; review for final

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, December 22, 2006 10:40 PM
To: May, Steven K <skmay@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Question Regarding Sports Ethics
Attach: Brand article.pdf; Moral significance Essay.doc

Hi Steve,
No problem about contacting me on break I'm glad you are incorporating sports ethics in your class. What is the case book you are using?
There is a journal that has many articles: Journal of the Philosophy of Sport--there is one good article by Miles Brand, President of the NCAA. I am attaching that article. There are also several anthologies [mine Sports Ethics: An anthology] that have good articles and one very good book [Robert Simon, Fair Play: Sports and Social Values]. In Simon's book there is a chapter on Whether sports belong on campus.
I'm also attaching my essay on the Moral Significance of Sport, that may be of some help.

Also, I will be happy to offer to guest in your class to discuss the issue. If there's anything else I can do, let me know.

Have a good holiday break.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

>
>

Journal of the Philosophy of Sport, 2006, 33, 9-20
© 2006 International Association for the Philosophy of Sport

The Role and Value of Intercollegiate Athletics in Universities

Myles Brand

America began its fascination with college sports in the middle of the 19th century. First it was primarily its version of football, and then all sports took root in institutions of higher education. By the latter half of the 20th century, the general public often knew some of its universities not as centers of learning but as hosts for big-time sports. The interests of the broadcast media have made these sporting events even more popular and accessible in the past few decades.

This relationship between sports and higher education is not without its detractors. The list of criticisms is long, from the exploitation of student-athletes to overpaid coaches, from the unfairness of limited opportunities for women students and minority coaches to performance-enhancing drug use. The central criticism is that sports on campus distort the mission of institutions of higher learning.[1]

My view is that many of these criticisms are false or exaggerated, and where they are warranted, strong reform efforts are underway that will, for the most part, rectify the problems. College sport is far from perfect, but it is a popular cultural artifact that serves well both the university community and the students who participate.

In this article, my focus will be limited. I will not attempt to defend intercollegiate athletics from all its critics for all its alleged shortcomings. Rather, my target is to defeat some of the objections of one crucial constituency, namely the faculty and other members of the academy. In particular, I will argue for the following thesis: The role and importance of intercollegiate athletics are undervalued by the academy.

Intercollegiate athletics has the potential to contribute far more to the academic enterprise than it does currently. The contributions of intercollegiate athletics have failed to be realized because of misconceptions of college sports and preconceptions in the academy. Removal of these impediments provides an opportunity for sports on campus to better support the academic mission of universities and colleges.

Most of my defense of this thesis will focus on refuting defenses of it. I will also outline, very briefly, a constructive prospective of the value of sports in higher education.

The Standard View

The Standard View conceives of intercollegiate athletics as an extracurricular activity. It resembles participation in student government and protesting against the university administration. It has more educational value than fraternity parties but less than the chess club.

The author <mnsegarra@ncaa.org> is with the NCAA, Indianapolis, IN 46206.

According to the Standard View, college sports may have some redeeming developmental value for students, but they are not part of the educational experience. Intercollegiate athletics can be eliminated from the campus without in any way diminishing the educational mission of the institution. Some critics go beyond the Standard View to claim that intercollegiate athletics detracts from the institution's ability to educate, and it is a strong negative force on campus.

College sports are merely "beer and circuses," as one author puts it, designed to entertain and distract attention from universities' failures (11). The Standard View, though not necessarily this stronger version, is widely held by faculty members, academic administrators, and many external constituents not closely allied with the university. It is not widely held by students, alumni, local community members, and national fans or by many governing-board members. The Standard View tends to pervade the nonstudent campus culture, mostly because of faculty influence.

The main problem with the Standard View is that it misrepresents college sports and the experiences of student-athletes. As a result, it creates problems for the functioning of an athletics department, and it inhibits the positive, constructive values of intercollegiate athletics from influencing campus life and the education of undergraduates. The Standard View is the leading contributor to the undervaluation of college sports.

Let me begin the argument with a seemingly small point. When the educational experience of student-athletes is compared with those studying the performing arts such as music, dance, and theater, as well as the studio arts, it is difficult to find substantive differences. Consider, in particular, music students at universities with major music programs. These students must be accomplished before admission. They have to audition, and the best of them receive scholarships. Those with exceptional talent are often admitted even if their purely academic credentials, demonstrated by their grade-point averages and SAT scores, are below the range of normally admitted students.

Many of the music students admitted to the best music departments and schools have ambitions for professional careers. Once admitted, they practice innumerable hours on their own and as members of the university's symphony orchestras, vocal and choral groups, and jazz ensembles. They perform with these groups on weekends and evenings during the semester, and, on occasion, they miss class to perform at off-campus locations. These performances often involve paid admission. In nearly every case, both performance and practice are intense, highly competitive for lead roles, time demanding, and year-round. Participation is similar to working a full-time job.

There are musical prodigies who bypass college and perform as soloists with international orchestras. Some who do enroll leave college early to follow career opportunities. Highly successful professional musicians, with or without college degrees, are well compensated and receive a great deal of public adulation.

Of course, the vast majority of music students never have a significant music career. Even in the best university music departments, the proportion of students that become international stars is infinitesimal. Some music graduates teach music; most, however, enter careers that are, at best, indirectly related to their music education. Nonetheless, these individuals benefited from their college education, not only in music but also because of the learning achieved in general-education coursework and because of broadly based intellectual and personal growth.

The similarities of the experience of music students and student-athletes should be apparent. Student-athletes must be accomplished in their sport before enrollment, especially at the National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) Division I institutions, and they must "audition" through game performances and camps.[2] Like musicians, the best are sought by universities and receive scholarships. Some talented prospects are admitted even if their grade-point averages and SAT scores are below the range of the student body. Student-athletes practice on their own and as members of teams, they play on weekends or evenings during the semester, and they travel to off-campus sites. Their games provide entertainment to the college community, and tickets normally must be purchased.

There are rare athletics prodigies, but most attend college. Very few of those who play in college become professionals in their sports. In Division I men's basketball, for example, less than one half of 1% of Division I scholarship players each year have an opportunity to play in the professional National Basketball Association (NBA), and the large majority of those have short careers. Some teach their craft after graduation—that is to say become coaches—but most pursue other careers, only some of which are related to college sports.

Like student-musicians, student-athletes receive public praise for the exercise of their abilities. In both cases, their successes—and failures—reflect on their home institutions. Both groups tend to form strong bonds with their mentors—their coaches or master teachers—as well as other students in the program. Student-musicians tend to major in music, though not always. Student-athletes undertake a broad array of majors, with business and the social sciences being the predominant ones, although sometimes their majors reflect their interests in athletics, such as kinesiology and broadcasting.[3]

These similarities point to a convergence of educational experiences between student-athletes and others engaged in certain preprofessional courses of study. Given this convergence, it might be expected that the student-athlete experience and that of students in the performing arts would have similar academic standing, but that is not the case.

In general, music students receive academic credit for learning their instruments, practicing, and playing in the school symphony. In general, student-athletes do not receive academic credit for instruction by coaches, nor do they receive academic credit for team practice or play. Many institutions give credit to members of the general student body to take classes in sports, say golf or tennis instruction. When physical education was required, as it tends not to be now, credit was awarded to nonathletes. But again, at NCAA Division I institutions, students do not receive credit for intercollegiate athletic participation.

What are the reasons for this apparent disparity in academic standing between student-athletes and student-musicians? There appear to be two primary ones. The first is the claim that credit is awarded only when the activity has content and the class (or its equivalent) is taught by a qualified instructor. This reason for the difference between student-musicians and student-athletes is not tenable, however.

How are we to specify content in this instance? In the case of physics, psychology, and philosophy courses, for example, the content is relatively clear. It is the systematic knowledge that is organized and conveyed by the instructor and textbooks and learned by the students. This is factual knowledge, knowledge "that." For example, physics students are expected to know that the speed of light is a constant, and philosophy students are expected to know that Western philosophy began with the ancient Greeks.

Music performance students are expected to gain knowledge "that" in some of their classes, such as music theory, but, by and large, performance students gain knowledge "how." That is, they learn how to do certain things, for example, how to play Bach's Brandenburg concertos. Learning how to do something is to gain a skill or to exercise an acquired skill in specific circumstances (8).

Student-athletes, too, must learn factual knowledge. They must know the rules of the game and about nutrition and exercise. But the most important learning undertaken by student-athletes is to come to know "how." Individual and team practices provide opportunities for student-athletes to learn skills and to apply those skills in specific situations.

Content includes knowing "how," as well as knowing "that," both facts and skills. Content need not be restricted to propositional representation. Other kinds of mental representation including skill schemata and imagery also qualify as content. Nonpropositional representation is critical to action (3: part IV, ch. 7 and 8).

Thus, student-athletes and performance students each learn content in the same way. Some content is acquired in cognate courses, and that tends to be factual knowledge. The primary content, however, in both cases is knowledge how, and that is acquired in individual or group settings with a master teacher or coach. It is this knowledge how that enables them to perform in the concert hall or on the playing field.

Another account of the educational value of athletics participation is often offered. This account, compatible with the one given here but different, focuses on student-athletes learning cognitive skills (10: pp. 154 ff; pp. 160–161). In mastering their game, student-athletes gain skill in critical thinking and problem solving. These cognitive skills transfer to learning in the sciences, humanities, and other areas. Being successful on the field of play requires observation, weighing alternatives, assessing probabilities, and hypothesizing solutions. Of course there are other ways to learn to think critically and solve problems, but athletics participation stimulates and encourages the learning of these skills.

This account focuses on learned cognitive skills, whereas the perspective I am stressing is based on learned physical skills. Cognitive-skill learning is, for the most part, gaining knowledge that; physical-skill learning is, for the most part, gaining knowledge how. No doubt, both occur through athletics participation, and both contribute to a student's education, but the main part is that, although athletics participation may well generate learning that is assimilable to the intellectual model of a university education, there is another type of learning that occurs in athletics participation that focuses on physical-skill development and that is a legitimate and worthy part of a university education.

The remaining part of this defense of the Standard View is that there is a difference between learning by student-athletes and performance students because of the differences in qualifications of the instructors. Here, too, the claim does not stand up to scrutiny. At fine universities and colleges across this nation, we expect a large majority of the instruction of undergraduates to be undertaken by those with terminal degrees or the equivalent in their fields. We do permit those in training—graduate students—to render instruction, but only under the supervision of senior teachers.

In the case of physics, psychology, and philosophy, among other disciplines, the terminal degree is the PhD. That is the appropriate degree when the primary, often exclusive, learning is factual knowledge. In the case of skill-based disciplines, however, such as the performing and studio arts, the PhD is not ordinarily the terminal degree. In these cases, it is usually the MFA, though that, too, might not be required. Rather, in these disciplines, the underlying requirement is that there is a track record of excellence, verified by peers, of teaching the skills appropriate to the activity. Peer judgment in the cases of skill instruction plays at least as important a role in asserting qualifications, and likely more so, than it does in factual knowledge instruction.

In athletic coaching, and to a large degree in the performing and studio arts, there is an apprenticeship system for instructors. Of course, minimal academic credentials are required, usually at least the baccalaureate degree, but after that, one learns from masters. Coaches begin as assistants and, through involvement with successful coaches, emerge, if they are talented, as head coaches. Similar routes to leadership in their fields are followed by performing and studio master teachers. Often, though certainly not always, coaches and master teachers themselves have or had high skill levels in their areas of expertise.

Those who teach in the performing and studio arts tend to be on the tenure track. That often held for coaches in the past, but Division I coaches are not now on the tenure track, except for a few elders who retain their faculty positions. There are some institutions in Divisions II and III that continue the practice of putting coaches on the tenure track, especially when they teach classes to the general student body.

Thus, the first purported reason for the disparity in academic standing between athletics and performance students—namely, differences in instructional content and teacher qualifications—is not defensible.

The second reason for the disparity between athletics and performance disciplines cuts to the heart of the matter. It focuses directly on the role and value of intercollegiate athletics in universities. This reason is that there are unsubstantiated cultural preconceptions within the academy about intercollegiate athletics.

Not all faculty members and academic administrators are antiathletics. There are many faculty members who are fans and many who work toward the success and proper conduct of intercollegiate athletics, for example, through service as NCAA faculty representatives and on campus-based committees. Nonetheless, on the whole, there is an underlying and growing disconnect with intercollegiate athletics within the campus-based academic community. Academic fraud; academically underperforming student-athletes; growing athletics department budgets; large compensation packages for some coaches; student-athletes, coaches, and even presidents misbehaving; and many other issues fuel this discontent.

Some faculty members are helping to resolve these issues in intercollegiate athletics that lead to discomfort, especially the academic issues. Recently, for example, the Coalition on Intercollegiate Athletics, which consists of Division I faculty-governance leaders, has been a strong advocate for integrity in intercollegiate athletics (4). Aside from these efforts to understand and reform intercollegiate athletics, however, there is serious and growing discontent among faculty members. The underlying reason is that, for the most part, faculty members hold intellectual powers in higher esteem then they do bodily abilities. Put provocatively, the American academy is prejudiced against the body.

Most faculty members are engaged in disciplines that are intellectual. Universities generally are involved in research and scholarship involving factual knowledge. This approach was inherited from the 19th-century German universities, which in many respects are the forerunners of the American research university. But there is also a long-term trend, which is distinctively American, that attempts to democratize higher education and emphasize the practical. This perspective led to the Morrill Act of 1862, by which universities were founded through a federal grant of land in order to teach agriculture and the mechanical arts (engineering). Nonetheless, despite this practical, skill-oriented history of American higher education, the intellectual, cognitive approach prevails. In it, emphasis on bodily skills is inappropriate; indeed, it subverts the true aim of the university. A focus on bodily skills leads to a vocational or purely professional view of education, and that, it is held, is antithetical to the mission of an institution of higher learning. Ballet counts; hip-hop does not. The core of the university is the study and advancement of the liberal arts.

Music and dance performance, though not purely intellectual, are treated as exceptions because they fall into the category of art. Actually, that is not entirely correct. It depends on what kind of music or dance. Classical music qualifies; rock and roll does not. The art form must relate to high culture. Rock and roll can be studied in a disinterested, intellectual way, and there are college courses on the history and sociology of rock and roll, but playing in a rock band does not ordinarily warrant college credit toward graduation.

In sum, the prejudice against the body, and with it professional studies that emphasize physical skill, is deeply rooted in the American academy. It was not until the middle of the 20th century that music, even classical music, rose to departmental status in many universities. This bias against the body and toward cognitive and intellectual capacity is the driving force of the disdain by many faculty members for college sports and the acceptance of the Standard View.

Financing Intercollegiate Athletics on the Standard View

The Standard View of intercollegiate athletics has far-reaching consequences. It affects the way Division I institutions budget for intercollegiate athletics. Because athletics is merely an extracurricular activity, according to the Standard View, the athletics department is to be treated like an auxiliary, similar to residence halls and parking, and not like an academic unit. Therefore, general-fund resources should not be used to support athletic departments. Rather, in Division I, athletics departments should be self-supporting or, better, return revenue to the institution for central academic purposes.

Universities are budgeted through a system of cross-subsidization. Graduate programs are subsidized by undergraduate programs. Some undergraduate programs, such as service courses in English and the social sciences, subsidize other undergraduate programs. One of the most costly programs in the university is music; one of the best revenue producers is Psychology 101. Auxiliary units such as residence halls and technology-transfer operations do not have academic value by themselves and they are not to be subsidized, if at all possible.

Because athletics is conceptualized in the Standard View as an auxiliary, as something without academic value, it should not be entitled to a university budgetary subsidy if at all possible. Athletics should earn its own way. This perspective has been codified as part of the NCAA Division I philosophy statement: "[A member of Division I] strives to finance its athletics program insofar as possible from revenues generated by the program itself" (5).

Divisions II and III institutions do not, and cannot, expect their athletics departments to be self-sufficient. The reason is that they lack the ticket and broadcast-media proceeds and donor contributions to produce substantial revenue. In those divisions, intercollegiate athletics is a subsidized activity, but in the high profile, high-cost athletics programs of Division I, the expectation is for self-sufficiency.

Faculty members and academic administrators like this principle. There is enormous competition for resources in a university; in fact, the contemporary university can almost be defined by saying that the good ideas of the faculty always outstrip the available resources. Faculty members tend to strongly prefer to invest university resources in academic programs and not subsidize athletics or other auxiliaries. Indeed, in this time of limited resources, there is increasing pressure to not subsidize athletics, or at least minimize the subsidy by, for example, increasing student athletic fees.

Many athletics administrators, especially athletic directors, also like this principle. Although they certainly want additional resources that come from institutional subsidy, this principle justifies a degree of autonomy within the university not achieved by most academic units. Athletic directors are expected to find ways to generate resources through ticket sales, media contracts, entrepreneurial activity, and fundraising. They are permitted, with considerable autonomy, to undertake these activities.

In Division I, especially for institutions with the most successful athletics programs, revenue can be increased, even dramatically so, through broadcast-media contracts. For example, in men's and women's basketball, the NCAA conducts postseason tournaments. Long-term agreements for the men's postseason basketball tournament provide a payout of more than $6 billion over the 11-year length of the contracts.[4]

Given the principle that intercollegiate athletics is to be self-supporting, presidents and athletic directors have also sought to make improvements and investments in their athletics programs in order to be highly competitive. Competitive success, they reason, will increase their revenue streams. One example of investments for enhancing competitiveness is new or renovated facilities. Football stadiums are enlarged, and luxury boxes are added to increase ticket revenue and to satisfy donors and supporters. As the perceived value of winning teams increases, the market for the best coaches does, too. The competition for these coaches is such that they command seven-figure compensation packages. The recent escalation of the costs of competitive Division I athletics programs has been labeled the "arms race."

There is competition in other parts of the university, as well. English departments compete to hire the most accomplished faculty members, which then drives up personnel budgets. Biology departments compete not merely on the basis of salaries but also on laboratory facilities and scientific instrumentation. Investments are made in residence halls and recreation centers to attract more and better students. In these cases, however, the university, through its normal budgetary process, makes priority decisions about which units to support.

Because according to the Standard View athletics departments are not taken to be central, or even part of the academic mission of the institution, the tendency is to not make budgetary decisions within the overall institutional context. The autonomy of the athletics department at some institutions enables the department to make its case directly to the president or even, in some cases, to the university's governing board.

But recent studies conducted under the auspices of the NCAA cast serious doubt on the claim that continued increases in expenditures results in improved competitiveness or in an enhanced ability to satisfy the principle of self-support (6). These studies are predicated on the best databases ever assembled. They show, for example, that for every dollar invested in football or men's basketball in Division I, the institution can expect a dollar back. That is, the rate of return is 0%. These studies also show that there is no correlation between winning teams and funds for operational expenditures. Overall, the studies do not support the rationale often given for increased expenditures on athletes.

Of the 117 Division I-A athletics programs, the highest level engaged in football, over one third claim that they cover their expenses or are producing excess revenue on an annual basis. This claim is presently difficult to evaluate because there is no uniform means of accounting for athletics expenditures. For example, some do not fully count facility costs such as bonded indebtedness and physical-plant maintenance; some do not fully account for academic support for student-athletes, such as advising and tutors; and others fail to include student fees in institutional support. Based on the economic studies, it may be more reasonable to believe that fewer than two dozen Division I-A schools, perhaps as few as one dozen when everything is taken into account, actually meet the principle of self-support. The 100 or so Division I-A institutions and the remaining 900 other schools with NCAA athletics programs all subsidize them.

Is that bad? It is only if one is committed to the Standard View that athletics lies outside the central mission of the university. If the Standard View is relinquished, and with it the principle of self-support, then subsidizing athletics becomes acceptable in Division I, as it is in the other divisions. Athletics departments, like every other unit in the university, should and will continue to seek ways to increase revenue, but the felt need to ratchet up investment in the hope of improving revenues should diminish. Athletics-department budgetary decisions can, and should, flow through the normal university budget process, once it is clear that subsidization is an acceptable reality of life. The stigma of subsidies for athletics is removed when the Standard View is foregone.

The Integrated View

The Standard View should be replaced by a more balanced view about athletics that integrates it into the mission of the university. Call this the Integrated View. The primary and defining feature of the Integrated View is that athletic programs are made part of the educational mission of the university. Although they are not part of the liberal-arts core, they play the same type of role as music and art and, perhaps, business and journalism.

The Integrated View is based on a different perspective of the role of physical-skill education than that of the Standard View. The Integrated View disposes of the bias against physical-skill development. The Attic Greeks had a good perspective. They believed that the mental and the physical should both be part of a sound education. Even someone as committed to the superiority of the mental as Plato held that physical accomplishment was necessary for successful citizenship. The central idea here is that of harmony. The harmony, the unity, of mind and body is crucial to a happy life (7: Book II 376E, Book III 412B, Book VII 521C–541B).[5]

The idea of harmony between mind and body in education comports well with the underlying philosophy of education in this country. America is the only country in the world that includes athletics extensively in its educational system. In Europe, sports are played mostly outside the university. Independent club sports, many of which involve payment to the athletes, substitute for intercollegiate athletics. Some Asian countries are reconsidering the separation of sports and education. Mainland China is reviewing its educational system, and there is some prospect that they will emulate the American system and incorporate athletics directly into it.

By focusing on the harmony between mind and body in education, athletics takes on a more central role. That role is not unlike the role of music in education, once again following the ancient Greeks. Some students specialize in music, but not many. Nonetheless, music is to be appreciated and enjoyed by all. It is considered a valuable part of the curriculum and the campus environment. Similarly, a minority of students are focused on intercollegiate athletics—from less than 2% of the general student body at large Division I institutions to 30% or more at some highly selective Division III liberal-arts colleges. Nonetheless, athletics and student-athletes should find a central role in university life. Athletics should be a valuable part of the educational environment.

The Integrated View raises a provocative issue. If athletic participation is relevantly similar to music performance with respect to content—namely, in knowledge of skills—as well as instructor qualifications, then if academic credit is provided for music students, should it not also be provided for student-athletes? There are some obvious limitations in providing credit to student-athletes. We should not offer majors in basketball or other sports. But it appears reasonable to provide a small number of credits, one time only, provided that the course has been approved through the normal process by appropriate faculty committees and it has an attendance requirement. There is the potential for abuse and academic fraud but, with faculty oversight, not more so than with some other courses in the university. In any case, the idea of offering credit for students participating in intercollegiate athletics is worthy of consideration, once the Integrated View is established at an institution.

Intercollegiate athletics, at its best, demonstrates positive values. These values include striving for excellence, perseverance, resilience, hard work, respect for others, sportsmanship and civility, and losing—and winning—with grace. Consider for a moment reactions to losing. Most undergraduate students, especially freshmen, have difficulty with failure, but student-athletes, who are accustomed to competition and the failures that accompany it, become good at overcoming adversity. If they lose a big game on Saturday afternoon, they are on the field the next Monday working doubly hard. Many students would do well to embrace this value of resilience and coping with failure early in their college careers.

In general, it would be good if the positive values exhibited by student-athletes were learned and adopted by the general student body. A college education is not only an exercise in gaining factual and skill-based knowledge; it is an opportunity to develop a value system, a set of enduring goals, and a perspective on life. In large part, college is about becoming a productive citizen and a mature person. This developmental aspect of a college education is especially pertinent to traditional-age students who have a residential experience. The positive, constructive values of student-athletes, gained through their experiences in intercollegiate athletics, are apt models.

Given that certain types of physical-skill development have roles to play in an institution of higher education and that intercollegiate athletics is one such type of skill development, intercollegiate athletics should be treated similarly to music education and education in other areas that involve skill development. For example, departments of intercollegiate athletics and schools of music should be relevantly similar in terms of the university's organizational chart.

Athletic directors should have a role similar to those of deans of major units such as medicine and arts and sciences. It would be good if there were a direct reporting relationship between the athletic director and the president (although it can be helpful for a vice president or other high-level administrator to work with the athletic director on local operational issues). The athletic director should serve in the president's cabinet or similar body. Doing so enables the athletic director to gain knowledge of and contribute to the strategic priorities of the institution, as well as providing an opportunity for university leadership to be informed about the issues facing the athletics department and to assist the department in fulfilling its institutional role.

The advantage of mainstreaming the athletic department into the mission and structure of the university is that it reflects the balanced approach to education that includes both cognitive and physical capacity. It also has the advantage of removing the impetus for the bias against intercollegiate athletics underlying the Standard View. Mainstreaming, undertaken successfully, should yield a better appreciation for the athletics enterprise by faculty members. One expected result is that there will be an increased willingness among faculty to accept, if necessary, cross-subsidization of athletics, at least to the extent that there is acceptance for cross-subsidizing music and art. By placing athletics in the mainstream of the university, its value to the education of undergraduates becomes more apparent.

Students' education may include both intellectual- and physical-skill elements. Although an emphasis on the intellectual certainly has had salutary effects, a university education should not be limited in that skill development is necessarily excluded. The structure of the university, in turn, should reflect this integrated approach. On the defensive side, failure to place adequate operational controls on intercollegiate athletics is a recipe for deep problems, including public exposure by the media. On the constructive side, mainstreaming intercollegiate athletics into the campus structure is likely to yield value for the institution in terms of broadly based developmental educational opportunities.

Conclusions

The rationale for the Standard View is weak. It discredits intercollegiate athletics, ignoring its educational value and relegating it to mere extracurricular activity. The underlying rationale for it is that a university education should be dedicated entirely to the mind. By contrast, I have been arguing that there is a legitimate place in the university for physical-skill development. Not everyone, of course, should concentrate on skill development, as do music, drama, dance majors, and student-athletes, but a university should accommodate those who, in addition to learning factual knowledge, gain certain physical abilities.

In a university in which this integrated approach is undertaken, the constructive values associated with intercollegiate athletics, even for those who do not themselves participate, can influence the campus culture. The values of hard work, striving for excellence, respect for others, sportsmanship and civility, team play, persistence, and resilience that underlie the ideal of sport should be brought into the developmental aspects of a college education affecting all students. The Integrated View of college sports, as opposed to the Standard View, not only puts intercollegiate athletics in its proper perspective but also has positive effects for the campus community.

The role of intercollegiate athletics in universities has been undervalued. The problems surrounding intercollegiate athletics, often sensationalized, should be kept in perspective. The constructive values represented by the sports ideal can positively influence students and enable them to become productive citizens. Intercollegiate athletics can, and should be, a positive part of undergraduate education and campus culture.[6]

Notes

1. The best statement of the contemporary problems of college sports, which is based on sound social-science research, is reference 9. The follow-up volume is reference 1. This latter book focuses on highly selective private schools and also makes specific recommendations to resolve the issues. For a summary of some of the criticism, see reference 10, especially chapter 7. See also reference 2.

2. The NCAA divides colleges and universities into three divisions reflecting athletic scholarship (grants-in-aid) support, the level of competition, and differences in philosophy. For example, Division III, unlike Divisions I and II, does not offer athletic scholarships. Division I, in turn, is subdivided in football, and only in football, into Divisions I-A, I-AA, and I-AAA. Division I-AAA does not field football teams. Division I-A, which consists of 117 schools, plays at the highest competitive level and receives the lion's share of fan and media attention. Overall, there are approximately 360,000 current student-athletes in the NCAA competing at more than 1,000 colleges and universities. See www.ncaa.org for details of structure and membership.

3. See reference 9 for the majors and postcollege careers of student-athletes.

4. The NCAA national office uses less than 5% of the funds from media contracts to conduct its operations and redistributes the remaining 95% of the proceeds to member colleges and universities and to student-athletes.

5. See also reference 10: pp. 156ff. Simon quotes A. Bartlett Giamatti, former president of Yale University and commissioner of Major League Baseball: "The Greeks saw physical training and games as a form of knowledge, meant to toughen the body in order to temper the soul, activities pure in themselves, immediate, obedient to the rules so that winning would be sweeter still" (10: p. 157).

6. I want to thank Dr. Marshall Swain for his helpful comments on an earlier draft of this article and the editor and referees of the Journal of the Philosophy of Sport for constructive comments. I also want to thank the several university audiences who commented on an earlier version of this article.

References

1. Bowen, W.G., and Levin, S.A. Reclaiming the Game: College Sports and Educational Values. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2003.
2. Brand, M. "Academics First: Reforming Intercollegiate Athletics." Address delivered to the National Press Club, January 23, 2001. Vital Speeches of the Day. 67(12), April 2001, 367-371.
3. Brand, M. Intending and Acting: Toward a Naturalized Action Theory. Boston: The Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Bradford Press, 1984.
4. Coalition on Intercollegiate Athletics Web site: www.math.umd.edu/~jmc/COIA.
5. NCAA Division I Manual, Article 20.
6. Orszag, J., and Orszag, P. "The Empirical Effects of Collegiate Athletics: An Interim Report," "The Physical Capital Stock Used in College Athletics," and "Division II Intercollegiate Athletics: An Empirical and Case Study Analysis." Available at www.ncaa.org.
7. Plato. Trans. F.M. Cornford. The Republic of Plato. New York and London: Oxford University Press, 1951.
8. Ryle, G. "Knowing How and Knowing That." In The Concept of Mind. London and New York: Hutchinson's University Library, 1949.
9. Shulman, J.L., and Bowen, W.G. The Game of Life: College Sports and Educational Values. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2001.
10. Simon, R.L. "Do Intercollegiate Athletics Belong on Campus?" In Fair Play: Sports, Values, and Society. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1991.
11. Sperber, M.A. Beer and Circus: How Big-Time College Sports Is Crippling Undergraduate Education. New York: Henry Holt and Co, 2000.

Journal of the Philosophy of Sport, 2006, 33, 21-36
© 2006 International Association for the Philosophy of Sport

Aristotle and Cricket: Drama in Retrospect[1]

Anthony D. Buckley

There's a breathless hush in the close tonight
Ten balls to play and a match to win
A bumping pitch and a blinding light
An hour to play and the last man in
—Sir Henry Newbolt, Vitai Lamada

A game or a sporting activity[2] is likely to be a drama in the sense that a ritual or a play is a drama. In a pioneering article, Keenan (12) uses the word "tragedy" to discuss athletic performance using terms taken from Aristotle's Poetics (1). This article will similarly show that that an enjoyable game will be, if not a tragedy,[3] then a "complex drama" with features described in Aristotle's discussion of theater. Some problems, however, need to be solved before this approach is adopted.

Using cricket as the main but not the only example, I will ask how an unscripted game can resemble a scripted theatrical play, a complex drama with an Aristotelian plot. The conclusion will be that in a game, a hero or team of heroes will strive to achieve goals in circumstances that render the path to success "complicated." Only when the game ends does a complex plot retrospectively emerge.

Aristotle's Poetics sets out practical principles to allow a "poet" to write a well-constructed theatrical drama. Concentrating on the tragedy, which he sees as one type of complex drama, Aristotle emphasizes the importance of the plot, which he calls the soul of tragedy (1: VI).[4] He divides the plot of a complex drama into several sections. After an introduction, the plot of a play becomes complicated. At the reversal of the situation, good fortune turns toward bad or bad fortune turns toward good. There then follows a denouement (1: XVIII) leading to a conclusion.[5] I shall argue that this scheme can be shown to exist not only in theater but also in sport.

Because sport may be seen to resemble theater, I shall ask whether sport, or some aspect of it, is "a work of art." I shall therefore investigate some ideas of David Best (2), who says that sport is not art. I shall disagree with him on some points but conclude that, although a game may be drama, it is not art.

The focus of this article, however, is to solve the major difficulty in seeing a game as a complex drama. Aristotle says of theater that "the structural union

The author <a.d.buckley@talk21.com> is with the Ulster Folk and Transport Museum, Cultra Holywood Co, Down BT18 0EU, United Kingdom.

The Moral Significance of Sport

Jan Boxill
University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

There is no doubting that sports play a significant role in the lives of many Americans and indeed of many people around the world. What accounts for this fascination? It is doubtful that sports simply provide an outlet for violence in society. This is too simplistic. Sport, I maintain, fascinates for many reasons, including its beauty and its display of morally heroic virtues. Human beings admire the beauty and grace in sport; they are moved by the discipline of the best athletes; and often it is the heroism and courage in sport that they applaud, not the violence which occasion the display of these virtues..

But this is not all. I maintain that because of the nature and design of sport, sport provides a significant moral function both for the individual and for society at large. It does so first because it provides participants a vehicle for self-expression, and a means of self-respect and self-development. Sport in this sense may serve as what philosopher John Rawls calls a "social union" in a society of social unions, a community of people with shared ends and common activities valued for themselves, enjoying one another's excellences and individuality as they participate in the activities."[1]

Second, because sport is a microcosm of society, it dramatizes the social order. As a microcosm, sport represents the social order in miniature, a "slice of life" and exhibits that slice in an exaggerated and dramatic form, much as a play dramatizes an episode of life. Sport mirrors or reflects society, its virtues and vices, but unlike a mirror, which is passive, sport is active. It reflects back on society; its reflection affects what it is a reflection of. And finally, because sport functions analogously as an art form, as a controlled expression of emotion, it enhances the notion of sport as a social union, and further serves a significant moral function in the dramatization of sport as a microcosm of society.

I.

In its paradigmatic form, sport can serve illuminate its moral significance, both negatively and positively. Four features exemplify sport in its paradigmatic form: 1) Sport is a freely chosen, voluntary activity; 2) Sport is rule governed with two sets of rules; 3) Sport is physically challenging; 4) Sport involves competition in a mutual challenge to achieve excellence.[2] These features provide neither an exhaustive nor exclusive definition, but a model to examine the moral significant features of sport.

First sport is a freely chosen, voluntary activity whose participation is an expression of the individual's creativity and his or her freedom to choose. Thus, sport is an unalienated activity, and as such is included in what Marx called "the realm of freedom." As an unalienated activity, sport has as its end the activity itself. Thought it may serve other purposes, it is an activity complete in itself. It dos not have to have a product nor provide a service, nor is it a means to an end outside itself. Sport is an end in itself.

Of course, those who participate in a sport necessarily have goals. For example, to play basketball is necessarily to have the goal of scoring baskets. But the goal is within the context of the activity itself. That is, in stating the rules of the game, one necessarily states the goals internal to it which the participants must have. But the participants need not have goals external to the game.

In its paradigmatic form them, participation in sport is both conscious and free, and the participants know and freely abide by the rules. This voluntary co-operation is required to begin, continue, and end the activity. Thus, for example, when I play basketball, tennis, or golf, I freely choose to do so and am conscious of my freedom to participate in the activity for no end outside the activity itself. Neither my existence nor my subsistence depends on my participation in the activity. This is unlike work.

By contrast work in its paradigmatic form is nonvoluntary and aims at something other than itself. Most members of society work in order to live; for them work is a means to an end other than itself. It is seen as a deliberate providing for needs or wants. As such work belongs in what Marx called "the realm of necessity."

It is possible, of course, for the fortunate few to express their creativity and freedom to choose in their work; most often when work approaches the paradigm of sport, it also enters the realm of freedom. But this cannot be the case for the great many workers whose work has little or no room for creativity nor

---

[1] John Rawls, A Theory of Justice, Harvard University Press, 1971, p. 523.
[2] This concept I take from Robert Simon, in Fair Play: Sports, Values and Society, Westview Press, 1991.

self-expression. Conversely, sport which in its paradigmatic form is in the realm of freedom, may be an individual's means of living and thus in the real of necessity. As I will argue, however, this is one possible source of the perversion of sport.

Now it might be objected that on my analysis, sport is no different from work, because sport is indeed a means to some ends, for happiness and pleasure, for health, discipline, relaxation, or for money. All of these are products of sports. Several points may be made here. First, when the aim is health or discipline, the activity degenerates into dull routine and quickly becomes something akin to work. When these objectives dictate what is done, efficiency becomes the concern. The question is "what is the most efficient way of obtaining these products?" This is the question one asks in work, not in sport. Examples of such activities are calisthenics, weightlifting, and jogging. These are examples of what are better called exercises, not sports. These activities are generally designed for physical fitness and are generally subjectively different from sport, in that they are not enjoyed for themselves.

This subjective difference has an objective counterpart. They are not designed nor participated in for self-expression because they are repetitive and simple. In doing sit-ups, for example, you do not try to be creative, nor do you do them for their own sake. You can concentrate on the sit-ups initially to make sure you are doing them correctly or efficiently, but after the efficiency level is reached, there is no more to think about except what end they will achieve, the "cut" abdominal muscles. "Once given a chance to train for games, students revolted against doing set exercises as ends in themselves. They found them to be tedious, repetitious and meaningless."[3] This may be further illustrated in body building. This was not satisfying in itself; the regimen had to be seen for something; thus, competition was devised.

Interestingly and importantly, when one participates to the fullest, the by-products of all sports are health, discipline, and a sense of achievement. These may be aimed at, as we saw, but they are better achieved when one forgets about them and participates. This is certainly also the case with relaxation, happiness, and pleasure. These are by-products of sports, but only when they are not the aim. This is just a particular instance of the paradox of happiness. In discussing this issue, a friend commented that she jogged, "not for its own sake, but for fun, relaxation, health and a sense of achievement." But if my analysis is correct, these can best be achieved by participating without those aims in mind. A person "who wants to be refreshed through play must forget about refreshing himself and just play."[4] By participating to the fullest, that is by participating freely with no other specific aim in mind, one achieves these "products." This is not the case in work, where the end product must always be kept in mind. If I am building a house and am concerned with the end product, I must keep fully aware of that end and must be alert and aware of the day-to-day operations and building. If I "lose myself" occasionally, it could be disastrous. The structure depends on keeping in mind on the work at hand.

When money becomes the aim, sport begins to degenerate in another way. It begins to degenerate into a means to that end, in so far as this objective dictates what is done. " How best can I command money?" becomes the question. Being good at the sport helps, but becoming a spectacle or entertainer is often the main criterion. To this end individuals try gimmicks or antics, or go to schools with a big athletic publicity department. For example, the Heisman trophy winners command more money by virtue of winning that award. But the winner is not always the best football player in the nation. It is often the result of the publicity that is put out by the athlete's school. Athletes become commodities and the "bottom line" is what matters to the owners. Further, salaries are decided relative to the draft choice.

Of course, the Heisman trophy winner is still an outstanding athlete, but unfortunately there are other cases where the sport itself is incidental. How best to be an entertainer or produce a spectacle is the primary concern, since that is how to command more money. At this point sport begins to be perverted, and moral virtues are undermined. The epitome of a perverted sport is professional wrestling. Everything is done for the entertainment value, for the benefit of the spectators, or more honestly for their money. In fact there is little sport left in it. The perversion is so pervasive that in most states professional wrestling is not even considered a sport. The participants are not athletes, but actors and stuntmen, certainly talented in their own right. There is little resemblance between this spectacle and collegiate wrestling, which is a spectacular sport, but is far from being spectacle.

Fortunately, it is still the case that in most sports ability is still the primary money-maker. But because money becomes the aim, other factors are introduced, or at least encouraged; namely the violence or "bad boy" behavior. Violence is encouraged, not for the good of the game, but for the good of the gate.

---

[3] Paul Weiss, Sport: A Philosophic Inquiry, Southern Illinois Press, 1969, p. 225.
[4] Ibid. p. 228.

Violence does nothing to enhance the sport performance. This can readily be seen in professional hockey. Hockey is a contact sport, but the contact is often exaggerated and violence is encouraged because it is spectacular and develops fan loyalty through hatred. This testifies to humankind's great passion and failure to keep focus on the athletic event. In this sense sport begins to parallel war. Love of one's country, or patriotism, is enhanced during war; loyalty developed through hatred of a common enemy.

We also see this in professional basketball with the proliferation of "bad boy" behavior, with some players seeing who can be the "baddest" or the most outrageous. We are all familiar with former NBA players Charles Barkley and Dennis Rodman. Spectators flocked to see their antics, encouraging others to follow in their footsteps. League officials could curtail behavior such as theirs, but it would cost the league ticket sales, and so is basically ignored. Again this attests to what is good for the gate not for the game. It is true that fines are levied for fighting in professional basketball, but with the enormous salaries, this has little affect. These players know that their antics are a drawing card, so they can command salaries whereby fines mean very little.[5] Again the bottom line is money.

It might be claimed here that where there are spectators perversion is inevitable. Possible yes, in that spectators often dramatize or multiply the atmosphere so that violence is encouraged even more. But inevitable, no. I agree with those who maintain that participating rather than watching is central to sport,[6] and I agree that everyone should participate, if they are able. This point I will take up in Section II.

The second feature of sport in its paradigmatic form is that it is rule governed. There are two different sorts of rules that are important to sport: rules decency or fair play and constitutive rules. Some sports have more rules than others, and some may have only one sort. First there are rules of decency, safety, and fair play. For example, in boxing one cannot hit below the belt; in football one cannot tackle by grabbing the face mask or tackle a non-ball carrier from behind; in baseball one cannot throw at the batsman's head; in cricket one cannot continually bowl bodyline, etc. There are very many rules for decency and safety, and when violated players are penalized. Rules of fair play include penalties for moves of strategy within the game. Rules of decency reflect basic moral standards. The basic ground rules are accepted, and they may be manipulated for strategy, but must not overstep prohibitive ones without swift punishment (e.g. fighting, biting, etc). The death of ethics is the sabotage of excellence.

Added to the rules of decency and fair play are constitutive rules which the game and the permissible moves. Their existence comes from their acceptance. Constitutive rules define the activity and are designed to develop and exhibit distinct sets of skills and talents. In combination these rules impose a discipline and create a framework for self-expression and self-development. These rules require calculations, decisions, strategies, and mental agility as well as a physical challenge. Thus, when I agree to play basketball, I agree first of all to abide by the rules which define the game, and the rules of decency, safety and fair play within the game. Further, I use thee rules as a disciplined means of self-expression and self-development. In playing basketball, for example, I cannot put the ball in the basket any way I choose. I must put it in the basket in the ways the rules permit. I cannot stand on a ladder, knock someone out of my way or climb on someone to reach the basket. Nor can I score a basket by sending the ball through the bottom of the net. To be sure these attempts use some skill and ingenuity, but the rules impose a kind of discipline that requires me to devise ways of scoring a basket which require skill, bodily excellence and ingenuity. The rules force me to use various strategies to create moves to score within these carefully specified rules.

Now it is a fact that not all sports impose a defining set of rules, for example, mountain climbing. However, besides the rules for safety, there are impositions that require bodily excellence and ingenuity, rules that require strategies for climbing to reach the top. The goal is not just to reach the top, but to climb to reach the top, and this requires adherence to rules, or laws, of nature. No artificial rules need be imposed.

It is this rule-governing feature that contrasts sport to play, where the rules are simply the more general rules of the society. In play there is little to guide the play activity except the general rules that guide normal human behavior, in particular rules against harming others. But such rules impose no discipline for self-expression or self-development. (They do serve to develop character however.) The rules of sport, on the other hand, provide a framework for creativity in accordance with aesthetic standards, requiring both mental and physical energies. It is this last notion which signifies the third feature of sport.

---

[5] The Latrell Sprewell situation is a case in point.

[6] See James Michener, Sports in America, New York: Random House, Inc. 1976.

The third feature of sport in its paradigmatic form is that sport is physically challenging. This feature contrasts sports to games. It is the rule-governing feature of sport that makes sports coextensive with games, but games to not always emphasize a physical challenge or require bodily excellence. Both sports and games are rule-governed, but not all games are sports, and are not when there is no physical challenge. Thus, for example, chess is a rule-governed activity and is a game, but it does not qualify as a sport because it is not physically challenging. The rules which define the sport activity are specifically designed for displaying and expressing bodily performance and aimed at bodily excellence. Thus, these rules often create artificial obstacles for just this purpose. Further, often rule changes are made for just this purpose. Without these rules no particular bodily perfection would necessarily be exhibited.

Using the example of basketball again, rules and obstacles are designed so that baskets scored require skill, coordination, strategies, and bodily excellence. The obstacles and rules present a challenge. The size of the court forces the action in a relatively small area. The "three-second lane" forces continuous action around the basket and prevents a very tall players from simply standing next to the basket for a dunk. This is why we have heard some advocate for raising the rim of the basket to eleven or twelve feet, so that the tallest players must create moves which require bodily excellence. Dunking itself displays a tremendous amount of ability—coordination, timing, jumping ability and balance. It is probably one of the most beautiful moves in basketball because it requires such a combination of abilities—mental and physical.

A rule that imposes another discipline is the shot clock. In college men's basketball the shot clock is 35; women's is 30; and in the professional game it is 24 seconds. The shot clock requires a basket to be attempted with the time allowed. This not only requires bodily excellence, it requires mental concentration and strategies. Interestingly the women's rules, once they changed to approximate the men's rules, included a 30-second clock in their revision, and this still remains. Professional men's basketball has required a 24-second clock since 1954. In every case the clock serves to keep the game challenging, mentally and physically, and also serves for spectator appeal.

Obviously some sports impose more obstacles and discipline than others. However, as I mentioned above, not all obstacles need be artificial. The mountain itself is the obstacle in climbing; as the water is for kayaking and white water rafting. But all impose some obstacles providing a physical challenge, and forcing the participant to create ways to display their abilities. Cricket, for example, does not allow the bowler to throw the ball to the batter in the same way the pitcher throws to the batter in baseball. Also the bats are very different. But in both baseball and in cricket the bats are very specifically designed with definite specifications stipulated by the rules.[7] All these rules, obstacles, and equipment specifications are designed for displaying and creating bodily excellence.

What is interesting and significant is that the different sets of rules which define different sports are designed to exploit the different bodily excellences which correspond to the different body types in men. A good basketball player for example, does not necessarily make a good football player; a good football player does not necessarily make a good swimmer, etc. The point is that certain body types fit different types of sports. There presently exist sports opportunities for nearly every male body type; though there have been great strides, this is not the case for women.

Women cannot as a rule compete in football and boxing, nor compete with men inmost other sports. Although there will always be exceptions, because these are exceptions there will always be societal prejudice which guarantees inequalities of opportunities. Therefore, there is a case for developing sport activities that exploit women's body types. In some cases this may simply involve revising the rules of existing sports, such as in basketball by reducing the size of the basketball for the college players. In other cases it may require developing entirely new activities. In any case since sport is already the single most available activity for self-expression for men, as is clear by the great variety of sports which serve most men's body types, it seems reasonable that similar activities ought to be provided for women. It is interesting to note that basketball was originally created for men to play in the winter between the fall and spring sports. This testifies to the truth that a sport can be a fresh creation made to satisfy definite purposes; other sports could be similarly created. What is also fascinating about basketball is that women played the same game as the men in 1892, but due to concern for women's bodies, it did not develop as the men's game did, and only in 1976 was women's basketball an Olympic sport.

---

[7] Recall the controversy when George Brett hit a game-winning home run with a bat with too much tar, and further controversy over the "super-bats."

The final feature of sport in its paradigmatic form is that it requires competition. And it is in competition that the mental and physical skills, talents, and coordination come together. Competition in sport obviously compels the players to exercise and develop their mental skills. Each must develop strategies to counter a competitor's skills and strategies. Here coaches often play significant roles; they are the skilled strategists and work with the athletes in practice and discuss the mental aspects of the sport in the locker room. But once on the court or the playing field, it is up to the athletes to make quick calculations and decisions. Only the most basic plays and moves become automatic. It is seldom that every play of the game is automatic, so quick calculations and decisions based on past behavior and conduct are required. The quarterback in football must be able to "read" and understand the opposing team's defense and then call the next play accordingly.[8] And if the defense shifts in anticipation or if the play does not go quite as it should, the quarterback must make a quick calculation and decision, and the other players must do the same. Good players are neither afflicted with decidophobia nor rashness. In most activities challengers change in unpredictable ways and so one must be prepared to counter within the rules. Making these decisions in those circumstances can serve an important moral function. It is not only in sport that one has to make decisions quickly, but not rashly.

It should be noted here that not all sports require person-to-person competition nor even team competition. There are different forms of competition. Sports such as rock and mountain climbing do not require competition between persons; rather they pit a person against nature. This may be understood as "contention" rather than competition; but the requirements are the same in that one must put ones mental and physical skills to the test. However, while this is the case, in analyzing the moral significance of sport, my discussion centers on the person-to-person aspects especially seen in organized sport.

This feature of sport dramatizes the morality of a community in competition. Sport dramatizes how competition can lead to friendship, to a cooperative challenge toward a shared end. When the game is played fairly according to the rules of the game, and when the competitors are relatively evenly matched, the participants take pleasure in a well-played game, whereby the participants put out their best efforts in the desire to win. This requires the cooperation of all involved. The shared end is the game well played. Without the cooperative efforts of the participants, referees, etc, such an end cannot be achieved. This cooperative effort constitutes a mutual challenge. I am challenged by my competitor as she is challenged by me. I am not interested in destroying her as an enemy, nor subjugating her. I do not view her as an enemy, but as a challenger, someone who by her efforts makes me work hard to develop my abilities. In this way I respect her as a person with similar abilities and virtues and also respect myself in this mutual cooperative challenge. That competition leads to friendship is epitomized by the traditional handshake at the end of the competition. That the competitors are saying in this symbolic gesture is, "Thanks friend, I could not have done it without you. Thanks for the challenge."

Unfortunately sport also dramatizes how competition may lead to combat. But the dramatization in either case serves as a significant moral function. It shows our intense passion and desire to be victorious as well as our failures. Competition as a challenge to better oneself is a value to society and to the individual. This is not unique to sport situations; it is important in all fields of endeavor. Competition is valuable when it is viewed as a cooperative challenge and not as combat, when it is viewed as a means to friendship and not as a means to alienation. In these ways competition does serve to develop citizens as well as individuals. Competition enables participants to deal properly with other realities.

Now, of course, this does not carry over into all activities and realities. It does not mean, for example, that participants now put as much energy into activities they dislike or find great difficulty doing. There are, of course, aberrations, and these aberrations are definitely dramatized in a sport context. This is especially seen when competition is viewed as combat, emphasizing the "win-at-all-costs" syndrome, and when viewed as a zero-sum game. It has been argued that these are essential features of competition. But if my analysis is correct, these "features" are not essential to the notion of competition and are, as I have noted above, aberrations.

The point of competition is not just to win, but to function at a maximum, to develop oneself to the fullest, and to do this one must compete against those who challenge. If it were simply to win, one would choose weak opponents that one could always defeat. Generally one prefers to lose against a strong opponent than win against no competition at all. This is evidenced by the expression "hollow victory." Certainly winning is part of the game (i.e. someone must win), but one does not see an opponent as an enemy to be defeated, but one whose excellences challenge and make possible one's own best performance.

---

[8] Admittedly technology has made some decision making less spontaneous.

This point was made clear to me in the 1993 National Indoor Tennis Championship. Roland Thornquist of the University of North Carolina disagreed with a line call that was in his favor saying, "I'd rather lose a match and be a good sport than cheat and win the match. I think you win in the long run."[9] This epitomizes competition in sports. The goal is not to destroy, but to achieve, to discover how effectively one's power can used to bring about a successful outcome under the established rules, not at all costs. Again here I am talking about person-to-person competition. These observations are not present in all kinds of competition, as I noted above, but perhaps we ought to derive our the model of competition from that of the mountain climber, or kayaker, or rower, where strategy is used to challenge the mountain or the river. The point is not to subjugate, but to challenge, to achieve, where the struggle involves the process, he desire to be tested. The win-at-all-costs syndrome does not seem to be present in sports where the competition does not involve other persons. Much can be learned from this and transferred to the person-to-person organized sports which is the focus of this project.

To illustrate the virtue of competition as an achievement toward a shared end, David Halberstam, a noted sportswriter writes:

> "When most oarsmen talked about their perfect moments in a boat, they referred not so much to winning a race as to the feel of the boat, all eight oars in the water together, the synchronization almost perfect. In moments like that, the boat seemed to lift right out of the water. Oarsmen called that the moment of swing. … it allowed you to trust the other men in the boat. A boat did not have swing unless everyone was putting out in exact measure, and because of that, and only because of that, there was the possibility of true trust among oarsmen."[10]

This same moment of "swing" can be seen in other team sports when the play works beautifully because everyone is putting out the same energy to be synchronized with each other.

These four features constitute a schema for sport in its paradigmatic form, and it is these four features that characterize the importance of sport. Sport, therefore, is an unalienated activity which is required for self-development, self-expression, and self-respect. This is part of its fascination. I do not deny that other activities provide vehicles for these goods; there are others. What I contend is that sport is the single most available means and single most participated means for attainment of these goods. It is in this sense that sport is the art of the people and is therefore morally significant.

II

Karl Marx has argued that work is the means to self-development. Not, of course, work under capitalism, but unalienated work; work that is freely chosen and exemplifies human creativity requiring both the energy of the mind and of the body, in accordance with aesthetic standards. And, Marx continues, given the proper setting, i.e. communism, there can be this alienated work available to everyone. This obviously was essential for Marx's argument.

Further Marx maintained that in a communist society, we could all not only be workers, but philosophers, poets, etc.

> "In communist society, … each can become accomplished in any branch he wishes, society regulates general production and thus makes it possible for me to do one thing today and another tomorrow, to hunt in the morning, fish in the afternoon, rear cattle in the evening, criticize after dinner, just as I have a mind, without ever becoming hunter, fisherman, cowherd, or critic."[11]

I am not sure this is the case, but Marx is correct in emphasizing that this well-roundedness which is necessary for self-development requires "unalienated activities"; activities designed specifically to provide room to express and develop oneself freely and not activities that are means to satisfy needs. I have already discussed sport as an unalienated activity. I will now discuss how it also provides the basis for well-roundedness and for development of our uniquely human capacities.

I adhere to the claim that we all ought to be well-rounded and that we all ought to develop our uniquely human capacities; capacities which include the rational, aesthetic, moral, as well as the capacities for friendship and cooperation. But Marx's claim notwithstanding, we can't all be artists, philosophers, poets, or top athletes. To be well-rounded and to develop all our faculties is impossible if it means we must

---

[9] Roland Thornquist went on to play professional tennis and is currently the Head Women's Tennis Coach at his alma mater, the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

[10] David Halberstam, The Amateurs, William Morrow & Co., Inc., New York, 1985, p. 40.

[11] Karl Marx, "German Ideology," in Karl Marx: Selected Writings, edited by David McLellan, p. 169.

attempt to perfect all our faculties. Time alone does not permit the development of all our potentialities. As Rawls puts it, "One characteristic of human beings is that no one person can do all that they might like to. ... Potentialities of each are greater than those we can hope to realize."[12]

How then can we be well-rounded? If excellence necessarily requires specialization, it would seem that we cannot be well-rounded. One possible solution is for everyone to participate in as many activities as possible, but specialize only in one or two endeavors. We can't perhaps all be philosophers, but we should all philosophize. We can't all be experts in any one area, but we should participate in as many areas as possible. Obviously not all of us can be superior athletes, but we should all participate. However, in both cases, philosophy and sports, some must specialize so that everyone else can appreciate the superior excellence of that activity. In this way we can participate in that excellence. So, for example, the more you participate in sports yourself, the more you appreciate the superior excellence of the best. The same holds true for philosophy, or for any other activity. It is in this sense that sport fulfills the requirements of Rawls's social union. The successes and enjoyments of others complement our own good. Thus, the successes and enjoyments of superior athletes and their performances complement the good of others. This justifies professional sports. The professionals display the superior talent and excellence of the best and as such enable us to participate in and appreciate their excellence. We do this as spectators. In this way we become complete vicariously.

Now it may be asked here whether participation is necessary for appreciation. I maintain that some participation is necessary to appreciate the excellence of others. Otherwise one runs the risk of becoming an elitist, or of focussing on the "accidents" of the activity, or of denying its significance. As a result the nonparticipant often fails to give respect to the superior participant. It is in this situation that spectators contribute to the perversion of sport.

However, rather than perverting sports, our participation and knowledge actually enhance the quality of the performance. An analogy may be made with philosophy and philosophical conventions. Attending a convention are professional philosophers, students of philosophy, other academics, and professionals interested in certain areas of philosophy. Some of the performances are entertaining with little content. But these are rare, because most of the spectators at any paper are fairly knowledgeable and are actual participants themselves, and thus "see through" such performances. Thus the quality of the convention is enhanced. And further we as spectators appreciate the excellences of the professional philosophers through these performances (i.e. their papers).

The same can and does hold true in sports. By being a participant, a student or a knowledgeable aficionado of the sport, these spectators enhance the quality of the sport. The more knowledgeable people become, the more they are able to see through the performers who lack ability; and less likely to be impressed with violent displays. They appreciate the superior performances, the hard work, the creativity, the strategy, and the artistry involved. They need not be participants in all sports to appreciate all sports. The unique nature of sport activities transfers to any sport. So that while I may be a participant in basketball, I can appreciate the excellences of other sports because they all have similar requirements. They all, in some way, participate in the model presented in Section I. However, the more I know about any one sport, the more I can appreciate it.[13] And the more I participate in a variety of sports, the more I can appreciate the significance of sport in general.

The point is that we cannot all be specialists in all areas, but because there are specialists who do achieve excellence, we can participate in the excellences in the performances of others. In this way our capacities are complemented, and we become well-rounded. Thus, "when [we] are secure in the enjoyment of the exercise of [our] own powers, [we] are disposed to appreciate the perfections of others…"[14] This is the essence of Rawls's social union.

Thus, individuals realize themselves as individuals by participating in roles and stations of the social order. "We need one another as partners in ways of life that are engaged in for their own sake, and the successes and enjoyments of others are necessary for and complementary to our own good."[15] Thus social institutions are to be judged by their contribution to this aim. And it is to this aim that sports must also be judged.

---

[12] John Rawls, A Theory of Justice, Harvard University Press, 1971, p. 523.
[13] This is why those who most respect Coach Smith are players and other coaches.
[14] Rawls, 523.
[15] Ibid. 522-523

III

It has been argued by many that sports mirrors the society in which they operate. In this way sport is a microcosm of society.[16] Sport is society in miniature, complete with all its conflicts, assets, and defects. Society is lived by people and sports are played by people. Sports provide an effective medium for bringing out the characters of people. They serve to bring out the best and the worst of people. In observing sport as a microcosm, just as there is corruption in society, there is corruption in sports; just as there is violence in society, there is violence in sports; just as there are drugs in society, there are drugs in sports. On the other hand, just as there are rules of conduct in society, there are rules of conduct in sport; just as there are successes and heroes in society, there are successes and heroes in sports. In all these ways and others, sports reflect the society in which they operate. But while I agree with this analysis, it is only part of the picture. Sport is more than a mirror reflection. A mirror provides a passive reflection, but sport is not a passive reflection. Sport is active and affects what it is a reflection of. Further sport not only reflects society, it also dramatizes the social order. These unique aspects are what make clear the moral significance of sport both for the individual and society at large.

In its being a miniature of society, it compresses and heightens aspects of society, much like a dramatic presentation. Aspects of society are exaggerated and dramatized, and in this way are made clear to all of us. Like drams, sport may reveal to the society virtues it has not yet recognized, or present new values to the society and criticize old ones, or dramatize the established virtues and values in a society. For example, in the triathlon competition perseverance is dramatized in the mere attempt to finish the competition. This dramatization shows the virtue of perseverance and the struggles involved. We admire the finisher as well as those who merely push themselves to the limit in an attempt to finish.

In all of these ways sport may spur moral change. Insofar as it declares the virtues and values of society, sport tells people when they do not live up to their ideals, chastises them for their laxity and prods them to be better people. For example, "that's not cricket" is not said only in cricket.

We espouse the virtue of hard work. Sport does much to dramatize this, and it is with this in mind that some rules changes are made. Surely some people have more talent and aptitude than others. That is as it should be; but raw talent is usually not sufficient. No one, no matter how apt, is naturally great. To be great, an athlete must become great. This is why Michael Jordan is a great basketball player, and Tiger Woods is a great golfer. They both have talent, but they dominated their sports because they developed their natural abilities to be the best they could be. Sport emphasizes the development of the raw talent, and this carries over into society.

We also espouse the virtues of courage, patience, sportsmanship, perseverance and determination. These are emphasized in sports, but are also dramatized so that when they are undermined, they become more obvious and acute. And in so doing we chastise not only the violators but society itself for its laxity. This was illustrated quite well in our attitude toward John McEnroe, who in his displays on the tennis court dramatized the lack of some of our cherished values. Again some rule changes have tried to address such behavior.

Another value society holds dear is justice as fairness. Sport may serve to dramatize how justice ought to be administered and how fairness is emphasized. This is done by carefully specified rules, both to define the game to provide for development, bodily excellence, hard work and fairness, and to provide for proper conduct within the game. With regard to the latter, penalties are swiftly and surely dealt with. Referees and umpires mete out immediate justice. It is in playing the game that one agrees to abide by the rules, recognizing both their importance and their essential fairness. In this way participants are aware of each other as individuals with shared ends. And it is in this way participants come to appreciate others as moral persons and as such constitute a moral community.

It is because sport is an art form and dramatizes our virtues and values that we are outraged at the aberrations. And it is therefore most important that these be corrected within sports and don so surely and quickly. But while this dramatization of virtues may spur moral change, it may also be the source of a great moral danger in sport. People may substitute sport for reality and in so doing be content with their cherished virtues being played out in the game and not in reality. Sport in this way may be the moral opium of the people. For example, C.L.R. James, in his book Beyond a Boundary, gives the example of how on the playing field, racism was nonexistent. The important thing was the competition, the cooperation, teamwork, and friendship. But as soon as the players left the playing field the racial prejudices returned and this the racists felt was all right. After all we treat you as equals on the playing field, what more do you want?"

---

[16] For example, see D. Stanley Eitzen, "Sport as Microcosm of Society," in Sport in Contemporary Society, Sixth Edition, Worth Publishers, 2001, pp. 1-9.

This situation is analogous to Marx's criticism of religion. Religion, says Marx, "is the imaginary realization of the human essence…"[17] Thus, to tolerate the misery on earth, people live in imagination and all that is good is played out in this imaginary world. In this way what is miserable and less than good is tolerated. "Religion is the sigh of the oppressed creature, the feeling of a heartless world, and the soul of the soulless circumstances. It is the opium of the people."[18] Sport could represent an alienation in this sense and become the opium of the people in a similar way.[19] All the virtues could be carried out in the sport instead of in our own day-to-day lives, as C.L.R. James points out. On the cricket field there was no prejudice—not on the field, a place of honor—not in heaven! Thus the players alienate their good qualities from themselves and live them out in an imaginary realm. But neither sport nor religion is wholly imaginary.

In sport the realm is not imaginary. As a matter of fact in sport the prejudices were not and are not dropped. As C.L.R. James points out, there were black captains in cricket. There was indeed teamwork and friendships on the field which were not acknowledged off the field, but other prejudices carried over into the sport itself. So that after all the talk about no prejudices, there clearly was. So what happened? When pointed out as glaring prejudice it forced people to recognize what they were doing. By focusing on a specific point, changes were made.[20] Hopefully this dramatization and change carried over into society spurring further changes in society, which leads me to the aspect of sport that it affects what it reflects. Sport is not a mere passive reflection, but is active in that it affects society even when it is not intended.

We can see this in the circumstances and changes in our own society and in sport in America, in particular baseball, football and basketball. In baseball there were black and white leagues, no integrated teams. This was a glaring violation of the ideal. When dramatized and thus with the emergence of Jackie Robinson into the Brooklyn Dodgers, it stimulated or provoked analysis and criticism of wider issues in society. More recently the issue of black managers has been raised, and when Al Campanis, then Vice-President of the Los Angeles Dodgers, answered that blacks do not have the requisite abilities to manage, he was chastised and relieved of his position. And after that, we had Marge Schott, owner of the Cincinnati Reds, whose racist comments landed her a suspension. In an interview she commented that "everyone" uses these comments, so why was she singled out? While she may be right, the point is that it serves to put people on notice to recognize these issues in society and that people in power are most in need of this awareness. But even further, while these examples may reflect society prejudices, they also serve to perpetuate them. People in power as well in other roles in our society, by their very chosen positions, take on the duties attached with those positions, because they exemplify what is allowed in society. This includes owners, CEOs, public athletes, professors, to name a few. It is through these people that society learns what is proper, what is tolerated, and is right or wrong. So Marge Schott, Dennis Rodman, John McEnroe, Marion Jones all have duties beyond the general public. Once you choose to become a public figure, you also choose the duties that go along with this because it is the nature of being a public figure that you affect others in society. Since sports have become the most public of all professions, they impose more duties. Sports figures are role models; it goes with the territory.[21]

This can be extended to other areas as well, in particular feminist issues. The Title IX ruling of 1972 requires that schools not discriminate in their athletic programs on the basis of sex. Though even today this is met with resistance, most schools complied with this ruling and provided teams and coaches for females. Some schools did the bare minimum just to placate females and keep the law off their backs. Other schools provided facilities and revenue to provide competitive and challenging sports. Now it could stop there by claiming that the challenges have been provided, and that is enough. But because sports are viewed by many people as insignificant, sex equality in sports is tolerated, but not necessarily extended to or tolerated in the society in general, in business or politics. But rather than permit this, sports can serve to show that many of the old ideas held about women were simply prejudices—prejudices such as women being weak, not competitive, rendered incapacitated by their biology, etc.—and in this way sport may again

---

[17] Marx, 64
[18] Ibid
[19] See for an analysis of this concept.
[20] Recall the controversy and changes surrounding the Al Campanis affair resulting in black baseball managers.
[21] Kit Wellman discusses this issue in his essay in this collection.

spur moral change. "If women's athletic potentialities are taken with as much seriousness as a man's, it will become more evident that sport concerns not only mankind but humankind and deserves to be viewed as a basic human enterprise."[22] Gender equity is presently one of the biggest issues facing the NCAA and college athletics.

This serves to strengthen the analogy between sport and religion. Both sport and religion are only partially or temporarily in an imaginary realm. Prejudices carry over in both sport and religion, and in this way are reflections of the wider society. But because sport dramatizes and affects these prejudices, it turns and helps change society in a way that religion does not. Religion may serve a similar function, and often does, but only when it approaches the public dramatization as in sport.

It is in recognition of this dramatization that unlike Marx's recommendation that religion be abolished to destroy the illusion, this "holy form of self-alienation … to establish the truth of the here and now,"[23] neither sport nor religion ought to be abolished. Rather both should continue to dramatize our ideals and our virtues, as well as our prejudices and vices. In this way both may serve to spur moral change. But because sports involve a more public realm, the dramatizations are move visible and prominent. And further sports are concerned with the here and now in a way that religion is not. Sport is only "imaginary" in the sense that it is set apart from the normal everyday work world, and like religion may serve to help individuals tolerate the miseries of that workaday world. But it is the here and now that the participants are finding solace, not in any life after death. And so it is in the here and now that sports may serve to spur moral change. This can be seen in television ads that show young girls participating in sports and how this is good for them. The television promotion of the U.S. National Soccer Team does the same. These show that the old prejudices were just that, and that girls and women can and should participate to receive the same benefits men have so long enjoyed.

In religion it is in heaven where everything is just and good and this goodness depends on God, not us. We can't make it good on earth, only God can. In sport this goodness depends on us, not God. Sport has no God; there is no pretense that the perfect realm of sport is God's. Sport is of human beings and human creations. Thus for moral change no gigantic step is required. We don't have to wait for God to do it; it is within our present abilities. Sports reveal who we are and may reflect who we are in society, but it is up to us to recognize our duties to ourselves and others. In this way sport serves a different but compatible function. And in this function lies its moral significance.

IV

That everyone is entitled to self-respect and self-esteem is undisputed. These are as Rawls claims, primary social goods. That everyone has capacities that ought to be developed is also undisputed, capacities that include the moral, the rational, and the aesthetic. These are often referred to as "uniquely human attributes." What are required for self-respect, self-esteem, and the development of these attributes are activities. One kind of activity is productive activity, i.e. work. But another kind of activity is also required and that is "unalienated" activity—activity designed for no end outside itself, designed to emphasize creativity and enjoyed for its own sake. Work cannot always serve this function, so some other activity is necessary. Sports, I have argued, are such activities. And further there are all kinds of sports at all levels of participation. Thus sports are the single most available unalienated activities which provide autonomous agents a vehicle for self-expression, self-respect, and self-development, because the excellence of the athletes in themselves. In this way sports serve to humanize individuals and thus serve a significant moral function.

Sports also serve a significant moral function to the society at large. I have argued that in its dramatization and active reflection, sports may spur moral change. But while sports may be the "art of the people," they may also serve as the moral opium of the people.[24]

---

[22] Weiss, 228. Also see Jane English's essay in this collection.

[23] Marx 64.

[24] I have had the benefit of helpful comments and criticisms from a number of students and colleagues, most notably Bernard Boxill, Thomas E. Hill, Jr., Jacob Hale, Kit Wellman, Shirl Hoffman, participants at the Hillsdale College Conference, "Who's on First? Liberal Arts, Christianity or Sports," where an earlier version of this paper was presented, the Johnston Scholars Honors and my First Year Seminar students at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, January 1, 2007 3:52 PM
To: Bar-On, Dorit <dbar@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Colloquium for majors

Hi Dorit,
Yes, we should have John Roberts send an email to the majors. So I would suggest you send him a course description and ask him to send it to the majors.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Dorit Bar-On wrote:
> Dear Jan,
> I just checked the enrollment for the colloquium for majors and it's > still at 6 students. It would be a great shame if it stayed that > small, given what Nico and I are planning for it, which would make a > great opportunity for anyone planning on going on to grad school. Is > there any way of drumming up more business? Do you have a contact > list for eligible majors? Should we open it for non-seniors?
>
> Thanks,
> Dorit

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, January 3, 2007 11:25 AM
To: Bar-On, Dorit <dbar@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Colloquium for majors

Hi Dorit,
I know that he went to Texas over the break to be with Michael Hand, who had a stroke, so I don't know if he is back,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Dorit Bar-On wrote:
> Do you know if John is incommunicado? I wrote to him yesterday > morning but haven't heard back. I'm thinking that the sooner we > contact the major the better.
> Dorit
>
> Jan Boxill wrote:
>> Hi Dorit,
>> Yes, we should have John Roberts send an email to the majors. So I >> would suggest you send him a course description and ask him to send >> it to the majors.
>>
>> Jan
>>
>> Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
>> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
>> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
>> Department of Philosophy
>> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>> Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
>> Phone: 919-962-3317
>> FAX: 919-843-3929
>>
>>
>>
>> Dorit Bar-On wrote:
>>> Dear Jan,
>>> I just checked the enrollment for the colloquium for majors and it's >>> still at 6 students. It would be a great shame if it stayed that >>> small, given what Nico and I are planning for it, which would make a >>> great opportunity for anyone planning on going on to grad school.
>>> Is there any way of drumming up more business? Do you have a >>> contact list for eligible majors? Should we open it for non-seniors?
>>>
>>> Thanks,
>>> Dorit
>>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, January 3, 2007 5:05 PM
To: Laurel Goldstein <goldstel@email.unc.edu>; Given, Emily <given@email.unc.edu>
Subject: PHIL 275
Attach: PHIL 275-Spr07 Syllabus.doc

Hi Laurel and Emily,
I have put a partial syllabus on blackboard and also attaching it. I would like to meet to discuss the class and also get your office hours and office info. I have some time on Monday morning and afternoon, and some time on Tuesday-tho my Tuesday is a bit busy.

I am out of town tomorrow and Friday.

Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, January 3, 2007 6:16 PM
To: Laurel Goldstein <goldstel@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Natural kinds

/_Here is the reference to the transgender I was talking about_ Seminar on Ethics and Gender/, presented by Dr. Joan Roughgarden <http://www.stanford.edu/group/roughlab/>, author of /Evolutionâ€™s Rainbow

_
_Here is another reference--this refes to Frye's Politics of reality:

http://www.mit.edu/~shaslang/papers/fmnewsUHO.html
/

Here are some other references of Marily Frye's work:

Professor Frye is author of /The Politics of Reality: Essays in Feminist Theory/ and /Willful Virgin: Essays in Feminism 1976-1992/. Topics of recent interest: what categories are, social categories, race and gender categories, essentialism, ethnocentrism.

"The Necessity of Differences: Constructing a Positive Category of Women," in /SIGNS: Journal of Women in Culture and Society/, Vol.21, No.3, Summer 1996.

"Essentialism/Ethnocentrism: The Failure of the Ontological Cure," in /Is Academic Feminism Dead? Theory in Practice/, edited by the Center for Advanced Feminist Studies at the University of Minnesota. NYU Press, 2000.

"Categories and Dichotomies;" in /Encyclopedia of Feminist Theories/ edited by Loraine Code. NY:Routledge, 2000.

"Categories in Distress," in /Feminist Interventions in Ethics and Politics/, eds., Barbara Andrew, Jean Keller Lisa Schwartzman. Rowman and Littlefield, Spring 2005.

Frye's email:fryem@msu.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, January 3, 2007 7:11 PM
To: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: natural kinds

Real Essences and Natural Kinds in Feminist Theory: A Revisionist Account

*Author: *Howie, Gillian^1 <#aff_1>

Source: Contemporary Political Theory </content/pal/14708914;jsessionid=1r8ac98mtcqj1.alice>, Volume 5, Number 3, August 2006, pp. 238-258(21)

*Publisher: *Palgrave Macmillan
</content/pal;jsessionid=1r8ac98mtcqj1.alice>

Abstract:

This paper examines the problem of natural kinds, a key problem within feminist theory, and argues for a non-instrumental realist account of group identity. I suggest that a reconstructed (Lockean) theory of essence helps to make sense of group membership because it combines a conventional account of groups with a realist commitment to there being something responsible for the appearance of regularities in the world. The claim that natural kind membership is a matter of similarity relationships manages to avoid metaphysical, universal property-based essentialism and, at the same time, points to interested generative mechanisms underlying the appearance of the regularities that make sense of kind membership. Finally, I suggest that the concepts `real essence' and `internal constitution' offer a new way to conceive `sex' and `gender', and that Adorno's notion of non-identity is a way to think group membership non-instrumentally.Contemporary Political Theory (2006) 5, 238-258. doi:10.1057/palgrave.cpt.9300258

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, January 8, 2007 4:42 PM
To: Laurel Goldstein <goldstel@email.unc.edu>; Given, Emily <given@email.unc.edu>
Subject: PHIL 275
Attach: PHIL 275-46 Feminism.doc; Lecture 1-Intro.doc

Hi Laurel and Emily,
I may have already sent you a partial syllabus, but I am attaching one to this email, and also what I have prepared for the first day of class. Please give me your office numbers, phone, and office hours to add to the syllabus.

Thanks,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, January 10, 2007 9:53 AM
To: gilbert@wjh.harvard.edu
Cc: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>; Gilbert, Lawrence Irwin <LGilbert@bio.unc.edu>; Jesse Prinz <jesse@subcortex.com>; Knobe, Joshua M <knobe@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Parr Center Event: Happiness

Dear Daniel,
We are all looking forward to your visit to UNC on February 20-21st. We will be sending you a final itinerary once all the details are finalized, but here are the present details:

*TUESDAY FEBRUARY 20TH *
Arrive in Chapel Hill
Depending on time of arrival, lunch with students &/or faculty.
3:30-4:45 Meet with BIOLOGY 501 -- your father's class
5-7 Dinner
7:30 Public Lecture followed by a reception and book signing.
Audience: students, faculty, staff, community

WEDNESDAY FEBRUARY 21
Breakfast TBA
Lunch TBA with students and faculty

4-6:30 Meet with PHIL KENAN SEMINAR Caldwell 213
Instructors: Jesse Prinz & Joshua Knobe
Papers will be assigned for discussion
Presently there are philosophy graduate students in the class.
6:30- Dinner with seminar participants

[Jesse Prinz will be in touch with you to discuss further details of the seminar. I have copied him as well as Josh on this email.]

Other details: do you need a hotel room? Do you want us to make the flight arrangements? If so, please let Carlo know.

I hope this helps. I look forward to your visit.

Regards,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, January 10, 2007 1:19 PM
To: Gorman, Jacquelene W <jackie@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: [Fwd: PEACE STUDIES CANDIDATE: AMY SMITHSON]

Hi Jackie,
I am leaving town this afternoon and will be out all day tomorrow.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Jackie Gorman wrote:
>
>
> -------- Original Message --------
> Subject: PEACE STUDIES CANDIDATE: AMY SMITHSON
> Date: Wed, 10 Jan 2007 09:53:21 -0500
> From: woytowic@email.unc.edu <woytowic@email.unc.edu>
> To: Donald Hornstein <dhornste@email.unc.edu>, Jonathan Howes
> <Jonathan@athena.dev.unc.edu>, James Johnson <jim_johnson@unc.edu>,
> John Kasarda <john_kasarda@unc.edu>, Dennis Orthner
> <orthner@email.unc.edu>, Joel Schwartz - 3265
> <jjschwar@email.unc.edu>, Mike Munger <munger@duke.edu>, John Hardin > <jhardin@nccommerce.com>, David Schanzer <schanzer@duke.edu>, > Jennifer Bremer <jbremer@kenan.org>, Jackie Gorman <jackie@unc.edu>
> CC: Doug Crawford-Brown <Douglas_Crawford-Brown@unc.edu>, David Dill > <ddill@email.unc.edu>, Michael Luger <mluger@email.unc.edu>, Dale > Whittington <Dale_Whittington@unc.edu>, Sudhanshu Handa > <shanda@email.unc.edu>, Hodding Carter <hoddingcarter@unc.edu>,
> Richard Andrews <pete_andrews@unc.edu>, Douglas Lauen > <dlauen@email.unc.edu>, Daniel Gitterman <danielg@email.unc.edu>,
> Krista M Perreira <krista_perreira@unc.edu>, PUBLIC POLICY PH D
> <pupa-phd@listserv.unc.edu>, Arne Kalleberg <flewis@email.unc.edu>,
> Mark Crescenzi <crescenz@email.unc.edu>, Rudy Juliano > <rudy_juliano@med.unc.edu>, Joseph Glathaar <jtg@email.unc.edu>,
> David Schanzer <schanzer@duke.edu>, Richard Kohn <rhkohn@unc.edu>,
> Jim Porto <jim_porto@unc.edu>, Anna Waller > <anna_waller@med.unc.edu>, Robert Jenkins <rjenkins@email.unc.edu>
>
> Good Morning,
> I have attached Amy Smithson's schedule and CV for your information.
> She will be arriving this evening and residing at the Marriott Courtyard > out at the Friday Center. Amy's schedule time is set up for Thursday > and Friday but as she will be here until Sunday she has let me know that > she would be happy to meet over the weekend. If anyone is so inclined, > please get in touch with me or Dan Gitterman.
> Amy's seminar is scheduled for Thursday, January 11 from 4 - 5:30 pm at
> New East 101.
> Have a good day, everyone!
> Mary
>

From: nobody@notify.unc.edu on behalf of Andrews, Susan B. </O=UNC EXCHANGE/OU=EXCHANGE ADMINISTRATIVE GROUP (FYDIBOHF23SPDLT)/CN=RECIPIENTS/CN=ANDRESUS>

Sent: Wednesday, January 10, 2007 12:30 AM

To: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>

Subject: INFORMATIONAL: 2007 Summer Programs for Youth

In order for the Office of the Executive Vice Chancellor and Provost to respond to an annual request from 12th District Congressman Melvin Watt, I write to ask that you submit information regarding any program for youth (Kid's Camp through grade 12) that is being sponsored by your unit/department for Summer 2007. Please send this information to Susan Andrews, CB 3000 or email to Susan_Andrews@unc.edu no later than Monday, February 26. Please include the name of the program, targeted age group, any eligibility requirements, dates the program will be offered, a brief program description, and the name, address, phone number and email for the primary contact person. This information should also be available on your department's website. If you have questions, please feel free to contact me directly at 962-2198. Thank you.

This email is sponsored by: Office of the Executive Vice Chancellor and Provost

==========

"INFORMATIONAL:" email will only be sent to those who have indicated that they do want to receive mass email. To set your informational mass email preference, logon to the on-line directory web site at https://dir.unc.edu/dir/update.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, January 15, 2007 4:06 PM
To: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: bbbal
Attach: Keys to game-UCONN.doc; GAME NOTES-UCONN.doc

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

PREGAME NOTES: KEYS—UCONN

Thanks Taylor.

The Heels looked impressive in the second half against Clemson; their first half was not so spectacular as the Tigers held with them, which was something of a surprise. But tonight they have put together some pretty impressive basketball for 40 minutes. UCONN is a great team, with an outstanding coach. While they are winning by nearly a 41.2 point margin, we aren't likely to see this tonight. Their defense must be smothering, especially on Renee Montgomery. She's a sophomore but an experienced one. The tenacious and trapping defense must not let UCONN get set in their offense. I'm sure UCONN has viewed every film of the Heels games so they will be ready for this kind of tenacious and trapping defense. UCONN is not a team that will be intimidated.

Of course the way the Heels play defense and offense they get tired, so you need substitutions, which is why when you look at the combined team statistics there are nine players averaging double digit playing time. This is impressive and shows the depth of this team. Something else which will be a factor in tonight's game is the Tar Heels goal of possessions per game. As I've said at each game the Tar Heel's goal is 110 possessions per game—they are averaging about 104 now. They will continue to work hard for possessions in tonight's game, but unlikely they'll get as many as we've seen in the last 2 games. You recall against Virginia, the Heels had 92 shot attempts, and 125 possessions!!! Clemson: 62 shot attempts and 108 possessions.

And though the Heels are averaging 20 turnovers a game, the ball handling by nearly everyone on the team is very good. UCONN will go right after the Heels from the outset; they've got the talent to press, intimidate, and they have a great 3-point shooter in Mel Thomas. The one thing is that they are a young team with no seniors. This may be their weak link.

My Keys for tonight's game: UCONN

UCONN is as good as any team we'll see. They have an athletic, talented team, and National Championship coach, but they don't quite have what it takes to beat the Heels. So the Heels must be mentally focused. They must come out ready to play Carolina basketball to be successful. That means:

1. They must use their talent and quickness to push the ball up court and push up the tempo. They can't be passively pass the ball, but must ATTACK UCONN, especially pressing their point guard, Renee Montgomery. The Heels must come out of the blocks fast like they did against Virginia, not sluggish as they did in Clemson. Take advantage of the home crowd and get them loud and into it early.
2. Look to get the ball inside. UCONN will play a similar style of play as Carolina, while they do have a very good post player in 6'4" Tina Charles, I don't think as a freshman she can stop the inside play of Erlana Larkins or Latoya Pringle.
3. UCONN has a great 3-point shooter in Mel Thomas. They must know where she is at all times. And I've already mentioned Tina Charles—she can make things happen.

NO.	NAME	YR.	POSITION	HT	HOMETOWN/HIGH SCHOOL
2	Tahirah Williams	So.	G	6-0	Montclair, N.J. (Immaculate Heart Academy)
11	Ketia Swanier	Jr.	G	5-7	Columbus, Ga. (Columbus)
13	Jacquie Fernandes	Fr.	G	5-9	Pawcatuck, Conn. (Stonington)
14	Meghan Gardler	Fr.	F	6-0	Springfield, Pa. (Cardinal O'Hara)
20	Renee Montgomery	So.	G	5-7	St. Albans, W. Va. (South Charleston)
24	Charde Houston	Jr.	F	6-1	San Diego, Calif. (San Diego)
25	Mel Thomas	Jr.	G	5-9	Cincinnati, Ohio (Mount Notre Dame)
31	Tina Charles	Fr.	C	6-4	Jamaica, N.Y. (Christ the King)
32	Kalana Greene	So.	G	5-10	Saint Stephens, S.C. (Timberland)
41	Kaili McLaren	Fr.	F	6-2	Washington D.C. (Our Lady of Good Counsel)
44	Brittany Hunter	Jr.	C/F	6-3	Columbus, Ohio (Brookhaven)
51	Cassie Kerns	So.	C/F	6-3	Valparaiso, Ind. (Valparaiso)

2006-07 Women's Basketball Coaching Staff

Head Coach: Geno Auriemma 22nd season (West Chester '81)

Associate Head Coach: Chris Dailey 22nd season (Rutgers '82)

Assistant Coach: Tonya Cardoza 13th season (Virginia '91)

Assistant Coach: Jamelle Elliott 10th season (Connecticut '96)

Director of Basketball Operations: Jack Eisenmann 6th season (Saint Mary's University '80)

GAME NOTES: UCONN—January 15, 2007

POSSESSIONS PER GAME:

Goal is 110 possessions per game; 108 in last game
After 14 games we are averaging about 103 per game
Assess Possessions: FG attempts, trips to the foul line; TO's; Jump ball; offensive rebounds
Second chance points: points off offensive rebounds

SCORING

Last year the team that led in scoring had 86 points per game; Carolina was 3rd with 82.2
This year the Heels are averaging 91.1 PPG—having scored 1731 points in 19 games. So they are on still target for keeping in the top ten of that category. Opponents are averaging 49.9 points per game. That's an impressive 41.2 point spread.
One way to keep this is to keep a good ratio of outside to inside shots--the Heels are doing very well.
Against Clemson the Heels had ___ shots outside the paint; ___ passes into to the post and ___ drives where they scored or got fouled on ____ of _____..

FAST BREAK POINTS: UNC also scores on their fast break;not many teams can run with the Heels. Against Clemson the Heels had only 6 fast break points, no where near what they'd like, especially as they like to create their offense off their defense. However they did have 26 points off Clemson's 22 turnovers.

FIELD GOALS: in the combined games the Heels are 651 out of 1344 attempts for an average of approx 48.4%
They've held their opponents to a combined 354 our of 1127 for an average approximately 31%
In the Clemson game UNC had 62 shot attempts scoring 40 points in the paint.

THREE POINT SHOTS: Last year the Heels led the country in 3-point shooting making an average of 8.5 per game; this year in our combined games we are slightly off the pace with 7.2. They are 136-386 in the 19 games. They were 8-20 against Clemson, with McCants making 3-4 & Latta 3-6.

FREE THROWS: Doing a bit better in that category; they are now averaging 70%, which is respectable, but not great. This is crucial since the Heels play such a quick aggressive game, they get many more attempts than their opponents. So far the Heels have had 418 attempts making 293 of them.
Latta: 82%; Larkins: 76.6%; McCants: 76%; Little:62

ASSISTS: So far this year the Heels have combined for 385, averaging 20.3 a game. In the Clemson game the Heels had 22. Ivory Latta has 97 so far for the year, she had 6 in the Clemson game, to go along with her 23 points.

TURNOVERS: The assist/turnover ratio is one we always look at, and this year the Heels are not where they would like it to be, but in the last few games have improved significantly in this category. They have accounted for 340 turnovers, which is 20 a game. I know they'd like to see this lower. On the other hand their opponents are averaging nearly 30 a game. When you play the kind of quick aggressive offense there are bound to be turnovers, and the coaches don't get upset about turnovers as a result of aggressive play; where they get upset is when the turnovers result in soft-lazy passes, which happens when a player gets tired; or guard to guard passes that get picked off. But the assist/turnover ratio is still one the coaches are not pleased with. Against Clemson they had 25!

STEALS: Two years ago UNC led the nation in steals; last year they were second, so this year they'd like to lead in that category. They already have 325 in the 19 games, averaging 17.1 per game. In the Clemson game they had only 10. Their quick, aggressive play, and their famous tenacious press accounts for this. Camille Little leads the team with 55, Rashanda McCants =48; Erlana Larkins =45; Alex Miller=41.

BLOCKS: One strong area of the Heels—1148 so far in the 19 games; averaging 7.8. per game. The Heels leading shot blocker is LaToya Pringle with 59; Breland has 34..

REBOUNDING: Another strength of the Heels—averaging 49.3 per game; their opponents are averaging 33.7 per game. Of the 937 rebounds, 372 have been offensive boards. This is something Carolina likes to focus on, in the Clemson game the Heels had only 16 offensive boards out of a total of 50 boards, scoring 22 points off those offensive rebounds. Carolina depends on second chance points.
Larkins: 166=Off=86;Def=80. Pringle 150-57Off; 93 Def.

MINUTES PLAYED: 9 players are still averaging double-digit playing time; with Ivory Latta averaging 28; Camille Little-25.7; Erlana Larkins -23.9; Alex Miller-22; Latoya Pringle=21.8

OTHER POINTS OF INTEREST:

OFFENSE: No one pass and shoot. Carolina likes to have at le one of those going down into the post, but not just to pass it around the horn, but to make effective use of passes to disrupt the defense. This is usually pretty easy when a team plays Erlana one on one. In a team plays zone, then the outside shooting becomes important as it requires more movement away from the middle, freeing up Erlana or whoever is in the post to get open. If the outside shooting isn't going well, then the Heels will have to depend on their transition game and offensive rebounding to get second chance shots. Some teams have tried to slow down the Heels by playing zone, but with little success. Quick sharp passing is essential—passes into the post, drives, and outside shooting beats the press. The post players must play behind the zone, making it easier for them to get open to receive the passes.

Carolina attacks both on offense and defense, and their talent and quickness allow them more options than their opponents can handle.
Teams have been trying to run with the Heels; few have been playing zone.

DEFENSE: They are famous for their press, always attacking the ball. So each team that plays the Tar Heels has to make serious adjustments to handle the Heels defense. The main thing this press does is it doesn't allow the opposing team to set up their offense, and for a team that depends on their half-court offense, this is crucial.

For the Heels they like to double down in the post—at least to give that look to their opponents.

Though the Heels mainly play an aggressive one-on-one style defense, they will use zone occasionally. Sometimes that is used to give a different look or just to change the tempo of the game. In doing so you give up a bit in rebounding because no one is designated for rebounding, but it puts you in better position for fast break.

Opponents defend in various ways: trying to play with the Heels; or adjust by trying to slow the game down, being content with milking the ball to keep possessions down as well. Good traps come from being in an athletic stance and angling the traps

Added note: hand checking. If you are defending the ball handler, the referees will call a foul only if you have 2 hands on the player. That's an automatic foul. However, if you use the "hot stove touch foul" you will not get the call. That means you touch the ball handler with one hand and immediately take your hand off—like touching a hot stove!

NO.	NAME	YR.	POSITION	HT	HOMETOWN/HIGH SCHOOL
2	Tahirah Williams	So.	G	6-0	Montclair, N.J. (Immaculate Heart Academy)
11	Ketia Swanier	Jr.	G	5-7	Columbus, Ga. (Columbus)
13	Jacquie Fernandes	Fr.	G	5-9	Pawcatuck, Conn. (Stonington)
14	Meghan Gardler	Fr.	F	6-0	Springfield, Pa. (Cardinal O'Hara)
20	Renee Montgomery	So.	G	5-7	St. Albans, W. Va. (South Charleston)
24	Charde Houston	Jr.	F	6-1	San Diego, Calif. (San Diego)
25	Mel Thomas	Jr.	G	5-9	Cincinnati, Ohio (Mount Notre Dame)
31	Tina Charles	Fr.	C	6-4	Jamaica, N.Y. (Christ the King)
32	Kalana Greene	So.	G	5-10	Saint Stephens, S.C. (Timberland)
41	Kaili McLaren	Fr.	F	6-2	Washington D.C. (Our Lady of Good Counsel)
44	Brittany Hunter	Jr.	C/F	6-3	Columbus, Ohio (Brookhaven)
51	Cassie Kerns	So.	C/F	6-3	Valparaiso, Ind. (Valparaiso)

2006-07 Women's Basketball Coaching Staff

Head Coach: Geno Auriemma 22nd season (West Chester '81)

Associate Head Coach: Chris Dailey 22nd season (Rutgers '82)

Assistant Coach: Tonya Cardoza 13th season (Virginia '91)

Assistant Coach: Jamelle Elliott 10th season (Connecticut '96)

Director of Basketball Operations: Jack Eisenmann 6th season (Saint Mary's University '80)

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, January 16, 2007 4:04 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: International criminal court webpage

This looks good. We might send the link to Donna to have her look at it as well.-- and also to Claire who always has good suggestions.
Thanks,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Carlo Robustelli wrote:
> http://parrcenter.unc.edu/events/seminars/internationalcriminalcourt/
>
> What do you think? Any suggestions?
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, January 16, 2007 8:23 PM
To: Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>
Subject: signature
Attach: Re phil 275 course planning.msg

I'm forwarding you this email, not for the PHIL 275 content, but to show you the results of changing the signature as you suggested!!! :)
thanks,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, January 18, 2007 9:56 AM
To: Roberts, John Thomas <jtrosap@email.unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: Call for Papers]
Attach: Call for Papers.msg

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, January 18, 2007 3:15 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: revised bioethics invite Attach: Bioethics invite.doc

Take a look at it.

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Carlo Robustelli wrote:
> Please see attachment
>

The University
of North Carolina
at Chapel Hill
Caldwell Hall, CB# 3125
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

We invite you to participate in our 2007 Ethics in the Professions Workshop

Thursday, February 15th, 2007
4:00-8:00 pm

Respect for Patient Autonomy

Featuring Dr. Margaret Little of Georgetown University. Dr. Little will lead a 'case-based' workshop for Nursing, Allied Health, and Medical professionals.

Margaret Little is an Associate Professor in Georgetown's Philosophy Department and a Senior Research Scholar at Georgetown's Kennedy Institute of Ethics, a think-tank that specializes in bioethics. Her background is in analytic philosophy and feminist theory.

The location of this workshop is the boardroom on the second floor of the SunTrust Meadowmont Bank. Directions to the facility will be emailed to you when you register. A light supper will be provided and there is no cost for the program. However, registration is required before 5:00 pm on February 9, 2007.

Please visit the Workshop's webpage to find additional information: http://parrcenter.unc.edu/events/seminars/bioethicsworkshop/

To register or if you have any questions, please contactl Lance Westerlund at lance@unc.edu.

We hope you will take advantage of this unique opportunity to join us for this provocative and timely workshop.

This workshop is sponsored by the Parr Center for Ethics, the Department of Social Medicine, UNC Hospital Ethics Committee and the Department of Philosophy at UNC Chapel Hill.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, January 19, 2007 6:29 PM
To: Barksdale, Debra J <djbarksdale@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Coach of the Game

Hi Debra,
Thanks for your email. All the games are filled for this year, but I will keep this email on file, and also you should email me next October to remind me.
Thanks,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Debra J Barksdale wrote:
> Hi Dr. Boxill, I was give your name by my friend and colleague Marcia > Van Riper. I would very much like to be coach of the game some day. My > 15 year old daughter and I are great fans of the Carolina Women. So > much so that we _purchased_ season tickets instead of using the paper > card and just getting the tickets for the 3 restricted games. My > daughter has attend the Basketball camp 3 of the last 4 years. We have > even attended scrimmage games.
>
> So if you ever need a coach of the game, I would be honored. See you > Sunday at 2.
>
> Thank You
> Debra J. Barksdale

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Sunday, January 21, 2007 5:14 PM
To: Hill, Thomas E Jr <thill@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Ethics Bowl course
Attach: PHIL 560 Ethics Bowl.doc

Hi Tom,
Thanks for your suggestions. I wish I would have thought to run this by you before I submitted it, but I think when I finally did the syllabus you were in California. But I can submit a revised syllabus very easily.

Let me know.
thanks again,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

PHIL 560 ETHICS BOWL Instructor: Jan Boxill

The Ethics Bowl provides students with a unique opportunity to practice applying the moral theories and argumentation principles that they learn in their ethics classes. They receive about 15 case studies in advance involving ethical issues in a number of practical contexts, including engineering, law, medicine, personal relationships, school and politics, both nationally and internationally. During the course the students will prepare these cases. Questions may concern ethical problems on wide ranging topics, such as the classroom (e.g. cheating or plagiarism), personal relationships (e.g. dating or friendship), professional ethics (e.g. engineering, law, medicine), or social and political ethics (e.g. free speech, gun control, etc.) or global issues (e.g. the impact of globalization, global warming, the environment). Preparing responses to these questions involves a great deal of research, writing and oral presentation. The team sent to the Ethics Bowl competition will be selected from those registered in the course. Before the actual competition, a mock Ethics Bowl will be presented to the public and also to at least one local high school as part of the Philosophy Department's outreach program.

During a round, each team takes turns presenting its position on a case and critiquing another team's position on a different case. Teams must answer questions about their positions from a panel of judges. Judges assign scores based on logical consistency, clarity, focus and thoroughness. The presentations are evaluated on the following criteria:

Clarity and Intelligibility: Have you stated and defended your position in a way that is logically consistent and a reader/lister can clearly understand your line of reasoning?

Focus on Ethically Relevant Factors: Has you identified and discussed the ethically relevant factors?

Avoidance of Ethical Irrelevance: Has you stayed on track by avoiding preoccupation with issues that are not ethically relevant, or as only having minor ethical relevance, in connection with a case?

Deliberative Thoughtfulness: Does your presentation of its position on a question indicate both awareness and thoughtful consideration of different viewpoints, including especially those that could loom large in the reasoning of individuals who might disagree with the team's position?

The Intercollegiate Ethics Bowl (IEB) combines the excitement and fun of a competitive tournament with a valuable educational experience for undergraduate students.

The regional competition takes place in November and national in March. The course would be offered in the Fall to prepare students for the regional competition. The actual cases are sent out in mid September, so before that the students will look at previous year's cases and read material appropriate to cases in general, including ethical theory.

READINGS to be taken from the following:

Elements of Moral Philosophy, James Rachels

Being Good, Simon Blackburn

On Liberty, John Stuart Mill

Social Ethics: Morality and Social Policy, Thomas Mappes & Jane Zembaty, editors.

Other readings will be assigned as appropriate.

REQUIREMENTS:

Each student will prepare a minimum of two cases, which involves:

A 12-15 page paper on each

An eight (8) minute oral presentation for each case based on the paper.

A 5-7 minute rebuttal.anticipating questions and objections.

Answer questions posed by the students in class.

Final exam—in class

GRADE

The final grade will be assessed as follows:

Papers:	each=15%	30%
Presentation	each=15%	30%
Class participation:		20%
Final Exam:		20%

The course will be limited to 15 students per term.

Sample Cases:

Case #1

Dr. B., a Professor of Psychology at a large research institution, Ohio State University (OSU), has a long distinguished record of working with chimpanzees. In the 1970s, she taught chimps to communicate, first by using American Sign Language and later using graphic symbols. In the last decade, under her direction, two young chimps, Keeli and Ivy, have learned to count and to recognize simple written words. Another chimp, Bobby, has shown an uncanny ability to learn number sequences and even to fill in missing numbers in a sequence. She has learned that chimps can do simple arithmetic, behave similarly to preschoolers, and (along with humans) have the ability to perceive the knowledge state of a peer.

Dr. B., who has dedicated her entire professional life to the study of cognition in chimpanzees, has won international acclaim for her work and was named one of the top 50 women researchers in the nation by Discover Magazine in 2002. Her chimps have been featured on Discovery Channel. However, as funding to support the research center has been hard to come by in the last five years, the university decided to close the research center and send the chimps away. OSU abruptly seized the professor's laboratory on February 28, 2006, changed all the locks, and hired a truck to send all 12 primates (nine chimps and three monkeys) to Primarily Primates, a controversial Texas sanctuary. The university gave the sanctuary a $324,000 trust fund for the animal's care.

Dr. B. vigorously protested the decision. When a restraining order she filed failed to prevent the university from implementing its decision, Dr. B. chained herself to the center's gate to prevent the transport trucks from leaving. Her efforts were unsuccessful and one of the chimps, 25-year old Kermit, died during the 38-hour transport in early March. Bobby was found dead in his enclosure on April 20. One of the monkeys escaped and was never recovered. Dr. B sued OSU to win custody of the remaining chimps. PETA also joined the suit on behalf of the remaining seven chimps and two monkeys and in June a Texas judge ordered that an independent trustee should oversee the $324,000 funding to ensure that it be used to house and benefit the remaining OSU primates.

Case #2

Wisconsin State Representative Dan LeMahieu (R-Oostburg) was outraged when the University of Wisconsin-Madison's University Health Services (UHS) featured ads in the two student newspapers suggesting that students consider receiving prescriptions for emergency contraception (EC) prior to leaving for spring break. UHS services are available to any student at the UW-Madison, and as such they offer health expertise to students in the areas of medical treatment for illnesses and injuries, counseling for stress reduction, smoking cessation, nutrition, dermatology, sports medicine, as well as confidential testing and treatment of sexually transmitted diseases (STDs). Although a part of the state-funded University of Wisconsin System, the ads were paid for using student segregated fees which are not part of taxpayer dollars or academic tuition funds.

Following the publication of the ads, which were part of a series also advising students to protect themselves from sun exposure and limit their intake of alcohol, Representative LeMahieu initiated drafting legislation to ban any university health center in Wisconsin from advertising or distributing the morning-after pill (EC). LeMahieu contends, "I think it's offensive that the university is trying to tell young women to be prepared and to plan ahead so they can have promiscuous activities on spring break. I don't think that it's the role of the university to promote that type of activity, and I believe that's what their ad is asking young people to do." LeMahieu also added that the UW should be "made aware" that many people who are paying state taxes do not appreciate the offensive advertisements.

On June 16, 2005, Wisconsin's State Assembly voted 49-41 in favor of a bill prohibiting University of Wisconsin System health centers from advertising, prescribing or dispensing emergency contraception, making it the first state in the country to move towards banning EC on all state college campuses.

Case #3

Near the end of its fall season, a top executive from the popular reality television competition, Idol Starz, appeared on the Today Show and revealed that the program's contestants either advanced or were cut based on producers' decisions rather than being selected through the program's public text-messaging voting system. The executive went on to state that the show's winners and losers were selected by producers on a round-by-round basis in the hopes that certain "controversial" or "questionable" choices would positively influence ratings, increase fervor for underdog candidates, and create a more developed fan-base which would return to view the show during both current and future seasons.

Given the show's popularity and viewers' commitment to their favorite contestants, the revelation led to a large public outcry condemning the show for dishonesty and false advertising. Many claimed to have been cheated and explained that the show had a responsibility to adhere to the public's decisions about which candidates they preferred. Given special attention during this debate was the show's slogan: "You vote. You decide. Who should be the next Idol Star?"

During ensuing interviews, the show's producers explained that their decisions were based on the fact that they were in the entertainment business and that certain unpredictable events helped to keep the audience invested in the show and provided increased entertainment value. They also argued that, more often that not, their decisions about who should advance or win were in line with the public's desires. When questioned about the program's slogan, one producer was quoted as saying, "Look at it carefully. There is a difference between telling someone to vote and decide who should be the next Idol Star and telling them that their votes will decide the next Idol Star."

Case #4

In a recent case, Florida authorities declined to file charges against a Miami Herald columnist for surreptitiously recording a phone call from a city commissioner who later committed suicide in the newspaper's lobby. Authorities cited the unusual circumstances that led to the taping as the basis for not filing charges against the columnist. These circumstances were not enough for the Miami Herald, who took immediate action to fire the columnist for violating a company policy that prohibited the taping of sources and interviewees without the subject's consent.

State laws related to the recording of phone calls and the courts interpretation of these laws vary widely in the United States. Many of these laws are intentionally written with ambiguous terms and interpretation is typically required on a case by case basis.

The firing of this popular columnist caused much protest around the world. Many members of the Herald staff signed a petition requesting the decision to fire the columnist be rescinded. The columnist was friends with the city commissioner, and the commissioner provided regular sources for stories to the columnist.

