Imaging of the head and neck in the pediatric age group. Radiographic imaging of the head and neck in infants and children provides information about the structural and developmental status of the skull and face. This information is important for detection and management of various craniofacial abnormalities in children. Radiographic examination of the airways in the pediatric age group may include a lateral cervical radiograph, CT scan, and magnetic resonance imaging. Cranial computed tomography (CT) can be a valuable aid in evaluating patients with nonaccidental head trauma, and can also help in the diagnosis and management of diverse craniofacial conditions in children. The role of MRI in the diagnostic evaluation of malignancy in the pediatric age group is not well defined at this time. CT is more frequently performed than MRI in the pediatric head and neck, and this trend should continue as MRI becomes more accessible to more patients and physicians. The Associated Press reported that the 19-year-old student was the son of a former UCLA basketball star.
