Message From the President

Not only is the Kent State community committed to ensuring that our students succeed, we consider it part of our mission to reach out — with helping hands, open minds and compassionate hearts — far beyond campus boundaries. In the pages that follow, you will learn about Kent State people and programs that are making profound and positive differences for individuals and communities across Northeast Ohio. They range from a program that brings the healing power of poetry into the lives of thousands of children and adults to a program that gives individuals with intellectual disabilities the education, skills and confidence to lead independent, productive lives.

Physically and symbolically, Kent State is reaching out to the great city we have called home for more than a century. As you’ll find, we recently opened the Kent State University Hotel and Conference Center in downtown Kent. This much-needed, modern facility is a key component of the downtown renaissance made possible because the university, the city and other pivotal partners chose to dream big and refused to settle for anything less than excellence. I invite you to schedule a stay at the hotel and experience the excitement for yourself.

From programs that are transforming lives to projects that are transforming the environment; from new students who are inspired to help others to senior students whose accomplishments are inspirational, this issue reflects Kent State’s caring, “can-do” character — a character that is stronger than ever.

A major milestone in the $106 million redevelopment of downtown Kent, the Kent State University Hotel and Conference Center — a 94-room, contemporary hotel located right in the middle of the city’s renaissance — opened June 14, 2013. The project is a partnership between the Kent State University Foundation and the Pizzuti Companies of Columbus, Ohio.

Ron Pizzuti, '62, the developer of the hotel, grew up in Kent and received his bachelor’s from Kent State. He outlines some of its great features, including 5,400 square feet of meeting space that will accommodate up to 300 people, an indoor pool and an exercise room. Pizzuti estimates the cost of the project in excess of $15 million.

For those visiting Kent, the hotel is the perfect lunch or dinner venue. It’s close to the more than 30 new shops, boutiques, bookstores and galleries, and on Saturdays the famous Haymaker Farmers’ Market and live music is just steps away. Or if you’re looking for a bit of exercise, the University Esplanade is just across the street, for a safe, easy stroll that leads to the heart of Kent State’s campus.

Kent State President Lester A. Lefton spearheaded the public-private partnership and emphasizes that the downtown redevelopment has been a team effort involving many organizations and individuals who are committed to it. “The Kent State University Foundation Board saw the project as the keystone for the city’s development: to bring people downtown, allow them to stay overnight, eat at the restaurants, shop in the stores, walk down the Esplanade and visit the campus,” says Vice President for Institutional Advancement Gene Finn.

The hotel’s proximity to campus makes it ideal for alumni or families visiting for homecoming or commencement. As Larry Armstrong, 79, ‘80, chairman of the board of the foundation, says, “The foundation decided to take a role to invest in a first-rate hotel that would serve both the needs of the university and the town. It was a situation where everyone would benefit, and was an outstanding opportunity to become a part of the town-gown renaissance.”

Kent State influences

The general manager of the hotel, Mike Riccio, is justifiably proud of the new facility. Although it didn’t have its unofficial opening until mid-June, the hotel was completely booked for Homecoming Oct. 5, 2013, during the first two weeks of business. “We’ve booked groups such as associations, local businesses, groups that need to meet but don’t have space, fundraising events for nonprofits, weddings — the whole gamut.” Riccio says the hotel reflects the partnership between the university and the city in a number of ways. The restaurant is called Zenas, named after Zenas Kent, the father of Kent’s founder, Marvin Kent. It will serve a seasonal American menu with international influences, with food sourced from local vendors, including beef, vegetables, breads and signature desserts provided by a local bakeshop. The lounge is named 1910, the year that the university was founded, and offers a select menu of tapas and classic cocktails. It's more than a boutique hotel; it's an homage to the university's historic presence in the city.

The furniture in the hotel was custom made in Ohio by Amish craftsmen. Says Riccio, “The Reilly Hotel Group has done several projects in partnership with Amish builders. The price is significantly less than pre-made furniture from overseas, and the quality is just outstanding. Jacob and Levi from Dundee, Ohio, handled every aspect of the furniture in the guestrooms from desks, shelves, nightstands, even the headboards on the beds and the closets.”

The artwork in the hotel was the result of a collaborative effort, too. The Kent State University Foundation helped develop the concept for the artwork in the rooms, which features vintage photos of the university. Old photos were even incorporated into the room numbers on the doors, and a local art framer did all of the framing. Riccio says that partnering and engaging with the community on that level is very important to the hotel’s management.