According to the columnist, the commissioner was despondent over public allegations about his sex life and the tone of his voice on the phone conversation was so alarming that the columnist impulsively decided to record the conversation. The tape records the columnist's attempts to calm the commissioner. Throughout their 20-minute conversation, the columnist attempted to steer the conversation to less volatile subjects in the hopes of lifting the commissioner's spirits. But the call ended with the commissioner still despondent. A few minutes later, the commissioner shot himself.

Following the suicide, the columnist told editors of the Miami Herald that he had been interviewing the commissioner earlier in the day and had recorded part of the conversation without the commissioner's consent.

After being fired, the columnist was quoted as saying "In a tense situation I made a mistake. The Miami Herald executives only learned about it because I came to them and admitted it. I told them I was willing to accept a suspension and apologize both to the newsroom and our readers. Unfortunately, the Herald decided on the death penalty instead."

The Miami Herald editors have taken the position that there must be an absolute prohibition of the paper's reporters taping conversations without a party's consent, and not just because it is against the law in Florida, as it is in many states. An executive of the Herald has stated that the policy is necessary to protect the paper's integrity, as well as to foster trust from news sources.

Journalists at the Miami Herald have pointed out that at least one other reporter surreptitiously taped an interview, but was not fired. The journalists also have also stated that there is no written policy on taping conversations and that any verbal policy on expectations of reporters is unclear. The Miami Herald responded to the alleged case of a previous surreptitious taping by saying "we understand this happened 18 years ago". They went onto state that the recent decision to fire the columnist was clearly guided by the environment in which journalists operate today; which is much more constrained in terms of the latitude given for violation of law and policy.

Case #5

Beginning in 2005, protests at funerals for military personnel killed in Iraq have been increasing – and have received much media attention. In particular, members of the Westboro Baptist Church, in Topeka, Kansas, have been especially visible and vocal at many of these military funerals. Reverend Fred Phelps and his protesters claim that U.S. military deaths in Iraq are because America tolerates homosexuals and that they are a sign of divine punishment for America's tolerance of homosexuality. For over a year now, members of this anti-gay church have been crisscrossing the United States, holding more than one hundred protests outside the funerals of U.S. soldiers killed in Iraq.

They wave placards with such expressions as: "You're Going to Hell," "Fag Vets, God Hates You," and "Thank God for IEDs" (the improvised explosive devices responsible for killing many military personnel in Iraq). Phelps contends that all American soldiers are guilty by association – because they are fighting in the service of the U.S. government.

By Spring, 2006, twenty-eight states and Congress were rushing to pass laws to restrict protests outside military funerals. On May 17, 2006, Illinois Governor Rod Blagojevich signed a state law – "Let Them Rest in Peace Act" – that prohibits disruptive and inflammatory protesting 30 minutes before a funeral, during the service, and 30 minutes after a funeral while remaining 200 feet from the funeral site. This new Illinois law drew immediate scorn from Shirley Phelps-Roper, attorney for the Westboro Baptist Church: "The law is impotent. You've done nothing to change that God is killing your children and sending them home in body bags. Keep your big, fat snout out of our religion."

In the U.S. Congress, Representative Mike Rogers (R-Mich.) sponsored a House bill to address this matter. He said that he took up the issue after attending a military funeral in his home state, where mourners were greeted by "chants and taunting and some of the most vile things I have ever heard. Families deserve the time to bury their American heroes with dignity and in peace." On May 24, 2006, Congress passed legislation that would bar demonstrators from disrupting military funerals at national cemeteries.

The "Respect for America's Fallen Heroes Act" prohibits protests within 300 feet of the entrance of a national cemetery and within 150 feet of a road into the cemetery from 60 minutes before to 60 minutes after a funeral. Those violating the act would face up to a $100,000 fine and up to a year in prison. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said that this act "will protect the sanctity of all 122 of our national cemeteries as shrines to their gallant dead. It's a sad but necessary measure to protect what should be recognized by all reasonable people as a solemn, private and deeply sacred occasion."

In response to this federal legislation, Phelps has said that Congress was "blatantly violating the First Amendment rights to free speech" in passing the bill. He said that he will continue to demonstrate but would abide by the restrictions. Constitutional experts are warning that protest restrictions – such as those passed in Illinois and in Congress – appear overly broad and are likely to be overturned if challenged in court. Eugene Volokh, a law professor at the University of California-Los Angeles and an authority on the First Amendment, said: "You can't treat speech as a breach of peace simply because it offends people. These protests are tremendously offensive and hard to ignore. But ignoring them or counter-protesting is unfortunately the only remedy the 1st Amendment allows." And, the American Civil Liberties Union has filed a lawsuit against a new Kentucky law, saying that it goes too far in limiting freedom of speech and expression. Additional lawsuits are expected to be filed.

U.S military veterans find Phelps' beliefs and actions particularly abhorrent, and in November, 2005, veterans' motorcycle groups began showing up at military funerals to oppose the protesters and to show support for the families of the deceased soldiers. Calling themselves the Patriot Guard Riders, these motorcycle groups have organized hundreds of counter-protesters to wave American flags and stand silently in front of the Westboro picketers, to pay respects to the fallen soldier, and to protect the soldier's family from disruptions.

Case #6

Alejandro Toledo, President of Peru, has launched a public campaign demanding that Yale University return to Peru Incan artifacts excavated at Machu Picchu in 1912. Yale professor Hiram Bingham III, guided by a native Peruvian, came upon the Incan city of Machu Picchu in 1911. Bingham secured backing from the National Geographic Society and support from Peru's government for archeological excavations at Machu Picchu in 1912 and again in 1914-15.

In October 1912, Bingham gained the Peruvian government's permission to bring to Yale for research the contents of 170 tombs in Machu Picchu. The decree allowed that Peru reserve the right to ask for the return of the objects.

By 1916, Peru, suspecting Bingham of secretly taking Incan gold, ended Bingham's work at Machu Picchu. The items taken to Yale from the 1914-15 excavations were loaned for only 18 months. Yale has refused several Peruvian requests for return of the artifacts.

Today, Yale claims that they have complied with the 1912 and the 1916 agreements, returning the objects to Peru during the 1920's. Yale sees no similar responsibility to return the items taken from earlier work. National Geographic Society records show that about half of the items were returned to Peru, with no mention of the remaining artifacts.

Luis Guillermo Lumbreras, the director of Peru's National Institute of Culture in Lima, claims that Yale has had 90 years to complete research on the objects, and now Peru wants the items returned. Peru elected its first indigenous president–Alejandro Toledo, who honored the nation's Incan heritage by holding part of his inauguration ceremony at Machu Picchu in 2001. In part due to his influence, Peru wants possession of the artifacts, which have formed the core of Yale's impressive, scholarly exhibition: Unveiling the Mystery of the Incas. After traveling to six cities and attracting over a million visitors, the exhibit now resides at Yale's Peabody Museum of Natural History in Connecticut.

The recent research of Yale professors Lucy Salazar and her husband Richard L. Burger, including extensive scientific analysis of burials, has provided the most reasonable explanation for the existence of Machu Picchu. Rather than supporting the earlier ideas of the city as a center for religious activity including the sacrifice of virgins, the professors' research has suggested that the city served as a simple country retreat from the Inca capital of Cuzco.

The number and kinds of artifacts taken to Yale from Machu Picchu is in dispute. Yale has offered to return some of the pieces to Peru, if Peru allows it to keep others at the Peabody Museum of Natural History, where Machu Picchu is the prize exhibit.

Case #7

In October of 2002, after the overdose of one of its workers, management at a Weyerhaeuser, a multinational corporation in the pulp and paper industry located in Valliant, Oklahoma, became concerned that employees were not following drug and safety regulations in its parking lot. Management decided to have the parking lot searched with gun and drug sniffing dogs. While the dogs found no drugs, they did find firearms in twelve vehicles, including shotguns and automatic weapons. The owners of these vehicles, including a 23-year veteran shift manager, were fired in the next two days.

Weyerhaeuser and many other businesses have had long standing bans on firearms brought into the plant in order to protect workers and prevent workplace violence. In 2002, Weyerhaeuser extended this ban to the parking lot. Many workers claim they were not told of the extension of the ban, though management claims they informed workers. Some of the fired workers have filed suits claiming they were not informed. The initial suit was thrown out, but the decision is being appealed.

Since this and other incidents, many states -- beginning with Oklahoma -- have enacted laws protecting workers who want to keep firearms in their cars. The latest state to consider such a law is Florida, home to Walt Disney World, which does not allow any of its 50,000+ employees to bring guns onto company property.

A number of corporations have joined federal lawsuits against these new state laws. These companies include ConocoPhillips (petroleum), Halliburton (energy), and the Nordam Group (aircraft manufacture). They state that they cannot provide a safe and secure workplace without the ban on guns in the parking lot, and they see state laws allowing guns as infringing on the right of private property owners to decide what is and is not allowed on their property. Even aside from their property rights, companies claim that the laws would disregard public safety. The Bureau of Labor Statistics Census of Fatal Occupational Injuries states that in 2004, there were 551 workplace homicides out of 5703 workplace fatalities. A study at the University of North Carolina claims that such killings are five times more likely to occur at workplaces that allow guns compared to those who do not.

The National Rifle Association (NRA) has been the primary champion of laws that allow workers to have guns in cars in company parking lots. The NRA claims that prohibiting lawful gun owners to keep guns in their car dramatically diminishes their right to own firearms and defend themselves. All 50 states allow the transportation of firearms for lawful purposes. The laws also restrict workers who may want to hunt or target shoot after work from engaging in these lawful activities. They also claim that one's car should enjoy the same protections that one's home enjoys with regards to being able to keep lawful weapons and immunity to unlawful searches.

The NRA claims that the state laws already have commonsense provisions in them that prevent abuse. For instance, anyone wanting to transport a firearm and park their car in a company lot must keep the automobile locked, and at no time is it permissible to take the firearm out of the car on company property. Against the property rights claims of business owners, the NRA claims that business owners are already under extensive federal, state, and local regulations about what they can do with their property and that striking down these state laws would allow companies to "micro-manage" the contents of an employee's automobile. The NRA also cites statistics that 84% of workplace murders are committed by strangers, and anyone determined to commit a crime will not be discouraged from bringing the gun onto company property by a company regulation prohibiting guns in parking lots.

Case #8

After several years of miscarriages, Edward and Susan turn to in vitro fertilization as a means of screening embryos for genetic defects. More than two years elapse, with all the attendant discomfort and expense, but finally an “acceptable” embryo is produced and implanted. To their joy, nine months later they are blessed by Michelle, an apparently happy, healthy baby.
They decide that they will not tempt fate by trying to increase their family, instead choosing to relish the raising of their daughter. Five years pass and they eagerly anticipate Michelle’s starting kindergarten. They have elected to enroll her in a well-respected private school so as to realize her fullest potential. Part of the school’s pre-entry preparation is an extremely thorough set of physical examinations. (The physical examinations are not done to screen for admission, but rather to anticipate potential health issues while the student is enrolled.)

To their horror, the examinations determine that Michelle has early symptoms of a particularly virulent form of Acute Childhood Lymphoid Leukemia. Nothing in the embryonic screening could have predicted its occurrence. They begin immediate conventional treatments which prove to be ineffective. At their oncologist's recommendation they enroll her in the nation's premier pediatric oncology program. She gives them the bad news that Michelle shows evidence of having Philadelphia chromosome-positive ALL. The most successful treatment involves hematopoietic stem cell transplantation from matching relatives. The oncology clinic tests both Edward and Susan, but finds neither of them compatible. Since neither of them (nor Michelle) has any siblings, it looks as if they will have to hope for a million-to-one chance of finding a well-matched unrelated donor.

While waiting in the lounge of the clinic, the mother of another child under treatment introduces herself and suggests that they do have another option – they could have another child, via in vitro, selecting among possible embryos for compatibility for transplant. Initially they are horrified at the idea of producing another child as a "biological stockpile" for Michelle, but the more they think about it the better the idea seems. After all, they really had wanted more children. The new child wouldn't be seriously injured by the procedure needed to provide Michelle with the transplant material she so desperately needs. Given their history of medical procedures needed to have Michelle, the screening required to make sure the new child would be a compatible donor is almost the same as if they were just having another child as a family expansion.

When they raise the possibility with Michelle's physician, she explains that the screening technology has improved sufficiently since Michelle's birth to guard against the new child's having the same disposition toward this disease. But, before she will go further, she tells them they must speak with the clinic's counselor. The counselor asks them to consider what their true motives are in proposing the conception of this second child, whether they would be treating her as a person or as an object and how they will explain to her the reason for her conception.

Case #9

After 25-30 years of service, ships are at the end of their sailing life and are sold as "End of Life Vessels" to be dismantled primarily to recover the valuable steel which makes up about 95% of the ship. Ship breaking (or ship demolition) is the process of dismantling the structure of an obsolete vessel for scrapping or disposal and includes a wide range of activities, from removing all gear and equipment to cutting down and recycling the ship's infrastructure. However, the only ones who profit from ship breaking are the ship owners. They extract an average of $1.9 million profit per "End of Life Vessel." Ship breaking is also a challenging and controversial process, due to the structural complexity of ships and the many environmental, safety, and health issues involved.

Ship breaking is dangerous and has the reputation of being one of the dirtiest jobs on earth. For minimal dollars a day, workers with little protective gear tear out pipes insulated with asbestos, transformers covered with PCBs, and leaky diesel tanks. Until the late twentieth century, ship breaking took place primarily in port cities in developed countries – including the United States and Europe. Today, however, most ship breaking yards are in developing countries – especially India, China, Bangladesh, and Pakistan. This is due to rules dealing with lead paint and toxic substances. The industry was such a disgrace that, in 2000, Congress acted to stop U.S. registered ships from being sent overseas for scrap. Ship breaking remains an international environmental and labor concern - because ship breaking now occurs mostly in underdeveloped countries where working conditions and environmental impact are not regulated. Also, many ships being scrapped now were made before many international environmental laws were enacted.

In late 2005, a Virginia-based company, Bay Bridge Enterprises, visited the small coastal town of Newport, Oregon, and proposed opening a ship breaking plant on the banks of Yaquina Bay. The company offered up to 125 jobs paying $20 an hour. Their spokesperson indicated that the company had no environmental violations since they have been doing this work, and that they had zero lost-time injuries since 2001. Also, he noted that there is no large-scale ship breaking yard on the West Coast, and that there are about 60 ships anchored in a California bay – just waiting to be moved to a scrap yard. Therefore, there would be plenty of work available at a new ship breaking plant in Newport – for some time to come.

A strong coalition of interested parties in the Newport area emerged in opposition to this proposal. The "Friends of Yaquina Bay" were the group of people most responsible for rallying the community together to try to stop this ship breaking proposal. The Oregon Coast Aquarium and the Oregon State University Hatfield Marine Science Center – both located in Newport – also added major support to the effort to block the proposed plant. Some of the major issues raised by these opponents to the proposal included: the world-wide negative reputation of ship breaking; the safety of towing "ghost ships" (some with a length of up to 540 feet) from San Francisco Bay in California to Newport, Oregon; potential infestation of as many as 100 invasive species on the ships in California that are not in Yaquina Bay; toxins on and in the ships that would escape into the bay and the air, affecting the seafood industry – especially crabbing – as well as the fear of pollution runoff at the Hatfield Marine Science Center and the Oregon Coast Aquarium; and visual pollution. Yaquina Bay is a continentally Important Bird Area – with several endangered species present. There are 15 or more blue heron nests and other bird species on the tide flats near the proposed ship breaking site. The local tides extend 15 miles up the Yaquina River and thus the largest oyster farm in Oregon could be affected. Plus there is fear that money-spending tourists would not view these rusting ships as an asset to the beautiful Oregon coast.

On January 24, 2006, about 200 people packed a meeting room in Newport, Oregon, to hear Mr. Don Mann, general manager of the Port of Newport, announce that "some projects are a good fit, or not a fit at all. Bay Bridge's plan for a ship breaking facility in Yaquina Bay does not qualify in our test for a good fit." Thus, quite surprisingly, it seems, the ship breaking plan for Newport was ended. Mr. Mann continued: "This was not a good business deal for the company, or for the Port. I believe that the environmental issues could have been resolved, but our financial concerns could not be adequately addressed." The vast majority of persons at the meeting were very pleased with this decision.

While this issue was being considered by the town of Newport, Oregon, the office of the Port Commissioners received hundreds of telephone calls of concern – from all over the country. As one commissioner said: "We have gained much free advertising – for the port and community. The whole world knows we're here. This issue is bringing this concern to Oregon, and to the nation." Bay Bridge's next move on the West Coast remains to be seen. The company is still looking for a possible Oregon or Washington port.

Case #10

Ardent R. Porter is an investigatory journalist with a respected Washington-area newspaper, Capitol News Briefly. As a reporter working in and around the D.C. area, Mr. Porter often relies on his long list of contacts in order to glean information that might be useful for the various articles he publishes on corruption within politics and government. By establishing relationships with individuals at all levels of government, Ardent has provided himself with valuable human sources that are often capable of providing him with names, tips, or other information that he could not extract from other channels. Furthermore, a few of Mr. Porter's key contacts are able to pass along hard-to-come-by information about questionable or downright illegal actions taken by government employees or agencies.

One such contact is Ian Stalwart, a mid-level agency administrator who works with individuals who do government "groundwork" as well as with high-level government bureaucrats. As a middleman of sorts, Ian is in a position uniquely suited to evaluating the actions of those who work both below and above him. One of Mr. Stalwart's responsibilities is to watch for and report any illegal activity that he might encounter. Mr. Stalwart takes this role very seriously and his responsibilities as a watchdog were what originally led him to seek out Ardent, a like-minded opponent of corruption and illegality within public service.

It so happened that Mr. Stalwart discovered that many individuals within his agency were working to cover up illegally-awarded, over-billed, or otherwise fraudulent government contracts awarded during the early months of the Iraq War, actions which were in violation of several federal laws, in addition to many agency standards. Upon presenting his discovery to his superiors, Mr. Stalwart was told to disregard his findings and to refrain from further discussing the subject. After pressing for a more sophisticated explanation, he was informed that the contracts in question had been deemed classified through appropriate agency and congressional channels and that because the contracts had been deemed to serve a compelling national security interest, it would be against agency policy (as well as illegal) to discuss them, regardless of any questionable procedural or substantive aspects.

Fully knowing that he was in violation of laws regarding the disclosure of classified information, Mr. Stalwart approached Mr. Porter and revealed everything he knew about the dubious contracts. He also provided Mr. Porter with the names of the individuals implicated in the cover-ups and the names of the administrators who had ordered him to remain silent.

After composing a lengthy and revealing story, Mr. Porter approached his editor about publishing the story, explaining the dilemma presented by the fact that much, if not all, of the story's core material was classified. Following a discussion about publishing the article by the paper's editorial board it was decided that the story would run in the paper's next issue.

Case #11

Students in schools of medicine, nursing, dentistry and veterinary medicine are required to observe actual surgeries (and other procedures) early in their educations as a preliminary exposure to the practices of their field. In fact, such study is thought to be essential in confirming the students' choice of profession. Of course, the observation takes place with the informed consent of the patients (or their guardians). Many pre-medical, pre-nursing, pre-dentistry, and pre-veterinary programs, especially at schools with associated hospitals, are beginning to recommend (or even require) similar observation programs.

The State University Museum has one of the nation's premier exhibits of the history of medicine and allied fields. They include displays replicating Leonardo's anatomy studies, teaching materials from Charles University (in Prague) dating from the 16th century, 18th century "bleeding," and 19th century nutrition studies (among many other presentations).
One of the most popular offerings at the museum is the "surgery room" where films of common surgical procedures can be viewed. Like the student viewing in medical schools, the patients shown have given their informed consent. Not surprisingly, the most identifiable attendees are people who are considering having the operations shown in the pictures. The films have been "sanitized" so that excess gore is avoided, but the surgeries are shown in detail.

Dr. Suarez, curator of the museum and retired professor of neurosurgery, has proposed to the board that rather than using films, which are hard to make and quickly become outdated, observers should be allowed to observe actual, in process surgeries on persons who have consented. After all, the University Hospital is adjacent to the museum and access is convenient. The hospital's operating theaters are set up above the surgical floor but separated from the patient and surgical team by sound- and atmosphere-proof windows. Dr. Suarez suggests that such watching could become a significant educational revenue-generating operation. He points out that special exhibits commonly serve as important financial resources for museums.

When Dr. Suarez proposes this program to the Museum's board of directors, Katherine Osborn (one of the community members of the board) objects vigorously. Although Dr. Suarez's proposal clearly restricts participation to persons "15 and older," Ms. Osborn argues that teens, and perhaps others, will attend surgeries not as education but as entertainment. Her position is that such "exhibitions" will be little better than the "bum fights" and ultraviolent films that have gained popularity in recent years. Ms. Osborn claims that teens will watch surgeries as a replacement for the gore seen while attending the Halloween and Nightmare on Elm Street movies. Her claim is that such actions are exploitative more than educational.

Dr. Suarez responds that actual surgeries come nowhere near the gore commonly shown on TV and in the movies. He points out that we seldom know what motivates people to act as they do in the presence of human affliction. "Do people slow their cars when passing accidents in order to see whether they can help or to see blood and gore? How would we know? Even if an adolescent attended a surgery out of a desire to see gore, might the experience not shift his or her perspective, creating an interest in becoming a medical professional?"

Case #12

Politicians have crossed the floor, or switched parties for as long as political parties have been in place—famous switches include those of Strom Thurmond, Ronald Reagan, Condoleezza Rice, Howard Dean, Hilary Clinton and most recently, Joe Lieberman. In 2001, nine serving members of Congress had switched parties while in office. Various reasons are cited for changing parties, including ideological disagreement with one's current party and moving to improve power and legislative efficacy, among others. U.S. Representative Ralph Hall of the Fourth Congressional District in Texas cites both reasons.

Ralph Hall was first elected in 1980 as a Democrat and has been re-elected each succeeding year. Hall has made a reputation for himself as a rogue Democrat, willing to "cross the aisle" and vote with Republicans when he agreed with their position. He also has been an avid supporter of President Bush, opposed to Democratic bids to unseat him. But it was more than mere ideological agreement that encouraged a decision to switch parties in early 2004 before his bid for reelection.

As Hall stated in a January 2004 press release that announced his decision to switch parties, "This year I was denied requests for district appropriations because I was a Democrat who voted against the bill. I have always stated that … if being a Democrat hurt my district, I would either resign or switch parties." The bill to which he was referring was a "foreign operations bill" which, according to Hall, gave, "financial support to those countries that continue to vote against [the U.S.] in the United Nations."

Another motivation may be found in Hall's appreciation for being spared a potentially career devastating blow in the redistricting that cost many Democrats their seats in 2003. According to a CNN article, "…Hall's move comes after Republican state lawmakers in Austin spared him in a redistricting map that targets every other Anglo Democrat in the House. His district, based in the city of Tyler, was largely untouched by the GOP-drawn map, which is currently facing a Democratic court challenge."

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, January 22, 2007 7:15 PM
To: Andrew Calder <acalder@mail.uncaa.unc.edu>; Greg Law <lawdawg@uncaa.unc.edu>
Subject: Schedules
Attach: Spring 2007 Schedules.doc

Here are the up to date schedules. Could you make a copy for Josh--I don't have his email.
Thanks,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From:	nobody@notify.unc.edu on behalf of Williamson, Blakely M </O=UNC EXCHANGE/OU=EXCHANGE ADMINISTRATIVE GROUP (FYDIBOHF23SPDLT)/CN=RECIPIENTS/CN=BMWILLIA>
Sent:	Monday, January 22, 2007 9:03 PM
To:	Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject:	INFORMATIONAL: University Career Services - Spring 2007 Faculty Newsletter

---

The University Career Services Spring 2007 Faculty Newsletter may be read at http://careers.unc.edu/faculty/faculty_newsletter_spring07.pdf. I hope that you will find the information in the newsletter useful to you and your students.

Jacquelyn Gist

Jacquelyn Gist
Assistant Director
Non-Profits, Social Work
University Career Services

This email is sponsored by: University Career Services

==========

"INFORMATIONAL:" email will only be sent to those who have indicated that they do want to receive mass email. To set your informational mass email preference, logon to the on-line directory web site at https://dir.unc.edu/dir/update.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, January 31, 2007 10:10 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: letters to fellows
Attach: letter to fellows spring07[2].doc

Carlo,
Take a look at my edits. Also, if Lance hasn't sent the letter I signed to Gary, have him send me a copy as an attachment to redo. I thought of some changes I would prefer to make. But if he has, no big deal.
Jan

UNC
PARR CENTER FOR ETHICS
Jan Boxill 919.962.3317 jmboxill@email.unc.edu

The University
of North Carolina
at Chapel Hill
Caldwell Hall, CB# 3125
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

January 31, 2007

Dear Fellows,

I hope your semester has been going well so far. As you may have noticed the Parr Center for Ethics has had an extremely busy year and I want to thank all of you who have participated and contributed to the Center by attending events, contacting us with research/event ideas, listing your Center affiliations during conferences/workshops, and helping the Center live and thrive as the face of ethics at UNC.

Last semester the Center moved into its new physical location. Our new quarters in Caldwell Hall (suite 207) have brought together ethics faculty and staff creating a dynamic and productive environment. We encourage you to stop by to visit us in our new quarters.

Thanks to input and suggestions from our fellows, this semester we have many upcoming events that we hope you will attend. Events include:

Saturday & Sunday, March 31th-April 1st, 2007
Ethics in the Professions Workshop, "Disability and Disadvantage: Re-examining Topics in Moral and Political Philosophy."

Friday, March 30th, 2007
Public Seminar, "Disability and Disadvantage." A panel of experts will examine how the experiences of people with disabilities might be used to reconsider prominent positions on a variety of topics in moral and political philosophy.

Tuesday, March 20th, 2007
Public Lecture, "The International Criminal Court," featuring Fatou Bensouda, Deputy Prosecutor of the ICC.. Location Carroll Hall Auditorium, 7:30pm.

Tuesday, February 20th, 2007
Public Lecture, "Happiness," featuring Dr. Daniel Gilbert. Dr. Gilbert of Harvard University will present a lecture based on his book, "Stumbling on Happiness." Location Murphey Hall 116, 7:30pm.

Thursday, February 15th, 2007
Ethics in the Professions Workshop, "Respect for Patient Autonomy," featuring Dr. Margaret Little of Georgetown University.

All the events are free to attendees. We would like to see as many of you as possible at the public lectures. The workshops have limited spaces and dinners are provided for the participants, so please contact the Center if you are interested registering for these. Please check our website for more details and other activities of the Center.

We look forward to seeing you at these events and also to your continued support and input for future events.

Regards,

Jan Boxill
Director

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, February 2, 2007 4:21 PM
To: Hilger, Anthony E <Tony_Hilger@med.unc.edu>
Subject: pre-med students
Attach: Bioethics invite-student.doc

Dear Tony,
I understand you are the Pre-Health Advisor, and I am soliciting your help. The Parr Center for Ethics is sponsoring a bioethics workshop entitled, "Respect for Patient Autonomy" featuring Professor Margaret Little, Professor of Philosophy and Senior Research Scholar at the Kennedy Institute of Ethics at Georgetown University. She will be leading a case-based workshop for medical professionals and those interested in the medical profession on February 15th, 2007. This workshop is being co-sponsored by the Department of Social Medicine and the Department of Philosophy. The workshop is free and includes dinner. If you have any undergraduates or medical students who might be interested, please encourage them to go to our website to register, at parrcenter.unc.edu
There are limited spaces, but I thought this would be a workshop that would be of interest to advanced undergraduates who are planning for medical school.
Attached is an invitation flyer that you can circulate.

Thank you very much for your time.

Regards,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

The University
of North Carolina
at Chapel Hill
Caldwell Hall, CB# 3125
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

2007 Ethics in the Professions Workshop

Thursday, February 15th, 2007
4:00-8:00 pm

Respect for Patient Autonomy

As a student who may have a particular interest in Bioethics we would be honored if you would attend the 2007 Ethics in the Professions Workshop: Respect for Patient Autonomy, a special 'case-based Workshop for Nursing, Allied Health, and Medical professionals, featuring Dr. Margaret Little of Georgetown University.

Dr. Margaret Little is an Associate Professor in Georgetown's Philosophy Department and a Senior Research Scholar at Georgetown's Kennedy Institute of Ethics, a think-tank that specializes in bioethics. Her background is in analytic philosophy and feminist theory.

The location of this workshop is the boardroom on the second floor of the SunTrust Meadowmont Bank. Directions to the facility will be emailed to you when you register. A light supper will be provided and there is no cost for the program. However, registration is required before 5:00 pm on February 9, 2007.

For additional information, directions, and registration, you may view our website http://parrcenter.unc.edu/events/seminars/bioethicsworkshop/ or contact Lance Westerlund at lancew@unc.edu.

We hope you will take advantage of this unique opportunity to join us for this provocative and timely workshop.

This workshop is sponsored by the Parr Center for Ethics, the Department of Social Medicine, UNC Hospital Ethics Committee and the Department of Philosophy at UNC Chapel Hill.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, February 2, 2007 4:42 PM
To: Ethics in Society Fellows <ethicsinsociety@listserv.unc.edu>
Subject: Bioethics workshop
Attach: Bioethics invite-student.doc

Dear Fellows,

I hope all is going well with you all and that you are thriving in your second term of grad school. I am writing to invite you to a Parr Center Workshop. The Parr Center for Ethics is sponsoring a bioethics workshop entitled, "Respect for Patient Autonomy" featuring Professor Margaret Little, Professor of Philosophy and Senior Research Scholar at the Kennedy Institute of Ethics at Georgetown University. She will be leading a case-based workshop for medical professionals and those interested in the medical profession on February 15th, 2007. This workshop is being co-sponsored by the Department of Social Medicine and the Department of Philosophy. The workshop is free and includes dinner. There are limited spaces, but I thought some of you might be interested.

Attached is a flyer that gives more information. Also you might visit our website for other events as well, especially a public lectures by Harvard Psychology Professor Daniel Gilbert, author of Stumbling on Happiness on February 20th, and ICC Deputy Prosecuter Fatou Bensouda of the The International Criminal Court on March 20th.

Again, hope you are all doing well. Please feel free to drop in to my office at the Parr Center Suite in Caldwell 207.

Regards,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Jan Boxill wrote:
> Hi All,
> I hope everything is going well with you all. It seems that several > people cannot make Friday's lunch, so unfortunately I am going to > cancel it. So there is NO meeting Friday, Sept. 29th. I will look for > another times and email you with possible dates and times to see if we > can get together in the next week or so. It may be that we will have > to go in the evening. If you have any strong preferences, let me know.
>
> Thanks,
> Jan
>
>

The University
of North Carolina
at Chapel Hill
Caldwell Hall, CB# 3125
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

2007 Ethics in the Professions Workshop

Thursday, February 15th, 2007
4:00-8:00 pm

Respect for Patient Autonomy

As a student who may have a particular interest in Bioethics we would be honored if you would attend the 2007 Ethics in the Professions Workshop: Respect for Patient Autonomy, a special 'case-based Workshop for Nursing, Allied Health, and Medical professionals, featuring Dr. Margaret Little of Georgetown University.

Dr. Margaret Little is an Associate Professor in Georgetown's Philosophy Department and a Senior Research Scholar at Georgetown's Kennedy Institute of Ethics, a think-tank that specializes in bioethics. Her background is in analytic philosophy and feminist theory.

The location of this workshop is the boardroom on the second floor of the SunTrust Meadowmont Bank. Directions to the facility will be emailed to you when you register. A light supper will be provided and there is no cost for the program. However, registration is required before 5:00 pm on February 9, 2007.

For additional information, directions, and registration, you may view our website http://parrcenter.unc.edu/events/seminars/bioethicsworkshop/ or contact Lance Westerlund at lancew@unc.edu.

We hope you will take advantage of this unique opportunity to join us for this provocative and timely workshop.

This workshop is sponsored by the Parr Center for Ethics, the Department of Social Medicine, UNC Hospital Ethics Committee and the Department of Philosophy at UNC Chapel Hill.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, February 2, 2007 4:52 PM
To: Sauls, Jonathan C <jsauls@email.unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: FWD: complete email exchange]
Attach: FWD complete email exchange.msg

Jonathan,
Here is the complete email exchange. He did talk to her today and said he wanted no more emails and that we would meet to get things cleared up, and that I would be there. I will set up a meeting --hopefully on Wednesday Feb 7th at 12:30, but I will opt out if you think that is best.

Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, February 2, 2007 4:53 PM
To: Van Riper, Marcia L <vanriper@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Bioethics workshop
Attach: Bioethics invite-student.doc

Dear Marcia,

I hope all is going well with you all. I am writing to invite you to a Parr Center Workshop and also invite your students. The Parr Center for Ethics is sponsoring a bioethics workshop entitled, "Respect for Patient Autonomy" featuring Professor Margaret Little, Professor of Philosophy and Senior Research Scholar at the Kennedy Institute of Ethics at Georgetown University. She will be leading a case-based workshop for medical professionals and those interested in the medical profession on February 15th, 2007. This workshop is being co-sponsored by the Department of Social Medicine and the Department of Philosophy. The workshop is free and includes dinner. There are limited spaces, but I thought some of your nursing students might be interested.

Attached is a flyer that gives more information. Also you might visit our website for other events as well, especially a public lectures by Harvard Psychology Professor Daniel Gilbert, author of Stumbling on Happiness on February 20th, and ICC Deputy Prosecuter Fatou Bensouda of the The International Criminal Court on March 20th.

Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

The University
of North Carolina
at Chapel Hill
Caldwell Hall, CB# 3125
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

2007 Ethics in the Professions Workshop

Thursday, February 15th, 2007
4:00-8:00 pm

Respect for Patient Autonomy

As a student who may have a particular interest in Bioethics we would be honored if you would attend the 2007 Ethics in the Professions Workshop: Respect for Patient Autonomy, a special 'case-based Workshop for Nursing, Allied Health, and Medical professionals, featuring Dr. Margaret Little of Georgetown University.

Dr. Margaret Little is an Associate Professor in Georgetown's Philosophy Department and a Senior Research Scholar at Georgetown's Kennedy Institute of Ethics, a think-tank that specializes in bioethics. Her background is in analytic philosophy and feminist theory.

The location of this workshop is the boardroom on the second floor of the SunTrust Meadowmont Bank. Directions to the facility will be emailed to you when you register. A light supper will be provided and there is no cost for the program. However, registration is required before 5:00 pm on February 9, 2007.

For additional information, directions, and registration, you may view our website http://parrcenter.unc.edu/events/seminars/bioethicsworkshop/ or contact Lance Westerlund at lancew@unc.edu.

We hope you will take advantage of this unique opportunity to join us for this provocative and timely workshop.

This workshop is sponsored by the Parr Center for Ethics, the Department of Social Medicine, UNC Hospital Ethics Committee and the Department of Philosophy at UNC Chapel Hill.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, February 2, 2007 5:15 PM
To: Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>
Subject: Fall 2007
Attach: Fall 2007 Schedule Feb 2,2007.xls

Geoff,
I've attached and put in the admin file what my thoughts are on the visitors. I've made comments at the side as you'll see.
I think it would work nicely to change a bioethics to a practical ethics and give that to LeBar.

So here is what is on the schedule:
LeBar: PHIL 160: Intro TR2 and PHIL 163: Practical Ethics TR 9:30

Saenz: PHIL 170: Social & Political TR 9:30 and PHIL 275: Feminism TR 3:30
This is giving her Jerry's class. If Jerry does teach, then I'll see if he'd like to do Phil of Law

Moehler: PHIL 173: Social & Economic Justice MWF 1; and PHIL 384: PPE Gateway MW 4:25-5:40

Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

PHILOSOPHY CLASSES FALL 2006

	A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I	J	K	L	M	N	O	P
1				February 2,2007		FALL 2007 SCHEDULE
2	PHIL				On Leave:
3
4	HNRS32	HNRS 354	3	Bar On	Honors-Philosophical			11 TR				20		GM 210
5	6F	54		Roberts	Thinking About Time			3:30-4:45 MW				20
6	6F	68	1	Simmons	Paradoxes			2-4:30 W				20		MU 304
7	20	101	1	Neta	Intro: Main Problems			11 MWF				200		CW 103	4
8					Recitations: F: 10 & 11
9	20	101E	1	Staff	Intro: Main Problems: Evening			6-7:15 MW				40		CW 105	1
10	24	110	1	Staff	Great Works			3:30 TR				36		PE 216	1
11	26	112	1	Reeve	Making Sense of Ourselves			12 MW				188		MA 209	4
12					Recitations F: 12 & 1
13	32	134	1	Nord	Phil of Religion			2 TR				40		CW105
14	35	134	2	Staff	Phil of Religion			MWF 2				40		PE 216	1
15	21	155	1	Staff	Intro Symbolic Logic			8 TR				50		CW 105	1
16	21	155	2	Staff	Intro Symbolic Logic			11TR				50		CW 105	1
17	22	160	1	Staff	Intro to Ethics			8 TR				40		CW 105	1
18	22	160	2	Staff	Intro to Ethics			2 MWF				40		CW 105	V-1
19	22	160	3	Staff	Intro to Ethics			2 TR				36		CW 103	1	LeBar
20	30	163	1	J.Boxill	Practical Ethics			11 TR				35
21	39	164	1	Staff	Morality and Business			12:30 TR				40			V-2
22	34	165	1	Staff	Bioethics			9 MWF				40			V-1
23	34	165	2	Staff	Bioethics			9:30 TR				40			1	change to a 163-LeBar
24	34	165	3	Staff	Bioethics			6-7:15 TR				40		CW 105	1
25	37	170	1	Postema	Social Ethics & Pol Thought			9:30 TR				35				Saenz
26	37H	170H	1	Hill	Social Ethics & Pol Thought-Hon			11-12:15 MW				25		CW 213
27		229	1	Nelson	20th Century Phil			2 TR				40
28	38	230	1	Staff	Experience and Reality			3:30 TR				40		CW 105	1
29	38	230	2	Staff	Experience and Reality			8 TR				40		CW 105	1
30	42	272	1	B. Boxill	Ethics Peace, War, Defense			MW 10				100		GA 008	2
31					Recitations F: 9 & 10							25		SC 210
32	66	273	1	Staff	Social & Econ Justice			1MWF				45		CW 105	V-3	Moehler
33	46	275	1	Staff	Phil Issues Feminism (WMST 46)			3:30 TR				40		CW 105	1	Saenz
34	41	280	1	Staff	Phil of Law			3:30 TR				40			V-2
35	77	353	1	Prinz	Cognitive Science			12:30 TR				25		CW 103
36	71	356	1	Simmons	Topics in Logic			9:30-10:45 MW				25		CW 213
37	84	384	1	Staff	PPE: Gateway			4:35-5:40 MW				35			V-3	Moehler
38	80	390	1	B. Boxill	Special Topics-Liberty & Equality			2-4:30- W				25		CW 213
39	96	396	1	J. Boxill	Directed Readings			6-8:30 T				5		CW 208
40	96	396	2	J. Boxill	Readings: Ethics Bowl			6-8:30 T				10		CW 208
41	150	412	1	Reeve	Plato			4-6:30 M				25		CW 103
42	155	423	1	Nelson	Kant			11-12:15 TR				25
43	110	445	1	BarOn	Phil of Language			4-6:30 R				25		CW 213
44	108	450	1	Lange	Phil of Science			1-3:30 R				25		CW 208
45		451	1	Roberts	Phil of Physics/Physics 313			11-12:15 MW				25
46	109	453	1	Knobe	Phil of Psychology			T 1-3:30				25		CW 213
47	101	455	1	Hofweber	Advanced Symbolic Logic			10-11:15 MW				25		PE 216
48		691	1	Roberts	Honors			6-8:30 W						CW 213
49	230	730	1	Lycan	Metaphysics:Modalities			1-3:30 W				15		CW 213
50	260	760	1	Wolf	Moral Theory:Utilitarianism			4-6:30 T				15		CW 213
51		785	1	Maclean	Policy Analysis/PLCY 780			2 TR				25
52	290	790	1	Hofweber	Colloquium Seminar			TBA				15
53	290	790	2	Wolf	Colloquium Ceminar			TBA				15
54	300	800	1	Staff	Bibliography			TBA

PHILOSOPHY CLASSES FALL 2006

	A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I	J	K	L	M	N	O	P
55	360	860	1	Sayre McCord	Seminar:Ethical Theory			4-6:30 M				15		CW 213
56	390	990	1	Neta	Reading Group			TBA
57	390	990	2	Staff	Reading Group			TBA
58
59	Hnrs 32	Hnrs 354	3	Bar On	Self Knowledge			11 TR				25
60	22	160H	1	Lycan	Intro Ethics: Honors			2 TR				25
61	37H	170H	1	Hill	Social & Poltiical Honors			10-11:15 MW				25		CW 213
62	20	101E	1	Staff	Intro:Main Problems Evening			6 MW				40		CW 105	1
63
64
65
66					RECITATIONS
67
68	20	PHIL 101	601					10F				25		AL 205
69			602					10F				25		MU 105
70			603					10F				25		HN 307
71			604					10F				25
72			605					10F				25
73			606					11F				25		PH 222
74			607					11F				25		SM 107
75			608					11F				25		CW 105
76			605					11F				25		WG 301A
77			606					11F				25		GA 103
78			607					11F				25		MT 305
79			608					11F				25		PE 204
80
81	26	PHIL 112	601					12F				25		SM 107
82			602					12F				25		AL 203
83			603					12F				25		GA 001
84			604					12F				25		PH 228
85			605					1F				25		GA 103
86			606					1F				25		GA 009
87			607					1F				25		PE 216
88			608					1F
89												25		SC 209
90	42	PHIL 272	601					9F				25		MT 205
91			602					9F				25		PE 010
92			603					10F				25
93			604					10F				25		PE 215

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, February 5, 2007 4:08 PM
To: Robert Mercer <rmercer@uncaa.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: next Tuesday

By next Tuesday, you do mean tomorrow, Feb 6th right?

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Robert Mercer wrote:
> As you know, Dean Owen will be attending out staff meeting next > Tuesday at 3:30. She will be reviewing the new eligibility and PTD > policies & procedures (attached). I encourage you to review the > material and prepare your questions. Remember, the new policy has > been approved by Faculty Council and is therefore not up for debate.
> What we can ask questions about are the new procedure's. EX: under > 2.00 = ineligible (*policy), *the procedure for regaining > eligibility (how & how often) is what is being discussed*. I hope > that makes sense - if not come see me before Tuesday. Thanks. RJM*
>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, February 6, 2007 12:48 PM
To: goldstel@email.unc.edu
Subject: Re: Paper

You are right. I meant to make it 1-2 pages.
No we are only going to ask them to do the formal reconstruction, no defense.

I have a meeting from 3:30-4:30 out of the office.
Jan
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, February 6, 2007 2:52 PM
To: Hunt, Heather Ann <hhunt@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Disabilty workshop
Attach: Disability funding proposal.doc

Hi Heather,
Thank you for calling as I was about to formulate a letter of support. I am attaching the proposal and will get you more information. Please send me the name and contact information of the person who wrote the policy paper for you. We will take it from there.

Thanks again,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, February 8, 2007 11:49 AM
To: Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>; Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Letter for Bd of Visitors
Attach: Director's Letter.doc

Here is a revised letter to send to the Board of Visitors.
Any edits are greatly appreciated.

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

The University
of North Carolina
at Chapel Hill
Caldwell Hall, CB# 3125
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

Jan Boxill 919.962.3317 jmboxill@email.unc.edu

February 7, 2007

Dear Parr Center Board of Visitors:

Welcome to the exciting ventures of the Parr Center for Ethics that serves as the public face of the University of North Carolina's commitment to ethics. I want to personally thank you for your willingness to support the Center's mission of addressing the need for fruitful discussion and exploration of ethical issues that are important to the university and the communities it serves.

Since its inauguration, the Parr Center for Ethics has been active in sponsoring and co-sponsoring events to fulfill its mission. In some cases our initial support allowed other units to solicit matching funds. This was especially true for, Finding the Genome: Community Genetics Forum 2006. The Center's original sponsorship provided the base for UNC's Medical school award of a much larger NSF grant.

Research support for our fellows inspired programs, conferences, workshops and on-going working groups. Let me draw attention to two: First the Sexual Trafficking conference, which the Center sponsored in April 2005, resulted in an on-going working group that meets once a month to address this issue in North Carolina. This group includes UNC faculty and staff, community leaders, and a state legislator. Second, as a direct result of the Center's funding of Parr Fellow Donna LeFebvre's research on the International Human Rights Court in The Hague, on March 20th Fatou Bensouda, Deputy Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court will address students and the community on the role of the ICC and the responsibilities of the international community.

The Center is dedicated to providing support for the teaching of ethics in our Ethics in the Professions Series. These 25-30 person workshops and seminars are designed to help faculty in the teaching of ethics in their own disciplines. The first in the series was Teaching Ethics to Executives and Business Students. This year we are intruding workshops in teaching of ethical issues in medicine, education, disabilities, and sports.

Just this week the Center was selected to host the 2007-2008 Mid-Atlantic Regional Intercollegiate Ethics Bowl (IEB) in Fall 2007. Recognized widely by educators, the IEB combines the excitement and fun of a competitive tournament with a valuable educational experience for undergraduate students.

These and other events are described in the brochure and on our website. You can also visit the Center's website http://parrcenter.unc.edu for events and ethics in the news.

I am grateful for the opportunity to serve as the Director of the Parr Center for Ethics. I look forward to meeting you on February 16th and for your support and input in the Center's continued success

Regards,

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, February 8, 2007 11:52 AM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>; Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>
Subject: Brochure letter
Attach: Director letter-1.doc

I just made a few edits on the brochure letter.--particularly on the Fatou Bensouda lecture

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

The University
of North Carolina
at Chapel Hill
Caldwell Hall, CB# 3125
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

Jan Boxill 919.962.3317 jmboxill@email.unc.edu

February 8, 2007

The Parr Center for Ethics was established in 2004-2005, thanks to a generous gift from the Gary W. Parr Family Foundation. Plans for the Center grew naturally in the fertile soil of the Ethics Fellows Program in the College's Institute for Arts and Humanities which was begun in 1997. That program helped to consolidate a community of scholars from across the University, all of whose research and teaching interests are squarely in ethics. Capitalizing on this community, the mission of the Parr Center for Ethics is to meticulously address the palpable need for fruitful discussion and exploration of ethical issues.

Since its inauguration, the Parr Center for Ethics has been active in sponsoring and co-sponsoring events that fulfill its mission. In some cases our initial support allowed other units to solicit matching funds. This was especially true for Finding the Genome: Community Genetics Forum 2006. The Center's original sponsorship provided the base for UNC's Medical school award of a much larger NSF grant.

Research support for our fellows inspired programs, conferences, workshops and on-going working groups. Let me draw attention to two: First the Sexual Trafficking conference, which the Center sponsored in April 2005, has resulted in an on-going working group that meets once a month to address this issue in North Carolina. This group includes UNC faculty and staff, community leaders, and a North Carolina legislator. Second, as a direct result of the Center's funding of Parr Fellow Donna LeFebvre's research on the International Human Rights Court in The Hague, on March 20th Fatou Bensouda, Deputy Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court will address students and the community on the role of the ICC and the responsibilities of the international community.

The Center is dedicated to providing support for the teaching of ethics in our Ethics in the Professions Series. These 25-30 person workshops and seminars are designed to help faculty in the teaching of ethics in their own disciplines. The first in the series was Teaching Ethics to Executives and Business Students. This year we are introducing workshops in teaching of ethical issues in medicine, education, disabilities, and sports.

Recently the Center was selected to host the 2007-2008 Mid-Atlantic Regional Intercollegiate Ethics Bowl. The Intercollegiate Ethics Bowl (IEB) combines the excitement and fun of a competitive tournament with a valuable educational experience for undergraduate students. Recognized widely by educators, the American Philosophical Association awarded the IEB the 2006 prize for Excellence and Innovation in Philosophy Programs. The format, rules and procedures of the IEB have been developed to model widely acknowledged best methods of reasoning in practical and professional ethics.

These and other events are described in this brochure and on our website. Visit the Center's website http://parrcenter.unc.edu for our events and ethics in the news.

I am grateful for the opportunity to serve as the Director of the Parr Center for Ethics and I look forward to your support and input for its continued success.

Regards,

Jan Boxill

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, February 8, 2007 4:29 PM
To: Margaret O Little <littlem@georgetown.edu>
Subject: Re: UNC Visit

Hi Maggie,
We are all looking forward to your visit next week. One thing I need is a title for your paper that you are giving to the Department. Could you email that to me as soon as possible.

Is everything set on your end? Let me know if there is anything you need from us.

Thanks,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, February 8, 2007 11:02 PM
To: Roberts, John Thomas <jtrosap@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Teach for America

John could you send out this announcement to the Phil listserv.

African-Americans and Latino/Hispanics obtain college degrees at only Â½ the rate of Caucasian students. Help change the numbers. Find out how you can make this an equal opportunity nation.

Join us for a screening of CNN's acclaimed documentary on the achievement gap and how Teach For America corps members are working to improve the odds of their students. Learn how you can make an immediate impact in the lives of children growing up in low-income communities, join a network of leaders working to affect long-term change, and position yourself for success in any field.

See four Teach For America corps members in action:

CNN Documentary Screening

Monday, February 12

6:00PM

Carolina Union #3503

/Free pizza./

Seeking all majors. No previous education experience or coursework necessary. Full first-year teacher salary and benefits, financial aid, plus a $9,450 AmeriCorps education award (if eligible). Student loan forbearance and interest payments for two years.

FINAL APPLICATION DEADLINE FOR THE 2007 CORPS: February 18th , 2007, 3:00AM.

Visit _www.teachforamerica.org_ <http://www.teachforamerica.org/> to learn more and apply.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, February 9, 2007 9:48 AM
To: Chapel Hill Philosophy <hobler@email.unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: [FEAST] Call for Graduate Student Commentators]
Attach: [FEAST] Call for Graduate Student Commentators.msg

Could you send this out to our grad students

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Feminist Ethics and Social Theory <FEAST@LSV.UKY.EDU> on behalf of Joan Callahan <buddy@POP.UKY.EDU>
Sent: Friday, February 9, 2007 8:37 AM
To: FEAST@LSV.UKY.EDU
Subject: [FEAST] Call for Graduate Student Commentators

FYI.

If you are currently a graduate student with expertise relevant to the abstracts copied below, please consider nominating yourself as a commentator for our conference. If you are a faculty member supervising graduate students, please encourage anyone with relevant expertise to contact us. Our conference is organized and conducted entirely by graduate students, and aims to provide opportunities to hone professional philosophical skills in a collegial environment while addressing important issues in value theory and social-political philosophy, broadly construed.

Our conference is quite soon. An archive of past keynotes (including Charles Mills, Chris Cuomo, and Lucius Outlaw among many others) and information about this year's conference are available on the conference website at http://www.msu.edu/unit/phl/gradconference/. Alas, we cannot provide travel support, but we can assist hard-up commentators in finding cheap or free accomodations.

Collegially,

Alison Reiheld

Ph.D. student, MSU Department of Philosophy

Instructor, <?xml:namespace prefix = st1 ns = "urn:schemas-microsoft-com:office:smarttags" />Lyman Briggs School of Science

---

CALL FOR COMMENTATORS
The 8th Annual Graduate Student Philosophy Conference at MSU requires commentators for the upcoming conference - March 16-17th. Our keynote speaker will be Jay M. Bernstein of the New School for Social Research. Please see our website for more information and registration information (http://www.msu.edu/unit/phl/gradconference/). Please take a look at the following abstracts and email meagher6@msu.edu if you are interested in commenting.

Quasi-Absolutism and the Frege-Geach Problem
Leigh Duffy State University of New York at Buffalo

Abstract: In her section of Moral Relativism and Moral Objectivity, Judith Jarvis Thomson makes use of the Frege-Geach point to illustrate the problems with Letter Emotivism in order to counter Gilbert Harman's defense of moral relativism. While the Frege-Geach point does cause trouble for a moral relativist, Harman's Quasi-Absolutism can avoid the trouble by sticking to the "spirit" of emotivism without employing the letter. In this paper, I shall look at the ways around the Frege-Geach problem but concede that the Letter Emotivist cannot get around the problem. I shall then offer a defense of Harman's Quasi-Absolutism in response to Thomson's attack.

Socially Constructed Evaluations and Facts: A Realist Perspective
James McGlothlin The Ohio State University

Abstract: The positivist value-free doctrine has imposed severe limitations upon the theory and practice of social science. The naturalistic fallacy seems to have even given some logical impetus for this doctrine. But I argue that social science claims can be concluded from certain kinds of factual premises without fallacy. Searle's The Construction of Social Reality provides a convincing ontology of social and institutional facts as having truth-values within a realist framework. Searle's view of institutional facts provides the logical basis for making evaluative claims in the social sciences, et al. I deal with some of the possible counter-arguments to Searle's construction and argue that it holds up.

Intimate Abuse and the Ideal of Unity
John Zillmer Michigan State University

Abstract: In this paper I argue that two claims often held by feminist philosophers are inconsistent. One is that 'the ideal of unity', the notion that one's identity and the social milieu it derives from ought to be unified, is not a desirable ideal. The other is that intimate abuse, physical and psychological violence within romantic relationships, is to be eradicated. I argue that these two claims are inconsistent with one another, and that the former, the denial of the ideal of unity, should be modified or eliminated. In arguing for this conclusion, I appeal primarily to sociological and psychological studies of intimate violence and conflict resolution tactics among not only heterosexual but also homosexual intimate partners. Looking at the violence within homosexual relationships indicates that, contrary to much feminist theorizing, the effects of patriarchy are insufficient to explain intimate violence. I further argue that since intimate violence is found most often in partnerships in which one or both of the partners have a disunified identity, the denial of the ideal of unity is ill-advised.

Seeing as 'Touch-Like': The Enactive Model of Perception as a Feminist Epistemology
Travis Reider University of South Carolina

Abstract: For most of the history of western philosophy, sight has been accorded a certain privilege among the senses. Philosophers have tended, and still do tend, to consider vision to be uniquely pure, objective and rational. This view, however, has not gone uncontested, as the rise of the feminist movement brought with it a strand of 'anti-visual' thinkers, who began to link vision with masculinity. The following paper argues that the anti-visual sentiment is appropriate, but only in reference to the dominant, 'orthodox' model of visual perception. If a model of perception could scientifically validate human experience, and at the same time avoid the elements of the orthodox view which link it with masculinity, then it would appear that there would be no reason to maintain an anti-visual position. This paper argues that such a model exists, and that model is found in Alva Noë's recent work on what he calls the 'enactive approach' to visual perception. In support of this claim, this paper investigates the field of feminist epistemology and the competing models of visual perception, and it ultimately raises the question of whether these findings have any normative implications.

Puppies, Babies, and Zombies: Some Problems for Smith's Impartial Spectator

Danielle Carducci University of Texas at Austin

Abstract: In the Theory of Moral Sentiments, Adam Smith states that "every faculty in one man is the measure by which he judges of the like faculty in another." Smith uses this statement to motivate his claim that the imaginative use of sympathy can provide a method for joining in fellow-feeling with the rest of mankind and enable us to make judgments about their feelings, behaviors, etc. However, Smith's sympathetic method is flawed in that, contrary to his assertions, it does not adequately account for the sympathy we feel for beings whose conscious life is significantly different from our own. Specifically, in the case of babies, animals, or the dead, we lack adequate knowledge of what their mental states are like and thus have no way of joining with them in fellow-feeling. It is not possible to imaginatively place ourselves 'in their shoes' without grossly mischaracterizing their mental states; Smith's method requires that we anthropomorphize animals, assume children have complex, adult-like mental states, and make zombies out of the dead. I argue that, at best, Smith's sympathetic method provides us with a way of sympathizing with those humans whose 'experiential shoes' are similar to our own, but cannot be extended to include animals, the dead, or even humans from significantly different cultures.

The University
of North Carolina
at Chapel Hill
Caldwell Hall, CB# 3125
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

Jan Boxill 919.962.3317 jmboxill@email.unc.edu

February 7, 2007

Dear Parr Center Board of Visitors:

Welcome to the exciting ventures of the Parr Center for Ethics that serves as the public face of the University of North Carolina's commitment to ethics. I want to personally thank you for your willingness to support the Center's mission of addressing the need for fruitful discussion and exploration of ethical issues that are important to the university and the communities it serves.

Since its inauguration, the Parr Center for Ethics has been active in sponsoring and co-sponsoring events to fulfill its mission. In some cases our initial support has allowed other units to solicit matching funds. This was especially true for, Finding the Genome: Community Genetics Forum 2006. The Center's original sponsorship provided the base for a National Science Foundation grant to the UNC Medical School.

Research support for our fellows inspired programs, conferences, workshops and on-going working groups. Let me draw attention to two: First the Sexual Trafficking conference, which the Center sponsored in April 2005, resulted in an on-going working group that meets once a month to address this issue in North Carolina. This group includes UNC faculty and staff, community leaders, and a state legislator. Second, as a direct result of the Center's funding of Parr Fellow Donna LeFebvre's research on the International Human Rights Court in The Hague, on March 20th Fatou Bensouda, Deputy Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court will address students and the community on the role of the ICC and the responsibilities of the international community.

The Center is dedicated to providing support for the teaching of ethics in our Ethics in the Professions Series. These 25-30 person workshops and seminars are designed to help faculty in the teaching of ethics in their own disciplines. The first in the series was Teaching Ethics to Executives and Business Students. This year we are introducing workshops in the teaching of ethical issues in the areas of medicine, education, disabilities, and sports.

Just this week the Center was selected to host the 2007-2008 Mid-Atlantic Regional Intercollegiate Ethics Bowl (IEB) in Fall 2007. Recognized widely by educators, the IEB combines the excitement and fun of a competitive tournament with a valuable educational experience for undergraduate students.

These and other events are more fully described in the brochure and on our website at http://parrcenter.unc.edu.

I am grateful for the opportunity to serve as the Director of the Parr Center for Ethics. I look forward to meeting you on February 16th and for your support and input in the Center's continued success.

Regards,

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair

Department of Philosophy

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, February 9, 2007 3:22 PM
To: Lance Westerlund <westy@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Director's letter
Attach: Director's Letter.doc

Here is my final letter, can you add the signature for me thanks--and THANKS for all you outstanding help.

Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

The University
of North Carolina
at Chapel Hill
Caldwell Hall, CB# 3125
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

Jan Boxill 919.962.3317 jmboxill@email.unc.edu

February 7, 2007

Dear Parr Center Board of Visitors:

Welcome to the exciting ventures of the Parr Center for Ethics that serves as the public face of the University of North Carolina's commitment to ethics. I want to personally thank you for your willingness to support the Center's mission of addressing the need for fruitful discussion and exploration of ethical issues that are important to the university and the communities it serves.

Since its inauguration, the Parr Center for Ethics has been active in sponsoring and co-sponsoring events to fulfill its mission. In some cases our initial support has allowed other units to solicit matching funds. This was especially true for Finding the Genome: Community Genetics Forum 2006. The Center's original sponsorship provided the base for a National Science Foundation grant to the UNC Medical School.

Research support for our fellows has inspired programs, conferences, workshops and on-going working groups. Let me draw attention to two: First, the Sexual Trafficking conference, which the Center sponsored in April 2005, resulted in an on-going working group that meets once a month to address this issue in North Carolina. This group includes UNC faculty and staff, community leaders, and a state legislator. Second, as a direct result of the Center's funding of Parr Fellow Donna LeFebvre's research on the International Human Rights Court in The Hague, on March 20, 2007, Fatou Bensouda, Deputy Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court will address students and the community on the role of the ICC and the responsibilities of the international community.

The Center is dedicated to providing support for the teaching of ethics in our Ethics in the Professions Series. These 25-30 person workshops and seminars are designed to help faculty in the teaching of ethics in their own disciplines. The first in the series was Teaching Ethics to Executives and Business Students. This year we are introducing workshops in the teaching of ethical issues in the areas of medicine, education, disabilities, and sports.

Just this week the Center was selected to host the 2007-2008 Mid-Atlantic Regional Intercollegiate Ethics Bowl (IEB) in Fall 2007. Recognized widely by educators, the IEB combines the excitement and fun of a competitive tournament with a valuable educational experience for undergraduate students.

These and other events are more fully described in the brochure and on our website at http://parrcenter.unc.edu.

I am grateful for the opportunity to serve as the Director of the Parr Center for Ethics. I look forward to meeting you on February 16 and look forward to your support and input in the Center's continued success.

Regards,

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair

Department of Philosophy

From: Hunt, Heather Ann <hhunt@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, February 9, 2007 5:56 PM
To: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Disability workshop

Hi Jan,

Thank you for sending me the proposal for the Parr Center's disabilities workshop. I'm eager to see how the workshop takes shape--this is not an area I'm familiar with but it sounds complex, multifaceted and thought-provoking. I asked the two authors who wrote policy briefs that engaged issues of disability and poverty if they would be interested in the workshop and both responded affirmatively and with alacrity. I told them that I would pass their contact information on to you and that you might be in touch. They are Philip Cohen (pnc@unc.edu), who is in the Sociology Department, and Susan Parish (parish@email.unc.edu), in the School of Social Work.

Unfortunately, the Poverty Center will not be able to provide any funding for this event. Apparently, when the possibility of co-sponsoring this event first arose, the Center was not aware of any impending requests for financial assistance. We are more than happy to provide support in a number of other ways (posting an announcement on the website, help finding and contacting speakers, distribution of information to our listserv, etc.), but we do not have the monetary resources to contribute to the workshop. I apologize if we led you to believe otherwise.

It was lovely to speak with you this past Tuesday--I have heard many glowing comments about you from both Marion Crain and Laura Hogshead--and I look forward to meeting you in person. Please be in touch if I can be of any further use.

Heather

Heather Hunt
Assistant Director, Center on Poverty, Work and Opportunity
University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
(919) 843-9032

Jan Boxill wrote:

> Hi Heather,
> Thank you for calling as I was about to formulate a letter of support.
> I am attaching the proposal and will get you more information. Please > send me the name and contact information of the person who wrote the > policy paper for you. We will take it from there.
>
> Thanks again,
> Jan
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, February 9, 2007 8:48 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: [Fwd: Re: Disability workshop]

I know.
I looked through our brochure and it looks good. I did notice one thing immediately though--Faculty board and staff are in larger font! I wish now we'd done only 25 and then done others later. Oh well! We'll fix it for the next set.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Carlo Robustelli wrote:
> That is totally bogus. I was at that meeting and they made explicitly > clear that funding was on the table for this event specifically.
>
>
> - Carlo
> Carlo Robustelli
> Program Coordinator
> Parr Center for Ethics
> Department of Philosophy
> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
> CB #3125
> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
> USA
>
> Phone: (919) 843-5640
> email: carlo@unc.edu
> http://philosophy.unc.edu/robustelli.htm
>
>
> Jan Boxill wrote:
>> Here is the response from Heather Hunt. This is NOT what I expected.
>> I thought it was clear we wanted financial support from them when we >> first spoke.
>> But the Center people do want to participate.
>> I am going to approach the School of Social Work, through Kim >> Strom-Gottfried, the Jordan Institute.
>>
>> Jan
>>
>>
>> ----------
>>
>> Subject:
>> Re: Disability workshop
>> From:
>> Heather Hunt <hhunt@email.unc.edu>

>> Date:
>> Fri, 09 Feb 2007 17:56:05 -0500
>> To:
>> Jan Boxill <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
>>
>> To:
>> Jan Boxill <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
>>
>>
>> Hi Jan,
>>
>> Thank you for sending me the proposal for the Parr Center's >> disabilities workshop. I'm eager to see how the workshop takes >> shape--this is not an area I'm familiar with but it sounds complex, >> multifaceted and thought-provoking. I asked the two authors who >> wrote policy briefs that engaged issues of disability and poverty if >> they would be interested in the workshop and both responded >> affirmatively and with alacrity. I told them that I would pass their >> contact information on to you and that you might be in touch. They >> are Philip Cohen (pnc@unc.edu), who is in the Sociology Department, >> and Susan Parish (parish@email.unc.edu), in the School of Social Work.
>>
>> Unfortunately, the Poverty Center will not be able to provide any >> funding for this event. Apparently, when the possibility of >> co-sponsoring this event first arose, the Center was not aware of any >> impending requests for financial assistance. We are more than happy >> to provide support in a number of other ways (posting an announcement >> on the website, help finding and contacting speakers, distribution of >> information to our listserv, etc.), but we do not have the monetary >> resources to contribute to the workshop. I apologize if we led you >> to believe otherwise.
>>
>> It was lovely to speak with you this past Tuesday--I have heard many >> glowing comments about you from both Marion Crain and Laura >> Hogshead--and I look forward to meeting you in person. Please be in >> touch if I can be of any further use.
>>
>> Heather
>>
>> Heather Hunt
>> Assistant Director, Center on Poverty, Work and Opportunity
>> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
>> (919) 843-9032
>>
>> Jan Boxill wrote:
>>
>>> Hi Heather,
>>> Thank you for calling as I was about to formulate a letter of >>> support. I am attaching the proposal and will get you more >>> information. Please send me the name and contact information of the >>> person who wrote the policy paper for you. We will take it from there.
>>>
>>> Thanks again,
>>> Jan
>>>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Sunday, February 11, 2007 11:51 AM
To: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: formatted thesis]
Attach: formatted thesis.msg

---

get this done asap

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Disability and Disadvantage: Re-examining topics in moral and political philosophy

Budget

Accommodations (2 nights, 8 speakers)	$2480
Airport Transportation (8 speakers, incl. ADA accessible for 1)	$360
Food
Friday Dinner (13 people)	$390
Saturday Breakfast (entire workshop)	$100
Saturday Lunch (entire workshop)	$300
Saturday Dinner (entire workshop)	$400
Sunday Breakfast (entire workshop)	$100
Workshop room	$75
Staff OT	$500
Materials: Filming, cups, plates, etc.	$250
Advertising	$500
Printing- flyers, workshop materials	$175
Total	$5630

Other committed funding sources:

UNC Philosophy Department
Disability Services

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, February 12, 2007 9:43 PM
To: Fredrickson, Barbara L <blf@unc.edu>
Subject: Daniel Gilbert
Attach: Happiness flyer.pdf; Happiness letter.doc

Dear Professor Frederickson,
I believe Karen Gil sent you a notice that the Parr Center for Ethics is sponsoring a talk and seminar by Professor Daniel Gilbert. The public lecture is on Tuesday, February 20th and he will be presenting at one of our Philosophy seminars on Wednesday the 21st. Attached is a flyer and also a letter soliciting support. While you may not be able to financially support the event, I would ask that you publicize the public lecture and book signing.
Also, I would like to invite you to dinner with Daniel on Tuesday evening, before the lecture. If you and 3-4 of your colleagues or graduate students would like to join us, please let me know. I apologize for the late invitation, but I hope and your students you can attend.

If you have any questions, please feel free to call me.

Regards,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

The Parr Center for Ethics

"Stumbling on Happiness"

Dr. Daniel Gilbert

Professor of Psychology at Harvard University

Co-sponsored by the Department of Philosophy, and the Department of Biology, Student Congress, UNC Honor System and the Philosophy Club

DATE & TIME: Tuesday, February 20th 7:30 p.m.

LOCATION: Murphey Hall
Room 116

Dr. Daniel Gilbert of Harvard University will present a lecture based on his book, "Stumbling on Happiness." Utilizing the latest scientific research about the uniquely human ability to imagine the future, Dr. Gilbert describes the illusions of foresight that cause us to misconceive outcomes and misestimate our satisfactions.

For Further Information, please contact:
The Parr Center for Ethics
Phone 843-5640
Email: carlo@unc.edu

The Parr Center for Ethics
The University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
Caldwell Hall, CB #3125
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

The University
of North Carolina
at Chapel Hill
Caldwell Hall, CB# 3125
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

Jan Boxill, Director 919.962.3317 jmboxill@email.unc.edu

February 12, 2007

Dear Barbara,

The Parr Center for Ethics would like to invite you to participate in Professor Daniel Gilbert's visit to UNC in February. On February 20th, he will be giving a public lecture based on his book, Stumbling on Happiness. And on February 21st he will be participating in a graduate seminar in Philosophy of Psychology. If you or any of your colleagues and graduate students would like to attend, please let me know as soon as possible as space is limited for this seminar. The seminar meets Wednesday, February 21st from 4-6:30. The instructors for the course are Professors Jesse Prinz and Joshua Knobe and they have assigned specific readings for this session.

Dr. Daniel Gilbert is a Professor in the Department of Psychology at Harvard University. He will present a lecture based on his book, "Stumbling on Happiness." Utilizing the latest scientific research about the uniquely human ability to imagine the future, Dr. Gilbert describes the illusions of foresight that cause us to misconceive outcomes and misestimate our satisfactions.

It will cost approximately $2500 to bring Professor Gilbert to UNC-Chapel Hill. Therefore, we want to ask the Psychology Department to be a co-sponsor with us and contribute $250 to making this event possible. These funds will be used for travel and hotel accommodations.

I realize this is coming very late, but if you would like to attend either of the events and if Psychology can help sponsor this, please let me know as soon as possible. More information can be found on the Parr Center website at parrcenter.unc.edu

I would also like to invite you to have dinner with Professor Gilbert on Tuesday, February 20th at 6 p.m. I hope you and/or some of your colleagues can attend.

Thank you very much for your help.

Sincerely,

Dr. Jan Boxill
Director, Parr Center for Ethics

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, February 13, 2007 9:10 AM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>; Clark, Susan C <scclark@email.unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: Re: Daniel Gilbert]
Attach: Re Daniel Gilbert.msg

Psychology--has committed $250 for Gilbert

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, February 13, 2007 9:18 AM
To: Fredrickson, Barbara L <blf@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Daniel Gilbert

Hi Barbara,
Thanks so much. I am so sorry that we didn't connect earlier, but hopefully we can work things out that will be beneficial to you. Is there a class that you teach or one that someone else teaches on Wednesday morning that would be appropriate for him to join? And would you or any of your grad students be able to attend the PHIL seminar on Wednesday 4-6:30 in CW 213. Just let me know.

In recognition of your support, should we list as co-sponsor Psychology or your Kenan Professorship?

Thanks again,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, February 13, 2007 9:32 AM
To: Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: SWIP UK Women-Friendly Department Awards]
Attach: SWIP UK Women-Friendly Department Awards.msg

I want to nominate us for this award. It may not mean much in the grand scheme of things, but I think any recognition of this would be great. Do you want to write me something that I can send.

Thanks,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, February 13, 2007 10:29 AM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: Re: Daniel Gilbert]
Attach: Re Daniel Gilbert.msg

Gilbert in Psycholgy

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, February 13, 2007 10:46 AM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: Re: Daniel Gilbert]
Attach: Re Daniel Gilbert.msg

Carlo,
Can you check with Dan to see if he would be willing to meet with Prof Frederickson's class.
Also could you check with WUNC to see if they would be interested in having him on the radio?
Also, have we sent his visit to see if we could get it on the UNC webpage?

Thanks,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, February 13, 2007 11:16 AM
To: Jesse Prinz <jesse@subcortex.com>
Cc: Fredrickson, Barbara L <blf@unc.edu>
Subject: Kenan Seminar-Dan Gilbert

Hi Jesse,
You had indicated that you would like to have some psychology grad students to your seminar for Daniel Gilbert's visit. Professor Barbara Fredrickson, whose areas of research include emotions, well-being, & positive psychology, is excited about Gilbert's visit and would like to invite some of her grad students to your seminar. I would recommend that the two of you communicate to make this happen. I have included her on this email so you have her email and she yours.

Thanks,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, February 13, 2007 11:18 AM
To: Fredrickson, Barbara L <blf@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Daniel Gilbert

Hi Barbara,
We will invite Dan to come to your seminar.
There are three occasions for meals with him:
Tuesday dinner; Wednesday lunch; Wednesday dinner with Phil grad class.
I would like about 6-8 people at the first two--so 3-4 psych, 3-4 philosophy.

I have emailed Jesse Prinz, who is conducting the seminar along with Joshua Knobe regarding inviting your grad students. I copied you on the email, so you both have each other's emails.

Even if your students attend the seminar or if he attends yours, and they go to lunch, please encourage them to come to the public lecture.

Thanks so much.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Barbara L. Fredrickson wrote:
> Hi Jan,
>
> Why don't you just list Psychology as a co-sponsor -- no need to > single out my Kenan here.
>
> Wednesday morning is when my lab group meets -- if I can't make the > Tuesday dinner work, it would be a great alternative to invite Dan to > join my lab group (10-12).
> I put e-mails in to my regular babysitters, though.
>
> I'll also invite my students to consider the seminar. Can I have them
> RSVP for that by Wed afternoon? Or is that too late?
>
> Barb
>
> On 2/13/07, Jan Boxill <jmboxill@email.unc.edu> wrote:
>> Hi Barbara,
>> Thanks so much. I am so sorry that we didn't connect earlier, but >> hopefully we can work things out that will be beneficial to you. Is >> there a class that you teach or one that someone else teaches on >> Wednesday morning that would be appropriate for him to join? And would >> you or any of your grad students be able to attend the PHIL seminar on >> Wednesday 4-6:30 in CW 213. Just let me know.
>>
>> In recognition of your support, should we list as co-sponsor Psychology >> or your Kenan Professorship?
>>

>> Thanks again,
>> Jan
>>
>> Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
>> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
>> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
>> Department of Philosophy
>> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>> Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
>> Phone: 919-962-3317
>> FAX: 919-843-3929
>>
>>
>> >
>>
>>
>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, February 13, 2007 1:53 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: Re: Daniel Gilbert]
Attach: Re Daniel Gilbert.msg

I emailed her to thank her for taking the lead on her invites.

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, February 13, 2007 3:07 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: upcoming visit to Chapel Hill great.

---

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Carlo Robustelli wrote:
> I was going to send this to Dan Gilbert. What do you think?
>
> Dear Daniel,
>
> I hope your travels in Europe have been relaxing and enjoyable. I > know people are excited about your upcoming visit to Chapel Hill.
> Professor Barbara Fredrickson <http://www.unc.edu/peplab/>,
> Psychology, has asked if you would be available and willing to meet > with her lab group on Wednesday morning from 10 -12 pm. Dr.
> Fredrickson's areas of research include emotions, well-being, and > positive psychology. The Center has nothing scheduled for you during > this time but we hope to offer you both a stimulating and engaging > visit while enjoying the comfort of good food and southern > hospitality. So we certainly do not want to over schedule you while > you are visiting. I understand that you will also be meeting with > Jesse Prinz's and Joshua Knobe's Philosophy of Psychology seminar > later in the afternoon and wanted to make sure you would have enough > time to prepare.
>
> I will be sending you an itinerary and some information about > reimbursements shortly. I look forward to your response.
>
> Best,
> - Carlo Robustelli
>
> --
> Carlo Robustelli
> Program Coordinator
> Parr Center for Ethics
> Department of Philosophy
> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
> CB #3125
> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
> USA
>
> Phone: (919) 843-5640
> email: carlo@unc.edu
> http://philosophy.unc.edu/robustelli.htm

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, February 13, 2007 4:24 PM
To: Journal of Social Philosophy <jsp@gmu.edu>
Subject: Re: Journal of Social Philosophy Review Reminder

Kathalene,
I apologize for not getting back with you. I actually printed it off, started to read it, and then promptly misplaced. But interestingly I just found it on my desk this afternoon. So, I will read it and get my comments back to you, hopefully by Monday. Will that be okay?

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Journal of Social Philosophy wrote:
>
> Journal of Social Philosophy
> Carol Gould, Editor
>
> Department of Philosophy, George Mason University, Fairfax, VA, 22030
>
> ----------
>
>
>
> Dear Professor Boxill,
>
> I contacted you by email in January regarding a manuscript entitled > "Solving the MVP Problem." Professor Carol Gould has asked if you > would review this paper and give us your evaluation regarding > publication in the /Journal of Social Philosophy/.
>
> To date, I have not heard whether or not you are able to read this > paper. If you are able to complete the review, we welcome your > comments. If you are /unable/ to complete the review, please let me > know as soon as possible so that another reviewer may be selected. If > you have suggestions for an appropriate reader, we welcome your advice.
>
> Sincerely,
>
> Kathalene Razzano
> Managing Editor
> jsp@gmu.edu <mailto:jsp@gmu.edu>
>
>
> ----------
>
> Subject:
> Journal of Social Philosophy Review Request
> From:
> Journal of Social Philosophy <jsp@gmu.edu>

> Date:
> Tue, 16 Jan 2007 16:06:00 -0500
> To:
> jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>
> To:
> jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>
>
> Journal of Social Philosophy
> *Carol Gould, Editor *
>
> Department of Philosophy, George Mason University, Fairfax, VA, 22030
>
> ----------
>
>
>
> Professor Boxill,
>
> Carol Gould has asked if you would review the attached paper "Solving > the MVP Problem" and give us your evaluation of its suitability for > publication in the /Journal of Social Philosophy/. We depend on peer > reviewers for the evaluation of submitted manuscripts and she has > proposed you as an expert on the topic of the paper. You will find an > abstract at the end of this message.
>
> Kindly let us know right away whether or not you will be able to > review this manuscript. We would greatly appreciate receiving your > comments within six weeks. We prefer an electronic response with your > comments either in the body of an email or attached as a separate > document. If you cannot review this manuscript, any suggestions for > alternate reviewers would be welcomed.
>
> Thank you for your assistance in maintaining the standards of this > journal and for contributing to the debates within social philosophy.
> Please do not hesitate to contact me if you have any concerns or > questions about the review process.
>
> Sincerely,
>
> Kathalene Razzano
> Managing Editor
> jsp@gmu.edu <java-script:main.compose%28%27new%27,%27t=jsp@gmu.edu%27%29>
>
>
> /Journal of Social Philosophy
> /Department of Philosophy
> George Mason University
> 4400 University Drive, MS 3F1
> Fairfax, VA, 22030
> 703-993-4510
> 703-993-1297 (fax)
> http://www.blackwell-synergy.com/loi/josp
>
> SOLVING THE MVP PROBLEM
>
> ABSTRACT
>
> The largest professional team sports leagues in the United States give > out an award for the most valuable player (MVP). The notion of a > player?s value is also relevant toward other tasks that professional > teams engage in, e.g., drafting, paying, and trading players. This > notion is a complex one since an analysis of it must specify the type > of value involved. In this paper, I use the notions from ethics

> (instrumental and intrinsic value) and economics (substitution value) > to analyze the concept of the MVP. In the first part of this paper, I > begin by setting out the concept of the MVP. Specifically, I argue > that the value should be understood in terms of a player?s net benefit > to his team. In the second part of the paper, I analyze the notion of > a net benefit to a team. In the third part, I consider objections to > this analysis.
>
>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, February 14, 2007 9:40 AM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: upcoming visit to UNC

I made a few changes.

Carlo Robustelli wrote:
> I completely understand. I apologize for not having more specific > information about the NPR show. The NPR show would be taped between > 12-1 pm and your Father's class is at 3:30, so you wouldn't have to > rush from that to class to lecture. We do have dinner planned before > the lecture. Of course this may still be too much for one day and we > would completely understand but I wanted to clear up my > miscommunication.
>
> Best,
> - Carlo
> Carlo Robustelli
> Program Coordinator
> Parr Center for Ethics
> Department of Philosophy
> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
> CB #3125
> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
> USA
>
> Phone: (919) 843-5640
> email: carlo@unc.edu
> http://philosophy.unc.edu/robustelli.htm
>
>
> Daniel Gilbert wrote:
>> Yes, I have booked my flights. However, I am speaking to my dad's class in >> the afternoon and giving a public lecture in the evening, so I think an NPR >> show between the two would be a bit much. I don't want to be wiped out >> before the talk. Thanks.
>>
>>
>> -d.
>>
>> Prof. Daniel Gilbert
>> Department of Psychology
>> 1430 William James Hall
>> 33 Kirkland Street
>> Harvard University
>> Cambridge, MA 02138 USA
>>
>> Tel & Fax: 617.495.3892
>> Website: www.danielgilbert.com
>>
>> Assistant: Beth Mela, WJH 1456, 617.496.2595, bethmela@wjh.harvard.edu
>>
>> NOTICE: This email may contain disclaimers in tiny fonts that are closer >> than they appear in the mirror. No raw or uncooked foods were harmed in the >> production of this email, which neither includes nor implies batteries.
>>
>> -----Original Message-----
>> From: Carlo Robustelli [mailto:carlo@unc.edu]
>> Sent: Tuesday, February 13, 2007 3:57 PM

>> To: gilbert@wjh.harvard.edu
>> Subject: Re: upcoming visit to UNC
>>
>> Great! Have you booked your flights yet? If time permits the npr program
>> "The State of Things" is interested in having you on the show as a guest >> before the public lecture. This would be great publicity for your public >> lecture.
>>
>> Let me know you flight plans and if you are interested I will make the >> arrangements.
>>
>> - Carlo
>>
>> Carlo Robustelli
>> Program Coordinator
>> Parr Center for Ethics
>> Department of Philosophy
>> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill CB #3125 Chapel Hill, NC
>> 27599-3125 USA
>>
>> Phone: (919) 843-5640
>> email: carlo@unc.edu
>> http://philosophy.unc.edu/robustelli.htm
>>
>>
>>
>> Daniel Gilbert wrote:
>>
>>> Yes, I know Barb well and am happy to meet with her lab group on
>>>
>> Wednesday.
>>
>>> -d.
>>>
>>> Prof. Daniel Gilbert
>>> Department of Psychology
>>> 1430 William James Hall
>>> 33 Kirkland Street
>>> Harvard University
>>> Cambridge, MA 02138 USA
>>>
>>> Tel & Fax: 617.495.3892
>>> Website: www.danielgilbert.com
>>>
>>> Assistant: Beth Mela, WJH 1456, 617.496.2595, bethmela@wjh.harvard.edu
>>>
>>> NOTICE: This email may contain disclaimers in tiny fonts that are >>> closer than they appear in the mirror. No raw or uncooked foods were >>> harmed in the production of this email, which neither includes nor implies >> batteries.
>>>
>>
>>> -----Original Message-----
>>> From: Carlo Robustelli [mailto:carlo@unc.edu]
>>> Sent: Tuesday, February 13, 2007 3:18 PM
>>> To: Daniel Gilbert
>>> Subject: upcoming visit to UNC
>>>
>>> Dear Daniel,
>>>
>>> I hope your travels in Europe have been relaxing and enjoyable. I >>> know people are excited about your upcoming visit to Chapel Hill.
>>> Professor Barbara Fredrickson <http://www.unc.edu/peplab/>,
>>> Psychology, has asked if you would be available and willing to meet >>> with her lab group on Wednesday morning from 10 -12 pm. Dr. Fredrickson's >> areas of research

>>>
>>
>>> include emotions, well-being, and positive psychology. The Center has >>> nothing scheduled for you during this time but we hope to offer you >>> both a stimulating and engaging visit while enjoying the comfort of >>> good food and southern hospitality. So we certainly do not want to over
>>>
>> schedule
>>
>>> you while you are visiting. I understand that you will also be meeting >>> with Jesse Prinz's and Joshua Knobe's Philosophy of Psychology seminar >>> later in the afternoon and wanted to make sure you would have enough >>> time to prepare.
>>>
>>> I will be sending you an itinerary and some information about >>> reimbursements shortly. I look forward to your response.
>>> Best,
>>> - Carlo Robustelli
>>>
>>> --
>>> Carlo Robustelli
>>> Program Coordinator
>>> Parr Center for Ethics
>>> Department of Philosophy
>>> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill CB #3125 Chapel Hill, NC
>>> 27599-3125 USA
>>>
>>> Phone: (919) 843-5640
>>> email: carlo@unc.edu
>>> http://philosophy.unc.edu/robustelli.htm
>>>
>>>
>>>
>>
>>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Saturday, February 17, 2007 10:38 AM
To: Lange, Marc B <mlange@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: First year seminar

Interesting--it is on our list. I'll check on Monday again.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Marc Lange wrote:
> My proposal went through several years ago. I believe it was 2003. Are > you reviewing all of the seminars that were approved years ago?
>
> MBL
>
>
> Quoting Steve Weiss <weiss@cs.unc.edu>:
>
>> I don't have a record of your seminar proposal (Reason, religion, and >> reality...) coming through the FYS Steering Committee. It may have >> happened before I was in this job, or maybe it fell through a crack >> here. The proposal I have does not address some of the items >> required for a FYS proposal (take a look at the FYS web site -- >> http://www.unc.edu/fys/forms/seminarproposal.html.
>>
>> Steve Weiss
>> 2-1888
>>
>>
>
>
>
> Marc Lange
> Professor of Philosophy
> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
> Caldwell Hall
> CB#3125
> Chapel Hill, NC USA 27599-3125

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Sunday, February 18, 2007 9:08 PM
To: Maggie Little <littlem@georgetown.edu>
Subject: Re: Parable

Hi Maggie,
Thanks so much for coming and giving the workshop. It went very well and the feedback was uniformly superb. It had just the right number and combination of participants.
Bernie also said he really enjoyed your paper to the Department as well. I'm sorry I missed it.
Thanks again, and I'm glad it was a good visit for you as well.

Regards,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, February 21, 2007 10:19 AM
To: Mary Willingham <mwillingham@uncaa.unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: Re: course drop for AFAM 101]
Attach: Re course drop for AFAM 101.msg

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, February 21, 2007 5:53 PM
To: Lance Westerlund <westy@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Happiness Event Pictures

Great--esp the one that shows a full house-taken from the front to the back.

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Lance Westerlund wrote:
> Hi folks,
>
> I added a few pictures to the Happines event webpage:
>
> http://parrcenter.unc.edu/events/seminars/happiness/
>
> Let me know what you think. We have many more in case we want to link > to a new page of pictures. There are also pictures up on the Stem > Cell event page, although I need to do some redesigns after seeing how > the Happiness page came out.
>
> -Lance
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, February 22, 2007 9:17 AM
To: Blanton, Brent S <blanton@uncaa.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: PHIL275

We have not looked at the papers yet. We will tomorrow. By that I mean that we didn't have anyone put names, only PIDs. They are graded and then we will match names. So I don't know who has or has not turned them in.
Jan

>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, February 22, 2007 9:26 AM
To: Lange, Marc B <mlange@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Fwd: Re: First year seminar

I now see the issue. We submitted it for revision to cover more than one approach. This was originally approved as moral and philosophical. PH. We asked for it to be included in Physical and Life sciences PL AND World before 1750 WB. If it is approved for PL it will not be for PH. Which do you think it should most be--PH or PL?

Here is the description as it appears in the FYS courses:

*PHIL 085 [006F]: Reason, Religion, and Reality in the Copernican Revolution
*Philosophical and Moral Reasoning (PH) [GC Philosophical]
Marc Lange <../faculty/phil.html#lange>
The arguments by which Galileo and his contemporaries defended the Copernican model of the solar system (with the Earth and other planets revolving around the Sun) puzzle philosophers even today as they struggle to understand the logic of testing scientific theories. Was Copernicanism genuinely well-supported by Galileo's evidence? Or was the Church justified at the time in regarding Copernicanism as just one among many fairly successful techniques for predicting the night sky's appearance? Could Galileo argue for his telescope's reliability and use mere thought-experiments to defend Copernicanism? To grapple with these issues, we will explore some philosophical accounts of theory testing. Ultimately, we will gain a more nuanced conception of scientific reasoning and of how scientific revolutions occur.

Jan

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, February 22, 2007 10:04 AM
To: Tim Marr <marr@email.unc.edu>
Subject: CONGRATULATIONS

Hi Tim,
CONGRATULATONS on the Tanner Teaching Award. It is indeed MOST deserved.
Being on one of the other committees I have known about it for a while, but as is our charge had to keep it confidential!!! I can think of no one more deserving of this award. I must tell you I have been telling people in my class to take your AFAM 101 class, as I have used material that I have in my notes from sitting in on the class.

Once again, CONGRATULATIONS.

Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, February 22, 2007 10:35 AM
To: Lange, Marc B <mlange@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Fwd: Re: First year seminar

The present rule is that it can count for only one, even though it seems it should count for more.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Marc Lange wrote:
> Why can't it be both PH and PL? It seems to me that it has as much > claim to one as to the other? Do no courses count for both?
>
> Marc
>
> Quoting Jan Boxill <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>:
>
>> I now see the issue. We submitted it for revision to cover more than >> one approach. This was originally approved as moral and >> philosophical. PH. We asked for it to be included in Physical and >> Life sciences PL AND World before 1750 WB. If it is approved for PL >> it will not be for PH. Which do you think it should most be--PH or PL?
>>
>> Here is the description as it appears in the FYS courses:
>>
>> *PHIL 085 [006F]: Reason, Religion, and Reality in the Copernican >> Revolution
>> *Philosophical and Moral Reasoning (PH) [GC Philosophical]
>> Marc Lange <../faculty/phil.html#lange>
>> The arguments by which Galileo and his contemporaries defended the >> Copernican model of the solar system (with the Earth and other >> planets revolving around the Sun) puzzle philosophers even today as >> they struggle to understand the logic of testing scientific theories.
>> Was Copernicanism genuinely well-supported by Galileo's evidence? Or >> was the Church justified at the time in regarding Copernicanism as >> just one among many fairly successful techniques for predicting the >> night sky's appearance? Could Galileo argue for his telescope's >> reliability and use mere thought-experiments to defend Copernicanism?
>> To grapple with these issues, we will explore some philosophical >> accounts of theory testing. Ultimately, we will gain a more nuanced >> conception of scientific reasoning and of how scientific revolutions >> occur.
>>
>>
>>
>> Jan
>>
>>
>>
>

>
>
> Marc Lange
> Professor of Philosophy
> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
> Caldwell Hall
> CB#3125
> Chapel Hill, NC USA 27599-3125

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, February 22, 2007 12:04 PM
To: Daniel Gilbert <gilbert@wjh.harvard.edu>
Cc: 'Carlo Robustelli' <carlo@unc.edu>; Gilbert, Lawrence Irwin <LGilbert@bio.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Parr Center Event: Happiness

Hi Daniel,
On behalf of the Parr Center, I want to thank you for coming to UNC. I hope you enjoyed your visit as much as we enjoyed having you. I have to say, and I think I speak for all the Parr Center Staff, this has been the most successful of all our visitors in every way. The public lecture was outstanding and so well received. You were amazing at reaching everyone in that room-- but I was not surprised, as your father did say you were good!!! Meeting in the smaller groups was equally well received and well done. I wish I could have joined the seminar.

Thank you so very much for coming and a special thanks to your Father who suggested it. I'm so glad for all of us that we were able to bring this about. And I personally am happy to have had the opportunity to meet and have dinner with you.

I realize when we asked you to sign the contract form that we didn't actually give you a contract with details, but you will be receiving an honorarium of $1000 plus your expenses. You will be receiving all these details will be coming from Carlo Robustelli, but if you have any questions beforehand, feel free to contact him or me.
Thanks again. Good luck in all your appearances and book sales.

Best regards,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, February 22, 2007 12:23 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: New Rates at the Stone Center - FY 2007-2008]
Attach: New Rates at the Stone Center - FY 2007-2008.msg

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

SONJA HAYNES STONE CENTER FOR BLACK CULTURE AND HISTORY
UNC AT CHAPEL HILL

NEW RATES FOR
FISCAL YEAR 2007-2008

STONE CENTER THEATRE	$250/PER USE
SEMINAR ROOM(S)	$125 EACH/PER USE
CLASSROOM(S)	$150 EACH/PER USE
TERRACE	$100/PER USE
HITCHCOCK MULTIPURPOSE ROOM	$200 FOR BANQUET SET-UP/PER USE
HITCHCOCK MULTIPURPOSE ROOM	$150 MEETING ONLY/PER USE
LATE DEPARTURE FEE (AFTER 9:00 PM)	$50
CATERING FEE	10% OF CATERING BILL
EXTRAORDINARY CLEAN UP/DAMAGE	$30

THESE FEES WILL GO INTO EFFECT FOR PROGRAMS HELD AFTER 5:00 PM IN THE STONE CENTER.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, February 22, 2007 1:09 PM
To: Lange, Marc B <mlange@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Fwd: Re: First year seminar

Marc,
I have solved the mystery. A course can only satisfy one APPROACH, but can satisfy different CONNECTIONS.
So, here is the question? Do we want PHIL 085 to count for APPROACH: PHIL & MORAL REASONING as it stands now, or for PHYS & LIFE SCI;
We can still have it for NORTH ATLANTIC WORLD, AND WORLD BEFORE 1750.
Below is the breakdown of how these things fit. Confusing to say the least, but at least now I understand the rule.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, February 22, 2007 4:38 PM
To: Lange, Marc B <mlange@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Fwd: Re: First year seminar

I agree--we'll let it stand as Philosohical,
Thanks,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Marc Lange wrote:
> Thanks very much, Jan. I don't really care which APPROACH it > satisfies. Select whichever you think would do us the most good.
> (Perhaps it would be easiest just to leave well enough alone and not > try to change the APPROACH.)
>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Sunday, February 25, 2007 9:54 AM
To: Roberts, John Thomas <jtrosap@email.unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: IWU Philosophy Conference]
Attach: IWU Philosophy Conference.msg

For undergrads

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Laura E. Arnold <larnold@iwu.edu>
Sent: Saturday, February 24, 2007 11:26 PM
To: larnold@iwu.edu
Subject: IWU Philosophy Conference

Hello Again! I apologize for sending multiple emails to you, but I recieved word that the last email did not come through properly. Please foward this on to your students. We look forward to seeing your student's papers.

Laura Arnold
Illinois Wesleyan University

CALL FOR PAPERS
Illinois Wesleyan University
Undergraduate Philosophy Conference

March 30 & 31, 2007

Keynote Speaker: Professor John Heil
"The Myth of Multiple Realizability"

Papers in any area of philosophy are welcome. Both analytic and continental philosophers are encouraged to submit papers.
Word Limit: 3000 words

Submission Deadline: Friday, March 2

Electronic Submissions
Please save your paper as either a Microsoft Word file or as an RTF file and send it as an e-mail attachment to Regina Linsalata. (rlinsala@iwu.edu)

USPS Submissions
Please send full copies of your paper to:
Regina Linsalata
Department of Philosophy
Illinois Wesleyan University
P.O. Box 2900
Bloomington, Illinois 61702-2900

Contact person: Laura Arnold (larnold@iwu.edu)

Please Post

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, February 28, 2007 12:07 PM
To: Crowder, Deborah A <dacrowde@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: idiots.....

Wish I had this for this morning's class!!! We discussed Hardaway, so this would have been great!
thanks,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, March 1, 2007 9:44 AM
To: Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>
Subject: faculty assignments
Attach: Faculty Overview Nov 15,2006.xls; Faculty Assign 07-08.doc; Fall 2007 Schedule Feb 2,2007.xls

---

Here are the overviews, 07-08 assigns, Fall schedul.

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

PHILOSOPHY FACULTY

	A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I	J	K	L	M	N	O	P	Q
1
2	15-Nov-06	F 2000	S 2001	F 2001	S 2002	F 2002	S 2003	F 2003	S 2004	F 2004	S 2005	F 2005	S 2006	F 2006	S 2007	F 2007	S 2008
3
4	BAR-ON	38H,109	96,305T	110,305	20L,38L	LEAVE	20L, 35H	38H, 245	H32, 77	20L, 230	Leave	20, 116	Leave	Hnrs,990	397,700
5	B. BOXILL	22L,105	42L,205	55,159	6F	55,80	LEAVE	42L, 59	55, 390	42,80	55H, 270	42,78	42L,80	272L,274H	390,473
6	J. BOXILL	46L,22H	30L,47H	46	30,46	21, 30	Fellowship	46, 47	6F	66	47	Parr	Parr	FYS	275L
7	BRENNAN							130			84, 130		84, 184		384,698
8	CORRADO					113	Law	113	Law	113		113			FYS
9	HILL	72,102	6F,208	22H,102	37, 96	6F, 102	6F, 260	37H, 390	6F, 37	Leave	Leave	102, DGS	37H,390	FYS,460	360,765
10	HOFWEBER							20H, 80	20H, 300	21L,101	390	101, 305	Leave	155,356	73O,
11	KNOBE											20H, 38	20,109	101H,705	230,805
12	LANGE							38, 116	38, 390	6F, 123	69, 200	38H, Place	200, 390	230H.805	LV
13	LYCAN	LEAVE	LEAVE	21L,80	300T,305		96, 200	21L, 74	LEAVE	22L, 117	6F, 200	6F, 390	22L, 240	LV	LV
14	MACLEAN			67,78	22H,168	20H, 24	30L, 70	LEAVE	30L, 96	30H, 390	30L	Leave	Parr	FYS,368	163L,DGS
15	NETA					20L, 117	38,114	58L, 390	20L, 200	58, PI	20L, 305	Leave	20L, 114	LV	101L,700
16	NELSON													220,720	422,
17	NORD		32	32						32	32	45	32	134	285
18	PETTIT							32,32	32,35	32	35	32, 110	32, 74	134,230	134.145
19	POSTEMA	LEAVE	LEAVE	6F,213	41H,130	156	37,Law	295, 305	41L, 105	DGS, 380	Law, 390	Leave	Leave	Law	280H,990
20	PRINZ						20, 109	20L, 80	300, 240	116, 390	77, Adm	Leave	Leave	353,790	FYSH,805
21	REEVE			24,109	24,150	151, 305	56, 200	26L, 150	LEAVE	6F, 26L	56L, 210	26L, 109	6F, 305	112L,411	210H,990
22	ROBERTS	75,207	6F,121	LEAVE	31,108	LEAVE	LEAVE	31, 250	21L, 6F	21H, 31	Leave	6F. 108	31	351,805	150,DUS
23	SAYRE MCCORD	LEAVE	22L,112	22L,305	22L	22L	22L	365	22L	305/Wolf	22L	22L/Link	112	LV	160L
24	SIMMONS	6F	21L,305	LEAVE	LEAVE	21L, 101	305, 355	6F, 71	LEAVE	38, 111	Leave	H-32, 305	200, 300	155L,455	790,990
25	WALKER							34	112	Leave	178	34L	178	LV	MED
26	WOLF					46L, 305	46H, 112	22L, 300	LEAVE	305/GSM	305/Velle	Leave	Leave	805	805
27
28
29	VISITOR: PPE									153				170,284	160,170
30	VISITOR: PPE									67	31 or 68			160,163	163,165
31	VISITOR:PARR									39,41	39.41			164,165L	164,165
32	VISITOR									37,42	37,42			101,145	101,112
33	VISITOR							32,32	32, 35	32	35	32,110	32, 74	273,364
34	VISITOR										58,154			390	390
35	Visitor-

Faculty	Fall 2007		Spring 2008
Bar-On	HNRS 354	PHIL 735:Reasons w/Neta	PHIL 230: Experience & Reality	PHIL 445 Phil of Language
Boxill, Bernard	Phil 272-Large: PWAD-2	PHIL 390: Topics for majors	PHIL 274H Afro-American Poli	PHIL 770 w/ Hill
Boxill, Jan	Parr Center	PHIL 163: Practical Ethics	Parr Center	PHIL 266: Ethics in Sports
Brennan	XXX	XXX	PHIL 484: PPE Gateway	PHIL 698: PPE Capstone
Corrado	XXX	XXX	PHIL 480: Phil of Law	XXX
Hill	PHIL 170H: Social & Political	PHIL 460: History of Ethics	PHIL 397: Colloquium for Majors	PHIL 770 w/ B. Boxill
Hofweber	PHIL 790: Colloquium Series	PHIL 455: Advanced Logic	PHIL 155 large: Intro to Logic-4	PHIL 700-Logic
Knobe	PHIL 160: Intro to Ethics	PHIL 453: Phil of Psychology	FYS-Honors	PHIL 990: Reading Group
Lange	ASSOC CHAIR	PHIL 450: Phil of Science	FYS	PHIL 150Large:Intro Phil of Sci
Lesher	PHIL 210: Ancient	XXX	PHIL 210: Ancient	XXX
Lycan	PHIL 160H	PHIL 730: Metaphysics	PHIL 340-Mind	400-level
MacLean	DGS	Public Policy Seminar	DGS	PHIL 468: Risk & Society
Nelson	PHIL 229: 20th Century	PHIL 423: Kant	PHIL 220: Modern	Sem w/Reeve
Neta	PHIL 101 Large: Intro to Phil-4	PHIL 735 w/ BarOn	PHIL 335: Theory of Knowledge	Possible leave
Nord	PHIL 134: Phil of Religion	XXX	PHIL 285: Phil of Education	XXX
Pettit	XXX	XXX	XXX	XXX
Postema	Possible Leave or PHIL 170	Possible Leave or in LAW	Possible Leave	Possible Leave
Prinz	PLACEMENT	PHIL 353: Cognitive Science	PHIL 485: Phil of Art	PROTO
Reeve	PHIL 112 large:Making Sense-4	PHIL 412: Plato	PHIL 390-topics/or new submission	Sem w/ Nelson
Roberts	FYS	PHIL 451: Phil of Physics	Possible Research leave	Possible Research Leave
Sayre McCord	CHAIR	Seminar in ethics	PHIL 16O Large: Intro to Ethics-4	CHAIR
Simmons	FYS	PHIL 356:Topics in Math Logic	ADMISSIONS	PROTO
Walker	XXX	XXX	XXX	PHIL 495: Health Care
Wolf	PHIL 460: Topics in Moral Phil	790: Colloquium
New Hire-1
New Hire-2
Visitor 1: PPE	PHIL 384: PPE Gateway	PPE course	PPE course	PPE course
Visitor 2: Parr	PHIL 160: Intro to Ethics	PHIL 165: Bioethics	Ethics	Ethics
Visitor 3: BBT	PHIL 164: Business Ethics	PHIL 273: Social & Economic Justice	PHIL
Visitor 4:

First Year Seminars:	Fall:Roberts,Simmons	Spring: Knobe, Lange	DUS: Fall: Roberts; Spring: ??
Honors:	Fall: Hill, Lycan	Spring: Boxill, Knobe	DGS: McLean
Proto:		Spring: Simmons/Wolf	Placement:
Research Reading Group:	Fall: Neta	Spring: Knobe	Admissions:

Kenan Seminars:	Fall Sayre McCord	Spring: Bar-On/Neta	Assoc Chair: Lange
Summa	Fall: Wolf	Spring

PHILOSOPHY CLASSES FALL 2006

	A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I	J	K	L	M	N	O	P
1				February 2,2007		FALL 2007 SCHEDULE
2	PHIL				On Leave:
3
4	HNRS32	HNRS 354	3	Bar On	Honors-Philosophical			11-1:30 R				20		GM 210
5	6F	54		Roberts	Thinking About Time			3:30-4:45 MW				20
6	6F	68	1	Simmons	Paradoxes			2-4:30 W				20		MU 304
7	20	101	1	Neta	Intro: Main Problems			11 MWF				200		CW 103	4
8					Recitations: F: 10 & 11
9	20	101E	1	Staff	Intro: Main Problems: Evening			6-7:15 MW				40		CW 105	1
10	24	110	1	Staff	Great Works			3:30 TR				36		PE 216	1
11	26	112	1	Reeve	Making Sense of Ourselves			12 MW				188		MA 209	4
12					Recitations F: 12 & 1
13	32	134	1	Nord	Phil of Religion			2 TR				40		CW105
14	35	134	2	Staff	Phil of Religion			MWF 2				40		PE 216	1
15	21	155	1	Staff	Intro Symbolic Logic			8 TR				50		CW 105	1
16	21	155	2	Staff	Intro Symbolic Logic			11TR				50		CW 105	1
17	22	160	1	Staff	Intro to Ethics			8 TR				40		CW 105	1
18	22	160	2	Staff	Intro to Ethics			2 MWF				40		CW 105	V-1
19	22	160	3	Staff	Intro to Ethics			2 TR				36		CW 103	1	LeBar
20	30	163	1	J.Boxill	Practical Ethics			11 TR				35
21	39	164	1	Staff	Morality and Business			12:30 TR				40			V-2
22	34	165	1	Staff	Bioethics			9 MWF				40			V-1
23	34	165	2	Staff	Bioethics			9:30 TR				40			1	change to a 163-LeBar
24	34	165	3	Staff	Bioethics			6-7:15 TR				40		CW 105	1
25	37	170	1	Postema	Social Ethics & Pol Thought			9:30 TR				35				Saenz
26	37H	170H	1	Hill	Social Ethics & Pol Thought-Hon			11-12:15 MW				25		CW 213
27		229	1	Nelson	20th Century Phil			2 TR				40
28	38	230	1	Staff	Experience and Reality			3:30 TR				40		CW 105	1
29	38	230	2	Staff	Experience and Reality			8 TR				40		CW 105	1
30	42	272	1	B. Boxill	Ethics Peace, War, Defense			MW 10				100		GA 008	2
31					Recitations F: 9 & 10							25		SC 210
32	66	273	1	Staff	Social & Econ Justice			1MWF				45		CW 105	V-3	Moehler
33	46	275	1	Staff	Phil Issues Feminism (WMST 46)			3:30 TR				40		CW 105	1	Saenz
34	41	280	1	Staff	Phil of Law			3:30 TR				40			V-2
35	77	353	1	Prinz	Cognitive Science			12:30 TR				25		CW 103
36	71	356	1	Simmons	Topics in Logic			9:30-10:45 MW				25		CW 213
37	84	384	1	Staff	PPE: Gateway			4:35-5:40 MW				35			V-3	Moehler
38	80	390	1	B. Boxill	Special Topics-Liberty & Equality			2-4:30- W				25		CW 213
39	96	396	1	J. Boxill	Directed Readings			6-8:30 T				5		CW 208
40	96	396	2	J. Boxill	Readings: Ethics Bowl			6-8:30 T				10		CW 208
41	150	412	1	Reeve	Plato			4-6:30 M				25		CW 103
42	155	423	1	Nelson	Kant			11-12:15 TR				25
43	110	445	1	BarOn	Phil of Language			4-6:30 R				25		CW 213
44	108	450	1	Lange	Phil of Science			1-3:30 R				25		CW 208
45		451	1	Roberts	Phil of Physics/Physics 313			11-12:15 MW				25
46	109	453	1	Knobe	Phil of Psychology			T 1-3:30				25		CW 213
47	101	455	1	Hofweber	Advanced Symbolic Logic			10-11:15 MW				25		PE 216
48		691	1	Roberts	Honors			6-8:30 W						CW 213
49	230	730	1	Lycan	Metaphysics:Modalities			1-3:30 W				15		CW 213
50		735	1	Neta/Bar On	Reasons			4-6:30 R
51	260	760	1	Wolf	Moral Theory:Utilitarianism			4-6:30 T				15		CW 213
52		785	1	Maclean	Policy Analysis/PLCY 780			2 TR				25
53	290	790	1	Hofweber	Colloquium Seminar			TBA				15
54	290	790	2	Wolf	Colloquium Ceminar			TBA				15

PHILOSOPHY CLASSES FALL 2006

	A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I	J	K	L	M	N	O	P
55	300	800	1	Staff	Bibliography			TBA
56	360	860	1	Sayre McCord	Seminar:Ethical Theory			4-6:30 M				15		CW 213
57	390	990	1	Neta	Reading Group			TBA
58	390	990	2	Staff	Reading Group			TBA
59
60	Hnrs 32	Hnrs 354	3	Bar On	Self Knowledge			11 TR				25
61	22	160H	1	Lycan	Intro Ethics: Honors			2 TR				25
62	37H	170H	1	Hill	Social & Poltiical Honors			10-11:15 MW				25		CW 213
63	20	101E	1	Staff	Intro:Main Problems Evening			6 MW				40		CW 105	1
64
65
66
67					RECITATIONS
68
69	20	PHIL 101	601					10F				25		AL 205
70			602					10F				25		MU 105
71			603					10F				25		HN 307
72			604					10F				25
73			605					10F				25
74			606					11F				25		PH 222
75			607					11F				25		SM 107
76			608					11F				25		CW 105
77			605					11F				25		WG 301A
78			606					11F				25		GA 103
79			607					11F				25		MT 305
80			608					11F				25		PE 204
81
82	26	PHIL 112	601					12F				25		SM 107
83			602					12F				25		AL 203
84			603					12F				25		GA 001
85			604					12F				25		PH 228
86			605					1F				25		GA 103
87			606					1F				25		GA 009
88			607					1F				25		PE 216
89			608					1F
90												25		SC 209
91	42	PHIL 272	601					9F				25		MT 205
92			602					9F				25		PE 010
93			603					10F				25
94			604					10F				25		PE 215

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, March 1, 2007 8:10 PM
To: Stephens, John B <stephens@sog.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Ethics, feminist through, collaboration Attach: Moral Orientation and Moral Development.pdf

Hi John,
Thanks for joining us for lunch--so sorry about the mix-up. Thanks for sharing your ideas.
Thanks for sending the material as well.

