Anyone impacted by 1 October is encouraged to visit the Vegas Strong Resiliency Center's website at www.VegasStrongRC.org to learn about available resources and to fill out the online intake form that is posted on the website. "The Vegas Strong Resiliency Center is the single point of contact for anyone who is dealing with issues related to the aftermath of the 1 October mass shooting," said Kevin Schiller, Assistant Clark County manager. "We don't have a list of everyone who was present at the concert when the shooting occurred so we can't contact all the attendees directly. We need anyone who was there that night to reach out to us even if you live in another city or outside the United States so we can connect you with services and assess what we can do to serve you."

The Las Vegas Strong Resiliency Center is a free resource and referral hub for anyone impacted by 1 October including survivors, family members of victims, responders and anyone dealing with effects from the attack including hotel workers, taxi cab drivers or bystanders who tried to help victims. Partnering agencies represented on site include Clark County's Department of Social Service, the Nevada Victims of Crime