Proud addition to downtown

Lefton calls the redevelopment efforts a “recruitment strategy, a retention strategy and a part of what great universities do.” He adds, “We’re trying to create a pedestrian-oriented, people-scaled sense of place. Place matters, and Kent is going to be a place that matters. The linkage of the university to the downtown project is going to be very important to this.”

Finn agrees. “The growth of the area in the past few years has been the result of a university- and communitywide commitment. Now we’re looking forward, with the goal of building on the momentum we’ve achieved through President Lefton’s vision and the good work of the Kent State University Foundation board of directors.”

It’s an achievement in which everyone involved can be proud.

NEVER UNDERESTIMATE THE POWER OF LOVE

Alumni couple from the School of Journalism and Mass Communication host the first wedding in the new Kent State University Hotel.

"Sadie is the boldest bride," says Samantha Lingenfelter, '10, a college friend and Daily Kent Stater coworker of Nate Sargent, '09, and Sadie Kelly, '10.

"They weren't going to get married until 2014, but Sadie called about the new Kent Hotel, and learned that they had an opening in July. She did all this before the hotel building even opened!"

And that is how a Kent State University student media "power couple" made local history as the first to be married in the Kent State University Hotel and Conference Center on July 26.

"Everyone sort of thought I was crazy," Kelly says. "But the hotel is absolutely beautiful. It couldn't have turned out any better."

Sargent and Kelly met on the second floor of Franklin Hall, where the pair could be found in the business office of the Daily Kent Stater late in the afternoon, after all of their peers had abandoned the room for the evening. She was working on the Classified section of the paper as the classified account executive. He was manning the phones as the sales manager.

Friends and family were excited for the bride and groom and couldn't wait to be part of Kent State history. "We've all graduated from Kent State, so it's great to be part of the hotel's history," says bridesmaid Kelly Pickerel, '09. Student Media Manager Lori Cantor agrees, "We were all excited when we heard they were engaged, but when we heard they were going to be the first couple to be married at the hotel, we were even more excited."

Like the couple, the wedding was unique and incorporated many local vendors and traditions. The wedding featured 50 bags of popcorn from Popped!, as well as photography from Carman & Pugh, both located in Acorn Alley II in downtown Kent.

Instead of serving a traditional wedding cake at the reception, they served pie, a dessert that holds special meaning for the couple. Kelly was in Ireland one Thanksgiving while they were dating, and Sargent promised to make her a whole Thanksgiving meal when she returned. "I think he realized that was a really big commitment — making a whole Thanksgiving dinner — so he made me a homemade pumpkin pie instead. I love pumpkin pie, and it was delicious. That's a sign of a good future husband right there," Kelly jokes.

More than the wedding, friends and family looked forward to Sargent and Kelly spending the rest of their lives together.

Remember the excitement you felt entering Kent State as a new freshman? Do you recall the anticipation of the first day of classes? Were you cool? Did you have your act together?

The entering class of 2017 is decidedly cool, and the members you're about to meet certainly have their act together. This fall Kent State welcomes another record class and the brightest in its history with a 3.3 grade point average (GPA), and nearly 75 percent have at least a 3.0 GPA.

Get to know a few of these fascinating young people. Learn more about their achievements, their active lives and why they chose Kent State. Maybe they'll remind you of yourself at this stage in your life.

Natalia Roman

If you ask 18-year-old Natalia Roman how she spends her free time, she'll tell you that she really doesn't have any. While attending high school at Academia Santo Tomás de Aquino Superior in her native Puerto Rico, she maintained a very busy schedule (and a 4.0 GPA) while serving as president of the Student Council and a member of the National Honor Society. Graduating as class valedictorian, Roman, a member of the national Honor Society, received a Legacy Award for her work on Student Council. She also teaches Taekwondo and represented Puerto Rico in the World Taekwondo-Do Championships held in Estonia on August 2012. "I trained for about five months and did a great job in the competition," says Roman.

Who is the person who has had the most influence in your life?

“My mother, who has never given up, even when life has pushed her down. I've always been driven to excel to be able to give back to her everything she has sacrificed for me.”

Where do you see your Kent State degree taking you after graduation?

“I plan to finish my bachelor's degree in political science and afterwards, study corporate law. My long-term goal is to become a judge or a Latin-American political leader.”

Have you ever met a celebrity?