Here is the article by Carol Gilligan.piece. I hope it helps.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Moral Orientation and Moral Development

Carol Gilligan

Summary

In her book, In a Different Voice, Carol Gilligan cited empirical studies of moral development and identified a moral perspective focused on care. This perspective differed from the orientation toward justice that represents a dominant tradition in moral theory and that frames the choice of all-male samples in the developmental studies of Jean Piaget and Lawrence Kohlberg. The care perspective, voiced by the women Gilligan studied, has largely been obscured in both philosophical and psychological studies of moral judgment. In this article, Gilligan addresses the question of the relationship between the two moral orientations. She draws an analogy to the ambiguous figure of Gestalt psychology to illuminate her position. Like the figure that may be seen as a vase or as two female profiles, or the drawing that may be seen as a duck or as a rabbit, a situation of moral consequence may be framed in terms of justice or in terms of care. The care and justice perspectives, claims Gilligan, cannot simply be integrated, nor are they polar opposites. But as in the case of the ambiguous figures, so we can see the same situation only from one perspective at a time. We can shift our view, but we cannot see both images or moral frames simultaneously. Updating the research begun in her book, Gilligan uses later studies to elucidate why the care perspective has not been recognized and to clarify the relation of gender and moral perspective. She examines the roots of the two moral orientations and tentatively explores the significance of a moral viewpoint articulated by women.

E.F.K.

When one looks at an ambiguous figure like the drawing that can be seen as a young or old woman, or the image of the vase and the faces, one initially sees it in only one way. Yet even after seeing it in both ways, one way often seems more compelling. This phenomenon reflects the laws of perceptual organization that favor certain modes of visual grouping. But it also suggests a tendency to view reality as unequivocal and thus to argue that there is one right or better way of seeing.

From Women and Moral Theory by Eva Feder Kittay and Diana T. Myers, eds. Copyright © 1987 by Rowman & Littlefield. Reprinted by permission.

The experiments of the Gestalt psychologists on perceptual organization provide a series of demonstrations that the same proximal pattern can be organized in different ways so that, for example, the same figure can be seen as a square or a diamond, depending on its orientation in relation to a surrounding frame. Subsequent studies show that the context influencing which of two possible organizations will be chosen may depend not only on the features of the array presented but also on the perceiver's past experience or expectation. Thus, a bird-watcher and a rabbit-keeper are likely to see the duck-rabbit figure in different ways; yet this difference does not imply that one way is better or a higher form of perceptual organization. It does, however, call attention to the fact that the rabbit-keeper, perceiving the rabbit, may not see the ambiguity of the figure until someone points out that it can also be seen as a duck.

This paper presents a similar phenomenon with respect to moral judgment, describing two moral perspectives that organize thinking in different ways. The analogy to ambiguous figure perception arises from the observation that although people are aware of both perspectives, they tend to adopt one or the other in defining and resolving moral conflict. Since moral judgments organize thinking about choice in difficult situations, the adoption of a single perspective may facilitate clarity of decision. But the wish for clarity may also imply a compelling human need for resolution or closure, especially in the face of decisions that give rise to discomfort or unease. Thus, the search for clarity in seeing may blend with a search for justification, encouraging the position that there is one right or better way to think about moral problems. This question, which has been the subject of intense theological and philosophical debate, becomes of interest to the psychologist not only because of its psychological dimensions—the tendency to focus on one perspective and the wish for justification—but also because one moral perspective currently dominates psychological thinking and is embedded in the most widely used measure for assessing the maturity of moral reasoning.

In describing an alternative standpoint, I will reconstruct the account of moral development around two moral perspectives, grounded in different dimensions of relationship that give rise to moral concern. The justice perspective, often equated with moral reasoning, is recast as one way of seeing moral problems and a care perspective is brought forward as an alternate vision or frame. The distinction between justice and care as alternative perspectives or moral orientations is based empirically on the observation that a shift in the focus of attention from concerns about justice to concerns about care changes the definition of what constitutes a moral problem, and leads the same situation to be seen in different ways. Theoretically, the distinction between justice and care cuts across the familiar divisions between thinking and feeling, egoism and altruism, theoretical and practical reasoning. It calls attention to the fact that all human relationships, public and private, can be characterized both in terms of equality and in terms of attachment, and that both inequality and detachment constitute grounds for moral concern. Since everyone is vulnerable both to oppression and to abandonment, two moral visions—one of justice and one of care—recur in human experience. The moral injunctions, not to act unfairly toward others, and not to turn away from someone in need, capture these different concerns.

The conception of the moral domain as comprised of at least two moral orientations raises new questions about observed differences in moral judgment and the disagreements to which they give rise. Key to this revision is the distinction between differences in developmental stage (more or less adequate positions within a single orientation) and differences in orientation (alternative perspectives or frameworks). The findings reported in this paper of an association between moral orientation and gender speak directly to the continuing controversy over sex differences in moral reasoning. In doing so, however, they also offer an empirical explanation for why previous thinking about moral development has been organized largely within the justice framework.

My research on moral orientation derives from an observation made in the course of studying the relationship between moral judgment and action. Two studies, one of college students describing their experiences of moral conflict and choice, and one of pregnant women who were considering abortion, shifted the focus of attention from the ways people reason about hypothetical dilemmas to the ways people construct moral conflicts and choices in their lives. This change in approach made it possible to see what experiences people define in moral terms, and to explore the relationship between the understanding of moral problems and the reasoning strategies used and the actions taken in attempting to resolve them. In this context, I observed that women, especially when speaking about their own experiences of moral conflict and choice, often define moral problems in a way that eludes the categories of moral theory and is at odds with the assumptions that shape psychological thinking about morality and about the self.[1] This discovery, that a different voice often guides the moral judgments and the actions of women, called attention to a major design problem in previous moral judgment research: namely, the use of all-male samples as the empirical basis for theory construction.

The selection of an all-male sample as the basis for generalizations that are applied to both males and females is logically inconsistent. As a research strategy, the decision to begin with a single-sex sample is inherently problematic, since the categories of analysis will tend to be defined on the basis of the initial data gathered and subsequent studies will tend to be restricted to these categories. Piaget's work on the moral judgment of the child illustrates these problems since he defined the evolution of children's consciousness and practice of rules on the basis of his study of boys playing marbles, and then undertook a study of girls to assess the generality of his findings. Observing a series of differences both in the structure of girls' games and "in the actual mentality of little girls," he deemed these differences not of interest because "it was not this contrast which we proposed to study." Girls, Piaget found, "rather complicated our interrogatory in relation to what we know about boys," since the changes in their conception of rules, although following the same sequence observed in boys, did not stand in the same relation to social experience. Nevertheless, he concluded that "in spite of these differences in the structure of the game and apparently in the players' mentality, we find the same process at work as in the evolution of the game of marbles."[2]

Thus, girls were of interest insofar as they were similar to boys and confirmed the generality of Piaget's findings. The differences noted, which included a greater tolerance, a greater tendency toward innovation in solving conflicts, a greater willingness to make exceptions to rules, and a lesser concern with legal elaboration, were not seen as germane to "the psychology of rules," and therefore were regarded as insignificant for the study of children's moral judgment. Given the confusion that currently surrounds the discussion of sex differences in moral judgment, it is important to emphasize that the differences observed by Piaget did not pertain to girls' understanding of rules per se or to the development of the idea of justice in their thinking, but rather to the way girls structured their games and their approach to conflict resolution—that is, to their use rather than their understanding of the logic of rules and justice.

Kohlberg, in his research on moral development, did not encounter these problems since he equated moral development with the development of justice reasoning and initially used an all-male sample as the basis for theory and test construction. In response to his critics, Kohlberg has recently modified his claims, renaming his test a measure of "justice reasoning" rather than of "moral maturity" and acknowledging the presence of a care perspective in people's moral thinking.[3] But the widespread use of Kohlberg's measure as a measure of moral development together with his own continuing tendency to equate justice reasoning with moral judgment leaves the problem of orientation differences unsolved. More specifically, Kohlberg's efforts to assimilate thinking about care to the six-stage developmental sequence he derived and refined by analyzing changes in justice reasoning (relying centrally on his all-male longitudinal sample), underscores the continuing importance of the points raised in this paper concerning (1) the distinction between differences in developmental stage within a single orientation and differences in orientation, and (2) the fact that the moral thinking of girls and women was not examined in establishing either the meaning or the measurement of moral judgment within contemporary psychology.

An analysis of the language and logic of men's and women's moral reasoning about a range of hypothetical and real dilemmas underlies the distinction elaborated in this paper between a justice and a care perspective. The empirical association of care reasoning with women suggests that discrepancies observed between moral theory and the moral judgments of girls and women may reflect a shift in perspective, a change in moral orientation. Like the figure-ground shift in ambiguous figure perception, justice and care as moral perspectives are not opposites or mirror-images of one another, with justice uncaring and care unjust. Instead, these perspectives denote different ways of organizing the basic elements of moral judgment: self, others, and the relationship between them. With the shift in perspective from justice to care, the organizing dimension of relationship changes from inequality/equality to attachment/detachment, reorganizing thoughts, feelings, and language so that words connoting relationship like "dependence" or "responsibility" or even moral terms such as "fairness" and "care" take on different meanings. To organize relationships in terms of attachment rather than in terms of equality changes the way human connection is imagined, so that the images or metaphors of relationship shift from hierarchy or balance to network or web. In addition, each organizing framework leads to a different way of imagining the self as a moral agent.

From a justice perspective, the self as moral agent stands as the figure against a ground of social relationships, judging the conflicting claims of self and others against a standard of equality or equal respect (the Categorical imperative, the Golden Rule). From a care perspective, the relationship becomes the figure, defining self and others. Within the context of relationship, the self as a moral agent perceives and responds to the perception of need. The shift in moral perspective is manifest by a change in the moral question from "What is just?" to "How to respond?"

For example, adolescents asked to described a moral dilemma often speak about peer or family pressure in which case the moral question becomes how to maintain moral principles or standards and resist the influence of one's parents or friends. "I have a right to my religious opinions," one teenager explains, referring to a religious difference with his parents. Yet, he adds, "I respect their views." The same dilemma, however, is also construed by adolescents as a problem of attachment, in which case the moral question becomes: how to respond both to oneself and to one's friends or one's parents, how to maintain or strengthen connection in the face of differences in belief. "I understand their fear of my new religious ideas," one teenager explains, referring to her religious disagreement with her parents, "but they really ought to listen to me and try to understand my beliefs."

One can see these two statements as two versions of essentially the same thing. Both teenagers present self-justifying arguments about religious disagreement; both address the claims of self and of others in a way that honors both. Yet each frames the problem in different terms, and the use of moral language points to different concerns. The first speaker casts the problem in terms of individual rights that must be respected within the relationship. In other words, the figure of the considering is the self looking on the disagreeing selves in relationship, and the aim is to get the other selves to acknowledge the right to disagree. In the case of the second speaker, figure and ground shift. The relationship becomes the figure of the considering, and relationships are seen to require listening and efforts at understanding differences in belief. Rather than the right to disagree, the speaker focuses on caring to hear and to be heard. Attention shifts from the grounds for agreement (rights and respect) to the grounds for understanding (listening and speaking, hearing and being heard). This shift is marked by a change in moral language from the stating of separate claims to rights and respect ("I have a right . . . I respect their views.") to the activities of relationship—the injunction to listen and try to understand ("I understand . . . they ought to listen . . . and try to understand."). The metaphor of moral voice itself carries the terms of the care perspective and reveals how the language chosen for moral theory is not orientation neutral.

The language of the public abortion debate, for example, reveals a justice perspective. Whether the abortion dilemma is cast as a conflict of rights or in terms of respect for human life, the claims of the fetus and of the pregnant woman are balanced or placed in opposition. The morality of abortion decisions thus construed hinges on the scholastic or metaphysical question as to whether the fetus is a life or a person, and whether its claims take precedence over those of the pregnant woman. Framed as a problem of care, the dilemma posed by abortion shifts. The connection between the fetus and the pregnant woman becomes the focus of attention and the question becomes whether it is responsible or irresponsible, caring or careless, to extend or to end this connection. In this construction, the abortion dilemma arises because there is no way not to act, and no way of acting that does not alter the connection between self and others. To ask what actions constitute care or are more caring directs attention to the parameters of connection and the costs of detachment, which become subjects of moral concern.

Finally, two medical students, each reporting a decision not to turn in someone who has violated the school rules against drinking, cast their decision in different terms. One student constructs the decision as an act of mercy, a decision to override justice in light of the fact that the violator has shown "the proper degrees of contrition." In addition, this student raises the question as to whether or not the alcohol policy is just, i.e., whether the school has the right to prohibit drinking. The other student explains the decision not to turn in a proctor who was drinking on the basis that turning him in is not a good way to respond to this problem, since it would dissolve the relationship between them and thus cut off an avenue for help. In addition, this student raises the question as to whether the proctor sees his drinking as a problem.

This example points to an important distinction, between care as understood or construed within a justice framework and care as a framework or a perspective on moral decision. Within a justice construction, care becomes the mercy that tempers justice; or connotes the special obligations or supererogatory duties that arise in personal relationships; or signifies altruism freely chosen—a decision to modulate the strict demands of justice by considering equity or showing forgiveness; or characterizes a choice to sacrifice the claims of the self. All of these interpretations of care leave the basic assumptions of a justice framework intact: the division between the self and others, the logic of reciprocity or equal respect.

As a moral perspective, care is less well elaborated, and there is no ready vocabulary in moral theory to describe its terms. As a framework for moral decision, care is grounded in the assumption that self and other are interdependent, an assumption reflected in a view of action as responsive and, therefore, as arising in relationship rather than the view of action as emanating from within the self and, therefore, "self governed." Seen as responsive, the self is by definition connected to others, responding to perceptions, interpreting events, and governed by the organizing tendencies of human interaction and human language. Within this framework, detachment, whether from self or from others, is morally problematic, since it breeds moral blindness or indifference—a failure to discern or respond to need. The question of what responses constitute care and what responses lead to hurt draws attention to the fact that one's own terms may differ from those of others. Justice in this context becomes understood as respect for people in their own terms.

The medical student's decision not to turn in the proctor for drinking reflects a judgment that turning him in is not the best way to respond to the drinking problem, itself seen as a sign of detachment or lack of concern. Caring for the proctor thus raises the question of what actions are most likely to ameliorate this problem, a decision that leads to the question of what are the proctor's terms.

The shift in organizing perspective here is marked by the fact that the first student does not consider the terms of the other as potentially different but instead assumes one set of terms. Thus the student alone becomes the arbiter of what is the proper degree of contrition. The second student, in turn, does not attend to the question of whether the alcohol policy itself is just or fair. Thus each student discusses an aspect of the problem that the other does not mention.

These examples are intended to illustrate two cross-cutting perspectives that do not negate one another but focus attention on different dimensions of the situation, creating a sense of ambiguity around the question of what is the problem to be solved. Systematic research on moral orientation as a dimension of moral judgment and action initially addressed three questions (1) Do people articulate concerns about justice and concerns about care in discussing a moral dilemma? (2) Do people tend to focus their attention on one set of concerns and minimally represent the other? and (3) Is there an association between moral orientation and gender? Evidence from studies that included a common set of questions about actual experiences of moral conflict and matched samples of males and females provides affirmative answers to all three questions.

When asked to describe a moral conflict they had faced, 55 out of 80 (69 percent) educationally advantaged North American adolescents and adults raised considerations of both justice and care. Two-thirds (54 out of 80) however, focused their attention on one set of concerns. with focus defined as 75 percent or more of the considerations raised pertaining either to justice or to care. Thus the person who presented, say, two care considerations in discussing a moral conflict was more likely to give a third, fourth, and fifth than to balance care and justice concerns—a finding consonant with the assumption that justice and care constitute organizing frameworks for moral decision. The men and the women involved in this study (high school students, college students, medical students, and adult professionals) were equally likely to demonstrate the focus phenomenon (two-thirds of both sexes fell into the outlying focus categories). There were, however, sex differences in the direction of focus. With one exception, all of the men who focused, focused on justice. The women divided, with roughly one third focusing on justice and one third on care.[4]

These findings clarify the different voice phenomenon and its implications for moral theory and for women. First, it is notable that if women were eliminated from the research sample, care focus in moral reasoning would virtually disappear. Although care focus was by no means characteristic of all women, it was almost exclusively a female phenomenon in this sample of educationally advantaged North Americans. Second, the fact that the women were advantaged means that the focus on care cannot readily be attributed to educational deficit or occupational disadvantage—the explanation Kohlberg and others have given for findings of lower levels of justice reasoning in women.[5] Instead, the focus on care in women's moral reasoning draws attention to the limitations of a justice-focused moral theory and highlights the presence of care concerns in the moral thinking of both women and men. In this light, the Care/Justice group composed of one third of the women and one third of the men becomes of particular interest, pointing to the need for further research that attends to the way people organize justice and care in relation to one another—whether, for example, people alternate perspectives, like seeing the rabbit and the duck in the rabbit-duck figure, or integrate the two perspectives in a way that resolves or sustains ambiguity.

Third, if the moral domain is comprised of at least two moral orientations, the focus phenomenon suggests that people have a tendency to lose sight of one moral perspective in arriving at moral decisions—a liability equally shared by both sexes. The present findings further suggest that men and women tend to lose sight of different perspectives. The most striking result is the virtual absence of care-focus reasoning among the men. Since the men raised concerns about care in discussing moral conflicts and thus presented care concerns as morally relevant, a question is why they did not elaborate these concerns to a greater extent.

In summary, it becomes clear why attention to women's moral thinking led to the identification of a different voice and raised questions about the place of justice and care within a comprehensive moral theory. It also is clear how the selection of an all-male sample for research on moral judgment fosters an equation of morality with justice, providing little data discrepant with this view. In the present study, data discrepant with a justice-focused moral theory comes from a third of the women. Previously, such women were seen as having a problem understanding "morality." Yet these women may also be seen as exposing the problem in a justice-focused moral theory. This may explain the decision of researchers to exclude girls and women at the initial stage of moral judgment research. If one begins with the premise that "all morality consists in respect for rules,"[6] or "virtue is one and its name is justice,"[7] then women are likely to appear problematic within moral theory. If one begins with women's moral judgments, the problem becomes how to construct a theory that encompasses care as a focus of moral attention rather than as a subsidiary moral concern.

The implications of moral orientation for moral theory and for research on moral development are extended by a study designed and conducted by Kay Johnston.[8] Johnston set out to explore the relationship between moral orientation and problem-solving strategies, creating a standard method using fables for assessing spontaneous moral orientation and orientation preference.* She asked 60 eleven- and fifteen-year-olds to state and to solve the moral problem posed by the fable. Then she asked: "Is there another way to solve this problem?" Most of the children initially constructed the fable problems either in terms of justice or in terms of care; either they stood back from the situation and appealed to a rule or principle for adjudicating the conflicting claims or they entered the situation in an effort to discover or create a way of responding to all of the needs. About half of the children, slightly more fifteen- than eleven-year-olds, spontaneously switched moral orientation when asked whether there was another way to solve the problem. Others did so following an interviewer's cue as to the form such a switch might take. Finally, the children were asked which of the solutions they described was the best solution. Most of the children answered the question and explained why one way was preferable.

Johnston found gender differences parallel to those previously reported, with boys more often spontaneously using and preferring justice solutions and girls more often spontaneously using and preferring care solutions. In addition, she found differences between the two fables she used, confirming Langdale's finding that moral orientation is associated both with the gender of the reasoner and with the dilemma considered.[9] Finally, the fact that children, at least by the age of eleven, are able to shift moral orientation and can explain the logic of two moral perspectives, each associated with a different problem-solving strategy, heightens the analogy to ambiguous figure perception and further supports the conception of justice and care as organizing frameworks for moral decision.

The demonstration that children know both orientations and can frame and solve moral problems in at least two different ways means that the choice of moral standpoint is an element of moral decision. The role of the self in moral judgment thus includes the choice of moral standpoint, and this decision, whether implicit or explicit, may become linked with self-respect and self-definition. Especially in adolescence when choice becomes more self-conscious and self-reflective, moral standpoint may become entwined with identity and self-esteem. Johnston's finding that spontaneous moral orientation and preferred orientation are not always the same raises a number of questions as to why and under what conditions a person may adopt a problem-solving strategy that he or she sees as not the best way to solve the problem.

* Editor's note: For an example of one of the fables used in the study, see Diana T. Meyers' chapter, this volume, p. 139.

The way people chose to frame or solve a moral problem is clearly not the only way in which they can think about the problem, and is not necessarily the way they deem preferable. Moral judgments thus do not reveal the structure of moral thinking, since there are at least two ways in which people can structure moral problems. Johnston's demonstration of orientation-switch poses a serious challenge to the methods that have been used in moral judgment and moral development research, introducing a major interpretive caution. The fact that boys and girls at eleven and fifteen understand and distinguish the logics of justice and care reasoning directs attention to the origins and the development of both ways of thinking. In addition, the tendency for boys and girls to use and prefer different orientations when solving the same problem raises a number of questions about the relationship between these orientations and the factors influencing their representation. The different patterns of orientation use and preference, as well as the different conceptions of justice and of care implied or elaborated in the fable judgments, suggest that moral development cannot be mapped along a single linear stage sequence.

One way of explaining these findings, suggested by Johnston, joins Vygotsky's theory of cognitive development with Chodorow's analysis of sex differences in early childhood experiences of relationship.[10] Vygotsky posits that all of the higher cognitive functions originate as actual relations between individuals. Justice and care as moral ideas and as reasoning strategies thus would originate as relationships with others—an idea consonant with the derivation of justice and care reasoning from experiences of inequality and attachment in early childhood. All children are born into a situation of inequality in that they are less capable than the adults and older children around them and, in this sense, more helpless and less powerful. In addition, no child survives in the absence of some kind of adult attachment—or care, and through this experience of relationship children discover the responsiveness of human connection including their ability to move and affect one another.

Through the experience of inequality, of being in the less powerful position, children learn what it means to depend on the authority and the good will of others. As a result, they tend to strive for equality of greater power, and for freedom. Through the experience of attachment, children discover the ways in which people are able to care for and to hurt one another. The child's vulnerability to oppression and to abandonment thus can be seen to lay the groundwork for the moral visions of justice and care, conceived as ideals of human relationship and defining the ways in which people "should" act toward one another.

Chodorow's work then provides a way of explaining why care concerns tend to be minimally represented by men and why such concerns are less frequently elaborated in moral theory. Chodorow joins the dynamics of gender identity formation (the identification of oneself as male or female) to an analysis of early childhood relationships and examines the effects of maternal child care on the inner structuring of self in relation to others. Further, she differentiates a positional sense of self from a personal sense of self, contrasting a self defined in terms of role or position from a self known through the experience of connection. Her point is that maternal child care fosters the continuation of a relational sense of self in girls, since female gender identity is consonant with feeling connected with one's mother. For boys, gender identity is in tension with mother-child connection, unless that connection is structured in terms of sexual opposition (e.g., as an Oedipal drama). Thus, although boys experience responsiveness or care in relationships, knowledge of care or the need for care, when associated with mothers, poses a threat to masculine identity.[11]

Chodorow's work is limited by her reliance on object relations theory and problematic on that count. Object relations theory ties the formation of the self to the experience of separation, joining separation with individuation and thus counterposing the experience of self to the experience of connection with others. This is the line that Chodorow traces in explicating male development. Within this framework, girls' connections with their mothers can only be seen as problematic. Connection with others or the capacity to feel and think with others is, by definition, in tension with self-development when self-development or individuation is linked to separation. Thus, object-relations theory sustains a series of oppositions that have been central in Western thought and moral theory, including the opposition between thought and feelings, self and relationship, reason and compassion, justice and love. Object relations theory also continues the conventional division of psychological labor between women and men. Since the idea of a self, experienced in the context of attachment with others, is theoretically impossible, mothers, described as objects, are viewed as selfless, without a self. This view is essentially problematic for women, divorcing the activity of mothering from desire, knowledge, and agency, and implying that insofar as a mother experiences herself as a subject rather than as an object (a mirror reflecting her child), she is "selfish" and not a good mother. Winnicott's phrase "good-enough mother" represents an effort to temper this judgment.

Thus, psychologists and philosophers, aligning the self and morality with separation and autonomy—the ability to be self-governing—have associated care with self-sacrifice, or with feelings—a view at odds with the current position that care represents a way of knowing and a coherent moral perspective. This position, however, is well represented in literature written by women. For example the short story "A Jury of Her Peers," written by Susan Glaspell in 1917, a time when women ordinarily did not serve on juries, contrasts two ways of knowing that underlie two ways of interpreting and solving a crime.[12] The story centers on a murder; Minnie Foster is suspected of killing her husband.

A neighbor woman and the sheriff's wife accompany the sheriff and the prosecutor to the house of the accused woman. The men, representing the law, seek evidence that will convince a jury to convict the suspect. The women, collecting things to bring Minnie Foster in jail, enter in this way into the lives lived in the house. Taking in rather than taking apart, they begin to assemble observations and impressions, connecting them to past experience and observations until suddenly they compose a familiar pattern, like the log-cabin pattern they recognize in the quilt Minnie Foster was making. "Why do we know—what we know this minute?" one woman asks the other, but she also offers the following explanation:

> We live close together, and we live far apart. We all go through the same things—it's all just a different kind of the same thing! If it weren't—why do you and I understand.[13]

The activity of quilt-making—collecting odd scraps and piecing them together until they form a pattern—becomes the metaphor for this way of knowing. Discovering a strangled canary buried under pieces of quilting, the women make a series of connections that lead them to understand what happened.

The logic that says you don't kill a man because he has killed a bird, the judgment that finds these acts wildly incommensurate, is counterposed to the logic that sees both events as part of a larger pattern—a pattern of detachment and abandonment that led finally to the strangling. "I wish I'd come over here once in a while," Mrs. Hale, the neighbor exclaims. "That was a crime! Who's going to punish that?" Mrs. Peters, the sheriff's wife, recalls that when she was a girl and a boy killed her cat, "if they hadn't held me back I would have" and realizes that there had been no one to restrain Minnie Foster. John Foster was known as "a good man . . . he didn't drink, and he kept his word as well as most, I guess, and paid his debts." But he also was "a hard man," Mrs. Hale explains, "like a raw wind that gets to the bone."

Seeing detachment as the crime with murder as its ultimate extension, implicating themselves and also seeing the connection between their own and Minnie Foster's actions, the women solve the crime by attachment—by joining together, like the "knotting" that joins pieces of a quilt. In the decision to remove rather than to reveal the evidence, they separate themselves from a legal system in which they have no voice but also no way of voicing what they have come to understand. In choosing to connect themselves with one another and with Minnie, they separate themselves from the law that would use their understanding and their knowledge as grounds for further separation and killing.

In a law school class where a film-version of this story was shown, the students were divided in their assessment of the moral problem and in their evaluation of the various characters and actions. Some focused on the murder, the strangling of the husband. Some focused on the evidence of abandonment or indifference to others. Responses to a questionnaire showed a bi-modal distribution, indicating two ways of viewing the film. These different perspectives led to different ways of evaluating both the act of murder and the women's decision to remove the evidence. Responses to the film were not aligned with the sex of the viewer in an absolute way, thus dispelling any implication of biological determinism or of a stark division between the way women and men know or judge events. The knowledge gained inductively by the women in the film, however, was also gained more readily by women watching the film, who came in this way to see a logic in the women's actions and to articulate a rationale for their silence.

The analogy to ambiguous figure perception is useful here in several ways. First, it suggests that people can see a situation in more than one way, and even alternate ways of seeing, combining them without reducing them—like designating the rabbit-duck figure both duck and rabbit. Second, the analogy argues against the tendency to construe justice and care as opposites or mirror-images and also against the implication that these two perspectives are readily integrated or fused. The ambiguous figure directs attention to the way in which a change in perspective can reorganize perception and change understanding, without implying an underlying reality or pure form. What makes seeing both moral perspectives so difficult is precisely that the orientations are not opposites nor mirror images or better and worse representations of a single moral truth. The terms of one perspective do not contain the terms of the other. Instead, a shift in orientation denotes a restructuring of moral perception, changing the meaning of moral language and thus the definition of moral conflict and moral action. For example, detachment is considered the hallmark of mature moral thinking within a justice perspective, signifying the ability to judge dispassionately, to weigh evidence in an even-handed manner, balancing the claims of others and self. From a care perspective, detachment is the moral problem.

> "I could've come," retorted Mrs. Hale . . . "I wish I had come over to see Minnie Foster sometimes. I can see now . . . If there had been years and years of—nothing, then a bird to sing to you, it would be awful—still—after the bird was still. . . . I know what stillness is."

The difference between agreement and understanding captures the different logics of justice and care reasoning, one seeking grounds for agreement, one seeking grounds for understanding, one assuming separation and thus the need for some external structure of connection, one assuming connection and thus the potential for understanding. These assumptions run deep, generating and reflecting different views of human nature and the human condition. They also point to different vulnerabilities and different sources of error. The potential error in justice reasoning lies in its latent egocentrism, the tendency to confuse one's perspective with an objective standpoint or truth, the temptation to define others in one's own terms by putting oneself in their place. The potential error in care reasoning lies in the tendency to forget that one has terms, creating a tendency to enter into another's perspective and to see oneself as "selfless" by defining oneself in other's terms. These two types of error underlie two common equations that signify distortions or deformations of justice and care: the equation of human with male, unjust in its omission of women; and the equation of care with self-sacrifice, uncaring in its failure to represent the activity and the agency of care.

The equation of human with male was assumed in the Platonic and in the Enlightenment tradition as well as by psychologists who saw all-male samples as "representative" of human experience. The equation of care with self-sacrifice is in some ways more complex. The premise of self-interest assumes a conflict of interest between self and other manifest in the opposition of egoism and altruism. Together, the equations of male with human and of care with self-sacrifice form a circle that has had a powerful hold on moral philosophy and psychology. The conjunction of women and moral theory thus challenges the traditional definition of human and calls for a reconsideration of what is meant by both justice and care.

To trace moral development along two distinct although intersecting dimensions of relationship suggests the possibility of different permutations of justice and care reasoning, different ways these two moral perspectives can be understood and represented in relation to one another. For example, one perspective may overshadow or eclipse the other, so that one is brightly illuminated while the other is dimly remembered, familiar but for the most part forgotten. The way in which one story about relationship obscures another was evident in high-school girls' definitions of dependence. These definitions highlighted two meanings—one arising from the opposition between dependence and independence, and one from the opposition of dependence to isolation ("No woman," one student observed, "is an island.") As the word "dependence" connotes the experience of relationship, this shift in the implied opposite of dependence indicates how the valence of relationship changes, when connection with others is experienced as an impediment to autonomy or independence, and when it is experienced as a source of comfort and pleasure, and a protection against isolation. This essential ambivalence of human connection provides a powerful emotional grounding for two moral perspectives, and also may indicate what is at stake in the effort to reduce morality to a single perspective.

It is easy to understand the ascendance of justice reasoning and of justice-focused moral theories in a society where care is associated with personal vulnerability in the form of economic disadvantage. But another way of thinking about the ascendance of justice reasoning and also about sex differences in moral development is suggested in the novel Masks, written by Fumiko Enchi, a Japanese woman.[14] The subject is spirit possession, and the novel dramatizes what it means to be possessed by the spirits of others. Writing about the Rokujo lady in the Tales of Genji, Enchi's central character notes that:

> Her soul alternates uncertainly between lyricism and spirit possession, making no philosophical distinction between the self alone and in relation to others, and is unable to achieve the solace of a religious indifference.[15]

The option of transcendence, of a religious indifference or a philosophical detachment, may be less available to women because women are more likely to be possessed by the spirits and the stories of others. The strength of women's moral perceptions lies in the refusal of detachment and depersonalization, and insistence on making connections that can lead to seeing the person killed in war or living in poverty as someone's son or father or brother or sister, or mother, or daughter, or friend. But the liability of women's development is also underscored by Enchi's novel in that women, possessed by the spirits of others, also are more likely to be caught in a chain of false attachments. If women are at the present time the custodians of a story about human attachment and interdependence, not only within the family but also in the world at large, then questions arise as to how this story can be kept alive and how moral theory can sustain this story. In this sense, the relationship between women and moral theory itself becomes one of interdependence.

By rendering a care perspective more coherent and making its terms explicit, moral theory may facilitate women's ability to speak about their experiences and perceptions and may foster the ability of others to listen and to understand. At the same time, the evidence of care focus in women's moral thinking suggests that the study of women's development may provide a natural history of moral development in which care is ascendant, revealing the ways in which creating and sustaining responsive connection with others becomes or remains a central moral concern. The promise in joining women and moral theory lies in the fact that human survival, in the late twentieth century, may depend less on formal agreement than on human connection.

Notes

1. Gilligan, C. (1977). "In a Different Voice: Women's Conceptions of Self and of Morality." Harvard Educational Review 47 (1982):481–517; In a Different Voice: Psychological Theory and Women's Development. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.
2. Piaget, J. (1965). The Moral Judgment of the Child. New York, N.Y.: The Free Press Paperback Edition, pp. 76–84.
3. Kohlberg, L. (1984). The Psychology of Moral Development. San Francisco, Calif.: Harper & Row, Publishers, Inc.
4. Gilligan, C. and J. Attanucci. (1986). Two Moral Orientations. Harvard University, unpublished manuscript.
5. See Kohlberg, L. op. cit., also Walker, L. (1984). "Sex Differences in the Development of Moral Reasoning: A Critical Review of the literature." Child Development 55 (3):677–91.
6. Piaget, R., op. cit.
7. Kohlberg, L., op. cit.
8. Johnston, K. (1985). Two Moral Orientations—Two Problem-solving Strategies: Adolescents' Solutions to Dilemmas in Fables. Harvard University, unpublished doctoral dissertation.
9. Langdale, C. (I 983). Moral Orientation and Moral Development: The Analysis of Care and Justice Reasoning Across Different Dilemmas in Females and Males from Childhood through Adulthood. Harvard University, unpublished doctoral dissertation.
10. Johnston, K., op. cit.; Vygotsky, L. (1978). Mind in Society. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press; Chodorow, N. (1974). "Family Structure and Feminine Personality" in Women, Culture and Society, L. M. Rosaldo and L. Lamphere, eds., Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press; see also Chodorow, N. (1978). The Reproduction of Mothering: Psychoanalysis and the Sociology of Gender. Berkeley, Calif.: University of California Press.
11. Chodorow, N., op. cit.
12. Glaspell, S. (1927). A Jury of Her Peers, London: E. Benn.
13. Ibid.
14. Fumiko, E. (1983). Masks. New York: Random House.
15. Ibid. p. 54.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, March 6, 2007 10:32 AM
To: Boxill, Bernard R <brboxill@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Teaching Schedule

Hi,
Your teaching schedule for:
FALL:

PHIL 272:Peace, War Defense-Large class with 2 TAs: MW 12 in GA 008
PHIL 390: Special Topics in CW 213

Tentative Spring:

PHIL 274H: Afro-American Political
PHIL 770: Seminar with Tom Hill

Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, March 6, 2007 10:37 AM
To: Wolf, Susan R <susanw@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: courses for next fall

I am sending out assignments right now, so here is your schedule:

Fall:
PHIL 760: Seminar in Utilitarianism Tuesday 4-6:30
PHIL 790: Colloquium

We need to talk about Spring, as I don't have anything yet scheduled.

Thanks,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, March 6, 2007 11:15 AM
To: Wolf, Susan R <susanw@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: courses for next fall

Colloquium is a course for 3rd year's to prepare for their bibliogaphy;
it isn't a class that meets or that you have any duties for.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Susan Wolf wrote:
> Right.
> Great about the utilitarianism class.
> What does being assigned the Colloquium mean?
>
> Thanks for the prompt reply!
>
> Susan
>
> Jan Boxill wrote:
>> I am sending out assignments right now, so here is your schedule:
>>
>> Fall:
>> PHIL 760: Seminar in Utilitarianism Tuesday 4-6:30
>> PHIL 790: Colloquium We need to talk about Spring, as I don't have >> anything yet scheduled.
>>
>> Thanks,
>> Jan
>>
>> Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
>> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
>> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
>> Department of Philosophy
>> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>> Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
>> Phone: 919-962-3317
>> FAX: 919-843-3929
>>
>>
>>
>>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, March 6, 2007 11:36 AM
To: Wolf, Susan R <susanw@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: courses for next fall

Oh yes!!! That's the BEST course to be assigned! :)

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Susan Wolf wrote:
> How nice!
>
> Jan Boxill wrote:
>> Colloquium is a course for 3rd year's to prepare for their >> bibliogaphy; it isn't a class that meets or that you have any duties >> for.
>> Jan
>>
>> Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
>> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
>> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
>> Department of Philosophy
>> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>> Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
>> Phone: 919-962-3317
>> FAX: 919-843-3929
>>
>>
>>
>> Susan Wolf wrote:
>>> Right.
>>> Great about the utilitarianism class.
>>> What does being assigned the Colloquium mean?
>>>
>>> Thanks for the prompt reply!
>>>
>>> Susan
>>>
>>> Jan Boxill wrote:
>>>> I am sending out assignments right now, so here is your schedule:
>>>>
>>>> Fall:
>>>> PHIL 760: Seminar in Utilitarianism Tuesday 4-6:30
>>>> PHIL 790: Colloquium We need to talk about Spring, as I don't have >>>> anything yet scheduled.
>>>>
>>>> Thanks,
>>>> Jan
>>>>
>>>> Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
>>>> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
>>>> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair

>>>> Department of Philosophy
>>>> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>>>> Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
>>>> Phone: 919-962-3317
>>>> FAX: 919-843-3929
>>>>
>>>>
>>>>
>>>>
>>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, March 6, 2007 12:15 PM
To: Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>
Cc: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Teaching Schedule-07-08
Attach: Faculty Assign 07-08.doc; Fall 2007 Schedule March 6,2007.xls

---

Hi Geoff,
Here is your teaching schedule for:

FALL 2007:
PHIL 860: Seminar in Ethics M 4-6:30 in CW 208
Chair

SPRING 2008:
PHIL 160: Intro to Ethics-Large class with 4 TAs
Chair

I'm attaching the latest schedule for you to look at overall and also attaching the faculty assignment sheet. I did discover in sending out the assignments that I don't have an official second class for Josh Knobe. I'll have to talk with him.

I've sent out all the assignments- firm for Fall, Tentative for Spring.

Thanks,
Jan

Faculty	Fall 2007		Spring 2008
Bar-On	HNRS 354	PHIL 735:Reasons w/Neta	PHIL 230: Experience & Reality	PHIL 445 Phil of Language
Boxill, Bernard	Phil 272-Large: PWAD-2	PHIL 390: Topics for majors	PHIL 274H Afro-American Poli	PHIL 770 w/ Hill
Boxill, Jan	Parr Center	PHIL 163: Practical Ethics	Parr Center	DUS
Brennan	XXX	XXX	PHIL 484: PPE Gateway	PHIL 698: PPE Capstone
Corrado	XXX	XXX	PHIL 480: Phil of Law	XXX
Hill	PHIL 170H: Social & Political	PHIL 460: Topics in Ethics	PHIL 397: Colloquium for Majors	PHIL 770 w/ B. Boxill
Hofweber	PHIL 790: Colloquium Series	PHIL 455: Advanced Logic	PHIL 155 large: Intro to Logic-4	PHIL 700-Logic
Knobe	PHIL 160: Intro to Ethics	PHIL 453: Phil of Psychology	FYS-Honors	PHIL 990: Reading Group
Lange	ASSOC CHAIR	PHIL 450: Phil of Science	FYS	PHIL 150Large:Intro Phil of Sci
Lesher	PHIL 210: Ancient	XXX	PHIL 210: Ancient	XXX
Lycan	PHIL 160H	PHIL 730: Metaphysics	PHIL 340-Mind	400-level
MacLean	DGS	Public Policy Seminar	DGS	PHIL 468: Risk & Society
Nelson	PHIL 229: 20th Century	PHIL 990: Reading Group	PHIL 423: Kant	Sem w/Reeve
Neta	PHIL 101 Large: Intro to Phil-4	PHIL 735 w/ BarOn	PHIL 335: Theory of Knowledge	Colloquium
Nord	PHIL 134: Phil of Religion	XXX	PHIL 285: Phil of Education	XXX
Pettit	XXX	XXX	XXX	XXX
Postema	R&S Leave	R&S leave	PHIL 170	Law School Course
Prinz	PLACEMENT	PHIL 353: Cognitive Science	PHIL 485: Phil of Art	PROTO
Reeve	PHIL 112 large:Making Sense-4	PHIL 412: Plato	PHIL 390-topics/or new submission	Sem w/ Nelson
Roberts	FYS	PHIL 451: Phil of Physics	R&S leave	R&S Leave
Sayre McCord	CHAIR	PHIL 860:Kenan Seminar in Ethics	PHIL 16O Large: Intro to Ethics-4	CHAIR
Simmons	FYS	PHIL 356:Topics in Math Logic	ADMISSIONS	PROTO
Walker	XXX	XXX	XXX	PHIL 495: Health Care
Wolf	PHIL 760: Utilitarianism	790: Colloquium
New Hire-1
New Hire-2
Visitor 1: PPE	PHIL 384: PPE Gateway	PPE course	PPE course	PPE course
Visitor 2: Parr	PHIL 160: Intro to Ethics	PHIL 165: Bioethics	Ethics	Ethics
Visitor 3: BBT	PHIL 164: Business Ethics	PHIL 273: Social & Economic Justice	PHIL
Visitor 4:

First Year Seminars:	Fall:Roberts,Simmons	Spring: Knobe, Lange	DUS: Fall: Roberts; Spring: Boxill
Honors:	Fall: Hill, Lycan	Spring: Boxill, Knobe	DGS: McLean
Proto:		Spring: Simmons/Prinz	Placement: Prinz
Research Reading Group:	Fall: Nelson	Spring: Knobe	Admissions: Simmons

Kenan Seminars:	Fall Sayre McCord	Spring: ???	Assoc Chair: Lange
Summa	Fall: Wolf	Spring: Neta

Honors-Philosophical
1.2
1
0.8
0.6
0.4
0.2
0 Honors-Philosophical
Paradoxes
Intro: Main Problems
Recitations: F: 10 & 11
Intro: Main Problems: Evening
Great Works
Making Sense of Ourselves
Recitations F: 12 & 1
Phil of Religion
Phil of Religion
Intro Symbolic Logic
Intro Symbolic Logic
Intro to Ethics
Intro to Ethics
Intro to Ethics
Intro Ethics:Honor
Practical Ethics
Practical Ethics
Morality and Business
Bioethics
Bioethics
Social Ethics & Pol Thought
Social Ethics & Pol Thought-Hon
20th Century Phil
Experience and Reality
Experience and Reality
Ethics Peace, War, Defense
Recitations F 12&1
Social & Econ Justice
Phil Issues Feminism (WMST 46)
Phil of Law
Cognitive Science
Topics in Logic
Contemp. Ethical Theories
PPE: Gateway
Special Topics-Liberty & Equality
Directed Readings
Readings: Ethics Bowl
Plato
Kant
Phil of Science
Phil of Physics/Physics 313
Phil of Psychology
Advanced Symbolic Logic
Honors
Honors
Metaphysics:Modalities
Reasons
Moral Theory:Utilitarianism
Policy Analysis/PLCY 780
Colloquium Seminar
Colloquium Ceminar
Bibliography
Seminar:Ethical Theory
Reading Group
Reading Group
Simm
On McCord
Staff
1
1
1
1
1
2
1
1
2
1
2
3
1
1
2
1
1
3
1
1
1
1
2
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
2
1
1
2

PHILOSOPHY CLASSES FALL 2006

	A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I	J	K	L	M	N	O	P
1				March 1 2007		FALL 2007 SCHEDULE
2	PHIL				On Leave:
3
4	HNRS32	HNRS 354	3	Bar On	Honors-Philosophical			9:30-12 R				20		CW 213
5	6F	54		Roberts	Thinking About Time			3:30-4:45 MW				20		CW 103
6	6F	55	1	Simmons	Paradoxes			2-4:30 W				20		AR 118
7	20	101	1	Neta	Intro: Main Problems			11 MWF				200		HM 100	4
8					Recitations: F: 10 & 11
9	20	101E	1	Staff	Intro: Main Problems: Evening			6-7:15 MW				40		CW 105	1
10	24	110	1	Staff	Great Works			3:30 TR				36		PE 216	1
11	26	112	1	Reeve	Making Sense of Ourselves			12 MW				200		CP 211	4
12					Recitations F: 12 & 1
13	32	134	2	Nord	Phil of Religion			2 TR				40		PE 216
14	35	134	1	Staff	Phil of Religion			MWF 2				40		PE 216	1
15	21	155	1	Staff	Intro Symbolic Logic			8 TR				50		CW 105	1
16	21	155	2	Staff	Intro Symbolic Logic			11TR				50		CW 105	1
17	22	160	1	Staff	Intro to Ethics			8 TR				36		CW 103	1
18	22	160	2	Staff	Intro to Ethics			2 MWF				40		CW 105	V-1
19	22	160	3	LeBar	Intro to Ethics			2 TR				36		CW 103	1
20		160H	1	Lycan	Intro Ethics:Honor			12:30-1:45 TR				25		MU 115
21	30	163	1	J.Boxill	Practical Ethics			11 TR				35		CW 103
22		163	2	Lebar	Practical Ethics			9:30 TR				40		CW 105
23	39	164	1	Staff	Morality and Business			12:30 TR				40		CW 105	V-2
24	34	165	1	Staff	Bioethics			9 MWF				40		CW 105	V-1
25	34	165	3	Staff	Bioethics			6-7:15 TR				40		CW 105	1
26	37	170	1	Staff	Social Ethics & Pol Thought			9:30 TR				35		CW 103		Saenz
27	37H	170H	1	Hill	Social Ethics & Pol Thought-Hon			11-12:15 MW				25		CW 213
28		229	1	Nelson	20th Century Phil			2 TR				40		CW 105
29	38	230	1	Staff	Experience and Reality			3:30 TR				36		CW 103	1
30	38	230	2	Staff	Experience and Reality			8 TR				36		PE 216	1
31	42	272	1	B. Boxill	Ethics Peace, War, Defense			MW 12				100		GA 008	2
32					Recitations F 12&1							25		SC 210
33	66	273	1	Staff	Social & Econ Justice			1MWF				45		CW 105	V-3	Moehler
34	46	275	1	Staff	Phil Issues Feminism (WMST 46)			3:30 TR				40		CW 105	1	Saenz
35	41	280	1	Staff	Phil of Law			3:30 TR				40		MU 112	V-2
36	77	353	1	Prinz	Cognitive Science			12:30 TR				25		CW 103
37	71	356	1	Simmons	Topics in Logic			9:30-10:45 MW				25		CW 213
38		362		Hill	Contemp. Ethical Theories			4-6:30 W				25		CW 213
39	84	384	1	Staff	PPE: Gateway			4:35-5:40 MW				35		CW 105	V-3	Moehler
40	80	390	1	B. Boxill	Special Topics-Liberty & Equality			2-4:30- W				25		CW 213
41	96	396	1	Roberts	Directed Readings			6-8:30 T				5		CW 208
42	96	396	2	J. Boxill	Readings: Ethics Bowl			6-8:30 T				10		CW 208
43	150	412	1	Reeve	Plato			4-6:30 W				25		MU 314
44	155	423	1	cancel	Kant			11-12:15 TR				25		PE 216
45	108	450	1	Lange	Phil of Science			1-3:30 R				25		CW 208
46		451	1	Roberts	Phil of Physics/Physics 313			11-11:50 MWF				25		CW 103
47	109	453	1	Knobe	Phil of Psychology			T 1-3:30				25		CW 213
48	101	455	1	Hofweber	Advanced Symbolic Logic			9:30-10:45 TR				25		PE 216
49		691H	1	Roberts	Honors			6-8:30 W				25		CW 213
50		692H	1		Honors			TBA				25		CW 213
51	230	730	1	Lycan	Metaphysics:Modalities			1-3:30 W				15		CW 208
52		735	1	Neta/Bar-On	Reasons			1-3:30 R				15		CW 213
53	260	760	1	Wolf	Moral Theory:Utilitarianism			4-6:30 T				15		CW 213
54		785	1	Maclean	Policy Analysis/PLCY 780			3:30-4:45 TR				25		MU 118

PHILOSOPHY CLASSES FALL 2006

	A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I	J	K	L	M	N	O	P
55	290	790	1	Hofweber	Colloquium Seminar			TBA				15
56	290	790	2	Wolf	Colloquium Ceminar			TBA				15
57	300	800	1	Staff	Bibliography			TBA
58	360	860	1	Sayre McCord	Seminar:Ethical Theory			4-6:30 M				15		CW 208
59	390	990	1	Nelson	Reading Group			4-6:30 R						CW 208
60	390	990	2	Staff	Reading Group			TBA
61
62
63
64
65					RECITATIONS
66
67	20	PHIL 101	601					11F				25		AL 205
68			602					11F				25		MU 105
69			603					11F				25		HN 307
70			604					11F				25
71			605					10F				25
72			606					10F				25		PH 222
73			607					10F				25		SM 107
74			608					10F				25		CW 105
75
76	26	PHIL 112	601					12F				25		SM 107
77			602					12F				25		AL 203
78			603					12F				25		GA 001
79			604					12F				25		PH 228
80			605					1F				25		GA 103
81			606					1F				25		GA 009
82			607					1F				25		PE 216
83			608					1F
84												25		SC 209
85	42	PHIL 272	601					12F				25		MT 205
86			602					12F				25		PE 010
87			603					1F				25
88			604					1F				25		PE 215

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, March 6, 2007 12:22 PM
To: cdcreeve@mac.com
Subject: Re: Teaching 07-08

David,
I didn't know either, but just called to discover it is a new building behind Phillips Hall called CHAPMAN HALL.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

cdcreeve@mac.com wrote:
> That looks great, Jan. Thanks. What is CP?
> On Mar 6, 2007, at 12:02 PM, Jan Boxill wrote:
>
>> Hi David,
>> Here is your teaching schedule for:
>>
>> FALL 2007:
>> PHIL 112: Making Sense of Ourselves-large class with 4 TAs MW 12 in >> CP 211
>> PHIL 412: Plato W 4-6:30
>>
>> SPRING 2008: Tentative:
>> PHIL 390: Special Topics [or newly submitted course]
>> Seminar with Nelson.
>>
>> If you have any questions or concerns, please feel free to talk with me.
>>
>> Thanks,
>> Jan
>>
>> --Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
>> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
>> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
>> Department of Philosophy
>> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>> Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
>> Phone: 919-962-3317
>> FAX: 919-843-3929
>>
>>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, March 6, 2007 12:42 PM
To: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Teaching Schedule-07-08

Geoff,
We figured out the Josh situation--it's done.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Jan Boxill wrote:
> Hi Geoff,
> Here is your teaching schedule for:
>
> FALL 2007:
> PHIL 860: Seminar in Ethics M 4-6:30 in CW 208
> Chair
>
> SPRING 2008:
> PHIL 160: Intro to Ethics-Large class with 4 TAs
> Chair
>
> I'm attaching the latest schedule for you to look at overall and also > attaching the faculty assignment sheet. I did discover in sending out > the assignments that I don't have an official second class for Josh > Knobe. I'll have to talk with him.
>
> I've sent out all the assignments- firm for Fall, Tentative for Spring.
> Thanks,
> Jan

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, March 6, 2007 1:01 PM
To: Lange, Marc B <mlange@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Schedule info
Attach: Fall 2007 Schedule March 6,2007.xls; Faculty Assign 07-08.doc; Faculty Overview Mar 1,2007.xls

---

Hi Marc,
Here are some attachments that help understand the scheduling--I hope!!!
The overview may not reflect 07-08 correctly, but all else should be good.

Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Honors-Philosophical
1.2
1
0.8
0.6
0.4
0.2
0 Honors-Philosophical
Paradoxes
Intro: Main Problems
Recitations: F: 10 & 11
Intro: Main Problems: Evening
Great Works
Making Sense of Ourselves
Recitations F: 12 & 1
Phil of Religion
Phil of Religion
Intro Symbolic Logic
Intro Symbolic Logic
Intro to Ethics
Intro to Ethics
Intro to Ethics
Intro Ethics:Honor
Practical Ethics
Practical Ethics
Morality and Business
Bioethics
Bioethics
Social Ethics & Pol Thought
Social Ethics & Pol Thought-Hon
20th Century Phil
Experience and Reality
Experience and Reality
Ethics Peace, War, Defense
Recitations F 12&1
Social & Econ Justice
Phil Issues Feminism (WMST 46)
Phil of Law
Cognitive Science
Topics in Logic
Contemp. Ethical Theories
PPE: Gateway
Special Topics-Liberty & Equality
Directed Readings
Readings: Ethics Bowl
Plato
Kant
Phil of Science
Phil of Physics/Physics 313
Phil of Psychology
Advanced Symbolic Logic
Honors
Honors
Metaphysics:Modalities
Reasons
Moral Theory:Utilitarianism
Policy Analysis/PLCY 780
Colloquium Seminar
Colloquium Ceminar
Bibliography
Seminar:Ethical Theory
Reading Group
Reading Group
Simm
On McCord
Staff
1
1
1
1
1
2
1
1
2
1
2
3
1
1
2
1
1
3
1
1
1
1
2
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
1
2
1
1
2

PHILOSOPHY CLASSES FALL 2006

	A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I	J	K	L	M	N	O	P
1				March 1 2007		FALL 2007 SCHEDULE
2	PHIL				On Leave:
3
4	HNRS32	HNRS 354	3	Bar On	Honors-Philosophical			9:30-12 R				20		CW 213
5	6F	54		Roberts	Thinking About Time			3:30-4:45 MW				20		CW 103
6	6F	55	1	Simmons	Paradoxes			2-4:30 W				20		AR 118
7	20	101	1	Neta	Intro: Main Problems			11 MWF				200		HM 100	4
8					Recitations: F: 10 & 11
9	20	101E	1	Staff	Intro: Main Problems: Evening			6-7:15 MW				40		CW 105	1
10	24	110	1	Staff	Great Works			3:30 TR				36		PE 216	1
11	26	112	1	Reeve	Making Sense of Ourselves			12 MW				200		CP 211	4
12					Recitations F: 12 & 1
13	32	134	2	Nord	Phil of Religion			2 TR				40		PE 216
14	35	134	1	Staff	Phil of Religion			MWF 2				40		PE 216	1
15	21	155	1	Staff	Intro Symbolic Logic			8 TR				50		CW 105	1
16	21	155	2	Staff	Intro Symbolic Logic			11TR				50		CW 105	1
17	22	160	1	Staff	Intro to Ethics			8 TR				36		CW 103	1
18	22	160	2	Staff	Intro to Ethics			2 MWF				40		CW 105	V-1
19	22	160	3	LeBar	Intro to Ethics			2 TR				36		CW 103	1
20		160H	1	Lycan	Intro Ethics:Honor			12:30-1:45 TR				25		MU 115
21	30	163	1	J.Boxill	Practical Ethics			11 TR				35		CW 103
22		163	2	Lebar	Practical Ethics			9:30 TR				40		CW 105
23	39	164	1	Staff	Morality and Business			12:30 TR				40		CW 105	V-2
24	34	165	1	Staff	Bioethics			9 MWF				40		CW 105	V-1
25	34	165	3	Staff	Bioethics			6-7:15 TR				40		CW 105	1
26	37	170	1	Staff	Social Ethics & Pol Thought			9:30 TR				35		CW 103		Saenz
27	37H	170H	1	Hill	Social Ethics & Pol Thought-Hon			11-12:15 MW				25		CW 213
28		229	1	Nelson	20th Century Phil			2 TR				40		CW 105
29	38	230	1	Staff	Experience and Reality			3:30 TR				36		CW 103	1
30	38	230	2	Staff	Experience and Reality			8 TR				36		PE 216	1
31	42	272	1	B. Boxill	Ethics Peace, War, Defense			MW 12				100		GA 008	2
32					Recitations F 12&1							25		SC 210
33	66	273	1	Staff	Social & Econ Justice			1MWF				45		CW 105	V-3	Moehler
34	46	275	1	Staff	Phil Issues Feminism (WMST 46)			3:30 TR				40		CW 105	1	Saenz
35	41	280	1	Staff	Phil of Law			3:30 TR				40		MU 112	V-2
36	77	353	1	Prinz	Cognitive Science			12:30 TR				25		CW 103
37	71	356	1	Simmons	Topics in Logic			9:30-10:45 MW				25		CW 213
38		362		Hill	Contemp. Ethical Theories			4-6:30 W				25		CW 213
39	84	384	1	Staff	PPE: Gateway			4:35-5:40 MW				35		CW 105	V-3	Moehler
40	80	390	1	B. Boxill	Special Topics-Liberty & Equality			2-4:30- W				25		CW 213
41	96	396	1	Roberts	Directed Readings			6-8:30 T				5		CW 208
42	96	396	2	J. Boxill	Readings: Ethics Bowl			6-8:30 T				10		CW 208
43	150	412	1	Reeve	Plato			4-6:30 W				25		MU 314
44	155	423	1	cancel	Kant			11-12:15 TR				25		PE 216
45	108	450	1	Lange	Phil of Science			1-3:30 R				25		CW 208
46		451	1	Roberts	Phil of Physics/Physics 313			11-11:50 MWF				25		CW 103
47	109	453	1	Knobe	Phil of Psychology			T 1-3:30				25		CW 213
48	101	455	1	Hofweber	Advanced Symbolic Logic			9:30-10:45 TR				25		PE 216
49		691H	1	Roberts	Honors			6-8:30 W				25		CW 213
50		692H	1		Honors			TBA				25		CW 213
51	230	730	1	Lycan	Metaphysics:Modalities			1-3:30 W				15		CW 208
52		735	1	Neta/Bar-On	Reasons			1-3:30 R				15		CW 213
53	260	760	1	Wolf	Moral Theory:Utilitarianism			4-6:30 T				15		CW 213
54		785	1	Maclean	Policy Analysis/PLCY 780			3:30-4:45 TR				25		MU 118

PHILOSOPHY CLASSES FALL 2006

	A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I	J	K	L	M	N	O	P
55	290	790	1	Hofweber	Colloquium Seminar			TBA				15
56	290	790	2	Wolf	Colloquium Ceminar			TBA				15
57	300	800	1	Staff	Bibliography			TBA
58	360	860	1	Sayre McCord	Seminar:Ethical Theory			4-6:30 M				15		CW 208
59	390	990	1	Nelson	Reading Group			4-6:30 R						CW 208
60	390	990	2	Staff	Reading Group			TBA
61
62
63
64
65					RECITATIONS
66
67	20	PHIL 101	601					11F				25		AL 205
68			602					11F				25		MU 105
69			603					11F				25		HN 307
70			604					11F				25
71			605					10F				25
72			606					10F				25		PH 222
73			607					10F				25		SM 107
74			608					10F				25		CW 105
75
76	26	PHIL 112	601					12F				25		SM 107
77			602					12F				25		AL 203
78			603					12F				25		GA 001
79			604					12F				25		PH 228
80			605					1F				25		GA 103
81			606					1F				25		GA 009
82			607					1F				25		PE 216
83			608					1F
84												25		SC 209
85	42	PHIL 272	601					12F				25		MT 205
86			602					12F				25		PE 010
87			603					1F				25
88			604					1F				25		PE 215

Faculty	Fall 2007		Spring 2008
Bar-On	HNRS 354	PHIL 735:Reasons w/Neta	PHIL 230: Experience & Reality	PHIL 445 Phil of Language
Boxill, Bernard	Phil 272-Large: PWAD-2	PHIL 390: Topics for majors	PHIL 274H Afro-American Poli	PHIL 770 w/ Hill
Boxill, Jan	Parr Center	PHIL 163: Practical Ethics	Parr Center	DUS
Brennan	XXX	XXX	PHIL 484: PPE Gateway	PHIL 698: PPE Capstone
Corrado	XXX	XXX	PHIL 480: Phil of Law	XXX
Hill	PHIL 170H: Social & Political	PHIL 460: Topics in Ethics	PHIL 397: Colloquium for Majors	PHIL 770 w/ B. Boxill
Hofweber	PHIL 790: Colloquium Series	PHIL 455: Advanced Logic	PHIL 155 large: Intro to Logic-4	PHIL 700-Logic
Knobe	PHIL 160: Intro to Ethics	PHIL 453: Phil of Psychology	FYS-Honors	PHIL 990: Reading Group
Lange	ASSOC CHAIR	PHIL 450: Phil of Science	FYS	PHIL 150Large:Intro Phil of Sci
Lesher	PHIL 210: Ancient	XXX	PHIL 210: Ancient	XXX
Lycan	PHIL 160H	PHIL 730: Metaphysics	PHIL 340-Mind	400-level
MacLean	DGS	Public Policy Seminar	DGS	PHIL 468: Risk & Society
Nelson	PHIL 229: 20th Century	PHIL 990: Reading Group	PHIL 423: Kant	Sem w/Reeve
Neta	PHIL 101 Large: Intro to Phil-4	PHIL 735 w/ BarOn	PHIL 335: Theory of Knowledge	Colloquium
Nord	PHIL 134: Phil of Religion	XXX	PHIL 285: Phil of Education	XXX
Pettit	XXX	XXX	XXX	XXX
Postema	R&S Leave	R&S leave	PHIL 170	Law School Course
Prinz	PLACEMENT	PHIL 353: Cognitive Science	PHIL 485: Phil of Art	PROTO
Reeve	PHIL 112 large:Making Sense-4	PHIL 412: Plato	PHIL 390-topics/or new submission	Sem w/ Nelson
Roberts	FYS	PHIL 451: Phil of Physics	R&S leave	R&S Leave
Sayre McCord	CHAIR	PHIL 860:Kenan Seminar in Ethics	PHIL 16O Large: Intro to Ethics-4	CHAIR
Simmons	FYS	PHIL 356:Topics in Math Logic	ADMISSIONS	PROTO
Walker	XXX	XXX	XXX	PHIL 495: Health Care
Wolf	PHIL 760: Utilitarianism	790: Colloquium
New Hire-1
New Hire-2
Visitor 1: PPE	PHIL 384: PPE Gateway	PPE course	PPE course	PPE course
Visitor 2: Parr	PHIL 160: Intro to Ethics	PHIL 165: Bioethics	Ethics	Ethics
Visitor 3: BBT	PHIL 164: Business Ethics	PHIL 273: Social & Economic Justice	PHIL
Visitor 4:

First Year Seminars:	Fall:Roberts,Simmons	Spring: Knobe, Lange	DUS: Fall: Roberts; Spring: Boxill
Honors:	Fall: Hill, Lycan	Spring: Boxill, Knobe	DGS: McLean
Proto:		Spring: Simmons/Prinz	Placement: Prinz
Research Reading Group:	Fall: Nelson	Spring: Knobe	Admissions: Simmons

Kenan Seminars:	Fall Sayre McCord	Spring: ???	Assoc Chair: Lange
Summa	Fall: Wolf	Spring: Neta

PHILOSOPHY FACULTY

	A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I	J	K	L	M	N	O	P	Q
1
2	March 1,2007	F 2000	S 2001	F 2001	S 2002	F 2002	S 2003	F 2003	S 2004	F 2004	S 2005	F 2005	S 2006	F 2006	S 2007	F 2007	S 2008
3
4	BAR-ON	38H,109	96,305T	110,305	20L,38L	LEAVE	20L, 35H	38H, 245	H32, 77	20L, 230	Leave	20, 116	Leave	Hnrs,990	397,700	Hnrs,735	230,445
5	B. BOXILL	22L,105	42L,205	55,159	6F	55,80	LEAVE	42L, 59	55, 390	42,80	55H, 270	42,78	42L,80	272L,274H	390,473	272L,390	274H,770
6	J. BOXILL	46L,22H	30L,47H	46	30,46	21, 30	Fellowship	46, 47	6F	66	47	Parr	Parr	FYS	275L	163, Parr	266,Parr
7	BRENNAN							130			84, 130		84, 184		384,698	xxx	484,698
8	CORRADO					113	Law	113	Law	113		113			FYS		480
9	HILL	72,102	6F,208	22H,102	37, 96	6F, 102	6F, 260	37H, 390	6F, 37	Leave	Leave	102, DGS	37H,390	FYS,460	360,765	170H,460	397,770
10	HOFWEBER							20H, 80	20H, 300	21L,101	390	101, 305	Leave	155,356	73O,	455,790	155L,700
11	KNOBE											20H, 38	20,109	101H,705	230,805	160,453	FYSH,990
12	LANGE							38, 116	38, 390	6F, 123	69, 200	38H, Place	200, 390	230H.805	LV	450,AC	FYS,250L
13	LYCAN	LEAVE	LEAVE	21L,80	300T,305		96, 200	21L, 74	LEAVE	22L, 117	6F, 200	6F, 390	22L, 240	LV	LV	160H,730	340,400?
14	MACLEAN			67,78	22H,168	20H, 24	30L, 70	LEAVE	30L, 96	30H, 390	30L	Leave	Parr	FYS,368	163L,DGS	DGS,785	DGS,468
15	NETA					20L, 117	38,114	58L, 390	20L, 200	58, PI	20L, 305	Leave	20L, 114	LV	101L,700	101L,735	335,???
16	NELSON													220,720	422,	229,423	220,SemR
17	NORD		32	32						32	32	45	32	134	285	134	285
18	PETTIT							32,32	32,35	32	35	32, 110	32, 74	134,230	134.145	xxx	xxx
19	POSTEMA	LEAVE	LEAVE	6F,213	41H,130	156	37,Law	295, 305	41L, 105	DGS, 380	Law, 390	Leave	Leave	Law	280H,990	170, Law	???
20	PRINZ						20, 109	20L, 80	300, 240	116, 390	77, Adm	Leave	Leave	353,790	FYSH,805	353,Place	485,Proto
21	REEVE			24,109	24,150	151, 305	56, 200	26L, 150	LEAVE	6F, 26L	56L, 210	26L, 109	6F, 305	112L,411	210H,990	112L,412	390,SemN
22	ROBERTS	75,207	6F,121	LEAVE	31,108	LEAVE	LEAVE	31, 250	21L, 6F	21H, 31	Leave	6F. 108	31	351,805	150,DUS	54,451	Leave?
23	SAYRE MCCORD	LEAVE	22L,112	22L,305	22L	22L	22L	365	22L	305/Wolf	22L	22L/Link	112	LV	160L	860,Chair	160L,Chair
24	SIMMONS	6F	21L,305	LEAVE	LEAVE	21L, 101	305, 355	6F, 71	LEAVE	38, 111	Leave	H-32, 305	200, 300	155L,455	790,990	68,356	Adm,Proto
25	WALKER							34	112	Leave	178	34L	178	LV	MED		495
26	WOLF					46L, 305	46H, 112	22L, 300	LEAVE	305/GSM	305/Velle	Leave	Leave	805	805	760,790
27
28
29	VISITOR: PPE									153				170,284	160,170
30	VISITOR: PPE									67	31 or 68			160,163	163,165
31	VISITOR:PARR									39,41	39.41			164,165L	164,165
32	VISITOR									37,42	37,42			101,145	101,112
33	VISITOR							32,32	32, 35	32	35	32,110	32, 74	273,364
34	VISITOR										58,154			390	390
35	Visitor-

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, March 6, 2007 2:18 PM
To: Given, Emily <given@email.unc.edu> Subject: Re: Grades

---

great, thanks,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Emily Given wrote:
> jan,
> done. for the kids who didn't turn anything in, i left their slot > blank, rather than filling in a zero, just so you know.
> emily
>
> Jan Boxill wrote:
>
>> Hi,
>> Can you enter grades for the paper on Gradebook so I can send out the >> progress reports.
>> Thanks,
>> Jan
>>
>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, March 6, 2007 3:44 PM
To: Chambers, Julius L <jchambe1@email.unc.edu>
Cc: Rosenbluth, Martin M <marty@unc.edu>; Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Meeting with Fatou Bensouda

Dear Mr. Chambers,
As you know the Parr Center for Ethics is sponsoring a visit by Ms. Fatou Bensouda, Deputy Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court. As Director of the Center, I would like to extend an invitation for you to meet with Ms.Bensouda on Monday, March 19th. Since I understand you are unavailable for lunch, may I suggest two possible options: Breakfast at the Carolina Inn or coffee later in the morning at a time and place that is suitable for you both, perhaps at 10 a.m. She will be speaking at the Law school at noon.

I hope to be in town and would like to escort Ms. Bensouda and meet you. We met very briefly a few years ago, and I would welcome the opportunity to meet and perhaps at a later date talk with you about each of our centers.

On a personal note, I am very good friends with your nephew, Wendell McCain, whom I have known him since he was a student in my Philosophy class his freshman year at Carolina. Indeed, I just spent some time with him last week--one of the few times he is not traveling.

Please contact me or my Assistant, Carlo, to make arrangements. For more information about Ms. Bensouda's visit please visit our website.

Regards,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, March 6, 2007 9:17 PM
To: Chapel Hill Philosophy <hobler@email.unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: Re: 07-08 Teaching Schedule]
Attach: Re 07-08 Teaching Schedule.msg

Gucki,
We somehow messed up with Tom. He should be teaching his PHIL 362 on Monday's 4-6:30 in Fall, NOT Wednesday. He MUST keep Wednesday afternoon's free.
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Hill, Thomas E Jr <thill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, March 6, 2007 3:59 PM
To: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: 07-08 Teaching Schedule

Jan Boxill wrote:
> Hi Tom,
> Your Fall teaching schedule is:
> PHIL 170H: Social & Political Honors: MW 11-12:15
> PHIL 362: Ethical Theory: W 4-6:30 in CW 213
>
> Tentative Spring Schedule:
> PHIL 397: Colloquium for Majors
> PHIL 770: Seminar with B. Boxill
>
> Jan
>

Jan,

Opps, we did it again -- forgetting my Ad ABoard meetings on Wednesday afternoons. I'll check to make sure my term is not up, but I couldn't miss all the fall meetings if I'm still a member (which I think I will be).

Sorry I didn't catch this earlier.

Tom

From: Friday, Olympia Thyais <ofriday@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, March 7, 2007 9:40 AM
To: Stone Center Announcement <stonelistserv@listserv.unc.edu>
Subject: [stonelistserv] Apply Now - 2007 Undergraduate International Studies Fellowship

---

Spring 2007 Undergraduate International Studies Fellowship
Application Deadline: March 30, 2007

The Sonja Haynes Stone Center for Black Culture and History is currently accepting applications for its fourth annual Undergraduate International Studies Fellowships (UISF). The Stone Center created the UISF program in support of the University's effort to globalize the campus and internationalize the curriculum.

Fellowship recipients are awarded $2,500 toward academic research or study in an international setting. Through the fellowships, the UISF program hopes to increase the low numbers of underrepresented UNC-Chapel Hill students who travel and study abroad.

UNC at Chapel Hill Students in good standing and enrolled full-time are eligible to apply for one of two fellowships.

Applications are available at the Stone Center, Suite 215 or download an application from the Stone Center website at www.unc.edu/depts/stonecenter. Look under other downloads on the homepage for the UISF Application.

Have questions about the Fellowship? Please contact the Stone Center at 962-9001.

Olympia Friday
Public Relations
The Sonja Haynes Stone Center for
Black Culture and History
The University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
Phone: (919) 962-7265
Fax: (919) 962-3725
Email: ofriday@email.unc.edu
Website: www.unc.edu/depts/stonecenter

- -- You are currently subscribed to

stonelistserv as: jmboxill@email.unc.edu .
To unsubscribe click here: http://lists.unc.edu/u?id*f*62698Y&n=T&l=stonelistserv&o831708 or send a blank email to leave-14831708-8362698Y@listserv.unc.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, March 8, 2007 11:31 AM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: New Rates at the Stone Center - FY 2007-2008]
Attach: New Rates at the Stone Center - FY 2007-2008.msg

---

here is the latest that I received. I don't think we put in for funding, but should.
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

SONJA HAYNES STONE CENTER FOR BLACK CULTURE AND HISTORY
UNC AT CHAPEL HILL

NEW RATES FOR
FISCAL YEAR 2007-2008

STONE CENTER THEATRE	$250/PER USE
SEMINAR ROOM(S)	$125 EACH/PER USE
CLASSROOM(S)	$150 EACH/PER USE
TERRACE	$100/PER USE
HITCHCOCK MULTIPURPOSE ROOM	$200 FOR BANQUET SET-UP/PER USE
HITCHCOCK MULTIPURPOSE ROOM	$150 MEETING ONLY/PER USE
LATE DEPARTURE FEE (AFTER 9:00 PM)	$50
CATERING FEE	10% OF CATERING BILL
EXTRAORDINARY CLEAN UP/DAMAGE	$30

THESE FEES WILL GO INTO EFFECT FOR PROGRAMS HELD AFTER 5:00 PM IN THE STONE CENTER.

After encountering a dying pilgrim on a climbing trip in the Himalayas, a businessman ponders the differences between individual and corporate ethics

The parable of the sadhu

Bowen H. McCoy

It was early in the morning before the sun rose, which gave them time to climb the treacherous slope to the pass at 18,000 feet before the ice steps melted. They were also concerned about their stamina and altitude sickness, and felt the need to press on. Into this chance collection of climbers on that Himalayan slope an ethical dilemma arose in the guise of an unconscious, almost naked sadhu, an Indian holy man. Each climber gave the sadhu help but none made sure he would be safe. Should somebody have stopped to help the sadhu to safety? Would it have done any good? Was the group responsible? Since leaving the sadhu on the mountain slope, the author, who was one of the climbers, has pondered these issues. He sees many parallels for business people as they face ethical decisions at work.

Mr. McCoy is a managing director of Morgan Stanley & Co., Inc., and president of Morgan Stanley Realty, Inc. He is also an ordained ruling elder of the United Presbyterian Church.

Illustration by Geoffrey Moss.

Last year, as the first participant in the new six-month sabbatical program that Morgan Stanley has adopted, I enjoyed a rare opportunity to collect my thoughts as well as do some traveling. I spent the first three months in Nepal, walking 600 miles through 200 villages in the Himalayas and climbing some 120,000 vertical feet. On the trip my sole Western companion was an anthropologist who shed light on the cultural patterns of the villages we passed through.

During the Nepal hike, something occurred that has had a powerful impact on my thinking about corporate ethics. Although some might argue that the experience has no relevance to business, it was a situation in which a basic ethical dilemma suddenly intruded into the lives of a group of individuals. How the group responded I think holds a lesson for all organizations no matter how defined.

The sadhu

The Nepal experience was more rugged and adventuresome than I had anticipated. Most commercial treks last two or three weeks and cover a quarter of the distance we traveled.

My friend Stephen, the anthropologist, and I were halfway through the 60-day Himalayan part of the trip when we reached the high point, an 18,000-foot pass over a crest that we'd have to traverse to reach to the village of Muklinath, an ancient holy place for pilgrims.

Six years earlier I had suffered pulmonary edema, an acute form of altitude sickness, at 16,500 feet in the vicinity of Everest base camp, so we were understandably concerned about what would happen at 18,000 feet. Moreover, the Himalayas were having their wettest spring in 20 years; hip-deep powder and ice had already driven us off one ridge. If we failed to cross the pass, I feared that the last half of our "once in a lifetime" trip would be ruined.

The night before we would try the pass, we camped at a hut at 14,500 feet. In the photos taken at that camp, my face appears wan. The last village we'd passed through was a sturdy two-day walk below us, and I was tired.

During the late afternoon, four backpackers from New Zealand joined us, and we spent most of the night awake, anticipating the climb. Below we could see the fires of two other parties, which turned out to be two Swiss couples and a Japanese hiking club.

To get over the steep part of the climb before the sun melted the steps cut in the ice, we departed at 3:30 A.M. The New Zealanders left first, followed by Stephen and myself, our porters and Sherpas, and then the Swiss. The Japanese lingered in their camp. The sky was clear, and we were confident that no spring storm would erupt that day to close the pass.

At 15,500 feet, it looked to me as if Stephen were shuffling and staggering a bit, which are symptoms of altitude sickness. (The initial stage of altitude sickness brings a headache and nausea. As the condition worsens, a climber may encounter difficult breathing, disorientation, aphasia, and paralysis.) I felt strong, my adrenaline was flowing, but I was very concerned about my ultimate ability to get across. A couple of our porters were also suffering from the height, and Pasang, our Sherpa sirdar (leader), was worried.

Just after daybreak, while we rested at 15,500 feet, one of the New Zealanders, who had gone ahead, came staggering down toward us with a body slung across his shoulders. He dumped the almost naked, barefoot body of an Indian holy man – a sadhu – at my feet. He had found the pilgrim lying on the ice, shivering and suffering from hypothermia. I cradled the sadhu's head and laid him out on the rocks. The New Zealander was angry. He wanted to get across the pass before the bright sun melted the snow. He said, "Look, I've done what I can. You have porters and Sherpa guides. You care for him. We're going on!" He turned and went back up the mountain to join his friends.

I took a carotid pulse and found that the sadhu was still alive. We figured he had probably visited the holy shrines at Muklinath and was on his way home. It was fruitless to question why he had chosen this desperately high route instead of the safe, heavily traveled caravan route through the Kali Gandaki gorge. Or why he was almost naked and with no shoes, or how long he had been lying in the pass. The answers weren't going to solve our problem.

Stephen and the four Swiss began stripping off outer clothing and opening their packs. The sadhu was soon clothed from head to foot. He was not able to walk, but he was very much alive. I looked down the mountain and spotted below the Japanese climbers marching up with a horse.

Without a great deal of thought, I told Stephen and Pasang that I was concerned about withstanding the heights to come and wanted to get over the pass. I took off after several of our porters who had gone ahead.

On the steep part of the ascent where, if the ice steps had given way, I would have slid down about 3,000 feet, I felt vertigo. I stopped for a breather, allowing the Swiss to catch up with me. I inquired about the sadhu and Stephen. They said that the sadhu was fine and that Stephen was just behind. I set off again for the summit.

Stephen arrived at the summit an hour after I did. Still exhilarated by victory, I ran down the snow slope to congratulate him. He was suffering from altitude sickness, walking 15 steps, then stopping, walking 15 steps, then stopping. Pasang accompanied him all the way up. When I reached them, Stephen glared at me and said: "How do you feel about contributing to the death of a fellow man?"

I did not fully comprehend what he meant.

"Is the sadhu dead?" I inquired.

"No," replied Stephen, "but he surely will be!"

After I had gone, and the Swiss had departed not long after, Stephen had remained with the sadhu. When the Japanese had arrived, Stephen had asked to use their horse to transport the sadhu down to the hut. They had refused. He had then asked Pasang to have a group of our porters carry the sadhu. Pasang had resisted the idea, saying that the porters would have to exert all their energy to get themselves over the pass. He had thought they could not carry a man down 1,000 feet to the hut, reclimb the slope, and get across safely before the snow melted. Pasang had pressed Stephen not to delay any longer.

The Sherpas had carried the sadhu down to a rock in the sun at about 15,000 feet and had pointed out the hut another 500 feet below. The Japanese had given him food and drink. When they had last seen him he was listlessly throwing rocks at the Japanese party's dog, which had frightened him.

We do not know if the sadhu lived or died.

For many of the following days and evenings Stephen and I discussed and debated our behavior toward the sadhu. Stephen is a committed Quaker with deep moral vision. He said, "I feel that what happened with the sadhu is a good example of the breakdown between the individual ethic and the corporate ethic. No one person was willing to assume ultimate responsibility for the sadhu. Each was willing to do his bit just so long as it was not too inconvenient. When it got to be a bother, everyone just passed the buck to someone else and took off. Jesus was relevant to a more individualistic stage of society, but how do we interpret his teaching today in a world filled with large, impersonal organizations and groups?"

I defended the larger group, saying, "Look, we all cared. We all stopped and gave aid and comfort. Everyone did his bit. The New Zealander carried him down below the snow line. I took his pulse and suggested we treat him for hypothermia. You and the Swiss gave him clothing and got him warmed up. The Japanese gave him food and water. The Sherpas carried him down to the sun and pointed out the easy trail toward the hut. He was well enough to throw rocks at a dog. What more could we do?"

"You have just described the typical affluent Westerner's response to a problem. Throwing money – in this case food and sweaters – at it, but not solving the fundamentals!" Stephen retorted.

"What would satisfy you?" I said. "Here we are, a group of New Zealanders, Swiss, Americans, and Japanese who have never met before and who are at the apex of one of the most powerful experiences of our lives. Some years the pass is so bad no one gets over it. What right does an almost naked pilgrim who chooses the wrong trail have to disrupt our lives? Even the Sherpas had no interest in risking the trip to help him beyond a certain point."

Stephen calmly rebutted, "I wonder what the Sherpas would have done if the sadhu had been a well-dressed Nepali, or what the Japanese would have done if the sadhu had been a well-dressed Asian, or what you would have done, Buzz, if the sadhu had been a well-dressed Western woman?"

"Where, in your opinion," I asked instead, "is the limit of our responsibility in a situation like this? We had our own well-being to worry about. Our Sherpa guides were unwilling to jeopardize us or the porters for the sadhu. No one else on the mountain was willing to commit himself beyond certain self-imposed limits."

Stephen said, "As individual Christians or people with a Western ethical tradition, we can fulfill our obligations in such a situation only if (1) the sadhu dies in our care, (2) the sadhu demonstrates to us that he could undertake the two-day walk down to the village, or (3) we carry the sadhu for two days down to the village and convince someone there to care for him."

"Leaving the sadhu in the sun with food and clothing, while he demonstrated hand-eye coordination by throwing a rock at a dog, comes close to fulfilling items one and two," I answered. "And it wouldn't have made sense to take him to the village where the people appeared to be far less caring than the Sherpas, so the third condition is impractical. Are you really saying that, no matter what the implications, we should, at the drop of a hat, have changed our entire plan?"

The individual vs. the group ethic

Despite my arguments, I felt and continue to feel guilt about the sadhu. I had literally walked through a classic moral dilemma without fully thinking through the consequences. My excuses for my actions include a high adrenaline flow, a superordinate goal, and a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity – factors in the usual corporate situation, especially when one is under stress.

Real moral dilemmas are ambiguous, and many of us hike right through them, unaware that they exist. When, usually after the fact, someone makes an issue of them, we tend to resent his or her bringing it up. Often, when the full import of what we have done (or not done) falls on us, we dig into a defensive position from which it is very difficult to emerge. In rare circumstances we may contemplate what we have done from inside a prison.

Had we mountaineers been free of physical and mental stress caused by the effort and the high altitude, we might have treated the sadhu differently. Yet isn't stress the real test of personal and corporate values? The instant decisions executives make under pressure reveal the most about personal and corporate character.

Among the many questions that occur to me when pondering my experience are: What are the practical limits of moral imagination and vision? Is there a collective or institutional ethic beyond the ethics of the individual? At what level of effort or commitment can one discharge one's ethical responsibilities?

Not every ethical dilemma has a right solution. Reasonable people often disagree; otherwise there would be no dilemma. In a business context, however, it is essential that managers agree on a process for dealing with dilemmas.

The sadhu experience offers an interesting parallel to business situations. An immediate response was mandatory. Failure to act was a decision in itself. Up on the mountain we could not resign and submit our résumés to a headhunter. In contrast to philosophy, business involves action and implementation – getting things done. Managers must come up with answers to problems based on what they see and what they allow to influence their decision-making processes. On the mountain, none of us but Stephen realized the true dimensions of the situation we were facing.

One of our problems was that as a group we had no process for developing a consensus. We had no sense of purpose or plan. The difficulties of dealing with the sadhu were so complex that no one person could handle it. Because it did not have a set of preconditions that could guide its action to an acceptable resolution, the group reacted instinctively as individuals. The cross-cultural nature of the group added a further layer of complexity. We had no leader with whom we could all identify and in whose purpose we believed. Only Stephen was willing to take charge, but he could not gain adequate support to care for the sadhu.

Some organizations do have a value system that transcends the personal values of the managers. Such values, which go beyond profitability, are usually revealed when the organization is under stress. People throughout the organization generally accept its values, which, because they are not presented as a rigid list of commandments, may be somewhat ambiguous. The stories people tell, rather than printed materials, transmit these conceptions of what is proper behavior.

For 20 years I have been exposed at senior levels to a variety of corporations and organizations. It is amazing how quickly an outsider can sense the tone and style of an organization and the degree of tolerated openness and freedom to challenge management.

Organizations that do not have a heritage of mutually accepted, shared values tend to become unhinged during stress, with each individual bailing out for himself. In the great takeover battles we have witnessed during past years, companies that had strong cultures drew the wagons around them and fought it out, while other companies saw executives supported by their golden parachutes, bail out of the struggles.

Because corporations and their members are interdependent, for the corporation to be strong the members need to share a preconceived notion of what is correct behavior, a "business ethic," and think of it as a positive force, not a constraint.

As an investment banker I am continually warned by well-meaning lawyers, clients, and associates to be wary of conflicts of interest. Yet if I were to run away from every difficult situation, I wouldn't be an effective investment banker. I have to feel my way through conflicts. An effective manager can't run from risk either; he or she has to confront and deal with risk. To feel "safe" in doing this, managers need the guidelines of an agreed-on process and set of values within the organization.

After my three months in Nepal, I spent three months as an executive-in-residence at both Stanford Business School and the Center for Ethics and Social Policy at the Graduate Theological Union at Berkeley. These six months away from my job gave me time to assimilate 20 years of business experience. My thoughts turned often to the meaning of the leadership role in any large organization. Students at the seminary thought of themselves as antibusiness. But when I questioned them they agreed that they distrusted all large organizations, including the church. They perceived all large organizations as impersonal and opposed to individual values and needs. Yet we all know of organizations where peoples' values and beliefs are respected and their expressions encouraged. What makes the difference? Can we identify the difference and, as a result, manage more effectively?

The word "ethics" turns off many and confuses more. Yet the notions of shared values and an agreed-on process for dealing with adversity and change – what many people mean when they talk about corporate culture – seem to be at the heart of the ethical issue. People who are in touch with their own core beliefs and the beliefs of others and are sustained by them can be more comfortable living on the cutting edge. At times, taking a tough line or a decisive stand in a muddle of ambiguity is the only ethical thing to do. If a manager is indecisive and spends time trying to figure out the "good" thing to do, the enterprise may be lost.

Business ethics, then, has to do with the authenticity and integrity of the enterprise. To be ethical is to follow the business as well as the cultural goals of the corporation, its owners, its employees, and its customers. Those who cannot serve the corporate vision are not authentic business people and, therefore, are not ethical in the business sense.

At this stage of my own business experience I have a strong interest in organizational behavior. Sociologists are keenly studying what they call corporate stories, legends, and heroes as a way organizations have of transmitting the value system. Corporations such as Arco have even hired consultants to perform an audit of their corporate culture. In a company, the leader is the person who understands, interprets, and manages the corporate value system. Effective managers are then action-oriented people who resolve conflict, are tolerant of ambiguity, stress, and change, and have a strong sense of purpose for themselves and their organizations.

If all this is true, I wonder about the role of the professional manager who moves from company to company. How can he or she quickly absorb the values and culture of different organizations? Or is there, indeed, an art of management that is totally transportable? Assuming such fungible managers do exist, is it proper for them to manipulate the values of others?

What would have happened had Stephen and I carried the sadhu for two days back to the village and become involved with the villagers in his care? In four trips to Nepal my most interesting experiences occurred in 1975 when I lived in a Sherpa home in the Khumbu for five days recovering from altitude sickness. The high point of Stephen's trip was an invitation to participate in a family funeral ceremony in Manang. Neither experience had to do with climbing the high passes of the Himalayas. Why were we so reluctant to try the lower path, the ambiguous trail? Perhaps because we did not have a leader who could reveal the greater purpose of the trip to us.

Why didn't Stephen with his moral vision opt to take the sadhu under his personal care? The answer is because, in part, Stephen was hard-stressed physically himself, and because, in part, without some support system that involved our involuntary and episodic community on the mountain, it was beyond his individual capacity to do so.

I see the current interest in corporate culture and corporate value systems as a positive response to Stephen's pessimism about the decline of the role of the individual in large organizations. Individuals who operate from a thoughtful set of personal values provide the foundation for a corporate culture. A corporate tradition that encourages freedom of inquiry, supports personal values, and reinforces a focused sense of direction can fulfill the need for individuality along with the prosperity and success of the group. Without such corporate support, the individual is lost.

That is the lesson of the sadhu. In a complex corporate situation, the individual requires and deserves the support of the group. If people cannot find such support from their organization, they don't know how to act. If such support is forthcoming, a person has a stake in the success of the group, and can add much to the process of establishing and maintaining a corporate culture. It is management's challenge to be sensitive to individual needs, to shape them, and to direct and focus them for the benefit of the group as a whole.

For each of us the sadhu lives. Should we stop what we are doing and comfort him; or should we keep trudging up toward the high pass? Should I pause to help the derelict I pass on the street each night as I walk by the Yale Club en route to Grand Central Station? Am I his brother? What is the nature of our responsibility if we consider ourselves to be ethical persons? Perhaps it is to change the values of the group so that it can, with all its resources, take the other road.

Readers of this article will be interested in Robert Jackall's Moral Mazes: Bureaucracy and Managerial Work beginning on page 118 of this issue.

The Editors

Harvard Business Review and Harvard Business School Publishing content on EBSCOhost is licensed for the individual use of authorized EBSCOhost patrons at this institution and is not intended for use as assigned course material. Harvard Business School Publishing is pleased to grant permission to make this work available through "electronic reserves" or other means of digital access or transmission to students enrolled in a course. For rates and authorization regarding such course usage, contact permissions@hbsp.harvard.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, March 8, 2007 11:48 AM
To: Roberts, John Thomas <jtrosap@email.unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: [stonelistserv] Stone Center Announcements]
Attach: [stonelistserv] Stone Center Announcements.msg

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Friday, Olympia Thyais <ofriday@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, March 8, 2007 11:28 AM
To: Stone Center Announcement <stonelistserv@listserv.unc.edu>
Subject: [stonelistserv] Stone Center Announcements

March 8, 2007

Attention Students - Do you want to study abroad?
Learn how to apply for and fund your study abroad experience by attending the Stone Center's Applying for International Funding workshop on March 22 at 5:30 p.m. in the Hitchcock Multipurpose Room. The workshop is designed to help students research, write and submit international travel and study abroad applications for campus and off-campus programs. For more information, contact Tamara Johnson at johnson5@email.unc.edu or call the Stone Center at 962-9001.

Apply Now - Undergraduate International Studies Fellowship

The Stone Center is currently accepting applications for its fourth annual Undergraduate International Studies Fellowships (UISF). Fellowship recipients are awarded $2,500 toward academic research or study in an international setting. Through the fellowships, the UISF program hopes to increase the low numbers of underrepresented UNC at Chapel Hill students who travel and study abroad. Students in good standing and enrolled full-time are eligible to apply for one of two fellowships. Applications are available at the Stone Center, Suite 215 or download an application from the Stone Center website at www.unc.edu/depts/stonecenter. Look under other downloads on the homepage for the UISF Application. Application deadline is March 30, 2007. Questions? Call the Stone Center at 962-9001.

Visit the exhibit Radicals in Black and Brown

On display through March 31

More than 200 people attended the exhibit opening in January – come out and see this extraordinary exhibit for yourself! Radicals in Black and Brown: Palante, People's Power and Common Cause in the Black Panther and the Young Lords Organization includes, as its central component, an exhibit of photographs, posters, flyers, ephemera and other materials that chronicle the common and connected histories of the Black Panther Party and the Young Lords Organization. The exhibit has been extended and is now on display through March 31 in the Stone Center's Robert and Sallie Brown Gallery and Museum. Exhibit hours are Monday-Thursday from 10 a.m. – 7 p.m.; Friday from 10 a.m. – 5 p.m., closed University holidays. For more information visit the exhibit website at http://ibiblio.org/shscbch/ribb/.

Stone Center to host African-American Studies Consortium

The Sonja Haynes Stone Center for Black Culture and History introduces a new initiative that will take place in April. The first Campus Wide African-American Studies Consortium will convene at The Sonja Haynes Stone Center for Black Culture and History on April 18th from 4-7 p.m. The consortium will bring together faculty and graduate students from all departments & disciplines across the entire University whose work and research focus on blacks in the Americas; all in one place to meet, interact and collaborate. If you are a UNC faculty member or graduate student whose research and work falls within this scope and would like to attend, please contact Olympia Friday at ofriday@email.unc.edu or call 962-7265.

This initiative is sponsored by The Sonja Haynes Stone Center, The Department of African & Afro-American Studies, The Institute of African American Research, and The Institute for the Arts and Humanities.

Communiversity to Celebrate 15th Anniversary

The Stone Center's after-school youth enrichment program will celebrate 15 years of service to the Chapel-Hill/Carrboro communities at its annual end of the year celebration on April 26. The celebration will include reflection on past year successes, musical performances, and more. If you are or know of a former Communiversity participant or volunteer who would like to be a part of this special occasion, contact Lotticia Mack at 962-9001 or email lmmack@email.unc.edu.

Olympia Friday
Public Relations
The Sonja Haynes Stone Center for
Black Culture and History
The University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
Phone: (919) 962-7265
Fax: (919) 962-3725
Email: ofriday@email.unc.edu
Website: www.unc.edu/depts/stonecenter

- -- You are currently subscribed to

stonelistserv as: jmboxill@email.unc.edu .
To unsubscribe click here: http://lists.unc.edu/u?id*f*62698Y&n=T&l=stonelistserv&o846232 or send a blank email to leave-14846232-8362698Y@listserv.unc.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, March 8, 2007 12:02 PM
To: Lange, Marc B <mlange@email.unc.edu>
Subject: TA preferences
Attach: TA Req Memo Fall 07.DOC; TA-Pref Fall 2007.doc

Marc,
Attached is a memo and a preference form for grad student teaching for Fall 2007. Could you please look it over to see if this would be the right kind of information you would need to make assignments. We will do again what we did with the faculty schedule.

Thanks,
Ja

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

TA ASSIGNMENT REQUEST FORM FOR FALL 2007

NAME:_____

I intend to return to the Department and I wish to be considered for a teaching assignment: Yes No

I intend to return to the Department and will be funded by a non teaching fellowship: Yes No

I will be a fifth year student next year and wish to be considered for a dissertation fellowship: Yes No

If you answered "yes" please rank all of the following assignments, taking into account your qualifications, your own educational needs and the seminars you plan to take. A Teaching Fellow must have been a TA at UNC for at least two semesters. Let "1" stand for your first choice, etc:

TEACHING ASSISTANT

_____	101	Intro to Main Problems	Large Section (4)	Neta	11 MW; F-10 & 11
_____	112	Making Sense of Ourselves	Large Section (4)	Reeve	12 MW F- 12 & 1
_____	272	Peace, War, Defense	Large Section (2)	B. Boxill	12 MW F- 12 & 1

TEACHING FELLOWS

_____	101E	Intro: Main Problems	MW 6-7:15	[Evening Class]
_____	110	Intro: Great Works	TR 3:30
_____	134	Philosophy of Religion	MWF 2
_____	155	Intro to Logic	TR 8
_____	155	Intro to Logic	TR 11
_____	160	Intro to Ethics	TR 8
_____	160	Intro to Ethics	MWF 2
_____	164	Morality and Business	TR 12:30
_____	165	Bioethics	MWF 9
_____	165	Bioethics	TR 6-7:15	[regular class just taught in evening]
_____	170	Social & Political	TR 9:30
_____	230	Experience and Reality	TR 8
_____	230	Experience and Reality	TR 3:30
_____	280	Morality in Law	TR 3:30

Something to keep in mind as you fill this out: The large classes in the Spring 2008 for which we will need TAs are: PHIL 160-Intro to Ethics [4]; PHIL 150-Intro to Philosophy of Science[2 or 4]; and PHIL 163-Practical Ethics [4]; PHIL 155-Intro to Logic [4]

Have you taken Phil 102 or 112? _____ Phil 101?_____

Please indicate your relevant teaching experience to date and any other considerations you would like us to keep in mind when determining your assignment for next term. E.g. If you have not been a TA for a course, but believe you are qualified to teach it, please explain. (Use space below or back of this sheet for other considerations) Feel free to add additional comments.

PLEASE RETURN TO JAN BOXILL NO LATER THAN: April 9, 2007

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, March 8, 2007 3:43 PM
To: Calder, Andrew G <acalder@uncaa.unc.edu>
Cc: shatchell@uncaa.unc.edu
Subject: NCAA Pairings

Dear Judy,
With the NCAA pairings coming up on Monday, I want to have some input to give fair treatment to the success of the University of North Carolina and its team. We understand that the #1 overall seed gets the closest regional. This year that would be Duke and its fans being rewarded with Greensboro, NC. Given this it seems that to reward UNC and its fans, UNC should be rewarded with Raleigh for the sub-regional for the first and second rounds. We feel that this is justified for the following reasons:
1. UNC is the only top seed that won their Conference Tournament.
2. UNC won the ACC Tournament in a conference that has Duke, this year's #1 overall team, and defeating Maryland, last year's NCAA Champions which has the same team as last year.
3. UNC is the only top seed that won their last game of their seasons--in their tournaments.
4. Last year [2005-06] when UNC was the overall #1 seed, we were sent away for the first and second rounds to Vanderbilt, playing them on their home court. 5. Also last year as the #1 seed we were put in a bracket with Tennessee, the team ranked #2 in the NCAA RPI.
4. The previous year [2004-5], as the #1 seed UNC was sent to Arizona State playing them on their home court in the Sweet Sixteeen.
5. Previous to that [2003-04] as the higher seed in the bracket, UNC would have played Notre Dame on their home court, but lost to Middle Tennessee in the first round.
5. And the year before [2002-03] as the higher seed, UNC was sent to Colorado to play a lower seed on their home court.

