HyperMotion Technology is built on a new, more natural visual engine. It comes with new player models, new animations, player specific off-the-ball styles, momentum-based ball control, and more. Here are five key features of the new motion capture engine. 1. Player Models: The FIFA 22 Player models use new and improved physics-based animation. Players are more realistic, more reactive and more responsive. The players move with a completely new action weighting system, which gives players more purpose and impact in the game. Players now also have a full torsional rig for dynamic and reactive movement, which increases the responsiveness of players, especially those in tight spaces, like midfielders. 2. Positioning System: The positioning system has undergone a complete visual rework. This means positioning visuals will be more realistic, and players will be better able to adapt to their opponents. All players have a new, physics-based positioning system, which looks and feels much more realistic than previous games. The positioning system also now reacts to topological changes, which means players who are inside a building can now see the pitch on their field of view. Every player can always be seen on the pitch, not just high up in the sky as in previous games. The positioning system now also adapts to changes in light level, which provides a more consistent depth of field. 3. Physics Engine: The physics engine allows the player models to interact with the environment, such as walls and the ball. Players now push and pull themselves through space and interact with objects such as walls, moving furniture, and even other players. Physics-based animations adapt based on the density of the area and player actions. 4. Movement: Players now drive towards the ball with a new motion curve. This new motion curve allows players to accelerate in shorter periods of time, and to more effectively recover after a tackle or shot, all while maintaining a variety of speed variations to effectively change pace. This new motion curve now also allows players to decelerate more quickly. Players will now feel more weight when decelerating, which makes them more responsive. 5. Dynamic Ball: The ball now adapts to the player's movement. Players touch the ball and this prompts the ball to move with a new dynamic action weighting system. This means players have more weight on a ball when they run or intercept the ball. The ball its Authentic Motion Engine (AME) that uses body and ball physics to create realistic, reactive on-field actions and motions. The introduction of the AME has been the number one innovation in EA SPORTS FIFA since the launch of EA SPORTS FIFA 17.