“I participated in Puerto Rico's Leadership Congress in 2011 and met Puerto Rico's Governor Alejandro Garcia Padilla and Resident Commissioner Pedro Pierluisi.”
Katie Kimble
Key Club, Flag Team and Dance Team kept 18-year-old Katie Kimble busy as a student at Rocky River High School. Also active in her community, Kimble has volunteered with Youth Challenge, a sports and recreation program where teens partner with youths ages four-19 who have physical handicaps. “Being the arms, legs and sometimes the voice for these kids is unbelievably fulfilling,” says Kimble, who’s raised more than $21,000 in support of Youth Challenge. One of the biggest influences in Kimble’s life is her brother, Mickey. Born with cerebral palsy, Mickey is confined to a wheelchair and does not speak. “I have learned so much just by being in his presence. He is a reminder of how lucky I am to have the opportunity to tackle the typical challenges in life,” she says.

Why did you choose Kent State?
“The campus is beautiful. Everyone is helpful and friendly. An added benefit is the proximity to my hometown. Knowing I could get home when I wanted and still enjoy some independence was the perfect blend for me.”

Have you ever met a celebrity?
“Yes, Paula Abdul, in Los Angeles. We were passing each other in the hotel lobby and looked at each other and said, ‘I love your shoes’ at the same time. She was unbelievably nice, so pretty and vertically challenged, just like me.”

Jordan Provost
Jordan Provost and his sister learned about the fine arts at an early age. And while his sister learned ballet, Jordan became interested in the piano. “Music has been my passion since I was eight years old. My family has encouraged me to go into a field that I love,” says Provost. In 2011, he was accepted into Kent State’s Piano Institute. He also served as principle keyboard for the Canton Youth Symphony Orchestra and as a percussionist for the Tuscarawas Philharmonic Orchestra Honor Band. He graduated from Navarre High School as a member of the National Honor Society and the National Society of High School Scholars. In addition to NHS, he also participated in Student Council, the school newspaper, Teen Board, 4-H and “all the high school bands.”

Who is the person who has had the most influence in your life?
“My parents. They were rigid enough to keep me safe, but also laid back enough to allow me to make my own decisions, make mistakes and learn from them.”

Where is your favorite place you’ve gone on vacation?
“When I went to the Amazon for about a week earlier this year, the first two days were spent in the city of Manaus, and the rest of the week on a boat traveling along the Amazon and Black Rivers. Various stops were made on the way for things like swimming, catching alligators and sloths, piranha fishing, petting pink dolphins, visiting a native tribe and learning about their natural medicines, and camping in the forest for a night among other things.”

Amanda Sheets
A graduate of Eastmoor Academy High School, Amanda Sheets graduated with honors as a junior, earned a diploma of distinction and was a member of the Hall of Scholars. A member of the National Honor Society, Sheets participated in the Impact Team and Good Neighbors, a homeless benefit. Sports were also a major commitment; she was on the golf, bowling, softball, swimming and soccer teams. She says canine rescue is a passion, “Beginning in 2003, our family became involved in the Franklin County Dog Shelter foster program, taking in 13 litters over the past 10 years to raise until ready for adoption. We also took in more than 300 individual dogs socializing them, fostering them back to health from heartworm, etc.”

What social issues are most important to you?
“Homelessness and hunger are big issues for me. I have worked with shelters to feed the hungry and give back to the homeless and I do my best to make a difference in their lives.”

What motivates you? What drives you to excel?
“My friends keep me going and drive me, but even more than that, wanting to make a difference in the world and in the lives of those around me has driven me. I know there are people who don’t respect my generation because of how some of us behave. I want to change that view.”
Amanda Rabinowitz, local host of Morning Edition.

WKSU format change offers listeners a more consistent experience.

On Jan. 2, when Dan Skinner started his first day as the new general manager of WKSU, Kent State's award-winning NPR affiliate, he was thrilled to be taking over the reins of a well-respected public media operation known across the country for innovations in fundraising, engineering, technology and talent development.

But the veteran public radio manager had one main goal for his first year in Kent: To follow through on the results of research that provided compelling evidence it was time for a change.

On Aug. 5, WKSU made its first major format change in decades, switching to all news and information programming from 5 a.m. to 8 p.m. daily, and classical music from 8 p.m. till 5 a.m. Classical music now airs on weekend nights as well, replacing folk music.