Given all these factors I believe UNC and our fans should be rewarded with the opportunity to see us play in Raleigh for the sub-regional. In this way it rewards both Duke and UNC teams and their fans. Both have earned that right.

I ask that you take the above factors into consideration when making the selections.

Thank you very much for the opportunity to share my concerns with you.

Regards,
Sylvia Hatchell
Head Women's Basketball Coach
University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

TA ASSIGNMENT REQUEST FORM FOR FALL 2007

NAME:_____

I intend to return to the Department and I wish to be considered for a teaching assignment: Yes No

I intend to return to the Department and will be funded by a non teaching fellowship: Yes No

I will be a fifth year student next year and wish to be considered for a dissertation fellowship: Yes No

If you answered "yes" please rank your preferences taking into account your qualifications, your own educational needs and the seminars you plan to take. A Teaching Fellow must have been a TA at UNC for at least two semesters. Rank 1-6, with "1" being your first choice.

TEACHING ASSISTANT

_____	101	Intro to Main Problems	Large Section (4)	Neta	11 MW; F-10 & 11
_____	112	Making Sense of Ourselves	Large Section (4)	Reeve	12 MW F- 12 & 1
_____	272	Peace, War, Defense	Large Section (2)	B. Boxill	12 MW F- 12 & 1

TEACHING FELLOWS

_____	101E	Intro: Main Problems	MW 6-7:15	[Evening Class]
_____	110	Intro: Great Works	TR 3:30
_____	134	Philosophy of Religion	MWF 2
_____	155	Intro to Logic	TR 8
_____	155	Intro to Logic	TR 11
_____	160	Intro to Ethics	TR 8
_____	160	Intro to Ethics	MWF 2
_____	164	Morality and Business	TR 12:30
_____	165	Bioethics	MWF 9
_____	165	Bioethics	TR 6-7:15	[regular class just taught in evening]
_____	170	Social & Political	TR 9:30
_____	230	Experience and Reality	TR 8
_____	230	Experience and Reality	TR 3:30
_____	280	Morality in Law	TR 3:30

Something to keep in mind as you fill this out: The large classes in the Spring 2008 for which we will need TAs are: PHIL 160-Intro to Ethics [4]; PHIL 150-Intro to Philosophy of Science[2 or 4]; and PHIL 163-Practical Ethics [4]; PHIL 155-Intro to Logic [4]

Have you taken Phil 102 or 112? _____ Phil 101?_____

Please indicate your relevant teaching experience to date and any other considerations you would like us to keep in mind when determining your assignment for next term. E.g. If you have not been a TA for a course, but believe you are qualified to teach it, please explain. (Use space below or back of this sheet for other considerations) Feel free to add additional comments.

PLEASE RETURN TO JAN BOXILL NO LATER THAN: April 9, 2007

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, March 8, 2007 7:31 PM
To: Hildebrand, Reginald F <hildebra@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Bensouda Leture

Thanks, I'll do this tomorrow,
Regards,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Reginald Hildebrand wrote:
> Dear Jan,
>
> Trevaughn informs me that this process has to be initiated by some > paperwork from you. Just touch base with her when you get a chance.
>
> All the Best, -Reg
>
>
>
> Jan Boxill wrote:
>> Hi Reg,
>> Hope all is going well and that Spring Break offers you a moment to >> take your breath! I am following up on funding for Fatou Bensouda.
>> She will be coming March 19-20, and she is giving several guest >> lectures in classes and a public lecture on March 20th. We are >> hoping the Stone Center can give us some financial support. For more >> information on her visit, please visit our website at parrcenter.unc.edu
>>
>> Thanks,
>> Jan
>>
>> Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
>> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
>> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
>> Department of Philosophy
>> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>> Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
>> Phone: 919-962-3317
>> FAX: 919-843-3929
>>
>>
>>
>> Reginald Hildebrand wrote:
>>
>>> Dear Jan,
>>>
>>> Your letter has to Joseph Jordan concerning support for the Bensouda >>> lecture has made it's way to me, because Joseph is on leave this >>> year and I'm filling in for him as interim director of the Stone >>> Center. He has advised be to see what money comes in at the end of >>> the month, and then come as close to meeting your full request as we >>> can. So, I'll get back to you during the first week in February.

>>> Please give my regards to your husband. I haven't seen either of >>> you for a long time.
>>>
>>> All the Best, -Reg Hildebrand
>>
>>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, March 8, 2007 7:31 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: Re: Bensouda Leture]
Attach: Re Bensouda Leture.msg

Let's do this tomorrow.

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Hildebrand, Reginald F <hildebra@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, March 8, 2007 6:39 PM
To: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Bensouda Leture

Dear Jan,

Trevaughn informs me that this process has to be initiated by some paperwork from you. Just touch base with her when you get a chance.

All the Best, -Reg

Jan Boxill wrote:
> Hi Reg,
> Hope all is going well and that Spring Break offers you a moment to take > your breath! I am following up on funding for Fatou Bensouda. She will > be coming March 19-20, and she is giving several guest lectures in > classes and a public lecture on March 20th. We are hoping the Stone > Center can give us some financial support. For more information on her > visit, please visit our website at parrcenter.unc.edu
>
> Thanks,
> Jan
>
> Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
> Department of Philosophy
> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
> Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
> Phone: 919-962-3317
> FAX: 919-843-3929
>
>
>
> Reginald Hildebrand wrote:
>
>> Dear Jan,
>>
>> Your letter has to Joseph Jordan concerning support for the Bensouda >> lecture has made it's way to me, because Joseph is on leave this year >> and I'm filling in for him as interim director of the Stone Center.
>> He has advised be to see what money comes in at the end of the month, >> and then come as close to meeting your full request as we can. So, >> I'll get back to you during the first week in February. Please give >> my regards to your husband. I haven't seen either of you for a long >> time.
>>
>> All the Best, -Reg Hildebrand
>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Saturday, March 10, 2007 12:02 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: INFORMATIONAL: RESEARCH SUPPORT March 2007 Issue Now Available]
Attach: INFORMATIONAL RESEARCH SUPPORT March 2007 Issue Now Available.msg

---

Let's look into any of these.

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From:	nobody@notify.unc.edu on behalf of Research Support </O=UNC EXCHANGE/OU=EXCHANGE ADMINISTRATIVE GROUP (FYDIBOHF23SPDLT)/CN=RECIPIENTS/CN=VCRED RESEARCH SUPPORT762CD96E>
Sent:	Friday, March 9, 2007 8:26 PM
To:	Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject:	INFORMATIONAL: RESEARCH SUPPORT March 2007 Issue Now Available

---

The March 2007 issue of RESEARCH SUPPORT online newsletter is now available for viewing at http://research.unc.edu/rs/

In this issue:

FUNDING OPPORTUNITIES
*Major funding opportunities from state, public, and private agencies, as well as from UNC-Chapel Hill.
*Carolina Internal
*National Science Foundation
*National Institutes of Health Grants and Contracts
*Multidisciplinary
*Social and Behavioral Sciences
*Health and Medical Sciences
*Life and Physical Sciences
*Arts and Humanities

CAMPUS NEWS
* Bridge Funding Program
* RENCI Seeks Faculty Fellows for Innovative Collaborative Research
* Identifying Funding Sources Workshops for Faculty and Staff
* Core Facilities Training Program
* RAMSeS IPF Attachment Feature
* OTD Innovations Seminar
* OSR Policy Updates
* Call for Abstracts for the Aging Exchange
* SBIR/STTR National Conference Coming to RTP

FUNDING TIPS
* Time for a COS Funding Alert Tune-up?
* Funding Tips for International Faculty Members
* Tips on Grantsmanship and Different Sponsor Types
* Clean Water Act RFP
* RWJF Announces New Funding Commitment

FEDERAL NEWS
* Guide from OSR for NIH eSubmissions
* NIH Alert on Delay in Grants.gov Processing
* SBIR/STTR Omnibus Solicitation from the NIH, CDC and FDA
* NSF and Department of Energy Partner in Education and Human Resources
* AHRQ Interested in Research Implementation
* NOAA Invites Applications Outside of Program Areas
* OMB Requests Comments on Federal Awards Made Database
* Change in Unsolicited NSF Chemistry Proposal Dates

View the issue at http://research.unc.edu/rs/

RESEARCH SUPPORT provides Carolina faculty and research staff with funding opportunities, sponsored research news, funding tips, and timely information from all of the offices supporting research at Carolina. It is published by the Office of the Vice Chancellor for Research and Economic Development, GrantSource Library. Email research_support@unc.edu

This email is sponsored by: Office of the Vice Chancellor for Research and Economic Development

==========

"INFORMATIONAL:" email will only be sent to those who have indicated that they do want to receive mass email. To set your informational mass email preference, logon to the on-line directory web site at https://dir.unc.edu/dir/update.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, March 12, 2007 11:10 AM
To: ADV Publications <adv_pub.smb@ad.unc.edu>
Subject: PHILOSOPHY
Attach: Philosophy UG 2007-08.doc

Attached is the PHILOSOPHY UG Bulletin updates

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Department of Philosophy

philosophy.unc.edu

GEOFFREY SAYRE-McCORD, Chair

Distinguished Professors

Bernard Boxill, Michael Corrado, Thomas E. Hill Jr., William G. Lycan, Gerald J. Postema, C.D.C. Reeve, Jesse Prinz Susan Wolf.

Professors

Dorit Bar-On, Geoffrey Brennan, Marc Lange, Douglas MacLean, Alan Nelson, Geoffrey Sayre-McCord, Keith Simmons.

Associate Professors

Thomas Hofweber, John Roberts.

Assistant Professors

Joshua Knobe, Ram Neta.

Adjunct Professor

James Lesher, Rebecca Walker Senior Lecturer

Jeanette Boxill.

Lecturers

Warren A. Nord,

Professors Emeriti

Edward M. Galligan, Douglas C. Long, Stanley Munsat, Michael D. Resnik, Jay Rosenberg George Schlesinger, Richard A. Smyth, Robert D. Vance.

Introduction

The principal goal of the study of philosophy is to enable students to think more clearly, deeply, and appreciatively about themselves and their world. Study of philosophy enhances analytical, critical, and interpretive capacities that are applicable to any subject matter in almost any context. It provides opportunity for self-expression and reflection, for the exchange and focused debate of ideas, and for learning how to come to terms with problems for which there are no easy answers. A good philosophical education also helps to prepare students for responsible and intelligent participation in political and community affairs.

The most important outcome of philosophical study is the ability to engage in thinking that is at once disciplined and imaginatively creative. While such thinking lies at the heart of the philosophical enterprise, it is also needed for success in any complex intellectual or practical endeavor. Philosophy's attention to critical thought, rigorous argument, and articulate expression makes the philosophical curriculum absolutely central to a liberal education and valuable as a basis for further training in a wide variety of pursuits.

Examples of philosophical questions are:

How should we understand truth, existence, validity, fact, value, free will?

What are the principles or presuppositions of science, language, political systems, religious and moral views?

What is the nature of a person, of space and time, of a work of art?

What is the wisdom of the past on these enduring questions (how can we learn from people like Plato and Aristotle, Descartes or Kant)?

Students are encouraged to view philosophy not as a specialized, esoteric discipline, but instead as an activity integral to a liberal arts education, helping students to think more cogently and appreciatively about themselves and their world.

The Department of Philosophy is part of the College of Arts and Sciences. Philosophy may be taken by students in the college as an elective, as a major, as a minor, as a part of a double major, or as part of an interdisciplinary minor in philosophy, politics, and economics; it also may be taken to meet certain General Education requirements as well as the Approaches requirement in Philosophical and Moral Reasoning. PHIL 101, PHIL 110, or PHIL 112 is recommended as a first course for those interested in philosophical issues and their cultural significance and for those who wish to examine a broad range of philosophical topics, problems, or historical figures. Other good starting points are: PHIL 155, which deals with logic and the analysis of argument; PHIL 160, which deals with moral thought and experience; and PHIL 150, which deals with the concepts, methods, and foundations of the biological and physical sciences.

Courses numbered 51-229 have no prerequisites and may, for many, serve as suitable first courses in philosophy. Courses numbered 101-120 are general survey courses. Courses numbered 130-290 are oriented toward particular problems or topics. Courses numbered 210-229 concern the history of philosophy. Courses numbered 300-399 are designed for advanced undergraduates and majors, and carry a prerequisite of one course in philosophy. Courses between 400 and 699 are for advanced undergraduates as well as graduate students.

PHIL 155 is recommended for all students who major or minor in philosophy.

Programs of Study

The degree offered is bachelor of arts in philosophy. Also offered are a minor in philosophy and an interdisciplinary minor in philosophy, politics, and economics (PPE).

Majoring in Philosophy: Bachelor of Arts

A major in philosophy requires nine philosophy courses - one course in each of three of the following four areas:

History of philosophy: courses with second digit of 1 or 2

Metaphysics, epistemology, philosophy of mind, philosophy of language: courses with second digit of 3 or 4

Logic and philosophy of science: courses with second digit of 5

Value theory: courses with second digit of 6, 7, or 8.

No more than three of the nine courses may be numbered 199 or below.

Within the framework of the major, one can elect a pre-law concentration designed specifically for those planning on pursuing a career in law. Professors Corrado and Postema, both of whom also hold appointments in the School of Law, are available to advise those electing this concentration. Further information is available on the department's Web site at: www.unc.edu/depts/phildept/Pre_law_Program.htm.

Minoring in Philosophy

A minor in philosophy requires five philosophy courses, including at least one course in each of three of the four areas listed above. No more than three may be from courses numbered 199 or below.

PHIL 155 (Introduction to Logic) is recommended for all students who major or minor in philosophy.

Minoring in Philosophy, Politics, and Economics (PPE)

The PPE minor requires five courses: PHIL 384 (Introduction to PPE), PHIL 484 (Advanced PPE), and three additional courses - one each from philosophy, political science, and economics - selected from the PPE approved listing. Detailed information is available on the program's Web site at: philosophy.unc.edu/ppe/ppe.html.

Honors in Philosophy

Those students who have at least a 3.2 grade point average and qualify may take two semesters of courses for honors (PHIL 691H, 692H) during which they prepare and write an honors thesis. Students registered for 691H or 692H will meet periodically as a group, organized by the director of undergraduate studies, to present and discuss their research in progress. Departmental approval is required.

Special Opportunities in Philosophy

Undergraduate Philosophy Club

This group meets weekly to discuss topics of interest and the work of current faculty members. The club sponsors an Annual Undergraduate Philosophy Symposium. Listserve: philclub@listserv.oit.unc.edu.

Phi Sigma Tau

The Eta Chapter of the international honor society in philosophy is open to students who have completed a minimum of four philosophy courses and have a cumulative 3.2 GPA.

Study Abroad

The Philosophy Department enjoys close relations with a number of departments in Australia, New Zealand, and the United Kingdom and is willing and able to work closely with the Study Abroad Office to arrange opportunities for study in these and other countries.

Undergraduate Research

The Philosophy Department offers a colloquium for majors - PHIL 395 (old number 96) and Honors PHIL 396 and 397 (old numbers 100A and 100B) - for students to work closely with faculty on an honors thesis.

Undergraduate Symposium

The Philosophy Club and Phi Sigma Tau coordinate a student conference of selected papers. The one-day conference is set in the format of a professional conference where students have an opportunity to present their research.

Intercollegiate Ethics Bowl

The Intercollegiate Ethics Bowl provides students with a unique opportunity to practice applying the moral theories and argumentation principles learned in their ethics classes. The team sent to the Ethics Bowl competition will be selected from those registered in the course. [For more information contact Professor Jan Boxill, Director Parr Center for Ethics, Caldwell 207A; 962-3317, jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Career Opportunities

A major in philosophy is an excellent preparation for many careers in which clear thinking and analytical ability are valued. Some majors choose to pursue graduate work in philosophy in preparation for college or university teaching (PhD normally required), but the philosophy major also provides the form of rigorous and systematic intellectual training that is of crucial importance in law, medicine, business, and other fields.

Contact Information

Professor John Roberts, Director of Undergraduate Studies, CB# 3125, 102B Caldwell Hall, (919) 962-3325, johnroberts@email.unc.edu.

For more detailed information including courses and faculty, visit the department's home page: philosophy.unc.edu.

NOTE TO DEPARTMENT:
PLEASE DO NOT MAKE CHANGES TO THE COURSE DESCRIPTIONS IN THIS DOCUMENT. THE REGISTRAR'S OFFICE WILL PROVIDE US WITH THE ADDS/DELETES/CHANGES TO COURSES.

PHIL

051 [006F] First Year Seminar: Who Was Socrates? (3). Socrates is the quintessential philosopher - a man for all season, a foundational figure of the West.

052 [006F] First Year Seminar: Reason and Religion at the Dawn of Modern Science (3). Students will read some of the most important philosophical reflections of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

053 [006F] First Year Seminar: Theories in Human Nature (3). Students will explore a variety of issues that arise when human beings begin to reflect on our own natures and will be introduced to main theories that have been developed.

054 [006F] First Year Seminar: Thinking about Time (3). What is time? Do the past and the future exist, or only the present? Is the "flow of time" an objective feature of reality?

055 [006F] First Year Seminar: Paradoxes (3). Paradoxes have been a driving force in philosophy since the fourth century B.C. They force us to rethink old ideas and conceptions.

056 [006F] First Year Seminar: Abortion (3). A general philosophical discussion of the value of life, the evil in death, and the wrongness of killing.

057 [006F] First Year Seminar: Race and Affirmative Action (3). The course is to get a mature and correct understanding of race, racism, and affirmative action.

058 [006F] First Year Seminar: From Vengeance to Mercy: Dealing with Evil (3). This course will explore the ethical dimensions of the responses to evil that we have developed over history. Revenge, retribution, reparation; hatred, resentment, forgiveness; punishment, pardon, mercy.

063 [006F] First Year Seminar: Mind, Brain, and Consciousness (3). What are minds and how are they related to bodies?

065 [006F] First Year Seminar: Philosophy through Mathematics (3). This seminar introduces several of the central problems in philosophy through reflection on the nature of mathematics.

066 [006F] First Year Seminar: Ethics: Theoretical and Practical (3). This seminar examines theoretical issues, relativism, utilitarianism, deontological ethics, and virtue ethics.

067 [006F] First Year Seminar: Issues in a World Society: Sports and Competition (3). This seminar examines ethical issues in sports, including Title IX, gender equity, racism, sexism, cheating, violence, and drug use.

068 [006F] First Year Seminar: Moral Life (3). This course will explore the meaning of basic moral concepts as they are understood in philosophy, science, and art.

076 [006F] First Year Seminar: Is Free Will an Illusion? (3). This course will examine whether our belief in freedom of action is compatible with the modern picture of ourselves.

077 [006F] First Year Seminar: Moral Weakness and Conscience (3). Is man's reason a powerful thing: if one had knowledge or belief about something that should be done, would that be enough to position one to do it?

078 [006F] First Year Seminar: Death as a Problem for Philosophy: Metaphysical and Ethical (3). This course explores both old and new questions regarding death. It will examine the presuppositions and cogency of the classical religious-philosophical conception of death.

085 [006F] First Year Seminar: Reason, Religion, and Reality in the Copernican Revolution (3). The arguments by which Galileo and his contemporaries defended the Copernican model of the solar system puzzle philosophers even today.

101 [020] Introduction to Philosophy: Main Problems (3). What makes some things right and others wrong, and how can we tell the difference? What can we know about the world? Do we have free will?

110 [024] Introduction to Philosophy: Great Works (3). Philosophy is the love of wisdom. But what is wisdom? And what good does it do us to pursue wisdom? Can it improve our character?

112 [026] Making Sense of Ourselves (3). An examination of some of the most influential attempts to understand human beings, their lives, and their moral and political values. Authors include: Plato, Aristotle, St. Matthew, Nietzsche, Rand.

134 [032] Philosophy of Religion (RELI 126) (3). A philosophical inquiry into the problems of religious experience and belief, as expressed in philosophic, religious, and literary documents from traditional and contemporary sources.

145 [035] Language and Communication (LING 222) (3). How are natural human languages different from other communication systems? How are languages related to the world and the mind?

150 [031] Philosophy of Science (3). What is distinctive about the kind of knowledge called "science"? What is scientific explanation? How are scientific theories related to empirical evidence?

154 [036] Philosophy of the Social Sciences (3). How do social sciences explain human actions? Are there social facts over and above facts about various individuals? Do values enter into social science?

155 [021] Introduction to Mathematical Logic (3). Introduces the theory of deductive reasoning, using a symbolic language to represent and evaluate patterns of reasoning.

157 Logic and Decision Theory (3). A broader discussion of practical reasoning, including inductive and deductive logic, which provides a good introduction to decision and game theory that is important for the social sciences, especially economics.

160 [022] Introduction to Ethics (3). Exploration of different philosophical perspectives about right and wrong, personal character, justice, moral reasoning, and moral conflicts. Readings drawn from classic or contemporary sources. Critical discussion emphasized.

163 [030] Practical Ethics (3). Topics may include: war, medical ethics, media ethics, sexual ethics, business ethics, racism, sexism, capital punishment, and the environment.

164 [039] Morality and Business (3). An examination of business ethics and the types of ethical dilemmas people may face in business practices.

165 [034] Bioethics (3). The ethical basis of issues arising in health care: e.g. patient rights, removing life support, euthanasia, abortion, use of human or animal subjects in experiments, genetic manipulation, cloning.

170 [037] Social Ethics and Political Thought (3). Individual rights, social responsibility, legal authority, civil authority, civil disobedience, war and peace. Readings selected from classical and contemporary writings.

185 [033] Introduction to Aesthetics (3). The nature of art and artworks and their aesthetic appraisal.

210 [056] Ancient Philosophy (3). An examination of the basic writings of the pre-Socratics, Plato, and Aristotle, with a primary focus on ethics and politics. Epicureanism, stoicism, Neoplatonism, and Greek skepticism.

213 [052] Asian Philosophy (3). An examination of some of the philosophical traditions of Asia. Possible topics include Advaita Vedanta, Nyaya-Vaisheshika, Madhyamaka Buddhism, neo-Confucianism, Mohism, and philosophical Taoism.

215 [057] Medieval Philosophy (3). A survey of medieval philosophy from Augustine through Ockham. Topics: God and the world, faith and reason, knowledge and reality, the problem of universals. Additional main authors: Anselm, Aquinas, Duns Scotus.

220 [058] Modern Philosophy: Descartes to Hume (3). Prerequisite, one course in philosophy. The writings of Descartes, Spinoza, Locke, Berkeley, Leibniz, and Hume on such questions as: Can we know that the things we see and touch are real and not a dream?

224 [064] Existential Philosophy (3). A study of European philosophers such as Kierkegaard, Nietzsche, Husserl, Heidegger, Jaspers, Sartre, Gadamer, Habermas, and/or Foucault.

228 [059] American Philosophy (3). An exploration of the distinctively American approaches to philosophy from Jonathan Edwards to the present.

229 [065] Twentieth-Century Philosophy (3). Prerequisite, one course other than PHIL 155. An introductory survey of British and continental philosophy in the twentieth century.

230 [038] Experience and Reality (3). Is your mind different from your brain? Is time travel possible? What are cause and effect? What makes you today and yesterday the same person?

266 [047] Ethics of Sports (3). A conceptual and theoretical analysis of the moral significance of sport, concentrating on issues such as racism, sexism, gender equity, violence, and drug use.

272 [042] The Ethics of Peace, War, and Defense (POLI 272, PWAD 272) (3). The legitimacy of states; just war theory; pacifism; the ethics of revolution; terrorism; problems of war in an age of weapons of mass destruction; the moral conditions of peace.

273 [066] Social and Economic Justice (3). This course will focus on justice and the common good, applying theoretical justifications to contemporary social and economic issues. Readings will include classical and contemporary literature on the nature of justice and rights.

274 [055] African-American Political Philosophy (AFAM 274) (3). Race, identity, discrimination, multiculturalism, affirmative action and slave reparations in the writings of Walker, Delany, Douglass, Cooper, DuBois, King, and Malcolm X.

275 [046] Moral and Philosophical Issues of Gender in Society (WMST 275) (3). A survey of feminist perspectives on topics such as the meaning of oppression, sexism and racism, sex roles and stereotypes, ideals of female beauty, women in the workplace, pornography, rape.

280 [041] Morality and Law (3). Explores the best work in legal philosophy on such questions as: What is law? Does it serve justice or undermine it? Can punishment be justified? When is a person responsible?

285 [045] Moral and Philosophical Issues in Education (3). A critical examination of the moral and philosophical issues in education: What does it mean to be well educated? What is a liberal education?

330 [075] Metaphysics (3). An examination of general theories of the nature of reality. What kinds of things exist? What are space, time, and causation? Are abstract entities (such as numbers) real?

335 [073] Theory of Knowledge (3). What is knowledge and how does it relate to belief, justification, and truth? What makes beliefs reasonable or irrational? Can skepticism be defeated?

340 [076] Philosophy of Mind (3). The mind-body problem, the nature of thinking, the puzzles of consciousness, and the qualitative character of felt experience.

345 [074] Reference and Meaning (3). How does a noise or a mark on paper refer to something, or have a meaning?

351 [082] Philosophy of Physics (3). Prerequisite, one course in philosophy or permission of instructor. Topics may include the nature of space and time, the ontological status of fields and energy, or causation and locality in quantum physics.

352 [083] [GB1]Philosophy of Biology (3). Prerequisite, one course in philosophy or in a biological science. Philosophical issues raised by biological theories, which may include the logical structure of evolutionary theory, fitness, taxonomy, the notion of a living thing, reductionism, evolutionary explanations, or teleology.

353 [077] Philosophy of Cognitive Science (3). Philosophical questions raised by linguistics, computer science, cognitive psychology, and neuroscience. Topics may include the innateness of language, artificial intelligence, and the neural correlates of consciousness.

356 [071] Topics in Mathematical Logic (3). Prerequisite, PHIL 155 or permission of instructor. Topics may include the predicate calculus with identity and the metalogic of formal systems, modal logic, decision theory, alternative logics, probability, and induction.

357 [069] Induction, Probability, and Confirmation (3). Prerequisite, one course in philosophy. Current accounts of evidence and observation, the confirmation of scientific theories, the logic of inductive reasoning, and the metaphysics and epistemology of chance.

360 [070] History of Ethics (3). Major developments in the history of moral philosophy, from Plato to Nietzsche. PHIL 160 recommended.

362 [072] Contemporary Ethical Theory (3). Questions include: Is there moral truth? Is there a distinction between facts and values?

364 [067] Ethics and Economics (PLCY 364) (3). Prerequisite, one course in ethics (PHIL 160, 163, or 170) or one course in economics. Issues at the intersection of ethics and economics, including: value; the relation between values and preferences; rationality; the relevance to economics of rights, justice, and the value of human life.

368 [068] Environmental Ethics (ENST 368) (3). The meaning of environmental values and their relation to other values; the ethical status of animals, species, wilderness, and ecosystems; the built environment; environmental justice; ecofeminism; obligations to future generations.

370 [078] Political Philosophy (3). Advanced discussion of competing philosophical approaches to questions of justice, authority, freedom, rights, and the like, including libertarianism, liberalism, communitarianism, Marxism, and feminism.

384 [084] Introduction to Philosophy, Politics, and Economics (ECON 384, POLI 384) (3). Prerequisites, permission of instructor, PHIL 170 or POLI 276, and one course in economics. This interdisciplinary gateway course provides an introduction to subjects and quantitative techniques used to analyze problems in philosophy, political science, and economics.

390 [080] Seminar in Selected Topics (3). Intensive exploration and discussion of selected topics in philosophy.

396 [099] Directed Readings (3). See the director of undergraduate studies of the department.

397 [096] Colloquium for Philosophy Majors (3). Students will present papers on selected topics for critical discussion. Recommended for philosophy majors in their junior year.

411 [151] Aristotle (3). An examination of some representative works of Aristotle, with reference to common emphases and basic problems, together with an analysis of their philosophic content.

412 [150] Plato (3). An examination of some representative works in the context of contemporary scholarship.

415 [152] Topics in Medieval Philosophy (3). An intensive study of some medieval philosophical author (e.g., Aquinas, Scotus, or Ockham) or topic (e.g., arguments for the existence of God, universals, knowledge of individuals).

421 [153] Rationalism (3). An examination of the view of the rationalist philosophers (Descartes, Spinoza, and Leibniz) that reasoning can give us knowledge of the world and of our place in it.

422 [154] Empiricism (3). An examination of the view of the empiricist philosophers (Locke, Berkeley, and Hume) that the only way to gain knowledge of the world is by means of the senses.

423 [155] Kant (3). An intensive introduction to Kant's accounts of space, time, concepts, perception, substance, causation, and the thinking self through a careful study of his masterwork, The Critique of Pure Reason.

427 [156] Hegel (3). In-depth study of Hegel's systematic philosophy emphasizing its roots in Kant's critical philosophy. Primary focus on Phenomenology of Spirit, supplemented by selections from the Encyclopedia and Philosophy of Right.

428 [159] History of American Philosophy (3). Transcendentalists, pragmatists, Quine, Rorty, and others.

432 [114] The Beginnings of Analytic Philosophy (3). Prerequisites, two courses in philosophy other than PHIL 155 or permission of instructor. Frege, Russell, Moore, and Wittgenstein among other are considered.

433 [116] Current Issues in Analytic Philosophy (3). Prerequisites, two courses in philosophy other than PHIL 155 or permission of instructor. Recent work in epistemology and metaphysics.

440 [117] Philosophy of Mind (3). Prerequisites, two courses in philosophy other than PHIL 155 (PHIL 340 recommended) or permission of instructor. An examination of dualism, behaviorism, the identity theory, and forms of functionalism with special focus on the problems of mental aboutness.

445 [110] Philosophy of Language (LING 410) (3). Prerequisites, two courses in philosophy other than PHIL 155 (PHIL 345 recommended) or permission of instructor. How does language represent? Does it mirror the structure of the world? Does it reflect the structure of the mind?

450 [108] Philosophy of Natural Sciences (3). Concept formation, verifiability, law, explanation, the role of logic and mathematics in the sciences, and other topics.

451 [122] Philosophy of Physics (3). Topics may include the nature of space and time, the ontological status of fields and energy, or causation and locality in quantum physics.

452 [123] Philosophy of Biology (3). The logical structure of evolutionary theory, fitness, taxonomy, the notion of a living thing, reductionism, evolutionary explanations, teleology.

453 [109] Philosophy of Psychology (3). Topics may include reasoning, the relationship between language and thought, concepts, moral cognition, and emotions.

454 [107] Philosophy, History, and the Social Sciences (3). The nature of historical explanation, structural and functional explanation, the weighing of historical testimony, the concept of meaning, normative judgments and predictions in the social sciences.

455 [101] Symbolic Logic (LING 455) (3). Introduction for graduates and advanced undergraduates not taking the PHIL 155-PHIL 356 sequence.

456 [111] Advanced Symbolic Logic (3). Prerequisite, PHIL 455 or permission of instructor. Presupposes propositional and quantificational logic as a basis of further deductive development with special attention to selected topics:

alternative systems, modal and deontic logic, inductive logic, the grammar of formalized languages, paradoxes, and foundations of mathematics.

457 [190] Set Theory and Logic (3). Prerequisite, PHIL 455 or permission of instructor. Natural and real numbers. Infinite cardinal and ordinal numbers. Alternative axiom systems and their consistency problems.

459 [106] Philosophy of Mathematics (3). Prerequisite, PHIL 455 or permission of instructor. Philosophical problems concerning logic and the foundation of mathematics.

460 [102] Selected Topics in the History of Moral Philosophy (3). Prerequisites, two courses in philosophy other than PHIL 155 (PHIL 360 recommended) or permission of instructor. Examination of classic texts of Plato, Aristotle, Aquinas, Hobbes, Butler, Hume, Kant, and Mill. Selections may vary from year to year.

462 [112] Contemporary Moral Philosophy (3). Prerequisites, two courses in philosophy other than PHIL 155 (PHIL 362 recommended) or permission of instructor. Fact and value, reason and morality, the nature of morality.

463 [120] Contemporary Moral and Social Problems (3). Prerequisites, two courses in philosophy other than PHIL 155 or permission of instructor. A detailed examination of one or more of the following contemporary issues: environmental ethics, animal rights, abortion, euthanasia, pornography, racism, sexism, public versus private morality.

465 [175] Justice in Health Care (3). Prerequisite, one course in philosophy or permission of instructor; medical students welcome. The course will focus on the question of how scarce health care resources ought to be distributed in order to meet the demands of justice.

468 [168] Risk and Society (3). Prerequisites, PHIL 155 and one other course or permission of instructor. The course examines attitudes toward risk and how they affect our preferences for different public policies in the areas of environmental protection, technology regulation, and workplace and product safety.

470 [105] Political Philosophy from Hobbes to Rousseau (3). Prerequisites, two courses in philosophy other than PHIL 155 (PHIL 170 or PHIL 370 recommended) or permission of instructor. Explores the foundations of justice and authority in the idea of contract or covenant, the nature of law, rights, liberty, and democracy in the work of Hobbes, Locke, Hume, Rousseau.

471 [104] Hegel, Marx, and the Philosophical Critique of Society (3). An examination of central issues in social and political philosophy as they figure in the work of Hegel, Marx, Nietzsche, and others.

473 [160] American Political Philosophy (3). Prerequisites, junior/senior status and one course in the Philosophy Department other than PHIL 155. The issue of unity and diversity in America is analyzed through the writings of Jefferson, the Federalists and Anti-Federalists, Calhoun, MacKinnon, DuBois, and Rawls.

475 [165] Philosophical Issues in Gender, Race, and Class (WMST 475) (3). Prerequisite, PHIL 275, WMST 101, or permission of instructor. Examines in greater depth and complexity one or more of the issues addressed in PHIL 275; investigating issues of gender, race, and class within the dominant theories of philosophy.

476 [130] Recent Developments in Political Philosophy (3). Prerequisites, two courses in philosophy other than PHIL 155 (PHIL 370 recommended) or permission of instructor. Investigation of major contemporary contributors (Rawls, Nozick, Dworkin, Cohen, Waldron, Arrow) to philosophical debate concerning justice, equality, liberty, democracy, public reason, or rights versus community.

480 [113] Philosophy of Law (3). An exploration of whether and under what conditions the state has the right to control crime by punishment of past crimes and preventive detention to prevent future crimes.

482 [142] Philosophy and Literature (CMPL 482) (3). Philosophical readings of literary texts, including novels, plays, and poems.

485 [103] Philosophy of Art (3). Competing theories of art and art criticism. The relationship between art and emotional expression, the formal character of art, and standards of taste.

494 [158] Existentialism and Phenomenology (3). A study of one or two major systematic works by Sartre, Heidegger, or Merleau-Ponty.

495 [178] Health Care, Science, and Philosophy (3). Interdisciplinary course to develop critical thinking capacities through philosophical study of the nature of scientific presuppositions and concepts, including events, causality, and determinism, with specific application to health care issues.

691H [100A] Courses for Honors (3). Prerequisite, senior honors major. See the director of undergraduate studies of the department.

692H [100B] Courses for Honors (3). Prerequisite, senior honors major. See the director of undergraduate studies of the department.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, March 12, 2007 1:56 PM
To: Corrado, Michael L <mlcorrad@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: scheduling

Yes, we can. We can have it as "controlled enrollment" and that way screen anyone who wants to enroll in the course.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Michael Corrado wrote:
> Jan, those of us teaching the philosophy of law seminar would like to > limit the number of participants this year, if that's OK with you:
> 10 law students, eight Arts and Sciences students. Of the eight Arts > and Science, we'd like to limit it to five philosophy and three > economics students. Is all of that possible?
>
> Mike
>
> Jan Boxill wrote:
>> Hi Mike,
>> I am still doing the scheduling -- this year. We have you teaching >> in the Philosophy of Law in Spring 2008, but nothing in the Fall. Is >> that what you understand as well?
>>
>> Jan
>>
>> Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
>> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
>> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
>> Department of Philosophy
>> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>> Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
>> Phone: 919-962-3317
>> FAX: 919-843-3929
>>
>>
>>
>> Michael Corrado wrote:
>>> Hi, Jan. I have forgotten whether you are still doing scheduling.
>>> Is it you or is it someone else?
>>>
>>> Mike
>>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, March 12, 2007 9:42 PM
To: Walker, Rebecca L <rebecca_l_walker@med.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Fwd: Teaching Schedule: 07-08

I haven't started looking at Spring, but I'll talk with Geoff this week,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Rebecca Walker wrote:
> Hi Jan,
>
> When you have a chance please just confirm that it will be OK for me > to teach a grad seminar in contemporary ethics in the spring (08).
> That will help me finalize my schedule for next year.
>
> Thanks so much,
>
> Rebecca
>
>
> Begin forwarded message:
>
>> *From: *Rebecca Walker <rlwalker@med.unc.edu
>> <mailto:rlwalker@med.unc.edu>>
>> *Date: *March 6, 2007 3:37:06 PM EST
>> *To: *Jan Boxill <jmboxill@email.unc.edu <mailto:jmboxill@email.unc.edu>>
>> Subject: Re: Teaching Schedule: 07-08
>>
>> Hi Jan,
>>
>> How about if I teach a graduate seminar in the spring (08)? It would >> be something in contemporary ethics (probably on moral status). Let >> me know if that works for the coming year (then I'd do an >> undergraduate course the following year 08-09).
>>
>> Thanks,
>>
>> Rebecca
>>
>>
>> On Mar 6, 2007, at 12:09 PM, Jan Boxill wrote:
>>
>>> Hi Rebecca,
>>> Hope all is going well with the new baby.
>>> Here is your teaching schedule for:
>>> FALL: nothing scheduled
>>>
>>> SPRING 2008:
>>> PHIL 495: Health Care.
>>>

>>> Jan
>>>
>>> --
>>> Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
>>> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
>>> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
>>> Department of Philosophy
>>> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu <mailto:jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
>>> Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
>>> Phone: 919-962-3317
>>> FAX: 919-843-3929
>>>
>>>
>>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, March 12, 2007 9:42 PM
To: Corrado, Michael L <mlcorrad@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: scheduling

Will do.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Michael Corrado wrote:
> Let's do that.
>
> Jan Boxill wrote:
>> Yes, we can. We can have it as "controlled enrollment" and that way >> screen anyone who wants to enroll in the course. Jan
>>
>> Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
>> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
>> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
>> Department of Philosophy
>> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>> Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
>> Phone: 919-962-3317
>> FAX: 919-843-3929
>>
>>
>>
>> Michael Corrado wrote:
>>> Jan, those of us teaching the philosophy of law seminar would like >>> to limit the number of participants this year, if that's OK with you:
>>> 10 law students, eight Arts and Sciences students. Of the eight >>> Arts and Science, we'd like to limit it to five philosophy and three >>> economics students. Is all of that possible?
>>>
>>> Mike
>>>
>>> Jan Boxill wrote:
>>>> Hi Mike,
>>>> I am still doing the scheduling -- this year. We have you teaching >>>> in the Philosophy of Law in Spring 2008, but nothing in the Fall.
>>>> Is that what you understand as well?
>>>>
>>>> Jan
>>>>
>>>> Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
>>>> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
>>>> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
>>>> Department of Philosophy
>>>> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>>>> Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
>>>> Phone: 919-962-3317

>>>> FAX: 919-843-3929
>>>>
>>>>
>>>>
>>>> Michael Corrado wrote:
>>>>> Hi, Jan. I have forgotten whether you are still doing >>>>> scheduling. Is it you or is it someone else?
>>>>>
>>>>> Mike
>>>>
>>>
>>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, March 13, 2007 10:41 AM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Kurt Smith talk

Professor Kurt Smith, Visiting Fellow in Philosophy at Princeton, Associate Professor of Philosophy at Bloomsburg University of Pennsylvania, will give a talk on Friday, March 30, 2007, 3 p.m. in Murphey 116.

"Academe at War: A Critical Look at David Horowitz's Campaign Against Academic Freedom"

Dr. Kurt Smith, Visiting Fellow in Philosophy at Princeton University, is an Associate Professor of Philosophy at Bloomsburg University of Pennsylvania. He received his B.A. in Philosophy at the University of California at Irvine and his M.A. and Ph.D. at Claremont Graduate University, specializing in the 17th and 18th century philosophy. His work can be found published in several scholarly peer-reviewed journals and books.

Dr. Smith has received two NEH grants for his research and is currently an elected Associate of the Center for the Philosophy of Science at the University of Pittsburgh. He has presented his research at sessions of the American Philosophical Association, most recently presenting work at the Colloquium of the New England Early Modern Reading Group, co-sponsored by Harvard and Brown Universities.

Dr. Smith was among those who testified at the hearings held by Pennsylvania's Select Committee on Academic Freedom in Higher Education conducted across the Commonwealth. At Gettysburg College, he presented a paper that took a critical look at HR-177, the House resolution establishing the select committee that conducted those hearings. Again, those hearings stemmed from, in many regards, Mr. Horowitz's /Academic Bill of Rights/. His article, "A Philosopher Looks at the Academic Bill of Rights," appears in a recent issue of /Academe./

If you would like to view the debate with Horowitz:
http://www.frontpagemag.com/Content/read.asp?ID=204

Thanks,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, March 13, 2007 1:11 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Kurt Smith talk

Carlo,
The Office of Faculty Governance does not want to be recognized as a co-sponsor. So remove that from the website, and when we make a flyer, be sure they are not on it.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Carlo Robustelli wrote:
> I would also include the link to the event web page (which I just > created). If you could proof it for errors I would appreciate it.
> http://parrcenter.unc.edu/events/seminars/Academicfreedom/
>
> - Carlo
>
> Carlo Robustelli
> Program Coordinator
> Parr Center for Ethics
> Department of Philosophy
> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
> CB #3125
> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
> USA
>
> Phone: (919) 843-5640
> email: carlo@unc.edu
> http://philosophy.unc.edu/robustelli.htm
>
>
> Jan Boxill wrote:
>> Professor Kurt Smith, Visiting Fellow in Philosophy at Princeton,
>> Associate Professor of Philosophy at Bloomsburg University of >> Pennsylvania, will give a talk on Friday, March 30, 2007, 3 p.m. in >> Murphey 116.
>>
>> "Academe at War: A Critical Look at David Horowitz's Campaign Against >> Academic Freedom"
>>
>>
>> Dr. Kurt Smith, Visiting Fellow in Philosophy at Princeton
>> University, is an Associate Professor of Philosophy at Bloomsburg >> University of Pennsylvania. He received his B.A. in Philosophy at >> the University of California at Irvine and his M.A. and Ph.D. at >> Claremont Graduate University, specializing in the 17th and 18th >> century philosophy. His work can be found published in several >> scholarly peer-reviewed journals and books.

>>
>>
>> Dr. Smith has received two NEH grants for his research and is >> currently an elected Associate of the Center for the Philosophy of >> Science at the University of Pittsburgh. He has presented his >> research at sessions of the American Philosophical Association, most >> recently presenting work at the Colloquium of the New England Early >> Modern Reading Group, co-sponsored by Harvard and Brown Universities.
>>
>>
>> Dr. Smith was among those who testified at the hearings held by >> Pennsylvania's Select Committee on Academic Freedom in Higher >> Education conducted across the Commonwealth. At Gettysburg College, >> he presented a paper that took a critical look at HR-177, the House >> resolution establishing the select committee that conducted those >> hearings. Again, those hearings stemmed from, in many regards, Mr.
>> Horowitz's /Academic Bill of Rights/. His article, "A Philosopher >> Looks at the Academic Bill of Rights," appears in a recent issue of >> /Academe./
>>
>>
>>
>>
>> If you would like to view the debate with Horowitz:
>> http://www.frontpagemag.com/Content/read.asp?ID=204
>>
>> Thanks,
>> Jan
>>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, March 13, 2007 1:22 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: Re: Professor Kurt Smith talk]
Attach: Re Professor Kurt Smith talk.msg

I can still ask him for money if we need.
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Allred, Stephen <steve_allred@UNC.EDU>
Sent: Tuesday, March 13, 2007 1:16 PM
To: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Professor Kurt Smith talk

Jan: Count me in for this! I'll see you on March 30th. -Steve

Jan Boxill wrote:

> Professor Kurt Smith, Visiting Fellow in Philosophy at Princeton,
> Associate Professor of Philosophy at Bloomsburg University of > Pennsylvania, will give a talk on Friday, March 30, 2007, 3 p.m. in > Murphey 116.
>
> "Academe at War: A Critical Look at David Horowitz's Campaign Against > Academic Freedom"
>
> Dr. Kurt Smith, Visiting Fellow in Philosophy at Princeton University, > is an Associate Professor of Philosophy at Bloomsburg University of > Pennsylvania. He received his B.A. in Philosophy at the University of > California at Irvine and his M.A. and Ph.D. at Claremont Graduate > University, specializing in the 17th and 18th century philosophy. His > work can be found published in several scholarly peer-reviewed > journals and books.
>
> Dr. Smith has received two NEH grants for his research and is > currently an elected Associate of the Center for the Philosophy of > Science at the University of Pittsburgh. He has presented his > research at sessions of the American Philosophical Association, most > recently presenting work at the Colloquium of the New England Early > Modern Reading Group, co-sponsored by Harvard and Brown Universities.
>
> Dr. Smith was among those who testified at the hearings held by > Pennsylvania's Select Committee on Academic Freedom in Higher > Education conducted across the Commonwealth. At Gettysburg College, > he presented a paper that took a critical look at HR-177, the House > resolution establishing the select committee that conducted those > hearings. Again, those hearings stemmed from, in many regards, Mr.
> Horowitz's /Academic Bill of Rights/. His article, "A Philosopher > Looks at the Academic Bill of Rights," appears in a recent issue of > /Academe/.
>
>
> If you would like to view the debate with Horowitz:
> http://www.frontpagemag.com/Content/read.asp?ID=204
>
> Thanks,
> Jan
>

--

Steve Allred
Executive Associate Provost
CB # 3000
University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3000
Phone: 919-962-4510
Fax: 919-962-1593

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, March 13, 2007 7:51 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: [Fwd: Re: Professor Kurt Smith talk]

I was thinking we wouldn't have a reception. What do you think?

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Carlo Robustelli wrote:
> Well we will need overtime pay and reception money. So if you want to > ask for about $600 that combined with $200 would be all we need I think.
>
> - Carlo
> Carlo Robustelli
> Program Coordinator
> Parr Center for Ethics
> Department of Philosophy
> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
> CB #3125
> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
> USA
>
> Phone: (919) 843-5640
> email: carlo@unc.edu
> http://philosophy.unc.edu/robustelli.htm
>
>
> Jan Boxill wrote:
>> I can still ask him for money if we need.
>> Jan
>>
>>
>> ----------
>>
>> Subject:
>> Re: Professor Kurt Smith talk
>> From:
>> Steve Allred <steve_allred@UNC.EDU>
>> Date:
>> Tue, 13 Mar 2007 13:15:48 -0400
>> To:
>> Jan Boxill <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
>>
>> To:
>> Jan Boxill <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
>>
>>
>> Jan: Count me in for this! I'll see you on March 30th. -Steve
>>
>> Jan Boxill wrote:
>>

>>> Professor Kurt Smith, Visiting Fellow in Philosophy at Princeton, >>> Associate Professor of Philosophy at Bloomsburg University of >>> Pennsylvania, will give a talk on Friday, March 30, 2007, 3 p.m. in >>> Murphey 116.
>>>
>>> "Academe at War: A Critical Look at David Horowitz's Campaign >>> Against Academic Freedom"
>>>
>>> Dr. Kurt Smith, Visiting Fellow in Philosophy at Princeton >>> University, is an Associate Professor of Philosophy at Bloomsburg >>> University of Pennsylvania. He received his B.A. in Philosophy at >>> the University of California at Irvine and his M.A. and Ph.D. at >>> Claremont Graduate University, specializing in the 17th and 18th >>> century philosophy. His work can be found published in several >>> scholarly peer-reviewed journals and books.
>>>
>>> Dr. Smith has received two NEH grants for his research and is >>> currently an elected Associate of the Center for the Philosophy of >>> Science at the University of Pittsburgh. He has presented his >>> research at sessions of the American Philosophical Association, most >>> recently presenting work at the Colloquium of the New England Early >>> Modern Reading Group, co-sponsored by Harvard and Brown Universities.
>>>
>>> Dr. Smith was among those who testified at the hearings held by >>> Pennsylvania's Select Committee on Academic Freedom in Higher >>> Education conducted across the Commonwealth. At Gettysburg College, >>> he presented a paper that took a critical look at HR-177, the House >>> resolution establishing the select committee that conducted those >>> hearings. Again, those hearings stemmed from, in many regards, Mr.
>>> Horowitz's /Academic Bill of Rights/. His article, "A Philosopher >>> Looks at the Academic Bill of Rights," appears in a recent issue of >>> /Academe/.
>>>
>>>
>>> If you would like to view the debate with Horowitz:
>>> http://www.frontpagemag.com/Content/read.asp?ID=204
>>>
>>> Thanks,
>>> Jan
>>>
>>
>>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, March 14, 2007 10:56 AM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: [Fwd: Re: Professor Kurt Smith talk]

I think just $250 honorarium is suitable.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Carlo Robustelli wrote:
> I agree, no reception. Perhaps we could pay him 250 honorarium and > 200 for travel?
>
> What do you think?
>
> - Carlo
>
> Carlo Robustelli
> Program Coordinator
> Parr Center for Ethics
> Department of Philosophy
> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
> CB #3125
> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
> USA
>
> Phone: (919) 843-5640
> email: carlo@unc.edu
> http://philosophy.unc.edu/robustelli.htm
>
>
> Jan Boxill wrote:
>> I was thinking we wouldn't have a reception. What do you think?
>>
>> Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
>> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
>> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
>> Department of Philosophy
>> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>> Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
>> Phone: 919-962-3317
>> FAX: 919-843-3929
>>
>>
>>
>> Carlo Robustelli wrote:
>>> Well we will need overtime pay and reception money. So if you want >>> to ask for about $600 that combined with $200 would be all we need I >>> think.
>>>
>>> - Carlo

>>> Carlo Robustelli
>>> Program Coordinator
>>> Parr Center for Ethics
>>> Department of Philosophy
>>> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
>>> CB #3125
>>> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
>>> USA
>>>
>>> Phone: (919) 843-5640
>>> email: carlo@unc.edu
>>> http://philosophy.unc.edu/robustelli.htm
>>>
>>> Jan Boxill wrote:
>>>> I can still ask him for money if we need.
>>>> Jan
>>>>
>>>>
>>>> ----------
>>>>
>>>>
>>>> Subject:
>>>> Re: Professor Kurt Smith talk
>>>> From:
>>>> Steve Allred <steve_allred@UNC.EDU>
>>>> Date:
>>>> Tue, 13 Mar 2007 13:15:48 -0400
>>>> To:
>>>> Jan Boxill <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
>>>>
>>>> To:
>>>> Jan Boxill <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
>>>>
>>>>
>>>> Jan: Count me in for this! I'll see you on March 30th. -Steve
>>>>
>>>> Jan Boxill wrote:
>>>>
>>>>> Professor Kurt Smith, Visiting Fellow in Philosophy at Princeton, >>>>> Associate Professor of Philosophy at Bloomsburg University of >>>>> Pennsylvania, will give a talk on Friday, March 30, 2007, 3 p.m. >>>>> in Murphey 116.
>>>>>
>>>>> "Academe at War: A Critical Look at David Horowitz's Campaign >>>>> Against Academic Freedom"
>>>>>
>>>>> Dr. Kurt Smith, Visiting Fellow in Philosophy at Princeton >>>>> University, is an Associate Professor of Philosophy at Bloomsburg >>>>> University of Pennsylvania. He received his B.A. in Philosophy at >>>>> the University of California at Irvine and his M.A. and Ph.D. at >>>>> Claremont Graduate University, specializing in the 17th and 18th >>>>> century philosophy. His work can be found published in several >>>>> scholarly peer-reviewed journals and books.
>>>>>
>>>>> Dr. Smith has received two NEH grants for his research and is >>>>> currently an elected Associate of the Center for the Philosophy of >>>>> Science at the University of Pittsburgh. He has presented his >>>>> research at sessions of the American Philosophical Association, >>>>> most recently presenting work at the Colloquium of the New England >>>>> Early Modern Reading Group, co-sponsored by Harvard and Brown >>>>> Universities.
>>>>>
>>>>> Dr. Smith was among those who testified at the hearings held by >>>>> Pennsylvania's Select Committee on Academic Freedom in Higher >>>>> Education conducted across the Commonwealth. At Gettysburg

>>>>> College, he presented a paper that took a critical look at HR-177, >>>>> the House resolution establishing the select committee that >>>>> conducted those hearings. Again, those hearings stemmed from, in >>>>> many regards, Mr. Horowitz's /Academic Bill of Rights/. His >>>>> article, "A Philosopher Looks at the Academic Bill of Rights," >>>>> appears in a recent issue of /Academe/.
>>>>>
>>>>>
>>>>> If you would like to view the debate with Horowitz:
>>>>> http://www.frontpagemag.com/Content/read.asp?ID=204
>>>>>
>>>>> Thanks,
>>>>> Jan
>>>>>
>>>>
>>>>
>>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, March 14, 2007 11:09 AM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: [Fwd: Re: Another possible IAH-Parr Center event collaboration]

Yes, AAUP = American Association of University Professors.
So perhaps we could co-ordinate Smith with the AAUP meeting. So let's send it on to Carl Ernst. Actually I know Carl, so I'll send him the info.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Carlo Robustelli wrote:
> FYI - There seems to be a conflict. Do you know what the AAUP is?
>
>
>
> ---
>
> Subject:
> Re: Another possible IAH-Parr Center event collaboration
> From:
> jpm@email.unc.edu
> Date:
> Tue, 13 Mar 2007 21:13:07 -0400
> To:
> Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
>
> To:
> Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
>
>
> Carlo:
>
> Send this information to Carl Ernst in Religious Studies. He is the > campus head of AAUP --and they are holding ameeting here on March > 30-31. Is Smith aprt of that meeting? His topic makes it sound as if > he must be. And if not, then he's conflicting with a meeting of the > very audience he would be most likey to attract.
>
> John
>
> Quoting Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>:
>
>> John,
>>
>> We have been working on organizing an event featuring, Kurt Smith, >> Visiting Fellow in Philosophy at Princeton University, is an >> Associate Professor of Philosophy at Bloomsburg University of >> Pennsylvania. He is giving a public lecture on March 30th, "Academe >> at War: A Critical Look at David Horowitz's Campaign Against Academic >> Freedom." Funding for the event has been secured and so I thought >> this might be of interest to IAH faculty fellows. Would you (IAH) >> consider co-sponsoring the event by sending event details out to >> fellows and/or listserv's?

>>
>> You can find out more about Professor Smith and this event by going >> to the event web page:
>> http://parrcenter.unc.edu/events/seminars/Academicfreedom/index.htm
>>
>> Let me know what you have any questions or concerns.
>>
>> - Carlo
>>
>> --
>> Carlo Robustelli
>> Program Coordinator
>> Parr Center for Ethics
>> Department of Philosophy
>> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
>> CB #3125
>> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
>> USA
>>
>> Phone: (919) 843-5640
>> email: carlo@unc.edu
>> http://philosophy.unc.edu/robustelli.htm
>>
>>
>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, March 14, 2007 8:23 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@UNC.EDU>
Cc: Lance Westerlund <Lance_Westerlund@UNC.EDU>
Subject: Re: [Fwd: Re: Professor Kurt Smith, "Academe at War: A Critical Look at David Horowitz's Campaign Against Academic Freedom"]

Carlo,
Carl has it wrong--he thinks the talk is at 7:30, which is not the case. Also, Thursday morning??? And if we move it to Thursday in the afternoon, it will conflict with our seminars. We need to check with Alan Nelson as well to make sure there is no conflict with Kurt. Perhaps we could have him at 7 on Thursday, or a noon talk.
I'll call you when I'm driving tomorrow.

Oh you can use the truck anytime. It's available; just come get it. The keys are behind the visor on the driver's side.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, March 15, 2007 4:33 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Professor Kurt Smith, "Academe at War: A Critical Look at David Horowitz's Campaign Against Academic Freedom"

Carlo,
There's still a confusion as the talk is at 3 not 3:30. It is at 3 p.m.
on March 30th [3/30]
Let's see Carl's response.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Carlo Robustelli wrote:
> Hi Carl,
>
> I apologize for the confusion but Kurt Smith's talk is actually on > Friday at 3:30 pm. Would this still be in conflict with Cary Nelson's > talk?
>
> - Carlo
> Carlo Robustelli
> Program Coordinator
> Parr Center for Ethics
> Department of Philosophy
> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
> CB #3125
> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
> USA
>
> Phone: (919) 843-5640
> email: carlo@unc.edu
> http://philosophy.unc.edu/robustelli.htm
>
>
> Carl Ernst wrote:
>>
>> dear Carlo,
>>
>> I see that Kurt Smith is scheduled to speak at 7:30, which is indeed >> in conflict with Cary Nelsonâ€™s talk for the AAUP conference. I am >> attaching a flyer for this event.
>>
>> I agree that it would be very beneficial to avoid dividing the >> natural audience for these speakers. If it is possible to shift Smith >> to Thursday, that would be great. I would be glad to publicize the >> talk on the AAUP listserv.
>>
>> Best wishes,
>>
>> Carl

>>
>> **********
>>
>> Carl W. Ernst, Director
>>
>> Carolina Center for the Study of the Middle East and Muslim Civilizations
>>
>> William R. Kenan, Jr., Distinguished Professor
>>
>> Department of Religious Studies
>>
>> 125 Saunders, CB #3225
>>
>> University of North Carolina
>>
>> Chapel Hill NC 27599-3225
>>
>> 919-962-3924 office
>>
>> 919-962-1567 fax
>>
>> cernst@email.unc.edu <mailto:cernst@email.unc.edu>
>>
>> http://www.unc.edu/~cernst <http://www.unc.edu/%7Ecernst>
>>
>> Author of /Following Muhammad: Rethinking Islam in the Contemporary >> World/
>>
>> http://uncpress.unc.edu/books/T-7369.html
>>
>> **********
>>
>> -----Original Message-----
>> From: Carlo Robustelli [mailto:carlo@unc.edu]
>> Sent: Wednesday, March 14, 2007 8:17 AM
>> To: CERNST@email.unc.edu
>> Subject: Professor Kurt Smith, "Academe at War: A Critical Look at >> David Horowitz's Campaign Against Academic Freedom"
>>
>> Dear Professor Ernst,
>>
>> We have been working on organizing an event featuring, Kurt Smith,
>>
>> Visiting Fellow in Philosophy at Princeton University, is an Associate
>>
>> Professor of Philosophy at Bloomsburg University of Pennsylvania. He is >> giving a public lecture on March 30th, "Academe at War: A Critical Look
>>
>>
>> at David Horowitz's Campaign Against Academic Freedom." John McGowan
>>
>> informed me that this may be in conflict with the upcoming AAUP
>>
>> meeting. If this is in conflict and many people who would otherwise
>>
>> attend will be at the AAUP meeting then we will try to reschedule the
>>
>> event to Thursday. Can you confirm whether or not this event is in >> conflict with the upcoming meeting. I appreciate any help you can give.
>>
>>
>> You can find out more about Professor Smith and this event by going to
>>
>> the event web page:
>>

>> http://parrcenter.unc.edu/events/seminars/Academicfreedom/index.htm
>>
>> Best,
>>
>> - Carlo Robustelli
>>
>> --
>>
>> Carlo Robustelli
>>
>> Program Coordinator
>>
>> Parr Center for Ethics
>>
>> Department of Philosophy
>>
>> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
>>
>> CB #3125
>>
>> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
>>
>> USA
>>
>> Phone: (919) 843-5640
>>
>> email: carlo@unc.edu
>>
>> http://philosophy.unc.edu/robustelli.htm
>>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, March 15, 2007 8:09 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: [Fwd: Re: Professor Kurt Smith, "Academe at War: A Critical Look at David Horowitz's Campaign Against Academic Freedom"]

GREAT. So we can go ahead and just make sure the website is correct--which it is!

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Carlo Robustelli wrote:
> Good News!
>
>
> ----------
>
> Subject:
> Re: Professor Kurt Smith, "Academe at War: A Critical Look at David > Horowitz's Campaign Against Academic Freedom"
> From:
> cernst@EMAIL.UNC.EDU
> Date:
> Thu, 15 Mar 2007 19:12:35 -0400
> To:
> Carlo Robustelli <carlo@UNC.EDU>
>
> To:
> Carlo Robustelli <carlo@UNC.EDU>
>
>
> dear Carlo,
> the 3 pm time would not be a conflict; I saw 7:30 pm on the website > you referred me to, but if there is no conflict, > that's great.
> best wishes,
> Carl
>
>
>
> Quoting Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>:
>
>> Hi Carlo (Again),
>>
>> The Parr Center office assistant just reminded me that the talk is >> scheduled for 3:00 pm NOT 3:30. Please let me know if this would >> still be in conflict.
>>
>> sorry for my error.
>>

>> Thanks,
>>
>> - Carlo
>>
>> Carlo Robustelli
>> Program Coordinator
>> Parr Center for Ethics
>> Department of Philosophy
>> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
>> CB #3125
>> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
>> USA
>>
>> Phone: (919) 843-5640
>> email: carlo@unc.edu
>> http://philosophy.unc.edu/robustelli.htm
>>
>>
>>
>> Carlo Robustelli wrote:
>>> Hi Carl,
>>>
>>> I apologize for the confusion but Kurt Smith's talk is actually on >>> Friday at 3:30 pm. Would this still be in conflict with Cary >>> Nelson's talk? - Carlo
>>> Carlo Robustelli
>>> Program Coordinator
>>> Parr Center for Ethics
>>> Department of Philosophy
>>> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
>>> CB #3125
>>> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
>>> USA
>>>
>>> Phone: (919) 843-5640
>>> email: carlo@unc.edu
>>> http://philosophy.unc.edu/robustelli.htm Carl Ernst wrote:
>>>>
>>>> dear Carlo,
>>>>
>>>> I see that Kurt Smith is scheduled to speak at 7:30, which is >>>> indeed in conflict with Cary Nelson's talk for the AAUP conference.
>>>> I am attaching a flyer for this event.
>>>>
>>>> I agree that it would be very beneficial to avoid dividing the >>>> natural audience for these speakers. If it is possible to shift >>>> Smith to Thursday, that would be great. I would be glad to >>>> publicize the talk on the AAUP listserv.
>>>>
>>>> Best wishes,
>>>>
>>>> Carl
>>>>
>>>> **********
>>>>
>>>> Carl W. Ernst, Director
>>>>
>>>> Carolina Center for the Study of the Middle East and Muslim >>>> Civilizations
>>>>
>>>> William R. Kenan, Jr., Distinguished Professor
>>>>
>>>> Department of Religious Studies
>>>>
>>>> 125 Saunders, CB #3225

>>>>
>>>> University of North Carolina
>>>>
>>>> Chapel Hill NC 27599-3225
>>>>
>>>> 919-962-3924 office
>>>>
>>>> 919-962-1567 fax
>>>>
>>>> cernst@email.unc.edu <mailto:cernst@email.unc.edu>
>>>> http://www.unc.edu/~cernst <http://www.unc.edu/%7Ecernst>
>>>>
>>>> Author of /Following Muhammad: Rethinking Islam in the Contemporary >>>> World/
>>>>
>>>> http://uncpress.unc.edu/books/T-7369.html
>>>> **********
>>>>
>>>> -----Original Message-----
>>>> From: Carlo Robustelli [mailto:carlo@unc.edu]
>>>> Sent: Wednesday, March 14, 2007 8:17 AM
>>>> To: CERNST@email.unc.edu
>>>> Subject: Professor Kurt Smith, "Academe at War: A Critical Look at >>>> David Horowitz's Campaign Against Academic Freedom"
>>>>
>>>> Dear Professor Ernst,
>>>>
>>>> We have been working on organizing an event featuring, Kurt Smith,
>>>>
>>>> Visiting Fellow in Philosophy at Princeton University, is an Associate
>>>>
>>>> Professor of Philosophy at Bloomsburg University of Pennsylvania.
>>>> He is
>>>>
>>>> giving a public lecture on March 30th, "Academe at War: A Critical >>>> Look
>>>>
>>>> at David Horowitz's Campaign Against Academic Freedom." John McGowan
>>>>
>>>> informed me that this may be in conflict with the upcoming AAUP
>>>>
>>>> meeting. If this is in conflict and many people who would otherwise
>>>>
>>>> attend will be at the AAUP meeting then we will try to reschedule the
>>>>
>>>> event to Thursday. Can you confirm whether or not this event is in >>>> conflict with the upcoming meeting. I appreciate any help you can >>>> give.
>>>>
>>>>
>>>> You can find out more about Professor Smith and this event by >>>> going to
>>>>
>>>> the event web page:
>>>>
>>>> http://parrcenter.unc.edu/events/seminars/Academicfreedom/index.htm
>>>>
>>>> Best,
>>>>
>>>> - Carlo Robustelli
>>>>
>>>> -- Carlo Robustelli
>>>>
>>>> Program Coordinator
>>>>

>>>> Parr Center for Ethics
>>>>
>>>> Department of Philosophy
>>>>
>>>> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
>>>>
>>>> CB #3125
>>>>
>>>> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
>>>>
>>>> USA
>>>>
>>>> Phone: (919) 843-5640
>>>>
>>>> email: carlo@unc.edu
>>>>
>>>> http://philosophy.unc.edu/robustelli.htm
>>>>
>>>>
>>
>
>

TOPICS FOR PAPER #2
PHILOSOPHY 275-SPRING 2007

INSTRUCTIONS: Write a 3-5 page essay on one of the following.
Please have a title page with your name, the essay you are writing on and the Pledge with your signature. Do not put your name on any of the other pages.

DATE DUE: FRIDAY, APRIL 13 in Recitations

DIRECTIONS:

1. Choose the passage that most interests, excites, disturbs or enrages you.
2. Decide whether you want to argue for or against the position taken in the passage.
3. In your introductory paragraph, reconstruct or construct the argument in the passage, and clearly state your thesis.
4. Define all terms/concepts.
5. Defend/support the position you are taking on the argument you reconstructed.
6. Give objections to your position
7. Defend your position against those objections.

Note: In writing your paper, imagine you are trying to defending your position to a fairly reasonable 15 year old who is not familiar with any of the readings or the arguments. Or imagine you are trying to present your case to the legislature.

1. Because a person's right to life is stronger and more stringent than the woman's right to decide what happens in and to her body, abortion cannot be morally justified.

2. Given that white males have benefited from full membership in our society, preferential treatment is justified for women and minorities who have not so benefited.

3. Equal opportunity requires that women be given equal access to sports for their basic benefits and an equal share in the scarce benefits; Title IX ought to be implemented as a step toward that goal.

4. There ought to be ordinances to restrict pornography because pornography is harmful to women. It is implicated in the committing of violent crimes against women, and among other things, its dissemination supports sexist attitudes and reinforces women's oppression.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, March 19, 2007 3:17 PM
To: Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Baer

Thanks Geoff. I will talk with Marc on Wednesday as I have classes I would like for him to teach.

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Geoff Sayre-McCord wrote:
> Next year. Just told Marc that we will have him here next year > teaching for us again. I will give you the necessary paperwork Susan.
> Jan, can you set to work putting him on the teaching schedule?
> -- Geoff
>
> --
>
>
>
> Geoffrey Sayre-McCord
> Professor and Department Chair
> Department of Philosophy
> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
>
> Tel: (919) 962-2695
> Fax: (919) 843-3929
> http://philosophy.unc.edu/smccord.htm
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, March 20, 2007 4:11 AM
To: Given, Emily <given@email.unc.edu>; Laurel Goldstein <goldstel@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Phil 275 class

THANKS so much for doing the lecture for me. How did it go? I will be there on Wednesday, despite the fact that we will be arriving back in Chapel Hill at about 4 a.m. on Wednesday morning :(We'll meet after class as well.
I am going to try to post the paper topics on Blackboard, but my internet doesn't always allow me much time--it keeps going in and out.

Thanks again,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, March 20, 2007 10:58 AM
To: Laurel Goldstein <goldstel@email.unc.edu>; Given, Emily <given@email.unc.edu>
Cc: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: paper topics
Attach: Paper #2-Spr 07.doc; Paper format.doc; Paper criteria.xls

---

Here is what I want to put on Blackboard. I also want to have them add a criteria grading sheet to their papers. What do you think. I've attached it as well.
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

TOPICS FOR PAPER #2
PHILOSOPHY 275-SPRING 2007

INSTRUCTIONS: Write a 3-5 page essay on one of the following.
Please have a title page with your name, the essay you are writing on and the Pledge with your signature. Do not put your name on any of the other pages.

DATE DUE: FRIDAY, APRIL 13 in Recitations

DIRECTIONS: See Paper Format

1. Choose the passage that most interests, excites, disturbs or enrages you.
2. Decide whether you want to argue for or against the position taken in the passage.
3. In your introductory paragraph, reconstruct or construct the argument in the passage, and clearly state your thesis.
4. Define all terms/concepts.
5. Defend/support the position you are taking on the argument you reconstructed.
6. Give objections to your position
7. Defend your position against those objections.

Note: In writing your paper, imagine you are trying to defending your position to a fairly reasonable 15 year old who is not familiar with any of the readings or the arguments. Or imagine you are trying to present your case to the legislature.

1. Because a person's right to life is stronger and more stringent than the woman's right to decide what happens in and to her body, abortion cannot be morally justified.

2. Given that white males have benefited from full membership in our society, preferential treatment is justified for women and minorities who have not so benefited.

3. Equal opportunity requires that women be given equal access to sports for their basic benefits and an equal share in the scarce benefits; Title IX ought to be implemented as a step toward that goal.

4. There ought to be ordinances to restrict pornography because pornography is harmful to women. It is implicated in the committing of violent crimes against women, and among other things, its dissemination supports sexist attitudes and reinforces women's oppression.

WRITING YOUR PAPER

TITLE PAGE: Your name, PID, the paper topic, Honor pledge with signature.

STRUCTURE OF PAPER:

I. FORMAL ARGUMENT CONSTRUCTION/RECONSTRUCTION

Reconstruct the argument in the passage:

Premise 1:
Premise 2:
Premise 3:
…
…
Conclusion:

Clearly state the position you are going to take. This is your thesis statement

II. SUPPORT FOR THESIS:

Argue for the position you are taking. If you are arguing for the conclusion, then support argument you have constructed in Section I with good reasons. If you are arguing against the conclusion, then give reasons why the argument you have constructed is not sound. In so doing be sure to give adequate philosophical support, using the readings and your own ideas. Avoid using "I believe" or "I feel." Personal opinions are acceptable only if supported by good reasons.

III. OBJECTIONS TO YOUR POSITION

Consider obvious objections to your position. That is, how would someone argue against the position you took and what support would they give? Use readings and your own ideas.

IV. ANSWERING THE OBJECTIONS

Answer the objections raised. What reasons can be offered to counter the objections?

V. CONCLUSION

Basically restate your thesis to show why your position is the better one.

Paper Criteria Grading Sheet

	A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H
1
2
3	PAPER CRITERIA	Excellent	Good	Fair	Poor	Failed to do	N/A	Comments
4
5	Introductory paragraph
6	Clear thesis/position statement
7	Argument for position taken
8	Adequate philosophical support
9	Use of examples
10	Defined concepts
11	Objections to your argument
12	Development of objections
13	Adequate philosophical support
14	Response to objections
15	Avoided irrelevancies
16	Creativity/originality
17	Spelling/Grammar
18	Clearly Written
19	Sources cited
20
21	Other
22
23	GENERAL COMMENTS:
24							Grade:
25	NAME:
26	HONOR PLEDGE:

From:	nobody@notify.unc.edu on behalf of Coble, Rebecca S </O=UNC EXCHANGE/OU=EXCHANGE ADMINISTRATIVE GROUP (FYDIBOHF23SPDLT)/CN=RECIPIENTS/CN=REBECCA S COBLE (RSCOBLE)>
Sent:	Wednesday, March 21, 2007 1:38 AM
To:	Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject:	INFORMATIONAL: UNC's Mindfulness Program for Stress/PainManagement

---

Mindfulness programs offer training in meditation, mind-body awareness exercises and other awareness techniques that will teach you how to slow down, set priorities and stay calm, focused and relaxed in the midst of a busy life in ways that will enhance your body's natural adaptive and healing ability.

The UNC Program on Integrative Medicine has upcoming opportunities to learn about mindfulness and how to apply it to daily life. Detailed information is available at our website at http://pim.med.unc.edu/mindfulness.html

To register for the Spring sessions to be held April 10-June 5, contact Becky Coble at email: rcoble@med.unc.edu or at (919) 966-8586

Registration for the Spring session is open through April 6, 2007.

This email is sponsored by: Physical Medicine & Rehabilitation

==========

"INFORMATIONAL:" email will only be sent to those who have indicated that they do want to receive mass email. To set your informational mass email preference, logon to the on-line directory web site at https://dir.unc.edu/dir/update.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, March 21, 2007 10:48 AM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: CEI Research Seminar March 26: David Schmidtz "Social Contract, Rule of Law and Entrepreneurship"]
Attach: CEI Research Seminar March 26 David Schmidtz 'Social Contract, Rule of Law and Entrepreneurship'.msg

---

Did we know about this?

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Carolina Entrepreneurial Initiative <cei@unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, March 21, 2007 10:24 AM
To:
Subject: CEI Research Seminar March 26: David Schmidtz "Social Contract, Rule of Law and Entrepreneurship"

Trouble viewing this e-mail? View it on our website.

Schmidtz's seminar will focus on research under development for a new book on the history of liberty, part of Blackwell's Brief History series that he is writing with colleague Jason Brennan.

The projected work is expected to include chapters on "pre-history," the key events that form some of the background of modern philosophy; the evolution of liberty; the rule of law and consent of the governed; economic freedom; civil rights, religious freedom and equality before the law; and psychological freedom.

Dr. David Schmidtz focuses his teaching and research on decision theory, environmental ethics and moral theory. He directs the Program in Philosophy of Freedom at the University of Arizona. The most recent edition of the Philosophical Gourmet ranked Arizona tied for #1 in the world (along with Harvard and Oxford universities) in political philosophy. Schmidtz is author of Rational Choice and Moral Agency (Princeton, 1995) and Elements of Justice (Cambridge, 2006).

Carolina Entrepreneurial Initiative (CEI)
Turning Ideas Into Enterprises cei@unc.edu
www.unc.edu/cei

You are subscribed to the CEI Interest Group list because you have expressed interest in the Carolina Entrepreneurial Initiative or are involved in entrepreneurship at Carolina in some way.

To unsubscribe, please e-mail CEI at cei@unc.edu.

If you have received this e-mail from someone else and would like to subscribe to CEI updates and announcements, please e-mail cei@unc.edu.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, March 21, 2007 3:54 PM
To: Sahle, Eunice N <eunice@email.unc.edu>
Cc: Terry L. Price <tlprice@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Grade appeal
Attach: Grade appeal report.doc

Eunice & Terry,
Thank you both for taking the time to read and meet about the grade appeal.

Attached is a report I will be sending to the Department Chair to respond to the Dean. Please review it and let me know if I need to change or add anything--wording, etc.

Thanks again,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, March 23, 2007 1:10 PM
To: Taylor, Geraldine <gtaylor@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Course Submission Message
Attach: PHIL 560 Ethics Bowl.doc

I have resubmitted PHIL 560 with revisions and with a new fuller syllabus. I hope this is all that is needed. I am attaching the syllabus in case it didn't go through on the revision screen.

Thanks,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Geraldine Taylor wrote:
> Geraldine Taylor has sent your submission for PHIL-560 back to you > requesting the following change:
>
> Please resolve the issues identified below and/or remove unapproved General Education classification(s) from this course submission and return immediately for Administrative Boards review.
> This course was approved as Philosophical and Moral Reasoning (PH).
> This course was not approved as (Communications Intensive) (CI) because revision of written work is not part of the course (perhaps have students revise a paper after engaging in a debate?).
> Not approved as Global Issues (GL) because the course does not meet GL criteria.
> Not approved as Experiential Education (EE) because the rationale for counting this as EE is not clear. Is this mentored research? Seems not. Field work? How so? Of what would the field work consist? Engaging in a debate/game in public is not necessarily experiential in the sense implied by the criteria document. In any case, the hours of field work are not specified.
>
> To update this course, please log in to Faculty/Staff Central using your > ONYEN and password. Select Course Request Approval from the menu, then > enter the course number in the field provided and select the appropriate > function:
>
> If your original course submission was > Revision... choose 'Revision'
> Renumber... choose 'Revision'
> Addition... choose 'Addition'
> Deletion... choose 'Deletion'
>
> _____
> PK 17077
>

PHIL 560 ETHICS BOWL Instructor: Jan Boxill

The Ethics Bowl provides students with a unique opportunity to practice applying the moral theories and argumentation principles that they learn in their ethics classes. They receive about 15 case studies in advance involving ethical issues in a number of practical contexts, including engineering, law, medicine, personal relationships, school and politics, both nationally and internationally. During the course the students will prepare these cases. Questions may concern ethical problems on wide ranging topics, such as the classroom (e.g. cheating or plagiarism), personal relationships (e.g. dating or friendship), professional ethics (e.g. engineering, law, medicine), or social and political ethics (e.g. free speech, gun control, etc.) or global issues (e.g. the impact of globalization, global warming, the environment). Preparing responses to these questions involves a great deal of research, writing and oral presentation. The team sent to the Ethics Bowl competition will be selected from those registered in the course. Before the actual competition, a mock Ethics Bowl will be presented to the public and also to local high schools as part of the Philosophy Department's outreach program.

During a round, each team takes turns presenting its position on a case and critiquing another team's position on a different case. Teams must answer questions about their positions from a panel of judges. Judges assign scores based on logical consistency, clarity, focus and thoroughness. The presentations are evaluated on the following criteria:

Clarity and Intelligibility: Have you stated and defended your position in a way that is logically consistent and a reader/lister can clearly understand your line of reasoning?

Focus on Ethically Relevant Factors: Has you identified and discussed the ethically relevant factors?

Avoidance of Ethical Irrelevance: Has you stayed on track by avoiding preoccupation with issues that are not ethically relevant, or as only having minor ethical relevance, in connection with a case?

Deliberative Thoughtfulness: Does your presentation of its position on a question indicate both awareness and thoughtful consideration of different viewpoints, including especially those that could loom large in the reasoning of individuals who might disagree with the team's position?

The Intercollegiate Ethics Bowl (IEB) combines the excitement and fun of a competitive tournament with a valuable educational experience for undergraduate students.

The regional competition takes place in November and national in March. The course would be offered in the Fall to prepare students for the regional competition. The actual cases are sent out in mid September, so before that the students will look at previous year's cases and read material appropriate to cases in general, including ethical theory.

READINGS to be taken from the following:

Elements of Moral Philosophy, James Rachels
Being Good, Simon Blackburn
On Liberty, John Stuart Mill
Social Ethics: Morality and Social Policy, Thomas Mappes & Jane Zembaty, editors.

Other readings will be assigned as appropriate.

REQUIREMENTS:

I. CASE PREPARATION:

Each student will prepare a minimum of two cases. Each case involves:

1. 2-3 page paper setting out the argument with ethical implications.
2. Present argument to class- 5 minute presentation. Other students write a critique of the presentation with suggested revisions, readings, and research.
3. Revised paper based upon class presentation, discussion, and student critiques. Revised paper will also include an analysis of one aspect of the argument. 3-5 pages which will include bibliography and field research plans.
4. Present revised argument along with analysis: 5-7 minutes. Critiques.
5. Revised paper based on previous discussion. Revised paper will also include analysis of second aspect of the argument: 5-7 pages.
6. Present revised argument along with analysis: 5-7 minutes. Critiques
7. Revised paper based on previous discussion. Revised paper will include objections to your analysis.
8. Present revised argument: 5-7 minutes.
9. Revised paper with completed philosophical analysis: 12-15 pages
10. Oral presentation of completed analysis:
    8 minutes for presentation
    5 minutes for questions
    5-7 minutes rebuttal.

II. EXPERIENTIAL MENTORED RESEARCH STUDY:

1. For each case, students will contact appropriate units for essential background to investigate original problems and gain information regarding the case to be incorporated in the presentations and drafts. Throughout the experience, the work will be supervised and mentored by instructor and Parr Center Visiting Professor, who will assist students with setting appropriate goals. Research will also be assisted by the Parr Center graduate research fellow and the unit head or designate. [E.g. For legal cases, it would involve working with the DA office].

Expected minimum hours: 60

2. Three mock Ethics Bowl competitions: one to the Department/University, and two in local high schools as part of the Department's Outreach Program.

III. FINAL EXAM—In class

Two components: written and oral

GRADE: The final grade will be assessed as follows:

Papers:	30%
Presentations:	30%
Class participation &critiques:	20%
Final Exam:	20%

The course will be limited to 15 students per term.

WEEKLY ASSIGNMENTS:

Week 1:	Readings: Rachels: Chapters 1- & Blackburn Chapters 1- Discuss readings and cases. Assign cases. Discuss appropriate research units.
Week 2:	Readings: Mill, On Liberty; Mappes One-two page reconstruction of the arguments of your cases Five minute oral presentation of the reconstruction Feedback and suggestions from class.
Week 3:	Re-write the reconstruction given the feedback from class. Prepare a bibliography of selected readings appropriate to your cases Present both the re-write and bibliography to the class. Receive student feedback and suggestions.
Week 4:	Annotated bibliography. 1-2 page showing the relevant facts of the case.
Weeks 5-8:	Presentations, discussions,
Week 9-11	Mock Ethics Bowl Competitions
Week 12:	In class discussions in preparation for National Competition.
Week 13:	National Ethics Bowl Competition
Week 14:	Debriefing and discussion of Ethics Bowl Competition; review for final exam.

Sample Cases:

Case #1

Dr. B., a Professor of Psychology at a large research institution, Ohio State University (OSU), has a long distinguished record of working with chimpanzees. In the 1970s, she taught chimps to communicate, first by using American Sign Language and later using graphic symbols. In the last decade, under her direction, two young chimps, Keeli and Ivy, have learned to count and to recognize simple written words. Another chimp, Bobby, has shown an uncanny ability to learn number sequences and even to fill in missing numbers in a sequence. She has learned that chimps can do simple arithmetic, behave similarly to preschoolers, and (along with humans) have the ability to perceive the knowledge state of a peer.

Dr. B., who has dedicated her entire professional life to the study of cognition in chimpanzees, has won international acclaim for her work and was named one of the top 50 women researchers in the nation by Discover Magazine in 2002. Her chimps have been featured on Discovery Channel. However, as funding to support the research center has been hard to come by in the last five years, the university decided to close the research center and send the chimps away. OSU abruptly seized the professor's laboratory on February 28, 2006, changed all the locks, and hired a truck to send all 12 primates (nine chimps and three monkeys) to Primarily Primates, a controversial Texas sanctuary. The university gave the sanctuary a $324,000 trust fund for the animal's care.

Dr. B. vigorously protested the decision. When a restraining order she filed failed to prevent the university from implementing its decision, Dr. B. chained herself to the center's gate to prevent the transport trucks from leaving. Her efforts were unsuccessful and one of the chimps, 25-year old Kermit, died during the 38-hour transport in early March. Bobby was found dead in his enclosure on April 20. One of the monkeys escaped and was never recovered. Dr. B sued OSU to win custody of the remaining chimps. PETA also joined the suit on behalf of the remaining seven chimps and two monkeys and in June a Texas judge ordered that an independent trustee should oversee the $324,000 funding to ensure that it be used to house and benefit the remaining OSU primates.

Case #2

Wisconsin State Representative Dan LeMahieu (R-Oostburg) was outraged when the University of Wisconsin-Madison's University Health Services (UHS) featured ads in the two student newspapers suggesting that students consider receiving prescriptions for emergency contraception (EC) prior to leaving for spring break. UHS services are available to any student at the UW-Madison, and as such they offer health expertise to students in the areas of medical treatment for illnesses and injuries, counseling for stress reduction, smoking cessation, nutrition, dermatology, sports medicine, as well as confidential testing and treatment of sexually transmitted diseases (STDs). Although a part of the state-funded University of Wisconsin System, the ads were paid for using student segregated fees which are not part of taxpayer dollars or academic tuition funds.

Following the publication of the ads, which were part of a series also advising students to protect themselves from sun exposure and limit their intake of alcohol, Representative LeMahieu initiated drafting legislation to ban any university health center in Wisconsin from advertising or distributing the morning-after pill (EC). LeMahieu contends, "I think it's offensive that the university is trying to tell young women to be prepared and to plan ahead so they can have promiscuous activities on spring break. I don't think that it's the role of the university to promote that type of activity, and I believe that's what their ad is asking young people to do." LeMahieu also added that the UW should be "made aware" that many people who are paying state taxes do not appreciate the offensive advertisements.

On June 16, 2005, Wisconsin's State Assembly voted 49-41 in favor of a bill prohibiting University of Wisconsin System health centers from advertising, prescribing or dispensing emergency contraception, making it the first state in the country to move towards banning EC on all state college campuses.

Case #3

Near the end of its fall season, a top executive from the popular reality television competition, Idol Starz, appeared on the Today Show and revealed that the program's contestants either advanced or were cut based on producers' decisions rather than being selected through the program's public text-messaging voting system. The executive went on to state that the show's winners and losers were selected by producers on a round-by-round basis in the hopes that certain "controversial" or "questionable" choices would positively influence ratings, increase fervor for underdog candidates, and create a more developed fan-base which would return to view the show during both current and future seasons.

Given the show's popularity and viewers' commitment to their favorite contestants, the revelation led to a large public outcry condemning the show for dishonesty and false advertising. Many claimed to have been cheated and explained that the show had a responsibility to adhere to the public's decisions about which candidates they preferred. Given special attention during this debate was the show's slogan: "You vote. You decide. Who should be the next Idol Star?"

During ensuing interviews, the show's producers explained that their decisions were based on the fact that they were in the entertainment business and that certain unpredictable events helped to keep the audience invested in the show and provided increased entertainment value. They also argued that, more often that not, their decisions about who should advance or win were in line with the public's desires. When questioned about the program's slogan, one producer was quoted as saying, "Look at it carefully. There is a difference between telling someone to vote and decide who should be the next Idol Star and telling them that their votes will decide the next Idol Star."

Case #4

In a recent case, Florida authorities declined to file charges against a Miami Herald columnist for surreptitiously recording a phone call from a city commissioner who later committed suicide in the newspaper's lobby. Authorities cited the unusual circumstances that led to the taping as the basis for not filing charges against the columnist. These circumstances were not enough for the Miami Herald, who took immediate action to fire the columnist for violating a company policy that prohibited the taping of sources and interviewees without the subject's consent.

State laws related to the recording of phone calls and the courts interpretation of these laws vary widely in the United States. Many of these laws are intentionally written with ambiguous terms and interpretation is typically required on a case by case basis.

The firing of this popular columnist caused much protest around the world. Many members of the Herald staff signed a petition requesting the decision to fire the columnist be rescinded. The columnist was friends with the city commissioner, and the commissioner provided regular sources for stories to the columnist.

According to the columnist, the commissioner was despondent over public allegations about his sex life and the tone of his voice on the phone conversation was so alarming that the columnist impulsively decided to record the conversation. The tape records the columnist's attempts to calm the commissioner. Throughout their 20-minute conversation, the columnist attempted to steer the conversation to less volatile subjects in the hopes of lifting the commissioner's spirits. But the call ended with the commissioner still despondent. A few minutes later, the commissioner shot himself.

Following the suicide, the columnist told editors of the Miami Herald that he had been interviewing the commissioner earlier in the day and had recorded part of the conversation without the commissioner's consent.

After being fired, the columnist was quoted as saying "In a tense situation I made a mistake. The Miami Herald executives only learned about it because I came to them and admitted it. I told them I was willing to accept a suspension and apologize both to the newsroom and our readers. Unfortunately, the Herald decided on the death penalty instead."

The Miami Herald editors have taken the position that there must be an absolute prohibition of the paper's reporters taping conversations without a party's consent, and not just because it is against the law in Florida, as it is in many states. An executive of the Herald has stated that the policy is necessary to protect the paper's integrity, as well as to foster trust from news sources.

Journalists at the Miami Herald have pointed out that at least one other reporter surreptitiously taped an interview, but was not fired. The journalists also have also stated that there is no written policy on taping conversations and that any verbal policy on expectations of reporters is unclear. The Miami Herald responded to the alleged case of a previous surreptitious taping by saying "we understand this happened 18 years ago". They went onto state that the recent decision to fire the columnist was clearly guided by the environment in which journalists operate today; which is much more constrained in terms of the latitude given for violation of law and policy.

Case #5

Beginning in 2005, protests at funerals for military personnel killed in Iraq have been increasing – and have received much media attention. In particular, members of the Westboro Baptist Church, in Topeka, Kansas, have been especially visible and vocal at many of these military funerals. Reverend Fred Phelps and his protesters claim that U.S. military deaths in Iraq are because America tolerates homosexuals and that they are a sign of divine punishment for America's tolerance of homosexuality. For over a year now, members of this anti-gay church have been crisscrossing the United States, holding more than one hundred protests outside the funerals of U.S. soldiers killed in Iraq.

They wave placards with such expressions as: "You're Going to Hell," "Fag Vets, God Hates You," and "Thank God for IEDs" (the improvised explosive devices responsible for killing many military personnel in Iraq). Phelps contends that all American soldiers are guilty by association – because they are fighting in the service of the U.S. government.

By Spring, 2006, twenty-eight states and Congress were rushing to pass laws to restrict protests outside military funerals. On May 17, 2006, Illinois Governor Rod Blagojevich signed a state law – "Let Them Rest in Peace Act" – that prohibits disruptive and inflammatory protesting 30 minutes before a funeral, during the service, and 30 minutes after a funeral while remaining 200 feet from the funeral site. This new Illinois law drew immediate scorn from Shirley Phelps-Roper, attorney for the Westboro Baptist Church: "The law is impotent. You've done nothing to change that God is killing your children and sending them home in body bags. Keep your big, fat snout out of our religion."

In the U.S. Congress, Representative Mike Rogers (R-Mich.) sponsored a House bill to address this matter. He said that he took up the issue after attending a military funeral in his home state, where mourners were greeted by "chants and taunting and some of the most vile things I have ever heard. Families deserve the time to bury their American heroes with dignity and in peace." On May 24, 2006, Congress passed legislation that would bar demonstrators from disrupting military funerals at national cemeteries.

The "Respect for America's Fallen Heroes Act" prohibits protests within 300 feet of the entrance of a national cemetery and within 150 feet of a road into the cemetery from 60 minutes before to 60 minutes after a funeral. Those violating the act would face up to a $100,000 fine and up to a year in prison. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said that this act "will protect the sanctity of all 122 of our national cemeteries as shrines to their gallant dead. It's a sad but necessary measure to protect what should be recognized by all reasonable people as a solemn, private and deeply sacred occasion."

In response to this federal legislation, Phelps has said that Congress was "blatantly violating the First Amendment rights to free speech" in passing the bill. He said that he will continue to demonstrate but would abide by the restrictions. Constitutional experts are warning that protest restrictions – such as those passed in Illinois and in Congress – appear overly broad and are likely to be overturned if challenged in court. Eugene Volokh, a law professor at the University of California-Los Angeles and an authority on the First Amendment, said: "You can't treat speech as a breach of peace simply because it offends people. These protests are tremendously offensive and hard to ignore. But ignoring them or counter-protesting is unfortunately the only remedy the 1st Amendment allows." And, the American Civil Liberties Union has filed a lawsuit against a new Kentucky law, saying that it goes too far in limiting freedom of speech and expression. Additional lawsuits are expected to be filed.

U.S military veterans find Phelps' beliefs and actions particularly abhorrent, and in November, 2005, veterans' motorcycle groups began showing up at military funerals to oppose the protesters and to show support for the families of the deceased soldiers. Calling themselves the Patriot Guard Riders, these motorcycle groups have organized hundreds of counter-protesters to wave American flags and stand silently in front of the Westboro picketers, to pay respects to the fallen soldier, and to protect the soldier's family from disruptions.

Case #6

Alejandro Toledo, President of Peru, has launched a public campaign demanding that Yale University return to Peru Incan artifacts excavated at Machu Picchu in 1912. Yale professor Hiram Bingham III, guided by a native Peruvian, came upon the Incan city of Machu Picchu in 1911. Bingham secured backing from the National Geographic Society and support from Peru's government for archeological excavations at Machu Picchu in 1912 and again in 1914-15.

In October 1912, Bingham gained the Peruvian government's permission to bring to Yale for research the contents of 170 tombs in Machu Picchu. The decree allowed that Peru reserve the right to ask for the return of the objects.

By 1916, Peru, suspecting Bingham of secretly taking Incan gold, ended Bingham's work at Machu Picchu. The items taken to Yale from the 1914-15 excavations were loaned for only 18 months. Yale has refused several Peruvian requests for return of the artifacts.

Today, Yale claims that they have complied with the 1912 and the 1916 agreements, returning the objects to Peru during the 1920's. Yale sees no similar responsibility to return the items taken from earlier work. National Geographic Society records show that about half of the items were returned to Peru, with no mention of the remaining artifacts.

Luis Guillermo Lumbreras, the director of Peru's National Institute of Culture in Lima, claims that Yale has had 90 years to complete research on the objects, and now Peru wants the items returned. Peru elected its first indigenous president–Alejandro Toledo, who honored the nation's Incan heritage by holding part of his inauguration ceremony at Machu Picchu in 2001. In part due to his influence, Peru wants possession of the artifacts, which have formed the core of Yale's impressive, scholarly exhibition: Unveiling the Mystery of the Incas. After traveling to six cities and attracting over a million visitors, the exhibit now resides at Yale's Peabody Museum of Natural History in Connecticut.

The recent research of Yale professors Lucy Salazar and her husband Richard L. Burger, including extensive scientific analysis of burials, has provided the most reasonable explanation for the existence of Machu Picchu. Rather than supporting the earlier ideas of the city as a center for religious activity including the sacrifice of virgins, the professors' research has suggested that the city served as a simple country retreat from the Inca capital of Cuzco.

The number and kinds of artifacts taken to Yale from Machu Picchu is in dispute. Yale has offered to return some of the pieces to Peru, if Peru allows it to keep others at the Peabody Museum of Natural History, where Machu Picchu is the prize exhibit.

Case #7

In October of 2002, after the overdose of one of its workers, management at a Weyerhaeuser, a multinational corporation in the pulp and paper industry located in Valliant, Oklahoma, became concerned that employees were not following drug and safety regulations in its parking lot. Management decided to have the parking lot searched with gun and drug sniffing dogs. While the dogs found no drugs, they did find firearms in twelve vehicles, including shotguns and automatic weapons. The owners of these vehicles, including a 23-year veteran shift manager, were fired in the next two days.

Weyerhaeuser and many other businesses have had long standing bans on firearms brought into the plant in order to protect workers and prevent workplace violence. In 2002, Weyerhaeuser extended this ban to the parking lot. Many workers claim they were not told of the extension of the ban, though management claims they informed workers. Some of the fired workers have filed suits claiming they were not informed. The initial suit was thrown out, but the decision is being appealed.

Since this and other incidents, many states -- beginning with Oklahoma -- have enacted laws protecting workers who want to keep firearms in their cars. The latest state to consider such a law is Florida, home to Walt Disney World, which does not allow any of its 50,000+ employees to bring guns onto company property.

A number of corporations have joined federal lawsuits against these new state laws. These companies include ConocoPhillips (petroleum), Halliburton (energy), and the Nordam Group (aircraft manufacture). They state that they cannot provide a safe and secure workplace without the ban on guns in the parking lot, and they see state laws allowing guns as infringing on the right of private property owners to decide what is and is not allowed on their property. Even aside from their property rights, companies claim that the laws would disregard public safety. The Bureau of Labor Statistics Census of Fatal Occupational Injuries states that in 2004, there were 551 workplace homicides out of 5703 workplace fatalities. A study at the University of North Carolina claims that such killings are five times more likely to occur at workplaces that allow guns compared to those who do not.

The National Rifle Association (NRA) has been the primary champion of laws that allow workers to have guns in cars in company parking lots. The NRA claims that prohibiting lawful gun owners to keep guns in their car dramatically diminishes their right to own firearms and defend themselves. All 50 states allow the transportation of firearms for lawful purposes. The laws also restrict workers who may want to hunt or target shoot after work from engaging in these lawful activities. They also claim that one's car should enjoy the same protections that one's home enjoys with regards to being able to keep lawful weapons and immunity to unlawful searches.

The NRA claims that the state laws already have commonsense provisions in them that prevent abuse. For instance, anyone wanting to transport a firearm and park their car in a company lot must keep the automobile locked, and at no time is it permissible to take the firearm out of the car on company property. Against the property rights claims of business owners, the NRA claims that business owners are already under extensive federal, state, and local regulations about what they can do with their property and that striking down these state laws would allow companies to "micro-manage" the contents of an employee's automobile. The NRA also cites statistics that 84% of workplace murders are committed by strangers, and anyone determined to commit a crime will not be discouraged from bringing the gun onto company property by a company regulation prohibiting guns in parking lots.

Case #8

After several years of miscarriages, Edward and Susan turn to in vitro fertilization as a means of screening embryos for genetic defects. More than two years elapse, with all the attendant discomfort and expense, but finally an “acceptable” embryo is produced and implanted. To their joy, nine months later they are blessed by Michelle, an apparently happy, healthy baby.

They decide that they will not tempt fate by trying to increase their family, instead choosing to relish the raising of their daughter. Five years pass and they eagerly anticipate Michelle's starting kindergarten. They have elected to enroll her in a well-respected private school so as to realize her fullest potential. Part of the school's pre-entry preparation is an extremely thorough set of physical examinations. (The physical examinations are not done to screen for admission, but rather to anticipate potential health issues while the student is enrolled.)

To their horror, the examinations determine that Michelle has early symptoms of a particularly virulent form of Acute Childhood Lymphoid Leukemia. Nothing in the embryonic screening could have predicted its occurrence. They begin immediate conventional treatments which prove to be ineffective. At their oncologist's recommendation they enroll her in the nation's premier pediatric oncology program. She gives them the bad news that Michelle shows evidence of having Philadelphia chromosome-positive ALL. The most successful treatment involves hematopoietic stem cell transplantation from matching relatives. The oncology clinic tests both Edward and Susan, but finds neither of them compatible. Since neither of them (nor Michelle) has any siblings, it looks as if they will have to hope for a million-to-one chance of finding a well-matched unrelated donor.

While waiting in the lounge of the clinic, the mother of another child under treatment introduces herself and suggests that they do have another option – they could have another child, via in vitro, selecting among possible embryos for compatibility for transplant. Initially they are horrified at the idea of producing another child as a "biological stockpile" for Michelle, but the more they think about it the better the idea seems. After all, they really had wanted more children. The new child wouldn't be seriously injured by the procedure needed to provide Michelle with the transplant material she so desperately needs. Given their history of medical procedures needed to have Michelle, the screening required to make sure the new child would be a compatible donor is almost the same as if they were just having another child as a family expansion.

When they raise the possibility with Michelle's physician, she explains that the screening technology has improved sufficiently since Michelle's birth to guard against the new child's having the same disposition toward this disease. But, before she will go further, she tells them they must speak with the clinic's counselor. The counselor asks them to consider what their true motives are in proposing the conception of this second child, whether they would be treating her as a person or as an object and how they will explain to her the reason for her conception.

Case #9

After 25-30 years of service, ships are at the end of their sailing life and are sold as "End of Life Vessels" to be dismantled primarily to recover the valuable steel which makes up about 95% of the ship. Ship breaking (or ship demolition) is the process of dismantling the structure of an obsolete vessel for scrapping or disposal and includes a wide range of activities, from removing all gear and equipment to cutting down and recycling the ship's infrastructure. However, the only ones who profit from ship breaking are the ship owners. They extract an average of $1.9 million profit per "End of Life Vessel." Ship breaking is also a challenging and controversial process, due to the structural complexity of ships and the many environmental, safety, and health issues involved.

Ship breaking is dangerous and has the reputation of being one of the dirtiest jobs on earth. For minimal dollars a day, workers with little protective gear tear out pipes insulated with asbestos, transformers covered with PCBs, and leaky diesel tanks. Until the late twentieth century, ship breaking took place primarily in port cities in developed countries – including the United States and Europe. Today, however, most ship breaking yards are in developing countries – especially India, China, Bangladesh, and Pakistan. This is due to rules dealing with lead paint and toxic substances. The industry was such a disgrace that, in 2000, Congress acted to stop U.S. registered ships from being sent overseas for scrap. Ship breaking remains an international environmental and labor concern - because ship breaking now occurs mostly in underdeveloped countries where working conditions and environmental impact are not regulated. Also, many ships being scrapped now were made before many international environmental laws were enacted.

In late 2005, a Virginia-based company, Bay Bridge Enterprises, visited the small coastal town of Newport, Oregon, and proposed opening a ship breaking plant on the banks of Yaquina Bay. The company offered up to 125 jobs paying $20 an hour. Their spokesperson indicated that the company had no environmental violations since they have been doing this work, and that they had zero lost-time injuries since 2001. Also, he noted that there is no large-scale ship breaking yard on the West Coast, and that there are about 60 ships anchored in a California bay – just waiting to be moved to a scrap yard. Therefore, there would be plenty of work available at a new ship breaking plant in Newport – for some time to come.

A strong coalition of interested parties in the Newport area emerged in opposition to this proposal. The "Friends of Yaquina Bay" were the group of people most responsible for rallying the community together to try to stop this ship breaking proposal. The Oregon Coast Aquarium and the Oregon State University Hatfield Marine Science Center – both located in Newport – also added major support to the effort to block the proposed plant. Some of the major issues raised by these opponents to the proposal included: the world-wide negative reputation of ship breaking; the safety of towing "ghost ships" (some with a length of up to 540 feet) from San Francisco Bay in California to Newport, Oregon; potential infestation of as many as 100 invasive species on the ships in California that are not in Yaquina Bay; toxins on and in the ships that would escape into the bay and the air, affecting the seafood industry – especially crabbing – as well as the fear of pollution runoff at the Hatfield Marine Science Center and the Oregon Coast Aquarium; and visual pollution. Yaquina Bay is a continentally Important Bird Area – with several endangered species present. There are 15 or more blue heron nests and other bird species on the tide flats near the proposed ship breaking site. The local tides extend 15 miles up the Yaquina River and thus the largest oyster farm in Oregon could be affected. Plus there is fear that money-spending tourists would not view these rusting ships as an asset to the beautiful Oregon coast.

