

In South America, women from the Embera tribe sit daily, asking for money from people who walk by. They are very hungry and do not have much money.

Missionary Beth Burkhalter saw these women and knew they needed to hear about Jesus. She and her husband, Travis, began teaching Bible stories to them. As Beth got to know the Embera people, she realized they needed a way to make money and provide food and shelter for their families.

For many years, the Embera people have created jewelry from colorful beads. Beth felt God wanted her to begin the Embera Bead Project as a way to help the Embera families earn money and, ultimately, to share about Jesus and the Bible with them.

Beth helped to create an online store to help the women sell to customers all over the world. The Embera Bead Project's online store is helping families pay for shelter, feed their families, and get medical care. Through hearing about Jesus and selling their jewelry, the Embera are beginning to experience the hope of the Savior, one Bible story and bead at a time.