"For a number of years now, WKSU has been researching how to best serve the audience moving forward," Skinner explains. "We've been studying audience trends both locally and nationally and not surprisingly, we found that listenership has changed significantly over the years. Listening patterns have changed, and the different ways people access media have changed."

Mixed formats stations — those that broadcast more than one kind of programming during the daytime hours — are a dying breed nationally, according to Skinner. Apparently with good reason. "Financial support for those stations has dropped significantly," Skinner explains. "Most major market stations are now opting for a most consistent audience-friendly program schedule."

Serving the audience in multiple ways

The picture that emerged from the WKSU research was clear. "Our listeners
Students with intellectual disabilities have a chance to earn a university education and work toward a fulfilling career and ultimately a more self-sufficient life, thanks to a new Kent State program.

By Susan Pappas Menassa

The question is not who is going to let me but who is going to stop me?

Those words from the poster mounted on the bedroom wall of Kent State University student Catherine Lavelle’s apartment speak volumes about her character. Lavelle is not just a typical, spunky college student decorating her room with bold affirmations. She is a student with intellectual disabilities entering her junior year of college and finally learning to live on her own, thanks to a program in the Center for Innovation in Transition and Employment offered by the School of Lifetime Development and Educational Sciences in the College of Education, Health and Human Services. “I never thought this would happen. I feel really good,” the 21-year-old Lavelle says as she sits in a recliner in the apartment she rented during the summer at the Stow-Glen Retirement Village in Stow, Ohio. Long-interested in a career in gerontology, Lavelle’s internship and residence at Stow-Glen enabled her to get closer to turning her dream into reality. “It makes me feel independent,” says Lavelle.

Toward a self-sufficient life

Independence is a key component of the program that was created two years ago at Kent State from a five-year grant from the United States Department of Education. The university was one of 27 across the country to receive funding to develop a program known as Transition to Postsecondary Education for Students with Intellectual Disabilities (TPSID). Kent State calls its version of the program Career and Community Studies, and it’s designed to give those with intellectual disabilities a chance to
“I like being on my own. I want to do more and more on my own,” Craft says. “I feel good being on campus and going from class to class.”

Craft’s mother, Sandy, says her son has taken giant steps since coming here. “He’s more independent and much more confident about doing things on his own,” she says.

Motivation is key

In order to be accepted into the inaugural program when it began two years ago, students had to articulate in an interview how motivated they were to pursue their career of choice and their willingness to explore and prepare for employment within that career field. A total of 19 students enrolled and are currently in their junior year. A few have gained enough independence to live alongside other students in the residence halls. Upon graduation in spring 2015, they will have taken a total of 122 credits and will receive a record of completion.

The courses students take are regular college classes that are usually modified, explains Michali. Those modifications may include reduced writing assignments, multiple choice exams, and an option to be graded on a pass/fail basis.

Woven throughout the program is the emphasis on self-determination, self-advocacy and self-efficacy, according to Michali. Students are required to sign a contract that states their commitment to their Kent State course and what they believe they are capable of doing in each class, which is then reviewed and agreed upon by the faculty member teaching each course.

Supported by faculty

Cindy Kenyon, director of program operations, is responsible for getting buy-in from Kent State faculty and staff to open the classes up to her students and says the response has been amazing. “In the very beginning of each semester, I go to every single faculty member who teaches a class that a student is interested in taking,” Kenyon says. “I have to ask their permission. And the response in the last three years has been 99.9 percent positive. Faculty members think it’s a great opportunity. They join forces with us and embrace an opportunity for students to succeed.”

Michali echoed her appreciation for how well faculty and staff have responded. “I can’t express enough how awesome this whole university has been across the board,” Michali says. “The faculty has been phenomenal.”

Kenyon said the success of the program has also influenced universitywide policy changes, such as enabling graduate students who work with Career and Community Studies students to receive training through the Student Accessibility Services to proctor exams.

Michali says that this fledgling class of students will become the model for how the program will be carried out at Kent State in the future, and her hope is that support will grow when people realize the value these independent graduates provide not only to future employers but also to society.

Fulfilling a dream

Matt Craft has been able to get closer to his dream of working in law enforcement as a student in the Career and Community Studies program. The 20-year-old has taken criminal justice courses at Kent State and has also gotten hands-on experience by doing internships at local parks and riding in squad cars with local police officers.
The Wick Poetry Center's Outreach Program gives voice to people of all ages.