On January 24, 2006, about 200 people packed a meeting room in Newport, Oregon, to hear Mr. Don Mann, general manager of the Port of Newport, announce that "some projects are a good fit, or not a fit at all. Bay Bridge's plan for a ship breaking facility in Yaquina Bay does not qualify in our test for a good fit." Thus, quite surprisingly, it seems, the ship breaking plan for Newport was ended. Mr. Mann continued: "This was not a good business deal for the company, or for the Port. I believe that the environmental issues could have been resolved, but our financial concerns could not be adequately addressed." The vast majority of persons at the meeting were very pleased with this decision.

While this issue was being considered by the town of Newport, Oregon, the office of the Port Commissioners received hundreds of telephone calls of concern – from all over the country. As one commissioner said: "We have gained much free advertising – for the port and community. The whole world knows we're here. This issue is bringing this concern to Oregon, and to the nation." Bay Bridge's next move on the West Coast remains to be seen. The company is still looking for a possible Oregon or Washington port.

Case #10

Ardent R. Porter is an investigatory journalist with a respected Washington-area newspaper, Capitol News Briefly. As a reporter working in and around the D.C. area, Mr. Porter often relies on his long list of contacts in order to glean information that might be useful for the various articles he publishes on corruption within politics and government. By establishing relationships with individuals at all levels of government, Ardent has provided himself with valuable human sources that are often capable of providing him with names, tips, or other information that he could not extract from other channels. Furthermore, a few of Mr. Porter's key contacts are able to pass along hard-to-come-by information about questionable or downright illegal actions taken by government employees or agencies.

One such contact is Ian Stalwart, a mid-level agency administrator who works with individuals who do government "groundwork" as well as with high-level government bureaucrats. As a middleman of sorts, Ian is in a position uniquely suited to evaluating the actions of those who work both below and above him. One of Mr. Stalwart's responsibilities is to watch for and report any illegal activity that he might encounter. Mr. Stalwart takes this role very seriously and his responsibilities as a watchdog were what originally led him to seek out Ardent, a like-minded opponent of corruption and illegality within public service.

It so happened that Mr. Stalwart discovered that many individuals within his agency were working to cover up illegally-awarded, over-billed, or otherwise fraudulent government contracts awarded during the early months of the Iraq War, actions which were in violation of several federal laws, in addition to many agency standards. Upon presenting his discovery to his superiors, Mr. Stalwart was told to disregard his findings and to refrain from further discussing the subject. After pressing for a more sophisticated explanation, he was informed that the contracts in question had been deemed classified through appropriate agency and congressional channels and that because the contracts had been deemed to serve a compelling national security interest, it would be against agency policy (as well as illegal) to discuss them, regardless of any questionable procedural or substantive aspects.

Fully knowing that he was in violation of laws regarding the disclosure of classified information, Mr. Stalwart approached Mr. Porter and revealed everything he knew about the dubious contracts. He also provided Mr. Porter with the names of the individuals implicated in the cover-ups and the names of the administrators who had ordered him to remain silent.

After composing a lengthy and revealing story, Mr. Porter approached his editor about publishing the story, explaining the dilemma presented by the fact that much, if not all, of the story's core material was classified. Following a discussion about publishing the article by the paper's editorial board it was decided that the story would run in the paper's next issue.

Case #11

Students in schools of medicine, nursing, dentistry and veterinary medicine are required to observe actual surgeries (and other procedures) early in their educations as a preliminary exposure to the practices of their field. In fact, such study is thought to be essential in confirming the students' choice of profession. Of course, the observation takes place with the informed consent of the patients (or their guardians). Many pre-medical, pre-nursing, pre-dentistry, and pre-veterinary programs, especially at schools with associated hospitals, are beginning to recommend (or even require) similar observation programs.

The State University Museum has one of the nation's premier exhibits of the history of medicine and allied fields. They include displays replicating Leonardo's anatomy studies, teaching materials from Charles University (in Prague) dating from the 16th century, 18th century "bleeding," and 19th century nutrition studies (among many other presentations).
One of the most popular offerings at the museum is the "surgery room" where films of common surgical procedures can be viewed. Like the student viewing in medical schools, the patients shown have given their informed consent. Not surprisingly, the most identifiable attendees are people who are considering having the operations shown in the pictures. The films have been "sanitized" so that excess gore is avoided, but the surgeries are shown in detail.

Dr. Suarez, curator of the museum and retired professor of neurosurgery, has proposed to the board that rather than using films, which are hard to make and quickly become outdated, observers should be allowed to observe actual, in process surgeries on persons who have consented. After all, the University Hospital is adjacent to the museum and access is convenient. The hospital's operating theaters are set up above the surgical floor but separated from the patient and surgical team by sound- and atmosphere-proof windows. Dr. Suarez suggests that such watching could become a significant educational revenue-generating operation. He points out that special exhibits commonly serve as important financial resources for museums.

When Dr. Suarez proposes this program to the Museum's board of directors, Katherine Osborn (one of the community members of the board) objects vigorously. Although Dr. Suarez's proposal clearly restricts participation to persons "15 and older," Ms. Osborn argues that teens, and perhaps others, will attend surgeries not as education but as entertainment. Her position is that such "exhibitions" will be little better than the "bum fights" and ultraviolent films that have gained popularity in recent years. Ms. Osborn claims that teens will watch surgeries as a replacement for the gore seen while attending the Halloween and Nightmare on Elm Street movies. Her claim is that such actions are exploitative more than educational.

Dr. Suarez responds that actual surgeries come nowhere near the gore commonly shown on TV and in the movies. He points out that we seldom know what motivates people to act as they do in the presence of human affliction. "Do people slow their cars when passing accidents in order to see whether they can help or to see blood and gore? How would we know? Even if an adolescent attended a surgery out of a desire to see gore, might the experience not shift his or her perspective, creating an interest in becoming a medical professional?"

Case #12

Politicians have crossed the floor, or switched parties for as long as political parties have been in place—famous switches include those of Strom Thurmond, Ronald Reagan, Condoleezza Rice, Howard Dean, Hilary Clinton and most recently, Joe Lieberman. In 2001, nine serving members of Congress had switched parties while in office. Various reasons are cited for changing parties, including ideological disagreement with one's current party and moving to improve power and legislative efficacy, among others. U.S. Representative Ralph Hall of the Fourth Congressional District in Texas cites both reasons.

Ralph Hall was first elected in 1980 as a Democrat and has been re-elected each succeeding year. Hall has made a reputation for himself as a rogue Democrat, willing to "cross the aisle" and vote with Republicans when he agreed with their position. He also has been an avid supporter of President Bush, opposed to Democratic bids to unseat him. But it was more than mere ideological agreement that encouraged a decision to switch parties in early 2004 before his bid for reelection.

As Hall stated in a January 2004 press release that announced his decision to switch parties, "This year I was denied requests for district appropriations because I was a Democrat who voted against the bill. I have always stated that … if being a Democrat hurt my district, I would either resign or switch parties." The bill to which he was referring was a "foreign operations bill" which, according to Hall, gave, "financial support to those countries that continue to vote against [the U.S.] in the United Nations."

Another motivation may be found in Hall's appreciation for being spared a potentially career devastating blow in the redistricting that cost many Democrats their seats in 2003. According to a CNN article, "…Hall's move comes after Republican state lawmakers in Austin spared him in a redistricting map that targets every other Anglo Democrat in the House. His district, based in the city of Tyler, was largely untouched by the GOP-drawn map, which is currently facing a Democratic court challenge."

From: Boukhelifa, Malika <malika_boukhelifa@med.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, March 23, 2007 1:02 PM
To: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: speaker suggestion Parr center

Dear Dr. Boxill,

My name is Malika Boukhelifa, I am a Research Assistant Professor in the Department of Developmental and Cell Biology. I was just reading about the Parr Center and as a biologist, I am very interested about ethical issues. I am not a fellow of the Parr Center, but since you are organizing many events on ethics subjects. I wanted to suggest to you Dr. Nancy L. Jones from AAAS/NIH, as a futur speaker. Dr. Jones is doing a great work in the field of biomedical ethics. You probably heard about Dr. Jones, but here is just a brief description of her work. Recently, Dr. Jones got a NSF grant at Wake Forest to design a new ethics and Professionalism for biomedical graduate students. "They have a two years program. The first year, they are using a small group format with problem based learning and introducing the RCR (responsible conduct of research) and the culture of science. The goal is to make sure that students recognize the different roles and obligations of a student, versus postdoc, versus PI versus technican. Students are also introduced to the principles in science for authorship and the philosophy of patenting biomedical research in an academic setting, and justification of using animals compared with other philosophies in society. The second year, they will introduce the students to scientists and sciences'role in the society, with more bioethics focus. The goal is to help students to assume the values of science and to increase in their moral reasoning skills".

I think that Dr. Nancy L. Jones work and ideas will be of a great interest for the scientific community at UNC. Please let me know what you think.

Sincerely,

Malika

Malika Boukhelifa, Ph.D.
Research Assistant professor
UNC at Chapel Hill
Department of Cell Biology
MBRB RM#5332

Email: malika_boukhelifa@med.unc.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, March 28, 2007 9:48 AM
To: Roberts, John Thomas <jtrosap@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Ethics Bowl
Attach: PHIL 560 Ethics Bowl.doc

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

PHIL 560 ETHICS BOWL Instructor: Jan Boxill

The Ethics Bowl provides students with a unique opportunity to practice applying the moral theories and argumentation principles that they learn in their ethics classes. They receive about 15 case studies in advance involving ethical issues in a number of practical contexts, including engineering, law, medicine, personal relationships, school and politics, both nationally and internationally. During the course the students will prepare these cases. Questions may concern ethical problems on wide ranging topics, such as the classroom (e.g. cheating or plagiarism), personal relationships (e.g. dating or friendship), professional ethics (e.g. engineering, law, medicine), or social and political ethics (e.g. free speech, gun control, etc.) or global issues (e.g. the impact of globalization, global warming, the environment). Preparing responses to these questions involves a great deal of research, writing and oral presentation. The team sent to the Ethics Bowl competition will be selected from those registered in the course. Before the actual competition, a mock Ethics Bowl will be presented to the public and also to local high schools as part of the Philosophy Department's outreach program.

During a round, each team takes turns presenting its position on a case and critiquing another team's position on a different case. Teams must answer questions about their positions from a panel of judges. Judges assign scores based on logical consistency, clarity, focus and thoroughness. The presentations are evaluated on the following criteria:

Clarity and Intelligibility: Have you stated and defended your position in a way that is logically consistent and a reader/lister can clearly understand your line of reasoning?

Focus on Ethically Relevant Factors: Has you identified and discussed the ethically relevant factors?

Avoidance of Ethical Irrelevance: Has you stayed on track by avoiding preoccupation with issues that are not ethically relevant, or as only having minor ethical relevance, in connection with a case?

Deliberative Thoughtfulness: Does your presentation of its position on a question indicate both awareness and thoughtful consideration of different viewpoints, including especially those that could loom large in the reasoning of individuals who might disagree with the team's position?

The Intercollegiate Ethics Bowl (IEB) combines the excitement and fun of a competitive tournament with a valuable educational experience for undergraduate students.

The regional competition takes place in November and national in March. The course would be offered in the Fall to prepare students for the regional competition. The actual cases are sent out in mid September, so before that the students will look at previous year's cases and read material appropriate to cases in general, including ethical theory.

READINGS to be taken from the following:

Elements of Moral Philosophy, James Rachels
Being Good, Simon Blackburn
On Liberty, John Stuart Mill
Social Ethics: Morality and Social Policy, Thomas Mappes & Jane Zembaty, editors.

Other readings will be assigned as appropriate.

REQUIREMENTS:

I. CASE PREPARATION:

Each student will prepare a minimum of two cases. Each case involves:

1. 2-3 page paper setting out the argument with ethical implications.
2. Present argument to class- 5 minute presentation. Other students write a critique of the presentation with suggested revisions, readings, and research.
3. Revised paper based upon class presentation, discussion, and student critiques. Revised paper will also include an analysis of one aspect of the argument. 3-5 pages which will include bibliography and field research plans.
4. Present revised argument along with analysis: 5-7 minutes. Critiques.
5. Revised paper based on previous discussion. Revised paper will also include analysis of second aspect of the argument: 5-7 pages.
6. Present revised argument along with analysis: 5-7 minutes. Critiques
7. Revised paper based on previous discussion. Revised paper will include objections to your analysis.
8. Present revised argument: 5-7 minutes.
9. Revised paper with completed philosophical analysis: 12-15 pages
10. Oral presentation of completed analysis:
    8 minutes for presentation
    5 minutes for questions
    5-7 minutes rebuttal.

II. EXPERIENTIAL MENTORED RESEARCH STUDY:

1. For each case, students will contact appropriate units for essential background to investigate original problems and gain information regarding the case to be incorporated in the presentations and drafts. Throughout the experience, the work will be supervised and mentored by instructor and Parr Center Visiting Professor, who will assist students with setting appropriate goals. Research will also be assisted by the Parr Center graduate research fellow and the unit head or designate. [E.g. For legal cases, it would involve working with the DA office].

Expected minimum hours: 60

2. Three mock Ethics Bowl competitions: one to the Department/University, and two in local high schools as part of the Department's Outreach Program.

III. FINAL EXAM—In class

Two components: written and oral

GRADE: The final grade will be assessed as follows:

Papers:	30%
Presentations:	30%
Class participation &critiques:	20%
Final Exam:	20%

The course will be limited to 15 students per term.

WEEKLY ASSIGNMENTS:

Week 1:	Readings: Rachels: Chapters 1- & Blackburn Chapters 1- Discuss readings and cases. Assign cases. Discuss appropriate research units.
Week 2:	Readings: Mill, On Liberty; Mappes One-two page reconstruction of the arguments of your cases Five minute oral presentation of the reconstruction Feedback and suggestions from class.
Week 3:	Re-write the reconstruction given the feedback from class. Prepare a bibliography of selected readings appropriate to your cases Present both the re-write and bibliography to the class. Receive student feedback and suggestions.
Week 4:	Annotated bibliography. 1-2 page showing the relevant facts of the case.
Weeks 5-8:	Presentations, discussions,
Week 9-11	Mock Ethics Bowl Competitions
Week 12:	In class discussions in preparation for National Competition.
Week 13:	National Ethics Bowl Competition
Week 14:	Debriefing and discussion of Ethics Bowl Competition; review for final exam.

Sample Cases:

Case #1

Dr. B., a Professor of Psychology at a large research institution, Ohio State University (OSU), has a long distinguished record of working with chimpanzees. In the 1970s, she taught chimps to communicate, first by using American Sign Language and later using graphic symbols. In the last decade, under her direction, two young chimps, Keeli and Ivy, have learned to count and to recognize simple written words. Another chimp, Bobby, has shown an uncanny ability to learn number sequences and even to fill in missing numbers in a sequence. She has learned that chimps can do simple arithmetic, behave similarly to preschoolers, and (along with humans) have the ability to perceive the knowledge state of a peer.

Dr. B., who has dedicated her entire professional life to the study of cognition in chimpanzees, has won international acclaim for her work and was named one of the top 50 women researchers in the nation by Discover Magazine in 2002. Her chimps have been featured on Discovery Channel. However, as funding to support the research center has been hard to come by in the last five years, the university decided to close the research center and send the chimps away. OSU abruptly seized the professor's laboratory on February 28, 2006, changed all the locks, and hired a truck to send all 12 primates (nine chimps and three monkeys) to Primarily Primates, a controversial Texas sanctuary. The university gave the sanctuary a $324,000 trust fund for the animal's care.

Dr. B. vigorously protested the decision. When a restraining order she filed failed to prevent the university from implementing its decision, Dr. B. chained herself to the center's gate to prevent the transport trucks from leaving. Her efforts were unsuccessful and one of the chimps, 25-year old Kermit, died during the 38-hour transport in early March. Bobby was found dead in his enclosure on April 20. One of the monkeys escaped and was never recovered. Dr. B sued OSU to win custody of the remaining chimps. PETA also joined the suit on behalf of the remaining seven chimps and two monkeys and in June a Texas judge ordered that an independent trustee should oversee the $324,000 funding to ensure that it be used to house and benefit the remaining OSU primates.

Case #2

Wisconsin State Representative Dan LeMahieu (R-Oostburg) was outraged when the University of Wisconsin-Madison's University Health Services (UHS) featured ads in the two student newspapers suggesting that students consider receiving prescriptions for emergency contraception (EC) prior to leaving for spring break. UHS services are available to any student at the UW-Madison, and as such they offer health expertise to students in the areas of medical treatment for illnesses and injuries, counseling for stress reduction, smoking cessation, nutrition, dermatology, sports medicine, as well as confidential testing and treatment of sexually transmitted diseases (STDs). Although a part of the state-funded University of Wisconsin System, the ads were paid for using student segregated fees which are not part of taxpayer dollars or academic tuition funds.

Following the publication of the ads, which were part of a series also advising students to protect themselves from sun exposure and limit their intake of alcohol, Representative LeMahieu initiated drafting legislation to ban any university health center in Wisconsin from advertising or distributing the morning-after pill (EC). LeMahieu contends, "I think it's offensive that the university is trying to tell young women to be prepared and to plan ahead so they can have promiscuous activities on spring break. I don't think that it's the role of the university to promote that type of activity, and I believe that's what their ad is asking young people to do." LeMahieu also added that the UW should be "made aware" that many people who are paying state taxes do not appreciate the offensive advertisements.

On June 16, 2005, Wisconsin's State Assembly voted 49-41 in favor of a bill prohibiting University of Wisconsin System health centers from advertising, prescribing or dispensing emergency contraception, making it the first state in the country to move towards banning EC on all state college campuses.

Case #3

Near the end of its fall season, a top executive from the popular reality television competition, Idol Starz, appeared on the Today Show and revealed that the program's contestants either advanced or were cut based on producers' decisions rather than being selected through the program's public text-messaging voting system. The executive went on to state that the show's winners and losers were selected by producers on a round-by-round basis in the hopes that certain "controversial" or "questionable" choices would positively influence ratings, increase fervor for underdog candidates, and create a more developed fan-base which would return to view the show during both current and future seasons.

Given the show's popularity and viewers' commitment to their favorite contestants, the revelation led to a large public outcry condemning the show for dishonesty and false advertising. Many claimed to have been cheated and explained that the show had a responsibility to adhere to the public's decisions about which candidates they preferred. Given special attention during this debate was the show's slogan: "You vote. You decide. Who should be the next Idol Star?"

During ensuing interviews, the show's producers explained that their decisions were based on the fact that they were in the entertainment business and that certain unpredictable events helped to keep the audience invested in the show and provided increased entertainment value. They also argued that, more often that not, their decisions about who should advance or win were in line with the public's desires. When questioned about the program's slogan, one producer was quoted as saying, "Look at it carefully. There is a difference between telling someone to vote and decide who should be the next Idol Star and telling them that their votes will decide the next Idol Star."

Case #4

In a recent case, Florida authorities declined to file charges against a Miami Herald columnist for surreptitiously recording a phone call from a city commissioner who later committed suicide in the newspaper's lobby. Authorities cited the unusual circumstances that led to the taping as the basis for not filing charges against the columnist. These circumstances were not enough for the Miami Herald, who took immediate action to fire the columnist for violating a company policy that prohibited the taping of sources and interviewees without the subject's consent.

State laws related to the recording of phone calls and the courts interpretation of these laws vary widely in the United States. Many of these laws are intentionally written with ambiguous terms and interpretation is typically required on a case by case basis.

The firing of this popular columnist caused much protest around the world. Many members of the Herald staff signed a petition requesting the decision to fire the columnist be rescinded. The columnist was friends with the city commissioner, and the commissioner provided regular sources for stories to the columnist.

According to the columnist, the commissioner was despondent over public allegations about his sex life and the tone of his voice on the phone conversation was so alarming that the columnist impulsively decided to record the conversation. The tape records the columnist's attempts to calm the commissioner. Throughout their 20-minute conversation, the columnist attempted to steer the conversation to less volatile subjects in the hopes of lifting the commissioner's spirits. But the call ended with the commissioner still despondent. A few minutes later, the commissioner shot himself.

Following the suicide, the columnist told editors of the Miami Herald that he had been interviewing the commissioner earlier in the day and had recorded part of the conversation without the commissioner's consent.

After being fired, the columnist was quoted as saying "In a tense situation I made a mistake. The Miami Herald executives only learned about it because I came to them and admitted it. I told them I was willing to accept a suspension and apologize both to the newsroom and our readers. Unfortunately, the Herald decided on the death penalty instead."

The Miami Herald editors have taken the position that there must be an absolute prohibition of the paper's reporters taping conversations without a party's consent, and not just because it is against the law in Florida, as it is in many states. An executive of the Herald has stated that the policy is necessary to protect the paper's integrity, as well as to foster trust from news sources.

Journalists at the Miami Herald have pointed out that at least one other reporter surreptitiously taped an interview, but was not fired. The journalists also have also stated that there is no written policy on taping conversations and that any verbal policy on expectations of reporters is unclear. The Miami Herald responded to the alleged case of a previous surreptitious taping by saying "we understand this happened 18 years ago". They went onto state that the recent decision to fire the columnist was clearly guided by the environment in which journalists operate today; which is much more constrained in terms of the latitude given for violation of law and policy.

Case #5

Beginning in 2005, protests at funerals for military personnel killed in Iraq have been increasing – and have received much media attention. In particular, members of the Westboro Baptist Church, in Topeka, Kansas, have been especially visible and vocal at many of these military funerals. Reverend Fred Phelps and his protesters claim that U.S. military deaths in Iraq are because America tolerates homosexuals and that they are a sign of divine punishment for America's tolerance of homosexuality. For over a year now, members of this anti-gay church have been crisscrossing the United States, holding more than one hundred protests outside the funerals of U.S. soldiers killed in Iraq.

They wave placards with such expressions as: "You're Going to Hell," "Fag Vets, God Hates You," and "Thank God for IEDs" (the improvised explosive devices responsible for killing many military personnel in Iraq). Phelps contends that all American soldiers are guilty by association – because they are fighting in the service of the U.S. government.

By Spring, 2006, twenty-eight states and Congress were rushing to pass laws to restrict protests outside military funerals. On May 17, 2006, Illinois Governor Rod Blagojevich signed a state law – "Let Them Rest in Peace Act" – that prohibits disruptive and inflammatory protesting 30 minutes before a funeral, during the service, and 30 minutes after a funeral while remaining 200 feet from the funeral site. This new Illinois law drew immediate scorn from Shirley Phelps-Roper, attorney for the Westboro Baptist Church: "The law is impotent. You've done nothing to change that God is killing your children and sending them home in body bags. Keep your big, fat snout out of our religion."

In the U.S. Congress, Representative Mike Rogers (R-Mich.) sponsored a House bill to address this matter. He said that he took up the issue after attending a military funeral in his home state, where mourners were greeted by "chants and taunting and some of the most vile things I have ever heard. Families deserve the time to bury their American heroes with dignity and in peace." On May 24, 2006, Congress passed legislation that would bar demonstrators from disrupting military funerals at national cemeteries.

The "Respect for America's Fallen Heroes Act" prohibits protests within 300 feet of the entrance of a national cemetery and within 150 feet of a road into the cemetery from 60 minutes before to 60 minutes after a funeral. Those violating the act would face up to a $100,000 fine and up to a year in prison. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said that this act "will protect the sanctity of all 122 of our national cemeteries as shrines to their gallant dead. It's a sad but necessary measure to protect what should be recognized by all reasonable people as a solemn, private and deeply sacred occasion."

In response to this federal legislation, Phelps has said that Congress was "blatantly violating the First Amendment rights to free speech" in passing the bill. He said that he will continue to demonstrate but would abide by the restrictions. Constitutional experts are warning that protest restrictions – such as those passed in Illinois and in Congress – appear overly broad and are likely to be overturned if challenged in court. Eugene Volokh, a law professor at the University of California-Los Angeles and an authority on the First Amendment, said: "You can't treat speech as a breach of peace simply because it offends people. These protests are tremendously offensive and hard to ignore. But ignoring them or counter-protesting is unfortunately the only remedy the 1st Amendment allows." And, the American Civil Liberties Union has filed a lawsuit against a new Kentucky law, saying that it goes too far in limiting freedom of speech and expression. Additional lawsuits are expected to be filed.

U.S military veterans find Phelps' beliefs and actions particularly abhorrent, and in November, 2005, veterans' motorcycle groups began showing up at military funerals to oppose the protesters and to show support for the families of the deceased soldiers. Calling themselves the Patriot Guard Riders, these motorcycle groups have organized hundreds of counter-protesters to wave American flags and stand silently in front of the Westboro picketers, to pay respects to the fallen soldier, and to protect the soldier's family from disruptions.

Case #6

Alejandro Toledo, President of Peru, has launched a public campaign demanding that Yale University return to Peru Incan artifacts excavated at Machu Picchu in 1912. Yale professor Hiram Bingham III, guided by a native Peruvian, came upon the Incan city of Machu Picchu in 1911. Bingham secured backing from the National Geographic Society and support from Peru's government for archeological excavations at Machu Picchu in 1912 and again in 1914-15.

In October 1912, Bingham gained the Peruvian government's permission to bring to Yale for research the contents of 170 tombs in Machu Picchu. The decree allowed that Peru reserve the right to ask for the return of the objects.

By 1916, Peru, suspecting Bingham of secretly taking Incan gold, ended Bingham's work at Machu Picchu. The items taken to Yale from the 1914-15 excavations were loaned for only 18 months. Yale has refused several Peruvian requests for return of the artifacts.

Today, Yale claims that they have complied with the 1912 and the 1916 agreements, returning the objects to Peru during the 1920's. Yale sees no similar responsibility to return the items taken from earlier work. National Geographic Society records show that about half of the items were returned to Peru, with no mention of the remaining artifacts.

Luis Guillermo Lumbreras, the director of Peru's National Institute of Culture in Lima, claims that Yale has had 90 years to complete research on the objects, and now Peru wants the items returned. Peru elected its first indigenous president–Alejandro Toledo, who honored the nation's Incan heritage by holding part of his inauguration ceremony at Machu Picchu in 2001. In part due to his influence, Peru wants possession of the artifacts, which have formed the core of Yale's impressive, scholarly exhibition: Unveiling the Mystery of the Incas. After traveling to six cities and attracting over a million visitors, the exhibit now resides at Yale's Peabody Museum of Natural History in Connecticut.

The recent research of Yale professors Lucy Salazar and her husband Richard L. Burger, including extensive scientific analysis of burials, has provided the most reasonable explanation for the existence of Machu Picchu. Rather than supporting the earlier ideas of the city as a center for religious activity including the sacrifice of virgins, the professors' research has suggested that the city served as a simple country retreat from the Inca capital of Cuzco.

The number and kinds of artifacts taken to Yale from Machu Picchu is in dispute. Yale has offered to return some of the pieces to Peru, if Peru allows it to keep others at the Peabody Museum of Natural History, where Machu Picchu is the prize exhibit.

Case #7

In October of 2002, after the overdose of one of its workers, management at a Weyerhaeuser, a multinational corporation in the pulp and paper industry located in Valliant, Oklahoma, became concerned that employees were not following drug and safety regulations in its parking lot. Management decided to have the parking lot searched with gun and drug sniffing dogs. While the dogs found no drugs, they did find firearms in twelve vehicles, including shotguns and automatic weapons. The owners of these vehicles, including a 23-year veteran shift manager, were fired in the next two days.

Weyerhaeuser and many other businesses have had long standing bans on firearms brought into the plant in order to protect workers and prevent workplace violence. In 2002, Weyerhaeuser extended this ban to the parking lot. Many workers claim they were not told of the extension of the ban, though management claims they informed workers. Some of the fired workers have filed suits claiming they were not informed. The initial suit was thrown out, but the decision is being appealed.

Since this and other incidents, many states -- beginning with Oklahoma -- have enacted laws protecting workers who want to keep firearms in their cars. The latest state to consider such a law is Florida, home to Walt Disney World, which does not allow any of its 50,000+ employees to bring guns onto company property.

A number of corporations have joined federal lawsuits against these new state laws. These companies include ConocoPhillips (petroleum), Halliburton (energy), and the Nordam Group (aircraft manufacture). They state that they cannot provide a safe and secure workplace without the ban on guns in the parking lot, and they see state laws allowing guns as infringing on the right of private property owners to decide what is and is not allowed on their property. Even aside from their property rights, companies claim that the laws would disregard public safety. The Bureau of Labor Statistics Census of Fatal Occupational Injuries states that in 2004, there were 551 workplace homicides out of 5703 workplace fatalities. A study at the University of North Carolina claims that such killings are five times more likely to occur at workplaces that allow guns compared to those who do not.

The National Rifle Association (NRA) has been the primary champion of laws that allow workers to have guns in cars in company parking lots. The NRA claims that prohibiting lawful gun owners to keep guns in their car dramatically diminishes their right to own firearms and defend themselves. All 50 states allow the transportation of firearms for lawful purposes. The laws also restrict workers who may want to hunt or target shoot after work from engaging in these lawful activities. They also claim that one's car should enjoy the same protections that one's home enjoys with regards to being able to keep lawful weapons and immunity to unlawful searches.

The NRA claims that the state laws already have commonsense provisions in them that prevent abuse. For instance, anyone wanting to transport a firearm and park their car in a company lot must keep the automobile locked, and at no time is it permissible to take the firearm out of the car on company property. Against the property rights claims of business owners, the NRA claims that business owners are already under extensive federal, state, and local regulations about what they can do with their property and that striking down these state laws would allow companies to "micro-manage" the contents of an employee's automobile. The NRA also cites statistics that 84% of workplace murders are committed by strangers, and anyone determined to commit a crime will not be discouraged from bringing the gun onto company property by a company regulation prohibiting guns in parking lots.

Case #8

After several years of miscarriages, Edward and Susan turn to in vitro fertilization as a means of screening embryos for genetic defects. More than two years elapse, with all the attendant discomfort and expense, but finally an “acceptable” embryo is produced and implanted. To their joy, nine months later they are blessed by Michelle, an apparently happy, healthy baby.

They decide that they will not tempt fate by trying to increase their family, instead choosing to relish the raising of their daughter. Five years pass and they eagerly anticipate Michelle's starting kindergarten. They have elected to enroll her in a well-respected private school so as to realize her fullest potential. Part of the school's pre-entry preparation is an extremely thorough set of physical examinations. (The physical examinations are not done to screen for admission, but rather to anticipate potential health issues while the student is enrolled.)

To their horror, the examinations determine that Michelle has early symptoms of a particularly virulent form of Acute Childhood Lymphoid Leukemia. Nothing in the embryonic screening could have predicted its occurrence. They begin immediate conventional treatments which prove to be ineffective. At their oncologist's recommendation they enroll her in the nation's premier pediatric oncology program. She gives them the bad news that Michelle shows evidence of having Philadelphia chromosome-positive ALL. The most successful treatment involves hematopoietic stem cell transplantation from matching relatives. The oncology clinic tests both Edward and Susan, but finds neither of them compatible. Since neither of them (nor Michelle) has any siblings, it looks as if they will have to hope for a million-to-one chance of finding a well-matched unrelated donor.

While waiting in the lounge of the clinic, the mother of another child under treatment introduces herself and suggests that they do have another option – they could have another child, via in vitro, selecting among possible embryos for compatibility for transplant. Initially they are horrified at the idea of producing another child as a "biological stockpile" for Michelle, but the more they think about it the better the idea seems. After all, they really had wanted more children. The new child wouldn't be seriously injured by the procedure needed to provide Michelle with the transplant material she so desperately needs. Given their history of medical procedures needed to have Michelle, the screening required to make sure the new child would be a compatible donor is almost the same as if they were just having another child as a family expansion.

When they raise the possibility with Michelle's physician, she explains that the screening technology has improved sufficiently since Michelle's birth to guard against the new child's having the same disposition toward this disease. But, before she will go further, she tells them they must speak with the clinic's counselor. The counselor asks them to consider what their true motives are in proposing the conception of this second child, whether they would be treating her as a person or as an object and how they will explain to her the reason for her conception.

Case #9

After 25-30 years of service, ships are at the end of their sailing life and are sold as "End of Life Vessels" to be dismantled primarily to recover the valuable steel which makes up about 95% of the ship. Ship breaking (or ship demolition) is the process of dismantling the structure of an obsolete vessel for scrapping or disposal and includes a wide range of activities, from removing all gear and equipment to cutting down and recycling the ship's infrastructure. However, the only ones who profit from ship breaking are the ship owners. They extract an average of $1.9 million profit per "End of Life Vessel." Ship breaking is also a challenging and controversial process, due to the structural complexity of ships and the many environmental, safety, and health issues involved.

Ship breaking is dangerous and has the reputation of being one of the dirtiest jobs on earth. For minimal dollars a day, workers with little protective gear tear out pipes insulated with asbestos, transformers covered with PCBs, and leaky diesel tanks. Until the late twentieth century, ship breaking took place primarily in port cities in developed countries – including the United States and Europe. Today, however, most ship breaking yards are in developing countries – especially India, China, Bangladesh, and Pakistan. This is due to rules dealing with lead paint and toxic substances. The industry was such a disgrace that, in 2000, Congress acted to stop U.S. registered ships from being sent overseas for scrap. Ship breaking remains an international environmental and labor concern - because ship breaking now occurs mostly in underdeveloped countries where working conditions and environmental impact are not regulated. Also, many ships being scrapped now were made before many international environmental laws were enacted.

In late 2005, a Virginia-based company, Bay Bridge Enterprises, visited the small coastal town of Newport, Oregon, and proposed opening a ship breaking plant on the banks of Yaquina Bay. The company offered up to 125 jobs paying $20 an hour. Their spokesperson indicated that the company had no environmental violations since they have been doing this work, and that they had zero lost-time injuries since 2001. Also, he noted that there is no large-scale ship breaking yard on the West Coast, and that there are about 60 ships anchored in a California bay – just waiting to be moved to a scrap yard. Therefore, there would be plenty of work available at a new ship breaking plant in Newport – for some time to come.

A strong coalition of interested parties in the Newport area emerged in opposition to this proposal. The "Friends of Yaquina Bay" were the group of people most responsible for rallying the community together to try to stop this ship breaking proposal. The Oregon Coast Aquarium and the Oregon State University Hatfield Marine Science Center – both located in Newport – also added major support to the effort to block the proposed plant. Some of the major issues raised by these opponents to the proposal included: the world-wide negative reputation of ship breaking; the safety of towing "ghost ships" (some with a length of up to 540 feet) from San Francisco Bay in California to Newport, Oregon; potential infestation of as many as 100 invasive species on the ships in California that are not in Yaquina Bay; toxins on and in the ships that would escape into the bay and the air, affecting the seafood industry – especially crabbing – as well as the fear of pollution runoff at the Hatfield Marine Science Center and the Oregon Coast Aquarium; and visual pollution. Yaquina Bay is a continentally Important Bird Area – with several endangered species present. There are 15 or more blue heron nests and other bird species on the tide flats near the proposed ship breaking site. The local tides extend 15 miles up the Yaquina River and thus the largest oyster farm in Oregon could be affected. Plus there is fear that money-spending tourists would not view these rusting ships as an asset to the beautiful Oregon coast.

On January 24, 2006, about 200 people packed a meeting room in Newport, Oregon, to hear Mr. Don Mann, general manager of the Port of Newport, announce that "some projects are a good fit, or not a fit at all. Bay Bridge's plan for a ship breaking facility in Yaquina Bay does not qualify in our test for a good fit." Thus, quite surprisingly, it seems, the ship breaking plan for Newport was ended. Mr. Mann continued: "This was not a good business deal for the company, or for the Port. I believe that the environmental issues could have been resolved, but our financial concerns could not be adequately addressed." The vast majority of persons at the meeting were very pleased with this decision.

While this issue was being considered by the town of Newport, Oregon, the office of the Port Commissioners received hundreds of telephone calls of concern – from all over the country. As one commissioner said: "We have gained much free advertising – for the port and community. The whole world knows we're here. This issue is bringing this concern to Oregon, and to the nation." Bay Bridge's next move on the West Coast remains to be seen. The company is still looking for a possible Oregon or Washington port.

Case #10

Ardent R. Porter is an investigatory journalist with a respected Washington-area newspaper, Capitol News Briefly. As a reporter working in and around the D.C. area, Mr. Porter often relies on his long list of contacts in order to glean information that might be useful for the various articles he publishes on corruption within politics and government. By establishing relationships with individuals at all levels of government, Ardent has provided himself with valuable human sources that are often capable of providing him with names, tips, or other information that he could not extract from other channels. Furthermore, a few of Mr. Porter's key contacts are able to pass along hard-to-come-by information about questionable or downright illegal actions taken by government employees or agencies.

One such contact is Ian Stalwart, a mid-level agency administrator who works with individuals who do government "groundwork" as well as with high-level government bureaucrats. As a middleman of sorts, Ian is in a position uniquely suited to evaluating the actions of those who work both below and above him. One of Mr. Stalwart's responsibilities is to watch for and report any illegal activity that he might encounter. Mr. Stalwart takes this role very seriously and his responsibilities as a watchdog were what originally led him to seek out Ardent, a like-minded opponent of corruption and illegality within public service.

It so happened that Mr. Stalwart discovered that many individuals within his agency were working to cover up illegally-awarded, over-billed, or otherwise fraudulent government contracts awarded during the early months of the Iraq War, actions which were in violation of several federal laws, in addition to many agency standards. Upon presenting his discovery to his superiors, Mr. Stalwart was told to disregard his findings and to refrain from further discussing the subject. After pressing for a more sophisticated explanation, he was informed that the contracts in question had been deemed classified through appropriate agency and congressional channels and that because the contracts had been deemed to serve a compelling national security interest, it would be against agency policy (as well as illegal) to discuss them, regardless of any questionable procedural or substantive aspects.

Fully knowing that he was in violation of laws regarding the disclosure of classified information, Mr. Stalwart approached Mr. Porter and revealed everything he knew about the dubious contracts. He also provided Mr. Porter with the names of the individuals implicated in the cover-ups and the names of the administrators who had ordered him to remain silent.

After composing a lengthy and revealing story, Mr. Porter approached his editor about publishing the story, explaining the dilemma presented by the fact that much, if not all, of the story's core material was classified. Following a discussion about publishing the article by the paper's editorial board it was decided that the story would run in the paper's next issue.

Case #11

Students in schools of medicine, nursing, dentistry and veterinary medicine are required to observe actual surgeries (and other procedures) early in their educations as a preliminary exposure to the practices of their field. In fact, such study is thought to be essential in confirming the students' choice of profession. Of course, the observation takes place with the informed consent of the patients (or their guardians). Many pre-medical, pre-nursing, pre-dentistry, and pre-veterinary programs, especially at schools with associated hospitals, are beginning to recommend (or even require) similar observation programs.

The State University Museum has one of the nation's premier exhibits of the history of medicine and allied fields. They include displays replicating Leonardo's anatomy studies, teaching materials from Charles University (in Prague) dating from the 16th century, 18th century "bleeding," and 19th century nutrition studies (among many other presentations).
One of the most popular offerings at the museum is the "surgery room" where films of common surgical procedures can be viewed. Like the student viewing in medical schools, the patients shown have given their informed consent. Not surprisingly, the most identifiable attendees are people who are considering having the operations shown in the pictures. The films have been "sanitized" so that excess gore is avoided, but the surgeries are shown in detail.

Dr. Suarez, curator of the museum and retired professor of neurosurgery, has proposed to the board that rather than using films, which are hard to make and quickly become outdated, observers should be allowed to observe actual, in process surgeries on persons who have consented. After all, the University Hospital is adjacent to the museum and access is convenient. The hospital's operating theaters are set up above the surgical floor but separated from the patient and surgical team by sound- and atmosphere-proof windows. Dr. Suarez suggests that such watching could become a significant educational revenue-generating operation. He points out that special exhibits commonly serve as important financial resources for museums.

When Dr. Suarez proposes this program to the Museum's board of directors, Katherine Osborn (one of the community members of the board) objects vigorously. Although Dr. Suarez's proposal clearly restricts participation to persons "15 and older," Ms. Osborn argues that teens, and perhaps others, will attend surgeries not as education but as entertainment. Her position is that such "exhibitions" will be little better than the "bum fights" and ultraviolent films that have gained popularity in recent years. Ms. Osborn claims that teens will watch surgeries as a replacement for the gore seen while attending the Halloween and Nightmare on Elm Street movies. Her claim is that such actions are exploitative more than educational.

Dr. Suarez responds that actual surgeries come nowhere near the gore commonly shown on TV and in the movies. He points out that we seldom know what motivates people to act as they do in the presence of human affliction. "Do people slow their cars when passing accidents in order to see whether they can help or to see blood and gore? How would we know? Even if an adolescent attended a surgery out of a desire to see gore, might the experience not shift his or her perspective, creating an interest in becoming a medical professional?"

Case #12

Politicians have crossed the floor, or switched parties for as long as political parties have been in place—famous switches include those of Strom Thurmond, Ronald Reagan, Condoleezza Rice, Howard Dean, Hilary Clinton and most recently, Joe Lieberman. In 2001, nine serving members of Congress had switched parties while in office. Various reasons are cited for changing parties, including ideological disagreement with one's current party and moving to improve power and legislative efficacy, among others. U.S. Representative Ralph Hall of the Fourth Congressional District in Texas cites both reasons.

Ralph Hall was first elected in 1980 as a Democrat and has been re-elected each succeeding year. Hall has made a reputation for himself as a rogue Democrat, willing to "cross the aisle" and vote with Republicans when he agreed with their position. He also has been an avid supporter of President Bush, opposed to Democratic bids to unseat him. But it was more than mere ideological agreement that encouraged a decision to switch parties in early 2004 before his bid for reelection.

As Hall stated in a January 2004 press release that announced his decision to switch parties, "This year I was denied requests for district appropriations because I was a Democrat who voted against the bill. I have always stated that … if being a Democrat hurt my district, I would either resign or switch parties." The bill to which he was referring was a "foreign operations bill" which, according to Hall, gave, "financial support to those countries that continue to vote against [the U.S.] in the United Nations."

Another motivation may be found in Hall's appreciation for being spared a potentially career devastating blow in the redistricting that cost many Democrats their seats in 2003. According to a CNN article, "…Hall's move comes after Republican state lawmakers in Austin spared him in a redistricting map that targets every other Anglo Democrat in the House. His district, based in the city of Tyler, was largely untouched by the GOP-drawn map, which is currently facing a Democratic court challenge."

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, March 28, 2007 2:38 PM
To: Crowder, Deborah A <dacrowde@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Selassie

Thanks--looks impressive. I've put it on my calendar.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

PHILOSOPHY 66 SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC JUSTICE Jan Boxill

Fall 2004 Office: Caldwell 102B
Tues/Thurs 12:30-1:45 Caldwell 105 Office Hours T/W 9-11
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu Phone: 962-3317

The course will consist of readings and class discussions focusing on social and economic issues and their theoretical justifications. The first set of readings will examine classical political theories with a focus on justice and the common good. We will ask questions such as: What is the nature of justice? What is the justification and role of the state? What is the nature of rights? Why do we take rights seriously? Is there such a thing as "the common good"? Do the traditional theories of justice and rights accommodate everyone? The second set of readings will examine current social issues using the theories discussed. The issues we will address are: racism and sexism, affirmative action, capital punishment, business ethics, the environment. We may not, and probably will not, be able to resolve the issues, but we should at least gain a greater understanding of the issues which should serve as beginnings to possible resolutions.

GOALS FOR THIS COURSE:

1. Acquire the basic skills used by philosophers generally and thus the skills we will use in this course; tools and skills needed to appreciate, challenge, reflect, and evaluate both the ideas you have inherited and those you might yet adopt. Philosophical reflection is a matter of engaging actively with ideas. The point throughout is to help you to think clearly, and for yourselves, about positions you would otherwise adopt or reject uncritically; in other words, to give you the skills you need to enjoy intellectual autonomy. With this in mind, by the end of the semester you should be able to:
   - Reconstruct an argument from a given passage or text.
   - Critically analyze an argument presented to you, produced by you, or reconstructed by you.
   - Produce, articulate, and defend reasons for a given opinion and respond to objections raised to this opinion.

2. Gain an understanding of various theories of justice and how they help us understand the current issues in society. For the various issues we will examine, both theoretical and more concrete, you should be able to:
   - Define the important terms and concepts.
   - Gain an understanding of classical and contemporary theories of justice and rights.
   - Apply these various theories to the different issues.
   - Explain the relationship between the larger theoretical issues and the relationship between the various issues.
   - Given a specific issue, demonstrate the ability to supply reasons in favor of a certain resolution and make sure these are consistent with positions you have taken and will take on other issues.

REQUIRED TEXTS:

The Trial and Death of Socrates
The State, Justice, and the Common Good, edited by B.J. Diggs (SJCG)
Contemporary Moral Problems, edited by James E. White (CMP)
Other Readings on Reserve

CLASS REQUIREMENTS:
Keep up with announcements, assignments, outlines and notes for lectures posted on BLACKBOARD.

Assigned Readings: See Schedule
Examinations and Quizzes:
- 5 Quizzes: Dates announced in Class-likely every 2 weeks; lowest quiz will be dropped.
- Two Papers: Paper 1: 2-4 pages; Paper 2: 3-5 pages. Due dates and topics on Blackboard.
- A Comprehensive Final: Format -- Short Answer and essay Thursday, December 16, 9 a.m.

Outside Assignments: Options
1. Volunteer Service: APPLES or 8-10 hours of volunteer service for the semester with a 3-5 page analysis of your service. Submit a short paragraph for approval to begin service. Paper due last day of class. Or:
2. FOUR outside lectures, events, or articles related to the issues or theories discussed. For each you are to write a one-page (typed or handwritten) analysis/reaction giving a brief summary, your reaction and analysis, and how it is relevant to the class. DUE DATES: Two by Fall Break; Two by last day of class.

Class Participation:
Participation makes for a more enjoyable and interesting class. But further, discussion in class is crucial to understanding and reasoning. You should prepare the readings so that you will be able to answer questions about them and use the concepts they introduce.

Class Attendance: A Roll sheet will be passed around for each class.

FINAL GRADE FOR THE COURSE WILL BE DETERMINED AS FOLLOWS:

Paper #1	=15%
Paper #2	=20%
Quizzes	=15%
Outside Assignments/Attendance	=10%

Final Exam =40%

SCHEDULE OF READINGS

WEEK 1: Introduction to Course
Trial and Death of Socrates: Apology and Crito.

WEEK 2: Greek Political Thought continued
SJCG: Introduction pp. 1-26

WEEK 3: SJCG: The Modern State, Hobbes: pp. 29-33; 52-66.

WEEK 4: SJCG: Locke, pp. 33-37 and 67-87

WEEK 5: SJCG: Rousseau pp. 43-50 and 117-144

WEEK 6: SJCG: Hume, pp. 37-43 and 88-116

WEEK 7: SJCG: Justice and the Common Good, pp. 145-169;
Marx, pp. 145-158 and 172-184

WEEK 8: SJCG: Mill, pp. 159-163 and 185-200

WEEK 9: SJCG: Rawls, pp. 164-169 and 219-240

WEEK 10: Dworkin: Taking Rights Seriously, CMP: pp. 72-78
Baier: The Need for More Than Justice, CMP: pp. 86-96
Racism and Sexism: Readings on reserve
Audre Lorde, Scratching the Surface
Marilyn Frye, Sexism
R. Wasserstrom, Racism and Sexism bell hooks, Selections from From Margin to Center Film: A Class Divided

WEEK 11: Affirmative Action: CMP: pp. 415-463
Louis Pojman, The Moral Status of Affirmative Action
Albert Mosley, The Case against Pojman
Laurence Thomas, What Good Am I?
Thomas Hill, The Message of Affirmative Action
On Reserve: The Case of Alan Bakke
J. Boxill, Affirmative Action as Reverse Discrimination
B. Boxill, Affirmative Action

WEEK 12: Pornography and Drugs: CMP: pp. 355-411
J.S. Mill, On Liberty
Barry Lynn, Pornography and Free Speech: The Civil Rights Approach
Ann Garry, Sex, Lies, and Pornography
Thomas Szasz, The Ethics of Addiction
James Q. Wilson, Against Legalization of Drugs
Daniel Shapiro, Addiction and Drug Policy

WEEK 13: Capital Punishment: CMP: pp. 239-282
Gregg vs. Georgia (1976)
Kant, The Retributive Theory of Punishment
L. Pojman, Deterrence and the Death Penalty
J. Reiman, Deterrence: Common Sense and the Best Bet Argument
Anthony Amsterdam, Capital Punishment

WEEK 14: Business Ethics: Readings on Reserve
Cases: MacPherson vs. Buick; Henningsen vs.Bloomfield Motors; Ford Pinto; Ford Explorer/Firestone Tires.
Rights in the Workplace
Nickel and Dimed: Selections

WEEK 15: The Environment: CMP: pp. 511-571
Aldo Leopold, The Land Ethic
J. Callicot, Animal Liberation: A Triangular Affair
Devall and Sessions, Deep Ecology

COMPREHENSIVE FINAL EXAM
THURSDAY, DECEMBER 16 at 9 a.m.

THE HONOR CODE

It shall be the responsibility of every student at UNC to obey and to support the enforcement of the Honor Code, which prohibits lying, cheating, or stealing when these actions involve academic processes or University, student, or academic personnel acting in an official capacity.

CAMPUS CODE

It shall be the further responsibility of every student to abide by the Campus Code; namely, to conduct oneself so as not to impair significantly the welfare or the educational opportunities of others in the University Community.

WHAT I EXPECT

The Honor Code is, as always, in effect in this course. The following sections explain what I expect from you in terms of meeting these standards. If you have any questions at all about these matters, please do not hesitate to ask me.

PLEDGE: The Instrument of Student Judicial Governance requires that you sign a pledge on all written work. (On my honor, I have neither given nor received unauthorized aid on this assignment.?) This includes all papers, exams, and quizzes. The first time you hand in an assignment, I expect you to write out the pledge in full. After that, you may simply write ?Pledge? and sign your name.

EXAMS AND QUIZZES: All in-class exams and quizzes in this class are to be taken without the assistance of books, notes, or other people. You may, however, study with classmates. In fact, forming study groups is an excellent way to prepare for exams.

PAPERS: As with exams and quizzes, I encourage you to discuss your papers with your classmates and anyone else, for that matter. The crucial thing to remember is that you must give citations for ideas that are not your own, whether or not those ideas have been written down somewhere. If your roommate comes up with a brilliant example and you use it in your paper, then you must cite him or her in a footnote.

Again, if you are not clear about any of this, ask questions.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Sunday, April 8, 2007 10:17 AM
To: Gulledge, Suzanne Allen <sgulledg@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Humanities award first draft
Attach: Humanities grant application.doc

Suzanne,
I've added and edited what you sent. I am home and available today, and also tomorrow from 12-1 and 3-4.
As I was reading through it, I truly believe we have something unique to offer. I tried to emphasize this in the end. What do you think?

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

>

April 5, 2007

Vice Chancellor Tony Waldrop
Office of Research and Economic Development
University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

Dear Vice Chancellor Waldrop:

Following is a request for an award to support scholarship and research for a project related to ethics and the preparation and professional development of teachers. The proposed activity would involve collaboration of a professor in philosophy and a professor in education to develop a resource book on ethical decision making that is specifically applicable to the work of public school teachers, administrators, and counselors. The aim is to incorporate narratives of real cases and dilemmas that face our public school personnel and to provide a framework for analizing them. We further aim to inform our recommendations through a study of the processes and the outcomes of a humanities project that began with the work of a few scholars, much as we aim to begin, in Australia in 1998 as the multicultural public schools faced issues of conflicting ethical cultures and a crisis related to achievement of all students. Upon completion of this project, in cooperation with the Parr Center for Ethics, we will sponsor seminars and workshops for public school teachers using this resource book as the base of the discussion, as well as include the material in an Ethics in Education class.

At present, there exists a significant void in the literature related to ethics and teaching that specifically addresses public school teaching. The proposed articles and book that will proceed from this award will be useful in several contexts and for a varied audience: in the pre-service training of teachers; as text for college and university faculty members who are teacher educators; to inform state education agencies that oversee professional licensing; in the ongoing professional development of practicing teachers and to administrators who oversee the work of classroom teachers in public schools; and for anyone interested in applied ethics and the professions.

Scholarship related to ethics in other professions- medicine, law, and business has yielded a number of seminal books and case studies (for example:)
Comparable work that is specifically relevant to American public school educators is virtually non existent. Attention to ethics in education is almost exclusively focused on college level teaching in the few books devoted to the subject. The work of Nel

Noddings and Paulo Freire provide text for most topical treatments of ethics within professional studies courses that are a part of teacher preparation and neither of those authors includes specific cases nor have exclusive interest in public school teaching and its practical, ethical considerations.

The ethical behavior of teachers and public school professionals is of central importance in their work that includes not only relations with students, families and school communities, but also the veracity of their instruction, their perspectives on content, their attention to students' learning skills and deficits, what they confront and what they ignore, what they teach and what they leave out. While codes of conduct or guidelines for educators may explicitly state the expectations that teachers treat student equitably, meet the individual needs of pupils and follow the proscribed curriculum, there is little guidance and scant instruction about how one proceeds when the practical application of those values conflict with each other. That Socratic question, the fundamental one in ethics: "What ought one to do?" is fundamentally practical and those who confront it in their professional work are called to respond with practicalities of action (or inactivity). Such a resource book would not replace the present guides to educators, but would serve to enhance and provide a means for understanding in applying these guidelines. Ethical decision making is more than simply applying a code; it requires clear analytic thinking. Furthermore, the dilemmas that public schools face do not fit nicely into any guideline application. This book aims to provide a means of understanding issues and reasoning through them.

Cases to be based on real classroom and public school dilemmas should be confronted and wrestled with by pre-service and practicing teachers and other professionals whose work is in those schools. Exemplary cases representing relationships, responsibility for the individuals who make up our increasingly diverse public schools, and the pedagogy and curriculum of those schools will be included in the book. For example, we may include the case of a student teacher in a Chapel Hill middle school who was handed a note by a pupil's mother informing him that the student was to be excused from reading material discussing Hinduism as part of studies about Asia since such studies were an affront to family religious values. Or, a case may be framed around the issue of the teacher who must discuss a student's failing grades with a parent whom the teacher suspects will beat the child if such news is conveyed. Well developed cases and a framework for consideration of them would provide a much needed text to springboard the preparation and practice that educators need to deal with the myriad ethical issues that define their work as human service professionals.

The collaboration of philosophy and education is ideal for this endeavor. Philosophy provides a base for ethical decision making and education provides a base for understanding the real issues that face public school educators. With this collaboration, we believe this book will be unique in the field and serve as a resource not just for educators, but for other professionals as well.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Sunday, April 8, 2007 10:31 AM
To: Janken, Kenneth R <krjanken@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Ethics Bowl Proposal
Attach: PHIL 560 Ethics Bowl.doc

Hi Kenneth,
It was good seeing you at Lucius Outlaw's paper, and to have a few minutes to chat. Our lives are just so busy, we don't interact much with people outside our own little worlds!

Here is the proposal I sent for the Ethics Bowl Experiential Learning course. I must say I am not a fan of the online submission as once submitted I cannot review it--at least I can't figure it out!

Thanks for all your help.
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

PHIL 560 ETHICS BOWL Instructor: Jan Boxill

The Ethics Bowl provides students with a unique opportunity to practice applying the moral theories and argumentation principles that they learn in their ethics classes. They receive about 15 case studies in advance involving ethical issues in a number of practical contexts, including engineering, law, medicine, personal relationships, school and politics, both nationally and internationally. During the course the students will prepare these cases. Questions may concern ethical problems on wide ranging topics, such as the classroom (e.g. cheating or plagiarism), personal relationships (e.g. dating or friendship), professional ethics (e.g. engineering, law, medicine), or social and political ethics (e.g. free speech, gun control, etc.) or global issues (e.g. the impact of globalization, global warming, the environment). Preparing responses to these questions involves a great deal of research, writing and oral presentation. The team sent to the Ethics Bowl competition will be selected from those registered in the course. Before the actual competition, a mock Ethics Bowl will be presented to the public and also to local high schools as part of the Philosophy Department's outreach program.

During a round, each team takes turns presenting its position on a case and critiquing another team's position on a different case. Teams must answer questions about their positions from a panel of judges. Judges assign scores based on logical consistency, clarity, focus and thoroughness. The presentations are evaluated on the following criteria:

Clarity and Intelligibility: Have you stated and defended your position in a way that is logically consistent and a reader/lister can clearly understand your line of reasoning?

Focus on Ethically Relevant Factors: Has you identified and discussed the ethically relevant factors?

Avoidance of Ethical Irrelevance: Has you stayed on track by avoiding preoccupation with issues that are not ethically relevant, or as only having minor ethical relevance, in connection with a case?

Deliberative Thoughtfulness: Does your presentation of its position on a question indicate both awareness and thoughtful consideration of different viewpoints, including especially those that could loom large in the reasoning of individuals who might disagree with the team's position?

The Intercollegiate Ethics Bowl (IEB) combines the excitement and fun of a competitive tournament with a valuable educational experience for undergraduate students.

The regional competition takes place in November and national in March. The course would be offered in the Fall to prepare students for the regional competition. The actual cases are sent out in mid September, so before that the students will look at previous year's cases and read material appropriate to cases in general, including ethical theory.

READINGS to be taken from the following:

Elements of Moral Philosophy, James Rachels
Being Good, Simon Blackburn
On Liberty, John Stuart Mill
Social Ethics: Morality and Social Policy, Thomas Mappes & Jane Zembaty, editors.

Other readings will be assigned as appropriate.

REQUIREMENTS:

I. CASE PREPARATION:

Each student will prepare a minimum of two cases. Each case involves:

1. 2-3 page paper setting out the argument with ethical implications.
2. Present argument to class- 5 minute presentation. Other students write a critique of the presentation with suggested revisions, readings, and research.
3. Revised paper based upon class presentation, discussion, and student critiques. Revised paper will also include an analysis of one aspect of the argument. 3-5 pages which will include bibliography and field research plans.
4. Present revised argument along with analysis: 5-7 minutes. Critiques.
5. Revised paper based on previous discussion. Revised paper will also include analysis of second aspect of the argument: 5-7 pages.
6. Present revised argument along with analysis: 5-7 minutes. Critiques
7. Revised paper based on previous discussion. Revised paper will include objections to your analysis.
8. Present revised argument: 5-7 minutes.
9. Revised paper with completed philosophical analysis: 12-15 pages
10. Oral presentation of completed analysis:
    8 minutes for presentation
    5 minutes for questions
    5-7 minutes rebuttal.

II. EXPERIENTIAL MENTORED RESEARCH STUDY:

1. For each case, students will contact appropriate units for essential background to investigate original problems and gain information regarding the case to be incorporated in the presentations and drafts. Throughout the experience, the work will be supervised and mentored by instructor and Parr Center Visiting Professor, who will assist students with setting appropriate goals. Research will also be assisted by the Parr Center graduate research fellow and the unit head or designate. [E.g. For legal cases, it would involve working with the DA office].

Expected minimum hours: 60

2. Three mock Ethics Bowl competitions: one to the Department/University, and two in local high schools as part of the Department's Outreach Program.

III. FINAL EXAM—In class

Two components: written and oral

GRADE: The final grade will be assessed as follows:

Papers:	30%
Presentations:	30%
Class participation &critiques:	20%
Final Exam:	20%

The course will be limited to 15 students per term.

WEEKLY ASSIGNMENTS:

Week 1:	Readings: Rachels: Chapters 1- & Blackburn Chapters 1- Discuss readings and cases. Assign cases. Discuss appropriate research units.
Week 2:	Readings: Mill, On Liberty; Mappes One-two page reconstruction of the arguments of your cases Five minute oral presentation of the reconstruction Feedback and suggestions from class.
Week 3:	Re-write the reconstruction given the feedback from class. Prepare a bibliography of selected readings appropriate to your cases Present both the re-write and bibliography to the class. Receive student feedback and suggestions.
Week 4:	Annotated bibliography. 1-2 page showing the relevant facts of the case.
Weeks 5-8:	Presentations, discussions,
Week 9-11	Mock Ethics Bowl Competitions
Week 12:	In class discussions in preparation for National Competition.
Week 13:	National Ethics Bowl Competition
Week 14:	Debriefing and discussion of Ethics Bowl Competition; review for final exam.

Sample Cases:

Case #1

Dr. B., a Professor of Psychology at a large research institution, Ohio State University (OSU), has a long distinguished record of working with chimpanzees. In the 1970s, she taught chimps to communicate, first by using American Sign Language and later using graphic symbols. In the last decade, under her direction, two young chimps, Keeli and Ivy, have learned to count and to recognize simple written words. Another chimp, Bobby, has shown an uncanny ability to learn number sequences and even to fill in missing numbers in a sequence. She has learned that chimps can do simple arithmetic, behave similarly to preschoolers, and (along with humans) have the ability to perceive the knowledge state of a peer.

Dr. B., who has dedicated her entire professional life to the study of cognition in chimpanzees, has won international acclaim for her work and was named one of the top 50 women researchers in the nation by Discover Magazine in 2002. Her chimps have been featured on Discovery Channel. However, as funding to support the research center has been hard to come by in the last five years, the university decided to close the research center and send the chimps away. OSU abruptly seized the professor's laboratory on February 28, 2006, changed all the locks, and hired a truck to send all 12 primates (nine chimps and three monkeys) to Primarily Primates, a controversial Texas sanctuary. The university gave the sanctuary a $324,000 trust fund for the animal's care.

Dr. B. vigorously protested the decision. When a restraining order she filed failed to prevent the university from implementing its decision, Dr. B. chained herself to the center's gate to prevent the transport trucks from leaving. Her efforts were unsuccessful and one of the chimps, 25-year old Kermit, died during the 38-hour transport in early March. Bobby was found dead in his enclosure on April 20. One of the monkeys escaped and was never recovered. Dr. B sued OSU to win custody of the remaining chimps. PETA also joined the suit on behalf of the remaining seven chimps and two monkeys and in June a Texas judge ordered that an independent trustee should oversee the $324,000 funding to ensure that it be used to house and benefit the remaining OSU primates.

Case #2

Wisconsin State Representative Dan LeMahieu (R-Oostburg) was outraged when the University of Wisconsin-Madison's University Health Services (UHS) featured ads in the two student newspapers suggesting that students consider receiving prescriptions for emergency contraception (EC) prior to leaving for spring break. UHS services are available to any student at the UW-Madison, and as such they offer health expertise to students in the areas of medical treatment for illnesses and injuries, counseling for stress reduction, smoking cessation, nutrition, dermatology, sports medicine, as well as confidential testing and treatment of sexually transmitted diseases (STDs). Although a part of the state-funded University of Wisconsin System, the ads were paid for using student segregated fees which are not part of taxpayer dollars or academic tuition funds.

Following the publication of the ads, which were part of a series also advising students to protect themselves from sun exposure and limit their intake of alcohol, Representative LeMahieu initiated drafting legislation to ban any university health center in Wisconsin from advertising or distributing the morning-after pill (EC). LeMahieu contends, "I think it's offensive that the university is trying to tell young women to be prepared and to plan ahead so they can have promiscuous activities on spring break. I don't think that it's the role of the university to promote that type of activity, and I believe that's what their ad is asking young people to do." LeMahieu also added that the UW should be "made aware" that many people who are paying state taxes do not appreciate the offensive advertisements.

On June 16, 2005, Wisconsin's State Assembly voted 49-41 in favor of a bill prohibiting University of Wisconsin System health centers from advertising, prescribing or dispensing emergency contraception, making it the first state in the country to move towards banning EC on all state college campuses.

Case #3

Near the end of its fall season, a top executive from the popular reality television competition, Idol Starz, appeared on the Today Show and revealed that the program's contestants either advanced or were cut based on producers' decisions rather than being selected through the program's public text-messaging voting system. The executive went on to state that the show's winners and losers were selected by producers on a round-by-round basis in the hopes that certain "controversial" or "questionable" choices would positively influence ratings, increase fervor for underdog candidates, and create a more developed fan-base which would return to view the show during both current and future seasons.

Given the show's popularity and viewers' commitment to their favorite contestants, the revelation led to a large public outcry condemning the show for dishonesty and false advertising. Many claimed to have been cheated and explained that the show had a responsibility to adhere to the public's decisions about which candidates they preferred. Given special attention during this debate was the show's slogan: "You vote. You decide. Who should be the next Idol Star?"

During ensuing interviews, the show's producers explained that their decisions were based on the fact that they were in the entertainment business and that certain unpredictable events helped to keep the audience invested in the show and provided increased entertainment value. They also argued that, more often that not, their decisions about who should advance or win were in line with the public's desires. When questioned about the program's slogan, one producer was quoted as saying, "Look at it carefully. There is a difference between telling someone to vote and decide who should be the next Idol Star and telling them that their votes will decide the next Idol Star."

Case #4

In a recent case, Florida authorities declined to file charges against a Miami Herald columnist for surreptitiously recording a phone call from a city commissioner who later committed suicide in the newspaper's lobby. Authorities cited the unusual circumstances that led to the taping as the basis for not filing charges against the columnist. These circumstances were not enough for the Miami Herald, who took immediate action to fire the columnist for violating a company policy that prohibited the taping of sources and interviewees without the subject's consent.

State laws related to the recording of phone calls and the courts interpretation of these laws vary widely in the United States. Many of these laws are intentionally written with ambiguous terms and interpretation is typically required on a case by case basis.

The firing of this popular columnist caused much protest around the world. Many members of the Herald staff signed a petition requesting the decision to fire the columnist be rescinded. The columnist was friends with the city commissioner, and the commissioner provided regular sources for stories to the columnist.

According to the columnist, the commissioner was despondent over public allegations about his sex life and the tone of his voice on the phone conversation was so alarming that the columnist impulsively decided to record the conversation. The tape records the columnist's attempts to calm the commissioner. Throughout their 20-minute conversation, the columnist attempted to steer the conversation to less volatile subjects in the hopes of lifting the commissioner's spirits. But the call ended with the commissioner still despondent. A few minutes later, the commissioner shot himself.

Following the suicide, the columnist told editors of the Miami Herald that he had been interviewing the commissioner earlier in the day and had recorded part of the conversation without the commissioner's consent.

After being fired, the columnist was quoted as saying "In a tense situation I made a mistake. The Miami Herald executives only learned about it because I came to them and admitted it. I told them I was willing to accept a suspension and apologize both to the newsroom and our readers. Unfortunately, the Herald decided on the death penalty instead."

The Miami Herald editors have taken the position that there must be an absolute prohibition of the paper's reporters taping conversations without a party's consent, and not just because it is against the law in Florida, as it is in many states. An executive of the Herald has stated that the policy is necessary to protect the paper's integrity, as well as to foster trust from news sources.

Journalists at the Miami Herald have pointed out that at least one other reporter surreptitiously taped an interview, but was not fired. The journalists also have also stated that there is no written policy on taping conversations and that any verbal policy on expectations of reporters is unclear. The Miami Herald responded to the alleged case of a previous surreptitious taping by saying "we understand this happened 18 years ago". They went onto state that the recent decision to fire the columnist was clearly guided by the environment in which journalists operate today; which is much more constrained in terms of the latitude given for violation of law and policy.

Case #5

Beginning in 2005, protests at funerals for military personnel killed in Iraq have been increasing – and have received much media attention. In particular, members of the Westboro Baptist Church, in Topeka, Kansas, have been especially visible and vocal at many of these military funerals. Reverend Fred Phelps and his protesters claim that U.S. military deaths in Iraq are because America tolerates homosexuals and that they are a sign of divine punishment for America's tolerance of homosexuality. For over a year now, members of this anti-gay church have been crisscrossing the United States, holding more than one hundred protests outside the funerals of U.S. soldiers killed in Iraq.

They wave placards with such expressions as: "You're Going to Hell," "Fag Vets, God Hates You," and "Thank God for IEDs" (the improvised explosive devices responsible for killing many military personnel in Iraq). Phelps contends that all American soldiers are guilty by association – because they are fighting in the service of the U.S. government.

By Spring, 2006, twenty-eight states and Congress were rushing to pass laws to restrict protests outside military funerals. On May 17, 2006, Illinois Governor Rod Blagojevich signed a state law – "Let Them Rest in Peace Act" – that prohibits disruptive and inflammatory protesting 30 minutes before a funeral, during the service, and 30 minutes after a funeral while remaining 200 feet from the funeral site. This new Illinois law drew immediate scorn from Shirley Phelps-Roper, attorney for the Westboro Baptist Church: "The law is impotent. You've done nothing to change that God is killing your children and sending them home in body bags. Keep your big, fat snout out of our religion."

In the U.S. Congress, Representative Mike Rogers (R-Mich.) sponsored a House bill to address this matter. He said that he took up the issue after attending a military funeral in his home state, where mourners were greeted by "chants and taunting and some of the most vile things I have ever heard. Families deserve the time to bury their American heroes with dignity and in peace." On May 24, 2006, Congress passed legislation that would bar demonstrators from disrupting military funerals at national cemeteries.

The "Respect for America's Fallen Heroes Act" prohibits protests within 300 feet of the entrance of a national cemetery and within 150 feet of a road into the cemetery from 60 minutes before to 60 minutes after a funeral. Those violating the act would face up to a $100,000 fine and up to a year in prison. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said that this act "will protect the sanctity of all 122 of our national cemeteries as shrines to their gallant dead. It's a sad but necessary measure to protect what should be recognized by all reasonable people as a solemn, private and deeply sacred occasion."

In response to this federal legislation, Phelps has said that Congress was "blatantly violating the First Amendment rights to free speech" in passing the bill. He said that he will continue to demonstrate but would abide by the restrictions. Constitutional experts are warning that protest restrictions – such as those passed in Illinois and in Congress – appear overly broad and are likely to be overturned if challenged in court. Eugene Volokh, a law professor at the University of California-Los Angeles and an authority on the First Amendment, said: "You can't treat speech as a breach of peace simply because it offends people. These protests are tremendously offensive and hard to ignore. But ignoring them or counter-protesting is unfortunately the only remedy the 1st Amendment allows." And, the American Civil Liberties Union has filed a lawsuit against a new Kentucky law, saying that it goes too far in limiting freedom of speech and expression. Additional lawsuits are expected to be filed.

U.S military veterans find Phelps' beliefs and actions particularly abhorrent, and in November, 2005, veterans' motorcycle groups began showing up at military funerals to oppose the protesters and to show support for the families of the deceased soldiers. Calling themselves the Patriot Guard Riders, these motorcycle groups have organized hundreds of counter-protesters to wave American flags and stand silently in front of the Westboro picketers, to pay respects to the fallen soldier, and to protect the soldier's family from disruptions.

Case #6

Alejandro Toledo, President of Peru, has launched a public campaign demanding that Yale University return to Peru Incan artifacts excavated at Machu Picchu in 1912. Yale professor Hiram Bingham III, guided by a native Peruvian, came upon the Incan city of Machu Picchu in 1911. Bingham secured backing from the National Geographic Society and support from Peru's government for archeological excavations at Machu Picchu in 1912 and again in 1914-15.

In October 1912, Bingham gained the Peruvian government's permission to bring to Yale for research the contents of 170 tombs in Machu Picchu. The decree allowed that Peru reserve the right to ask for the return of the objects.

By 1916, Peru, suspecting Bingham of secretly taking Incan gold, ended Bingham's work at Machu Picchu. The items taken to Yale from the 1914-15 excavations were loaned for only 18 months. Yale has refused several Peruvian requests for return of the artifacts.

Today, Yale claims that they have complied with the 1912 and the 1916 agreements, returning the objects to Peru during the 1920's. Yale sees no similar responsibility to return the items taken from earlier work. National Geographic Society records show that about half of the items were returned to Peru, with no mention of the remaining artifacts.

Luis Guillermo Lumbreras, the director of Peru's National Institute of Culture in Lima, claims that Yale has had 90 years to complete research on the objects, and now Peru wants the items returned. Peru elected its first indigenous president–Alejandro Toledo, who honored the nation's Incan heritage by holding part of his inauguration ceremony at Machu Picchu in 2001. In part due to his influence, Peru wants possession of the artifacts, which have formed the core of Yale's impressive, scholarly exhibition: Unveiling the Mystery of the Incas. After traveling to six cities and attracting over a million visitors, the exhibit now resides at Yale's Peabody Museum of Natural History in Connecticut.

The recent research of Yale professors Lucy Salazar and her husband Richard L. Burger, including extensive scientific analysis of burials, has provided the most reasonable explanation for the existence of Machu Picchu. Rather than supporting the earlier ideas of the city as a center for religious activity including the sacrifice of virgins, the professors' research has suggested that the city served as a simple country retreat from the Inca capital of Cuzco.

The number and kinds of artifacts taken to Yale from Machu Picchu is in dispute. Yale has offered to return some of the pieces to Peru, if Peru allows it to keep others at the Peabody Museum of Natural History, where Machu Picchu is the prize exhibit.

Case #7

In October of 2002, after the overdose of one of its workers, management at a Weyerhaeuser, a multinational corporation in the pulp and paper industry located in Valliant, Oklahoma, became concerned that employees were not following drug and safety regulations in its parking lot. Management decided to have the parking lot searched with gun and drug sniffing dogs. While the dogs found no drugs, they did find firearms in twelve vehicles, including shotguns and automatic weapons. The owners of these vehicles, including a 23-year veteran shift manager, were fired in the next two days.

Weyerhaeuser and many other businesses have had long standing bans on firearms brought into the plant in order to protect workers and prevent workplace violence. In 2002, Weyerhaeuser extended this ban to the parking lot. Many workers claim they were not told of the extension of the ban, though management claims they informed workers. Some of the fired workers have filed suits claiming they were not informed. The initial suit was thrown out, but the decision is being appealed.

Since this and other incidents, many states -- beginning with Oklahoma -- have enacted laws protecting workers who want to keep firearms in their cars. The latest state to consider such a law is Florida, home to Walt Disney World, which does not allow any of its 50,000+ employees to bring guns onto company property.

A number of corporations have joined federal lawsuits against these new state laws. These companies include ConocoPhillips (petroleum), Halliburton (energy), and the Nordam Group (aircraft manufacture). They state that they cannot provide a safe and secure workplace without the ban on guns in the parking lot, and they see state laws allowing guns as infringing on the right of private property owners to decide what is and is not allowed on their property. Even aside from their property rights, companies claim that the laws would disregard public safety. The Bureau of Labor Statistics Census of Fatal Occupational Injuries states that in 2004, there were 551 workplace homicides out of 5703 workplace fatalities. A study at the University of North Carolina claims that such killings are five times more likely to occur at workplaces that allow guns compared to those who do not.

The National Rifle Association (NRA) has been the primary champion of laws that allow workers to have guns in cars in company parking lots. The NRA claims that prohibiting lawful gun owners to keep guns in their car dramatically diminishes their right to own firearms and defend themselves. All 50 states allow the transportation of firearms for lawful purposes. The laws also restrict workers who may want to hunt or target shoot after work from engaging in these lawful activities. They also claim that one's car should enjoy the same protections that one's home enjoys with regards to being able to keep lawful weapons and immunity to unlawful searches.

The NRA claims that the state laws already have commonsense provisions in them that prevent abuse. For instance, anyone wanting to transport a firearm and park their car in a company lot must keep the automobile locked, and at no time is it permissible to take the firearm out of the car on company property. Against the property rights claims of business owners, the NRA claims that business owners are already under extensive federal, state, and local regulations about what they can do with their property and that striking down these state laws would allow companies to "micro-manage" the contents of an employee's automobile. The NRA also cites statistics that 84% of workplace murders are committed by strangers, and anyone determined to commit a crime will not be discouraged from bringing the gun onto company property by a company regulation prohibiting guns in parking lots.

Case #8

After several years of miscarriages, Edward and Susan turn to in vitro fertilization as a means of screening embryos for genetic defects. More than two years elapse, with all the attendant discomfort and expense, but finally an “acceptable” embryo is produced and implanted. To their joy, nine months later they are blessed by Michelle, an apparently happy, healthy baby.

They decide that they will not tempt fate by trying to increase their family, instead choosing to relish the raising of their daughter. Five years pass and they eagerly anticipate Michelle's starting kindergarten. They have elected to enroll her in a well-respected private school so as to realize her fullest potential. Part of the school's pre-entry preparation is an extremely thorough set of physical examinations. (The physical examinations are not done to screen for admission, but rather to anticipate potential health issues while the student is enrolled.)

To their horror, the examinations determine that Michelle has early symptoms of a particularly virulent form of Acute Childhood Lymphoid Leukemia. Nothing in the embryonic screening could have predicted its occurrence. They begin immediate conventional treatments which prove to be ineffective. At their oncologist's recommendation they enroll her in the nation's premier pediatric oncology program. She gives them the bad news that Michelle shows evidence of having Philadelphia chromosome-positive ALL. The most successful treatment involves hematopoietic stem cell transplantation from matching relatives. The oncology clinic tests both Edward and Susan, but finds neither of them compatible. Since neither of them (nor Michelle) has any siblings, it looks as if they will have to hope for a million-to-one chance of finding a well-matched unrelated donor.

While waiting in the lounge of the clinic, the mother of another child under treatment introduces herself and suggests that they do have another option – they could have another child, via in vitro, selecting among possible embryos for compatibility for transplant. Initially they are horrified at the idea of producing another child as a "biological stockpile" for Michelle, but the more they think about it the better the idea seems. After all, they really had wanted more children. The new child wouldn't be seriously injured by the procedure needed to provide Michelle with the transplant material she so desperately needs. Given their history of medical procedures needed to have Michelle, the screening required to make sure the new child would be a compatible donor is almost the same as if they were just having another child as a family expansion.

When they raise the possibility with Michelle's physician, she explains that the screening technology has improved sufficiently since Michelle's birth to guard against the new child's having the same disposition toward this disease. But, before she will go further, she tells them they must speak with the clinic's counselor. The counselor asks them to consider what their true motives are in proposing the conception of this second child, whether they would be treating her as a person or as an object and how they will explain to her the reason for her conception.

Case #9

After 25-30 years of service, ships are at the end of their sailing life and are sold as "End of Life Vessels" to be dismantled primarily to recover the valuable steel which makes up about 95% of the ship. Ship breaking (or ship demolition) is the process of dismantling the structure of an obsolete vessel for scrapping or disposal and includes a wide range of activities, from removing all gear and equipment to cutting down and recycling the ship's infrastructure. However, the only ones who profit from ship breaking are the ship owners. They extract an average of $1.9 million profit per "End of Life Vessel." Ship breaking is also a challenging and controversial process, due to the structural complexity of ships and the many environmental, safety, and health issues involved.

Ship breaking is dangerous and has the reputation of being one of the dirtiest jobs on earth. For minimal dollars a day, workers with little protective gear tear out pipes insulated with asbestos, transformers covered with PCBs, and leaky diesel tanks. Until the late twentieth century, ship breaking took place primarily in port cities in developed countries – including the United States and Europe. Today, however, most ship breaking yards are in developing countries – especially India, China, Bangladesh, and Pakistan. This is due to rules dealing with lead paint and toxic substances. The industry was such a disgrace that, in 2000, Congress acted to stop U.S. registered ships from being sent overseas for scrap. Ship breaking remains an international environmental and labor concern - because ship breaking now occurs mostly in underdeveloped countries where working conditions and environmental impact are not regulated. Also, many ships being scrapped now were made before many international environmental laws were enacted.

In late 2005, a Virginia-based company, Bay Bridge Enterprises, visited the small coastal town of Newport, Oregon, and proposed opening a ship breaking plant on the banks of Yaquina Bay. The company offered up to 125 jobs paying $20 an hour. Their spokesperson indicated that the company had no environmental violations since they have been doing this work, and that they had zero lost-time injuries since 2001. Also, he noted that there is no large-scale ship breaking yard on the West Coast, and that there are about 60 ships anchored in a California bay – just waiting to be moved to a scrap yard. Therefore, there would be plenty of work available at a new ship breaking plant in Newport – for some time to come.

A strong coalition of interested parties in the Newport area emerged in opposition to this proposal. The "Friends of Yaquina Bay" were the group of people most responsible for rallying the community together to try to stop this ship breaking proposal. The Oregon Coast Aquarium and the Oregon State University Hatfield Marine Science Center – both located in Newport – also added major support to the effort to block the proposed plant. Some of the major issues raised by these opponents to the proposal included: the world-wide negative reputation of ship breaking; the safety of towing "ghost ships" (some with a length of up to 540 feet) from San Francisco Bay in California to Newport, Oregon; potential infestation of as many as 100 invasive species on the ships in California that are not in Yaquina Bay; toxins on and in the ships that would escape into the bay and the air, affecting the seafood industry – especially crabbing – as well as the fear of pollution runoff at the Hatfield Marine Science Center and the Oregon Coast Aquarium; and visual pollution. Yaquina Bay is a continentally Important Bird Area – with several endangered species present. There are 15 or more blue heron nests and other bird species on the tide flats near the proposed ship breaking site. The local tides extend 15 miles up the Yaquina River and thus the largest oyster farm in Oregon could be affected. Plus there is fear that money-spending tourists would not view these rusting ships as an asset to the beautiful Oregon coast.

On January 24, 2006, about 200 people packed a meeting room in Newport, Oregon, to hear Mr. Don Mann, general manager of the Port of Newport, announce that "some projects are a good fit, or not a fit at all. Bay Bridge's plan for a ship breaking facility in Yaquina Bay does not qualify in our test for a good fit." Thus, quite surprisingly, it seems, the ship breaking plan for Newport was ended. Mr. Mann continued: "This was not a good business deal for the company, or for the Port. I believe that the environmental issues could have been resolved, but our financial concerns could not be adequately addressed." The vast majority of persons at the meeting were very pleased with this decision.

While this issue was being considered by the town of Newport, Oregon, the office of the Port Commissioners received hundreds of telephone calls of concern – from all over the country. As one commissioner said: "We have gained much free advertising – for the port and community. The whole world knows we're here. This issue is bringing this concern to Oregon, and to the nation." Bay Bridge's next move on the West Coast remains to be seen. The company is still looking for a possible Oregon or Washington port.

Case #10

Ardent R. Porter is an investigatory journalist with a respected Washington-area newspaper, Capitol News Briefly. As a reporter working in and around the D.C. area, Mr. Porter often relies on his long list of contacts in order to glean information that might be useful for the various articles he publishes on corruption within politics and government. By establishing relationships with individuals at all levels of government, Ardent has provided himself with valuable human sources that are often capable of providing him with names, tips, or other information that he could not extract from other channels. Furthermore, a few of Mr. Porter's key contacts are able to pass along hard-to-come-by information about questionable or downright illegal actions taken by government employees or agencies.

One such contact is Ian Stalwart, a mid-level agency administrator who works with individuals who do government "groundwork" as well as with high-level government bureaucrats. As a middleman of sorts, Ian is in a position uniquely suited to evaluating the actions of those who work both below and above him. One of Mr. Stalwart's responsibilities is to watch for and report any illegal activity that he might encounter. Mr. Stalwart takes this role very seriously and his responsibilities as a watchdog were what originally led him to seek out Ardent, a like-minded opponent of corruption and illegality within public service.

It so happened that Mr. Stalwart discovered that many individuals within his agency were working to cover up illegally-awarded, over-billed, or otherwise fraudulent government contracts awarded during the early months of the Iraq War, actions which were in violation of several federal laws, in addition to many agency standards. Upon presenting his discovery to his superiors, Mr. Stalwart was told to disregard his findings and to refrain from further discussing the subject. After pressing for a more sophisticated explanation, he was informed that the contracts in question had been deemed classified through appropriate agency and congressional channels and that because the contracts had been deemed to serve a compelling national security interest, it would be against agency policy (as well as illegal) to discuss them, regardless of any questionable procedural or substantive aspects.

Fully knowing that he was in violation of laws regarding the disclosure of classified information, Mr. Stalwart approached Mr. Porter and revealed everything he knew about the dubious contracts. He also provided Mr. Porter with the names of the individuals implicated in the cover-ups and the names of the administrators who had ordered him to remain silent.

After composing a lengthy and revealing story, Mr. Porter approached his editor about publishing the story, explaining the dilemma presented by the fact that much, if not all, of the story's core material was classified. Following a discussion about publishing the article by the paper's editorial board it was decided that the story would run in the paper's next issue.

Case #11

Students in schools of medicine, nursing, dentistry and veterinary medicine are required to observe actual surgeries (and other procedures) early in their educations as a preliminary exposure to the practices of their field. In fact, such study is thought to be essential in confirming the students' choice of profession. Of course, the observation takes place with the informed consent of the patients (or their guardians). Many pre-medical, pre-nursing, pre-dentistry, and pre-veterinary programs, especially at schools with associated hospitals, are beginning to recommend (or even require) similar observation programs.

The State University Museum has one of the nation's premier exhibits of the history of medicine and allied fields. They include displays replicating Leonardo's anatomy studies, teaching materials from Charles University (in Prague) dating from the 16th century, 18th century "bleeding," and 19th century nutrition studies (among many other presentations).
One of the most popular offerings at the museum is the "surgery room" where films of common surgical procedures can be viewed. Like the student viewing in medical schools, the patients shown have given their informed consent. Not surprisingly, the most identifiable attendees are people who are considering having the operations shown in the pictures. The films have been "sanitized" so that excess gore is avoided, but the surgeries are shown in detail.

Dr. Suarez, curator of the museum and retired professor of neurosurgery, has proposed to the board that rather than using films, which are hard to make and quickly become outdated, observers should be allowed to observe actual, in process surgeries on persons who have consented. After all, the University Hospital is adjacent to the museum and access is convenient. The hospital's operating theaters are set up above the surgical floor but separated from the patient and surgical team by sound- and atmosphere-proof windows. Dr. Suarez suggests that such watching could become a significant educational revenue-generating operation. He points out that special exhibits commonly serve as important financial resources for museums.

When Dr. Suarez proposes this program to the Museum's board of directors, Katherine Osborn (one of the community members of the board) objects vigorously. Although Dr. Suarez's proposal clearly restricts participation to persons "15 and older," Ms. Osborn argues that teens, and perhaps others, will attend surgeries not as education but as entertainment. Her position is that such "exhibitions" will be little better than the "bum fights" and ultraviolent films that have gained popularity in recent years. Ms. Osborn claims that teens will watch surgeries as a replacement for the gore seen while attending the Halloween and Nightmare on Elm Street movies. Her claim is that such actions are exploitative more than educational.

Dr. Suarez responds that actual surgeries come nowhere near the gore commonly shown on TV and in the movies. He points out that we seldom know what motivates people to act as they do in the presence of human affliction. "Do people slow their cars when passing accidents in order to see whether they can help or to see blood and gore? How would we know? Even if an adolescent attended a surgery out of a desire to see gore, might the experience not shift his or her perspective, creating an interest in becoming a medical professional?"

Case #12

Politicians have crossed the floor, or switched parties for as long as political parties have been in place—famous switches include those of Strom Thurmond, Ronald Reagan, Condoleezza Rice, Howard Dean, Hilary Clinton and most recently, Joe Lieberman. In 2001, nine serving members of Congress had switched parties while in office. Various reasons are cited for changing parties, including ideological disagreement with one's current party and moving to improve power and legislative efficacy, among others. U.S. Representative Ralph Hall of the Fourth Congressional District in Texas cites both reasons.

Ralph Hall was first elected in 1980 as a Democrat and has been re-elected each succeeding year. Hall has made a reputation for himself as a rogue Democrat, willing to "cross the aisle" and vote with Republicans when he agreed with their position. He also has been an avid supporter of President Bush, opposed to Democratic bids to unseat him. But it was more than mere ideological agreement that encouraged a decision to switch parties in early 2004 before his bid for reelection.

As Hall stated in a January 2004 press release that announced his decision to switch parties, "This year I was denied requests for district appropriations because I was a Democrat who voted against the bill. I have always stated that … if being a Democrat hurt my district, I would either resign or switch parties." The bill to which he was referring was a "foreign operations bill" which, according to Hall, gave, "financial support to those countries that continue to vote against [the U.S.] in the United Nations."

Another motivation may be found in Hall's appreciation for being spared a potentially career devastating blow in the redistricting that cost many Democrats their seats in 2003. According to a CNN article, "…Hall's move comes after Republican state lawmakers in Austin spared him in a redistricting map that targets every other Anglo Democrat in the House. His district, based in the city of Tyler, was largely untouched by the GOP-drawn map, which is currently facing a Democratic court challenge."

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Sunday, April 8, 2007 7:24 PM
To: Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>
Subject: Grant Proposal
Attach: Humanities grant application.doc

Geoff,
Suzanne Gulledge and I are submitting a grant proposal for an Ethics in Education project. If you are so inclined, could you write a letter of support for the proposal for us to submit with our proposal to the Vice-Provost. She has a letter from her Dean of Education. The only problem is that the proposal is due on Tuesday.
I'm attaching a draft of the proposal which shows edits. If you have any suggestions, we would welcome them as well.

Thanks,
Jan

April 5, 2007

Vice Chancellor Tony Waldrop
Office of Research and Economic Development
University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

Dear Vice Chancellor Waldrop:

Following is a request for an award to support scholarship and research for a project related to ethics and the preparation and professional development of teachers. The proposed activity would involve collaboration of a professor in philosophy, Jan Boxill, and a professor in education, Suzanne Gulledge, to develop a resource book on ethical reasoning and decision making that is specifically applicable to the work of public school teachers, administrators, and counselors. The aim is to incorporate narratives of real cases and dilemmas that face our public school personnel and to provide a framework for analyzing them.[See format below] We further aim to inform our recommendations through a study of the processes and the outcomes of a humanities project that began with the work of a few scholars, much as we aim to begin, in Australia in 1998 as the multicultural public schools faced issues of conflicting ethical cultures and a crisis related to achievement of all students. Upon completion of this project, in cooperation with the Parr Center for Ethics, we will sponsor seminars and workshops for public school teachers using this resource book as the base of the discussion, as well as include the material in an Ethics in Education class.

At present, there exists a significant void in the literature related to ethics and teaching that specifically addresses public school teaching. The proposed articles and book that will proceed from this award will be useful in several contexts and for a varied audience: in the pre-service training of teachers; as text for college and university faculty members who are teacher educators; to inform state education agencies that oversee professional licensing; in the ongoing professional development of practicing teachers and to administrators who oversee the work of classroom teachers in public schools; and for anyone interested in applied ethics and the professions.

Scholarship related to ethics in other professions- medicine, law, and business has yielded a number of seminal books and case studies [For example: Bioethics: Health Care Law and Ethics (American Casebook Series); Bioethics: A Casebook; Policies and Persons: A Casebook in Business Ethics; On Moral Business: Classical and Contemporary Resources for Ethics in Economic Life; Law, Medicine and Ethics (University Casebook Series])

Comparable work that is specifically relevant to American public school educators is virtually non existent. Attention to ethics in education is almost exclusively focused on college level teaching in the few books devoted to the subject. The work of Nel Noddings and Paulo Freire provide text for most topical treatments of ethics within professional studies courses that are a part of teacher preparation and neither of those authors includes specific cases nor have exclusive interest in public school teaching and its practical, ethical considerations.

The ethical behavior of teachers and public school professionals is of central importance in their work that includes not only relations with students, families and school communities, but also the veracity of their instruction, their perspectives on content, their attention to students' learning skills and deficits, what they confront and what they ignore, what they teach and what they leave out. While codes of conduct or guidelines for educators may explicitly state the expectations that teachers treat student equitably, meet the individual needs of pupils and follow the proscribed curriculum, there is little guidance and scant instruction about how one proceeds when the practical application of those values conflict with each other. That Socratic question, the fundamental one in ethics: "What ought one to do?" is fundamentally practical and those who confront it in their professional work are called to respond with practicalities of action (or inactivity). Such a resource book would not replace the present guides to educators, but would serve to enhance and provide a means for understanding in applying these guidelines. Ethical decision making is more than simply applying a code; it requires clear analytic thinking. Furthermore, the dilemmas that public schools face do not fit nicely into any guideline application. This book aims to provide a means of understanding issues and reasoning through them.

Cases to be based on real classroom and public school dilemmas should be confronted and wrestled with by pre-service and practicing teachers and other professionals whose work is in those schools. Exemplary cases representing relationships, responsibility for the individuals who make up our increasingly diverse public schools, and the pedagogy and curriculum of those schools will be included in the book. For example, we may include the case of a student teacher in a Chapel Hill middle school who was handed a note by a pupil's mother informing him that the student was to be excused from reading material discussing Hinduism as part of studies about Asia since such studies were an affront to family religious values. Or, a case may be framed around the issue of the teacher who must discuss a student's failing grades with a parent whom the teacher suspects will beat the child if such news is conveyed. Well developed cases and a framework for consideration of them would provide a much needed text to springboard the preparation and practice that educators need to deal with the myriad ethical issues that define their work as human service professionals.

The collaboration of philosophy and education is ideal for this endeavor. Philosophy provides a base for ethical decision making and education provides a base for understanding the real issues that face public school educators. With this collaboration, we believe this book will be unique in the field and serve as a resource for educators, and serve as a model for other professionals as well.

FORMAT FOR:

DO NO INJUSTICE: A Resource Book in Ethics in Education for K-12

I. Introduction

II. Distinctions between Ethics and Non-ethics
- A. Ethics and Religion
- B. Ethics and Social Conventions
- C. Ethics and the Law

III. Ethical Reasoning
- A. Obstacles
- B. Four Perspectives from which to analyze any issue
- C. Moral Courage
- D. Ethical Decision Making

IV. Brief Examination of Ethical Theories and Principles used in Ethical Reasoning
- A. Relativism
- B. Utilitarianism
- C. Kantian Deontology
- D. Virtue Ethics
- E. Social Contractarianism
- F. Ethics of Care

V. Cases

VI. Breakdown and analysis of sample cases

VII. Guidance overview

VIII. The Future of Ethics in Education

IX: About the Authors
Jan Boxill, Director of the Parr Center for Ethics, Senior Lecturer in Philosophy
Suzanne Gulledge, Clinical Professor, School of Education

Formatted: Underline, Font color: Black, Highlight

TA ASSIGNMENT REQUEST FORM FOR FALL 2007

NAME:_____

I intend to return to the Department and I wish to be considered for a teaching assignment: Yes No

I intend to return to the Department and will be funded by a non teaching fellowship: Yes No

I will be a fifth year student next year and wish to be considered for a dissertation fellowship: Yes No

If you answered "yes" please rank your preferences taking into account your qualifications, your own educational needs and the seminars you plan to take. A Teaching Fellow must have been a TA at UNC for at least two semesters. Rank 1-6, with "1" being your first choice.

TEACHING ASSISTANT

_____	101	Intro to Main Problems	Large Section (4)	Neta	11 MW; F-10 & 11
_____	112	Making Sense of Ourselves	Large Section (4)	Reeve	12 MW F- 12 & 1
_____	272	Peace, War, Defense	Large Section (2)	B. Boxill	12 MW F- 12 & 1

TEACHING FELLOWS

_____	101E	Intro: Main Problems	MW 6-7:15	[Evening Class]
_____	110	Intro: Great Works	TR 3:30
_____	134	Philosophy of Religion	MWF 2
_____	155	Intro to Logic	TR 8
_____	155	Intro to Logic	TR 11
_____	160	Intro to Ethics	TR 8
_____	160	Intro to Ethics	MWF 2
_____	164	Morality and Business	TR 12:30
_____	165	Bioethics	MWF 9
_____	165	Bioethics	TR 6-7:15	[regular class just taught in evening]
_____	170	Social & Political	TR 9:30
_____	230	Experience and Reality	TR 8
_____	230	Experience and Reality	TR 3:30
_____	280	Morality in Law	TR 3:30

Something to keep in mind as you fill this out: The large classes in the Spring 2008 for which we will need TAs are: PHIL 160-Intro to Ethics [4]; PHIL 150-Intro to Philosophy of Science[2 or 4]; and PHIL 163-Practical Ethics [4]; PHIL 155-Intro to Logic [4]

Have you taken Phil 102 or 112? _____ Phil 101?_____

Please indicate your relevant teaching experience to date and any other considerations you would like us to keep in mind when determining your assignment for next term. E.g. If you have not been a TA for a course, but believe you are qualified to teach it, please explain. (Use space below or back of this sheet for other considerations) Feel free to add additional comments.

PLEASE RETURN TO JAN BOXILL NO LATER THAN: April 9, 2007

ABORTION OUTLINE-1

I. ROE v. WADE -- 1973 Supreme Court Decision

A. Supreme Court Cases

1. Preceded by: GRISWALD case in 1965
   EISENSTADT case in 1972
2. Followed by several cases
   PLANNED PARENTHOOD case in 1992
   Case was intended to be the last word on the legal status of abortion in the U.S.
3. Roe v. Wade – more than a single Supreme Court case; it is a slogan in an ongoing debate.
4. Case said while the right to have an abortion was 'fundamental' it was not 'absolute'; i.e. can be limited to protect a 'compelling state interest.'

B. WHAT IS AN ABORTION?

As defined in the Texas Penal Code: "…the life of the fetus or embryo shall be destroyed in the woman's womb or that a premature birth thereof be caused."

C. Majority Opinion:

1. Decision based on the "right to privacy."
2. Right not unqualified.
3. Fetus = a person; led to a dilemma because not all abortions were illegal; e.g. saving life of mother.
4. Sole determining factor = mother's condition.
5. No other rights do we use "person" to include unborn.
6. So basis: autonomous individual control; freedom of choice in respect to marriage, divorce, etc.

D. Dissenting Opinion:

1. State values convenience of pregnant woman more than potential life she carries.
2. Issue should be left to the people.

II. JUDITH JARVIS THOMSON, "A Defense of Abortion"

A. Assumes fetus is a person at conception

B. Strongest Argument (Extreme view)
Every person has a right to life.
A fetus is a person.
So a fetus has a right to life.

Every person has a right to decide what happens in and to her body.
But surely, the right to life outweighs a person's right to decide what happens in and to her body.
So, the fetus may not be killed
And
So an abortion may not be performed.

C. Plausible?

D. Analogy—violinist example.
Replace "fetus" with "violinist"
Still Plausible?

E. What is the analogy similar to? What does it establish?

F. Consent: No one has a right to use one's body without consent.
When has a woman granted the right to a fetus?
Two extremes:
Rape
Voluntary act with full knowledge that pregnancy will result.

G. Analogies: When has A consented?
1. When A opens a window to air a room and a burglar climbs in; A has consented to the burglar's use of her house.
2. If A has bars installed and one is defective, and a burglar gets in?
3. People seeds drift about like pollen and A has opened her windows, allowing the seeds to take root?
4. A installs fine mesh screens, but one is defective, and seed drifts in and takes root.

Do the details matter?

H. Ought vs. right.
Does it follow that if one "ought" to do something, that another has a right against that person?
Examples: Henry Fonda (substitute your own favorite heartthrob!); Box of chocolates given to siblings.

I. GOOD SAMARITAN
What is the story?
Is it a matter of degrees:
Minimally decent Samaritan
Good Samaritan
Splendid Samaritan
Do we require anyone to be any of these?
Are we being consistent if we argue for the illegality of abortion?

J. THOMSON'S CONCLUSIONS:
A. Abortion not impermissible in all cases.
B. Must not go below "minimally decent Samaritans.
C. Does permit abortion in rape, but may not permit it in other cases: e.g. European vacation or in 7th month.
D. Even if abortion is permissible, it does not demand the death of the fetus.
E. Have assumed the fetus is a person. What if it is not, is abortion always permissible?
Thomson says, "no". Why?
We do have minimally decent duties toward nonpersons.
So the argument is not settled by declaring the fetus or person or not.

K. CARE PERSPECTIVE:
Would this change the argument? How? Why?

PHIL 30 -- ABORTION OUTLINE

READING: CMP: PP. 99-180
ROE V. WADE, NOONAN, THOMSON, ABORTION

I. ROE v. WADE -- 1973 Supreme Court Decision

A. Supreme Court Cases

1. Preceded by: GRISWALD case in 1965
   EISENSTADT case in 1972
2. Followed by several cases
   PLANNED PARENTHOOD case in 1992
   Case was intended to be the last word on the legal status of abortion in the U.S.
3. Roe v. Wade – more than a single Supreme Court case; it is a slogan in an ongoing debate.
4. Case said while the right to have an abortion was 'fundamental' it was not 'absolute'; i.e. can be limited to protect a 'compelling state interest.'

B. WHAT IS AN ABORTION?

As defined in the Texas Penal Code: "…the life of the fetus or embryo shall be destroyed in the woman's womb or that a premature birth thereof be caused."

C. Majority Opinion:

1. Decision based on the "right to privacy."
2. Right not unqualified.
3. Fetus = a person; led to a dilemma because not all abortions were illegal; e.g. saving life of mother.
4. Sole determining factor = mother's condition.
5. No other rights do we use "person" to include unborn.
6. So basis: autonomous individual control; freedom of choice in respect to marriage, divorce, etc.

D. Dissenting Opinion:

1. State values convenience of pregnant woman more than potential life she carries.
2. Issue should be left to the people.

II. JOHN NOONAN, "An Almost Absolute Value in History"

A. Traces Judeo-Christian view

B. Criterion of humanity: if conceived by human parents, then you are human.
Does this settle the issue?

C. Other positions:

1. VIABILITY

If fetus not viable, then cannot live apart from mother.
Fetus' life absolutely dependent on life of mother.
So, fetus not fully human
Good argument?

Criticism: Dependence not ended by viability. Fetus still absolutely dependent up to around 5 years old. So, viability does not confer humanity.

2. EXPERIENCE
A being who has had experience, lived, suffered, has memories, etc. is more human.
Fetus is "unformed" in most basic human sense.

Criticism: An embryo experiences and reacts; may be little distinction between a fetus and a younger child. Besides why does experience confer humanity?

3. SENTIMENTS
If fetus dies, grief of parents not same as grief for living child. Why?
Fetus = an "it" till born.

Criticism: Not a worthy guide. Why?

4. SOCIAL PERCEPTION
Fetus not socially perceived as human

Criticism: Many are not socialized so perceived. Humanity does not depend on social recognition.

D. Noonan's conclusions:
1. Anyone conceived by a man and a woman is human. At what point?
CONCEPTION.
Why?
New being received the genetic code
And
A being with a human genetic code is human.

2. Once humanity of fetus recognized, if we value equality of human lives, then abortion never right except in self-defense.

E. QUESTIONS?
What about self-abortion?
Can self-defense ever include others defending you?

III. JUDITH JARVIS THOMSON, "A Defense of Abortion"

A. Assumes fetus is a person at conception
B. Strongest Argument (Extreme view)
Every person has a right to life.
A fetus is a person.
So a fetus has a right to life.

Every person has a right to decide what happens in and to her body.
But surely, the right to life outweighs a person's right to decide what happens in and to her body.
So, the fetus may not be killed
And
So an abortion may not be performed.
C. Plausible?
D. Analogy—violinist example.
Replace "fetus" with "violinist"
Still Plausible?
E. What is the analogy similar to? What does it establish?

F. Consent: No one has a right to use one's body without consent.

When has a woman granted the right to a fetus?

Two extremes:

Rape

Voluntary act with full knowledge that pregnancy will result.

