DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Freer Gallery of Art is situated on part of the Smithsonian Grounds on the south side of the Mall between the Agriculture Building and the Smithsonian Institution at 12th Street and Jefferson Drive, S. W. The site was located according to the building line established by the McMillan Commission's plan to restore L'Enfant's original plan of the Mall. The isolated, rectangular building designed by architect Charles A. Platt in the style of a Florentine Renaissance fortress palace is 228' long and 185' wide with an open interior court about 65' square exclusive of the loggias on the east and west. The exterior of heavily rusticated gray Massachusetts granite consists of a basement story separated from a high main story by a wave motif string course. A classical entablature and balustrade crown the building on all four sides.

The principal north Mall entrance facade is composed of a three-arched central pavilion flanked by side wings. A circular drive and a low flight of steps lead up to the three-arched entrance portico and the single door to the gallery. Doric pilasters, two on each end and one in front of each arch supporting pier, rise to the entablature with its decorated Doric frieze. On either side of the entrances arches there is a single round-headed arched niche with strongly marked, rusticated splayed voussoirs. Beneath each of the niches is a single square grilled basement window set in a smooth stone panel. The rusticated side wings are broken only by three rectangular grilled basement windows, the wave motif string course and the undecorated frieze and balustrade.

The rusticated east and west facades of the building are simple and severe in design. On the south Independence Avenue facade a single-arched central pavilion is flanked by side wings. The great central entrance archway, approached by a flight of steps, is flanked by two smaller doors. Each of the side wings has three sets of paired grilled basement windows.

In the interior on the main floor, nineteen exhibition rooms surround an arcaded corridor and central court. The exhibition space in the galleries is kept low and the vaulted ceilings have skylights equipped with diffusing glass and adjustable curtains to meet the special lighting requirements of the objects on exhibition. The floors of the galleries and corridors are of marble and terrazzo and the walls are of sand-finished plaster.

In the southeast corner gallery, Whistler's Peacock Room appears exactly as it once existed in the London home of Frederick R. Leyland. Whistler re-decorated the entire room to harmonize with his painting, The Princess from the Land of Porcelain. Freer purchased the room in 1904, reerected it in his own home in Detroit, and bequeathed it to the Freer.

The five round-headed arched windows of the north and south corridors look into the square interior court. On the east and west this court is bounded by an exterior five-arched vaulted loggia. Doric pilasters between the arched windows and the loggia arches rise to support an entablature and balustrade similar in design to those of the exterior. The low planting, brick walkways, and central fountain of this open Tennessee marble court provide relief from the severe galleries and austere exterior.

The basement of the building, a half-story below ground, receives natural light from the large grilled windows. This story contains administration offices, storage space, a lecture hall with a separate entrance on the Independence Avenue side of the building, and rooms for studying works of art not on exhibition.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE (Include Personages, Dates, Events, Etc.)

The Joint Committee on Landmarks has designated the Freer Gallery of Art a Category II Landmark of importance which contributes significantly to the cultural heritage and visual beauty of the District of Columbia. This distinguished building was specifically designed to house Charles L. Freer's personal collection of American and Oriental art, which at the time it was received was the largest gift ever made by an individual to the U. S. Government. Both the building and its collection represent the highest standards of art. The Oriental collection, in particular, is one of the foremost in the world.

Charles Lang Freer, a wealthy Detroit manufacturer of freight cars, retired from business in 1904 to devote the last fifteen years of his life almost exclusively to the development of his art collection. In the same year, he offered his collection to the United States, with a provision for a suitable building to house it. In 1906, largely through the urging of President Roosevelt, Freer's offer was accepted and the proposed gallery placed under the trusteeship of the Smithsonian Institution.

Plans for the building designed by Charles A. Platt were accepted by the Government in 1915. The Freer Gallery of Art was officially opened to the public on May 2, 1923. Freer's gift included not only the collection and the building constructed at a cost of approximately $1,250,000, but also an endowment amounting to $2,600,000 for increasing the collection, for salaries, and for other specific items. In a codicil to his will, Mr. Freer required that the Commission of Fine Arts be consulted as to all future purchases, which were restricted to articles of Far Eastern art.

When the executors of Freer's estate delivered the collection to the Smithsonian Institution in November 1920, there were over 1,300 objects of American art, about 8,000 from Asia and Egypt, and a small but important group of Byzantine and early Christian relics. The American portion of the collection, which is fixed, consists of the world's largest collection of the paintings, prints, and drawings of James McNeill Whistler, two bronze statues by Augustus St. Gaudens, and a number of works by Dewing, Thayer, Tryon and other American artists. Perhaps the major interest of the Oriental collection, which is constantly growing, lies in the field of Chinese art on which Freer concentrated during his last years. Early jades and bronzes, Buddhist paintings and sculpture, and pottery from the Han and Sun periods formed the nucleus of the Chinese collection. There was also a notable group of Japanese painting, sculpture, and pottery, Korean pottery, Persian paintings and pottery, and Indian paintings and sculpture, and a small but important group of Byzantine and early Christian relics.

Washington, DC 20407

Dear Ms. Mones:

On June 2, 1981, we received the concurrence to the conditions for your determination that the proposed construction of the South Quadrangle Development Project would not adversely affect the Arts and Industries Building, the Freer Gallery of Art, and the Smithsonian Building, properties included in the National Register of Historic Places. A copy of the letter is enclosed. As you agree to these conditions, the Executive Director does not object to your determination of no adverse effect.

Thank you for your cooperation.

Sincerely,