By Jessica Jewel, M.F.A. '06

"When I found out a poet was coming to my house to write with me, I was kind of worried because I was used to not being able to understand poetry," Brandon Johnson says with a slight laugh. But 15 minutes into his first writing session with Wick Poetry Center's Outreach Manager, Nicole Robinson, '06, M.F.A., 17-year-old Brandon had changed his mind.

The Wick Poetry Center's outreach team provides poetry workshops and discussion groups for more than 3,000 children and adults each year. Like Brandon, many participants are skeptical that they can write poetry.

Brandon is a palliative care patient from Akron Children's Hospital, where the Emily Cooper Welty Expressive Therapy Center's staff coordinates weekly workshops led by Robinson for patients and families.

Brandon began writing with Robinson two years ago. She travels to his home in Ravenna, Ohio, and for an hour or two they read and discuss poetry by established authors and write poems.

Robinson explains her writing sessions with Brandon this way: "The poems I bring with me to Brandon's home are a tool for not only communication, but also discovery. We read the poems and find ourselves in the center of them. The poems then act as a sort of trigger for Brandon to begin his own writing. Often the subject matter stems around healing, and the poems open a door to integrate aspects of Brandon's life he has otherwise not discussed." Brandon says, "Writing about my experiences is awesome because I have never really been able to do that before, to talk through what is going on."

Deepening conversations

This same type of model (reading a poem or two, talking about the poems, and then using the poems to trigger one's own writing) is a standard lesson used by the outreach team. For more than 10 years, the team has worked regularly in schools, hospitals, senior communities, veterans' organizations and community centers to help create an atmosphere
Many believe Dri Archer, the nation's leader in rushing yards per carry and kick return average, is a legitimate Heisman candidate.

By Aaron Chimenti

Kent State football's success in 2012 brought an unprecedented level of national attention to the program. Within that historical run, another phenomenon was beginning to grab the college football nation's attention in the form of Dri Archer. Archer was just one of the many reasons why the Golden Flashes reached new heights in 2012, but his lightning speed made him the most noticeable.

One fan and alumnus who took notice of Archer from afar last fall was current Head Coach Paul Haynes, who was serving as defensive coordinator at Arkansas. Haynes stayed in contact with many of his former teammates, some of whom attended games regularly and reported Kent State football news to him.

“They would tell me how special and electrifying Dri was,” Haynes says of his former teammates. "And they were always comparing him to Pat Young, who was our quarterback (1986-90). He was also a smaller guy with game-changing speed.”

Caught up in the rigors of coaching, it wasn't until late in the season before Haynes got to see Archer in action, when the junior's jaw-dropping, 74-yard run at Bowling Green was played and replayed on numerous television and Internet outlets. By Dec. 18, Haynes became the head coach at his alma mater, undergoing a whirlwind of change. The one thought that remained with him during the transition was the potential of the 5-foot-8-inch, 175-pound speedster in 2013.

When it comes to the national spotlight in college football, teams aren’t the only thing drawing major attention. The Heisman Memorial Trophy is arguably the most prominent individual award in all of sports, and anyone who is considered a candidate accumulates a fair share of fame.

“Dri is all about doing what’s best for the team,” Haynes says. “But when it comes to catching the attention of fans and media, we want to put him front and center. The success he had last year has helped transform him into a complete player and person — because he’s doing everything the right way. He’s done a great job in the classroom and in the community. He’s a good ambassador for the football team and the university on and off the field.”

During his Kent State record-breaking season of scoring 23 touchdowns, Archer also netted a 3.4 grade point average during that fall semester. He has also appeared at more community service events. When it comes to helping his teammates match their success of 2012, the senior leads by example.

“He’s like a quiet storm,” Haynes says. “He’s not going to be in front of the team doing a lot of the rah-rah stuff. He’s just puts on his hardhat and he goes to work. He works his tail off in the weight room and when they’re out there running.”

Haynes and the rest of the Kent State coaches know every opponent must key in on Archer’s exact location every time he lines up.

“We’ve got to find creative ways to have him touch the ball,” Haynes says. “And with him being a kick returner, punt returner, receiver and a running back, we have a lot of different ways he can do that. It’s a team-first mentality where we’ve got to make sure we feed him the ball.”

If the Golden Flashes are able to execute around Archer and come up with big plays even when he doesn’t have the ball, it will make him even more dangerous. And the dream of having a Heisman finalist from Kent State could become reality.

"He's done a great job in the classroom and in the community."