G. Analogies: When has A consented?

1. When A opens a window to air a room and a burglar climbs in; A has consented to the burglar's use of her house.
2. If A has bars installed and one is defective, and a burglar gets in?
3. People seeds drift about like pollen and A has opened her windows, allowing the seeds to take root?
4. A installs fine mesh screens, but one is defective, and seed drifts in and takes root.

Do the details matter?

H. Ought vs. right.

Does it follow that if one "ought" to do something, that another has a right against that person?

Examples: Henry Fonda (substitute your own favorite heartthrob!); Box of chocolates given to siblings.

I. GOOD SAMARITAN

What is the story?

Is it a matter of degrees:

Minimally decent Samaritan

Good Samaritan

Splendid Samaritan

Do we require anyone to be any of these?

Are we being consistent if we argue for the illegality of abortion?

J. THOMSON'S CONCLUSIONS:

A. Abortion not impermissible in all cases.

B. Must not go below "minimally decent Samaritans.

C. Does permit abortion in rape, but may not permit it in other cases: e.g. European vacation or in 7th month.

D. Even if abortion is permissible, it does not demand the death of the fetus.

E. Have assumed the fetus is a person. What if it is not, is abortion always permissible?

Thomson says, "no". Why?

We do have minimally decent duties toward nonpersons.

So the argument is not settled by declaring the fetus or person or not.

K. CARE PERSPECTIVE:

Would this change the argument? How? Why?

PHIL 30 -- ABORTION: CMP pp 120-202

I. ABORTION

A. CASES:

Griswald Case	1965
Eisenstadt Case	1972
Roe v. Wade	1973
Planned Parenthood	1992

B. What is abortion?

C. What did Roe v. Wade

D. Majority Opinion—based on?

E. Dissenting Opinion?

I. NOONAN, "An Almost Absolute Value in History"

A. Traces Judeo-Christian view

B. Criterion of humanity?

C. Other positions, which Noonan rejects:

1. Viability
2. Experience
3. Sentiments
4. Social Perception

D. Noonan's conclusions?

Fetus is a human – at what point?

Is abortion every justified?

II. THOMSON, "A Defense of Abortion"

A. Assumes fetus a person at conception

B. Strongest argument:

Everyone has a right to life.

So the fetus has a right to life.

No doubt a person has a right to decide what shall happen in and to her body. But surely a person's right to life outweighs a person's right to decide what happens in and to her body. So, the fetus may not be killed and

An abortion may not be performed.

Is this argument good? Plausible?

C. What are the issues being raised?

Right to life: what does it mean?

Concept of a person

Right to life vs. right to decide what happens in and to your body.

Others? Killing: is it ever justified?

D. Analogy: Violinist example. What is this?

In the argument above, replace "fetus" with "violinist"

Is the argument still plausible?

Is the analogy a good one?

What is it similar to?

What does it establish?

E. Consent: No one has a right to use one's body without consent.

Voluntary act with full knowledge that pregnancy will result.

F. Analogies: When has A consented?
   1. When A opens a window to air a room and a burglar climbs in; A has consented to the burglar's use of her house.
   2. If A has bars installed and one is defective, and a burglar gets in?
   3. People seeds drift about like pollen and A has opened her windows, allowing the seeds to take root?
   4. A installs fine mesh screens, but one is defective, and seed drifts in and takes root.

   Do the details matter?

G. Ought vs. right.
   Does it follow that if one "ought" to do something, that another has a right against that person?
   Examples: Henry Fonda (substitute your own favorite heartthrob!); Box of chocolates given to siblings.

H. GOOD SAMARITAN
   What is the story?
   Is it a matter of degrees:
      Minimally decent Samaritan
      Good Samaritan
      Splendid Samaritan
   Do we require anyone to be any of these?
   Are we being consistent if we argue for the illegality of abortion?

I. THOMSON'S CONCLUSIONS:
   A. Abortion not impermissible in all cases.
   B. Must not go below "minimally decent Samaritans.
   C. Does permit abortion in rape, but may not permit it in other cases: e.g. European vacation or in 7th month.
   D. Even if abortion is permissible, it does not demand the death of the fetus.
   E. Have assumed the fetus is a person. What if it is not, is abortion always permissible? Thomson says, "no". Why?
      We do have minimally decent duties toward nonpersons.
      So the argument is not settled by declaring the fetus or person or not.

J. CARE PERSPECTIVE:
   Would this change the argument? How? Why?

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, April 13, 2007 10:38 AM
To: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Fall Teaching Preferences
Attach: TA-Pref Fall 2007.doc

If you are receiving this email that means I have not received a teaching preference form for Fall 2007. I need these ASAP. -- TODAY.
In case you have lost it, I have attached it to this email.

Thanks,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

TA ASSIGNMENT REQUEST FORM FOR FALL 2007

NAME:_____

I intend to return to the Department and I wish to be considered for a teaching assignment: Yes No

I intend to return to the Department and will be funded by a non teaching fellowship: Yes No

I will be a fifth year student next year and wish to be considered for a dissertation fellowship: Yes No

If you answered "yes" please rank your preferences taking into account your qualifications, your own educational needs and the seminars you plan to take. A Teaching Fellow must have been a TA at UNC for at least two semesters. Rank 1-6, with "1" being your first choice.

TEACHING ASSISTANT

_____	101	Intro to Main Problems	Large Section (4)	Neta	11 MW; F-10 & 11
_____	112	Making Sense of Ourselves	Large Section (4)	Reeve	12 MW F- 12 & 1
_____	272	Peace, War, Defense	Large Section (2)	B. Boxill	12 MW F- 12 & 1

TEACHING FELLOWS

_____	101E	Intro: Main Problems	MW 6-7:15	[Evening Class]
_____	110	Intro: Great Works	TR 3:30
_____	134	Philosophy of Religion	MWF 2
_____	155	Intro to Logic	TR 8
_____	155	Intro to Logic	TR 11
_____	160	Intro to Ethics	TR 8
_____	160	Intro to Ethics	MWF 2
_____	164	Morality and Business	TR 12:30
_____	165	Bioethics	MWF 9
_____	165	Bioethics	TR 6-7:15	[regular class just taught in evening]
_____	170	Social & Political	TR 9:30
_____	230	Experience and Reality	TR 8
_____	230	Experience and Reality	TR 3:30
_____	280	Morality in Law	TR 3:30

Something to keep in mind as you fill this out: The large classes in the Spring 2008 for which we will need TAs are: PHIL 160-Intro to Ethics [4]; PHIL 150-Intro to Philosophy of Science[2 or 4]; and PHIL 163-Practical Ethics [4]; PHIL 155-Intro to Logic [4]

Have you taken Phil 102 or 112? _____ Phil 101?_____

Please indicate your relevant teaching experience to date and any other considerations you would like us to keep in mind when determining your assignment for next term. E.g. If you have not been a TA for a course, but believe you are qualified to teach it, please explain. (Use space below or back of this sheet for other considerations) Feel free to add additional comments.

PLEASE RETURN TO JAN BOXILL NO LATER THAN: April 9, 2007

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, April 13, 2007 4:03 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: whaley family foundation

Good

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Carlo Robustelli wrote:
> Dear Gary,
>
> As I mentioned briefly during our meeting this afternoon, the Center
> has a very exciting named professorship opportunity for the Whaley > Family Foundation. Let me first explain briefly how the visiting > professorship works for the Parr Center. Every year the Center > sponsors visiting faculty who are carefully selected for their > demonstrated excellence in teaching and their capacity to bring new > ideas and a fresh perspective to Center activities. The visiting > professor teaches two ethics courses each semester and also engages in > activities aimed at advancing the understanding and appreciation of > ethics, such as workshops, seminars, and lectures. As you probably > know the Center moved into its physical location this past August and > all of the Center staff and faculty are in offices in the Centers > suite in Caldwell Hall.
> Now let me explain how the Whaley Family Foundation visiting > Professorship in Ethics would work. For every $50,000 donated to the > Parr Center the visiting professor will be named in honor of the > Whaley Family Foundation. Here is a possible scenario: if the > Foundation contributed $25,000 to the Center per year over six years > then every other year the visiting faculty member would be named to > the Whaley Family Foundation.
> The Center's current operating budget spins out from the interest > earned by the Gary W. Parr Family Foundation endowment. With the > support from the Whaley Family Foundation the Center's expendable > funds would increase.
> I enjoyed our discussion today about the need for ethics in the > professions (especially law) and your thoughts and suggestions on ways > to create meaningful sustained programs. Please let me know if you > need any additional information. Thanks so much for lunch.
> Best,
> - Carlo Robustelli
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, April 13, 2007 4:18 PM
To: Salyer, Sherry L <salyer@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: exss 101
Attach: Moral significance Essay.doc

Correct. I'll basically give the same presentation--even though I never finish it!!! :)
I've attached the essay if you want to have them read something and the outline for the presentation.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Sherry Salyer wrote:
> Just double checking for your visit for Thursday April 19 at 9:45 and > 11. Everything still okay?

The Moral Significance of Sport

Jan Boxill
University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

There is no doubting that sports play a significant role in the lives of many Americans and indeed of many people around the world. What accounts for this fascination? It is doubtful that sports simply provide an outlet for violence in society. This is too simplistic. Sport, I maintain, fascinates for many reasons, including its beauty and its display of morally heroic virtues. Human beings admire the beauty and grace in sport; they are moved by the discipline of the best athletes; and often it is the heroism and courage in sport that they applaud, not the violence which occasion the display of these virtues..

But this is not all. I maintain that because of the nature and design of sport, sport provides a significant moral function both for the individual and for society at large. It does so first because it provides participants a vehicle for self-expression, and a means of self-respect and self-development. Sport in this sense may serve as what philosopher John Rawls calls a "social union" in a society of social unions, a community of people with shared ends and common activities valued for themselves, enjoying one another's excellences and individuality as they participate in the activities."[1]

Second, because sport is a microcosm of society, it dramatizes the social order. As a microcosm, sport represents the social order in miniature, a "slice of life" and exhibits that slice in an exaggerated and dramatic form, much as a play dramatizes an episode of life. Sport mirrors or reflects society, its virtues and vices, but unlike a mirror, which is passive, sport is active. It reflects back on society; its reflection affects what it is a reflection of. And finally, because sport functions analogously as an art form, as a controlled expression of emotion, it enhances the notion of sport as a social union, and further serves a significant moral function in the dramatization of sport as a microcosm of society.

I.

In its paradigmatic form, sport can serve illuminate its moral significance, both negatively and positively. Four features exemplify sport in its paradigmatic form: 1) Sport is a freely chosen, voluntary activity; 2) Sport is rule governed with two sets of rules; 3) Sport is physically challenging; 4) Sport involves competition in a mutual challenge to achieve excellence.[2] These features provide neither an exhaustive nor exclusive definition, but a model to examine the moral significant features of sport.

First sport is a freely chosen, voluntary activity whose participation is an expression of the individual's creativity and his or her freedom to choose. Thus, sport is an unalienated activity, and as such is included in what Marx called "the realm of freedom." As an unalienated activity, sport has as its end the activity itself. Thought it may serve other purposes, it is an activity complete in itself. It dos not have to have a product nor provide a service, nor is it a means to an end outside itself. Sport is an end in itself.

Of course, those who participate in a sport necessarily have goals. For example, to play basketball is necessarily to have the goal of scoring baskets. But the goal is within the context of the activity itself. That is, in stating the rules of the game, one necessarily states the goals internal to it which the participants must have. But the participants need not have goals external to the game.

In its paradigmatic form them, participation in sport is both conscious and free, and the participants know and freely abide by the rules. This voluntary co-operation is required to begin, continue, and end the activity. Thus, for example, when I play basketball, tennis, or golf, I freely choose to do so and am conscious of my freedom to participate in the activity for no end outside the activity itself. Neither my existence nor my subsistence depends on my participation in the activity. This is unlike work.

By contrast work in its paradigmatic form is nonvoluntary and aims at something other than itself. Most members of society work in order to live; for them work is a means to an end other than itself. It is seen as a deliberate providing for needs or wants. As such work belongs in what Marx called "the realm of necessity."

It is possible, of course, for the fortunate few to express their creativity and freedom to choose in their work; most often when work approaches the paradigm of sport, it also enters the realm of freedom. But this cannot be the case for the great many workers whose work has little or no room for creativity nor self-expression. Conversely, sport which in its paradigmatic form is in the realm of freedom, may be an individual's means of living and thus in the real of necessity. As I will argue, however, this is one possible source of the perversion of sport.

---

[1] John Rawls, A Theory of Justice, Harvard University Press, 1971, p. 523.

Now it might be objected that on my analysis, sport is no different from work, because sport is indeed a means to some ends, for happiness and pleasure, for health, discipline, relaxation, or for money. All of these are products of sports. Several points may be made here. First, when the aim is health or discipline, the activity degenerates into dull routine and quickly becomes something akin to work. When these objectives dictate what is done, efficiency becomes the concern. The question is "what is the most efficient way of obtaining these products?" This is the question one asks in work, not in sport. Examples of such activities are calisthenics, weightlifting, and jogging. These are examples of what are better called exercises, not sports. These activities are generally designed for physical fitness and are generally subjectively different from sport, in that they are not enjoyed for themselves.

This subjective difference has an objective counterpart. They are not designed nor participated in for self-expression because they are repetitive and simple. In doing sit-ups, for example, you do not try to be creative, nor do you do them for their own sake. You can concentrate on the sit-ups initially to make sure you are doing them correctly or efficiently, but after the efficiency level is reached, there is no more to think about except what end they will achieve, the "cut" abdominal muscles. "Once given a chance to train for games, students revolted against doing set exercises as ends in themselves. They found them to be tedious, repetitious and meaningless."[3] This may be further illustrated in body building. This was not satisfying in itself; the regimen had to be seen for something; thus, competition was devised.

Interestingly and importantly, when one participates to the fullest, the by-products of all sports are health, discipline, and a sense of achievement. These may be aimed at, as we saw, but they are better achieved when one forgets about them and participates. This is certainly also the case with relaxation, happiness, and pleasure. These are by-products of sports, but only when they are not the aim. This is just a particular instance of the paradox of happiness. In discussing this issue, a friend commented that she jogged, "not for its own sake, but for fun, relaxation, health and a sense of achievement." But if my analysis is correct, these can best be achieved by participating without those aims in mind. A person "who wants to be refreshed through play must forget about refreshing himself and just play."[4] By participating to the fullest, that is by participating freely with no other specific aim in mind, one achieves these "products." This is not the case in work, where the end product must always be kept in mind. If I am building a house and am concerned with the end product, I must keep fully aware of that end and must be alert and aware of the day-to-day operations and building. If I "lose myself" occasionally, it could be disastrous. The structure depends on keeping in mind on the work at hand.

When money becomes the aim, sport begins to degenerate in another way. It begins to degenerate into a means to that end, in so far as this objective dictates what is done. " How best can I command money?" becomes the question. Being good at the sport helps, but becoming a spectacle or entertainer is often the main criterion. To this end individuals try gimmicks or antics, or go to schools with a big athletic publicity department. For example, the Heisman trophy winners command more money by virtue of winning that award. But the winner is not always the best football player in the nation. It is often the result of the publicity that is put out by the athlete's school. Athletes become commodities and the "bottom line" is what matters to the owners. Further, salaries are decided relative to the draft choice.

Of course, the Heisman trophy winner is still an outstanding athlete, but unfortunately there are other cases where the sport itself is incidental. How best to be an entertainer or produce a spectacle is the primary concern, since that is how to command more money. At this point sport begins to be perverted, and moral virtues are undermined. The epitome of a perverted sport is professional wrestling. Everything is done for the entertainment value, for the benefit of the spectators, or more honestly for their money. In fact there is little sport left in it. The perversion is so pervasive that in most states professional wrestling is not even considered a sport. The participants are not athletes, but actors and stuntmen, certainly talented in their own right. There is little resemblance between this spectacle and collegiate wrestling, which is a spectacular sport, but is far from being spectacle.

Fortunately, it is still the case that in most sports ability is still the primary money-maker. But because money becomes the aim, other factors are introduced, or at least encouraged; namely the violence or "bad boy" behavior. Violence is encouraged, not for the good of the game, but for the good of the gate.

---

[3] Paul Weiss, Sport: A Philosophic Inquiry, Southern Illinois Press, 1969, p. 225

Violence does nothing to enhance the sport performance. This can readily be seen in professional hockey. Hockey is a contact sport, but the contact is often exaggerated and violence is encouraged because it is spectacular and develops fan loyalty through hatred. This testifies to humankind's great passion and failure to keep focus on the athletic event. In this sense sport begins to parallel war. Love of one's country, or patriotism, is enhanced during war; loyalty developed through hatred of a common enemy.

We also see this in professional basketball with the proliferation of "bad boy" behavior, with some players seeing who can be the "baddest" or the most outrageous. We are all familiar with former NBA players Charles Barkley and Dennis Rodman. Spectators flocked to see their antics, encouraging others to follow in their footsteps. League officials could curtail behavior such as theirs, but it would cost the league ticket sales, and so is basically ignored. Again this attests to what is good for the gate not for the game. It is true that fines are levied for fighting in professional basketball, but with the enormous salaries, this has little affect. These players know that their antics are a drawing card, so they can command salaries whereby fines mean very little.[5] Again the bottom line is money.

It might be claimed here that where there are spectators perversion is inevitable. Possible yes, in that spectators often dramatize or multiply the atmosphere so that violence is encouraged even more. But inevitable, no. I agree with those who maintain that participating rather than watching is central to sport,[6] and I agree that everyone should participate, if they are able. This point I will take up in Section II.

The second feature of sport in its paradigmatic form is that it is rule governed. There are two different sorts of rules that are important to sport: rules decency or fair play and constitutive rules. Some sports have more rules than others, and some may have only one sort. First there are rules of decency, safety, and fair play. For example, in boxing one cannot hit below the belt; in football one cannot tackle by grabbing the face mask or tackle a non-ball carrier from behind; in baseball one cannot throw at the batsman's head; in cricket one cannot continually bowl bodyline, etc. There are very many rules for decency and safety, and when violated players are penalized. Rules of fair play include penalties for moves of strategy within the game. Rules of decency reflect basic moral standards. The basic ground rules are accepted, and they may be manipulated for strategy, but must not overstep prohibitive ones without swift punishment (e.g. fighting, biting, etc). The death of ethics is the sabotage of excellence.

Added to the rules of decency and fair play are constitutive rules which the game and the permissible moves. Their existence comes from their acceptance. Constitutive rules define the activity and are designed to develop and exhibit distinct sets of skills and talents. In combination these rules impose a discipline and create a framework for self-expression and self-development. These rules require calculations, decisions, strategies, and mental agility as well as a physical challenge. Thus, when I agree to play basketball, I agree first of all to abide by the rules which define the game, and the rules of decency, safety and fair play within the game. Further, I use thee rules as a disciplined means of self-expression and self-development. In playing basketball, for example, I cannot put the ball in the basket any way I choose. I must put it in the basket in the ways the rules permit. I cannot stand on a ladder, knock someone out of my way or climb on someone to reach the basket. Nor can I score a basket by sending the ball through the bottom of the net. To be sure these attempts use some skill and ingenuity, but the rules impose a kind of discipline that requires me to devise ways of scoring a basket which require skill, bodily excellence and ingenuity. The rules force me to use various strategies to create moves to score within these carefully specified rules.

Now it is a fact that not all sports impose a defining set of rules, for example, mountain climbing. However, besides the rules for safety, there are impositions that require bodily excellence and ingenuity, rules that require strategies for climbing to reach the top. The goal is not just to reach the top, but to climb to reach the top, and this requires adherence to rules, or laws, of nature. No artificial rules need be imposed.

It is this rule-governing feature that contrasts sport to play, where the rules are simply the more general rules of the society. In play there is little to guide the play activity except the general rules that guide normal human behavior, in particular rules against harming others. But such rules impose no discipline for self-expression or self-development. (They do serve to develop character however.) The rules of sport, on the other hand, provide a framework for creativity in accordance with aesthetic standards, requiring both mental and physical energies. It is this last notion which signifies the third feature of sport.

---

[5] The Latrell Sprewell situation is a case in point.

The third feature of sport in its paradigmatic form is that sport is physically challenging. This feature contrasts sports to games. It is the rule-governing feature of sport that makes sports coextensive with games, but games to not always emphasize a physical challenge or require bodily excellence. Both sports and games are rule-governed, but not all games are sports, and are not when there is no physical challenge. Thus, for example, chess is a rule-governed activity and is a game, but it does not qualify as a sport because it is not physically challenging. The rules which define the sport activity are specifically designed for displaying and expressing bodily performance and aimed at bodily excellence. Thus, these rules often create artificial obstacles for just this purpose. Further, often rule changes are made for just this purpose. Without these rules no particular bodily perfection would necessarily be exhibited.

Using the example of basketball again, rules and obstacles are designed so that baskets scored require skill, coordination, strategies, and bodily excellence. The obstacles and rules present a challenge. The size of the court forces the action in a relatively small area. The "three-second lane" forces continuous action around the basket and prevents a very tall players from simply standing next to the basket for a dunk. This is why we have heard some advocate for raising the rim of the basket to eleven or twelve feet, so that the tallest players must create moves which require bodily excellence. Dunking itself displays a tremendous amount of ability—coordination, timing, jumping ability and balance. It is probably one of the most beautiful moves in basketball because it requires such a combination of abilities—mental and physical.

A rule that imposes another discipline is the shot clock. In college men's basketball the shot clock is 35; women's is 30; and in the professional game it is 24 seconds. The shot clock requires a basket to be attempted with the time allowed. This not only requires bodily excellence, it requires mental concentration and strategies. Interestingly the women's rules, once they changed to approximate the men's rules, included a 30-second clock in their revision, and this still remains. Professional men's basketball has required a 24-second clock since 1954. In every case the clock serves to keep the game challenging, mentally and physically, and also serves for spectator appeal.

Obviously some sports impose more obstacles and discipline than others. However, as I mentioned above, not all obstacles need be artificial. The mountain itself is the obstacle in climbing; as the water is for kayaking and white water rafting. But all impose some obstacles providing a physical challenge, and forcing the participant to create ways to display their abilities. Cricket, for example, does not allow the bowler to throw the ball to the batter in the same way the pitcher throws to the batter in baseball. Also the bats are very different. But in both baseball and in cricket the bats are very specifically designed with definite specifications stipulated by the rules.[7] All these rules, obstacles, and equipment specifications are designed for displaying and creating bodily excellence.

What is interesting and significant is that the different sets of rules which define different sports are designed to exploit the different bodily excellences which correspond to the different body types in men. A good basketball player for example, does not necessarily make a good football player; a good football player does not necessarily make a good swimmer, etc. The point is that certain body types fit different types of sports. There presently exist sports opportunities for nearly every male body type; though there have been great strides, this is not the case for women.

Women cannot as a rule compete in football and boxing, nor compete with men inmost other sports. Although there will always be exceptions, because these are exceptions there will always be societal prejudice which guarantees inequalities of opportunities. Therefore, there is a case for developing sport activities that exploit women's body types. In some cases this may simply involve revising the rules of existing sports, such as in basketball by reducing the size of the basketball for the college players. In other cases it may require developing entirely new activities. In any case since sport is already the single most available activity for self-expression for men, as is clear by the great variety of sports which serve most men's body types, it seems reasonable that similar activities ought to be provided for women. It is interesting to note that basketball was originally created for men to play in the winter between the fall and spring sports. This testifies to the truth that a sport can be a fresh creation made to satisfy definite purposes; other sports could be similarly created. What is also fascinating about basketball is that women played the same game as the men in 1892, but due to concern for women's bodies, it did not develop as the men's game did, and only in 1976 was women's basketball an Olympic sport.

---

[7] Recall the controversy when George Brett hit a game-winning home run with a bat with too much tar, and

The final feature of sport in its paradigmatic form is that it requires competition. And it is in competition that the mental and physical skills, talents, and coordination come together. Competition in sport obviously compels the players to exercise and develop their mental skills. Each must develop strategies to counter a competitor's skills and strategies. Here coaches often play significant roles; they are the skilled strategists and work with the athletes in practice and discuss the mental aspects of the sport in the locker room. But once on the court or the playing field, it is up to the athletes to make quick calculations and decisions. Only the most basic plays and moves become automatic. It is seldom that every play of the game is automatic, so quick calculations and decisions based on past behavior and conduct are required. The quarterback in football must be able to "read" and understand the opposing team's defense and then call the next play accordingly.[8] And if the defense shifts in anticipation or if the play does not go quite as it should, the quarterback must make a quick calculation and decision, and the other players must do the same. Good players are neither afflicted with decidophobia nor rashness. In most activities challengers change in unpredictable ways and so one must be prepared to counter within the rules. Making these decisions in those circumstances can serve an important moral function. It is not only in sport that one has to make decisions quickly, but not rashly.

It should be noted here that not all sports require person-to-person competition nor even team competition. There are different forms of competition. Sports such as rock and mountain climbing do not require competition between persons; rather they pit a person against nature. This may be understood as "contention" rather than competition; but the requirements are the same in that one must put ones mental and physical skills to the test. However, while this is the case, in analyzing the moral significance of sport, my discussion centers on the person-to-person aspects especially seen in organized sport.

This feature of sport dramatizes the morality of a community in competition. Sport dramatizes how competition can lead to friendship, to a cooperative challenge toward a shared end. When the game is played fairly according to the rules of the game, and when the competitors are relatively evenly matched, the participants take pleasure in a well-played game, whereby the participants put out their best efforts in the desire to win. This requires the cooperation of all involved. The shared end is the game well played. Without the cooperative efforts of the participants, referees, etc, such an end cannot be achieved. This cooperative effort constitutes a mutual challenge. I am challenged by my competitor as she is challenged by me. I am not interested in destroying her as an enemy, nor subjugating her. I do not view her as an enemy, but as a challenger, someone who by her efforts makes me work hard to develop my abilities. In this way I respect her as a person with similar abilities and virtues and also respect myself in this mutual cooperative challenge. That competition leads to friendship is epitomized by the traditional handshake at the end of the competition. That the competitors are saying in this symbolic gesture is, "Thanks friend, I could not have done it without you. Thanks for the challenge."

Unfortunately sport also dramatizes how competition may lead to combat. But the dramatization in either case serves as a significant moral function. It shows our intense passion and desire to be victorious as well as our failures. Competition as a challenge to better oneself is a value to society and to the individual. This is not unique to sport situations; it is important in all fields of endeavor. Competition is valuable when it is viewed as a cooperative challenge and not as combat, when it is viewed as a means to friendship and not as a means to alienation. In these ways competition does serve to develop citizens as well as individuals. Competition enables participants to deal properly with other realities.

Now, of course, this does not carry over into all activities and realities. It does not mean, for example, that participants now put as much energy into activities they dislike or find great difficulty doing. There are, of course, aberrations, and these aberrations are definitely dramatized in a sport context. This is especially seen when competition is viewed as combat, emphasizing the "win-at-all-costs" syndrome, and when viewed as a zero-sum game. It has been argued that these are essential features of competition. But if my analysis is correct, these "features" are not essential to the notion of competition and are, as I have noted above, aberrations.

The point of competition is not just to win, but to function at a maximum, to develop oneself to the fullest, and to do this one must compete against those who challenge. If it were simply to win, one would choose weak opponents that one could always defeat. Generally one prefers to lose against a strong opponent than win against no competition at all. This is evidenced by the expression "hollow victory." Certainly winning is part of the game (i.e. someone must win), but one does not see an opponent as an enemy to be defeated, but one whose excellences challenge and make possible one's own best performance.

This point was made clear to me in the 1993 National Indoor Tennis Championship. Roland Thornquist of the University of North Carolina disagreed with a line call that was in his favor saying, "I'd rather lose a match and be a good sport than cheat and win the match. I think you win in the long run."[9] This epitomizes competition in sports. The goal is not to destroy, but to achieve, to discover how effectively one's power can used to bring about a successful outcome under the established rules, not at all costs. Again here I am talking about person-to-person competition. These observations are not present in all kinds of competition, as I noted above, but perhaps we ought to derive our the model of competition from that of the mountain climber, or kayaker, or rower, where strategy is used to challenge the mountain or the river. The point is not to subjugate, but to challenge, to achieve, where the struggle involves the process, he desire to be tested. The win-at-all-costs syndrome does not seem to be present in sports where the competition does not involve other persons. Much can be learned from this and transferred to the person-to-person organized sports which is the focus of this project.

To illustrate the virtue of competition as an achievement toward a shared end, David Halberstam, a noted sportswriter writes:

> "When most oarsmen talked about their perfect moments in a boat, they referred not so much to winning a race as to the feel of the boat, all eight oars in the water together, the synchronization almost perfect. In moments like that, the boat seemed to lift right out of the water. Oarsmen called that the moment of swing. … it allowed you to trust the other men in the boat. A boat did not have swing unless everyone was putting out in exact measure, and because of that, and only because of that, there was the possibility of true trust among oarsmen."[10]

This same moment of "swing" can be seen in other team sports when the play works beautifully because everyone is putting out the same energy to be synchronized with each other.

These four features constitute a schema for sport in its paradigmatic form, and it is these four features that characterize the importance of sport. Sport, therefore, is an unalienated activity which is required for self-development, self-expression, and self-respect. This is part of its fascination. I do not deny that other activities provide vehicles for these goods; there are others. What I contend is that sport is the single most available means and single most participated means for attainment of these goods. It is in this sense that sport is the art of the people and is therefore morally significant.

II

Karl Marx has argued that work is the means to self-development. Not, of course, work under capitalism, but unalienated work; work that is freely chosen and exemplifies human creativity requiring both the energy of the mind and of the body, in accordance with aesthetic standards. And, Marx continues, given the proper setting, i.e. communism, there can be this alienated work available to everyone. This obviously was essential for Marx's argument.

Further Marx maintained that in a communist society, we could all not only be workers, but philosophers, poets, etc.

> "In communist society, … each can become accomplished in any branch he wishes, society regulates general production and thus makes it possible for me to do one thing today and another tomorrow, to hunt in the morning, fish in the afternoon, rear cattle in the evening, criticize after dinner, just as I have a mind, without ever becoming hunter, fisherman, cowherd, or critic."[11]

I am not sure this is the case, but Marx is correct in emphasizing that this well-roundedness which is necessary for self-development requires "unalienated activities"; activities designed specifically to provide room to express and develop oneself freely and not activities that are means to satisfy needs. I have already discussed sport as an unalienated activity. I will now discuss how it also provides the basis for well-roundedness and for development of our uniquely human capacities.

I adhere to the claim that we all ought to be well-rounded and that we all ought to develop our uniquely human capacities; capacities which include the rational, aesthetic, moral, as well as the capacities for friendship and cooperation. But Marx's claim notwithstanding, we can't all be artists, philosophers, poets, or top athletes. To be well-rounded and to develop all our faculties is impossible if it means we must

---

[9] Roland Thornquist went on to play professional tennis and is currently the Head Women's Tennis Coach at his alma mater, the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

[10] David Halberstam, The Amateurs, William Morrow & Co., Inc., New York, 1985, p. 40.

attempt to perfect all our faculties. Time alone does not permit the development of all our potentialities. As Rawls puts it, "One characteristic of human beings is that no one person can do all that they might like to. ... Potentialities of each are greater than those we can hope to realize."[12]

How then can we be well-rounded? If excellence necessarily requires specialization, it would seem that we cannot be well-rounded. One possible solution is for everyone to participate in as many activities as possible, but specialize only in one or two endeavors. We can't perhaps all be philosophers, but we should all philosophize. We can't all be experts in any one area, but we should participate in as many areas as possible. Obviously not all of us can be superior athletes, but we should all participate. However, in both cases, philosophy and sports, some must specialize so that everyone else can appreciate the superior excellence of that activity. In this way we can participate in that excellence. So, for example, the more you participate in sports yourself, the more you appreciate the superior excellence of the best. The same holds true for philosophy, or for any other activity. It is in this sense that sport fulfills the requirements of Rawls's social union. The successes and enjoyments of others complement our own good. Thus, the successes and enjoyments of superior athletes and their performances complement the good of others. This justifies professional sports. The professionals display the superior talent and excellence of the best and as such enable us to participate in and appreciate their excellence. We do this as spectators. In this way we become complete vicariously.

Now it may be asked here whether participation is necessary for appreciation. I maintain that some participation is necessary to appreciate the excellence of others. Otherwise one runs the risk of becoming an elitist, or of focussing on the "accidents" of the activity, or of denying its significance. As a result the nonparticipant often fails to give respect to the superior participant. It is in this situation that spectators contribute to the perversion of sport.

However, rather than perverting sports, our participation and knowledge actually enhance the quality of the performance. An analogy may be made with philosophy and philosophical conventions. Attending a convention are professional philosophers, students of philosophy, other academics, and professionals interested in certain areas of philosophy. Some of the performances are entertaining with little content. But these are rare, because most of the spectators at any paper are fairly knowledgeable and are actual participants themselves, and thus "see through" such performances. Thus the quality of the convention is enhanced. And further we as spectators appreciate the excellences of the professional philosophers through these performances (i.e. their papers).

The same can and does hold true in sports. By being a participant, a student or a knowledgeable aficionado of the sport, these spectators enhance the quality of the sport. The more knowledgeable people become, the more they are able to see through the performers who lack ability; and less likely to be impressed with violent displays. They appreciate the superior performances, the hard work, the creativity, the strategy, and the artistry involved. They need not be participants in all sports to appreciate all sports. The unique nature of sport activities transfers to any sport. So that while I may be a participant in basketball, I can appreciate the excellences of other sports because they all have similar requirements. They all, in some way, participate in the model presented in Section I. However, the more I know about any one sport, the more I can appreciate it.[13] And the more I participate in a variety of sports, the more I can appreciate the significance of sport in general.

The point is that we cannot all be specialists in all areas, but because there are specialists who do achieve excellence, we can participate in the excellences in the performances of others. In this way our capacities are complemented, and we become well-rounded. Thus, "when [we] are secure in the enjoyment of the exercise of [our] own powers, [we] are disposed to appreciate the perfections of others…"[14] This is the essence of Rawls's social union.

Thus, individuals realize themselves as individuals by participating in roles and stations of the social order. "We need one another as partners in ways of life that are engaged in for their own sake, and the successes and enjoyments of others are necessary for and complementary to our own good."[15] Thus social institutions are to be judged by their contribution to this aim. And it is to this aim that sports must also be judged.

---

[12] John Rawls, A Theory of Justice, Harvard University Press, 1971, p. 523.
[13] This is why those who most respect Coach Smith are players and other coaches.
[14] Rawls, 523.

III

It has been argued by many that sports mirrors the society in which they operate. In this way sport is a microcosm of society.[16] Sport is society in miniature, complete with all its conflicts, assets, and defects. Society is lived by people and sports are played by people. Sports provide an effective medium for bringing out the characters of people. They serve to bring out the best and the worst of people. In observing sport as a microcosm, just as there is corruption in society, there is corruption in sports; just as there is violence in society, there is violence in sports; just as there are drugs in society, there are drugs in sports. On the other hand, just as there are rules of conduct in society, there are rules of conduct in sport; just as there are successes and heroes in society, there are successes and heroes in sports. In all these ways and others, sports reflect the society in which they operate. But while I agree with this analysis, it is only part of the picture. Sport is more than a mirror reflection. A mirror provides a passive reflection, but sport is not a passive reflection. Sport is active and affects what it is a reflection of. Further sport not only reflects society, it also dramatizes the social order. These unique aspects are what make clear the moral significance of sport both for the individual and society at large.

In its being a miniature of society, it compresses and heightens aspects of society, much like a dramatic presentation. Aspects of society are exaggerated and dramatized, and in this way are made clear to all of us. Like drams, sport may reveal to the society virtues it has not yet recognized, or present new values to the society and criticize old ones, or dramatize the established virtues and values in a society. For example, in the triathlon competition perseverance is dramatized in the mere attempt to finish the competition. This dramatization shows the virtue of perseverance and the struggles involved. We admire the finisher as well as those who merely push themselves to the limit in an attempt to finish.

In all of these ways sport may spur moral change. Insofar as it declares the virtues and values of society, sport tells people when they do not live up to their ideals, chastises them for their laxity and prods them to be better people. For example, "that's not cricket" is not said only in cricket.

We espouse the virtue of hard work. Sport does much to dramatize this, and it is with this in mind that some rules changes are made. Surely some people have more talent and aptitude than others. That is as it should be; but raw talent is usually not sufficient. No one, no matter how apt, is naturally great. To be great, an athlete must become great. This is why Michael Jordan is a great basketball player, and Tiger Woods is a great golfer. They both have talent, but they dominated their sports because they developed their natural abilities to be the best they could be. Sport emphasizes the development of the raw talent, and this carries over into society.

We also espouse the virtues of courage, patience, sportsmanship, perseverance and determination. These are emphasized in sports, but are also dramatized so that when they are undermined, they become more obvious and acute. And in so doing we chastise not only the violators but society itself for its laxity. This was illustrated quite well in our attitude toward John McEnroe, who in his displays on the tennis court dramatized the lack of some of our cherished values. Again some rule changes have tried to address such behavior.

Another value society holds dear is justice as fairness. Sport may serve to dramatize how justice ought to be administered and how fairness is emphasized. This is done by carefully specified rules, both to define the game to provide for development, bodily excellence, hard work and fairness, and to provide for proper conduct within the game. With regard to the latter, penalties are swiftly and surely dealt with. Referees and umpires mete out immediate justice. It is in playing the game that one agrees to abide by the rules, recognizing both their importance and their essential fairness. In this way participants are aware of each other as individuals with shared ends. And it is in this way participants come to appreciate others as moral persons and as such constitute a moral community.

It is because sport is an art form and dramatizes our virtues and values that we are outraged at the aberrations. And it is therefore most important that these be corrected within sports and don so surely and quickly. But while this dramatization of virtues may spur moral change, it may also be the source of a great moral danger in sport. People may substitute sport for reality and in so doing be content with their cherished virtues being played out in the game and not in reality. Sport in this way may be the moral opium of the people. For example, C.L.R. James, in his book Beyond a Boundary, gives the example of how on the playing field, racism was nonexistent. The important thing was the competition, the cooperation, teamwork, and friendship. But as soon as the players left the playing field the racial prejudices returned and this the racists felt was all right. After all we treat you as equals on the playing field, what more do you want?"

---

[16] For example, see D. Stanley Eitzen, "Sport as Microcosm of Society," in Sport in Contemporary Society

This situation is analogous to Marx's criticism of religion. Religion, says Marx, "is the imaginary realization of the human essence…"[17] Thus, to tolerate the misery on earth, people live in imagination and all that is good is played out in this imaginary world. In this way what is miserable and less than good is tolerated. "Religion is the sigh of the oppressed creature, the feeling of a heartless world, and the soul of the soulless circumstances. It is the opium of the people."[18] Sport could represent an alienation in this sense and become the opium of the people in a similar way.[19] All the virtues could be carried out in the sport instead of in our own day-to-day lives, as C.L.R. James points out. On the cricket field there was no prejudice—not on the field, a place of honor—not in heaven! Thus the players alienate their good qualities from themselves and live them out in an imaginary realm. But neither sport nor religion is wholly imaginary.

In sport the realm is not imaginary. As a matter of fact in sport the prejudices were not and are not dropped. As C.L.R. James points out, there were black captains in cricket. There was indeed teamwork and friendships on the field which were not acknowledged off the field, but other prejudices carried over into the sport itself. So that after all the talk about no prejudices, there clearly was. So what happened? When pointed out as glaring prejudice it forced people to recognize what they were doing. By focusing on a specific point, changes were made.[20] Hopefully this dramatization and change carried over into society spurring further changes in society, which leads me to the aspect of sport that it affects what it reflects. Sport is not a mere passive reflection, but is active in that it affects society even when it is not intended.

We can see this in the circumstances and changes in our own society and in sport in America, in particular baseball, football and basketball. In baseball there were black and white leagues, no integrated teams. This was a glaring violation of the ideal. When dramatized and thus with the emergence of Jackie Robinson into the Brooklyn Dodgers, it stimulated or provoked analysis and criticism of wider issues in society. More recently the issue of black managers has been raised, and when Al Campanis, then Vice-President of the Los Angeles Dodgers, answered that blacks do not have the requisite abilities to manage, he was chastised and relieved of his position. And after that, we had Marge Schott, owner of the Cincinnati Reds, whose racist comments landed her a suspension. In an interview she commented that "everyone" uses these comments, so why was she singled out? While she may be right, the point is that it serves to put people on notice to recognize these issues in society and that people in power are most in need of this awareness. But even further, while these examples may reflect society prejudices, they also serve to perpetuate them. People in power as well in other roles in our society, by their very chosen positions, take on the duties attached with those positions, because they exemplify what is allowed in society. This includes owners, CEOs, public athletes, professors, to name a few. It is through these people that society learns what is proper, what is tolerated, and is right or wrong. So Marge Schott, Dennis Rodman, John McEnroe, Marion Jones all have duties beyond the general public. Once you choose to become a public figure, you also choose the duties that go along with this because it is the nature of being a public figure that you affect others in society. Since sports have become the most public of all professions, they impose more duties. Sports figures are role models; it goes with the territory.[21]

This can be extended to other areas as well, in particular feminist issues. The Title IX ruling of 1972 requires that schools not discriminate in their athletic programs on the basis of sex. Though even today this is met with resistance, most schools complied with this ruling and provided teams and coaches for females. Some schools did the bare minimum just to placate females and keep the law off their backs. Other schools provided facilities and revenue to provide competitive and challenging sports. Now it could stop there by claiming that the challenges have been provided, and that is enough. But because sports are viewed by many people as insignificant, sex equality in sports is tolerated, but not necessarily extended to or tolerated in the society in general, in business or politics. But rather than permit this, sports can serve to show that many of the old ideas held about women were simply prejudices—prejudices such as women being weak, not competitive, rendered incapacitated by their biology, etc.—and in this way sport may again

---

[17] Marx, 64

[18] Ibid

[19] See for an analysis of this concept.

[20] Recall the controversy and changes surrounding the Al Campanis affair resulting in black baseball managers

spur moral change. "If women's athletic potentialities are taken with as much seriousness as a man's, it will become more evident that sport concerns not only mankind but humankind and deserves to be viewed as a basic human enterprise."[22] Gender equity is presently one of the biggest issues facing the NCAA and college athletics.

This serves to strengthen the analogy between sport and religion. Both sport and religion are only partially or temporarily in an imaginary realm. Prejudices carry over in both sport and religion, and in this way are reflections of the wider society. But because sport dramatizes and affects these prejudices, it turns and helps change society in a way that religion does not. Religion may serve a similar function, and often does, but only when it approaches the public dramatization as in sport.

It is in recognition of this dramatization that unlike Marx's recommendation that religion be abolished to destroy the illusion, this "holy form of self-alienation … to establish the truth of the here and now,"[23] neither sport nor religion ought to be abolished. Rather both should continue to dramatize our ideals and our virtues, as well as our prejudices and vices. In this way both may serve to spur moral change. But because sports involve a more public realm, the dramatizations are move visible and prominent. And further sports are concerned with the here and now in a way that religion is not. Sport is only "imaginary" in the sense that it is set apart from the normal everyday work world, and like religion may serve to help individuals tolerate the miseries of that workaday world. But it is the here and now that the participants are finding solace, not in any life after death. And so it is in the here and now that sports may serve to spur moral change. This can be seen in television ads that show young girls participating in sports and how this is good for them. The television promotion of the U.S. National Soccer Team does the same. These show that the old prejudices were just that, and that girls and women can and should participate to receive the same benefits men have so long enjoyed.

In religion it is in heaven where everything is just and good and this goodness depends on God, not us. We can't make it good on earth, only God can. In sport this goodness depends on us, not God. Sport has no God; there is no pretense that the perfect realm of sport is God's. Sport is of human beings and human creations. Thus for moral change no gigantic step is required. We don't have to wait for God to do it; it is within our present abilities. Sports reveal who we are and may reflect who we are in society, but it is up to us to recognize our duties to ourselves and others. In this way sport serves a different but compatible function. And in this function lies its moral significance.

IV

That everyone is entitled to self-respect and self-esteem is undisputed. These are as Rawls claims, primary social goods. That everyone has capacities that ought to be developed is also undisputed, capacities that include the moral, the rational, and the aesthetic. These are often referred to as "uniquely human attributes." What are required for self-respect, self-esteem, and the development of these attributes are activities. One kind of activity is productive activity, i.e. work. But another kind of activity is also required and that is "unalienated" activity—activity designed for no end outside itself, designed to emphasize creativity and enjoyed for its own sake. Work cannot always serve this function, so some other activity is necessary. Sports, I have argued, are such activities. And further there are all kinds of sports at all levels of participation. Thus sports are the single most available unalienated activities which provide autonomous agents a vehicle for self-expression, self-respect, and self-development, because the excellence of the athletes in themselves. In this way sports serve to humanize individuals and thus serve a significant moral function.

Sports also serve a significant moral function to the society at large. I have argued that in its dramatization and active reflection, sports may spur moral change. But while sports may be the "art of the people," they may also serve as the moral opium of the people.[24]

---

[22] Weiss, 228. Also see Jane English's essay in this collection.

[23] Marx 64.

[24] I have had the benefit of helpful comments and criticisms from a number of students and colleagues, most notably Bernard Boxill, Thomas E. Hill, Jr., Jacob Hale, Kit Wellman, Shirl Hoffman, participants at the Hillsdale College Conference, "Who's on First? Liberal Arts, Christianity or Sports," where an earlier version of this paper was presented, the Johnston Scholars Honors and my First Year Seminar students at

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, April 13, 2007 4:48 PM
To: Given, Emily <given@email.unc.edu>; Laurel Goldstein <goldstel@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Quiz 6
Attach: Quiz #6-Spr 07.doc

I've attached the quiz. But before I put it on I have two questions:
Should we require 2 reconstructions or just one?
Should we have it due on Wednesday instead of Monday?

Thanks,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

PHILOSOPHY 275-SPRING 2007	QUIZ #6

FORMALLY RECONSTRUCT TWO OF THE THREE PASSAGES YOU DID NOT WRITE YOUR PAPER ON. For example, if you wrote your paper on Abortion, then you choose 2 of the other 3 to reconstruct.

NO ANALYSIS IS REQUIRED—ONLY THE FORMAL RECONSTRUCTION. Reconstruction means setting the argument in the formal structure as noted in Section I of the paper format.

Any quiz written in paragraph form will not be graded.

Be sure to put your name, section number, PID, and Honor Pledge on your quiz.
DUE: IN CLASS MONDAY, APRIL 16th.

PASSAGES TO BE RECONSTRUCTED:

1. Because a person's right to life is stronger and more stringent than the woman's right to decide what happens in and to her body, abortion cannot be morally justified.

2. Given that white males have benefited from full membership in our society, preferential treatment is justified for women and minorities who have not so benefited.

3. Equal opportunity requires that women be given equal access to sports for their basic benefits and an equal share in the scarce benefits; Title IX ought to be implemented as a step toward that goal.

4. There ought to be ordinances to restrict pornography because pornography is harmful to women. It is implicated in the committing of violent crimes against women, and among other things, its dissemination supports sexist attitudes and reinforces women's oppression.

BONUS QUESTION: I will give you this in class before you turn your quizzes in.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, April 13, 2007 10:22 PM
To: Laurel Goldstein <goldstel@email.unc.edu>; Given, Emily <given@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Quiz 6
Attach: Quiz #6-Spr 07.doc

I have posted the take home quiz on blackboard. I decided to leave off the abortion one as most students did that one, and the reconstruction is done in the notes. So I left only the other three, and I thought to just have them do one! And it will be due on Wednesday, rather than Monday. So no excuses, and no late ones accepted. Hope this is okay.

Have a good weekend.

Jan

PHILOSOPHY 275	QUIZ #6-TAKE HOME	SPRING 2007

FORMALLY RECONSTRUCT ONE OF THE THREE PASSAGES YOU DID NOT WRITE YOUR PAPER ON. For example, if you wrote your paper on affirmative action, then you choose 1 of the other 2 to reconstruct.

NO ANALYSIS IS REQUIRED—ONLY THE FORMAL RECONSTRUCTION. Reconstruction means setting the argument in the formal structure as noted in Section I of the paper format.

Any quiz written in paragraph form will not be graded.

Be sure to put your name, section number, PID, and Honor Pledge on your quiz.
DUE: IN CLASS WEDNESDAY, APRIL 18th.

NO LATE QUIZZES WILL BE ACCEPTED.

PASSAGES TO BE RECONSTRUCTED:

1. Given that white males have benefited from full membership in our society, preferential treatment is justified for women and minorities who have not so benefited.

2. Equal opportunity requires that women be given equal access to sports for their basic benefits and an equal share in the scarce benefits; Title IX ought to be implemented as a step toward that goal.

3. There ought to be ordinances to restrict pornography because pornography is harmful to women. It is implicated in the committing of violent crimes against women, and among other things, its dissemination supports sexist attitudes and reinforces women's oppression.

BONUS QUESTION: I will give you this in class before you turn your quizzes in.

PHILOSOPHY 266	ETHICS IN SPORTS	Dr. Jan Boxill
Summer I 2007		Office: Caldwell 102B
MTWRF 9:45-11:15 Caldwell 105		Office Hours T11:30-12:30;W 1-2
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu		Phone: 962-3317

REQUIRED TEXTS:

Fair Play: Sports, Values, and Society, by Robert Simon	(FP)
Sports Ethics: An Anthology, by Jan Boxill	(SE)
Elements of Moral Philosophy, by James Rachels	(EMP) (Recommended)

"To whom much is given, much is required."
"You can discover more about a person in an hour of play than in a year of conversation."

Sports play a significant role in the lives of millions of people throughout the world, as participants, fans, spectators, and critics. Sport provides a unique model for understanding our own society. We certainly saw this during the Sydney Olympics. Even those who are uninvolved, bored or critical of sports are often affected by them. Because sports are significant forms of social activities, they raise a wide range of issues, some factual, some explanatory. E.g. sociologists may be concerned with whether or not sports affect society; psychologists may be concerned with personality features which contribute to success or failure in sport. In addition to these questions, sports also raise philosophical issues that are conceptual and ethical in nature. Conceptual questions ask how we understand the concepts and ideas that apply to the world of sports. What are sports? What is involved in competition? Ethical questions raise moral concerns many of us have about sports. Is there too much emphasis on winning and competition? Are college sports getting out of hand? Indeed do competitive athletics belong on campus? Has commercialization of sports undermined their integrity?

This course will examine these and other ethical issues in American sports, including, but not limited to, Title IX, gender equity, racism, sexism, cheating, violence, and drug use. My concern will be to gain an understanding of the moral significance of sport through readings and class discussion. We may not be able to resolve the issues, but we should at least gain a greater understanding of the issues, which should serve as beginnings to resolutions.

CLASS REQUIREMENTS: All work will be posted on Blackboard.

Assigned Readings:	(See schedule—also see Blackboard for any changes.
Quizzes:	5 in class quizzes; 1 will be dropped; some may be unannounced—NO MAKE UP QUIZZES
Paper:	One paper (3-5 pages) Topics will be posted on Blackboard
Class Participation:	Participation makes for a much more enjoyable and interesting class; but discussion is also crucial to understanding and reasoning. You should be prepared to discuss the essays assigned. Questions will be posted on Blackboard for class discussion.
Final Exam:	Exam Format: Multiple Choice; Short answer; Short essay. Final Exam Date:Monday, June 19 at 8 a.m.

GRADE IN COURSE:

Paper:	25%
Quizzes:	20%	(5% each)
Participation:	20%
Final Exam	35%

THE HONOR CODE

The Honor Code is, as always, in effect in this course, and will be taken very seriously. If you have any questions at all about these matters, please do not hesitate to ask me.

It shall be the responsibility of every student at UNC to obey and to support the enforcement of the Honor Code, which prohibits lying, cheating, or stealing when these actions involve academic processes or University, student, or academic personnel acting in an official capacity. It shall be the further responsibility of every student to abide by the Campus Code; namely, to conduct oneself so as not to impair significantly the welfare or the educational opportunities of others in the University Community.

With this in mind: NO CELL PHONES OR OTHER ELECTRONIC DEVICES ARE PERMITTED IN CLASS

READINGS/ASSIGNMENTS: Readings may change, check Blackboard for any changes

Week 1	May 16	Introduction to the course. Open discussion; significance of above quotes
	May 17	Sports Ethics (SE), Introduction: The Moral Significance of Sport, pages 1-12
	May 18	Fair Play (FP), Chapter 1: Introduction: Philosophy of Sport, pages 1-12;
	May 19	Ethical Theories – lectures; outline on Blackboard (EMP)
Week 2	May 22	Quiz #1
	May 22-24	Sport and Education
		SE: Section I: Readings, pages 16-60
		Robert Simon, "Sports, Relativism, and Moral Education"
		Janice Moulton, "Why Everyone Deserves a Sporting Chance: Education, Justice, and School Sports"
		Peter Heinegg, "Philosopher in the Playground"
		Francine Hardaway, "Foul Play: Sports Metaphors as Public Doublespeak"
	May 25	Quiz # 2
	May 25-26	Sport and Competition
		FP: Chapter 2, The Ethics of Competition, pages 13-36
		SE: Section III: Essays 11-16 pages 107-171
		Jan Boxill, "The Ethics of Competition"
		Nicholas Dixon, "On Winning and Athletic Superiority"
		Dean Smith, "Winding Down, Looking Ahead"
		Robert Butcher and Angela Schneider, "Fair Play as Respect for the Game"
	May 29	HOLIDAY—No Class
Week 3	May 30	Quiz # 3
	May 30	Sport and Sportspersonship
		FP: Chapter 3, Cheating and…, Part I, pages 37-51
		SE: Section II: Essays 6-10, pages 63-103
		James Keating, "Sportsmanship as a Moral Category"
		Peter Arnold, "Three Approaches Toward an Understanding of Sportsmanship"
		Kathleen Pearson, "Deception, Sportsmanship, and Ethics"
		Nicholas Dixon, "On Sportsmanship and 'Running up the Score'"
	May 31	Guest Lecture by Dr. Tim Taft, Professor of Orthopaedics & Head of Sports Medicine
	June 1-2	Sport and Drugs
		FP: Chapter 4, Enhancing Performance through drugs, Part I, pages 71-92
		SE: Section IV: Essays 17-19, pages 175-196
		Robert Simon, "Good Competition and Drug-Enhanced Performance"
		Laura Morgan, "Enhancing Performance in Sports: What is Morally Permissible"
		Michael Lavin, "Sports and Drugs: Are the Current Bans Justified?"
Week 4	June 5	Quiz #4
	June 5-6	Sport and Violence
		FP: Chapter 3, Cheating and Violence, Part II, pages 51-70
		SE: Section V, Essays 20-22, pages 199-222
		Michael Smith, "What is Sports Violence?"
		Brenda Jo Bredemeier, et al, "Values and Violence in Sports Today…"
		Robert Leach, "Violence and Sports"
	June 7	Catch up
	June 8-9	Sport and Gender
		FP: Chapter 5, Equality and Excellence in Sports; pages 93-121
		FP: Chapter 6: Sex Equality in Sports, pages 123-149
		SE: Section VI: Essays 23,25,26,28, 29; pages 226-288
		Jane English, "Sex Equality in Sports"
		Robert Simon, "Gender Equity and Inequity in Athletics"
		Jan Boxill, "Title IX and Gender Equity"
		Catharine MacKinnon, "Women, Self-Possession, and Sport"
		Mariah Burton Nelson, "Stronger Women"
	June 9	Paper due: —HARD COPIES; NO LATE PAPERS ACCEPTED
Week 5	June 12	Quiz #5
	June 12-13	Sport and Role Models
		SE: Section VIII: Essays 34, 35, pages 333-338
		Christopher Wellman, "Do Celebrated Athletes have Special Responsibilities to be Good Role Models?"
		Rick Reilly, "Get the Message?"
	June 14	Commercialization of sport in FP
	June 15:	Last day of class; wrap up and review for final

FINAL EXAM: Monday, June 19 at 8 a.m.
BRING TWO BLUE BOOKS

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, April 17, 2007 9:25 AM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Cc: Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Whaley Family Foundation (revised with your suggestions)

Carlo,
Has this been sent to yet? If not, I've made a few minor changes, but it would be good to get it out asap. Geoff, do you have any other edits?

Thanks,
Jan

Carlo Robustelli wrote:
> Dear
>
> As I mentioned briefly during our meeting this afternoon, the Center
> has a very exciting named professorship opportunity for the Whaley > Family Foundation. Let me first explain briefly how the visiting > professorship works for the Parr Center. Every year the Center > sponsors visiting faculty who are carefully screened and show > excellence in their teaching and their capacity to bring new ideas and > a fresh perspective to Center activities. The visiting professor > teaches two ethics courses each semester and also engages in > activities aimed at advancing the understanding and appreciation of > ethics, such as workshops, seminars, and lectures. As you probably > know the Center moved into its physical location this past August and > all of the Center staff and faculty are in offices in the Center's > suite in Caldwell Hall. Now let me explain how the Whaley Family > Foundation visiting Professorship in Ethics would work. For every > $50,000 donated to the Parr Center the visiting professor will be > named in honor of the Whaley Family Foundation for one academic year.
> Here is a possible scenario: if the Foundation contributed $25,000 to > the Center per year over six years then every other year the visiting > faculty member would be named to the Whaley Family Foundation.
>
> The Center's current operating budget spins out from the interest > earned by the Gary W. Parr Family Foundation endowment. With the > support from the Whaley Family Foundation the Center's expendable > funds would increase . [would we want to add here : ...funds would > increase to allow us to provide more programming.]
>
> I enjoyed our discussion Friday about the need for ethics in the > professions (especially law) and your thoughts and suggestions on ways > to create meaningful sustained programs. Please let me know if you > need any additional information. Thanks so much for lunch.
> Best,
> - Carlo Robustelli
>

The University
of North Carolina
at Chapel Hill
Caldwell Hall, CB# 3125
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

Jan Boxill 919.962.3317 jmboxill@email.unc.edu

AGENDA
April 18, 2007

I. OPENING COMMENTS

II. EVENTS:

PAST –

Liberty & Security Forum-4/14
PPE Workshop—April 13-14

UPCOMING:
FALL 2007

Disabilities Workshop:
September 7-8
Public Lecture Tues, Sept 10. [Honorarium]
Budget:
Grant from UK
Grad School $1000
Disability Services: $500 [but am going to ask for more] Diversity Grant: Must reapply, but should get back the Capital Punishment—Sister Helen Prejean

Workshop separate from visit
Ethics Bowl: November 11
Workshop on Torture—proposed by Tom Hill
John Allison
Fellows Lunch series: Steve Rosefielde

III. BUDGET

$1500 to Adventures and Ideas for Geoff's seminar from last Fall
Working on budget for FAC Meeting

IV. OTHER

FAC Meeting- May 1—Jim Thomas, Public Health; Laura Hanson, Social Medicine; Howard Aldrich, Sociology
Ethics in the News—new one posted; another being edited Ethics in Education grant proposal submitted with Suzanne Gulledge
Meeting with Gary Whaley
Parr Center Staff Proposal—Jan writing it up to meet with Geoff
Management course--submitted
Undergraduate Intern—two students interested; one already on board

Case Resource Book—started with Jan's Grad Ethics Fellows
Painting & Furniture

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, April 17, 2007 10:38 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: budget
Attach: Budget Report 2006-2007, August 1, 2006.doc

This is what I have found. I doubt I had a separate email regarding the $1500 for , but I do recall discussing this when we had the budget meeting. I would also suspect that there is a more detailed accounting of it.

Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

The University
of North Carolina
at Chapel Hill
Caldwell Hall, CB# 3125
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

Jan Boxill, Director 919.962.3317 jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Parr Center for Ethics
Operating Budget FY 2006-2007
(First Guess)

Available Funds:

Parr Family Foundation	$100,000.00
College of Arts and Sciences	$15,000.00
College of Arts and Sciences	$20,000.00
Department of Philosophy	$39,351.67
Department of Philosophy	$17,000.00
Total	$191,351.67

Expenses:

Salary Expenses:

Director's Salary & Benefits	$39,351.67
Program Assistant's Salary & Benefits	$20,320.00
Office Assistant's Salary & Benefits	$38,467.00
Visiting Professor	$44,000.00
Research Assistant	$17,000.00
Total	$159,138.67

Operating Expenses:

Supplies	$6,000.00
Travel	$2,000.00
Communication	$3,500.00
Printing	$1,300.00
Subscription / Dues	$500.00
Total	$13,300.00

One-time Expenses:

Repair and Maintenance of new space	$5,000.00[1]
Moving	$8,000.00[2]
Furniture	$5,000.00
Total	$18,000.00

Program Expenses:

See details of budget plans in chart below:

Total	$19,000.00

Over-all Picture:

Not including Program Expenses:

Available Funds	$191,351.67
Expenses	-$190,438.67
Total	$913.00

Including Program Expenses, expected grants, loans:

Available Funds	$191,351.67
Loan from Philosophy Department	$10,000.00
External Grants and Fellowships	$17,700.00
Expenses	-$190,438.67
Program Expenses	-$19,000.00
Total	$9,613.00

---

[1] Tentative strategy: allocate the costs with 5/9s charged to the Parr Center and 4/9s to the Philosophy Department (which corresponds to the office space division). In this case, if the total cost is $9,000, $5,000 would be charged to the Parr Center. Since this is repair and maintenance, I believe the College should cover it all; but I am not confident they will.

[2] Some of the total charge of $12,000 is related to moving Marc Lange and John Roberts and not just Jan Boxill and Carlo Robustelli.

Program Budget Details

Date	Event/ Research Sponsorship	Budget	Expenses	External (grants, donations, in kind)
Sept. 9, 2006	Public Film Series, part of the Community Genetics Forum 2006	$0.00	$0.00	$0.00
Sept. 15, 2006	Finding the Genome: Group Interests in Genetic Research and Testing Colloquium for Faculty and Graduate Students	$0.00	$0.00	$0.00
Sept. 20, 2006	Public Lecture on "Challenge of Ethics in Sports" for Faculty, Graduate Students, and the Public	$5,000.00	$0.00	$0.00
Oct. 10, 2006	Public Lecture on "Moral Philosophy" for Faculty, Graduate Students, and the Public	$1,500.00	$0.00	$0.00
Oct.10th, 2006	Public Lecture: "Ethics and DNA" African Diaspora Lecture featuring Fatimah Jackson	$750.00	$0.00	$0.00
Nov., 2006	Public Lecture: "Teaching Medical Ethics Using the Case Method", featuring Maggie Little	$3000.00	$0.00	$0.00
Feb., 2007	Public Seminar, "Ethics in a Time of Terror" for Faculty, Students, and public	$3,000.00	$0.00	$0.00
Feb., 2007	Public Lecture on "Happiness and Ethics," for Faculty, Students, and public	$2,500.00	$0.00	$0.00

Date	Event/ Research Sponsorship	Budget	Expenses	External (grants, donations, in kind)
Spring, 2007	Seminar Series: Entrepreneurship featuring David Schmitz	$500.00	$0.00	$0.00
Spring, 2007	Public Lecture on "Ethics and Globalization," for Faculty, Students, and public	$250.00	$0.00	$0.00
Spring, 2007	Public Lecture on "Ethics in Education" for Faculty, Students, and Public	$2,500.00	$0.00	$0.00
Total		$19,000.00	$0.00	$0.00

Anticipated Fund Raising: External Grants & Fellowships

School of Law (for "Ethics in a Time of Terror, Spring 2007) $1,000.00
Gary Family Foundation (for "Ethics in a Time of Terror, Spring 2007) $2,500.00
Economics Club (for "Ethics and Globalization", Spring 2007) $2,000.00
PPE Program (for "Ethics and Globalization", Spring 2007) $1,000.00
Department of Psychology (for "Happiness and Ethics," Spring 2007) $500.00
Department of Biology (for "Happiness and Ethics," Spring 2007) $500.00
Department of Athletics (for "Ethics in Sports," Fall 2006) $1,500.00
Diversity and Multicultural Affairs (for "Ethics in Sports," Fall 2006) $2,500.00
Exercise Sports Science (for "Ethics in Sports," Fall 2006) $500.00
Institute of Arts and Humanities (in-kind contribution of Hyde Hall) $1,700.00
Philosophy Club (for "Teaching Medical Ethics," Fall, 2006) $2,000.00
Department of Philosophy (for "Teaching Medical Ethics," Fall, 2006) $2,000.00

Total $17,700.00

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, April 18, 2007 1:28 PM
To: Roberts, John Thomas <jtrosap@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Ethics Bowl

Hi John,
Could you send an email to the majors regarding the course for the Ethics Bowl. You can let them know that any one can participate. The only prerequisite or co-requisite is one course in ethics, preferable PHIL 160: Intro to Ethics or PHIL 163: Practical Ethics. If anyone has any questions, please feel free to contact me.

_PHIL 396 Section 2 ETHICS BOWL Instructor: Jan Boxill_

The Ethics Bowl provides students with a unique opportunity to practice applying the moral theories and argumentation principles that they learn in their ethics classes. They receive about 15 case studies in advance involving ethical issues in a number of practical contexts, including engineering, law, medicine, personal relationships, school and politics, both nationally and internationally. During the course the students will prepare these cases for presentation in the Regional Ethics Bowl. Questions may concern ethical problems on wide ranging topics, such as the classroom (e.g. cheating or plagiarism), personal relationships (e.g. dating or friendship), professional ethics (e.g. engineering, law, medicine), or social and political ethics (e.g. free speech, gun control, etc.) or global issues (e.g. the impact of globalization, global warming, the environment). Preparing responses to these questions involves a great deal of research, writing and oral presentation. The team sent to the Ethics Bowl competition will be selected from those registered in the course. Before the actual competition, a mock Ethics Bowl will be presented to the Department and also to local high schools as part of the Philosophy Departmentâ€™s outreach program. The regional competition is being sponsored by the Parr Center for Ethics and will be held at UNC-CH in November 17th. Teams are selected from various regionals to advance to the National Ethics Bowl Competition usually held in February.

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, April 18, 2007 2:14 PM
To: Roberts, John Thomas <jtrosap@email.unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: PPE]
Attach: PPE.msg

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, April 18, 2007 2:22 PM
To: MacLean, Douglas <maclean@email.unc.edu>
Cc: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Dept Ceremony & MA

Hi Doug,
As you know we have the Graduation Ceremony for anyone receiving degrees. For the graduate degrees we actually give them their diplomas. Do you know if the paperwork is all done and turned in for the students who have completed their MA thesis and orals, and an you tell me who the MA people are? Two things at least must happen for them to receive their diplomas: the student officially files for the degree, and the sheet that the committee members sign must be turned in. I believe some have delayed their graduation until August. We may recognize them, but they won't have their diplomas. Are you going to be at the ceremony to take part in this?

Thanks,
Jan

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, April 18, 2007 2:39 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>; Lance Westerlund <westy@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Ethics Bowl flyer
Attach: Ethics Bowl Flyers.doc

Can you both work on a flyer for the Ethics Bowl--one that we can have for Friday's UG meeting, to post and also to send out on the UG listserv I've attached the information. You can work on it. The way I have it is with UG majors and minors [I think I left off philosophy], but it isn't necessarily restricted to phil majors.

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, April 18, 2007 8:31 PM
To: Wolf, Susan R <susanw@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Utilitarianism seminar

The official time is Tuesday 4-6:30. The Department website has that time as well.

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Susan Wolf wrote:
> Hi,Jan and Lance,
>
> A poli. sci, grad student just pointed out to me that there is a > discrepancy in the times listed for my course on the philosophy > department website and on the directory of classes. One lists it as > Tuesday afternoon; the other as Thursday.
>
> Please let me know which is the correct time.
>
> Thanks,
>
> Susan

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, April 20, 2007 3:41 PM
To: MacLean, Douglas <maclean@email.unc.edu>; Chapel Hill Philosophy <hobler@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: change of time/room

Hi Doug,
I see that we do have the time set as you suggest. I think it should be possible to use CW 213, but I will check with Gucki on Monday. I'm copying her on this so she has a heads up.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Douglas Maclean wrote:
> Hi Jan,
>
> I'd like to change the time of the class I teach in the fall. I've > worked with the Public Policy department, and they have set this up > and approved it for them. The new proposed date and time are:
>
> PLCY 780/PHIL 805: Thursday 3:30 - 5:50, Dey 207.
>
> Thanks,
> Doug
>
> PS. If there is a seminar room available in Caldwell at that time,
> I'd love to move it there.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, April 20, 2007 6:21 PM
To: Roberts, John Thomas <jtrosap@email.unc.edu>
Cc: Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Our UG Assessment procedure

I think Tom is claiming it is a legal obligation. If we are to do the UG assessment as required by the university, then I would think this would apply to every student who might be included in the assessment procedure. But I guess with all this HIPPA stuff, we should have each student sign a release/consent form. But since this is individual professor's courses who have written the papers explicitly for their courses, should we also have consent forms from them as well?
I am surprised when this was discussed a few years ago that this wasn't brought up.

Jan

John T Roberts wrote:
> Hey Geoff and Jan,
>
> I've put the wheels in motion for our 06-07 UG Assessment to happen.
>
> Tom Hill wrote to me and said that before we can use student papers > for this purpose, we are obligated to get their express permission.
> (I'm not sure if this was a moral obligation or a merely legal > obligation he was talking about.) Do you two think this is true? If > so, does it point to a correctable flaw in our assessment procedure?
>
> best,
> John

PHIL 560 ETHICS BOWL Instructor: Jan Boxill

The Ethics Bowl provides students with a unique opportunity to practice applying the moral theories and argumentation principles that they learn in their ethics classes. They receive about 15 case studies in advance involving ethical issues in a number of practical contexts, including engineering, law, medicine, personal relationships, school and politics, both nationally and internationally. During the course the students will prepare these cases. Questions may concern ethical problems on wide ranging topics, such as the classroom (e.g. cheating or plagiarism), personal relationships (e.g. dating or friendship), professional ethics (e.g. engineering, law, medicine), or social and political ethics (e.g. free speech, gun control, etc.) or global issues (e.g. the impact of globalization, global warming, the environment). Preparing responses to these questions involves a great deal of research, writing and oral presentation. The team sent to the Ethics Bowl competition will be selected from those registered in the course. Before the actual competition, a mock Ethics Bowl will be presented to the public and also to local high schools as part of the Philosophy Department's outreach program.

During a round, each team takes turns presenting its position on a case and critiquing another team's position on a different case. Teams must answer questions about their positions from a panel of judges. Judges assign scores based on logical consistency, clarity, focus and thoroughness. The presentations are evaluated on the following criteria:

Clarity and Intelligibility: Have you stated and defended your position in a way that is logically consistent and a reader/lister can clearly understand your line of reasoning?

Focus on Ethically Relevant Factors: Has you identified and discussed the ethically relevant factors?

Avoidance of Ethical Irrelevance: Has you stayed on track by avoiding preoccupation with issues that are not ethically relevant, or as only having minor ethical relevance, in connection with a case?

Deliberative Thoughtfulness: Does your presentation of its position on a question indicate both awareness and thoughtful consideration of different viewpoints, including especially those that could loom large in the reasoning of individuals who might disagree with the team's position?

The Intercollegiate Ethics Bowl (IEB) combines the excitement and fun of a competitive tournament with a valuable educational experience for undergraduate students.

The regional competition takes place in November and national in March. The course would be offered in the Fall to prepare students for the regional competition. The actual cases are sent out in mid September, so before that the students will look at previous year's cases and read material appropriate to cases in general, including ethical theory.

READINGS to be taken from the following:

Elements of Moral Philosophy, James Rachels
Being Good, Simon Blackburn
On Liberty, John Stuart Mill
Social Ethics: Morality and Social Policy, Thomas Mappes & Jane Zembaty, editors.

Other readings will be assigned as appropriate.

REQUIREMENTS:

I. CASE PREPARATION:

Each student will prepare a minimum of two cases. Each case involves:

1. 2-3 page paper setting out the argument with ethical implications.
2. Present argument to class- 5 minute presentation. Other students write a critique of the presentation with suggested revisions, readings, and research.
3. Revised paper based upon class presentation, discussion, and student critiques. Revised paper will also include an analysis of one aspect of the argument. 3-5 pages which will include bibliography and field research plans.
4. Present revised argument along with analysis: 5-7 minutes. Critiques.
5. Revised paper based on previous discussion. Revised paper will also include analysis of second aspect of the argument: 5-7 pages.
6. Present revised argument along with analysis: 5-7 minutes. Critiques
7. Revised paper based on previous discussion. Revised paper will include objections to your analysis.
8. Present revised argument: 5-7 minutes.
9. Revised paper with completed philosophical analysis: 12-15 pages
10. Oral presentation of completed analysis:
    8 minutes for presentation
    5 minutes for questions
    5-7 minutes rebuttal.

II. EXPERIENTIAL MENTORED RESEARCH STUDY:

1. For each case, students will contact appropriate units for essential background to investigate original problems and gain information regarding the case to be incorporated in the presentations and drafts. Throughout the experience, the work will be supervised and mentored by instructor and Parr Center Visiting Professor, who will assist students with setting appropriate goals. Research will also be assisted by the Parr Center graduate research fellow and the unit head or designate. [E.g. For legal cases, it would involve working with the DA office].

Expected minimum hours: 60

2. Three mock Ethics Bowl competitions: one to the Department/University, and two in local high schools as part of the Department's Outreach Program.

III. FINAL EXAM—In class

Two components: written and oral

GRADE: The final grade will be assessed as follows:

Papers:	30%
Presentations:	30%
Class participation &critiques:	20%
Final Exam:	20%

The course will be limited to 15 students per term.

WEEKLY ASSIGNMENTS:

Week 1:	Readings: Rachels: Chapters 1- & Blackburn Chapters 1- Discuss readings and cases. Assign cases. Discuss appropriate research units.
Week 2:	Readings: Mill, On Liberty; Mappes One-two page reconstruction of the arguments of your cases Five minute oral presentation of the reconstruction Feedback and suggestions from class.
Week 3:	Re-write the reconstruction given the feedback from class. Prepare a bibliography of selected readings appropriate to your cases Present both the re-write and bibliography to the class. Receive student feedback and suggestions.
Week 4:	Annotated bibliography. 1-2 page showing the relevant facts of the case.
Weeks 5-8:	Presentations, discussions,
Week 9-11	Mock Ethics Bowl Competitions
Week 12:	In class discussions in preparation for National Competition.
Week 13:	National Ethics Bowl Competition
Week 14:	Debriefing and discussion of Ethics Bowl Competition; review for final exam.

Sample Cases:

Case #1

Dr. B., a Professor of Psychology at a large research institution, Ohio State University (OSU), has a long distinguished record of working with chimpanzees. In the 1970s, she taught chimps to communicate, first by using American Sign Language and later using graphic symbols. In the last decade, under her direction, two young chimps, Keeli and Ivy, have learned to count and to recognize simple written words. Another chimp, Bobby, has shown an uncanny ability to learn number sequences and even to fill in missing numbers in a sequence. She has learned that chimps can do simple arithmetic, behave similarly to preschoolers, and (along with humans) have the ability to perceive the knowledge state of a peer.

Dr. B., who has dedicated her entire professional life to the study of cognition in chimpanzees, has won international acclaim for her work and was named one of the top 50 women researchers in the nation by Discover Magazine in 2002. Her chimps have been featured on Discovery Channel. However, as funding to support the research center has been hard to come by in the last five years, the university decided to close the research center and send the chimps away. OSU abruptly seized the professor's laboratory on February 28, 2006, changed all the locks, and hired a truck to send all 12 primates (nine chimps and three monkeys) to Primarily Primates, a controversial Texas sanctuary. The university gave the sanctuary a $324,000 trust fund for the animal's care.

Dr. B. vigorously protested the decision. When a restraining order she filed failed to prevent the university from implementing its decision, Dr. B. chained herself to the center's gate to prevent the transport trucks from leaving. Her efforts were unsuccessful and one of the chimps, 25-year old Kermit, died during the 38-hour transport in early March. Bobby was found dead in his enclosure on April 20. One of the monkeys escaped and was never recovered. Dr. B sued OSU to win custody of the remaining chimps. PETA also joined the suit on behalf of the remaining seven chimps and two monkeys and in June a Texas judge ordered that an independent trustee should oversee the $324,000 funding to ensure that it be used to house and benefit the remaining OSU primates.

Case #2

Wisconsin State Representative Dan LeMahieu (R-Oostburg) was outraged when the University of Wisconsin-Madison's University Health Services (UHS) featured ads in the two student newspapers suggesting that students consider receiving prescriptions for emergency contraception (EC) prior to leaving for spring break. UHS services are available to any student at the UW-Madison, and as such they offer health expertise to students in the areas of medical treatment for illnesses and injuries, counseling for stress reduction, smoking cessation, nutrition, dermatology, sports medicine, as well as confidential testing and treatment of sexually transmitted diseases (STDs). Although a part of the state-funded University of Wisconsin System, the ads were paid for using student segregated fees which are not part of taxpayer dollars or academic tuition funds.

Following the publication of the ads, which were part of a series also advising students to protect themselves from sun exposure and limit their intake of alcohol, Representative LeMahieu initiated drafting legislation to ban any university health center in Wisconsin from advertising or distributing the morning-after pill (EC). LeMahieu contends, "I think it's offensive that the university is trying to tell young women to be prepared and to plan ahead so they can have promiscuous activities on spring break. I don't think that it's the role of the university to promote that type of activity, and I believe that's what their ad is asking young people to do." LeMahieu also added that the UW should be "made aware" that many people who are paying state taxes do not appreciate the offensive advertisements.

On June 16, 2005, Wisconsin's State Assembly voted 49-41 in favor of a bill prohibiting University of Wisconsin System health centers from advertising, prescribing or dispensing emergency contraception, making it the first state in the country to move towards banning EC on all state college campuses.

Case #3

Near the end of its fall season, a top executive from the popular reality television competition, Idol Starz, appeared on the Today Show and revealed that the program's contestants either advanced or were cut based on producers' decisions rather than being selected through the program's public text-messaging voting system. The executive went on to state that the show's winners and losers were selected by producers on a round-by-round basis in the hopes that certain "controversial" or "questionable" choices would positively influence ratings, increase fervor for underdog candidates, and create a more developed fan-base which would return to view the show during both current and future seasons.

Given the show's popularity and viewers' commitment to their favorite contestants, the revelation led to a large public outcry condemning the show for dishonesty and false advertising. Many claimed to have been cheated and explained that the show had a responsibility to adhere to the public's decisions about which candidates they preferred. Given special attention during this debate was the show's slogan: "You vote. You decide. Who should be the next Idol Star?"

During ensuing interviews, the show's producers explained that their decisions were based on the fact that they were in the entertainment business and that certain unpredictable events helped to keep the audience invested in the show and provided increased entertainment value. They also argued that, more often that not, their decisions about who should advance or win were in line with the public's desires. When questioned about the program's slogan, one producer was quoted as saying, "Look at it carefully. There is a difference between telling someone to vote and decide who should be the next Idol Star and telling them that their votes will decide the next Idol Star."

Case #4

In a recent case, Florida authorities declined to file charges against a Miami Herald columnist for surreptitiously recording a phone call from a city commissioner who later committed suicide in the newspaper's lobby. Authorities cited the unusual circumstances that led to the taping as the basis for not filing charges against the columnist. These circumstances were not enough for the Miami Herald, who took immediate action to fire the columnist for violating a company policy that prohibited the taping of sources and interviewees without the subject's consent.

State laws related to the recording of phone calls and the courts interpretation of these laws vary widely in the United States. Many of these laws are intentionally written with ambiguous terms and interpretation is typically required on a case by case basis.

The firing of this popular columnist caused much protest around the world. Many members of the Herald staff signed a petition requesting the decision to fire the columnist be rescinded. The columnist was friends with the city commissioner, and the commissioner provided regular sources for stories to the columnist.

According to the columnist, the commissioner was despondent over public allegations about his sex life and the tone of his voice on the phone conversation was so alarming that the columnist impulsively decided to record the conversation. The tape records the columnist's attempts to calm the commissioner. Throughout their 20-minute conversation, the columnist attempted to steer the conversation to less volatile subjects in the hopes of lifting the commissioner's spirits. But the call ended with the commissioner still despondent. A few minutes later, the commissioner shot himself.

Following the suicide, the columnist told editors of the Miami Herald that he had been interviewing the commissioner earlier in the day and had recorded part of the conversation without the commissioner's consent.

After being fired, the columnist was quoted as saying "In a tense situation I made a mistake. The Miami Herald executives only learned about it because I came to them and admitted it. I told them I was willing to accept a suspension and apologize both to the newsroom and our readers. Unfortunately, the Herald decided on the death penalty instead."

The Miami Herald editors have taken the position that there must be an absolute prohibition of the paper's reporters taping conversations without a party's consent, and not just because it is against the law in Florida, as it is in many states. An executive of the Herald has stated that the policy is necessary to protect the paper's integrity, as well as to foster trust from news sources.

Journalists at the Miami Herald have pointed out that at least one other reporter surreptitiously taped an interview, but was not fired. The journalists also have also stated that there is no written policy on taping conversations and that any verbal policy on expectations of reporters is unclear. The Miami Herald responded to the alleged case of a previous surreptitious taping by saying "we understand this happened 18 years ago". They went onto state that the recent decision to fire the columnist was clearly guided by the environment in which journalists operate today; which is much more constrained in terms of the latitude given for violation of law and policy.

Case #5

Beginning in 2005, protests at funerals for military personnel killed in Iraq have been increasing – and have received much media attention. In particular, members of the Westboro Baptist Church, in Topeka, Kansas, have been especially visible and vocal at many of these military funerals. Reverend Fred Phelps and his protesters claim that U.S. military deaths in Iraq are because America tolerates homosexuals and that they are a sign of divine punishment for America's tolerance of homosexuality. For over a year now, members of this anti-gay church have been crisscrossing the United States, holding more than one hundred protests outside the funerals of U.S. soldiers killed in Iraq.

They wave placards with such expressions as: "You're Going to Hell," "Fag Vets, God Hates You," and "Thank God for IEDs" (the improvised explosive devices responsible for killing many military personnel in Iraq). Phelps contends that all American soldiers are guilty by association – because they are fighting in the service of the U.S. government.

By Spring, 2006, twenty-eight states and Congress were rushing to pass laws to restrict protests outside military funerals. On May 17, 2006, Illinois Governor Rod Blagojevich signed a state law – "Let Them Rest in Peace Act" – that prohibits disruptive and inflammatory protesting 30 minutes before a funeral, during the service, and 30 minutes after a funeral while remaining 200 feet from the funeral site. This new Illinois law drew immediate scorn from Shirley Phelps-Roper, attorney for the Westboro Baptist Church: "The law is impotent. You've done nothing to change that God is killing your children and sending them home in body bags. Keep your big, fat snout out of our religion."

In the U.S. Congress, Representative Mike Rogers (R-Mich.) sponsored a House bill to address this matter. He said that he took up the issue after attending a military funeral in his home state, where mourners were greeted by "chants and taunting and some of the most vile things I have ever heard. Families deserve the time to bury their American heroes with dignity and in peace." On May 24, 2006, Congress passed legislation that would bar demonstrators from disrupting military funerals at national cemeteries.

The "Respect for America's Fallen Heroes Act" prohibits protests within 300 feet of the entrance of a national cemetery and within 150 feet of a road into the cemetery from 60 minutes before to 60 minutes after a funeral. Those violating the act would face up to a $100,000 fine and up to a year in prison. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said that this act "will protect the sanctity of all 122 of our national cemeteries as shrines to their gallant dead. It's a sad but necessary measure to protect what should be recognized by all reasonable people as a solemn, private and deeply sacred occasion."

In response to this federal legislation, Phelps has said that Congress was "blatantly violating the First Amendment rights to free speech" in passing the bill. He said that he will continue to demonstrate but would abide by the restrictions. Constitutional experts are warning that protest restrictions – such as those passed in Illinois and in Congress – appear overly broad and are likely to be overturned if challenged in court. Eugene Volokh, a law professor at the University of California-Los Angeles and an authority on the First Amendment, said: "You can't treat speech as a breach of peace simply because it offends people. These protests are tremendously offensive and hard to ignore. But ignoring them or counter-protesting is unfortunately the only remedy the 1st Amendment allows." And, the American Civil Liberties Union has filed a lawsuit against a new Kentucky law, saying that it goes too far in limiting freedom of speech and expression. Additional lawsuits are expected to be filed.

U.S military veterans find Phelps' beliefs and actions particularly abhorrent, and in November, 2005, veterans' motorcycle groups began showing up at military funerals to oppose the protesters and to show support for the families of the deceased soldiers. Calling themselves the Patriot Guard Riders, these motorcycle groups have organized hundreds of counter-protesters to wave American flags and stand silently in front of the Westboro picketers, to pay respects to the fallen soldier, and to protect the soldier's family from disruptions.

Case #6

Alejandro Toledo, President of Peru, has launched a public campaign demanding that Yale University return to Peru Incan artifacts excavated at Machu Picchu in 1912. Yale professor Hiram Bingham III, guided by a native Peruvian, came upon the Incan city of Machu Picchu in 1911. Bingham secured backing from the National Geographic Society and support from Peru's government for archeological excavations at Machu Picchu in 1912 and again in 1914-15.

In October 1912, Bingham gained the Peruvian government's permission to bring to Yale for research the contents of 170 tombs in Machu Picchu. The decree allowed that Peru reserve the right to ask for the return of the objects.

By 1916, Peru, suspecting Bingham of secretly taking Incan gold, ended Bingham's work at Machu Picchu. The items taken to Yale from the 1914-15 excavations were loaned for only 18 months. Yale has refused several Peruvian requests for return of the artifacts.

Today, Yale claims that they have complied with the 1912 and the 1916 agreements, returning the objects to Peru during the 1920's. Yale sees no similar responsibility to return the items taken from earlier work. National Geographic Society records show that about half of the items were returned to Peru, with no mention of the remaining artifacts.

Luis Guillermo Lumbreras, the director of Peru's National Institute of Culture in Lima, claims that Yale has had 90 years to complete research on the objects, and now Peru wants the items returned. Peru elected its first indigenous president–Alejandro Toledo, who honored the nation's Incan heritage by holding part of his inauguration ceremony at Machu Picchu in 2001. In part due to his influence, Peru wants possession of the artifacts, which have formed the core of Yale's impressive, scholarly exhibition: Unveiling the Mystery of the Incas. After traveling to six cities and attracting over a million visitors, the exhibit now resides at Yale's Peabody Museum of Natural History in Connecticut.

The recent research of Yale professors Lucy Salazar and her husband Richard L. Burger, including extensive scientific analysis of burials, has provided the most reasonable explanation for the existence of Machu Picchu. Rather than supporting the earlier ideas of the city as a center for religious activity including the sacrifice of virgins, the professors' research has suggested that the city served as a simple country retreat from the Inca capital of Cuzco.

The number and kinds of artifacts taken to Yale from Machu Picchu is in dispute. Yale has offered to return some of the pieces to Peru, if Peru allows it to keep others at the Peabody Museum of Natural History, where Machu Picchu is the prize exhibit.

Case #7

In October of 2002, after the overdose of one of its workers, management at a Weyerhaeuser, a multinational corporation in the pulp and paper industry located in Valliant, Oklahoma, became concerned that employees were not following drug and safety regulations in its parking lot. Management decided to have the parking lot searched with gun and drug sniffing dogs. While the dogs found no drugs, they did find firearms in twelve vehicles, including shotguns and automatic weapons. The owners of these vehicles, including a 23-year veteran shift manager, were fired in the next two days.

Weyerhaeuser and many other businesses have had long standing bans on firearms brought into the plant in order to protect workers and prevent workplace violence. In 2002, Weyerhaeuser extended this ban to the parking lot. Many workers claim they were not told of the extension of the ban, though management claims they informed workers. Some of the fired workers have filed suits claiming they were not informed. The initial suit was thrown out, but the decision is being appealed.

Since this and other incidents, many states -- beginning with Oklahoma -- have enacted laws protecting workers who want to keep firearms in their cars. The latest state to consider such a law is Florida, home to Walt Disney World, which does not allow any of its 50,000+ employees to bring guns onto company property.

A number of corporations have joined federal lawsuits against these new state laws. These companies include ConocoPhillips (petroleum), Halliburton (energy), and the Nordam Group (aircraft manufacture). They state that they cannot provide a safe and secure workplace without the ban on guns in the parking lot, and they see state laws allowing guns as infringing on the right of private property owners to decide what is and is not allowed on their property. Even aside from their property rights, companies claim that the laws would disregard public safety. The Bureau of Labor Statistics Census of Fatal Occupational Injuries states that in 2004, there were 551 workplace homicides out of 5703 workplace fatalities. A study at the University of North Carolina claims that such killings are five times more likely to occur at workplaces that allow guns compared to those who do not.

The National Rifle Association (NRA) has been the primary champion of laws that allow workers to have guns in cars in company parking lots. The NRA claims that prohibiting lawful gun owners to keep guns in their car dramatically diminishes their right to own firearms and defend themselves. All 50 states allow the transportation of firearms for lawful purposes. The laws also restrict workers who may want to hunt or target shoot after work from engaging in these lawful activities. They also claim that one's car should enjoy the same protections that one's home enjoys with regards to being able to keep lawful weapons and immunity to unlawful searches.

The NRA claims that the state laws already have commonsense provisions in them that prevent abuse. For instance, anyone wanting to transport a firearm and park their car in a company lot must keep the automobile locked, and at no time is it permissible to take the firearm out of the car on company property. Against the property rights claims of business owners, the NRA claims that business owners are already under extensive federal, state, and local regulations about what they can do with their property and that striking down these state laws would allow companies to "micro-manage" the contents of an employee's automobile. The NRA also cites statistics that 84% of workplace murders are committed by strangers, and anyone determined to commit a crime will not be discouraged from bringing the gun onto company property by a company regulation prohibiting guns in parking lots.

Case #8

After several years of miscarriages, Edward and Susan turn to in vitro fertilization as a means of screening embryos for genetic defects. More than two years elapse, with all the attendant discomfort and expense, but finally an “acceptable” embryo is produced and implanted. To their joy, nine months later they are blessed by Michelle, an apparently happy, healthy baby.

They decide that they will not tempt fate by trying to increase their family, instead choosing to relish the raising of their daughter. Five years pass and they eagerly anticipate Michelle's starting kindergarten. They have elected to enroll her in a well-respected private school so as to realize her fullest potential. Part of the school's pre-entry preparation is an extremely thorough set of physical examinations. (The physical examinations are not done to screen for admission, but rather to anticipate potential health issues while the student is enrolled.)

To their horror, the examinations determine that Michelle has early symptoms of a particularly virulent form of Acute Childhood Lymphoid Leukemia. Nothing in the embryonic screening could have predicted its occurrence. They begin immediate conventional treatments which prove to be ineffective. At their oncologist's recommendation they enroll her in the nation's premier pediatric oncology program. She gives them the bad news that Michelle shows evidence of having Philadelphia chromosome-positive ALL. The most successful treatment involves hematopoietic stem cell transplantation from matching relatives. The oncology clinic tests both Edward and Susan, but finds neither of them compatible. Since neither of them (nor Michelle) has any siblings, it looks as if they will have to hope for a million-to-one chance of finding a well-matched unrelated donor.

While waiting in the lounge of the clinic, the mother of another child under treatment introduces herself and suggests that they do have another option – they could have another child, via in vitro, selecting among possible embryos for compatibility for transplant. Initially they are horrified at the idea of producing another child as a "biological stockpile" for Michelle, but the more they think about it the better the idea seems. After all, they really had wanted more children. The new child wouldn't be seriously injured by the procedure needed to provide Michelle with the transplant material she so desperately needs. Given their history of medical procedures needed to have Michelle, the screening required to make sure the new child would be a compatible donor is almost the same as if they were just having another child as a family expansion.

When they raise the possibility with Michelle's physician, she explains that the screening technology has improved sufficiently since Michelle's birth to guard against the new child's having the same disposition toward this disease. But, before she will go further, she tells them they must speak with the clinic's counselor. The counselor asks them to consider what their true motives are in proposing the conception of this second child, whether they would be treating her as a person or as an object and how they will explain to her the reason for her conception.

Case #9

After 25-30 years of service, ships are at the end of their sailing life and are sold as "End of Life Vessels" to be dismantled primarily to recover the valuable steel which makes up about 95% of the ship. Ship breaking (or ship demolition) is the process of dismantling the structure of an obsolete vessel for scrapping or disposal and includes a wide range of activities, from removing all gear and equipment to cutting down and recycling the ship's infrastructure. However, the only ones who profit from ship breaking are the ship owners. They extract an average of $1.9 million profit per "End of Life Vessel." Ship breaking is also a challenging and controversial process, due to the structural complexity of ships and the many environmental, safety, and health issues involved.

Ship breaking is dangerous and has the reputation of being one of the dirtiest jobs on earth. For minimal dollars a day, workers with little protective gear tear out pipes insulated with asbestos, transformers covered with PCBs, and leaky diesel tanks. Until the late twentieth century, ship breaking took place primarily in port cities in developed countries – including the United States and Europe. Today, however, most ship breaking yards are in developing countries – especially India, China, Bangladesh, and Pakistan. This is due to rules dealing with lead paint and toxic substances. The industry was such a disgrace that, in 2000, Congress acted to stop U.S. registered ships from being sent overseas for scrap. Ship breaking remains an international environmental and labor concern - because ship breaking now occurs mostly in underdeveloped countries where working conditions and environmental impact are not regulated. Also, many ships being scrapped now were made before many international environmental laws were enacted.

In late 2005, a Virginia-based company, Bay Bridge Enterprises, visited the small coastal town of Newport, Oregon, and proposed opening a ship breaking plant on the banks of Yaquina Bay. The company offered up to 125 jobs paying $20 an hour. Their spokesperson indicated that the company had no environmental violations since they have been doing this work, and that they had zero lost-time injuries since 2001. Also, he noted that there is no large-scale ship breaking yard on the West Coast, and that there are about 60 ships anchored in a California bay – just waiting to be moved to a scrap yard. Therefore, there would be plenty of work available at a new ship breaking plant in Newport – for some time to come.

A strong coalition of interested parties in the Newport area emerged in opposition to this proposal. The "Friends of Yaquina Bay" were the group of people most responsible for rallying the community together to try to stop this ship breaking proposal. The Oregon Coast Aquarium and the Oregon State University Hatfield Marine Science Center – both located in Newport – also added major support to the effort to block the proposed plant. Some of the major issues raised by these opponents to the proposal included: the world-wide negative reputation of ship breaking; the safety of towing "ghost ships" (some with a length of up to 540 feet) from San Francisco Bay in California to Newport, Oregon; potential infestation of as many as 100 invasive species on the ships in California that are not in Yaquina Bay; toxins on and in the ships that would escape into the bay and the air, affecting the seafood industry – especially crabbing – as well as the fear of pollution runoff at the Hatfield Marine Science Center and the Oregon Coast Aquarium; and visual pollution. Yaquina Bay is a continentally Important Bird Area – with several endangered species present. There are 15 or more blue heron nests and other bird species on the tide flats near the proposed ship breaking site. The local tides extend 15 miles up the Yaquina River and thus the largest oyster farm in Oregon could be affected. Plus there is fear that money-spending tourists would not view these rusting ships as an asset to the beautiful Oregon coast.

On January 24, 2006, about 200 people packed a meeting room in Newport, Oregon, to hear Mr. Don Mann, general manager of the Port of Newport, announce that "some projects are a good fit, or not a fit at all. Bay Bridge's plan for a ship breaking facility in Yaquina Bay does not qualify in our test for a good fit." Thus, quite surprisingly, it seems, the ship breaking plan for Newport was ended. Mr. Mann continued: "This was not a good business deal for the company, or for the Port. I believe that the environmental issues could have been resolved, but our financial concerns could not be adequately addressed." The vast majority of persons at the meeting were very pleased with this decision.

While this issue was being considered by the town of Newport, Oregon, the office of the Port Commissioners received hundreds of telephone calls of concern – from all over the country. As one commissioner said: "We have gained much free advertising – for the port and community. The whole world knows we're here. This issue is bringing this concern to Oregon, and to the nation." Bay Bridge's next move on the West Coast remains to be seen. The company is still looking for a possible Oregon or Washington port.

Case #10

Ardent R. Porter is an investigatory journalist with a respected Washington-area newspaper, Capitol News Briefly. As a reporter working in and around the D.C. area, Mr. Porter often relies on his long list of contacts in order to glean information that might be useful for the various articles he publishes on corruption within politics and government. By establishing relationships with individuals at all levels of government, Ardent has provided himself with valuable human sources that are often capable of providing him with names, tips, or other information that he could not extract from other channels. Furthermore, a few of Mr. Porter's key contacts are able to pass along hard-to-come-by information about questionable or downright illegal actions taken by government employees or agencies.

One such contact is Ian Stalwart, a mid-level agency administrator who works with individuals who do government "groundwork" as well as with high-level government bureaucrats. As a middleman of sorts, Ian is in a position uniquely suited to evaluating the actions of those who work both below and above him. One of Mr. Stalwart's responsibilities is to watch for and report any illegal activity that he might encounter. Mr. Stalwart takes this role very seriously and his responsibilities as a watchdog were what originally led him to seek out Ardent, a like-minded opponent of corruption and illegality within public service.

It so happened that Mr. Stalwart discovered that many individuals within his agency were working to cover up illegally-awarded, over-billed, or otherwise fraudulent government contracts awarded during the early months of the Iraq War, actions which were in violation of several federal laws, in addition to many agency standards. Upon presenting his discovery to his superiors, Mr. Stalwart was told to disregard his findings and to refrain from further discussing the subject. After pressing for a more sophisticated explanation, he was informed that the contracts in question had been deemed classified through appropriate agency and congressional channels and that because the contracts had been deemed to serve a compelling national security interest, it would be against agency policy (as well as illegal) to discuss them, regardless of any questionable procedural or substantive aspects.

Fully knowing that he was in violation of laws regarding the disclosure of classified information, Mr. Stalwart approached Mr. Porter and revealed everything he knew about the dubious contracts. He also provided Mr. Porter with the names of the individuals implicated in the cover-ups and the names of the administrators who had ordered him to remain silent.

After composing a lengthy and revealing story, Mr. Porter approached his editor about publishing the story, explaining the dilemma presented by the fact that much, if not all, of the story's core material was classified. Following a discussion about publishing the article by the paper's editorial board it was decided that the story would run in the paper's next issue.

Case #11

Students in schools of medicine, nursing, dentistry and veterinary medicine are required to observe actual surgeries (and other procedures) early in their educations as a preliminary exposure to the practices of their field. In fact, such study is thought to be essential in confirming the students' choice of profession. Of course, the observation takes place with the informed consent of the patients (or their guardians). Many pre-medical, pre-nursing, pre-dentistry, and pre-veterinary programs, especially at schools with associated hospitals, are beginning to recommend (or even require) similar observation programs.

The State University Museum has one of the nation's premier exhibits of the history of medicine and allied fields. They include displays replicating Leonardo's anatomy studies, teaching materials from Charles University (in Prague) dating from the 16th century, 18th century "bleeding," and 19th century nutrition studies (among many other presentations).
One of the most popular offerings at the museum is the "surgery room" where films of common surgical procedures can be viewed. Like the student viewing in medical schools, the patients shown have given their informed consent. Not surprisingly, the most identifiable attendees are people who are considering having the operations shown in the pictures. The films have been "sanitized" so that excess gore is avoided, but the surgeries are shown in detail.

Dr. Suarez, curator of the museum and retired professor of neurosurgery, has proposed to the board that rather than using films, which are hard to make and quickly become outdated, observers should be allowed to observe actual, in process surgeries on persons who have consented. After all, the University Hospital is adjacent to the museum and access is convenient. The hospital's operating theaters are set up above the surgical floor but separated from the patient and surgical team by sound- and atmosphere-proof windows. Dr. Suarez suggests that such watching could become a significant educational revenue-generating operation. He points out that special exhibits commonly serve as important financial resources for museums.

When Dr. Suarez proposes this program to the Museum's board of directors, Katherine Osborn (one of the community members of the board) objects vigorously. Although Dr. Suarez's proposal clearly restricts participation to persons "15 and older," Ms. Osborn argues that teens, and perhaps others, will attend surgeries not as education but as entertainment. Her position is that such "exhibitions" will be little better than the "bum fights" and ultraviolent films that have gained popularity in recent years. Ms. Osborn claims that teens will watch surgeries as a replacement for the gore seen while attending the Halloween and Nightmare on Elm Street movies. Her claim is that such actions are exploitative more than educational.

Dr. Suarez responds that actual surgeries come nowhere near the gore commonly shown on TV and in the movies. He points out that we seldom know what motivates people to act as they do in the presence of human affliction. "Do people slow their cars when passing accidents in order to see whether they can help or to see blood and gore? How would we know? Even if an adolescent attended a surgery out of a desire to see gore, might the experience not shift his or her perspective, creating an interest in becoming a medical professional?"

Case #12

Politicians have crossed the floor, or switched parties for as long as political parties have been in place—famous switches include those of Strom Thurmond, Ronald Reagan, Condoleezza Rice, Howard Dean, Hilary Clinton and most recently, Joe Lieberman. In 2001, nine serving members of Congress had switched parties while in office. Various reasons are cited for changing parties, including ideological disagreement with one's current party and moving to improve power and legislative efficacy, among others. U.S. Representative Ralph Hall of the Fourth Congressional District in Texas cites both reasons.

Ralph Hall was first elected in 1980 as a Democrat and has been re-elected each succeeding year. Hall has made a reputation for himself as a rogue Democrat, willing to "cross the aisle" and vote with Republicans when he agreed with their position. He also has been an avid supporter of President Bush, opposed to Democratic bids to unseat him. But it was more than mere ideological agreement that encouraged a decision to switch parties in early 2004 before his bid for reelection.

As Hall stated in a January 2004 press release that announced his decision to switch parties, "This year I was denied requests for district appropriations because I was a Democrat who voted against the bill. I have always stated that … if being a Democrat hurt my district, I would either resign or switch parties." The bill to which he was referring was a "foreign operations bill" which, according to Hall, gave, "financial support to those countries that continue to vote against [the U.S.] in the United Nations."

Another motivation may be found in Hall's appreciation for being spared a potentially career devastating blow in the redistricting that cost many Democrats their seats in 2003. According to a CNN article, "…Hall's move comes after Republican state lawmakers in Austin spared him in a redistricting map that targets every other Anglo Democrat in the House. His district, based in the city of Tyler, was largely untouched by the GOP-drawn map, which is currently facing a Democratic court challenge."

