The evening centered on the state’s nursing students. A number of them are working toward their degrees in the College of Nursing. "Precepting is an enormous responsibility taken on by nursing students," said Kuchenbecker. "The泡沫 are profound impact on the lives of people and the next generation of nurses."

"Empathy is about connecting with our students," she said. "They have a voice, and their stories are important."

Kuchenbecker’s remarks were followed by presentations from several Ohio Nurse Association members. The presentations were about various topics, including the importance of empathy in the nursing profession.

"We want to encourage and support our students," said one presenter. "They have a voice, and their stories are important."

After the presentations, the evening concluded with a Q&A session. Students had the opportunity to ask questions and share their thoughts with Kuchenbecker and other presenters.

The evening was a great success, and everyone involved is already looking forward to next year’s event. More information about the Ohio Nurse Association and their annual awards program can be found on their website.

KSU medical prof honored

Nearly 30 Northeast Ohio medical doctors were honored at the annual Komen Northeast Ohio’s Distinguished Leadership Awards dinner and celebration.

"The awards celebrate the commitment of our community partners to making a difference in the lives of those affected by breast cancer," said Dr. Angela Gatzoulis, KSU medical prof.

"We want to recognize the incredible work of our community partners," she said. "Their dedication and support are vital to our mission and the lives they touch."
