

upholds its interests." He is able and eloquent, and a bold warrior; to see him with a weapon in his hand, "one would think him an animated portrait of those ancient Cæsars of whom in Europe we see but pictures, all dimmed with smoke." While on the lake in a storm, with infidel companions, their lives are in danger; this Barnabé calls upon God, and immediately the wind and waves become calm. The infidels, however, claim this result as due to the demon whom they had previously invoked.

R. G. T.

MADISON, WIS., July, 1898.