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Saturday, April 21, 2007 1:28 PM
To: Laurel Goldstein <goldstel@email.unc.edu>; Given, Emily <given@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Phil 275 final
Attach: FINAL EXAM NOTES.doc

I've attached a final exam prep. Take a look and see what I've missed, left off, done wrong, etc.
Thanks,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

PHIL 275 FINAL EXAM SPRING 2007 MAY 4th at NOON

READINGS THAT THE FINAL WILL COVER

Men's & Women's Bill of Rights
Rosemarie Tong, Diversity of Feminist Thinking
Collins, Black Feminist Thought
Gilligan, Moral Orientation & Moral Development
Boxill, Football & Feminism
Why Sexist Language Matters
Frye: Oppression, Sexism, On Being White
Lorde: Scratching the Surface
hooks, Chapters Chapters 1-3 (pp 1-13); Chapters 10-11 (pp 55-66); Chapters 14-15 (pp78-92); Chapters 17-19 (pp 100-118).
Richards, A Black Woman Speaks
Jensen, White Privilege
Birth Control Newspaper article
Thomson, A Defense of Abortion
Marquis, Why Abortion is Immoral
Pojman, Affirmative Action
Boxill, Affirmative Action as Reverse Discrimination
About Title IX
Moulton, Why Everyone Deserves a Sporting Chance
Mill, Freedom of Thought and Discussion
Brison, Pornography and Harm

Video: A Class Divided

How to prepare for the final:

1. Go over all quizzes
2. Review the outlines
3. Reconstruct all the passages in the paper topics
4. Prepare the study questions

FINAL EXAM FORMAT: Should take about 2 hours

I. Multiple Choice Questions – [10-12]
II. Short answers [8-10]
These will be very much like the quiz questions
They will be broken up into topics, and there will be choices
III. Reconstruction [1]

OUTSIDE EVENTS DUE: LAST DAY OF CLASS

FINAL EXAM: MAY 4th AT NOON

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, April 23, 2007 2:07 PM
To: Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Hiring

Option 1 is fine with me.

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Geoff Sayre-McCord wrote:
> Dear colleagues,
>
> We have had two very nice successes, with Simon and Ryan both > accepting our offers. I want to express be heartfelt and deep > appreciation to all of you who put so much time in to this process.
> The junior position, which we originally offered Ryan before being > given an additional position for him, will be carried over to next > year. I am hopeful that a second junior position, funded by a > generous gift from Don Caudle, will come on line then too. The young > senior position, for which we have been considering Pamela Hieronymi, > will be carried over if we do not fill it with Hieronymi.
>
> But we need to bring to a close our deliberations regarding Hieronymi.
> I don't believe we would be in a better position to reach a decision > if we deferred this matter until the start of the fall semester. And I > am pretty sure that if we were to wait longer than that we would very > likely lose any chance of hiring her.
>
> Although this is a very busy time of the year, I trust you'll all > agree that it would be irresponsible for us to go forward with a > tenured appointment until we have all read a good deal of Hieronymi's > work and discussed it carefully together.
>
> As I see it, then, we have two options at this point:
>
> (1) We could meet early in the week of the FFM, prior to which > everyone should have read at least the three of Hieronymi's 2005 or > later papers (excluding the book review) -- and perhaps more, for > those members of the department in her areas of specialization (ethics > and mind); or
>
> (2) We could decide now that there is insufficient enthusiasm to merit > doing (1), and accordingly let Hieronymi know that we are not prepared > to go forward at this time.
>
> Hieronymi's papers and an up to date CV, are available on-line here:
> http://admin.cdh.ucla.edu/webpage.php?par=93
>
> I am prepared to carry out whichever of these options receives the > greatest support from you all. Please email either expressing a > preference for (1) or (2) or expressing no preference between them, by > this coming Friday (the 27th). Of course, I would be glad to discuss > this matter further with any of you, if you would like.

> -- Geoff
> --
>
>
>
> Geoffrey Sayre-McCord
> Professor and Department Chair
> Department of Philosophy
> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
>
> Tel: (919) 962-2695
> Fax: (919) 843-3929
> http://philosophy.unc.edu/smccord.htm
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, April 24, 2007 2:16 PM
To: Hill, Thomas E Jr <thill@email.unc.edu>; Wolf, Susan R <susanw@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: revisions to the ethics bibliography
Attach: Proposals for revisions of the Ethics Bibliography.doc

---

My comments are in blue.

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Proposals for revisions of the Ethics Bibliography:

Additions:

Judith Jarvis Thomson, "In defense of abortion"
Peter Singer, "Famine, Affluence, and Morality"
Iris Murdoch, "The Idea of Perfection" [I don't know this piece very well]
P.F. Strawson, "Freedom and Resentment"
Bernard Williams, "Moral Luck"

Susan and Jan,

I think that previously the first two items would have been considered "applied ethics" of a sort we do for the bibliography, but there are representative styles of argument there And they are classics. I don't recall the Murdock but I'm fine with it (she and the tpoic are important). Strawson seems a must. Isn't Nagel's "Moral Luck" on the list? I wouldn't mind having both. (It might be better to have both if students are to write on the topic.)

Yes, Moral Luck is on he exam.
Deletions:

It is easier to recommend additions than to recommend deletions, so I will list several readings that, it seems to me, our students have not actually referred to in the exams in recent years, and that may not be as central to the field as some of the suggestions above. I assume that for each addition, we should also recommend a deletion, so here are some possibilities:

Frances Kamm	"Non-consequentialism, the Person as an End-in-Itself, and the Significance of Status"
Gregory Kavka	"The Toxin Puzzle" "The Reconciliation Project"
Shelly Kagan	"The Additive Fallacy"
Nel Noddings	"Ethics from the Standpoint of Women"
Annette Baier	"Trust and Anti-Trust"

I don't know what feminist moral theory papers are best now, but an update might well be in order. I'm OK with cutting Kagan, Kavka, and Kamm. I don't think we've ever asked a question on those. I am also okay with cutting these three. But I would like to keep something by Noddings and Baier.

Further suggestions:

We have three articles by Philippa Foot on the bibliography – *"Moral Beliefs"
*"Morality as a System of Hypothetical Imperatives"
*"Virtues and Vices"
I wonder whether "Virtues and Vices" needs to be on there, and if so, whether it should be regarded as non-negotiable core reading.
Personally, I find "Utilitarianism and the Virtues" to be a more useful article, and so tentatively recommend substituting the latter for the former, and not making it non-negotiable.
The Foot papers represent different stages in her thinking, and the first two stake out important positions. The last, I thought, makes a nice concise starting point for discussing virtues, but I don't recall "Util. and Virtues" which may be better. I trust your judgment on that, Susan.
My "Moral Saints" was included on the bibliography before I joined the department. Should we perhaps eliminate it, due to my being here? I am of two minds about that, but if the decision is that this is not a problem, then I recommend that we add Tom's article on Self-Respect. "Moral Saints" is a classic and, as you say, got on the list before you came, Susan, and it fits nicely in discussions of several topics. I'd say keep it, but otherwise stick to our policy of not adding essays from our own dept. (but allowing them as substitutions if students want).
I agree leave "Moral Saints" and I agree with that we should add Tom's Self-Respect

Finally, the current bibliography has the following listing:
Eva Kittay and Diana Meyers *Women and Moral Theory
Gilligan, Moral Orientation and Moral Development
Stocker, Duty and Friendship: toward a synthesis of Gilligan's
Constrastive Moral Concepts

Are the Gilligan and Stocker essays that are IN the Kittay/Meyers anthology, or is the anthology itself meant to be non-negotiable required reading?
I think these essays are in the Kittay book,but I don't have access to the book right now. I don't think all the essays in that book should be included.

If the latter, this seems too much. I think the former. Even the former maybe should not be non-negotiable. OK with me, but there should be a core/sample of feminist moral theory non-negotiable, don't you think? I agree

I'll be busy for a few days now, and so I leave it to you, Susan and Jan, to decide and submit the changes.

Thanks for working on it,

Tom

mine." Yet how many years have you spent teaching Plato and Shakespeare and Proust? Or another, "She's a white woman and what could she possibly have to say to me?" Or, "She's a lesbian, what would my husband say, or my chairman?" Or again, "This woman writes of her sons and I have no children." And all the other endless ways in which we rob ourselves of ourselves and each other.

We can learn to work and speak when we are afraid in the same way we have learned to work and speak when we are tired. For we have been socialized to respect fear more than our own needs for language and definition, and while we wait in silence for that final luxury of fearlessness, the weight of that silence will choke us.

The fact that we are here and that I speak these words is an attempt to break that silence and bridge some of those differences between us, for it is not difference which immobilizes us, but silence. And there are so many silences to be broken.

Scratching the Surface: Some Notes on Barriers to Women and Loving*

Racism: The belief in the inherent superiority of one race over all others and thereby the right to dominance.

Sexism: The belief in the inherent superiority of one sex and thereby the right to dominance.

Heterosexism: The belief in the inherent superiority of one pattern of loving and thereby its right to dominance.

Homophobia: The fear of feelings of love for members of one's own sex and therefore the hatred of those feelings in others.

THE ABOVE FORMS of human blindness stem from the same root – an inability to recognize the notion of difference as a dynamic human force, one which is enriching rather than threatening to the defined self, when there are shared goals.

To a large degree, at least verbally, the Black community has moved beyond the "two steps behind her man" concept of sexual relations sometimes mouthed as desirable during the sixties. This was a time when the myth of the Black matriarchy as a social disease was being presented by racist forces to redirect our attentions away from the real sources of Black oppression.

For Black women as well as Black men, it is axiomatic that if we do not define ourselves for ourselves, we will be defined by others – for their use and to our detriment. The development of self-defined Black women, ready to explore and pursue our power and interests within our communities, is a vital component in the war for Black liberation. The image of the Angolan woman with a baby on one arm and a gun in the other is neither romantic nor fanciful. When Black women in this country come together to examine our sources of strength and support, and to recognize our common social, cultural, emotional, and political interests, it is a development which can only contribute to the power of the Black community as a whole. It can certainly never diminish it. For it is through the coming together of self-actualized individuals, female and male, that any real advances can be made. The old sexual power relationships based on a dominant/subordinate model between unequals have not served us as a people, nor as individuals.

* First published in The Black Scholar, vol. 9, no. 7 (1978).

Black women who define ourselves and our goals beyond the sphere of a sexual relationship can bring to any endeavor the realized focus of completed and therefore empowered individuals. Black women and Black men who recognize that the development of their particular strengths and interests does not diminish the other do not need to diffuse their energies fighting for control over each other. We can focus our attentions against the real economic, political, and social forces at the heart of this society which are ripping us and our children and our worlds apart.

Increasingly, despite opposition, Black women are coming together to explore and to alter those manifestations of our society which oppress us in different ways from those that oppress Black men. This is no threat to Black men. It is only seen as one by those Black men who choose to embody within themselves those same manifestations of female oppression. For instance, no Black man has ever been forced to bear a child he did not want or could not support. Enforced sterilization and unavailable abortions are tools of oppression against Black women, as is rape. Only to those Black men who are unclear about the pathways of their own definition can the self-actualization and self-protective bonding of Black women be seen as a threatening development.

Today, the red herring of lesbian-baiting is being used in the Black community to obscure the true face of racism/sexism. Black women sharing close ties with each other, politically or emotionally, are not the enemies of Black men. Too frequently, however, some Black men attempt to rule by fear those Black women who are more ally than enemy. These tactics are expressed as threats of emotional rejection: "Their poetry wasn't too bad but I couldn't take all those lezzies." The Black man saying this is code-warning every Black woman present interested in a relationship with a man – and most Black women are – that (1) if she wishes to have her work considered by him she must eschew any other allegiance except to him and (2) any woman who wishes to retain his friendship and/or support had better not be "tainted" by woman-identified interests.

If such threats of labelling, vilification and/or emotional isolation are not enough to bring Black women docilely into camp as followers, or persuade us to avoid each other politically and emotionally, then the rule by terror can be expressed physically, as on the campus of a New York State college in the late 1970s, where Black women sought to come together around women's concerns. Phone calls threatening violence were made to those Black women who dared to explore the possibilities of a feminist connection with non-Black women. Some of these women, intimidated by threats and the withdrawal of Black male approval, did turn against their sisters. When threats did not prevent the attempted coalition of feminists, the resulting campus-wide hysteria left some Black women beaten and raped. Whether the threats by Black men actually led to these assaults, or merely encouraged the climate of hostility within which they could occur, the results upon the women attacked were the same.

War, imprisonment, and "the street" have decimated the ranks of Black males of marriageable age. The fury of many Black heterosexual women against white women who date Black men is rooted in this unequal sexual equation within the Black community, since whatever threatens to widen that equation is deeply and articulately resented. But this is essentially unconstructive resentment because it extends sideways only. It can never result in true progress on the issue because it does not question the vertical lines of power or authority, nor the sexist assumptions which dictate the terms of that competition. And the racism of white women might be better addressed where it is less complicated by their own sexual oppression. In this situation it is not the non-Black woman who calls the tune, but rather the Black man who turns away from himself in his sisters or who, through a fear borrowed from white men, reads her strength not as a resource but as a challenge.

All too often the message comes loud and clear to Black women from Black men: "I am the only prize worth having and there are not too many of me, and remember, I can always go elsewhere. So if you want me, you'd better stay in your place which is away from one another, or I will call you 'lesbian' and wipe you out." Black women are programmed to define ourselves within this male attention and to compete with each other for it rather than to recognize and move upon our common interests.

The tactic of encouraging horizontal hostility to becloud more pressing issues of oppression is by no means new, nor limited to relations between women. The same tactic is used to encourage separation between Black women and Black men. In discussions around the hiring and firing of Black faculty at universities, the charge is frequently heard that Black women are more easily hired than are Black men. For this reason, Black women's problems of promotion and tenure are not to be considered important since they are only "taking jobs away from Black men." Here again, energy is being wasted on fighting each other over the pitifully few crumbs allowed us rather than being used, in a joining of forces, to fight for a more realistic ratio of Black faculty. The latter would be a vertical battle against racist policies of the academic structure itself, one which could result in real power and change. It is the structure at the top which desires changelessness and which profits from these apparently endless kitchen wars.

Instead of keeping our attentions focused upon our real needs, enormous energy is being wasted in the Black community today in antilesbian hysteria. Yet women-identified women – those who sought their own destinies and attempted to execute them in the absence of male support – have been around in all of our communities for a long time. As Yvonne Flowers of York College pointed out in a recent discussion, the unmarried aunt, childless or otherwise, whose home and resources were often a welcome haven for different members of the family, was a familiar figure in many of our childhoods. And within the homes of our Black communities today, it is not the Black lesbian who is battering and raping our underage girl-children out of displaced and sickening frustration.

The Black lesbian has come under increasing attack from both Black men and heterosexual Black women. In the same way that the existence of the self-defined Black woman is no threat to the self-defined Black man, the Black lesbian is an emotional threat only to those Black women whose feelings of kinship and love for other Black women are problematic in some way. For so long, we have been encouraged to view each other with suspicion, as eternal competitors, or as the visible face of our own self-rejection.

Yet traditionally, Black women have always bonded together in support of each other, however uneasily and in the face of whatever other allegiances which militated against that bonding. We have banded together with each other for wisdom and strength and support, even when it was only in relationship to one man. We need only look at the close, although highly complex and involved, relationships between African co-wives, or at the Amazon warriors of ancient Dahomey who fought together as the King's main and most ferocious bodyguard. We need only look at the more promising power wielded by the West African Market Women Associations of today, and those governments which have risen and fallen at their pleasure.

In a retelling of her life, a ninety-two-year-old Efik-Ibibio woman of Nigeria recalls her love for another woman:

> I had a woman friend to whom I revealed my secrets. She was very fond of keeping secrets to herself. We acted as husband and wife. We always moved hand in glove and my husband and hers knew about our relationship. The villagers nicknamed us twin > sisters. When I was out of gear with my husband, she would be the one to restore peace. I often sent my children to go and work for her in return for her kindnesses to me. My husband being more fortunate to get more pieces of land than her husband, allowed some to her, even though she was not my co-wife.*

On the West Coast of Africa, the Fon of Dahomey still have twelve different kinds of marriage. One of them is known as "giving the goat to the buck," where a woman of independent means marries another woman who then may or may not bear children, all of whom will belong to the blood line of the first woman. Some marriages of this kind are arranged to provide heirs for women of means who wish to remain "free," and some are lesbian relationships. Marriages like these occur throughout Africa, in several different places among different peoples. Routinely, the women involved are accepted members of their communities, evaluated not by their sexuality but by their respective places within the community.

While a piece of each Black woman remembers the old ways of another place – when we enjoyed each other in a sisterhood of work and play and power – other pieces of us, less functional, eye one another with suspicion. In the interests of separation, Black women have been taught to view each other as always suspect, heartless competitors for the scarce male, the all-important prize that could legitimize our existence. This dehumanizing denial of self is no less lethal than the dehumanization of racism to which it is so closely allied.

If the recent attack upon lesbians in the Black community is based solely upon an aversion to the idea of sexual contact between members of the same sex (a contact which has existed for ages in most of the female compounds across the African continent), why then is the idea of sexual contact between Black men so much more easily accepted, or unremarked? Is the imagined threat simply the existence of a self-motivated, self-defined Black woman who will not fear nor suffer terrible retribution from the gods because she does not necessarily seek her face in a man's eyes, even if he has fathered her children? Female-headed households in the Black community are not always situations by default.

* Iris Andreski, Old Wives Tales: Life-Stories of African Women (Schocken Books, New York, 1970), p. 131.

 Melville Herskovits, Dahomey, 2 vols. (Northwestern University Press, Evanston, Illinois, 1967), 1:320-322.

The distortion of relationship which says "I disagree with you, so I must destroy you" leaves us as Black people with basically uncreative victories, defeated in any common struggle. This jugular vein psychology is based on the fallacy that your assertion or affirmation of self is an attack upon my self – or that my defining myself will somehow prevent or retard your self-definition. The supposition that one sex needs the other's acquiescence in order to exist prevents both from moving together as self-defined persons toward a common goal.

This kind of action is a prevalent error among oppressed peoples. It is based upon the false notion that there is only a limited and particular amount of freedom that must be divided up between us, with the largest and juiciest pieces of liberty going as spoils to the victor or the stronger. So instead of joining together to fight for more, we quarrel between ourselves for a larger slice of the one pie. Black women fight between ourselves over men, instead of pursuing and using who we are and our strengths for lasting change; Black women and men fight between ourselves over who has more of a right to freedom, instead of seeing each other's struggles as part of our own and vital to our common goals; Black and white women fight between ourselves over who is the more oppressed, instead of seeing those areas in which our causes are the same. (Of course, this last separation is worsened by the intransigent racism that white women too often fail to, or cannot, address in themselves.)

At a recent Black literary conference, a heterosexual Black woman stated that to endorse lesbianism was to endorse the death of our race. This position reflects acute fright or a faulty reasoning, for once again it ascribes false power to difference. To the racist, Black people are so powerful that the presence of one can contaminate a whole lineage; to the heterosexist, lesbians are so powerful that the presence of one can contaminate the whole sex. This position supposes that if we do not eradicate lesbianism in the Black community, all Black women will become lesbians. It also supposes that lesbians do not have children. Both suppositions are patently false.

As Black women, we must deal with all the realities of our lives which place us at risk as Black women – homosexual or heterosexual. In 1977 in Detroit, a young Black actress, Patricia Cowan, was invited to audition for a play called Hammer and was then hammered to death by the young Black male playwright. Patricia Cowan was not killed because she was Black. She was killed because she was a Black woman, and her cause belongs to us all. History does not record whether or not she was a lesbian, but only that she had a four-year-old child.

Of the four groups, Black and white women, Black and white men, Black women have the lowest average wage. This is a vital concern for us all, no matter with whom we sleep.

As Black women we have the right and responsibility to define ourselves and to seek our allies in common cause: with Black men against racism, and with each other and white women against sexism. But most of all, as Black women we have the right and responsibility to recognize each other without fear and to love where we choose. Both lesbian and heterosexual Black women today share a history of bonding and strength to which our sexual identities and our other differences must not blind us.

Uses of the Erotic: The Erotic as Power*

THERE ARE MANY kinds of power, used and unused, acknowledged or otherwise. The erotic is a resource within each of us that lies in a deeply female and spiritual plane, firmly rooted in the power of our unexpressed or unrecognized feeling. In order to perpetuate itself, every oppression must corrupt or distort those various sources of power within the culture of the oppressed that can provide energy for change. For women, this has meant a suppression of the erotic as a considered source of power and information within our lives.

We have been taught to suspect this resource, vilified, abused, and devalued within western society. On the one hand, the superficially erotic has been encouraged as a sign of female inferiority; on the other hand, women have been made to suffer and to feel both contemptible and suspect by virtue of its existence.

It is a short step from there to the false belief that only by the suppression of the erotic within our lives and consciousness can women be truly strong. But that strength is illusory, for it is fashioned within the context of male models of power.

As women, we have come to distrust that power which rises from our deepest and nonrational knowledge. We have been warned against it all our lives by the male world, which values

* Paper delivered at the Fourth Berkshire Conference on the History of Women, Mount Holyoke College, August 25, 1978. Published as a pamphlet by Out & Out Books (available from The Crossing Press).

TA ASSIGNMENT REQUEST FORM FOR FALL 2007

NAME:_____

I intend to return to the Department and I wish to be considered for a teaching assignment: Yes No

I intend to return to the Department and will be funded by a non teaching fellowship: Yes No

I will be a fifth year student next year and wish to be considered for a dissertation fellowship: Yes No

If you answered "yes" please rank your preferences taking into account your qualifications, your own educational needs and the seminars you plan to take. A Teaching Fellow must have been a TA at UNC for at least two semesters. Rank 1-6, with "1" being your first choice.

TEACHING ASSISTANT

_____	101	Intro to Main Problems	Large Section (4)	Neta	11 MW; F-10 & 11
_____	112	Making Sense of Ourselves	Large Section (4)	Reeve	12 MW F- 12 & 1
_____	272	Peace, War, Defense	Large Section (2)	B. Boxill	12 MW F- 12 & 1

TEACHING FELLOWS

_____	101E	Intro: Main Problems	MW 6-7:15	[Evening Class]
_____	110	Intro: Great Works	TR 3:30
_____	134	Philosophy of Religion	MWF 2
_____	155	Intro to Logic	TR 8
_____	155	Intro to Logic	TR 11
_____	160	Intro to Ethics	TR 8
_____	160	Intro to Ethics	MWF 2
_____	164	Morality and Business	TR 12:30
_____	165	Bioethics	MWF 9
_____	165	Bioethics	TR 6-7:15	[regular class just taught in evening]
_____	170	Social & Political	TR 9:30
_____	230	Experience and Reality	TR 8
_____	230	Experience and Reality	TR 3:30
_____	280	Morality in Law	TR 3:30

Something to keep in mind as you fill this out: The large classes in the Spring 2008 for which we will need TAs are: PHIL 160-Intro to Ethics [4]; PHIL 150-Intro to Philosophy of Science[2 or 4]; and PHIL 163-Practical Ethics [4]; PHIL 155-Intro to Logic [4]

Have you taken Phil 102 or 112? _____ Phil 101?_____

Please indicate your relevant teaching experience to date and any other considerations you would like us to keep in mind when determining your assignment for next term. E.g. If you have not been a TA for a course, but believe you are qualified to teach it, please explain. (Use space below or back of this sheet for other considerations) Feel free to add additional comments.

PLEASE RETURN TO JAN BOXILL NO LATER THAN: April 9, 2007

TA ASSIGNMENT REQUEST FORM FOR FALL 2007

NAME:_____

I intend to return to the Department and I wish to be considered for a teaching assignment: Yes No

I intend to return to the Department and will be funded by a non teaching fellowship: Yes No

I will be a fifth year student next year and wish to be considered for a dissertation fellowship: Yes No

If you answered "yes" please rank your preferences taking into account your qualifications, your own educational needs and the seminars you plan to take. A Teaching Fellow must have been a TA at UNC for at least two semesters. Rank 1-6, with "1" being your first choice.

TEACHING ASSISTANT

_____	101	Intro to Main Problems	Large Section (4)	Neta	11 MW; F-10 & 11
_____	112	Making Sense of Ourselves	Large Section (4)	Reeve	12 MW F- 12 & 1
_____	272	Peace, War, Defense	Large Section (2)	B. Boxill	12 MW F- 12 & 1

TEACHING FELLOWS

_____	101E	Intro: Main Problems	MW 6-7:15	[Evening Class]
_____	110	Intro: Great Works	TR 3:30
_____	134	Philosophy of Religion	MWF 2
_____	155	Intro to Logic	TR 8
_____	155	Intro to Logic	TR 11
_____	160	Intro to Ethics	TR 8
_____	160	Intro to Ethics	MWF 2
_____	164	Morality and Business	TR 12:30
_____	165	Bioethics	MWF 9
_____	165	Bioethics	TR 6-7:15	[regular class just taught in evening]
_____	170	Social & Political	TR 9:30
_____	230	Experience and Reality	TR 8
_____	230	Experience and Reality	TR 3:30
_____	280	Morality in Law	TR 3:30

Something to keep in mind as you fill this out: The large classes in the Spring 2008 for which we will need TAs are: PHIL 160-Intro to Ethics [4]; PHIL 150-Intro to Philosophy of Science[2 or 4]; and PHIL 163-Practical Ethics [4]; PHIL 155-Intro to Logic [4]

Have you taken Phil 102 or 112? _____ Phil 101?_____

Please indicate your relevant teaching experience to date and any other considerations you would like us to keep in mind when determining your assignment for next term. E.g. If you have not been a TA for a course, but believe you are qualified to teach it, please explain. (Use space below or back of this sheet for other considerations) Feel free to add additional comments.

PLEASE RETURN TO JAN BOXILL NO LATER THAN: April 9, 2007

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, April 26, 2007 1:20 PM
To: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: finals exerpt

Final Examinations

Undergraduate courses taught on campus must include a final assessment (i.e., final examination) unless the provost grants an exception. A traditional final examination is written, is administered at a predetermined time as specified in the final examination schedule, and takes place at a designated location. Only the provost can grant exceptions to the scheduled time and location of a traditional examination after review and approval of the appropriate department head and the dean.

The final examination schedule, announced prior to the beginning of the semester, sets the time for each examination. Once having been fixed, the schedule cannot be changed. Examinations must be held at the time shown on the schedule. No special preparation quizzes may be given during the last five days of classes (last two days of classes for Summer School) before the beginning of the final examination period. No examination (except for laboratory sections) may be held at a time other than that specified in the general schedule except with the advance approval of the provost. No examination may start later than 7:00 P.M. Final examinations for a full course should ordinarily cover a minimum of two hours and should not exceed a period of three hours. Only examinations requiring an exceptional portion of practical work should be longer than three hours.

An instructor may, due to highly unusual circumstances, petition for a change in the examination schedule. The petition must be made before the first day of final examinations, and it must be cleared by the department head and the appropriate dean before consideration by the provost. If the petition is approved, the instructor assumes responsibility for making special arrangements to give the examination to any student who has a schedule conflict as a result of the change.

Departmental chairs (i.e., heads of instructional units) must give permission for faculty to use nontraditional examinations, such as a portfolio of a semester's work or a take-home examination. The chair should submit to the appropriate dean an annual summary of the exceptions that were granted. For multidisciplinary and co-taught courses, permission to give a nontraditional examination must be granted solely by the chair of the instructional unit in which the course is based.

All regular final examinations must be held in Chapel Hill. In exceptional cases a student may apply to his or her dean for permission to take examinations in absentia. (A fee of $10.00 is charged for each examination so taken.)

Students who are absent from an examination receive a course grade of Absent (AB), which is equivalent to F. When students are unable, for reasons clearly beyond their control, to take a final examination at the scheduled time, they can be excused only by the director of Student Health Service (who can authorize the Registrar to issue an "official permit to take final examination") or their academic dean (who can issue an "examination excuse"). An absence may be excused for severe health problems leading to the student's placement on the Infirmary List, for serious personal or family problems, or for a scheduling conflict involving multiple examinations. In cases of illness or personal or family emergency, additional documentation may be required by the dean.

A student who has three final examinations scheduled by the Registrar's Office within a twenty-four hour period may petition his or her dean for permission to have one of the scheduled examinations rescheduled. In the event that one of the scheduled examinations is a common final examination for a multiple-section course, that examination is the one to be rescheduled.

Students who have secured an "examination excuse" or an "official permit," and who transmit the document to the instructor or the instructor's departmental chair or dean, must be granted permission to take the exam at an alternate time, although students will need to arrange a mutually convenient time with the instructor. Except when the provost has provided an exception in writing, the exam will be taken at a time subsequent to the regularly scheduled exam, though no later than the end of the following semester.

The final examination in any course may be taken only by regularly enrolled members of the class whose registration has been certified and by students certified to be eligible to take a special examination in that course. The certifying authority is the Registrar's Office.

Each student is required to sign a full and explicit pledge certifying that he or she has neither given nor received aid during the examination.

top of page <#top>

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, April 26, 2007 10:04 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>; Lance Westerlund <westy@email.unc.edu>
Subject: FAC agenda
Attach: FAC-Agenda 5-1-07.doc

Here is a draft of the agenda. Any suggestions? omissions? etc?

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

The University
of North Carolina
at Chapel Hill
Caldwell Hall, CB# 3125
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

Jan Boxill 919.962.3317 jmboxill@email.unc.edu

FACULTY ADVISORY COUNCIL MEETING AGENDA
May 1, 2007
104 BYNUM

I. Welcome

II. Minutes from first meeting: December 6, 2006

III. Board Member composition. Three new added:
Howard Aldrich, Sociology
Laura Hanson, Medical School
James Thomas, Public Health

IV. Parr Center Report

A. Events: See End of Year Report

Ethics of Stem Cell Research: Student seminar	January 22
Stumbling on Happiness: Daniel Gilbert	February 20-21
International Criminal Court: Fatou Bensouda	March 19-21
Ethics in the Professions Series:
Law: Ethics in Time of Terror	February 2
Bioethics	February 15-16

B. In Progress

Disability and Disadvantage	September
Grant secured by Grad Fellow
Education	TBA
Applied for grant with Suzanne Gulledge
Ethics of Punishment (Death Penalty Debate)	TBA
Being coordinated with book
Expansion of the Ethics in Profession Series
Ethics Bowl	November 17

V. Fellows: Involvement

VI. Board of Visitors Meeting in New York City

VII. Ethics in the News

VIII. Other Issues
Action items from last meeting
Feedback and suggestions.

IX. Other Business from Board Members

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, April 26, 2007 10:31 PM
To: Bar-On, Dorit <dbar@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: from provost's office

Hi Dorit,
I discovered today that Geoff is giving an optional final, with a paper due at the finals time. I guess the paper is a part of the final.

Jan

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, April 27, 2007 4:35 PM
To: Nord, Warren A <wnord@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: a student

What you can do is write a letter to the Dean [Dean Caroline Cannon] that you are willing to extend the IN due to her medical problems. In that extension you can let her know you would like her to sit in on the course in the Fall. The reason for the extension is that you were not teaching the course this term, but will be teaching it in the Fall. I doubt given her situation, it should be granted.

Hope this helps.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

wnord@email.unc.edu wrote:
> Jan, I gave one of my Phil of Religion students (I discussed her with > you: the blind student with an incredible number of medical problems) > an Incomplete fall semester. She stopped by to see me yesterday, for > the first time since the end of fall semester, to see about completing > her work. She's not been in school this semester. I told her that it > is my understanding that she has only one semester (that is, two weeks > at this point) to complete her work, but not being sure about this I > would check into it. Am I right? Can anything be done to extend this > time period? She didn't turn in either paper or take her final; she > did turn in a midterm, but it was gibberish. She is willing to sit in > on the course again next fall, or do some kind of independent study.
> She is a second semester senior (a miracle?). Any advice? Thanks for > the news about Jay! Warren

JOHN STUART MILL: SUBJECTION OF WOMEN

1. Object of the Essay:
   - To explain the principle which regulates the sexes—i.e. the legal subordination of one to the other.
   - To show it is wrong in itself
   - To show it is one of the chief hindrances to human improvement
   - To show it ought to be replaced by a principle of perfect equality.

2. What possible explanation or justification could there be for the legal subordination of women?

   - Conducive to human happiness
   - Physical fact
   - Natural—women's nature
   - Customary—i.e. universal custom
   - Voluntary—women consent to it.

3. You can make no judgment in its favor from the fact of its existence.

4. Put together, it appears natural:
   - Natural attraction between the sexes
   - Wife's dependence on husband
   - Her entire status and ambition can only be had through him.

   Given these it would be a miracle if the object of being attractive to men had not become the polar star of feminine education.

5. What is taught is passed on, and so becomes customary, and even women's "nature"

6. What it shows is that custom, however universal it may be
   - Affords no presumption in its favor
   - Ought not create prejudice
   - History shows strong presumption against it
   - Is a relic of the past

7. No worry that women won't marry and produce, but worry is that marriage should be on equal conditions.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, April 30, 2007 2:02 PM
To: Laurel Goldstein <goldstel@email.unc.edu>; Given, Emily <given@email.unc.edu>
Subject: papers

I finally got my papers graded: Out of 20 papers, I had:
2=19; 1=16; 1=14; 1=9; 1=6; 14=13

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, April 30, 2007 4:38 PM
To: Lance Westerlund <westy@email.unc.edu>; Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: FAC meeting agenda
Attach: FAC-Agenda 5-1-07.doc

I believe this is the final version. Please look it over for any typos.

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Lance Westerlund wrote:
> Hi Jan,
>
> The FAC meeting agenda I have was sent by you last Thursday. I > believe you and Carlo made some revisions last Friday. Please forward > the updated agenda so I may print that out and add it to the info > packets for the Board members.
>
> Thanks,
> Lance
>

The University
of North Carolina
at Chapel Hill
Caldwell Hall, CB# 3125
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

Jan Boxill 919.962.3317 jmboxill@email.unc.edu

FACULTY ADVISORY COUNCIL MEETING AGENDA
May 1, 2007
104 BYNUM

I. Welcome

II. Minutes from first meeting: December 6, 2006

III. Board Member composition. Three new added:
Howard Aldrich, Sociology
Laura Hanson, Medical School
James Thomas, Public Health

IV. Budget

V. Parr Center Report

A. Events: See End of Year Report

Ethics of Stem Cell Research: Student seminar	January 22
Stumbling on Happiness: Daniel Gilbert	February 20-21
International Criminal Court: Fatou Bensouda	March 19-21
Ethics in the Professions Series:
Law: Ethics in Time of Terror	February 2
Bioethics	February 15-16

B. In Progress

Disability and Disadvantage	September
Grant secured by Grad Fellow
Education	TBA
Applied for grant with Suzanne Gulledge
Ethics of Punishment (Death Penalty Debate)	TBA
Being coordinated with book
Expansion of the Ethics in Profession Series
Ethics Bowl	November 17

VI. Fellows: Involvement

VII. Board of Visitors Meeting in New York City

VIII. Ethics in the News

IX. Other Issues
Action items from last meeting
Feedback and suggestions.

X. Other Business from Board Members

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, April 30, 2007 4:43 PM
To: Doug Roberts <droberts@uncaa.unc.edu>
Cc: Blanton, Brent S <blanton@uncaa.unc.edu>; Beth Bridger <bridgerb@uncaa.unc.edu>; Mary W. Brunk <brunk@uncaa.unc.edu>; Reynolds, Cynthia R <cynthiar@uncaa.unc.edu>; Jayme Mitchell <jayme@uncaa.unc.edu>; Kym N. Orr <knorr@uncaa.unc.edu>; Mary Willingham <mwillingham@uncaa.unc.edu>; Octavus Barnes <obarnes@uncaa.unc.edu>; Walden, Wayne L <wwalden@uncaa.unc.edu>; Crowder, Deborah A <dacrowde@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Summer course
Attach: Flyer for Philosophy of Religion.doc

If you have students who need a summer course, here is one that needs students. Philosophy of Religion. It can fulfill either A&S or GC perspective. I've attached a flyer.

Jan

Looking for exciting Summer course?

Sign up NOW for

Philosophy of Religion 134 Section 002

We will make a philosophical inquiry into:

1) The role of religion in the public sphere
   a. The veil affair in France
   b. Habermas and Pope Benedict XVI on reason, secularism and Islam

2) Nietzsche's critique of the logic of redemption

3) Contemporary discussions on evolution versus intelligent design

Books

- Friedrich Nietzsche's On the Genealogy of Morality
- William James' The Varieties of Religious Experience
- Jurgen Habermas and Pope Benedict XVI: The Dialectics of Secularization: On Reason and Religion
- Talal Asad's Formations of the Secular

90 mins MTWThF 9:45am Summer Session I, Instructor David Frost

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, April 30, 2007 7:53 PM
To: Lycan, William G <ujanel@isis.unc.edu>
Subject: Fall teaching

Hi Bill,
How are things in the lower half of the world?
I have a question/favor to ask. As of now you are scheduled to teach PHIL 160H on Tues/Thurs 12:30-1:45 and the seminar on Wednesdays 1-3:30. There are some conflicts with the scheduling, so my question is: If we needed would you be willing to change the seminar time to meet on Wednesdays 4-6:30? As of now only 2 students are registered in the seminar, and there would be no conflict--most of the grad students have not yet registered for the Fall.

Hope all is going well with you and Mary. You have likely received the emails regarding Tom and Jay. Tom is now home; Jay is still in the hospital. His surgery was quite delicate, but he is in good spirits.

Thanks,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, May 1, 2007 9:39 AM
To: Bar-On, Dorit <dbar@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Seminar in Fall

Hi,
Geoff's Ethical Theory is on Monday. At present there is none on Wed at 4. Bill is willing to change from Wed at 1, but he already has students enrolled.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Dorit Bar-On wrote:
> Whose seminar is Monday?
> I thought there /was/ someone's seminar Wed; maybe I'm misremembering.
> Dorit
>
> Jan Boxill wrote:
>> The only time that is available where there would not be a conflict >> is Wednesdays 4-6:30.Is this time possible? Monday there is a seminar >> from 4-6:30.
>> Jan
>>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, May 2, 2007 10:31 AM
To: Stevenson, Debbie Deese <debbie_stevenson@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Teaching Awards

Debbie,
Could you send me last year's committees. I thought I had all of it, but for the life of me, I can't find it. I thought I kept it all in a file, but my office isn't yet well organized since we moved. So I thought it would be easier for you to just send me the sheets.
Thanks,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, May 2, 2007 10:40 AM
To: Phillips, Susan <ssp@email.unc.edu>
Cc: Entwisle, Barbara <entwisle@unc.edu>; Stevenson, Debbie Deese <debbie_stevenson@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: University Teaching Awards

Great, thanks. And thanks Debbie.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Susan Phillips wrote:
> All, Debbie Stevenson was kind enough to straighten me out on who is chair > of what/when!
>
> So what I will do is include Jan Boxill's contact information on the back of > the teaching awards insert where we call for nominations, and this will > serve as a request to Barbara Entwisle to send me a statement about the > teaching awards winners.
>
> Thanks,
>
> Susan
>
> Susan Phillips
> University Gazette Assistant Editor
> UNC-Chapel Hill 210 Pittsboro St. CB# 6205 Chapel Hill, NC 27599-6205
> 919-962-8594 (voice) / 919-962-2279 (fax)
> susan_phillips@unc.edu
>
> Read us online: http://gazette.unc.edu
>
>
>
>
> Hello, I'm working on the University Teaching Awards insert that will be > included in the May 23 Gazette. I'm e-mailing all of you because while I do > have just one main request, I've noticed some disparities that necessitated > an e-mail to all.
>
> According to a recent campus e-mail, Jan Boxill is chair of the University
> Committee on Teaching Awards. However, according to this web page > (http://provost.unc.edu/opportunities/distinguished-teaching-awards-committe > e) the chair is Barbara Entwisle.
>
> As part of the insert, what I need is a statement from the chair -- whoever > that might be! -- similar in length to the one on this page written by Kevin > Stewart (http://gazette.unc.edu/archives/06apr26/teaching-awards.html).
>
> Also, in anticipation of including this call for nominations in the insert > and also running it as a news brief in next week's Gazette, this page

> (http://provost.unc.edu/teaching-awards) needs to be updated to give the > 2007 date and time by which nominations are due.
>
> Best regards,
>
> Susan
>
>
>
>
>
>
>
>
>
>
>
>

From: nobody@notify.unc.edu on behalf of Siu, Katherine L </O=UNC EXCHANGE/OU=EXCHANGE ADMINISTRATIVE GROUP (FYDIBOHF23SPDLT)/CN=RECIPIENTS/CN=KRINALDI>
Sent: Wednesday, May 2, 2007 8:28 PM
To: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: INFORMATIONAL: PMS Study seeking volunteers

Do you have extreme PMS?
Have you ever thought you may have Premenstrual Dysphoric Disorder (PMDD)?

Some women experience severe PMS symptoms that interfere with work, activities and relationships.

The UNC Department of Psychiatry research team is conducting a clinical research study for women with Premenstrual Dysphoric Disorder (PMDD) to see whether combining an anti-depressant with an additional study-related medication aids in the relief of this reproductive mood disorder.

Volunteers must be at least 18 years old, be in good physical health, currently treated with an SSRI (anti-depressant), and on some form of birth control. All office visits, medical evaluations, and investigational medications related to this study will be provided at no cost to patients.

For more information, please call Katherine at 966-1392.
www.womensmooddisorders.org

Approved 10/30/2006 by the Committee on the Protection of the Rights of Human Subjects Biomedical Institutional Review Board. IRB # 05-PSYCH-1418/ 05-3106.

This email is sponsored by: UNC Psychiatry

==========

"INFORMATIONAL:" email will only be sent to those who have indicated that they do want to receive mass email. To set your informational mass email preference, logon to the on-line directory web site at https://dir.unc.edu/dir/update.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, May 2, 2007 10:02 PM
To: Bar-On, Dorit <dbar@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: seminar

Does that fit for Ram as well? He's been really good about all this as well.
Thanks,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Dorit Bar-On wrote:
> Let's go with that then! Thurs 4-6:30
> Dorit
>
> Jan Boxill wrote:
>> In all of my going over and over the schedule, I gave you the wrong >> info. The way the schedule is set up, Doug Maclean is teaching a >> cross listed public policy seminar on Thursday 3:30-5:50. If we have >> to have a conflict, I think this is likely the best, especially as >> none of our grad students have signed up for it. So, my "final >> proposal" is to move yours to Thursdays 4-6:30. How does this sound?
>>
>> Sorry for all the confusions. I really want to make it work for >> everyone.
>>
>> Thanks for your patience.
>> Jan
>>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, May 2, 2007 10:31 PM
To: Bar-On, Dorit <dbar@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: seminar

WONDERFUL!!!
Thanks,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, May 2, 2007 10:31 PM
To: Chapel Hill Philosophy <hobler@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Ram/Dorit Seminar

Okay--finally got it: change their seminar to meet on Thursdays at 4-6:30!! Only problem now -- room :(

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, May 3, 2007 8:37 AM
To: Gucki Obler <hobler@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Ram/Dorit Seminar

We might see if Doug's class can move as so far he has no one.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Gucki Obler wrote:
> Jan Boxill wrote:
>> Okay--finally got it: change their seminar to meet on Thursdays at >> 4-6:30!! Only problem now -- room :(
>>
> I called the registrar, it is changed but the room is DEY 207, the > only one available at that time. For 15 people.
> Gucki

From: Gary.Parr@lazard.com
Sent: Thursday, May 3, 2007 11:27 AM
To: Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>; Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu> Subject: news

---

you probably saw this in NY times. There is a need to have an articulated view, in writing that is short, that addresses the issue of teaching ethics.
I recognize it is a complex subject we have discussed before but if it can be addressed intelligently in brief, I can perhaps help the Center increase it's presence in this important discussion.

A Duke University judicial panel's determination that 34 M.B.A. students cheated on an exam has some people wondering whether the spate of ethics classes – introduced in the wake of the Enron and WorldCom scandals – are doing any good.

Duke University officials have called the latest scandal the most widespread episode of cheating in the history of Duke's Fuqua School of Business.

"The cheating episode at Duke University may cause academics to conclude the post-Enron emphasis on teaching ethics in graduate business schools is a failure," Bloomberg News predicted Tuesday.

Citing confidentiality rules, Duke officials did not identify the course or the students involved. But the panel said nine students face expulsion, 15 will be suspended for a year and receive a failing grade for the course, another nine will get a failing grade but will not be suspended, and one will get a failing grade on the exam. The students are likely to appeal, and will be allowed to continue to attend classes while they await decisions.

A Duke professor noticed similarities among the students' exams, which they were allowed to take home and complete on their own. "But many students collaborated, in violation of the school's honor code," The New York Times noted.

All the students are M.B.A. candidates, which jibes with a study released in September, noted by DealBook, which found an "alarming" amount of cheating in business schools generally, and determined that M.B.A. students are the most likely to cheat.

The September study, by a Rutgers University professor, found that 56 percent of business graduate students admitted having cheated, compared with 54 percent in engineering, 48 percent in education and 45 percent in law school.

"This is self-reported evidence of cheating, so it's probably underestimated," said Donald McCabe, a professor of management and global business at Rutgers.

"I would say at many business schools it is a part of the culture," Dr. McCabe said. "You want to talk rationalizations? I could give you thousands of them: everybody else does it, it's the teachers' fault, you have to do it to get ahead."

Carl Schramm, president of the Kauffman Foundation, last year questioned whether ethics courses are an answer to the problem. "Presumably," Mr. Kauffman wrote in the Chronicle of Higher Education, "the goal is to prevent future Enron-like scandals, but how likely is it that human behavior can be changed for the better by tacking on a course on ethics?"

Teaching the "nebulous" concept of social responsibility, he warned, risks putting political goals ahead of business goals. Schools underserve their students by teaching them that corporations should focus more on "political ends" instead of making money.

On Dealbreaker, John Carney adds that such behavior wasn't surprising, arguing that business students pay little attention to ethics professors who seem, well, anti-business. Moreover, he says, changing human behavior, and therefore businesses' conduct, requires more than "pop platitudes cribbed from Kant."

Mr. Carney concludes:

So if the latest scandal at Duke helps us do away with the myth that the ethics course requirements for an M.B.A. were going to ameliorate business corruption, fraud or reduce agency costs, we might all have those 34 cheaters to thank for peeling the scales from our eyes.
Regards,
Gary

Gary W. Parr
Deputy Chairman
Lazard
30 Rockefeller Plaza
New York, NY 10020
212-632-6800
mobile: 646-270-5634
Gary.Parr@lazard.com

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, May 4, 2007 7:39 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@UNC.EDU>
Subject: Re: [Fwd: FW: 2007 Southeast Regional EB Invitation Letter and Registration Form]

Hi Carlo,
Yes, let's meet on Monday, I will try to get a lot done this weekend so
I can be less overwhelmed!
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Carlo Robustelli wrote:
> Jan,
>
> Just got this from Terry. I think we need to meet Monday morning to > discuss our plan for inviting teams. I have called the Carolina Inn > and made plans for the blocked room. After that we will need to set a > price and registration information.
> We can do all of this very quickly now that finals and events are > behind us :)
>
> - Carlo
>
>
> ----------
>
> Subject:
> FW: 2007 Southeast Regional EB Invitation Letter and Registration Form
> From:
> "Price, Terry" <tprice@richmond.edu>
> Date:
> Fri, 4 May 2007 18:42:15 -0400
> To:
> <carlo@unc.edu>
>
> To:
> <carlo@unc.edu>
>
>
> In case you didnâ€™t see that theyâ€™re sending out their invitation now.
>
> Best,
>
> Terry
>
> _____
> Terry L. Price
>
> Visiting Associate Professor
>
> Department of Philosophy

>
> University of North Carolina-Chapel Hill
>
> Chapel Hill, NC 27599
>
> Office: 919 962 3661
>
> Fax: 919 843 3929
>
> Email: tlprice@email.unc.edu <mailto:tlprice@email.unc.edu>
>
> Associate Professor
>
> Jepson School of Leadership Studies
>
> University of Richmond
>
> Virginia 23173
>
> Office: 804 287 6088
>
> Fax: 804 287 6062
>
> Email: tprice@richmond.edu <mailto:tprice@richmond.edu>
>
> http://oncampus.richmond.edu/academics/leadership/faculty/price.htm
>
> ----------
>
> From: Gloria Hobson [mailto:Hobson.Gloria@spcollege.edu]
> Sent: Friday, May 04, 2007 10:17 AM
> To: Wade Mumm Southeastern College; Al Pierce U.S. Naval Academy; > Anand Rao University of Mary Washington; Anita Cava University of > Miami; Aron Edidin New College of Florida; Arthur Kirk Saint Leo > University; Ben Mulvey Nova Southeastern University; Brook Sadler > University of South Florida; Buddy Payne Florida College; Charles > Starkey Clemson University; Crystal Thorpe University of Florida;
> Daniel Wueste Clemson University; Darren Domski Auburn Univ; David
> Kline University of North Florida; David McNaughton Florida State > University; Deni Elliot University of South Florida St. Petersburg;
> Dick Toenjes UNC Charlotte; Douglas Langston New College of Florida;
> Edward Queen Emory University; Erich Freiberger Jacksonville
> University; Frank Johnson Florida Southern College; Gayle Stillson
> University of North Florida; George Sherman St Petersburg College; > Gerald Horton University of Florida; Holt Edge Rollins College; James > Conley St. Thomas University; James Fleming Beacon College; James Kerr
> Edward Waters College; James Moyer Warner Southern College; Joanne > Hopkins St Petersburg College; John Stone Tuskegee University; John > Tresan University of Florida; Johnson Akinleye Bethune-Cookman
> College; Joshua Gert Florida State University; Keith Goree St
> Petersburg College; Ken Goodman University of Miami; Kevin Sweeney
> University of Tampa; Kyle Eidahl Florida Agricultural & Mechanical > Univ; Maria Morales Florida State University; Maureen Mahoney St
> Petersburg College; Michael Ruse Florida State University; Michael > Williams University of South Florida; Nancy Stanlick University of > Central Florida; Naomi Block Eckerd College; Nicholas Power University > of West Florida; Paul Draper Florida International University; Perry > Hildreth Palm Beach Atlantic University; Peter Dalton Florida State > University; Reinhold Schlieper Embry Riddle Aeronautical University; > Robert Baum University of Florida; Robert Damico University of > Florida; Robert Kirkman Georgia Institute of Technology; Robert Strain
> Florida Memorial University; Robin FioreFlorida Atlantic University;
> Ron Hall Stetson University; Sandra Fairbanks Barry University; Scott > Kimbrough Jacksonville University; Shaun Gallagher University of > Central Florida; Price, Terry; Timothy Johnson Flagler College; Tom

> Pynn Kennesaw State University
> Subject: 2007 Southeast Regional EB Invitation Letter and > Registration Form
>
> Southeast Regional Ethics Bowl
>
> * Invitation*
>
> May 3, 2007
>
> Please accept our invitation to participate in the Southeast Regional > Ethics Bowl on November 17th, 2007, from 8 AM to 6 PM at the St.
> Petersburg College Epi Center, in Clearwater, Florida. Our Regional > Bowl, like the 12-year-old National Bowl, provides an opportunity for > students to engage in thoughtful consideration of important ethical > issues of the day. The regional ethics bowls serve as feeders for the > National Ethics Bowl, to be held San Antonio, Texas, February 21st , > 2008. Only teams that participate in a regional bowl and rank among > the best are eligible to compete in the National Bowl. However, > schools may participate in the regional bowl without planning to send > a team to the national competition. Up to twenty teams will > participate in our regional bowl this year.
>
> Teams consist of 3-5 undergraduates who have spent time researching > and analyzing a dozen cases under the coaching of faculty or graduate > students. We are transmitting the cases electronically this year. You > should receive the cases in September, along with information on > housing for your trip. We expect the rules to be completed soon by the > National Ethics Bowl, and these will be forwarded to all registered > teams as soon as possible.
>
> The Registration Form is attached to this email. Registration will be > open until October 26th or until we reach the goal of 20 teams. The > cost for each team is $150, $50 of which will go to the National > Ethics Bowl Committee to offset costs for the National Ethics Bowl.
> $100 is for the cost of putting on the Southeast Regional Ethics Bowl, > including food, parking, trophies, and production costs. Payment must > be made by credit card. No refunds after October 26th.
>
> You may indicate your interest in having up to two teams compete in > the regional bowl. However, our first consideration is in making sure > that that every school that wishes to compete (up to 20 schools) has a > slot. If, at the registration deadline of October 26, there is room > for schools to bring extra teams, those spaces will be awarded on a > first-come/first-served basis. So, the first schools to send in > completed registration forms for two slots are the most likely to get > them. Schools will not be charged for their additional team until > space for that team can be guaranteed.
>
> The composition of the team that competes at Nationals may be > different from the composition of the team or teams that compete in > the regional bowl. It is the school that wins the ability to compete > at the national level, not specific team members.
>
> The Southeast Regional Bowl is being sponsored by St. Petersburg > College, the University of South Florida St. Petersburg and Eckerd > College. They are solely responsible for the operation and management > of the Bowl.
>
> If you have any questions or comments, please feel free to respond to > this email, or contact us through the address on the Registration Form.
>
> Sincerely,
>
> Keith Goree JoAnne Hopkins

>
> St. Petersburg College St. Petersburg College
>
> goree.keith@spcollege.edu <mailto:goree.keith@spcollege.edu> > hopkins.joanne@spcollege.edu <mailto:hopkins.joanne@spcollege.edu>
>
> Deni Elliott Naomi Block
>
> University of South Florida St. Petersburg Eckerd College
>
> elliott@stpt.usf.edu <mailto:elliott@stpt.usf.edu> > nlblock@tampabay.rr.com <mailto:nlblock@tampabay.rr.com>
>
> //Gloria Hobson//
>
> //Staff Assistant//
>
> //Applied Ethics SPG//
>
> //727-341-4335//
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Sunday, May 13, 2007 11:35 PM
To: Doug Roberts <droberts@uncaa.unc.edu>
Subject: Annual report
Attach: Annual Report-07.doc

Attached is my annual report.

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

ACADEMIC SUPPORT PROGRAM FOR STUDENT-ATHLETES
END OF YEAR REPORT
2006-2007
(Jan Boxill)

1. TEAMS

Team	# of Students
Women's Basketball	14
Total (s)	14

2. ACADEMIC COUNSELING

a. Weekly Meetings

Team	# Fall 2006	# Spring 2007
W Basketball	7	7
Total(s)	7	7

Comments:

b. Structured Study

Team	# Fall 2006	# Spring 2007
W Basketball	6	6
Total(s)

Comments:

I met with each student regularly, either as scheduled appointments, or at study hall on Monday nights.

I also meet regularly with Coach Calder, the academic liaison for the team.

Three met regularly in SI.

Three met regularly with Mary Willingham—twice a week.

Three had regularly scheduled tutoring appointments-at least twice a week, especially in the Spring.

The tutoring, SI and meetings with Mary Willingham really paid off in the end.

Structured study took place on trips as well, as I travel with the team.

c. "Drop-In" Student Meetings

In addition to my regular meetings, the first year students met with me at least twice a week; others in structured study met with me at least twice outside their scheduled appointments.

d. Monitoring of Continuing Eligibility

Eligibility was monitored regularly during the term, with a full assessment at the end of each term.

3. PROGRAMS

Gave a presentation on Study Skills and ways to achieve in the classroom.
Gave a presentation on Honor Court to Freshmen football.
Gave a presentation to CREED on sportsmanship.
Presented Academic four workshops at the Sylvia Hatchell Basketball Camps: Topics centered on:
NCAA Eligibility
How to achieve academic success
"Aptitude plus Attitude determines your Altitude."

4. PROFESSIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Chair and Panel participant on Ethics in Sports at the meetings of the American Philosophical Association, Central Division, in Chicago.

Coordinated and Chaired a panel discussion on the Challenge of Ethics in Sports, featuring Joe Ehrmann, and a distinguished panel, UNC-CH.

Panel participant, NCAA Scholarly Colloquium on College Sports, NCAA Convention, Orlando, Florida.

Panel participant, USADA Education Conference. [U.S. Anti-Doping Agency], Phoenix, Arizona

Serve on Editorial Board of the Journal of Philosophy in Sport, the official journal of the International Association for Philosophy of Sport.

Past President, International Association for Philosophy of Sport

Gave several presentations and workshops on ethical decision making.

Guest lecturer in EXSS classes on the Moral Significance of Sport.

Gave a presentation and led a panel discussion on the book, The Last Shot, by Darcy Frey, Durham Tech.

Gave a presentation on Sportspersonship, at Mt. Olive College for athletes, coaches and athletic administrators.

5. OTHER ACTIVITIES (Recruiting, etc.)

1. Recruiting:
   I met with several recruits on official and unofficial visits; Coach Hatchell includes me in all facets of recruiting so that I am fully aware of the academic abilities of each recruit.

2. Met daily with the first year students (2) who came to Second Session Summer School. This was a great success.
3 Served as Chair of the Tanner Teaching Awards Committee
4. Served as Chair of the search committee for the Director of LGBTQ Center.
5. Serve as radio color commentator for all women's basketball games.
6. Serve as the PA announcer for Field Hockey games.

6. COMMENTS/CONCLUSION

Working with Women's Basketball takes up many hours, but I am given tremendous support from the Coaching Staff, in particular Coach Calder and Coach Hatchell. They provide the proper atmosphere so that the student athletes realize that their academics are important. Basically I am treated as one of their staff.

This year with the team making it to the Final Four, there was a great deal travel. We held regular study hall to make sure everyone was keeping up with their work. I had regular contact with their professors to make things work as smoothly as possible. This was vital to the success of the student athletes, and in the end they did well. In fact Spring 2007 has been one of our most successful academically.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, May 14, 2007 12:04 PM
To: Andrew Calder <acalder@mail.uncaa.unc.edu>
Subject: summer schedules
Attach: Summer 2007 Schedules.doc

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, May 14, 2007 12:05 PM
To: Mary Willingham <mwillingham@uncaa.unc.edu>
Subject: Summer schedules
Attach: Summer 2007 Schedules.doc

Here are the summer schedules for WBB--

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, May 14, 2007 1:43 PM
To: Crowder, Deborah A <dacrowde@email.unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: Returned mail: see transcript for details]
Attach: Returned mail see transcript for details.msg

Here is what I got back.

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, May 14, 2007 10:05 PM
To: Ross, Amber M <amross@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: SUMMER SCHOOL

Amber, you can give a take home final as long as it is not due until the ctual final date and time.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

amross@email.unc.edu wrote:
> Hi Jan,
>
> I'm teaching Experience and Reality, and we're closing the session on > theories of consciousness. I'd like to give the students a take home > final (writing assignment) rather than give a final exam in class.
>
> Will that be alright?
>
> Thank you,
> Amber
>
> Quoting Jan Boxill <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>:
>
>> Dear Summer School Instructors,
>>
>> First summer session begins tomorrow, Tuesday, May 15th. You should >> all have received a memo from the Dean of Summer School, Jim Murphy.
>> Just a few reminders:
>> 1. All classes must have an in-class final exam. The weight of the >> exam is up to you. If you are planning something different, you must >> request and receive permission in writing from me. This can be done >> by email.
>> 2. You must have a syllabus for the course, and that syllabus >> must be reviewed by a faculty mentor. The syllabus is seen as a >> contract between you and the students. Keep in mind you will not be >> able to cover as much in a summer session as in a regular semester.
>> If you don't cover all that is on your syllabus that is permissible, >> however, you cannot add anything at the end. Your syllabus should >> include: your contact information, test/exam dates, paper due date, >> how you calculate the final exam, including the weight of each exam,
>> paper, participation, etc.
>> 3. You must hold regular office hours. Students see emails as the >> best means of getting in touch with instructors. These should be >> answered in a timely manner.
>>
>> If you have any questions or concerns, please feel free to come see me.
>>
>> Summer school teaching is usually fun, so enjoy.
>>
>> Jan

>>
>> --
>> Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
>> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
>> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
>> Department of Philosophy
>> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>> Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
>> Phone: 919-962-3317
>> FAX: 919-843-3929
>>
>>
>>
>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, May 14, 2007 10:12 PM
To: Foreman, Elizabeth A <eforeman@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Summer School

You can give a take home final as long as it is not due until the final date and time.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Elizabeth Foreman wrote:
> Jan,
>
> Is it possible to get permission to have a final paper instead of a > final exam for summer school, or must I have SOME sort of final exam, > however small? If I can have a final paper instead of a final exam, > I'd like permission to do that. If not, I'll have a small in-class > final.
>
> Thanks!
>
> Elizabeth

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, May 14, 2007 10:13 PM
To: Frost, David James <dfrost@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: SUMMER SCHOOL

A minimum of 2 hours

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

David James Frost wrote:
> Thanks Jan. How many office hours per day or week are we supposed to > hold?
>
> On May 14, 2007, at 7:18 PM, Jan Boxill wrote:
>
>> Dear Summer School Instructors,
>>
>> First summer session begins tomorrow, Tuesday, May 15th. You should >> all have received a memo from the Dean of Summer School, Jim Murphy.
>> Just a few reminders:
>> 1. All classes must have an in-class final exam. The weight of the >> exam is up to you. If you are planning something different, you must >> request and receive permission in writing from me. This can be done >> by email.
>> 2. You must have a syllabus for the course, and that syllabus >> must be reviewed by a faculty mentor. The syllabus is seen as a >> contract between you and the students. Keep in mind you will not be >> able to cover as much in a summer session as in a regular semester.
>> If you don't cover all that is on your syllabus that is permissible, >> however, you cannot add anything at the end. Your syllabus should >> include: your contact information, test/exam dates, paper due date,
>> how you calculate the final exam, including the weight of each exam,
>> paper, participation, etc.
>> 3. You must hold regular office hours. Students see emails as the >> best means of getting in touch with instructors. These should be >> answered in a timely manner.
>>
>> If you have any questions or concerns, please feel free to come see me.
>>
>> Summer school teaching is usually fun, so enjoy.
>>
>> Jan
>>
>> --Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
>> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
>> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
>> Department of Philosophy
>> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>> Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
>> Phone: 919-962-3317
>> FAX: 919-843-3929
>>
>>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, May 15, 2007 11:34 AM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: [Fwd: FW: 2007 Southeast Regional EB Invitation Letter and Registration Form]
Attach: Ethics Bowl invitation.doc; Ethics Bowl Registration Form.doc

---

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317

>>

The University
of North Carolina
at Chapel Hill
Caldwell Hall, CB# 3125
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

Jan Boxill 919.962.3317 jmboxill@email.unc.edu

We would like to invite you to participate in the Mid Atlantic Regional Ethics Bowl on November 17th, 2007, from 8 AM to 6 PM at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. Our Regional Bowl, like the 12-year-old National Bowl, provides an opportunity for students to engage in thoughtful consideration of important ethical issues of the day. The regional ethics bowls serve as feeders for the National Ethics Bowl, to be held San Antonio, Texas, February 21st, 2008. Only teams that participate in a regional bowl and rank among the best are eligible to compete in the National Bowl. However, schools may participate in the regional bowl without planning to send a team to the national competition. Up to twelve teams will participate in our regional bowl this year.

Teams consist of 3-5 undergraduates who have spent time researching and analyzing a dozen cases under the coaching of faculty or graduate students. We are transmitting the cases electronically this year. You should receive the cases in September, along with information on housing for your trip. We expect the rules to be completed soon by the National Ethics Bowl, and these will be forwarded to all registered teams as soon as possible.

The Registration Form is attached to this email. Registration will be open until October 26th or until we reach the goal of 20 teams. The cost for each team is $150, $50 of which will go to the National Ethics Bowl Committee to offset costs for the National Ethics Bowl. $100 is for the cost of putting on the Southeast Regional Ethics Bowl, including food, parking, trophies, and production costs. Payment must be made by credit card. No refunds after October 26th.

You may indicate your interest in having up to two teams compete in the regional bowl. However, our first consideration is in making sure that that every school that wishes to compete (up to 12 schools) has a slot. If, at the registration deadline of October 26, there is room for schools to bring extra teams, those spaces will be awarded on a first-come/first-served basis. So, the first schools to send in completed registration forms for two slots are the most likely to get them. Schools will not be charged for their additional team until space for that team can be guaranteed.

The composition of the team that competes at Nationals may be different from the composition of the team or teams that compete in the regional bowl. It is the school that wins the ability to compete at the national level, not specific team members.

The Mid Atlantic Regional Bowl is being sponsored by the Parr Center for Ethics and the Department of Philosophy at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. They are solely responsible for the operation and management of the Bowl.

If you have any questions or comments, please feel free to respond to this email, or contact us through the address on the Registration Form.

Sincerely,

Jan Boxill
Director
Parr Center for Ethics

Carlo Robustelli
Program Coordinator
Parr Center for Ethics

Mid Atlantic Regional Ethics Bowl Registration Form
November 17, 2007

Jan Boxill
Director of the Parr Center for Ethics
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC
(919) 962-3317
jmboxill@email.unc.edu

Carlo Robustelli
Program Coordinator, Parr Center
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC
(919 843-
carlo@unc.edu

Registration will remain open until October 26 or until 12 teams have paid registration.

COST: $150 Per TEAM

NO REFUNDS AFTER OCTOBER 26, 2007
CREDIT CARD PAYMENTS ONLY

I understand that the registration fee will be used in the following ways: $50 to APPE to offset costs for the National Ethics Bowl; $100 to offset costs of snacks, breakfast and lunch for coaches, judges and team members at the Regional Bowl on November 17, trophies, and production costs. Any leftover funds will be retained to support upcoming year's competitions. _____
(signature required)

Educational institution:_____

Faculty sponsor name: _____

Title/Department:_____

Address:_____Phone:_____

E-Mail: _____

Cases will be distributed and hotel suggestions will be provided by early September.
Team membership information will be requested October 1.

Please include the following information to pay with credit card or indicate that you would like us call for that information

Name as it Appears on Card: _____MasterCard____ VISA____

Credit Card Number: _____Expiration Date: _____

CVV2 Code (3-digit number on signature panel on back of card): _____

Name and Phone Number to call for CC information_____

Hotel reservation Information:

Holiday Inn Express
ICOT Center
13625 Icot Blvd
Clearwater FL 33760
888-400-9714

Room Rates:
$72.00 Double
$75.00 Single Reservation Cut Off Date: 11/2/07
Mention "Ethics Bowl" when you call

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, May 15, 2007 5:35 PM
To: Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>
Subject: Summer School memo

Dear Summer School Instructors,

First summer session begins tomorrow, Tuesday, May 15th. You should all have received a memo from the Dean of Summer School, Jim Murphy. Just a few reminders:

1. All classes must have an in-class final exam. The weight of the exam is up to you. If you are planning something different, you must request and receive permission in writing from me. This can be done by email.
2. You must have a syllabus for the course, and that syllabus must be reviewed by a faculty mentor. The syllabus is seen as a contract between you and the students. Keep in mind you will not be able to cover as much in a summer session as in a regular semester. If you don't cover all that is on your syllabus that is permissible, however, you cannot add anything at the end. Your syllabus should include: your contact information, test/exam dates, paper due date, how you calculate the final exam, including the weight of each exam, paper, participation, etc.
3. You must hold regular office hours. Students see emails as the best means of getting in touch with instructors. These should be answered in a timely manner.

If you have any questions or concerns, please feel free to come see me.

Summer school teaching is usually fun, so enjoy.

Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Saturday, May 19, 2007 10:56 AM
To: Terry L. Price <tlprice@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: [Fwd: news]

Hi Terry,
This is very, very good. I really liked it, and its message. I'll digest it for a while and then reread it.
Thanks so much,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Terry L. Price wrote:
> Jan,
>
> Here's a first shot at this. Please let me know what you think.
>
> Best,
> Terry
>
>
> Terry L. Price
> Visiting Associate Professor Department of Philosophy
> University of North Carolina-Chapel Hill
> Chapel Hill, NC 27599
> Office: 919 962 3661
> Fax: 919 843 3929
> Email: tlprice@email.unc.edu
>
> Associate Professor Jepson School of Leadership Studies University of > Richmond Virginia 23173 Office: 804 287 6088 Fax: 804 287 6062 E-mail:
> tprice@richmond.edu
> http://oncampus.richmond.edu/academics/leadership/faculty/price.htm/
>
>
>
>
>
>
>
> Quoting Jan Boxill <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>:
>
>> Hi Terry,
>> Thanks so much for considering this. I wouldn't expect you to be able >> to do this immediately, and obviously you have lots of other >> obligations. I think basically a defense of teaching ethics and moral >> reasoning. But let's talk. I have a busy schedule tomorrow, but >> I'll try to find some time to call.
>>
>> By the way, I just got off the phone with Ivory Latta and I told her >> about Harper's party and how thrilled she was with the poster and >> picture. She was very, very touched, and wanted me to convey her >> Happy Birthday wishes to Harper. Does Harper use email? If so, I >> can give her Ivory's email.

>>
>> Thanks again,
>> Jan
>>
>> Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
>> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
>> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
>> Department of Philosophy
>> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>> Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
>> Phone: 919-962-3317
>> FAX: 919-843-3929
>>
>>
>>
>> Terry L. Price wrote:
>>> Jan,
>>>
>>> Carlo talked to me this afternoon. I'm happy to try to write >>> something up, but I won't be able to get to it immediately. I'm >>> about to head to Richmond for a retreat and other obligations.
>>>
>>> You can call me at home tomorrow if you want to let me know what you >>> have in mind. Otherwise, I'll start thinking about this and talk to >>> you when I get back. I would welcome any ideas you and Carlo have >>> about what Parr is looking for: a defense of teaching ethics? a >>> defense of teaching ethics in business schools? something else?
>>>
>>> Best,
>>> Terry
>>>
>>> Terry L. Price
>>> Visiting Associate Professor Department of Philosophy
>>> University of North Carolina-Chapel Hill
>>> Chapel Hill, NC 27599
>>> Office: 919 962 3661
>>> Fax: 919 843 3929
>>> Email: tlprice@email.unc.edu
>>>
>>> Associate Professor Jepson School of Leadership Studies University >>> of Richmond Virginia 23173 Office: 804 287 6088 Fax: 804 287 6062
>>> E-mail: tprice@richmond.edu
>>> http://oncampus.richmond.edu/academics/leadership/faculty/price.htm/
>>>
>>>
>>>
>>>
>>>
>>>
>>>
>>> Quoting Jan Boxill <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>:
>>>
>>>>> Terry,
>>>>> I am forwarding you an email I received from Gary Parr about our >>>>> writing ethics in the news piece on the Duke cheating scandal. I >>>>> think the most appropriate person to write this for us would be >>>>> you. Would you be willing to write such a piece. I think Gary >>>>> would like it not just for the website, but also maybe for his >>>>> company.
>>>>> I'll be in tomorrow so maybe we can talk about this.
>>>>>
>>>>> Thanks,

>>>> Jan
>>>>
>>>> --
>>>> Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
>>>> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
>>>> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
>>>> Department of Philosophy
>>>> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>>>> Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
>>>> Phone: 919-962-3317
>>>> FAX: 919-843-3929
>>>>
>>>>
>>>
>>>
>>
>>
>
>

How Can Business Ethics Be Taught?

The dreaded question: "So, what are you teaching this semester?" When I reply that I teach a Business Ethics course, more often than not my questioner laughs and asks whether that isn't an oxymoron. And then laughs some more.

So it is hardly surprising that the recent cheating scandal at Duke's Fuquay School of Business has fueled cynicism about the teaching of business ethics. Business schools across the country responded to corporate wrongdoing by introducing ethics into their curriculums. Yet close to 10% of first-year students in Duke's MBA program were suspected of cheating on a take-home examination. The collective laughter would have been greater only if the accused students were in one of Duke's ethics courses.

Still we should be careful not to infer too much from the Duke cheating scandal. A successful ethics program does not guarantee that its participants will never behave immorally. Not even churches or prisons boast that kind of effectiveness. So why should we expect it of an ethics class? What we can expect is that when students leave an ethics class, they will approach moral problems with greater thoughtfulness and intellectual sophistication, as well as be more likely to resolve these problems in the right way. The goal is improvement, not perfection.

The behavior of the Duke MBA students nevertheless gives us reason to pause. How much thoughtfulness and intellectual sophistication are necessary to know that cheating is wrong? Surely these young professionals did not need a class to garner this important piece of moral knowledge. But if the students were aware of the wrongness of cheating all along, what kind of knowledge were they missing? What, exactly, could they have been taught in business ethics?

There is something more for business students to learn in ethics classes, and throughout their business programs. Ethics is not just about the what of morality; it is also about the whom of morality.

In ethics, the general requirements—the what of morality—are often quite straightforward. Indeed we would be hard pressed to find anyone in our society, let alone a university-level student, who was unaware of the general prohibition on cheating. However, the application of these requirements to individuals—the whom of morality—can be significantly murkier. I dare say it would not be difficult at all to find students who genuinely believe that their circumstances justify them in violating the prohibition on cheating.

Doing the right thing in the Duke case therefore required two things: first, the MBA students needed to know that cheating is generally morally wrong; and, second, they needed to know that it is wrong for them to cheat in their particular circumstances.

Why do people sometimes believe that moral requirements do not apply to them in the situations they face? The two most obvious answer appeals to consequences. People predict that breaking the rules will have high payoffs. And what are the opposing costs? Rule-breaking doesn't really hurt anyone else, especially in environments in which others similarly break the rules. Of course the rules of morality generally ought to be followed! But only as long as the costs aren't too high for me.

The consequentialist logic of business education may encourage this kind of thinking. There is no mistaking the fact that profit maximization is the chief value within the many business curriculums. As a result, brief surveys of business law, discussions of company codes of conduct, or even introductions to ethical theory —the what of morality—are very likely to buckle under the comparative weight given to considerations of profit, goal achievement, and shareholder satisfaction.

Does this mean that business ethics really is an oxymoron? Not if business schools are willing to take the whom of morality seriously and educate students throughout the curriculum about the application of ethical requirements to all business actors. It is not enough for business students to know that certain behaviors are generally prohibited. They must also come to see that these prohibitions apply to them even when the prohibitions conflict with self-interest, the bottom line, and the interests of investors.

When business schools start taking ethics seriously, maybe people will stop laughing.

Terry L. Price is visiting associate professor of philosophy and a fellow at the Parr Center for Ethics at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. He is associate professor at the Jepson School of Leadership Studies and author of Understanding Ethical Failures of Leadership on Cambridge University Press.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Saturday, May 19, 2007 1:34 PM
To: Sayre-McCord, Geoff <sayre-mccord@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Duke Cheating Scandal

Great, that's what I thought as well. I like it as is, so will go ahead and put it up. And I think this time we'll also put his name etc at the bottom.
Thanks,
Jan

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Saturday, May 19, 2007 9:56 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Ethics in the News
Attach: Duke Cheating Scandal.doc

Carlo,
I've attached Terry Price's piece. It is excellent. Geoff agrees. I would like to post it and also have Terry's signature at the end. What do you think?

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

How Can Business Ethics Be Taught?

The dreaded question: "So, what are you teaching this semester?" When I reply that I teach a Business Ethics course, more often than not my questioner laughs and asks whether that isn't an oxymoron. And then laughs some more.

So it is hardly surprising that the recent cheating scandal at Duke's Fuquay School of Business has fueled cynicism about the teaching of business ethics. Business schools across the country responded to corporate wrongdoing by introducing ethics into their curriculums. Yet close to 10% of first-year students in Duke's MBA program were suspected of cheating on a take-home examination. The collective laughter would have been greater only if the accused students were in one of Duke's ethics courses.

Still we should be careful not to infer too much from the Duke cheating scandal. A successful ethics program does not guarantee that its participants will never behave immorally. Not even churches or prisons boast that kind of effectiveness. So why should we expect it of an ethics class? What we can expect is that when students leave an ethics class, they will approach moral problems with greater thoughtfulness and intellectual sophistication, as well as be more likely to resolve these problems in the right way. The goal is improvement, not perfection.

The behavior of the Duke MBA students nevertheless gives us reason to pause. How much thoughtfulness and intellectual sophistication are necessary to know that cheating is wrong? Surely these young professionals did not need a class to garner this important piece of moral knowledge. But if the students were aware of the wrongness of cheating all along, what kind of knowledge were they missing? What, exactly, could they have been taught in business ethics?

There is something more for business students to learn in ethics classes, and throughout their business programs. Ethics is not just about the what of morality; it is also about the whom of morality.

In ethics, the general requirements—the what of morality—are often quite straightforward. Indeed we would be hard pressed to find anyone in our society, let alone a university-level student, who was unaware of the general prohibition on cheating. However, the application of these requirements to individuals—the whom of morality—can be significantly murkier. I dare say it would not be difficult at all to find students who genuinely believe that their circumstances justify them in violating the prohibition on cheating.

Doing the right thing in the Duke case therefore required two things: first, the MBA students needed to know that cheating is generally morally wrong; and, second, they needed to know that it is wrong for them to cheat in their particular circumstances.

Why do people sometimes believe that moral requirements do not apply to them in the situations they face? The two most obvious answer appeals to consequences. People predict that breaking the rules will have high payoffs. And what are the opposing costs? Rule-breaking doesn't really hurt anyone else, especially in environments in which others similarly break the rules. Of course the rules of morality generally ought to be followed! But only as long as the costs aren't too high for me.

The consequentialist logic of business education may encourage this kind of thinking. There is no mistaking the fact that profit maximization is the chief value within the many business curriculums. As a result, brief surveys of business law, discussions of company codes of conduct, or even introductions to ethical theory —the what of morality—are very likely to buckle under the comparative weight given to considerations of profit, goal achievement, and shareholder satisfaction.

Does this mean that business ethics really is an oxymoron? Not if business schools are willing to take the whom of morality seriously and educate students throughout the curriculum about the application of ethical requirements to all business actors. It is not enough for business students to know that certain behaviors are generally prohibited. They must also come to see that these prohibitions apply to them even when the prohibitions conflict with self-interest, the bottom line, and the interests of investors.

When business schools start taking ethics seriously, maybe people will stop laughing.

Terry L. Price is visiting associate professor of philosophy and a fellow at the Parr Center for Ethics at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. He is associate professor at the Jepson School of Leadership Studies and author of Understanding Ethical Failures of Leadership on Cambridge University Press.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Sunday, May 20, 2007 10:09 AM
To: Boxill, Bernard R <brboxill@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Duke Cheating Scandal
Attach: Duke Cheating Scandal.doc

---

here is the ethics in the news piece.

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

How Can Business Ethics Be Taught?

The dreaded question: "So, what are you teaching this semester?" When I reply that I teach a Business Ethics course, more often than not my questioner laughs and asks whether that isn't an oxymoron. And then laughs some more.

So it is hardly surprising that the recent cheating scandal at Duke's Fuquay School of Business has fueled cynicism about the teaching of business ethics. Business schools across the country responded to corporate wrongdoing by introducing ethics into their curriculums. Yet close to 10% of first-year students in Duke's MBA program were suspected of cheating on a take-home examination. The collective laughter would have been greater only if the accused students were in one of Duke's ethics courses.

Still we should be careful not to infer too much from the Duke cheating scandal. A successful ethics program does not guarantee that its participants will never behave immorally. Not even churches or prisons boast that kind of effectiveness. So why should we expect it of an ethics class? What we can expect is that when students leave an ethics class, they will approach moral problems with greater thoughtfulness and intellectual sophistication, as well as be more likely to resolve these problems in the right way. The goal is improvement, not perfection.

The behavior of the Duke MBA students nevertheless gives us reason to pause. How much thoughtfulness and intellectual sophistication are necessary to know that cheating is wrong? Surely these young professionals did not need a class to garner this important piece of moral knowledge. But if the students were aware of the wrongness of cheating all along, what kind of knowledge were they missing? What, exactly, could they have been taught in business ethics?

There is something more for business students to learn in ethics classes, and throughout their business programs. Ethics is not just about the what of morality; it is also about the whom of morality.

In ethics, the general requirements—the what of morality—are often quite straightforward. Indeed we would be hard pressed to find anyone in our society, let alone a university-level student, who was unaware of the general prohibition on cheating. However, the application of these requirements to individuals—the whom of morality—can be significantly murkier. I dare say it would not be difficult at all to find students who genuinely believe that their circumstances justify them in violating the prohibition on cheating.

Doing the right thing in the Duke case therefore required two things: first, the MBA students needed to know that cheating is generally morally wrong; and, second, they needed to know that it is wrong for them to cheat in their particular circumstances.

Why do people sometimes believe that moral requirements do not apply to them in the situations they face? The two most obvious answer appeals to consequences. People predict that breaking the rules will have high payoffs. And what are the opposing costs? Rule-breaking doesn't really hurt anyone else, especially in environments in which others similarly break the rules. Of course the rules of morality generally ought to be followed! But only as long as the costs aren't too high for me.

The consequentialist logic of business education may encourage this kind of thinking. There is no mistaking the fact that profit maximization is the chief value within the many business curriculums. As a result, brief surveys of business law, discussions of company codes of conduct, or even introductions to ethical theory —the what of morality—are very likely to buckle under the comparative weight given to considerations of profit, goal achievement, and shareholder satisfaction.

Does this mean that business ethics really is an oxymoron? Not if business schools are willing to take the whom of morality seriously and educate students throughout the curriculum about the application of ethical requirements to all business actors. It is not enough for business students to know that certain behaviors are generally prohibited. They must also come to see that these prohibitions apply to them even when the prohibitions conflict with self-interest, the bottom line, and the interests of investors.

When business schools start taking ethics seriously, maybe people will stop laughing.

Terry L. Price is visiting associate professor of philosophy and a fellow at the Parr Center for Ethics at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. He is associate professor at the Jepson School of Leadership Studies and author of Understanding Ethical Failures of Leadership on Cambridge University Press.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, May 21, 2007 9:31 AM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: Re: [Fwd: news]]
Attach: Re [Fwd news].msg

Terry sent an edited version--

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

How Can Business Ethics Be Taught?

The dreaded question: "So, what are you teaching this semester?" When I reply that I teach a Business Ethics course, more often than not my questioner laughs and asks whether that isn't an oxymoron. And then laughs some more.

So it is hardly surprising that the recent cheating scandal at Duke's Fuquay School of Business has fueled cynicism about the teaching of business ethics. Business schools across the country responded to corporate wrongdoing by introducing ethics into their curriculums. Yet close to 10% of first-year students in Duke's MBA program were suspected of cheating on a take-home examination. The collective laughter would have been greater only if the accused students were in one of Duke's ethics courses.

Still we should be careful not to infer too much from the Duke cheating scandal. A successful ethics program does not guarantee that its participants will never behave immorally. Not even churches or prisons boast that kind of effectiveness. So why should we expect it of an ethics class? What we can expect is that when students leave an ethics class, they will approach moral problems with greater thoughtfulness and intellectual sophistication, as well as be more likely to resolve these problems in the right way. The goal is improvement, not perfection.

The behavior of the Duke MBA students nevertheless gives us reason to pause. How much thoughtfulness and intellectual sophistication are necessary to know that cheating is wrong? Surely these young professionals did not need a class to garner this important piece of moral knowledge. But if the students were aware of the wrongness of cheating all along, what kind of knowledge were they missing? What, exactly, could they have been taught in business ethics?

There is something more for business students to learn in ethics classes, and throughout their business programs. Ethics is not just about the what of morality; it is also about the whom of morality.

In ethics, the general requirements—the what of morality—are often quite straightforward. Indeed we would be hard pressed to find anyone in our society, let alone a university-level student, who was unaware of the general prohibition on cheating. However, the application of these requirements to individuals—the whom of morality—can be significantly murkier. I dare say it would not be difficult at all to find students who genuinely believe that their circumstances justify them in violating the prohibition on cheating.

Doing the right thing in the Duke case therefore required two things: first, the MBA students needed to know that cheating is generally morally wrong; and, second, they needed to know that it was wrong for them to cheat in their particular circumstances.

Why do people sometimes believe that moral requirements do not apply to them in the situations they face? The most compelling answer appeals to consequences. People predict that breaking the rules will have high payoffs. And where are the opposing costs? After all, rule-breaking really doesn't seem to hurt anyone else, especially in environments in which others similarly break the rules. Of course, then, the rules of morality generally ought to be followed. But only as long as the costs aren't too high!

The consequentialist logic of business education may encourage this kind of thinking. There is no mistaking the fact that profit maximization is the chief value within the many business curriculums. As a result, brief surveys of business law, discussions of company codes of conduct, or even introductions to ethical theory —the what of morality—are very likely to buckle under the comparative weight given to considerations of profit, goal achievement, and shareholder satisfaction.

Does this mean that business ethics really is an oxymoron? Not if business schools are willing to take the whom of morality seriously and educate students throughout the curriculum about the application of ethical requirements to all business actors. It is not enough for business students to hear yet again that certain behaviors are generally prohibited by morality. They must also come to see that these prohibitions apply to them even when morality conflicts with self-interest, the bottom line, and the interests of investors.

When business schools start taking ethics seriously, maybe people will stop laughing.

Terry L. Price is visiting associate professor of philosophy and a fellow at the Parr Center for Ethics at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. He is associate professor at the Jepson School of Leadership Studies and author of Understanding Ethical Failures of Leadership on Cambridge University Press.

How Can Business Ethics Be Taught?

The dreaded question: "So, what are you teaching this semester?" When I reply that I teach a Business Ethics course, more often than not my questioner laughs and asks whether that isn't an oxymoron. And then laughs some more.

So it is hardly surprising that the recent cheating scandal at Duke's Fuquay School of Business has fueled cynicism about the teaching of business ethics. Business schools across the country responded to corporate wrongdoing by introducing ethics into their curriculums. Yet close to 10% of first-year students in Duke's MBA program were suspected of cheating on a take-home examination. The collective laughter would have been greater only if the accused students were in one of Duke's ethics courses.

Still we should be careful not to infer too much from the Duke cheating scandal. A successful ethics program does not guarantee that its participants will never behave immorally. Not even churches or prisons boast that kind of effectiveness. So why should we expect it of an ethics class? What we can expect is that when students leave an ethics class, they will approach moral problems with greater thoughtfulness and intellectual sophistication, as well as be more likely to resolve these problems in the right way. The goal is improvement, not perfection.

The behavior of the Duke MBA students nevertheless gives us reason to pause. How much thoughtfulness and intellectual sophistication are necessary to know that cheating is wrong? Surely these young professionals did not need a class to garner this important piece of moral knowledge. But if the students were aware of the wrongness of cheating all along, what kind of knowledge were they missing? What, exactly, could they have been taught in business ethics?

There is something more for business students to learn in ethics classes, and throughout their business programs. Ethics is not just about the what of morality; it is also about the whom of morality.

In ethics, the general requirements—the what of morality—are often quite straightforward. Indeed we would be hard pressed to find anyone in our society, let alone a university-level student, who was unaware of the general prohibition on cheating. However, the application of these requirements to individuals—the whom of morality—can be significantly murkier. I dare say it would not be difficult at all to find students who genuinely believe that their circumstances justify them in violating the prohibition on cheating.

Doing the right thing in the Duke case therefore required two things: first, the MBA students needed to know that cheating is generally morally wrong; and, second, they needed to know that it was wrong for them to cheat in their particular circumstances.

Why do people sometimes believe that moral requirements do not apply to them in the situations they face? The most compelling answer appeals to consequences. People predict that breaking the rules will have high payoffs. And where are the opposing costs? After all, rule-breaking really doesn't seem to hurt anyone else, especially in environments in which others similarly break the rules. Of course, then, the rules of morality generally ought to be followed. But only as long as the costs aren't too high!

The consequentialist logic of business education may encourage this kind of thinking. There is no mistaking the fact that profit maximization is the chief value within the many business curriculums. As a result, brief surveys of business law, discussions of company codes of conduct, or even introductions to ethical theory —the what of morality—are very likely to buckle under the comparative weight given to considerations of profit, goal achievement, and shareholder satisfaction.

Does this mean that business ethics really is an oxymoron? Not if business schools are willing to take the whom of morality seriously and educate students throughout the curriculum about the application of ethical requirements to all business actors. It is not enough for business students to hear yet again that certain behaviors are generally prohibited by morality. They must also come to see that these prohibitions apply to them even when morality conflicts with self-interest, the bottom line, and the interests of investors.

When business schools start taking ethics seriously, maybe people will stop laughing.

Terry L. Price is visiting associate professor of philosophy and a fellow at the Parr Center for Ethics at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. He is associate professor at the Jepson School of Leadership Studies and author of Understanding Ethical Failures of Leadership on Cambridge University Press.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, May 21, 2007 1:52 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: Re: [Fwd: news]]
Attach: Re [Fwd news].msg

Hold on the Terry Price piece

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, May 21, 2007 2:13 PM
To: Mary Willingham <mwillingham@uncaa.unc.edu>
Subject: Schedules & SH
Attach: Summer 2007 Schedules.doc

Attached are the schedules and study Hall assignments for the team.

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

How Can Business Ethics Be Taught?

The dreaded question: "So, what are you teaching this semester?" When I reply that I teach a Business Ethics course, more often than not my questioner laughs and asks whether that isn't an oxymoron. And then laughs some more.

So it is hardly surprising that the recent cheating scandal at Duke's Fuqua School of Business has fueled cynicism about the teaching of business ethics. Business schools across the country responded to corporate wrongdoing by emphasizing ethics within their curriculums. In the daytime MBA at Duke, students are required to take "Ethics, Leadership, and Organizations" as part of an initial three-week summer term (http://faculty.fuqua.duke.edu/courses/mba/). Yet close to 10% of first-year students in Duke's MBA program were suspected of cheating on a take-home examination. The collective laughter would have been greater only if the accused students were in one of Duke's ethics courses.

Still we should be careful not to infer too much from the Duke cheating scandal. A successful ethics component within a business program does not guarantee that its participants will never behave immorally. Not even churches or prisons boast that kind of effectiveness. So why should we expect it of an ethics class? What we expect is that when students complete the ethics component, they will approach moral problems with greater thoughtfulness and intellectual sophistication, as well as be more likely to resolve these problems in the right way. The goal is improvement, not perfection.

The behavior of the Duke MBA students nevertheless gives us reason to pause. How much thoughtfulness and intellectual sophistication are necessary to know that cheating is wrong? Surely these young professionals did not need an ethics class to garner this important piece of moral knowledge. But if the students were aware of the wrongness of cheating all along, what kind of knowledge were they missing? What, exactly, could they have been taught in business ethics?

There is something more for business students to learn in ethics classes, and throughout their business programs. Ethics is not just about the what of morality; it is also about the whom of morality.

In ethics, the general requirements—the what of morality—are often quite straightforward. Indeed we would be hard pressed to find anyone in our society, let alone a university-level student, who was unaware of the general prohibition on cheating. However, the application of these requirements to individuals—the whom of morality—can be significantly murkier. I dare say it would not be difficult at all to find students who genuinely believe that their circumstances justify them in violating the prohibition on cheating.

Doing the right thing in the Duke case therefore required two things. First, the MBA students needed to know that cheating is generally morally wrong. Second, they needed to know that it was wrong for them to cheat in their particular circumstances.

Why do people sometimes believe that moral requirements do not apply to them in the situations they face? The most compelling answer appeals to consequences. People predict that breaking the rules will have high payoffs. And where are the opposing costs? After all, rule-breaking really doesn't seem to hurt anyone else, especially in environments in which others similarly break the rules. Of course the rules of morality generally ought to be followed. But only as long as the costs aren't too high!

The consequentialist logic of business education may encourage this kind of thinking. There is no mistaking the fact that profit maximization is the chief value within the many business curriculums. As a result, brief surveys of business law, discussions of company codes of conduct, or even introductions to ethical theory —the what of morality—are very likely to buckle under the comparative weight given to considerations of profit, goal achievement, and shareholder satisfaction.

Does this mean that business ethics really is an oxymoron? Not if business schools are willing to take the whom of morality seriously and educate students throughout the curriculum about the application of ethical requirements to all business actors. Among other things, this kind of education would draw on traditional academic disciplines such as philosophy, psychology, and politics to help students understand their place in the world and the role of business in society.

So it is not enough for business students to hear yet again that certain behaviors are generally prohibited by morality. They must also come to see that these prohibitions apply to them even when morality conflicts with self-interest, the bottom line, and the interests of investors.

When business schools start taking ethics seriously, maybe people will stop laughing.

Terry L. Price is visiting associate professor of philosophy and a fellow at the Parr Center for Ethics at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. He is associate professor at the Jepson School of Leadership Studies and author of Understanding Ethical Failures of Leadership on Cambridge University Press.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, May 22, 2007 12:20 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Letter to Fellows
Attach: Fellows letter-o7.doc

Great, thanks. I've made a few changes. REad it for me to make sure I didn't misspell, etc.

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Carlo Robustelli wrote:
> Jan,
>
> I have attached the end of year letter to fellows. Please make any > necessary changes and I will send it out asap.
>
> - Carlo
>

How Can Business Ethics Be Taught?

The dreaded question: "So, what are you teaching this semester?" When I reply that I teach a Business Ethics course, more often than not my questioner laughs and asks whether that isn't an oxymoron. And then laughs some more.

So it is hardly surprising that the recent cheating scandal at Duke's Fuqua School of Business has fueled cynicism about the teaching of business ethics. Business schools across the country responded to corporate wrongdoing by emphasizing ethics within their curriculums. In the daytime MBA at Duke, students are required to take "Ethics, Leadership, and Organizations" as part of an initial three-week summer term (http://faculty.fuqua.duke.edu/courses/mba/). Yet close to 10% of first-year students in Duke's MBA program were suspected of cheating on a take-home examination. The collective laughter would have been greater only if the accused students were in one of Duke's ethics courses.

Still we should be careful not to infer too much from the Duke cheating scandal. A successful ethics component within a business program does not guarantee that its participants will never behave immorally. Not even churches or prisons boast that kind of effectiveness. So why should we expect it of an ethics class? What we expect is that when students complete the ethics component, they will approach moral problems with greater thoughtfulness and intellectual sophistication, as well as be more likely to resolve these problems in the right way. The goal is improvement, not perfection.

The behavior of the Duke MBA students nevertheless gives us reason to pause. How much thoughtfulness and intellectual sophistication are necessary to know that cheating is wrong? Surely these young professionals did not need an ethics class to garner this important piece of moral knowledge. But if the students were aware of the wrongness of cheating all along, what kind of knowledge were they missing? What, exactly, could they have been taught in business ethics?

There is something more for business students to learn in ethics classes, and throughout their business programs. Ethics is not just about the what of morality; it is also about the whom of morality.

In ethics, the general requirements—the what of morality—are often quite straightforward. Indeed we would be hard pressed to find anyone in our society, let alone a university-level student, who was unaware of the general prohibition on cheating. However, the application of these requirements to individuals—the whom of morality—can be significantly murkier. I dare say it would not be difficult at all to find students who genuinely believe that their circumstances justify them in violating the prohibition on cheating.

Doing the right thing in the Duke case therefore required two things. First, the MBA students needed to know that cheating is generally morally wrong. Second, they needed to know that it was wrong for them to cheat in their particular circumstances.

Why do people sometimes believe that moral requirements do not apply to them in the situations they face? The most compelling answer appeals to consequences. People predict that breaking the rules will have high payoffs. And where are the opposing costs? After all, rule-breaking really doesn't seem to hurt anyone else, especially in environments in which others similarly break the rules. Of course the rules of morality generally ought to be followed. But only as long as the costs aren't too high!

The consequentialist logic of business education may encourage this kind of thinking. There is no mistaking the fact that profit maximization is the chief value within the many business curriculums. As a result, brief surveys of business law, discussions of company codes of conduct, or even introductions to ethical theory —the what of morality—are very likely to buckle under the comparative weight given to considerations of profit, goal achievement, and shareholder satisfaction.

Does this mean that business ethics really is an oxymoron? Not if business schools are willing to take the whom of morality seriously and educate students throughout the curriculum about the application of ethical requirements to all business actors. Among other things, this kind of education would draw on traditional academic disciplines such as philosophy, psychology, and politics to help students understand their place in the world and the role of business in society.

So it is not enough for business students to hear yet again that certain behaviors are generally prohibited by morality. They must also come to see that these prohibitions apply to them even when morality conflicts with self-interest, the bottom line, and the interests of investors.

When business schools start taking ethics seriously, maybe people will stop laughing.

Terry L. Price is Visiting Associate Professor of Philosophy and a Fellow at the Parr Center for Ethics at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. He is Associate Professor at the Jepson School of Leadership Studies and author of Understanding Ethical Failures of Leadership on Cambridge University Press.

From: Sarah A. Henderson <henderson@unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, May 25, 2007 11:22 AM
To: henderson@unc.edu
Subject: Announcing August 2007 New TA Orientation
Attach: Memo to TA Admins re 2007 TA Orientation.doc; 2007 TA Orientation Information for New TAs.doc

---

To all TA Administrators and Faculty Coordinators,

The Center for Teaching and Learning will be conducting the annual campus-wide Orientation for New TAs on Saturday, August 18, 2007. Attached you will find a letter to TA Administrators & Faculty Coordinators describing the event, as well as a letter addressed to new TAs for the 2007-08 academic year. Please assist us in forwarding this information about the New TA Orientation in August to your TAs.
I am sending these letters to you via email because I have had many requests for this format. If you would like a stack of these letters sent to you in your office - as we have done in years past - please let me know and I will be happy to do so.
Thank you for your assistance.
Best wishes,
Sarah Henderson

****

Sarah A. Henderson
Center for Teaching and Learning
University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
316 Wilson Library, CB# 3470
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3470
Phone: 919-966-1289
Fax: 919-962-5236
Email: henderson@unc.edu

THE UNIVERSITY
of NORTH CAROLINA
at CHAPEL HILL

CENTER FOR TEACHING AND LEARNING

316 WILSON LIBRARY
CAMPUS BOX 3470
CHAPEL HILL, NC 27599-3470
ctl.unc.edu

T 919.966.1289
F 919.962.5236
ctl@unc.edu

MEMORANDUM

Date: May 25, 2007

To: TA Administrators & Faculty Coordinators

From: Donna Bailey
Director for TA Development
Center for Teaching and Learning

Re: Early Invitation to Twentieth Annual Fall Orientation for New GTAs

Enclosed please find early invitations to the Twentieth Annual Fall Orientation for New TAs. Please distribute these to graduate students in your department who will serve as teaching assistants or lab/recitation leaders for the first time in Fall 2007. Thank you for your assistance.

This year's Fall Orientation for New TAs will be held on Saturday, August 18, 2007 from 9:30am to 2:45pm. It will be held in the Frank Porter Graham Student Union. We will send formal invitations to your TAs over the summer. The following is a tentative schedule of the topics that we anticipate covering in the workshop sessions:

- The Carolina Classroom
  - atmosphere, culture, students
- Communication in the Classroom
  - language, clarity, presentation skills, expectations
- Authority in the Classroom
  - how to create, maintain appearances, discipline
- Time Management in the Classroom
  - lesson plans, use, adaptation
- Carolina Rules for Teaching and Learning
  - policies, procedures, plagiarism, guidelines, Honor Code

If you have any questions about the New TA Fall Orientation, please feel free to contact Donna Bailey, Director for TA Development, at the Center (966-1289).

THE UNIVERSITY
of NORTH CAROLINA
at CHAPEL HILL

CENTER FOR TEACHING AND LEARNING

316 WILSON LIBRARY
CAMPUS BOX 3470
CHAPEL HILL, NC 27599-3470
ctl.unc.edu

T 919.966.1289
F 919.962.5236
ctl@unc.edu

MEMORANDUM

Date: May 25, 2007

To: New Graduate Teaching Assistants

From: Larry Rowan, Director
Center for Teaching and Learning

Re: Twentieth Annual Fall Orientation for TAs

As you prepare for the 2007-2008 academic year, we invite you to join us for the twentieth annual Fall Orientation for New Graduate Teaching Assistants on Saturday, August 18, 2007, 9:30A.M. - 2:45P.M. The orientation will he held in the Frank Porter Graham Student Union.

The Orientation brings together new TAs, experienced TAs, and faculty from across the university for workshops designed to help you prepare for your responsibilities as a teaching assistant at Carolina. After an informal continental breakfast and short welcome session, participants will meet in small group morning sessions. The morning sessions will offer concrete strategies for managing one's dual role as teacher and student, preparing for the first day of class, and planning an effective lesson. These sessions will also introduce university policies for which all instructors are responsible on issues such as the Honor Code, sexual harassment, and amorous relations. We will have our traditional pizza & animal cracker lunch after the morning session. Following lunch, there will be afternoon workshops to provide you with information and strategies that will help you as you begin your teaching role.

The Center for Teaching and Learning supports the professional development of graduate teaching assistants through a variety of programs and services, beginning with the Fall Orientation and including workshops and seminars throughout the semester, consultations on teaching, and assistance with instructional support materials. Most CTL programs are open enrollment, learning may register to attend. Even if you are unable to attend the Orientation, please call or stop by our Wilson Library offices to let us know how we can be of assistance to you in your role as a TA.

We hope you will take advantage of this opportunity to meet your colleagues from across the university, learn about institutional policies and resources, and prepare for your important responsibilities as a graduate teaching assistant at UNC.

See you on August 18th!

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Saturday, May 26, 2007 3:37 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Letter to Fellows
Attach: Fellows letter-07.doc

Carlo
I made a few minor changes, but I think it is ready to go. Do you want to ask Lance to send it out.
Also, the draft you sent of the APA prize for input from the Fellows is great and ready to go as well. I think an email is fine, so it can be sent out under my email.

Thanks,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

>>>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, May 29, 2007 7:57 AM
To: Armstrong, Gary M <Gary_Armstrong@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Teaching Awards Committee

Hi Gary,
Thanks for your response. Even though you are in phased retirement you would be eligible but I will find a replacement.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Armstrong, Gary wrote:
> Thanks for the invitation. However, I'm now in phased retirement and > suspect that I'm not eligible for the committee. Good luck with your > considerations.
>
> Gary
>
> Gary Armstrong
> Blackwell Distinguished Professor
> Kenan-Flagler Business School
> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
> CB#3490, McColl Building
> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3490
> Phone: 919.962.3212
> Fax: 919.929.7078
> Gary_Armstrong@unc.edu
> www.Kenan-Flagler.unc.edu
>
> UNC Business
> Shaping leaders, driving results
>
> -----Original Message-----
> From: Jan Boxill [mailto:jmboxill@email.unc.edu]
> Sent: Monday, May 28, 2007 9:31 AM
> To: Armstrong, Gary
> Subject: Teaching Awards Committee
>
> Dear Gary.
> I recognition of your past Board of Governors' Award and as Chair of the
>
> Teaching Awards Committee for the upcoming year, I would like to invite > you to serve on the Committee to select the 2008 Board of Governors' > Award for Excellence in Teaching. Our first meeting will take place on > Monday, August 27th from 11:30-1, location TBA.
>
>
> Thank you for your consideration, and I hope you accept my invitation.
>
> Regards,
> Jan Boxill
> Chair 2008 Teaching Awards Committee
>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, May 29, 2007 11:33 AM
To: Chapel Hill Philosophy <hobler@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Spring 2008 Schedule
Attach: Spring 08 Schedule.xls

I have started the Spring schedule. I have I think the courses, now working on Times. I've attached what I have done.

