

ISM Central OH presents:

How Supply Chains Can Drive Value Through Change Management and Project Management

Presented by Iram Ali

As supply chain organizations are tasked by executive leadership to achieve additional value for their companies, procurement professionals are going to have to rely on value levers outside of traditional sourcing efforts. Demand and process value levers can provide significant value for an organization by essentially reducing the need for a product or service, or affecting the operating model to provide scalable, long term impact. However, demand and process value levers are sometimes met with resistance from stakeholders and require greater change from the organization.

To achieve the full value of demand and process value levers, supply chain professionals will need to advance and hone these critical skills:

- Change Management
- Project Management

Iram's presentation will provide an overview of the basics of change management and project management including:

- How the process works
- Applications to supply chain initiatives
- The benefits to supply chain organizations

Iram Ali is a Prosci certified Organization Change Management practitioner and PMP certified Project Manager with over 10 years of experience leading projects, managing change and directing resources across a wide variety of industries, including energy / utilities, financials, digital marketing and healthcare.
