Exposure to sunlight is an important cause of skin cancer. Ultraviolet-A (UVA, 320-400 nm) is able to produce reactive oxygen species (ROS), which are responsible for tissue damage and may initiate cancer initiation. Porphyrin molecules are naturally produced in living organisms, possess strong singlet oxygen ($^1\Delta O_2$) generation capability, and accumulate in cells following UVA exposure. This study focuses on the impact of salinity and the porphyrin molecule, protoporphyrin IX (PpIX) on DNA degradation following triple exposures to UVA, salinity, and PpIX in PM2.5-induced injuries in human skin cells, MCF-7. A set of classical comet assays, single cell gel electrophoresis assays, and cell survival measurements were performed to analyze the DNA damage level and corresponding survival rate. Our results show that salinity and PpIX increased the level of DNA damage, decreased cell survival, and slightly affected the morphology of cells. Interestingly, the triple exposure to the medium containing salinity, PpIX, and UVA alone did not produce any substantial level of DNA damage, but the triple exposure to the medium containing salinity, PpIX,