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

PHILOSOPHY CLASSES SPRING 2008

	A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I	J	K	L	M	N
1					SPRING 2008 SCHEDULE
2				On Leave: Roberts
3	053H	1	Knobe	Freshman Seminar			2-3:15				20
4	85	1	Lange	Freshman Seminar			2-4:30W				20		CW 103
5	101	1		Intro Main Problems			9 MWF				40			1
6	101	2		Intro: Main Problems			12 MWF				36		CW 103	1
7	101	3		Intro: Main Problems			8 TR				36		CW 103	1
8	155	1	Hofweber	Intro Symbolic Logic			10MW				200			4
9				Recitations 4@10;4@11
10	160	1	Sayre McCord	Intro to Ethics			11 MW				200		CA 111	4
11				Recitations:4@ F11;4@F 12
12	160	2		Intro to Ethics							38		GA 209	1
13	110	1		Great Works			8 TR				40		CW 105	1
14	112	1		Making Sense of Ourselves			11 MWF				40		CW 105	1
15	112	2		Making Sense of Ourselves			3:30 TR				36		PE 216	1
16	134	1		Philosohy of Religion			2 TR
17	150	1	Lange	Philosophy of Science			9 MW				100			2
18				Recitations 2@ 9 ; 2@12
19	163	1	LeBar	Practical Ethics			12 MWF				200		CO 201
20	163	2		Practical Ethics							40		GA 105	1
21	165	1		Bioethics			9 MWF				40		CW 105	1
22	165	2	Baer	Bioethics			3:30-4:45 TR				40		GA 106
23	165	3		Bioethics			1 MWF				40		CW 105	1
24	165E	1		Bioethics-Evening College			6-7:15 MW				40			1
25	170	1	Postema	Social Ethics & Pol Thought							35
26	170	2	Saenz	Social Ethics & Pol Thought			12:30				40		GA 007
27	210	1	Lesher	Ancient Philosophy			11 TR
28	230	1	BarOn	Experience and Reality			11 TR				40		GA 106
29	230	2		Experience and Reality							36		PE 216	1
30	280	1		Morality and Law							40			1
31	272	1		Ethics Peace, War, Defense							40		CW 105	1
32	274H	1	B. Boxill	Afro-Amer Political Thought-Honors			3:30				25
33	275	1	Saenz	Phil Issues Feminism (WMST 46)							40
34	285	1	Nord	Philosophy of Education							40
35	330	1	Neta	Metaphysical systems							25
36	340	1	Lycan	Phil of Mind			4-6:30 R				25
37	364	1	Moehler	Ethics & Economics							30
38	368	1	LeBar	Environmental Ethics							30
39	384	1	Brennan	Intro to PPE							25
40	390	1	Reeve	Special Topics			W				20
41	296	1	J. Boxill	Independent Studies			4-5 W				5
42	397	1	Hill	Colloquium for Majors			4-6:30 R				25		CW 208
43	396	1	J. Boxill	Directed Readings: Ethics Bowl			6:30-9:00 R				5		CW 207C
44	423	1	Nelson	Kant			4-6:30 T				20
45	445	1	BarOn	Philosophy of Language			4-6:30 R				20
46	455	1	Neta	Epistemology			1-3:30 W				20
47	468	1	Maclean	Risk & Society							20
48	480	1	Corrado	Philosophy of Law			3:30 W				25		CW 103
49	485	1	Prinz	Philosophy of Art			1-3:30 T				20
50	698	1	Brennan	Advanced PPE			4:25-6:55 T				20		CW 103
51	691H	1	J. Boxill	Honors			4-6:30 M				6		CW 207C
52	692H	1	J. Boxill	Honors			4-6:30 M				6		CW 207C
53	700	1	Prinz/Simmons	Protoseminar			10-12:30 R				8		CW 208
54	705	1	Hofweber	Logic Seminar			1-3:30 W				15		CW 208
55	730	1	Lycan	Modality			1-3:30 T				15		CW 208
56	770	1	Boxill/Hill	Kant & Rawls on Intern'l Justice			4-6:30 W				15		CW 208

PHILOSOPHY CLASSES SPRING 2008

	A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I	J	K	L	M	N
57	805	1	Nelson/Reeve	Seminar			4-6:30 M				15		CW 208
58	805	2	Wolf	Seminar			4-6:30 R				15		CW 213
59	790	1		Colloquium Seminar			TBA
60	790	2		Colloquium Seminar			TBA
61	800	1		Bibliography Exam Seminar			TBA
62	990	1	Knobe	Reading Group			TBA				15		CW 208
63	990	2									15			27
64
65					RECITATIONS
66
67
68	101	601					10F				25		PH 220
69		602					10F				25		PH 222
70		603					10F				25		SM 107
71		604					10F				25		CW 105
72		605					9F				25		WG 301A
73		606					9F				25		GA 103
74		607					9F				25		MT 305
75		608					9F				25		PE 204
76
77	160	601					11F				25		SA 104
78		602					11F				25		SM 107
79		603					11F				25		AL 203
80		604					11F				25		GA 001
81		605					11F				25		PH 228
82		606					11F				25		GA 103
83		607					10F				25		GA 009
84		608					10F				25		PE 216
85		609					10F
86		610					10F
87		611					10F
88		612					10F
89		613					11F
90	163	601					12 F				25		CW 105
91		602					12 F				25		PE 215
92		603					12 F				25
93		604					12 F				25
94		605					10F				25
95		606					10F				25
96		607					10F				25
97		608					10F				25
98
99	275	601					11F				25
100		602					11F				25
101		603					11F				25
102		604					12F				25
103		605					12F				25
104		606					12F				25
105														17

From: nobody@notify.unc.edu on behalf of Meyer-Kalos, Piper S </O=UNC EXCHANGE/OU=EXCHANGE ADMINISTRATIVE GROUP (FYDIBOHF23SPDLT)/CN=RECIPIENTS/CN=PSMEYER>
Sent: Tuesday, May 29, 2007 8:12 PM
To: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: INFORMATIONAL: info needed for study on social thinking

---

We are seeking participants for a study on social cognition. Social cognition research examines how people make judgments about the thoughts, feelings, and intentions of other people.

Participation will take 1 to 2 hours, and will involve completing a set of paper-and-pencil questionnaires, computer- and video-based tasks, and a brief, audio-taped role play.

Participants will be COMPENSATED at a rate of $20 per hour (pro-rated at $5 per 15 minutes).

For more information, please email Dr. Piper Meyer at psmeyer@email.unc.edu.

Participants must be 18 to 65 years old, have no current problems with alcohol or drug use, and have no history of schizophrenia or bipolar disorder themselves, or in first-degree relatives.

This is part of a broader study called, Social Cognition in Schizophrenia, which was approved by the UNC Behavioral Institutional Review Board on June 15, 2006 (Study number: Psy 05-0522).

This email is sponsored by: Psychology Department

==========

"INFORMATIONAL:" email will only be sent to those who have indicated that they do want to receive mass email. To set your informational mass email preference, logon to the on-line directory web site at https://dir.unc.edu/dir/update.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, May 31, 2007 9:37 AM
To: Sylvia Hatchell <shatchell@uncaa.unc.edu>
Subject: Schedules
Attach: Summer 2007 Schedules.doc

Here are the summer schedules

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, May 31, 2007 2:55 PM
To: Roberts, John Thomas <jtrosap@email.unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: Study Abroad Major Credit]
Attach: Study Abroad Major Credit.msg

Hi John,
Can you respond to him,
Thanks,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, June 4, 2007 11:35 PM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Quiz #4
Attach: Quiz #4-Sum 07.doc

Hi Carlo,
How was the trip to Central Prison?
Thank you so much for taking my class tomorrow. I've attached the quiz.
Can you make 37 copies for the class. It shouldn't take very long-so 15 minutes should be plenty of time.
I also forgot, some people will turn in 1-page papers. So you can collect them for me as well.

The video is set at the right place for the little-league story. That should take about 40 minutes, but however long it is, you can let them go after it.

Thanks,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, June 5, 2007 8:40 AM
To: Andrew Calder <acalder@mail.uncaa.unc.edu>
Subject: Second Summer Session
Attach: Summer 2007 Schedules.doc

I've attached the schedules again for both summer sessions.
Summer II is at the end of Summer I

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, June 7, 2007 11:11 AM
To: Clark, Susan C <scclark@email.unc.edu>
Cc: Lance Westerlund <westy@email.unc.edu>; Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Fatou event

Hi Susan,

The email you reference below concerning the Fatou event is an outdated version of the original correspondence with Great Decisions. Since then the actual commitment was clarified and posted in the Parr Center Admin folder-events-2007 spring events-budget that describes Great decisions contribution. The total contribution from Great Decisions is $1,300 and the contact person is Jon Weiler (jweiler@email.unc.edu).

Thanks for all of your hard work with getting the solicited funds.

Jan

Susan Clark wrote:
> Good Morning All,
> The paid invoice from International Court has cleared, and was on > May's FBMO. I need an account number or Dept number so I can process > the reimbursement to us. I believe that Great Decisions committed > $2128.89. If we could take care of this as soon as possible, since we > are almost at the end of this fiscal year.
> Thank you,
> Susan
>
> Carlo Robustelli wrote:
>> Hi Julia,
>>
>> I wanted to get back to you about travel costs associated with >> Fatou's upcoming visit. I have gotten the final details. Below you >> will find a break down based on what you are offering and what I >> estimate the costs to be. Please let me know if you have any >> questions or concerns.
>>
>> Just to review the funding Great Decisions is putting up for the event:
>> -half of the North American airfare (can't pay for trans-atlantic >> flights) = 1/2 $3,927.77 (3,000 euro's) (total GD contribution: >> $1963.89)
>> * I have confirmed that this fare is from Ottawa-NC-Amsterdam. So >> the half you would pay for would be from Ottawa - NC. She said she >> would indicate so in the invoice she will send to the Center after >> the event. *
>> -one night at the Carolina Inn ($165.00)
>> -dinner for Ms. Bensouda at Top of the Hill (unfortunately GD doesn't >> pay for other guests but of course we would want you all to come to >> dinner) (I assume you will be making these arrangements - let us >> know how many people we can invite) >> -Decisions and Desserts reception from 6:30-7:00 before (do we want >> the reception before the lecture????) the lecture (run by >> CUAB--students/community members RSVP to join, they are capped at >> 10)" *(I assume you will also be making these arrangements - if you >> are not making these arrangements or need help making these >> arrangements please let me know) *
>>
>> *The Center will directly pay for the hotel and the airfare and so >> Great Decisions should expect to reimburse the Center $2128.89.
>> *

>> I hope this helps.
>>
>> - Carlo
>>
>>
>>
>> Carlo Robustelli
>> Program Coordinator
>> Parr Center for Ethics
>> Department of Philosophy
>> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
>> CB #3125
>> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
>> USA
>>
>> Phone: (919) 843-5640
>> email: carlo@unc.edu
>> http://philosophy.unc.edu/robustelli.htm
>>
>>
>> Julia M. Brown wrote:
>>> Hi Carlo,
>>>
>>> Sorry it took so long to get back to you, Great Decisions is getting >>> in full swing and my students are very demanding (in the best >>> possible sense) this semester.
>>>
>>> Though the Parr Center event looks fascinating, it takes place >>> during Great Decisions (which is from 7-8 with an 8-9 recitation >>> section every Tuesday)--so you understand why I won't encourage my >>> students to attend.
>>>
>>> The title we are using for the event is:
>>> "Prosecuting War Criminals and the International Criminal Court"
>>>
>>> Regarding the DTH ad, it turns out we are not actually a student >>> organization since we are a class, so we wouldn't get the special >>> rate. However, I don't know how much an ad will help since I am not >>> very worried about attendance (see the following).
>>>
>>> Donna and I were discussing Ms. Bensouda's lecture and realized that >>> it would be beneficial for her to speak twice on the evening of >>> March 20. Great Decisions is almost a full class (upwards of 200 >>> people) and there are approximately 50 seniors from the local >>> retirement homes who come as well. The lectures thus far have ended >>> exactly at 8:00, so we think another, more intimate lecture for the >>> community would be beneficial.
>>>
>>> Donna can't remember if she reserved the JCUE lounge for March 20, >>> so if you could make talk to Randy and make sure it is reserved, >>> that would be great. If we had Ms. Bensouda give a talk from >>> 8:30-9:30, that would make optimal use of her time as well as assure >>> that professionals, community members, and perhaps students have a >>> chance to see Ms. Bensouda without the hassle of an overflow room.
>>> We can probably advertise this event as a discussion rather than a >>> lecture
>>>
>>> Just to review the funding Great Decisions is putting up for the event:
>>> -half of the North American airfare (can't pay for trans-atlantic >>> flights)
>>> -one night at the Carolina Inn
>>> -dinner for Ms. Bensouda at Top of the Hill (unfortunately GD >>> doesn't pay for other guests but of course we would want you all to >>> come to dinner)
>>> -Decisions and Desserts reception from 6:30-7:00 before the lecture >>> (run by CUAB--students/community members RSVP to join, they are >>> capped at 10)

>>>
>>> I will drop off a statement to that effect for you to sign in the >>> next week.
>>>
>>> This is very exciting and please let me know if you have any >>> questions or concerns!
>>>
>>> Thank you,
>>>
>>> Julia
>>>
>>>
>>> Quoting Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>:
>>>
>>>> Hi Julia,
>>>>
>>>> Could you send me the title you are using to publicize the upcoming >>>> event featuring Fatou Bensouda? I want to use it to keep our >>>> information consistent about her lecture.
>>>>
>>>> Also, do you think it would be either possible and/or appropriate >>>> to send an email about an upcoming Parr Center event that may be of >>>> interest to those involved with Great Decisions? The event is >>>> featuring, Professor Daniel Gilbert, Harvard University. You can >>>> find out a bit more about the event at the events web page:
>>>> http://parrcenter.unc.edu/events/seminars/happiness/
>>>> - If this is something that you would forward to your email lists >>>> then I will sent out a more comprehensive press release for the event.
>>>>
>>>> Thanks for your help,
>>>> - Carlo
>>>>
>>>> --
>>>> Carlo Robustelli
>>>> Program Coordinator
>>>> Parr Center for Ethics
>>>> Department of Philosophy
>>>> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
>>>> CB #3125
>>>> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
>>>> USA
>>>>
>>>> Phone: (919) 843-5640
>>>> email: carlo@unc.edu
>>>> http://philosophy.unc.edu/robustelli.htm
>>>>
>>>>
>>>
>>>
>>>
>
> --
>
>
> Susan Clark, UAM 1
> Philosophy,Admin. Manager
> UNC-Chapel Hill
> 102-A Caldwell Hall CB 3125
> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
> 919-962-3311
> 919-843-3929 Fax
> scclark@email.unc.edu
>

>
>

Paper Criteria Grading Sheet

	A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H
1
2
3	PAPER CRITERIA	Excellent	Good	Fair	Poor	Failed to do	N/A	Comments
4
5	Introductory paragraph
6	Clear thesis/position statement
7	Argument for position taken
8	Adequate philosophical support
9	Use of examples
10	Defined concepts
11	Objections to your argument
12	Development of objections
13	Adequate philosophical support
14	Response to objections
15	Avoided irrelevancies
16	Creativity/originality
17	Spelling/Grammar
18	Clearly Written
19	Sources cited
20
21	Other
22
23	GENERAL COMMENTS:
24							Grade:
25	NAME:
26	HONOR PLEDGE:

WRITING YOUR PAPER

TITLE PAGE: Your name, PID, the paper topic, Honor pledge with signature.

STRUCTURE OF PAPER:

I. FORMAL ARGUMENT CONSTRUCTION/RECONSTRUCTION

Reconstruct the argument in the passage:

Premise 1:
Premise 2:
Premise 3:
…
…
Conclusion:

Clearly state the position you are going to take. This is your thesis statement

II. SUPPORT FOR THESIS:

Argue for the position you are taking. If you are arguing for the conclusion, then support argument you have constructed in Section I with good reasons. If you are arguing against the conclusion, then give reasons why the argument you have constructed is not sound. In so doing be sure to give adequate philosophical support, using the readings and your own ideas. Avoid using "I believe" or "I feel." Personal opinions are acceptable only if supported by good reasons.

III. OBJECTIONS TO YOUR POSITION

Consider obvious objections to your position. That is, how would someone argue against the position you took and what support would they give? Use readings and your own ideas.

IV. ANSWERING THE OBJECTIONS

Answer the objections raised. What reasons can be offered to counter the objections?

V. CONCLUSION

Basically restate your thesis to show why your position is the better one.

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, June 7, 2007 2:40 PM
To: Janken, Kenneth R <krjanken@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: [Fwd: PHIL 560]

Thanks Kenneth,
These are the same notes I have and then I went through the on-line revision which I had a very uncomfortable feeling about. I don't know how to access the on line submission as every time I try it says there is no such Phil number. I must say this has been a VERY frustrating trying to work through the on-line submissions, not just for this class but others as well. I will call Denise and see what I can do.

Thanks for your help,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Kenneth Janken wrote:
> Dear Jan,
>
> I just got off the telephone with Denise Elbert. Below are the notes > from the SGE, explaining why the course was approved for some Gen Ed > requirements but not others. I'm pretty sure that you have these, as > they were sent out on March 14, 2007. This is the last record that > Denise has for PHIL560. If you submitted something in response to > these notes, well, Denise does not have it. She suggested that you > re-submit.
>
> Sorry. I wish the report had been different.
>
> Kenneth
> --
>
> Kenneth R. Janken
>
> Professor of Afro-American Studies
>
> Department of African and Afro-American Studies
>
> Battle Hall, Campus Box #3395
>
> University of North Carolina
>
> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3395
>
> /and/> Director of Experiential Education
>
> Office of Undergraduate Curricula
>
> 300 Steele Bldg, Campus Box 3504

>
> University of North Carolina
>
> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3504
>
> (919) 962-1519 (voice)
>
> (919) 962-2694 (fax)
>
> http://uncpress.unc.edu/books/T-8059.html
>
> http://www.umass.edu/umpress/spr_97/janken.html
>
>
> ---
>
> Subject:
> PHIL 560
> From:
> Denise Elbert <jdelbert@email.unc.edu>
> Date:
> Thu, 07 Jun 2007 13:56:26 -0400
> To:
> Kenneth R Janken <krjanken@email.unc.edu>
>
> To:
> Kenneth R Janken <krjanken@email.unc.edu>
>
>
> This is what I found from SGE notes:
>
> PHIL 560: This course was approved as Philosophical and Moral > Reasoning (PH).
> This course was not approved as (Communications Intensive) (CI)
> because revision of written work is not part of the course (perhaps > have students revise a paper after engaging in a debate?).
> Not approved as Global Issues (GL) because the course does not meet GL > criteria.
> Not approved as Experiential Education (EE) because the rationale for > counting this as EE is not clear. Is this mentored research? Seems > not. Field work? How so? Of what would the field work consist?
> Engaging in a debate/game in public is not necessarily experiential in > the sense implied by the criteria document. In any case, the hours > of field work are not specified.
>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, June 7, 2007 2:45 PM
To: Janken, Kenneth R <krjanken@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: [Fwd: PHIL 560]

Hi again,
I looked at my revision that I did on the syllabus and it was done and submitted on March 23, 2007. I will resubmit and hope it goes through.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Kenneth Janken wrote:
> Dear Jan,
>
> I just got off the telephone with Denise Elbert. Below are the notes > from the SGE, explaining why the course was approved for some Gen Ed > requirements but not others. I'm pretty sure that you have these, as > they were sent out on March 14, 2007. This is the last record that > Denise has for PHIL560. If you submitted something in response to > these notes, well, Denise does not have it. She suggested that you > re-submit.
>
> Sorry. I wish the report had been different.
>
> Kenneth
> --
>
> Kenneth R. Janken
>
> Professor of Afro-American Studies
>
> Department of African and Afro-American Studies
>
> Battle Hall, Campus Box #3395
>
> University of North Carolina
>
> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3395
>
> /and/> Director of Experiential Education
>
> Office of Undergraduate Curricula
>
> 300 Steele Bldg, Campus Box 3504
>
> University of North Carolina
>
> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3504
>
> (919) 962-1519 (voice)

>
> (919) 962-2694 (fax)
>
> http://uncpress.unc.edu/books/T-8059.html
>
> http://www.umass.edu/umpress/spr_97/janken.html
>
>
> ----------
>
> Subject:
> PHIL 560
> From:
> Denise Elbert <jdelbert@email.unc.edu>
> Date:
> Thu, 07 Jun 2007 13:56:26 -0400
> To:
> Kenneth R Janken <krjanken@email.unc.edu>
>
> To:
> Kenneth R Janken <krjanken@email.unc.edu>
>
>
> This is what I found from SGE notes:
>
> PHIL 560: This course was approved as Philosophical and Moral
> Reasoning (PH).
> This course was not approved as (Communications Intensive) (CI)
> because revision of written work is not part of the course (perhaps > have students revise a paper after engaging in a debate?).
> Not approved as Global Issues (GL) because the course does not meet GL
> criteria.
> Not approved as Experiential Education (EE) because the rationale for > counting this as EE is not clear. Is this mentored research? Seems > not. Field work? How so? Of what would the field work consist?
> Engaging in a debate/game in public is not necessarily experiential in > the sense implied by the criteria document. In any case, the hours > of field work are not specified.
>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, June 7, 2007 2:50 PM
To: Janken, Kenneth R <krjanken@email.unc.edu>; jdelbert@email.unc.edu
Subject: Re: [Fwd: PHIL 560]

I had revised and resubmitted the course proposal on March 23, 2007, and I just resubmitted it this minute. I hope this time the resubmission goes through.
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Kenneth Janken wrote:
> Dear Jan,
>
> I just got off the telephone with Denise Elbert. Below are the notes > from the SGE, explaining why the course was approved for some Gen Ed > requirements but not others. I'm pretty sure that you have these, as > they were sent out on March 14, 2007. This is the last record that > Denise has for PHIL560. If you submitted something in response to > these notes, well, Denise does not have it. She suggested that you > re-submit.
>
> Sorry. I wish the report had been different.
>
> Kenneth
> --
>
> Kenneth R. Janken
>
> Professor of Afro-American Studies
>
> Department of African and Afro-American Studies
>
> Battle Hall, Campus Box #3395
>
> University of North Carolina
>
> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3395
>
> /and/> Director of Experiential Education
>
> Office of Undergraduate Curricula
>
> 300 Steele Bldg, Campus Box 3504
>
> University of North Carolina
>
> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3504
>
> (919) 962-1519 (voice)

>
> (919) 962-2694 (fax)
>
> http://uncpress.unc.edu/books/T-8059.html
>
> http://www.umass.edu/umpress/spr_97/janken.html
>
>
> ----------
>
> Subject:
> PHIL 560
> From:
> Denise Elbert <jdelbert@email.unc.edu>
> Date:
> Thu, 07 Jun 2007 13:56:26 -0400
> To:
> Kenneth R Janken <krjanken@email.unc.edu>
>
> To:
> Kenneth R Janken <krjanken@email.unc.edu>
>
>
> This is what I found from SGE notes:
>
> PHIL 560: This course was approved as Philosophical and Moral
> Reasoning (PH).
> This course was not approved as (Communications Intensive) (CI)
> because revision of written work is not part of the course (perhaps > have students revise a paper after engaging in a debate?).
> Not approved as Global Issues (GL) because the course does not meet GL
> criteria.
> Not approved as Experiential Education (EE) because the rationale for > counting this as EE is not clear. Is this mentored research? Seems > not. Field work? How so? Of what would the field work consist?
> Engaging in a debate/game in public is not necessarily experiential in > the sense implied by the criteria document. In any case, the hours > of field work are not specified.
>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, June 11, 2007 9:42 AM
To: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: The Grammatical version]
Attach: The Grammatical version.msg

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Byrns, Ralph T <rbyrns@unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, June 8, 2007 3:39 PM
To: Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>
Subject: The Grammatical version
Attach: RTByrns-Parr_Center_APA_Award.doc

Jan-- I found and fixed one failure of agreement between subject and verb.

TTFN,

Ralph

-----Original Message-----
From: Ralph Byrns [mailto:rbyrns@unc.edu]
Sent: Friday, June 08, 2007 3:31 PM
To: 'Jan Boxill'
Subject: RE: Parr Center Help

Jan --

I've attached a letter advocating the award of the Prize from the American Philosophical Association, and will cheerfully revise it if you can suggest changes that would make this letter more useful.

Cheers,

Ralph Byrns

* **
* Adjunct Professor of Economics *
* University of North Carolina *
* Gardner Hall 006 CB #3305 *
* Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3305 *
* *
* Voice: (919) 843-6268 Fax : (919) 966-4986 *
* Home : (919) 932-9927 Cell : (919) 618-9993 *
* rbyrns@unc.edu *
* http://www.unc.edu/~rbyrns/ *
* **

-----Original Message-----
From: Jan Boxill [mailto:jmboxill@email.unc.edu]
Sent: Thursday, May 31, 2007 2:43 PM
To: Ralph Byrns
Subject: Parr Center Help

Hi Ralph,

I hope your summer is going well and that you have some time for yourself and family. I had hoped the summer would be relaxing and a time to get a lot of preliminary work done, but things are as hectic as ever, especially as Carlo is leaving us to take up a position as the Assistant to the Mayor of Chapel Hill. This will be a major loss for the Center, the Department and me. But the workings of the Center still have to go on, which is the occasion for this email.

Each year the American Philosophical Association, in conjunction with the Philosophy Documentation Center, awards a Prize for Excellence and Innovation in Philosophy Programs. We would like to to nominate the Parr Centerfor Ethics for this award as this would really help toward our programming. So I would like to ask for your help in this endeavor by writing a letter in support of our nomination.

The criteria for this award focus on both excellence and innovation and are described in greater detail below:

* Excellence -- assessed by a record of achievement, the accomplishment of clearly defined goals, and the appropriateness of the program for emulation by others in the field.

* Innovation assessed by the development of new research areas, new interdisciplinary connections, new international connections, new modes of teaching or dissemination, new audiences for philosophical work, or extension of existing boundaries of the discipline.

We are confident in the excellence of our programming and we think the Ethics in the Professions Series fits squarely with the innovative criteria mentioned above. To this end we hope that you will consider writing a letter, addressed to me, Dr. Jan Boxill, in which you give us your evaluation of the Parr Center for Ethics. Please tell us in as much detail as you can how you think the Parr Center for Ethics demonstrates excellence. If you can provide a measurement for its success, include that information as well.

The Ethics in the Professions Series calls attention to ethical issues as they arise in professional life. Participants in the series have the opportunity to explore ethical issues in their professions and to develop the critical frameworks they need to think about them fruitfully.

If you agree that the Ethics in the Professions Series meets the criteria described above then we could use your help. What we need to submit this proposal is for fellows to explain how, as part of the Ethics in the Professions Series, the Parr Center for Ethics helped participants from your field to explore ethical issues and to develop a critical framework in order to think about these issues effectively.

We would appreciate having your response, on letterhead, by Friday, June 8th.

We are grateful for your assistance and we are sure it will make a difference when our nomination is considered by the American Philosophical Association. Please feel free to contact me if you have any questions or concerns.

Thanks so much,

Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Ralph T. Byrns
Adjunct Professor [2001-]
Department of Economics
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3305

THE UNIVERSITY OF NORTH CAROLINA
AT CHAPEL HILL

cell: 919-618-9993
home: 919-932-9927
email: rbyrns@unc.edu
www.unc.edu/~rbyrns/

June 7, 2007

Dr. Jan Boxill, Director
Parr Center for Ethics
Department of Philosophy
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

Dear Dr. Boxill;

I have enjoyed presentations by the Parr Center for Ethics since shortly after I began teaching at UNC, when a student alerted me to one of its panel discussions. My sponsorship of the Carolina Economics Club more recently has resulted in a closer collaboration, with joint sponsorship of some events by the Parr Center, the Economics Club, and the Philosophy Club. I truly appreciate your request for my reactions to your "Ethics in the Professions" series and my overall evaluation of the Parr Center.

In short, the Parr Center for Ethics is among the hubs of excellence at UNC. The Parr Center's attempts to engage scholars across multiple disciplines are especially praiseworthy. For example, one panel I was on included faculty from political science, philosophy, and the College of Business. The quality and frequency of monthly presentations on "Ethics in the Professions" is exceptional, and is valuable in part because sequential presentations reflect elaborations of a coherent theme, and not merely a hodgepodge of unrelated topics. Consequently, I am pleased strongly recommend that this year's Prize for Excellence and Innovation in Philosophy Programs be awarded to the Parr Center by the American Philosophical Association, in conjunction with the Philosophy Documentation Center:

This letter is an opportunity for me to address how important ethical considerations are in economics, and why studying ethics by economists and economics students is increasingly important. The individual and collective behaviors of a stylized Homo economicus who is essentially sociopathic is central to many standard economic models. Unfortunately, some economists have been known to assert to their classes that "greed is good," based on a misreading of Adam Smith's "invisible hand" of the marketplace. In 1993, I was on a panel at the American Economics Association's Annual Meeting aimed at addressing failings in standard introductory courses in economics. Most of the presentations centered on how to integrate emerging technologies into our classes.

However, one of my friends, now dean of the Business School at the University of Rochester, insisted that the biggest shortcoming was that, after studying supply and demand, too many students went away with the impression that sharp dealing, cheating, and taking advantage of other people's ignorance is justified by an economic Darwinism that facilitates economic efficiency. His arguments caused me to begin revising my thoughts on whether businesses have a social responsibility beyond merely maximizing the wealth of the firms' owners, per the conventional wisdom among economists. I rewrote part of chapter 1 of a principles textbook I coauthored to discuss the empathy that many people feel and the roles of ethics and equity, topics that many economists try very hard to avoid in heir attempts to be “positive” scientists, and to avoid any normative judgments. I began thinking about these issues even more beginning in 2002, when the scandals associated with Enron, Global Crossing, etc. were exposed.

In my opinion, your innovative “Ethics in the Professions” program adds significantly to the quality of thought at UNC about numerous social problems. Our society definitely needs to adopt more rational and humane policies about such issues the rights of disadvantaged parties, as affirmative action, how immigration policy affects the wellbeing of Americans and foreigners, and the compensation of corporate CEOs and the broader issue of increasing inequality in the distribution of income and wealth in the United States.

I look forward to working with you this coming semester. Among other activities, I think two Nobel Prize winning economists are visiting the campus, and have agreed to meet with our students. I also believe that the continuing activities of the Parr Center justify an award of the Prize from the American Philosophical Association, and hope that you win this prize.

Sincerely,

Ralph Byrns, PhD

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, June 14, 2007 2:43 PM
To: Bickford, Donna M <dbickford@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Jennifer Lawless

Hi Donna,
Thank you so much for meeting with Laura. I think she is finally beginning to unwind a bit. I told her yesterday that she is wound so tight that sometimes I think she is going to explode, and that I wanted the discussions with you and me and her writing of all this out to be a way of loosening that tightness!!! She finally smiled! I think she has more of a focus on what she wants to say, rather than just being upset and stressed. At least I hope so. Each meeting I see progress, which is great. So thank you so much.

Dr. Lawless sounds great. I don't know our budget yet. I hope we can contribute some $$ but if not, we can at least co sponsor by way of helping with publicity. Interesting website; also interesting, I was saying to my daughter last night that I think it is time for me to run for political office!!! I was inspired from listening on NPR about this 94 year old woman who ran for Congress from New Hampshire!!! There is a documentary on her--"Granny B" I think it is.

Thanks,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Donna Bickford wrote:
> Hi Jan:
>
> I had a nice conversation with Laura Bennett the other day.
>
> I wanted to let you know that we are bringing Dr. Jennifer Lawless to > campus for a public lecture on October 25 and a seminar with the > American Politics Research Group on October 26. Jen is a professor of > political science at Brown, and also ran for office in Rhode Island > (bio attached and webpage below).
>
> I was wondering if the Parr Center for Ethics would have any interest > in cosponsoring and making a contribution to this event?
>
> Thanks for your consideration -
> Donna
>
> http://www.brown.edu/Departments/Political_Science/people/facultypage.php?id=10066
>
>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, June 15, 2007 4:36 PM
To: Lance Westerlund <westy@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Events

I just agreed to "co-sponsor" Jennifer Lawless with the Carolina Women's Center on Oct 25th. I told her for now no $$ but publicity, so that would be staff time.
The rest you have.
I just got an email from Adventures in Ideas to co-sponsor with them again. I haven't responded yet.

Jan

Lance Westerlund wrote:
> Hi Jan,
>
> I'm starting work on the proposed budget for the coming year and I > would like to add all possible events, including those that have not > yet progressed beyond the idea stage. Please reply with anything I > have missed. Here is what I have so far:
>
> Fellows Luncheon
> Disability Workshop/Seminar
> Ethical Decision Making course
> Ethics Bowl
> Capital Punishment event
> Torture event (Tom Hill)
> Freedom House Scholars (Kristen Bell)
>
> Thanks,
> Lance
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, June 15, 2007 9:06 PM
To: Laurel Goldstein <laurel.goldstein@gmail.com>
Subject: Re: syllabus

Hi Laurel,
Great syllabus. Really good readings. Don't be surprised if you don't get through all the articles, especially if students seem to be really into the discussion.
You can give a take home exam/paper. But it is easier to give a final exam.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Laurel Goldstein wrote:
> hi jan,
> here is the syllabus i am thinking of doing for my class.
> sorry for getting it to you so late.
> is it ok? do i have to give a final exam?
> thanks,
> laurel

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, June 18, 2007 5:51 PM
To: Beth Bridger <bridgerb@uncaa.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Thursday

Hi Beth,
Sounds good. See you at 1:45 to be ready at 2. I'll cover those very thing you want. Are all these guys in summer school as well?

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Beth Bridger wrote:
> Dr. Boxill--
>
> I just wanted to check in with you about Thursday. If you could come > at 2, that would be great. The guys will be here at 145 and we will > get them all settled in and ready to go for you at 2. I would say 30 > minutes or less would be the time we would like you to present.
>
> So you know, our kind of theme/emphasis this year with the guys is not > compromising who you are as a person, but understanding the different > situations and environments you are stepping into and acting > accordingly.
>
> With that in mind, if you could cover:
> professor observations and general comments on athletes in class > professor expectations for class, turning in assignments, test taking, > policies on cheating
> General do's and don'ts of the classroom
> How to talk to professors/what to ask in office hours (ie how to help > grades, not have professors change grades)
>
> Anything else you can relate to this topic!
>
> Thank you so much for helping us with this!
> See you Thursday at 2.
>
>
>
>
> *BETH
> *
> Beth Bridger
> Learning Specialist, Football
> UNC-Chapel Hill
> (w) 919-843-5669
> (c) 919-619-8809
> bridgerb@uncaa.unc.edu

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, June 18, 2007 6:03 PM
To: Beth Bridger <bridgerb@uncaa.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Thursday

Great, thanks,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Beth Bridger wrote:
> Yes, they are all the new freshmen and they are taking classes ranging > from engl 100 to psyc 101 to afri 101 to math 110 to educ 441.
>
> *BETH
> *
> Beth Bridger
> Learning Specialist, Football
> UNC-Chapel Hill
> (w) 919-843-5669
> (c) 919-619-8809
> bridgerb@uncaa.unc.edu
>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, June 19, 2007 11:56 AM
To: Lance Westerlund <westy@email.unc.edu>
Cc: Carlo Robustelli <carlo@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Online registration

Lance,
This sounds good, but I am a little concerned about waiting much longer to get out the invitations and notices to schools. Perhaps we could send out the invitations and let people know that we are working on the registration details. What do you think?

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Lance Westerlund wrote:
> Hi folks,
>
> Regarding the online registration and payment options, currently, a > company called ABC Signup (www.ABCSignup.com) is being used by Sue > Butler at BHRP and John Anderson in the School of Social Work. They > are cheaper than regoline, charging $3-3.50/per registrant. There is > also a one-time $200 set up fee. Although we would avoid the 4 weeks > it would take to get approval from the Controllers office, it will > take one week for ABC Signup to set up in addition to filling out > paperwork and meeting with the CERTIFI committee (*C*ompliant > *E*lectronic *R*eceipt *T*ransactions through* I*nnovation and* > F*inancial *I*ntegrity) here at UNC. This may be worth considering > for future use with Parr Center and Philosophy Department events.
>
> Thanks,
> Lance
>
>
> Thanks,
> Lance
> --
> Lance Westerlund
> Office Assistant
> Parr Center for Ethics
> Department of Philosophy
> University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
> CB #3125
> Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
> USA
>
> Phone: (919) 843-5641
> email: lancew@unc.edu
> http://parrcenter.unc.edu/about/westerlund.html

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, June 19, 2007 7:21 PM
To: Brodey, Inger S <brodey@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Teaching Awards Committee

WONDERFUL!!! Debbie Stevenson will be in contact with you regarding all future meetings.
Thanks again, I look forward to working with you.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Inger S. B. Brodey wrote:
> Hi Jan:
> I would be happy to help.
> Greetings from Inger
>
> -----Original Message-----
> From: Jan Boxill [mailto:jmboxill@email.unc.edu]
> Sent: Monday, May 28, 2007 9:35 AM
> To: brodey@email.unc.edu
> Subject: Teaching Awards Committee
>
>
> Dear Inger,
> I hope your summer is going well.
> In recognition of your 2006 Teaching Award and as Chair of the 2008 > Teaching Awards Committee, I would like to invite you to serve on the > committee to select the 2008 Tanner Awards for Excellence in > Undergraduate Teaching. Our initial meeting will take place on Monday, > August 27th from 11:30-1, location TBA.
>
> Thank you for your consideration, and I hope you will accept my invitation.
>
> Regards,
> Jan Boxill
> Chair, 2008 Teaching Awards Committee
>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, June 19, 2007 7:41 PM
To: Stevenson, Debbie Deese <debbie_stevenson@unc.edu>
Subject: Teaching Awards

Hi Debbie,
Inger Brodey will serve on Faculty Tanner Awards Committee.

Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, June 19, 2007 11:48 PM
To: Diane Lupton <dflupton@email.unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: SSI Faculty Grade Roll Letter]
Attach: SSI Faculty Grade Roll Letter.msg

Not sure if you got this, but thought I'd forward it anyway.
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Decosta, Senora R <senora@unc.edu>

Sent: Monday, June 18, 2007 1:55 PM

To: Alexandra Thomas <alexthom@email.unc.edu>; Amanda Brooks <amandalb@email.unc.edu>; Andi Morgan <file@email.unc.edu>; Warren, Angeline <awarren@email.unc.edu>; Rainey, Arlene <arlene_rainey@unc.edu>; McCullen, Ashley D <amcculle@email.unc.edu>; Riefkohl Muniz, Beatriz S <riefkohl@email.unc.edu>; Sauer, Beth H <bhsauer@email.unc.edu>; Futrell, Betty S <bfutrell@email.unc.edu>; Carolyn Fahey <cfahey@med.unc.edu>; Newman, Carolyn <cnewman@email.unc.edu>; Turner, Carolyn L <turnerc@email.unc.edu>; Rogers, Charlotte H <crogers@email.unc.edu>; Winston, Mary C <cwinston@physics.unc.edu>; Daniel Pellathy <pellathy@email.unc.edu>; Deborah Davis <Deborah_Davis@unc.edu>; Denise Kent <dkent@unc.edu>; Diane Harris <diane_harris@med.unc.edu>; Hill, Diane T <dhill@email.unc.edu>; Flannery, Dixie <dixie_flannery@med.unc.edu>; Rozan, Ellen <erozan@email.unc.edu>; Fholer, Marie A <fholer@email.unc.edu>; Taylor, Geraldine <gtaylor@email.unc.edu>; Williams, Gina <gina_werner@med.unc.edu>; Glenda Thompson <glenda@email.unc.edu>; Gucki Obler <hobler@email.unc.edu>; Diana, Ina Bobrow <ina_diana@med.unc.edu>; Gorman, Jacquelene W <jackie@unc.edu>; Ward, Janet M <jkerr@email.unc.edu>; Warfford, Janice C <janice_warfford@med.unc.edu>; Carter, Janis C <carter1@email.unc.edu>; Clemmons, Jason <jclem@email.unc.edu>; Jerry M. Spiller <jmspille@email.unc.edu>; Jessica Russell <Jessica_Russell@unc.edu>; Boxill, Jeanette M <JMBOXILL@email.unc.edu>; Lee, Joanne O. <Joanne_Lee@unc.edu>; Weiler, Jonathan D <jweiler@email.unc.edu>; Sardi, Karen L <ksardi@email.unc.edu>; Thompson, Karen <kthomps1@email.unc.edu>; Moore, Katherine A <mooreka@email.unc.edu>; Lanakila Michaels <lanakila_michaels@unc.edu>; Bailey, Lara J <ljbailey@email.unc.edu>; Lennis Carrier <lcarrier@email.unc.edu>; Van Meter, Leslie S <lvanmeter@unc.edu>; Fulenwider, C. Lindsay <lindsay@email.unc.edu>; Blalock, Lori N. <lori_blalock@med.unc.edu>; Harris, Lori <leharris@email.unc.edu>; Marcia Mock <marcia_mock@unc.edu>; Mark Walvoord <walvoord@unc.edu>; Hinrichs, Mary L <mhinrich@email.unc.edu>; Hobgood, Melissa C <mhobgood@bios.unc.edu>; Kelly, Miranda S <miranda@unc.edu>; Myra Quick <quick@email.unc.edu>; Salaam, Nadera <nadera@email.unc.edu>; McKinney, Nancy D <ndmckinney@unc.edu>; Phillips, Nell K <nphillip@email.unc.edu>; Tharp, Pam <pstharp@email.unc.edu>; Patricia M. Maroney <pmaroney@email.unc.edu>; Poteat, Phyllis B <pbpoteat@email.unc.edu>; Rebecca Teer <rebeccat@email.unc.edu>; cas_sallie.con <sallie@physics.unc.edu>; McIver, Samelia <mciver@email.unc.edu>; Shaw, Seletha L <seletha_shaw@med.unc.edu>; Davis, Sharon E <sedavis@email.unc.edu>; Jones, Sharon Horton <shjones@email.unc.edu>; Sharon Pickard <pickard@iogmail.iog.unc.edu>; Sessoms, Sharon R <srsessom@email.unc.edu>; Melton, Sheena J <smelton@email.unc.edu>; Sherry Rhodes <sherry_rhodes@unc.edu>; Sue Forrest <sforrest@email.unc.edu>; Soltis, Susan L <soltis@email.unc.edu>; Cheek, Suphronia M-j <sjcheek@email.unc.edu>; Williams, Terita <terita_williams@med.unc.edu>; Barker, Terry C <terry_barker@dentistry.unc.edu>; Test Message <karr@att.net>; tjohnson@bme.unc.edu; Gore, Travis <stgore@email.unc.edu>; Robinson, Tricia M. <tmrobins@email.unc.edu>; Bernhardt, Valerie M <valerieb@email.unc.edu>; Victoria Dowd <dowd@email.unc.edu>; Walker, Victoria Ward <vwwalker@email.unc.edu>; Berg, Vilma Gabriele <vberg@email.unc.edu>; Wallace, Wanda L. <allace@email.unc.edu>; Fletcher, W Miles <wmfletch@email.unc.edu>; Yvette Thompson <vette4@email.unc.edu>

Subject: SSI Faculty Grade Roll Letter

Attach: 1SS073grdrollmemo.doc

All,

Some of you requested this for SSI. -- Senora

--
****
Senora DeCosta
Assistant University Registrar
University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
CB# 2100, 105 Hanes Hall
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-2100
Phone: 919 962-9859
Fax: 919 962-3349
E-mail: senora@unc.edu
****

THE UNIVERSITY
of NORTH CAROLINA
at CHAPEL HILL

OFFICE OF THE UNIVERSITY REGISTRAR

104 HANES HALL
CAMPUS BOX 2100
CHAPEL HILL, NC 27599-2100

T 919.962.8291
F 919.962.3349
http://regweb.unc.edu

MEMORANDUM

TO: All Teaching Faculty

FROM: Senora DeCosta, Assistant University Registrar

DATE: June 18, 2007

RE: First Summer Session Grades

Enclosed are the Official Class Rolls and Grade Reports for First Summer Session 2007. These reports are due at the Office of the University Registrar, 105 Hanes Hall, no later than 72 hours after the scheduled time of the final examination. (See due dates below)

Compliance with the 72 hour deadline is important as it enables us to reliably determine academic eligibility information to report to school Deans. This enables them to assess whether or not a student may continue enrollment for the next term.

To facilitate the timely receipt and entering of grades, please follow these guidelines for returning Official Class Rolls and Grade Reports to the Office of the University Registrar:

- Exams scheduled on Monday, June 18 are due by 5:00 PM on Thursday, June 21
  Exams scheduled on Tuesday, June 19 are due by 4:00 PM on Friday, June 22

  Courses that do not have final examinations are due by 5:00 PM on Thursday, June 21

- When the Office of the University Registrar is closed, you may deposit your grade roll(s) in the GRADE ROLL DROP BOX located in the panel next to the west-facing (handicapped-access) door of Hanes Hall. This is the end of the building closest to Carroll Hall.

- The Report For Assignment Of Temporary Grade Of AB Or IN To Undergraduates can be found on-line at:
  http://regweb.unc.edu/resources/ab_report_form.pdf.

- Use only black or dark blue ink when completing and signing grade rolls. Adherence to this request is imperative, as pencil markings and other colors of ink do not duplicate very clearly. We must be able to microfilm our grade rolls for permanent storage and reference.

- Every registered student must have an appropriate grade designation (no blanks). If a student did not show up for the final examination or has not been attending classes, a grade of "AB" or "FA" must be assigned. Do not line through the name of a student you believe is not registered for your class. Assign that student an "AB" grade. This is the only action that will be recognized by our office. Nor should you write in the name of a student that you believe to be registered for your class. Appropriate actions will be taken when our office receives the official form governing the situation. Only a Post-Semester Registration/Drop/Add Form can remove or add a student to a course after the Official Roll & Grade Reports have been generated for the semester.

- Even if you know an undergraduate student has elected to take your course under the PS/D+/D/F option, you must assign the regular appropriate letter grade for their performance. The computerized grade table will convert grades of "C-" or better to "PS".

Refer to Registrar Procedures Memorandum (RPM) No. 24, for university grading policies and grade definitions at (http://regweb.unc.edu/resources/rpm24.php). Listed below are some tips and definitions to help you determine the appropriate grades to assign.

- All courses numbered 99 and below should use the undergraduate grading system, i.e., A, A-, B+, .., D, F.

- Grades assigned in courses numbered 100 through 199 depend upon the individual student classification. Students with undergraduate classifications should be assigned grades using the undergraduate grading system. Please do not use + and – for any graduate student grade. Pluses (+) and minuses (-) are not valid for H, P, L grades. This consumes an extraordinary amount of time for our staff to mark through every incorrect + or – on the grade roll, before it can be sent to data entry. If you are assigning a graduate grade and would like to make note on the grade roll of a plus (+) or minus (-) associated with the grade, use the "Remarks" column. Please use the following classification tables to help you determine the appropriate assignment of grades.

Undergraduate Classifications:

FR	Freshman
SO	Sophomore
JR	Junior
SR	Senior
FYR	Fifth Year (Pharmacy)
SPU	Special Undergraduate Non-degree
II	Inter-Institutional
SDS	Special Degree Seeking and Off-Campus Nursing Program
FX	Foreign Exchange

Graduate & Professional Classifications:

GD	Grad Doctoral
GM	Grad Masters
GPM	Grad Post Masters
GMD	Grad Masters then Doctoral
GPD	Grad Post Doctoral
SPG	Special Graduate Non-degree
1st	First Year MBA or Professional
2nd	Second Year MBA or Professional
3rd	Third Year Professional
4th	Fourth Year Professional
II	Inter-Institutional
FX	Foreign Exchange
SPP	Professional Non-degree
SDS	Currently used for Off-Campus Professional Pharmacy Program

Note: The classifications that start with "SP" (SPU, SPG, SPP) are used for non-degree students. Classifications that start with "G" (GD, GM, GMD, GPM, GPD) are graduate classifications. Classifications II and FX can be used for undergraduate or graduate students. Also, Continuing Studies post baccalaureate students (CS, SPG) are allowed to choose either the undergraduate or graduate grading system in courses numbered 100 through 199 for grade assignments. The student is supposed to inform the instructor at the beginning of classes as to their choice of grading system.

- The "FA" grade is assigned when an undergraduate student did not attend the final examination, and could not pass the course regardless of performance on the exam. This would be appropriate for an undergraduate student that never attended the course or has excessive absences in the course, as well as missing the exam.

- The "AB" grade is assigned when the student did not attend the final examination, and there is the possibility that the student could pass the course if the exam was taken. The "AB" is computed as an "F" grade in an undergraduate student's GPA. For undergraduate students, an "AB" grade is changed automatically to an "F*" if the grade is not cleared by the end of the next regular semester. For graduate students, an "AB" will revert to an "F*" (administratively assigned grade) if the grade is not cleared within one year from the original examination.

- The "IN" grade is assigned when the student took the final examination but did not complete some other course requirement. The student could pass the course if the assignment was completed. The "IN" is computed as an "F" grade in an undergraduate student's GPA. For undergraduate students, an "IN" is changed automatically to an "F*" if the grade is not cleared by eight weeks into the next regular semester. For graduate students, an "IN" will revert to an "F*" (administratively assigned grade) if the grade is not cleared within one year from the original examination.

- The "SP" grade is assigned for undergraduate students participating in the first course(s) of an approved departmental Undergraduate Honors Program. The Honors Program usually runs for the duration of at least two semesters (Junior and/or Senior Honors/Research). A final permanent grade is not assigned until completion of the second and/or final course. When the final permanent grade is assigned for an Honors Program, any previously assigned grade(s) of "SP" must be changed to the appropriate permanent letter grade by an Official Grade Change Form.

  Note: "IN" and "AB" are temporary grades that can be reported on the Official Class Roll and Grade Report or on an Official Grade Change Form. Instructors can change temporary grades to permanent grades by completing the Official Grade Change Form within the specified deadlines. Once a grade has been changed to an "F*", a dean's signature is also required on the Official Grade Change Form.

For any questions about this material, you may contact me at senora@unc.edu or 962-0495. Thank you.

cc: All OUR Staff

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, June 20, 2007 8:07 PM
To: Williams-Johnson, Tracey D <twilliams@uncaa.unc.edu>
Subject: Schedules

Hi Tracey,
Indeed, we changed their schedules. Here it is -- finally--I hope!!!
AFAM 101 9:45 Gardner 105
COMM 113 11:30 Murphey 111

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, June 21, 2007 12:26 AM
To: Landstrom, Susan B <susan_landstrom@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Fall Humanities Program Seminar

Hi Susan,
Thanks for your email.I thought I had responded, with a quick response that I would get back with you asap. But obviously I didn't! I have been overwhelmed this summer [I thought summer was supposed to be relaxing]. I have been teaching and my daughter gave birth to our first grandchild!--a boy. Both she and the baby had complications, so that was stressful. Both are doing quite well now though. And to make matters even more stressful, Carlo is leaving us to take a position as the Assistant to the Mayor of Chapel Hill. It's a great opportunity for him, but it sure makes things difficult for the Center. His last day is Thursday the 21st.

So in response to your email: Interestingly the Parr Center is putting together a panel discussion on The Ethics of Capital Punishment: A Careful Reflection on whether to retain, reform, or abolish the practice, likely Sept 25th or October 2nd. This too is in conjunction with the freshmen reading book, The Death of Innocence. Our plan is to have all sides represented, but I am finding similar difficulties -- the pro side! One person who may be very helpful is Professor Isaac Una in political science.[He worked on a research project with Boger] I'm not sure I would be the best person, and I also have a basketball on November 9th. But let me think a bit more, and I can ask out program committee for suggestions, as we talked about the practical issues, but are not going to focus on this, as ours is only a one time 2-hour panel. Our panel is mainly for UNC students, whereas yours is a bit different. Another person who may be helpful is Donna Lefebvre in poli sci as well.

With regard to providing support Adventures in Ideas program, right now we don't know what kind of money we will have. So I can't commit any money at all. What we can do is provide publicity, and provide for support for any of our fellows who want to attend. I would like to provide more, but can't do anything until we find out our budget--which won't be until late July.

Hope things are going well for you. Next week I'll have a little down time so should have some time to talk on the phone with you.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, June 22, 2007 10:31 PM
To: Lance Westerlund <westy@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: APA award letter
Attach: APA Prize June 2007 (Lance).doc

Lance
Thanks, I will contact Donna to see if she can write a letter or at least give us a quote. I made one grammatical change.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Lance Westerlund wrote:
> Hi Jan,
>
> Here's a final draft of our nomination letter for the APA award, for > you review and critique. I do feel that the letter will be > substantially improved with a quote from Donna LeFebvre if we are able > to obtain that in time.
>
> Thanks,
> Lance
>

UNC
COLLEGE OF
ARTS & SCIENCES

THE UNIVERSITY
of NORTH CAROLINA
at CHAPEL HILL

DEPARTMENT OF PHILOSOPHY

CAMPUS BOX #3125 T 919.962.7291
CALDWELL HALL F 919.843.3929
CHAPEL HILL, NC 27599-3125 philosophy.unc.edu

June 20, 2007

Ms. Katina Saunders
American Philosophical Association
31 Amstel Avenue
University of Delaware
Newark, DE 19716-4797

Dear Ms. Saunders:

It is with a great deal of pleasure that I nominate the Parr Center for Ethics' Ethics in the Professions Series for the American Philosophical Association and the Philosophy Documentation Center Prize for Excellence and Innovation in Philosophy Programs. By bringing academic and theoretical work in ethics to bear on practical ethical issues, developing the ethical sophistication of students, and providing a public forum for discussion and debate on important ethical issues affecting the University and the community, the Ethics in the Professions Series satisfies the criteria of excellence and innovation required to be nominated for the APA/PDC Prize and also meets the mission that the Parr Center has set for itself.

The Ethics in the Professions Series brings judicious attention to ethical issues as they arise in professional life. Through lectures, seminars and workshops, the Series gathers together professionals in the field with faculty, graduate students and undergraduates to explore ethical challenges in their professions and develop the critical framework they need to think meaningfully about these issues. Thus the scope of the Series possesses no inherent limits, yet the Series' events are constructed as specific to the professions as necessary for the intended audience. The areas covered in the Series so far include economics, business, law, medicine, sports, public policy, political science, psychology, biology, public health, geology, social work, philosophy, African and Afro-American studies, and women's studies.

The Ethics in the Professions Series tailors the event to the profession and invites experts in the field who are aware of the practical ethical issues embedded in their profession. The material presented is rich, brought to life in discussion, and, according to Professor Terry Price, Visiting Fellow at the Center, "moral discussion [is] accessible and inclusive." How the Center is able to bridge the diverse interests and inquiries of it's audience is exemplified by the Ethics in the Professions Series events related to Dr. Joel Bakan's appearance in Chapel Hill to discuss his book and film, The Corporation: The Pathological Pursuit of Profit and Power. Dr. Bakan argued that without appropriate restrictions, corporations, in virtue of their structure, function as powerful but essentially non-moral individuals, capable of causing great harm. A free screening of the film was shown and Dr. Bakan presented a free public lecture. Dr. Bakan's book and film then took center stage in a very different setting, when a panel of distinguished UNC professors from different academic departments came together for an evening of provocative dialogue on the many issues raised by The Corporation.

Professor Ralph T. Byrns, Moderator for the Bakan event, says that the Ethics in the Professions Series is "exceptional...valuable because sequential presentations reflect elaborations of a coherent theme, and not merely a hodgepodge of unrelated topics."

The Ethics in the Professions Series is able to cover territory, broad in scope, with great success because it takes an informed but pragmatic approach to each profession's ethical issues. Professor of Pediatrics Neonatal-Perinatal Medicine Karen R. Metzguer participated in a workshop on Respect for Patient Autonomy. She highly praises the Series, calling it "excellent," and explains that the Series is innovative because "it bridges disciplines by exposing commonalities in ethical challenges faced by actual professionals in the field." Her opinion is seconded by Lissa L. Broome, Wachovia Professor of Banking Law, who views the Series as having created a "successful formula in appealing to the interests of all professions in ethical issues and drawing connections among the professions through the study of ethics."

A major accomplishment of the Ethics in the Professions Series is the cementing of an international connection between the UNC School of Law and the International Criminal Court (ICC). A Parr Center for Ethics research grant provided to UNC Political Science Professor, Donna LeFebvre, addressing genocide and crimes against humanity, resulted in a visit to UNC campus by the International Criminal Court Deputy Prosecutor Fatou Bensouda, who addressed students, faculty and the community on the role of the ICC and the responsibilities of the international community in combating genocide. In addition to a free public lecture, the number of Ethics in Profession Series events surrounding Deputy Prosecutor Bensouda's visit included a workshop with the UNC-Chapel Hill International Law Organization, two classroom lectures and informal meetings with faculty and students at the UNC School of Law. As a result, two Law School faculty members visited the Court this summer and plans are under way to develop an exchange program, allowing UNC law students to have hands-on experience with the Court.

The Ethics in the Professions Series maintains a focus on introducing ethics to audiences not previously acquainted with philosophical work, on and off the UNC campus. Professor Jan Boxill, the Director of the Center, initiated this innovation through lectures she gave on Ethical Decision Making to participants of the Chapel Hill-Carrboro Chamber of Commerce's Leadership program. Staff at UNC will be introduced for the first time to Ethical Decision Making when Professor Boxill teaches a course on the subject through the Staff Training and Development Program in the fall of 2007.

In summary, the Parr Center for Ethics' Ethics in the Professions Series meticulously addresses the palpable need for fruitful discussion and exploration of ethical issues by building bridges between the academic study of ethics theory and the pragmatic application of ethics by professionals in the field and the community at large.

Sincerely,

Thomas E. Hill, Jr.

Kenan Professor of Philosophy

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, June 22, 2007 10:34 PM
To: LeFebvre, Donna H. <lefebvre@unc.edu>
Subject: Parr Help
Attach: APA Prize June 2007 (Lance).doc

Hi Donna,
If you can we would still like you to write a letter in support of the APA nomination for the Ethics in the Professions Series of the Parr Center. I am attaching our nomination letter. What I would like if you can do it for us by Monday or Tuesday, a letter. We can take quotes from it. You can see where a quote from you would be very helpful in the Bensouda discussion.

Thanks so much,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

UNC
COLLEGE OF
ARTS & SCIENCES

THE UNIVERSITY
of NORTH CAROLINA
at CHAPEL HILL

DEPARTMENT OF PHILOSOPHY

CAMPUS BOX #3125 T 919.962.7291
CALDWELL HALL F 919.843.3929
CHAPEL HILL, NC 27599-3125 philosophy.unc.edu

June 20, 2007

Ms. Katina Saunders
American Philosophical Association
31 Amstel Avenue
University of Delaware
Newark, DE 19716-4797

Dear Ms. Saunders:

It is with a great deal of pleasure that I nominate the Parr Center for Ethics' Ethics in the Professions Series for the American Philosophical Association and the Philosophy Documentation Center Prize for Excellence and Innovation in Philosophy Programs. By bringing academic and theoretical work in ethics to bear on practical ethical issues, developing the ethical sophistication of students, and providing a public forum for discussion and debate on important ethical issues affecting the University and the community, the Ethics in the Professions Series satisfies the criteria of excellence and innovation required to be nominated for the APA/PDC Prize and also meets the mission that the Parr Center has set for itself.

The Ethics in the Professions Series brings judicious attention to ethical issues as they arise in professional life. Through lectures, seminars and workshops, the Series gathers together professionals in the field with faculty, graduate students and undergraduates to explore ethical challenges in their professions and develop the critical framework they need to think meaningfully about these issues. Thus the scope of the Series possesses no inherent limits, yet the Series' events are constructed as specific to the professions as necessary for the intended audience. The areas covered in the Series so far include economics, business, law, medicine, sports, public policy, political science, psychology, biology, public health, geology, social work, philosophy, African and Afro-American studies, and women's studies.

The Ethics in the Professions Series tailors the event to the profession and invites experts in the field who are aware of the practical ethical issues embedded in their profession. The material presented is rich, brought to life in discussion, and, according to Professor Terry Price, Visiting Fellow at the Center, "moral discussion [is] accessible and inclusive." How the Center is able to bridge the diverse interests and inquiries of it's audience is exemplified by the Ethics in the Professions Series events related to Dr. Joel Bakan's appearance in Chapel Hill to discuss his book and film, The Corporation: The Pathological Pursuit of Profit and Power. Dr. Bakan argued that without appropriate restrictions, corporations, in virtue of their structure, function as powerful but essentially non-moral individuals, capable of causing great harm. A free screening of the film was shown and Dr. Bakan presented a free public lecture. Dr. Bakan's book and film then took center stage in a very different setting, when a panel of distinguished UNC professors from different academic departments came together for an evening of provocative dialogue on the many issues raised by The Corporation.

Professor Ralph T. Byrns, Moderator for the Bakan event, says that the Ethics in the Professions Series is "exceptional...valuable because sequential presentations reflect elaborations of a coherent theme, and not merely a hodgepodge of unrelated topics."

The Ethics in the Professions Series is able to cover territory, broad in scope, with great success because it takes an informed but pragmatic approach to each profession's ethical issues. Professor of Pediatrics Neonatal-Perinatal Medicine Karen R. Metzguer participated in a workshop on Respect for Patient Autonomy. She highly praises the Series, calling it "excellent," and explains that the Series is innovative because "it bridges disciplines by exposing commonalities in ethical challenges faced by actual professionals in the field." Her opinion is seconded by Lissa L. Broome, Wachovia Professor of Banking Law, who views the Series as having created a "successful formula in appealing to the interests of all professions in ethical issues and drawing connections among the professions through the study of ethics."

A major accomplishment of the Ethics in the Professions Series is the cementing of an international connection between the UNC School of Law and the International Criminal Court (ICC). A Parr Center for Ethics research grant provided to UNC Political Science Professor, Donna LeFebvre, addressing genocide and crimes against humanity, resulted in a visit to UNC campus by the International Criminal Court Deputy Prosecutor Fatou Bensouda, who addressed students, faculty and the community on the role of the ICC and the responsibilities of the international community in combating genocide. In addition to a free public lecture, the number of Ethics in Profession Series events surrounding Deputy Prosecutor Bensouda's visit included a workshop with the UNC-Chapel Hill International Law Organization, two classroom lectures and informal meetings with faculty and students at the UNC School of Law. As a result, two Law School faculty members visited the Court this summer and plans are under way to develop an exchange program, allowing UNC law students to have hands-on experience with the Court.

The Ethics in the Professions Series maintains a focus on introducing ethics to audiences not previously acquainted with philosophical work, on and off the UNC campus. Professor Jan Boxill, the Director of the Center, initiated this innovation through lectures she gave on Ethical Decision Making to participants of the Chapel Hill-Carrboro Chamber of Commerce's Leadership program. Staff at UNC will be introduced for the first time to Ethical Decision Making when Professor Boxill teaches a course on the subject through the Staff Training and Development Program in the fall of 2007.

In summary, the Parr Center for Ethics' Ethics in the Professions Series meticulously addresses the palpable need for fruitful discussion and exploration of ethical issues by building bridges between the academic study of ethics theory and the pragmatic application of ethics by professionals in the field and the community at large.

Sincerely,

Thomas E. Hill, Jr.

Kenan Professor of Philosophy

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, June 25, 2007 9:37 AM
To: Lowman, Joe <jclowman@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Teaching Awards Committee

WONDERFUL Thank you so much. Have a great experience in Botswana.
Debbie Stevenson will be in contact with you regarding future meetings.

Thanks again; see you in August.

Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

jclowman@email.unc.edu wrote:
> Dear Jan,
>
> Sorry to be so long in responding but I'm in Botswana directing a > Burch Seminar and just saw your message. Yes, I'd be delighted to > serve on the committee this year. Count me in.
>
> Joe
>
> Quoting Jan Boxill <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>:
>
>> Dear Joe,
>> I hope you are enjoying your summer. As Chair of the Teaching Awards >> Committee, and as you were a past recipient, I would like to invite >> you to serve on the Committee for the Board of Governors' Award for >> Excellence in Teaching. Our first meeting will be Monday, August >> 27th from 11:30-1, location TBA.
>>
>> Thank you for your consideration, and I hope you will accept my >> invitation.
>>
>> Regards,
>> Jan
>>
>> --
>> Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
>> Director, Parr Center for Ethics
>> Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
>> Department of Philosophy
>> Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
>> Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
>> Phone: 919-962-3317
>> FAX: 919-843-3929
>>
>>
>>
>
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, June 25, 2007 9:39 AM
To: Stevenson, Debbie Deese <debbie_stevenson@unc.edu>
Subject: Teaching Awards

Hi Debbie,
Joe Lowman from Psychology has agreed to serve on the Committee for the Board of Governors' Award for Excellence in Teaching.
The only one I am waiting on is Unks, who I presume is still in London.

Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, June 25, 2007 12:33 PM
To: Dean Walsh <dwalsh@cn.edu>
Subject: Re: academic lecture
Attach: Time Management.doc; AAA brochure.doc; SQ5R.doc; AAA-WB.ppt

---

Hi Dean,
I thought I responded to this, but since it is still in my "inbox" I don't think I did. I always enjoy doing these presentations at basketball camps. Attached is the information. I've also included the entire powerpoint.

Thanks,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Dean Walsh wrote:
>
> Dr. Boxill I enjoyed your presentation to the students at Sylviaâ€™s > camp. You mentioned that we could get a copy of your notes and what > was on the board of your presentation. You asked that we email you for > the info. My address is below and I appreciate your time. I will see > you at the next camp.
>
> Dean Walsh
>
> Head Coach Women's Basketball
>
> Carson-Newman College
>
> 2130 S. Branner Ave.
>
> Box 72009
>
> Jefferson City, TN 37760
>
> Office - (865) 471-3511
>
> E-mail - dwalsh@cn.edu
>

TIME MANAGEMENT
Dr. Jan Boxill

THE SECRET TO EFFECTIVE TIME MANAGEMENT IS DECIDING HOW TO COMMIT TIME TO TASKS WHICH WE DO NOT NECESSARILY ENJOY AND WHICH COMPETE AGAINST THOSE WE DO ENJOY!!

GOOD TIME MANAGEMENT MEANS DEFINING PRIORITIES AND SCHEDULING ACTIVITIES. MAKE TIME YOUR FRIEND NOT YOUR ENEMY!

EVERYTHING YOU DO TO BE SUCCESSFUL IN YOUR SPORT CAN BE APPLIED TO SUCCESS IN THE CLASSROOM AS WELL.

RULES FOR EFFECTIVE TIME MANAGEMENT:

1. DON'T CREATE IMPOSSIBLE SITUATIONS.
   Be realistic about school. For most classes, plan to study 2 hours for every 1 hour in class.
2. DEFINE PRIORITIES
   All time management begins with planning. Use lists to set priorities, plan activities and measure progress. Create a weekly calendar listing your courses, work, study time, recreation, meals, etc.

   Plan to study first priority classes when you work best. Keep your schedule handy and refer to it often. If it doesn't work, change it.

   Have a daily "To Do" list. Write down all the things that you want to do for the day, homework due, tests, shopping, etc. This is your reminder list, and keeps your mind uncluttered. Rewrite this list each morning.

   Have a Goals List. This can be a monthly or long term list. Put down your goals, what you want to accomplish over the next month, or year. The purpose of this list is to develop long-term goals and to free your mind to concentrate on today.

3. AVOID DISTRACTIONS AND LACK OF FOCUS: BIGGEST TIME WASTERS:

   PROCRASTINATION: Putting off important jobs.
   CRISIS MANAGEMENT: Being overwhelmed by the current crisis. No time for routine matters.
   SWITCHING AND FLOUNDERING: Lack of concentration and focus on one job.
   TELEVISION, TELEPHONES, EMAIL, FRIENDS: These are all ways of avoiding work.
   BOREDOM, STRESS: Boredom, stress, guilt, anger and frustration reduce concentration. Don't choose to be bored; it IS a choice!
   SICKNESS: Getting sick and blowing off your schedule

4. TIME SAVERS:
   GO TO CLASS and sit in the front and pay attention!
   Don't watch lectures as you watch TV; be active; ask questions; don't read the DTH.
   Take notes; 95% of exams come from class notes.
   SEE YOU PROFESSORS/INSTRUCTORS
   THINK POSITIVE, ACT POSITIVE, AND BE POSITIVE.
   You can find a million reasons to dislike class, instructor, tutoring, study hall, or even FASP sessions. Don't waste your time finding problems. Use your time to find why it might be interesting or how it can help.

In all these cases, the first step is to recognize the problem and resolve to improve. Use priority lists to focus attention. Try positive self-talk. To avoid distractions, find a quiet place to study. Screen your telephone calls with an answering machine. Stay off email till work is done. And remember:

MAKE TIME YOUR FRIEND, NOT YOUR ENEMY!!

APTITUDE + ATTITUDE DETERMINES YOUR ALTITUDE

ALL OF US HAVE GOALS OR AIMS IN LIFE. SOME OF THEM ARE SHORT TERM, OTHERS ARE LONG TERM. SOME OF US WANT TO BE DOCTORS, LAWYERS, TEACHERS, PROFESSIONAL BASKETBALL PLAYERS, MOTHERS, ETC. WHAT DO YOU WANT TO BE? WHERE WOULD YOU LIKE TO SEE YOURSELF IN TEN YEARS, FIVE, OR TWO YEARS? TO REACH THESE GOALS YOU MUST HAVE AND DO CERTAIN THINGS. FIRST YOU MUST MAKE A COMMITMENT. THEN YOU MUST HAVE AND DEVELOP TWO THINGS: APTITUDE, AND A GOOD ATTITUDE. WHAT DOES THIS MEAN?

APTITUDE	ATTITUDE	ALTITUDE
EDUCATIONAL SKILLS READING WRITING	BEHAVIOR TOWARD PARENTS/TEACHERS TEAM/CLASSMATES	GOALS IN LIFE WHAT DO YOU WANT TO BE OR ACHIEVE?
YOUR ABILITIES ATHLETIC,MUSIC, ART WRITING, STORYTELLING	LANGUAGE YOU USE NAMES YOU USE HOW YOU WORK WITH OTHERS	CAREER CHOICE SUCCESS IN LIFE

In order for you to reach your goals you must have some abilities. We all have them! If you want to be a basketball player, you must have some physical ability. But more importantly, you must be ready to learn and work. Even with all the ability, you need an EDUCATION. So while in school, make the most of what is offered to you. It is up to you to take control of your own education. No one can do that for you. Three things you must do to get an education and develop your abilities:

I. READ:

Read more than what is given in class and when you can READ ALOUD. Turn OFF the TV some nights and just read. Read about your favorite person or sport. Biographies are very interesting as well as informative. But it doesn't matter what you read; it is important that you read. Use your library to get the appropriate books. One of the very best things to read that will improve your reading and your knowledge is the front page of any major newspaper. This will help a great deal in preparing you for the SAT or ACT exams. Reading helps increase your vocabulary and grammar.

2. WRITE

Keep a diary or write a letter to a friend, a pen pal, or to one of the players at a school. Writing is improved by writing. Writing helps develop English grammar skills. The more you write, the better you write. Write about what you did this summer, or plan to do for a vacation, or about school. Write about what career you might like to choose. Read about it and write about it. It will make it more real to you. Have your teacher, parents, or friends read your work.

3. GO TO SCHOOL AND STAY IN SCHOOL

Don't skip school to stay at home and watch television or play. No matter how good you are in sports, without the education you will not get very far. Your goal can only be achieved by staying in school. While in school actively participate in class. Education, like playing basketball, is an active endeavor. Nothing comes from mere passive attendance. It is a choice to be active or be bored! Just like you prepare for a game, you prepare for exams—not just the night before, but for continuous weeks. Everything you do in basketball can be translated into your academics. Your natural talents will provide you with a base; your education develops them.

II. ATTITUDE

Attitude is just as important as aptitude, perhaps even more important. No matter how good you are, no matter how much natural talent you have, no matter how educated you are, if you behave in a way that no one wants to be around you, you will not be able to achieve what you want. What does that mean? Basically it means to RESPECT yourself and the people around you, no matter how different they are from you. We are all different. Our differences are either natural or chosen; we often do things to make ourselves different. But in being different we all have one overriding desire, the desire to be respected for who we are and for the choices we make. RESPECT is a must if we are to live and work together. That means to respect your parents, your teachers, your classmates, your teammates, workers at your school or at shops you frequent. If you want people to treat you right and respect you, you must also treat them right and respect them. Whether you think someone respects herself or not, you have to duty to respect her. You have no control over another's behavior, but you and only you have control over your own behavior.

One important aspect of attitude is your use of language. Do not use bad language or use derogatory names. Using bad language or name-calling tells others that you don't care about yourself or about others. It makes you look bad. In fact it makes you look worse than the person you are treating badly. It tells people that you don't like yourself very much, nor respect yourself.

Another important aspect of attitude is behavior. Bad behavior stands in the way of success. A bad attitude is a sure way to fail. It makes people not want to be around you. So if you want to play basketball, or be a teacher, or have relationships, it will be impossible for you to succeed if you display you attitude by bad behavior.

So begin today to think about how you treat your parents, your teachers, your classmates, your teammates, yourself, and others. Each day try to improve and think about them as you want them to think about you. That is what the "Golden Rule" is all about:

DO UNTO OTHERS AS YOU WOULD HAVE THEM DO UNTO YOU!

III. ALTITUDE

Your altitude is up to you. Put together a good attitude and develop you aptitude through education, and you can achieve just about anything you want. Your altitude is "How High You Can Go." Where do you want to go? Wherever that is, it is up to you; it is in your control only. Go back to the diary--write down how far or where you want to go, what you want to be, then each day or so make some note about it. Read about it, talk about it, and write about it. Read about people you want to be like. Write about them. Talk to your parents, teachers, friends, and classmates about them. ASK FOR HELP from people around you. Use the resources that are available to you. Asking for help is not a sign of weakness; it is a sign of strength! But remember:

It is up to you. No one can achieve your goals for you; only YOU can. Take advantage of what is available to you including your parents, your teachers, your counselors, and others. ASK and LISTEN!

GOOD LUCK AND REMEMBER:

APTITUDE + ATTITUDE DETERMINES YOUR ALTITUDE

University of North Carolina email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu

READ WITH A PURPOSE WITH SQ5R

S: Survey the entire chapter: Read the introduction; read each section heading, and read the summary conclusion and any questions at the end of the chapter.

Q: Make Questions of each of the section headings.

R: Read each section by section with the purpose of answering the question posed by the section heading.

R: Record notes as you read to answer the question.

R: Recite the answer to the question. If you cannot recite it then you should go back and re-read the section.

R: Review your answers.

R: Reflect on the material. Try to teach it to someone!

Each section should take about 20 minutes. After you have completed each section, take a 2-3 minute reflection break before beginning the next. Remember you remember best the first 10 minutes of what you read and the last 10 minutes of what you read. By recording notes to answer the questions, you have anticipated most, if not all, the questions that can be asked on an exam, and you have great notes for review.

Good Luck, and enjoy reading with a PURPOSE!!

DREAMS TO REALITY!!

- HOW CAN YOU MAKE YOUR DREAMS BECOME YOUR REALITY?

How to Achieve Academic Success

Presented by

Dr. Jan Boxill

Women's Basketball Advisor

Professor of Philosophy

Radio Commentator for UNC Women's Basketball

Athletics & Academics

- Everything you do in your sport can be translated to your academics.
- Use the same techniques for success in basketball to be successful in school!

APTITUDE

+

ATTITUDE

DETERMINES

YOUR ALTITUDE

ALTITUDE

- HOW HIGH DO YOU WANT TO GO?

WHAT ARE YOUR GOALS?

- Teacher/Professor
- Astronaut
- Lawyer
- Doctor
- Professional athlete
- Journalist/Writer
- Politician
- Zoo Keeper

WHAT ARE YOUR GOALS?

- Get good grades
- Be a good teammate
- Shooting
- Dribbling
- Rebounding
- Leader

ACHIEVING YOUR GOALS

WHAT IS NECESSARY?
WHAT MUST YOU DO?
HOW TO GO ABOUT IT?

CHALLENGES

- Write down the top 2-3 things in your life that you have failed to fully achieve.
- Write down the top 2-3 things you successfully achieved.
- What is the difference?

LIFE A JOURNEY

- Life is a journey, so you need a map, a plan & a timetable.
- Where are you going?

GOALS CREATE PURPOSE
PURPOSE GENERATES PLANS
PLANS PRODUCE ACTION
ACTION BUILDS HABITS
GOOD HABITS CREATE SUCCESS

APTITUDE

- What are your aptitudes?
- Your abilities
- Your strengths
- Your talents

- DEVELOP THEM!

KNOWLEDGE IS POWER

- Knowing what
- Knowing how
- Knowing that
- Knowing others
- Knowing yourself!

In order to reach your goals, talents and abilities are important, but developing them is essential. Three things important:

READ
WRITE
STUDY EFFECTIVELY

READ

- It doesn't matter what you read, just read!
- Read about your goals
- One of the best things to read is a major newspaper--especially the front page!
- In reading for class, use SQ5R method
- READ ALOUD

SQ5R

- S: Survey the entire Chapter
- Q: Make questions of section headings
- R: Read a section (read section by section)
- R: wRite down key points to answer Qs.
- R: Recite the answers to the questions
- R: Review your answers
- R: Reflect on what you have read/answered

WRITE

- Writing is improved by writing!
- Writing is thinking!
- Keep a diary or a journal.
- Write letters describing events in your life!
- Tips for paper writing:
  - Appearance matters
  - Proofread all papers
  - Read all papers aloud before turning them in

EFFECTIVE STUDY

- Have a time & place to study
- Study in short bursts
- Good time management--
  - time is not a resource when you have too much or too little to do.
  - Biggest problem=procrastination!
  - Use resources
  - Ask for help--this is NOT sign of weakness

RESOURCES

- People
  - Teachers, parents
- School
  - Be active; ask questions
- Volunteer
  - Give to the community, so that you might learn from them

SEIZE OPPORTUNITIES

- Seize opportunities when they present themselves, and create them when they do not!

ACT

- Until knowledge, awareness, insights, & understanding are translated into action, they are of no value.
- Life rewards action, not intention.

PROCRASTINATION

- Procrastination--mere intention--is the bane of human existence.

LEARNING

- SOMETIMES THE HARDEST PART IN LEARNING SOMETHING NEW IS UNLEARNING THE OLD WAY OF DOING IT.

ATTITUDE

- Aptitude is important, but even more important is your ATTITUDE!
- It's all about ATTITUDE
- Attitude is entirely within our control!

RESPECT

- Respect yourself and others
- We are all different, yet we are all the same in that we desire to be respected for who we are and the choices we make.
- This is often shown by the language we use and how we interact with others.

SELF-EVALUATION

- Measure yourself based on results, that's how the world is measuring you.

- Pay attention--misinformation is worse than lack of knowledge.

ACCOUNTABILITY

- You create your own experience; you are accountable for your life--now, in the past, and in the future.
- If you don't accept accountability, you will misdiagnose every problem you have.
- If you misdiagnosis, you will mistreat.
- If you mistreat, things don't get better.

GOLDEN RULE

- DO UNTO OTHERS AS YOU WOULD HAVE THEM DO UNTO YOU!!

FINAL THOUGHTS

- Put together a good attitude and develop your aptitudes and you can achieve just about anything you want.
- Where do you want to go? Whatever it is, it is up to you! It is in your control.
- Go to your diary and write down how far you want to go--read about it, write about it, talk about it. It will become real!
- No one can achieve your goals for you; only you can--it is up to you!

IT'S YOUR TIME; IT'S YOUR TURN

- LIFE STATEGIES: Doing what works; doing what matters
  - AUTHOR:
  - Phillip C. McGraw, Ph.D.
  - Hyperion Books, New York, 1999
  - $12.95

MAKE YOUR DREAMS BECOME REALITY

- DREAM
- LEARN
- ACT
- BECOME

GOOD LUCK

And Remember:

APTITUDE

+

ATTITUDE

=

ALTITUDE

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, June 26, 2007 12:40 PM
To: Miller, Claire <claire_miller@unc.edu>
Subject: APA nomination
Attach: APA Prize June 2007 (Lance).doc

Here is my edited copy.
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, June 26, 2007 8:22 PM
To: Miller, Claire <claire_miller@unc.edu>
Subject: [Fwd: Better and More Grammatical version]
Attach: Better and More Grammatical version.msg

Ralph Byrn's letter--redone!

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, June 27, 2007 2:02 PM
To: Landstrom, Susan B <susan_landstrom@unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Update on Capital Punishment seminar

Hi Susan,
Thanks for the update. Is Rich Rosen from Law School on your list of speakers? He is more of a "reform" person on the issue I believe. He is going to be one of our panelists.

Thanks,
Jan

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Susan Landstrom wrote:
> Dear Jan,
>
> Just a note to let you know where we are on the Adventures in Ideas > death penalty seminar for Fall 2007--I still don't have a confirmed > speaker for the fourth slot, but I have a promise from Peg Dorer, the > executive director of the NC Association of District Attorneys that > she and her executive board will find me a DA to take the pro-death > penalty position. I appreciate your willingness to consider > speaking--I'd rather make better use of your talents in the future.
> And I will be in touch about Parr Center funding after we have new > budgets in July. Thanks for all your help!
>
> Susan
>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Wednesday, June 27, 2007 2:45 PM
To: Lance Westerlund <westy@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: Gary Parr Ethics Bowl invitation
Attach: Gary Parr invite.doc

---

oops--here's the attachment

Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

Lance Westerlund wrote:
> Hi Jan,
>
> Attached is the invitation letter for Gary Parr to present the keynote > address for your review.
>
> Thanks,
> Lance
>

The University
of North Carolina
at Chapel Hill
Caldwell Hall, CB# 3125
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125

Jan Boxill 919.962.3317 jmboxill@email.unc.edu

July , 2007

Dear Gary,

I would like to invite you to present the keynote address to launch the Mid-Atlantic Regional Ethics Bowl on Saturday November 17, 2007, at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. The Mid-Atlantic Regional Bowl is being sponsored by the Parr Center for Ethics and the Department of Philosophy at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

The Intercollegiate Ethics Bowl is a day-long event that combines the excitement and fun of a competitive tournament with a valuable educational experience for undergraduate students. The Ethics Bowl received the American Philosophical Association & Philosophy Documentation Center's 2006 prize for Excellence and Innovation in Philosophy Programs. The format, rules, and procedures of the competition all have been developed to model widely acknowledged best methods of reasoning in practical and professional ethics.

In the competition, a moderator poses questions to teams of three to five students. Questions may concern ethical problems on wide ranging topics, such as the classroom (e.g. cheating or plagiarism), personal relationships (e.g. dating or friendship), professional ethics (e.g. engineering, law, medicine), or social and political ethics (e.g. free speech, gun control, etc.). Each team receives a set of ethical issues in advance of the competition, and questions posed to teams at the competition are taken from that set. A panel of judges evaluates the responses based on the following criteria: intelligibility, focus on ethically relevant considerations, avoidance of ethical irrelevance, and deliberative thoughtfulness.

Our Regional Bowl, like the 12-year-old National Bowl, provides an opportunity for students to engage in thoughtful consideration of the important ethical issues of our day. The regional Ethics Bowls serve as feeders for the National Ethics Bowl, to be held in San Antonio, Texas on February 21, 2008. Only teams that participate in a regional bowl and rank among the best are eligible to compete in the National Bowl. To find out more information about the National Ethics Bowl please view the CSEP website: http://ethics.iit.edu/eb/format.html.

Please contact me if you have any questions or comments. You can find the most up to date information on our Regional Bowl at: http://parrcenter.unc.edu/events/seminars/ethicsbowl/.

Sincerely,

Jan Boxill
Director
Parr Center for Ethics

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Saturday, June 30, 2007 12:18 PM
To: Stevenson, Debbie Deese <debbie_stevenson@unc.edu>
Subject: Teaching Awards

Hi Debbie,
I have a note on my schedule that there is a meeting on August 10th.
That is not correct, right? I hope it is just a misprint on my calendar! Our meeting is Monday, August 27th, right?

I'm still waiting to hear from Professor Unks, but I am assuming he will serve, as in our ADTS meeting he said he would!

Thanks,
Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer and Associate Chair
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, July 2, 2007 12:51 PM
To: Lange, Marc B <mlange@email.unc.edu>; Diane Lupton <dflupton@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Schedule
Attach: Spring 08 Schedule-July 2,2007.xls

Of course I pressed "send" before I attached the document. Here it is.

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

"Philosophy, when superficially studied, excites doubt; when thoroughly explored, it dispels it." Francis Bacon

PHILOSOPHY CLASSES SPRING 2008

	A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I	J	K	L	M	N	O
1					SPRING 2008 SCHEDULE
2				On Leave: Roberts
3	053H	1	Knobe	Freshman Seminar			2-3:15 TR				20
4	85	1	Lange	Freshman Seminar			2-4:30W				20		CW 103
5	101	1	Staff	Intro: Main Problems			9 MWF				40			1
6	101	2	Staff	Intro: Main Problems			12 MWF				36		CW 103	1
7	101	3	Staff	Intro: Main Problems			8 TR				36		CW 103	1
8	110	1	Staff	Great Works			8 TR				40		CW 105	1
9	112	1	Staff	Making Sense of Ourselves			11 MWF				40		CW 105	1
10	112	2	Staff	Making Sense of Ourselves			3:30 TR				36		PE 216	1
11	134	1	Staff	Philosohy of Religion			2 TR							1
12	150	1	Lange	Philosophy of Science			12 MW				100			2
13				Recitations 2@ 12 ; 2@1
14	155	1	Hofweber	Intro Symbolic Logic			10MW				200			4
15				Recitations 4@10;4@11
16	160	1	Sayre McCord	Intro to Ethics			11 MW				200		CA 111	4
17				Recitations:4@ F11;4@F 12
18	160	2	Moehler	Intro to Ethics			12 MWF				38
19	160	3	LeBar	Intro to Ethics			10 MWF				40
20	163	1	Staff	Practical Ethics			9 MWF				40			1
21	163	2	Staff	Practical Ethics			9:30 TR				40			1
22	164	1	Baer	Morality and Business			11 TR				40
23	165	1	Staff	Bioethics			9 MWF				40		CW 105	1
24	165	2	Staff	Bioethics			1MWF				40		GA 106
25	165	3	Staff	Bioethics			3:30-4:45 TR				40		CW 105	1
26	165E	1	Staff	Bioethics-Evening College			6-7:15 MW				40		CW 105	1
27	170	1	Postema	Social Ethics & Pol Thought			3:30-4:45 TR				35
28	170	2	Saenz	Social Ethics & Pol Thought			12:30 TR				40		GA 007
29	210	1	Lesher	Ancient Philosophy			11 TR
30	230	1	BarOn	Experience and Reality			11 TR				40		GA 106
31	230	2	Staff	Experience and Reality			12 MWF				36		PE 216	1
32	280	1	Staff	Morality and Law			8 TR				40			1
33	272	1	Baer	Ethics Peace, War, Defense			3:30 TR				40			1
34	274H	1	B. Boxill	Afro-Amer Political Thought-Honors			12:30 TR				25		CW???
35	275	1	Saenz	Phil Issues Feminism (WMST 275)			9:30 TR				40
36	275H	1	Wolf	Phil Issues Feminism -Honors			2-4:30 T				25
37	285	1	Nord	Philosophy of Education			2-3:15 TR				40
38	340	1	Lycan	Phil of Mind			2-4:30 T				25		CW 103
39	368	1	LeBar	Environmental Ethics			1 MWF				30
40	384	1	Moehler	Intro to PPE			4:35-5:40 MW				25		CW 105
41	390	1	Reeve	Special Topics			4-6:30 W				20		CW 208
42	396	1	J. Boxill	Directed Readings: Ethics Bowl			6-7 T				10		CW 207C
43	397	1	Hill	Colloquium for Majors			4-6:30 R				25		CW 208
44	423	1	Nelson	Kant			4-6:30 W				20		CW 213
45	445	1	BarOn	Philosophy of Language			4-6:30 R				20		CW 213
46	455	1	Neta	Epistemology			1-3:30 W				20		CW 208
47	462	1	Wolf	Contemporary Moral Problems			1-3:30 R				20		CW 208
48	480	1	Corrado	Philosophy of Law			3:30 W				25		CW 103
49	485	1	Prinz	Philosophy of Art			1-3:30 T				20		CW 208
50	698	1	Brennan/Maclean	Advanced PPE			4:25-6:55 T				20		CW 105
51	691H	1	J. Boxill	Honors			4-6:30 M				6		CW 207C
52	692H	1	J. Boxill	Honors			4-6:30 M				6		CW 207C
53	700	1	Prinz/Simmons	Protoseminar			10-12:30 R				8		CW 213
54	705	1	Hofweber	Logic Seminar			1-3:30 W				15		CW 213
55	730	1	Lycan	Modality			1-3:30 R				15		CW 213
56	770	1	Boxill/Hill	Kant & Rawls on Intern'l Justice			4-6:30 T				15		CW 213		no Wednesday afternoon

PHILOSOPHY CLASSES SPRING 2008

	A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I	J	K	L	M	N	O
57	805	1	Nelson/Reeve	Seminar			4-6:30 M				15		CW 208
58	790	1		Colloquium Seminar			TBA
59	790	2		Colloquium Seminar			TBA
60	800	1		Bibliography Exam Seminar			TBA
61	990	1	Knobe	Reading Group			TBA				15		CW 208	24
62
63
64					RECITATIONS
65
66
67	101	601					10F				25		PH 220
68		602					10F				25		PH 222
69		603					10F				25		SM 107
70		604					10F				25		CW 105
71		605					9F				25		WG 301A
72		606					9F				25		GA 103
73		607					9F				25		MT 305
74		608					9F				25		PE 204
75
76	160	601					11F				25		SA 104
77		602					11F				25		SM 107
78		603					11F				25		AL 203
79		604					11F				25		GA 001
80		605					11F				25		PH 228
81		606					11F				25		GA 103
82		607					10F				25		GA 009
83		608					10F				25		PE 216
84		609					10F
85		610					10F
86		611					10F
87		612					10F
88		613					11F
89	163	601					12 F				25		CW 105
90		602					12 F				25		PE 215
91		603					12 F				25
92		604					12 F				25
93		605					10F				25
94		606					10F				25
95		607					10F				25
96		608					10F				25
97
98	275	601					11F				25
99		602					11F				25
100		603					11F				25
101		604					12F				25
102		605					12F				25
103		606					12F				25
104														17

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Thursday, July 5, 2007 7:17 PM
To: Crowder, Deborah A <dacrowde@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: request for info re associate chair duties

I'll be happy to discuss this with Tim and you if you would like.
Jan

>

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Friday, July 6, 2007 12:33 PM
To: Lange, Marc B <mlange@email.unc.edu>
Subject: TA requests
Attach: TA Req Memo Spring 07.DOC; TA-Pref Spring 07.doc; TAoverview 2000-2007-July 2, 2007.xls; Faculty Assign 07-08.doc

---

Hi Marc,
Here are the TA Request forms I sent out last year for the Spring TA Assignments. We can just update these, and add any other information that might help you [us] in making assignments.

I've also attached the overview of TAs and faculty. I've asked Susan to get you set up so you can access the Admin files and SIS

If there is anything else you can think of let me know.

Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

"Philosophy, when superficially studied, excites doubt; when thoroughly explored, it dispels it." Francis Bacon

TA ASSIGNMENT REQUEST FORM FOR SPRING 2007

NAME:_____

I intend to return to the Department and I wish to be considered for a teaching assignment: Yes No

I intend to return to the Department and will be funded by a non teaching fellowship: Yes No

I will be a fifth year student next year and wish to be considered for a dissertation fellowship: Yes No
Specify Term

If you answered "yes" please rank all of the following assignments, taking into account your qualifications, your own educational needs and the seminars you plan to take. A Teaching Fellow must have been a TA at UNC for at least two semesters. Let "1" stand for your first choice, etc:

TEACHING ASSISTANT

_____	101 [20]	Intro to Main Problems	Large Section (4)	Neta	9 MW F- 9 & 10
_____	160 [22]	Intro to Ethics	Large Section (6)	Sayre McCord	11 MW F- 10 & 11
_____	163 [30]	Practical Ethics	Large Section (4)	Maclean	12 MW F- 10 & 12
_____	275 [46]	Phil Issues in Feminism	Large Section (3)	J. Boxill	10 MW F- 11 & 12

TEACHING FELLOWS

_____	101 [20]	Intro: Main Problems	TR 8
_____	110 [24]	Great Works	TR 8
_____	112 [26]	Making Sense of Ourselves	TR 3:30
_____	155 [21]	Intro to Logic	TR 9:30
_____	165 [34]	Bioethics	MWF 9
_____	134E [32]	Phil of Religion-Evening	MW 6-7:15
_____	230 [38]	Experience & Reality	MW 2
_____	272 [42]	Peace, War, Defense	MWF 2
_____	272 [42]	Peace, War, Defense	TR 3:30

Please indicate your relevant teaching experience to date and any other considerations you would like us to keep in mind when determining your assignment for next term. E.g. If you have not been a TA for a course, but believe you are qualified to teach it, please explain. (Use space below or back of this sheet for other considerations) Feel free to add additional comments.

PLEASE RETURN TO JAN BOXILL NO LATER THAN: October 13, 2006

Faculty	Fall 2007		Spring 2008
Bar-On	HNRS 354	PHIL 735:Reasons w/Neta	PHIL 230: Experience & Reality	PHIL 445 Phil of Language
Boxill, Bernard	Phil 272-Large: PWAD-2	PHIL 390: Topics for majors	PHIL 274H Afro-American Poli	PHIL 770 w/ Hill
Boxill, Jan	Parr Center	PHIL 163: Practical Ethics	Parr Center	DUS
Brennan	XXX	XXX	PHIL 484: PPE Gateway	PHIL 698: PPE Capstone
Corrado	XXX	XXX	PHIL 480: Phil of Law	XXX
Hill	PHIL 170H: Social & Political	PHIL 460: Topics in Ethics	PHIL 397: Colloquium for Majors	PHIL 770 w/ B. Boxill
Hofweber	PHIL 790: Colloquium Series	PHIL 455: Advanced Logic	PHIL 155 large: Intro to Logic-4	PHIL 700-Logic
Knobe	PHIL 160: Intro to Ethics	PHIL 453: Phil of Psychology	FYS-Honors	PHIL 990: Reading Group
Lange	ASSOC CHAIR	PHIL 450: Phil of Science	FYS	PHIL 150Large:Intro Phil of Sci
Lesher	PHIL 210: Ancient	XXX	PHIL 210: Ancient	XXX
Lycan	PHIL 160H	PHIL 730: Metaphysics	PHIL 340-Mind	700 level
MacLean	DGS	Public Policy Seminar	DGS	PHIL 698 w/ Brennan
Nelson	PHIL 229: 20th Century	PHIL 990: Reading Group	PHIL 423: Kant	Sem w/Reeve
Neta	PHIL 101 Large: Intro to Phil-4	PHIL 735 w/ BarOn	PHIL 335: Theory of Knowledge	Colloquium
Nord	PHIL 134: Phil of Religion	XXX	PHIL 285: Phil of Education --??	XXX
Pettit	XXX	XXX	XXX	XXX
Postema	R&S Leave	R&S leave	PHIL 170	Law School Course
Prinz	PLACEMENT	PHIL 353: Cognitive Science	PHIL 485: Phil of Art	PROTO
Reeve	PHIL 112 large:Making Sense-4	PHIL 412: Plato	PHIL 390-topics/or new submission	Sem w/ Nelson
Roberts	FYS	PHIL 451: Phil of Physics	R&S leave	R&S Leave
Sayre McCord	CHAIR	PHIL 860:Kenan Seminar in Ethics	PHIL 16O Large: Intro to Ethics-4	CHAIR
Simmons	FYS	PHIL 356:Topics in Math Logic	ADMISSIONS	PROTO
Walker	XXX	XXX	XXX	PHIL 495: Health Care ???
Wolf	PHIL 760: Utilitarianism	790: Colloquium	PHIL 275H-Feminism Honors	PHIL 462-Cont Moral Problems
New Hire-1
New Hire-2
Visitor 1:PPE-Moehler	PHIL 384: PPE Gateway	PHIL 273: Social & Economic Justice	PHIL 160-Intro Ethics	PHIL 484: PPE Gateway
Visitor 2: Parr-LeBar	PHIL 160: Intro to Ethics	PHIL 160: Intro to Ethics	PHIL 160-Intro Ethics	PHIL 368-Environmental Ethics
Visitor 3: BBT-Baer	PHIL 165: Bioethics	PHIL 165: Bioethics	PHIL 164: Business Ethics	PHIL 272: PWAD
Visitor 4: Parr-Saenz	PHIL 164: Business Ethics	PHIL 170: Social & Political	PHIL 170	PHIL 275: Feminism

First Year Seminars:	Fall:Roberts,Simmons	Spring: Knobe, Lange	DUS: Fall: Roberts; Spring: Boxill
Honors:	Fall: Hill, Lycan	Spring: Boxill, Knobe	DGS: McLean
Proto:		Spring: Simmons/Prinz	Placement: Prinz
Research Reading Group:	Fall: Nelson	Spring: Knobe	Admissions: Simmons

Kenan Seminars:	Fall Sayre McCord	Spring: ???	Assoc Chair: Lange
Summa	Fall: Wolf	Spring: Neta

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Monday, July 9, 2007 10:46 PM
To: Diane Lupton <dflupton@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Re: questions on schedule

> 1) PHIL 164 Morality and Business: currently listed with controlled > enrollment. Should this stay? The same for PHIL 165 sec 003 which is
> TR 3:30-4:45.
No -- remove the controlled enrollment on both. Once classes start, some profs want to have controlled enrollment to let in those who have been sitting in hoping for someone to drop.
>
> 2) PHIL 165 Bioethics sec 002, MWF 1-150pm has permission required.
> Should that stay? No--remove that as well, same as above.
>
> 3) PHIL 455 is currently listed with Neta as Epistemology. But when I > put in PHIL 455 it comes up Symbolic Logic. What is the # for > epistemology? I can only find a lower level course with that title.
>
> 4) PHIL 396, you wanted two sections of? One with a title of Ethics > Bowl, and the second just left as Directed Readings? Is everything > else the same with the second group, i.e. you're the instructor and it > will meet in 207C, etc?
The second section should just read "Directed Readings" and leave both as me as instructor and in 207C.
>
> 5) The perspectives requirement... Do all philosophy courses meet > this? It seems as if they do, but on classes we didn't offer last > spring, where I have to input everything, I want to make sure I should > add that.
Most philosophy classes meet perspectives, but they may satisfy different perspectives. I didn't think this was something you added, that should already be in once you put the number in.

Hope this helps.

Jan

From: Boxill, Jeanette M <jmboxill@email.unc.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, July 10, 2007 4:03 PM
To: Lange, Marc B <mlange@email.unc.edu>
Subject: Course overview
Attach: Courses F00-S07-1.xls

Here is the course overview with new numbers and up to date as of Spring 06. It looks like I began the Fall 06 & Spring 07, but it isn't complete. I have added this document on the admin folder in "courses" and you could ask Diane to update it, as she has all the information.

Jan

--
Jan Boxill, Ph.D.
Director, Parr Center for Ethics
Senior Lecturer
Department of Philosophy
University of North Carolina
Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3125
Email: jmboxill@email.unc.edu
Website:parrcenter.unc.edu
Phone: 919-962-3317
FAX: 919-843-3929

"Philosophy, when superficially studied, excites doubt; when thoroughly explored, it dispels it." Francis Bacon

	A	B	C	D	E	F	COURSE OFFERINGS		I	J	K	L	M	N	O	P
1
2
3					F 2000	S 2001	F 2001	S 2002	F 2002	S 2003	F 2003	S 2004	F 2004	S 2005	F 2005	S 2006
4
5		6F		First Year Seminar-1	Rosenberg		Long		Resnik	Hill	Simmons	BarOn	Lange	Lycan	Lycan	H-Hill
6		6F		First Year Seminar-2		Hill		Boxill B	Hill	Garrett		Boxill J	Reeve	Rosenberg	Roberts	Rosenberg
7		6F		First Year Seminar-3				Galligan
8		20	101	Intro: Main Problems				BarOn					TA		BarOn
9		20H	101H	Intro: Honors				Resnik		Prinz	Hofweber	Lange			Knobe
10		20	101-L	Intro: Large class	Garrett	Lycan	Rosen	Garrett	Neta	BarOn	Prinz	Neta	Bar On	Neta	no lge	Neta
11		24	110	Great Works		Gallig	Reeve		MacLean				TA	TA	Miller
12		26	112	Making Sense-regular										TA		TA
13		26	112-L	Making Sense-Large									Reeve		Reeve	r-TA
14		32	134	Phil of Religion				Nord			Pettit		Pettit/Nord	Nord	Pettit	Nord
15		35	145	Phil of Language						Bar On-H		Pettit		Pettit	Long
16		31	150	Phil of Science	Roberts					Resnik	Roberts		Roberts			Roberts
17		36	154	Phil Social Sci	Zaffron		Zaffron			Zaffron
18		21	155	Logic					Boxill J	Munsat			TA	2-TA	H-Resnik
19		21	155-L	Logic: Large class	Munsat	Simmons	Lycan	Munsat	Simmons		Lycan	Roberts	Hofweber		no lge	no lge
20		22	160	Intro to Ethics				Zaffron			Gert
21		22	160	Intro Ethics
22		22H	160H	Intro Ethics Honors	Boxill J			Lycan
23		22	160-L	Intro Ethics:Large	Boxill B	GSM	GSM	GSM	GSM	GSM	Wolf	GSM	Lycan	GSM	GSM	Lycan
24		30	163	Applied Ethics					Jboxill				TA
25		30	163-L	Applied Ethics:Large		Jboxill		Jboxill		MacLean		MacLean		MacLean	no lge	no lge
26		39	164	Business Ethics									Peikoff	Piekoff	Hassoun	Kelly
27		34	165	Bioethics-regular										TA
28		34	165
29		34H	165-H	Bioethics: Honors						Long		Long
30		34	165-L	Bioethics:Large class	Long		Long		Long		Gert		Long		Walker
31		37	170	Social & Political	Resnik		Resnik			Postema			Resnik	May	Tubert	TA-Turner
32		37	170	Social & Political									May	TA	TA-Wilson
33		37H	170H	Honors							Hill					Hill
34		33	185	Aesthetics	Vance
35		56	210	Ancient Phil	Galligan	Galligan	Galligan	Galligan		Reeve	Miller	Miller		Reeve-L	TA-Bowers
36		57	215	Medieval
37		58	220	Modern	Garrett		Garrett		Garrett		Neta	Sreedh	Neta	Russell		Miller
38		59	228	American Phil							Boxill B
39		38	230	Experience & Reality		Rosenberg		BarOn		Neta	Lange		Simmons	TA	Knobe	Knobe
40		38H	230H	Experience & Reality	BarOn						Bar On				Lange
41		47	266	Ethics of Sports				Boxill-H			Boxill J			J Boxill
42		42	272	PWAD			Boxill B				Boxill B		B.Boxill	TA	Boxill	Lge-Boxill
43		66	273	Social & Economic Just									J Boxill		Kelly
44		55	274	Afro-American Phil			Boxill B		Boxill B			Boxill B		B Boxill-H
45		46	275	Feminism		Boxill J			Wolf		Boxill J		TA	TA-2		Tubert
46		46H	275H	Feminism			Boxill J			Wolf
