Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Hawkes Children's Library is built in the Georgian Revival Style. It is a one-story building with a basement, built of brick and stone in a rectangular shape with five bays. It has a hipped roof and end chimneys.

The library has very fine detailing on the exterior main entrance and in the rear facade's main window. The front-entrance bay is set off from the rest of the building because it is made of stone. The pedimented entrance employs the triumphal-arch motif that includes paired pilasters and modillion blocks. The rear facade has a central Palladian window that includes two side windows with extra large lintels.

The interior of the main floor consists of one large room with crown moulding and smooth plaster walls that is now used as the museum room. Off of this main room on either side of the front entrance are two small storage rooms. On the northeast side is a small side room with a fireplace used as an office. Across and parallel to it on the southeast side are doors leading to the basement stairs and to a restroom.

The basement has a large meeting room, a small office, and smaller auxiliary rooms. It also has two outside entrances, one on either side of the building.

The property includes very little grounds with landscaping of no note on the three sides facing the streets. The rear facade faces an area under construction that will be a walled garden with a fountain in the center. There are no outbuildings.

This property is across the street on the west from the county courthouse, with dwellings on the south and businesses on the east and north.

The library is in excellent condition and retains virtually all of its integrity. It has had few changes during its conversion from a library to a museum. The only additions are the garden walls attached to the rear facade.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The Hawkes Children's Library is significant in architecture, social-humanitarian history and local history.

Architecturally, it is significant as a work of the noted Atlanta architectural firm of Hentz, Reid and Adler, of which the principal designer was J. Neel Reid (1885-1926). Although the actual plans for the building are unsigned, the library has, like many other buildings, been directly attributed to Reid. The firm worked throughout the region, although most of their work was in Atlanta. Many of the great homes designed and built in Georgia during the first quarter of this century were designed by this firm. They are also noted for commercial structures and at least one courthouse (in Florida). Their three known existing libraries were all bequests of A.K. Hawkes, the other two being located in Griffin and Jackson, Georgia.

The firm's works are reknown for their implementation of various "revivals" just as this library is significant for its design in the Georgian Revival style, as exemplified by the use of the triumphal arch in the front entrance doorway and the Palladian window in the rear facade. Later, the firm's creations were primarily remembered for their Classical Revival styling, as evidenced by many mansions in Atlanta.

The Hawkes Children's Library is significant in social-humanitarian history as part of the series of libraries built due to a bequest of Atlanta philanthropist, Albert King Hawkes.

Hawkes (1848-1916) was a Massachusetts native who came to Atlanta in the 1880s and began an optical company which became nationally known. A life-long bachelor, he kept somewhat of a low profile with his philanthropic endeavors. His donations were attributed to his interest in "sociological conditions" and in giving where it would most benefit society. He founded the Georgia Training School for Girls with a $10,000 donation as well as the land. It became a state institution before his death. He donated to various colleges, and a dormitory is named for him at LaGrange (Georgia) College. He provided for overaged Methodist ministers, as well as Methodist orphans. His only sister, Mrs. S.O. Cundy of Rome, Georgia, continued donating to some of these same institutions after his death.

Hawkes' first known interest in establishing children's libraries came after Andrew Carnegie (1835-1919) began his nationwide bequests to libraries. Many of the Carnegie libraries went to large Georgia cities (such as Atlanta and Columbus), while others went to small towns (like Barnesville and Dublin). Hawkes apparently felt he could provide money in a similar manner, but specified that the library had to be oriented toward children.

Libraries especially for children had long been a controversial subject in the United States. It was not until the late-nineteenth century that major cities provided either part of the main public library for children (Brookline, Massachusetts, is a contender for first place in 1890 or Minneapolis in 1893), and by 1908 most public libraries in major cities had a children's department. For a decade or so it was not a universally popular idea. Although Hawkes specifically established his libraries for children, they were actually used by adults, too, since they were the only libraries in the towns.

His first library was established before his death in Griffin, Georgia, where it is still in use. His will provided not only for family bequests and further donations to colleges, children's wards in hospitals and various other places that aided the young or the indigent, but also for other libraries.

Hawkes provided $7,000 each (later increased to $7,500 by his executors) for a children's library to be established in Cedartown, Dalton, Elberton, Madison and West Point. He stipulated that each town had to accept the bequest within a year after his death. If one of these first five towns did not accept, he provided that the amount be offered to either Thomasville, Waynesboro, Jackson, Waycross or Hawkinsville. Besides the Cedartown library, in the first group, libraries were constructed in West Point (1922) and from the second group, in Jackson (1925). A library room was added to a school in Elberton.

This library is significant in local history because it was the town's first free public library (that is, not tied to any existing organization). After the bequest was announced, the Cedartown Library Association was formed in early 1919. Land was donated later that spring and the architects and contractor selected. Local citizens raised $18,000 to add to the $7,500 bequest. The library formally opened September 30, 1921. It continued to operate as a library until recently. In January, 1976, the library association transferred the library to the City of Cedartown, which then leased it to the Polk County Historical Society to be used as a museum and library open to the public. The building's restoration, assisted by a state grant, was completed by May, 1977, at which time the historical society and the Cedartown Chamber of Commerce began using the building. The museum formally opened in September, 1978, as the county's first museum.

RE: National Register Nomination

Hawkes Childrens Library
(Polk County Historical Society
Building and Museum)
North College Street
Cedartown, GA

Dear Sir:

We would like to have the Hawkes Childrens Library building of Cedartown, Georgia, nominated for National Register listing.

Our Society, the City of Cedartown, and your agency (through grants) have all contributed toward the preservation and restoration of this grand, old building.

We believe that a National Register listing is merited. We also feel that such a listing is needed to finalize the massive effort that has already taken place in the preservation of the structure.

Attached are application and background materials along with photographs. The color photos are included to emphasized the fine structural detail of the building. If negatives or additional photos are needed please let us know.

We hope we have supplied sufficient background information. If not, please advise and we will supply any clarifying or additional data.

Thank you for your cooperation.

Sincerely,

POLK COUNTY HISTORICAL SOCIETY

Dear Dr. Lyon:

In reference to your notice of May 23, we have reviewed the information on the proposed nomination of the Hawkes Children's Library in Cedartown, Polk County, to the National Register of Historic Places.

We do not have an approved transportation plan or proposed project which would have an affect on the site. However, the highway right-of-way should not be included in the nomination.

Yours very truly,
