

PLATE IV.—MOUNDS AT LAKE WINNEBAGO.

the side hill, the position of the latter being as extensive as its shape. One may be a wolf, but the other, I think, any one would recognize as the fox, from its attitude, if from nothing else. A similar shaped mound is described by Dr. Lapham as having existed formerly on the site where Milwaukee now stands, block 56, Sherman's Addition. Several effigies, resembling the fox, are described by the same author, as having been seen at Lake Horicon. He states, also, that there are seven of these figures on the map, though we should say that three of them, at least, represented squirrels. Another is described as having existed at Mayville, and is repre-