— Paul Haynes, Head Football Coach

Did you write for the Daily Kent Stater or were you one of thousands who faithfully picked up a copy each morning on the way to class? Now you can read archived issues of your favorite college newspaper from a digital archive.

University Libraries has completed the first stage of a multiyear initiative to digitize the long-running Daily Kent Stater campus newspaper, which has been published since 1926. The project provides full electronic access to the entire content of the newspaper through time (including ads and photographs), helping to preserve very fragile original volumes of the paper.

The digital archive allows users to view the paper without having to handle fragile and crumbling original newsprint.

The first decade completed includes issues dating from fall 1959 through fall 1969. Also included are issues of the Kent Summer News published during that period. The digital archive is fully searchable down to every individual word in the paper, but the archive can also be browsed by date. Original paper issues will continue to be permanently archived in Special Collections and Archives, but alumni and other users can look forward to tremendously expanded access as future issues of the paper are put into digital form.

University Libraries invites you to join them in this effort. You or your class can help this project to move forward by making a gift to support this endeavor and other digital initiatives that provide digital access to unique, rare and distinctly local primary resources such as the Stater.

Rachel K. Downey, Cleveland, Ohio, principal and founder of Studio Graphique, announces a significant shift in its approach to business. The Cleveland-based firm is taking a holistic approach to the brand experience as it relates to audience interaction with public spaces. Studio Graphique now provides place-based clients with enhanced branding strategies that engage audiences by integrating the firm’s primary offerings: branding.
BUILDING A KENT STATE LEGACY

As alumni, we’re proud to call Kent State University our alma mater. That pride has built notable family legacies. Two families in particular, the Winklers and Drinkards, have extraordinary Kent State legacies.

By Madalyn Etzel, public relations major, Michael Cellars, English major, and Danielle DeBord, public relations major

The Winkler family holds 35 Kent State degrees, and the Drinkard family holds nine degrees with two more on the way. The families are composed of siblings, spouses, children and grandchildren.

The Winkler Family
John L. and Marie E. Winkler, lifelong dairy farmers in Rootstown, Ohio, were the parents of the first round of Kent State Winkler alumni.
The family legacy began in 1961 and now totals 27 family members with a total of 35 degrees ranging from bachelor’s to master’s.

The attraction to attending Kent State University for all of us is that it is home," Robert Winkler says. After graduating, the Winkler siblings stayed in the area and found teaching jobs.

Winkler said many family members today attend Kent State football and basketball games to stay connected with the school. "We’ve always loved Kent State," Winkler says.

Anna Deiters recently graduated from Kent State in December 2012 and says her family history had an impact on her decision to attend Kent State. "I think our little legacy is pretty awesome," says Deiters. "Our family holds it dear to our hearts."

Deiters had the opportunity to attend school with one of her cousins, Rebecca Winkler, where they both studied human development and family studies.

"It really helped having Rebecca around. We always shared family stories in class," says Deiters. "It helped being able to study together, too."

The Drinkard Family

The Drinkard began their family Kent State legacy in 2000 when Allyson Drinkard graduated with a bachelor's degree in sociology. Here are the other Drinkard family degrees:

- Allyson, '00, M.A. '02, Ph.D. '12
- Maureen, '03, Ph.D. '12
- Lauren, '06, '10, M.P.H. '13
- Neil, '11
- Nolan: Communications major, expected graduation in 2015
- Julia: Applying for admission into M.P.H. program for fall 2013

Allyson says that it was a really positive experience for the whole family to be at the same college at once.

"We were a close-knit family already, and having access to each other in our college years made us all grow closer. We could see each other on campus and go get lunch. We could also share resources, which made it easier for the younger ones coming up."

Allyson and her sister Maureen were the first two siblings to go to Kent State, and they provided valuable advice for the younger four that followed. "College can be intimidating for everyone. But we told our younger siblings the faculty was accessible, available to talk to, and encouraged higher education," Allyson says. "Don’t be afraid to talk to them."

As incredible as the Drinkard’s legacy at Kent State is in terms of numbers, Allyson says there is more to the legacy than that. "Our legacy is coming to Kent State as undergrads and wanting to stay there through graduate education."

"We are proud of our tradition at Kent State," declares Allyson. "We will definitely encourage our children to go there.

There is a new celebrity in PEOPLE Magazine, and he happens to be a Kent State graduate. Ben Rings, '06, was recognized as "Amazing Teacher" and featured in the March 2013 issue of PEOPLE Magazine.

