

ABSTRACT

This study aims to analyze the role of notaries in reporting and preventing illegal financial transactions through the Government Anti-Money Laundering system. Using normative legal research methods, this paper examines the position and responsibility of notaries within Indonesia's anti-money laundering framework. Findings indicate that notaries are central to ensuring the authenticity of legal documents and are obligated to report suspicious transactions to the Indonesian Financial Transaction Reports and Analysis Center via the system. This obligation helps strengthen the national anti-money laundering regime, safeguard public trust, and align Indonesia with global standards. The study emphasizes the need for continuous training and regulatory clarity to optimize notarial roles in combating financial crimes.
