A: I think I've got your issue resolved, in that your public/private key are (probably) incompatible with each other. It should be possible to generate a new pair of keys, with a new password. This can be done using the terminal command 'openssl genrsa' followed by 'openssl rsa -in keypair.pem -out keypair.pem'. This should create a pair of keys. The private key should be placed in a safe place, such as a hidden folder on your desktop, and the password will be required to restore the key. Try the process using the following steps; Go to the folder containing your keypair.pem file Type 'openssl genrsa' in the terminal window Enter a password Once the password is accepted, press 'Enter' twice Wait for the terminal to say 'Generating a 2048 bit RSA key' Re-enter the password Once the process is complete, your keys should be re-generated. If it still doesn't work, please post the contents of the two keypair.pem files, and we'll try to help you further. Share this... "Plans to cut emissions will be meaningless unless they are backed up by firm decisions to cut driving," the Danish scientist warned. He added that "big investments in electric and hydrogen vehicles are essential to stop climate change." The Guardian's report in the meantime continues: To combat climate change, Europe's national leaders will have to act quickly and show resolve, although the EU can only make a difference if national governments act together. Officials have committed to a climate deal by the end of 2020, but this is expected to be close to the limit of what it can deliver. Indeed it is no secret that the Paris Climate Conference isn't going according to plan. At the time of writing the whole thing is already in a shambles. The Guardian goes on to claim: Europe's two main parties, Angela Merkel's conservatives and Emmanuel Macron's Socialists, are locked in a coalition government after elections this month, and the challenges of the next parliament are numerous. After the election, half of the parliament is usually vacant and 54b84cb42d
