To this Judge Martin adds: The Green Bay settlement must have extended a very trifle from 1818 to 1827, when I first saw it. There was but three or four what could be called farms. Most of the inhabitants had small log huts, and cultivated small patches of ground around them. There were no roads—a wagon road was unknown; travel in the Summer was on horseback, and in Winter with trains or carryalls through the forests, and on the ice of the river and smaller streams.

Pierre, Louis, and Auguste Grignon, Lawe, Jos. Ducharme, Hyatt and Porlier, were the principal farmers—some of their farms were occupied by tenants, who were frequently those who wintered with their employers in the Indian country engaged in trade with the natives.

Louis Bauprez was a trader who followed up the Indians in their wintering grounds; in Summer was with his family at the settlement. His hut was mid-way between the mouth of the Fox River, and the Rapide des Peres, around which he had a small enclosure.