Rings, a special education teacher and wrestling coach at Pine-Richland High School in Pittsburgh, was recognized for his Peer Buddies Program. The program gives special education students the opportunity to interact with nonspecial needs students. Those students serve as great mentors to the special education students.

Rings also started the Wrestle With Your Buddy program, bringing special education students onto the wrestling mats. Rings says the special needs and nonspecial needs wrestlers have gone on to build friendships with each other outside of practice.

"They have formed bonds that happen outside of wrestling practice now," says Rings. "It's now at school, at lunch, in the hallways and outside of school.

When the kids start hanging out outside of the sport they are in, it's a really positive experience." Rings says after spending time practicing with the wrestling team, the Wrestle With Your Buddy program hosts a special night called the Best Buddies Showcase, where the students with special needs get to wrestle their partner.

"After practicing all year, they get to wrestle in front of a crowd, underneath the spotlight," Rings says.

Rings says one of his most valuable experiences was wrestling at Kent State. It not only taught him life lessons but lead him to create the Wrestle With Your Buddy Program

"The experience I had with Kent State wrestling was a lesson in itself, and there were many things that I learned about being part of a team and about myself," Rings says. "I benefited and learned so much from the experiences. I wanted every kid to be able to experience something like that and that is one of the reasons I created the Wrestle With Your Buddy program.

Rings chose Kent State after viewing several other schools throughout Ohio. He decided on Kent State because of the high-honored wrestling program the university offered.

"I came to Kent State for many reasons, first of all was the wrestling team," Rings says. "The years I was on the team at Kent State, we were always in the top 25 teams in the country, and we worked on making our team stronger."

Coaches Jim Andrassy, Frank Romano, Ryan Cummins and Josh Moore helped shape Rings during his time on the team.

"Every moment was memorable, whether it was busting our tails in the practice room, competing against other teams or spending time with athletes from other sports at Kent State," Rings says.

Now Rings can add other memorable moments to his list from his teaching experiences including this honor.

"I am ecstatic," Rings says "Now our program is gaining national recognition. Maybe another coach from another school will read this and begin to do it too."

The new Foundations of Excellence — Building the Future capital campaign got off to a tremendous start with a $5 million gift from John and Fonda Elliot of Charleston, W.Va. John Elliot graduated in 1970 from Kent State with a Bachelor of Architecture degree, and the gift made through his family’s foundation will create the Elliot Studios for Design at the new building planned for the College of Architecture and Environmental Design. The gift will also fund endowments for The Elliot Program for Healthcare Design, The Elliot Scholars and The Elliot Professorship in Healthcare Design.

“Fonda and I are honored to be able to give back to the university that gave us the opportunity and the tools to help build our pathway to today,” says John. “If it wasn’t for Kent State, and the school of architecture, I would not have had the foundation to develop my architectural practice or my healthcare company. We encourage other Kent State graduates to participate and foster the vision that Kent State has for the future.”

The Elliot Scholars gift will fund 10 scholarships for fulltime architecture students in any graduate degree program of Kent State’s College of Architecture and Environmental Design. Awards will be designated for both domestic scholarships and global education opportunities.

The Elliot Professorship in Healthcare Design will provide competitive compensation and research support for especially promising faculty members.

“Fonda and I are honored to be able to give back to the university that gave us the opportunity and the tools to help build our pathway to today,” says John. “If it wasn’t for Kent State, and the school of architecture, I would not have had the foundation to develop my architectural practice or my healthcare company. We encourage other Kent State graduates to participate and foster the vision that Kent State has for the future.”

NEIL DEGRASSE TYSON

Neil deGrasse Tyson, Ph.D., is an astrophysicist and the Frederick P. Rose director of the Hayden Planetarium at the American Museum of Natural History. Tyson's professional research interests include star formation, exploding stars, dwarf galaxies and the structure of our Milky Way. In The Pluto Files: The Rise and Fall of America’s Favorite Planet, he chronicles his experience at the center of the controversy over Pluto's planetary status.

In February 2012, he released his 10th book, containing every thought he has ever had on the past, present, and future of space exploration: Space Chronicles: Facing the Ultimate Frontier. Currently, Tyson is working on a 21st-century reboot of Carl Sagan's landmark television series COSMOS, to air in 13 episodes on the FOX network in the spring of 2014.
