

Church of the good Mothers. That man daily remained upon his knees so long a time that the French were astonished and edified. He knew not what it was to be angry; his greatest discontent arose from his not being spoken to about Eternal truths as long as he would have liked. He returned this year to his own country and we trust that his fervor will benefit his countrymen.

Some Savages accused themselves one day, saying that their hearts were full of malice. The Father who heard them asked them whether that malice dwelt long in their souls. "No," they said; "but still it enters them." "But again," said the Father, "what do you do when so bad a guest visits you?" "For my part," said one, "when I feel that anger comes to inflame my heart, I say to my soul: 'They who pray and who believe do not get angry;' and at once the fire cools down and is sometimes completely extinguished." "I am more wicked," said his companion; "for thoughts of hatred and thoughts of lewdness come to me, [65] which soil the whole of my heart." "But what dost thou on such occasions?" asked the Father. "I am afraid," he replied; "then I commence to pray to God, and all passes away." The holy Ghost is a great Master; he does more in one moment, when he pleases, than the Doctors in a hundred years.

Were I to say that some young men, when solicited by vile creatures, have caused grace to triumph over nature, it would be merely a repetition although the affair is quite recent.

A person who was sick in the midst of the woods suffered pain and anguish that brought her to the
