Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Lyons Woman's Club House is a simple two-story, brick-veneered Georgian Revival-style structure with a pedimented parapet on the roof, an adjacent covered pool, and gardens. The front facade of the building contains a brick vestibule with stairways on either side and a central window rather than the more usual portico and doorway. Stair railings and a first floor entrance gate dated 1934 are decorative wrought iron. The main or entrance level (second floor) contains a meeting room, kitchen, powder room, and bathroom. On this floor, the walls are plaster on metal lathe. A lowered acoustical tile ceiling covers an original plaster one. Carpet covers original hardwood floors. On the first floor, the walls are plaster over brick. The ceiling is embossed metal sheets. There are steel columns that support the upper floor and subdivide the downstairs. The columns have been boxed in and covered with plaster. The floor is poured concrete. The floor contains a large meeting room. Fireplaces are located on the south walls on both floor levels. The grounds are level and planted with magnolias, dogwoods, shrubs, perennials and a large pecan tree. Two sidewalks provide access to the streets. Changes to the property include the covering of the bathing pool in 1968, removal of the semicircular stage from the second floor, and the closing of two doorways. A suspended ceiling was also added on the second floor. The Club House is situated on a busy thoroughfare with commercial properties on three sides and residential property on the south side, yet the property retains a park-like atmosphere amidst the noise and traffic.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The Lyons Woman's Club House is significant in architecture, and social-humanitarian history. In architecture, the Club House is significant as a representative example of an early 20th-century woman's club house and meeting place. It is a functional building and perhaps due to its being built during the austerity of the Depression years, it exemplifies a restrained approach to architectural detailing. Although originally designed to be in the Spanish style with tile roof, the architect sold the design "subject to changes to suit local conditions." Subsequently the Georgian Revival style was employed with the only details being wrought-iron, a parapet, and round-arched windows. It is also significant as a work of William Walter Simmons (1876–1951), a Georgia native, who began his practice in 1905 and eventually worked in Georgia, South Carolina and Florida. By the late 1930s he had moved to Atlanta and at the time of his death was president of the Georgia State Board for Examination, Qualification and Registration of Architects. The Club House is significant in social-humanitarian history for being the meeting place of the Lyons Woman's Club which was established in 1928 after the demise of three other local clubs. The consolidation of earlier club memberships allowed centralization of talents and a combined diversity of interests. The club worked toward a variety of causes including the elimination of adult illiteracy, promoting home economics for school girls, beautifying school grounds, preventing all at-large animals wandering about town, removing unsightly billboards, and sponsoring scholarships, to name but a few. The Club House also was a site for theater productions for the community.

These areas of significance support the property's eligibility under National Register Criteria A and C.

Historical Narrative

The history of the Lyons Woman's Club House is also the history of women's organizations in Lyons as well as of the site itself and its place in the community's history.

In July, 1915, the local chapter of the United Daughters of the Confederacy (UDC) bought, for $300, 20 city lots. The property remained vacant and was a local eyesore due to poor drainage and overgrowth. The UDC and another club, the Worth While Club, then began a "beauty of the streets" program which became a city-wide effort. The mayor even proclaimed a "Clean-Up Week" in May, 1923. A year later, in June, 1924, the UDC property was proposed as a public recreational park. Several local groups helped prepare details for a park and a playground. A landscape architect provided extensive plans which were never realized.

The end of the 1920s brought an end to both the UDC chapter, the Worth While Club and another local organization, the New Era Club. This paved the way for a new club to be organized.

The "Lyons Woman's Club" was organized and became a member of the Georgia Federation of Women's Clubs in 1928. Many of the same women were members of the new club. It was more effective because local efforts in many areas were now centralized into one club. By being a part of a state-wide organization, it had access to more ideas and leadership.

The club's activities were extremely beneficial to the Depression-effected community. In 1930 one of their projects was to stamp out adult illiteracy. Club members also worked with home economics departments to help school girls in modernizing kitchens in country homes; toward the beautification of the school grounds; and provided books for the school library. They also worked toward turning vacant lots in the city into gardens and asked the city to keep at-large animals out of the city so that they would not harm the un-fenced gardens. The club also attacked signs and billboards which detracted from the view and wanted them removed from the highways. Fundraisers provided money to pay dental bills for needy children, add to the Community Chest, and for scholarships.

All of these activities and many more were done without a permanent meeting place. Having met for several years in the City Hall, club members eventually decided that a club house was needed. It was then that the UDC came forward and offered their abandoned land to the club with the stipulation that it be "dedicated to the UDC and in memory of the Confederate dead." No deed exists legally transferring the property to the club, although the UDC did sell several of the adjacent lots to raise money to help pay for the club house.

After requesting designs from members, an architect, William Walter Simmons (1876-1951), then of McRae, was hired in 1932 to draw the plans for which he charged $25.00. His later offer to build the club house was not accepted. Mr. M.H. Fountain of Vidalia was the builder. Mr. Simmons designed a club house with Spanish details but in the final product the architect's tile roof was omitted and the exterior was changed from stucco to brick. The contractor's fee for building the club house and bathing pool was about $3,500.00.

The bathing pool was open every day except Sunday and both individuals and families could join for the season.

As the club began to use the club house, interest once again surfaced for a public park. With the "New Deal" underway, Federal funds were available for a number of civic improvements. As early as May, 1933, 25 men were available to work on turning the grounds into a "memorial park." Club members planted shrubbery, grass and flowers, while the city officials were to place swings and seats at appropriate places.

After 1933, the club house was used by other community groups due to its large meeting hall and the auditorium on the second floor with a stage and "beautiful furnishings." In the 1930s the club also began a book shop in the building. This shop was actually a library, with four books purchased each month, and a children's department. It continued for nearly 30 years.

Naturally, the club house was the center for patriotic activities during World War II, from the sale of American flags to the rolling of bandages. It was also used after the war by the local Kiwanis and Lions clubs as well as for Boy Scouts. In 1947, the community's first radio station, WRQN, went on the air from the basement. The Lyons Woman's Club disbanded around 1945 and the Lyons Garden Club was organized and assumed most of the functions of the previous group.

In 1965 the property was finally officially transferred by the UDC to the Lyons Garden Club and in 1968 the bathing pool was covered over. The building remains today in use as a civic club house.

Subject: Lyons Women's Club, Toombs County

Dear Dr. Lyon:

In reference to your Notice of May 15, 1984, we have reviewed the information on the subject nomination to the National Register of Historic Places.

We find no approved transportation plan or proposed project which would have an affect on the site. However, it is requested that, wherever possible, highway rights-of-way not be included in the nomination.

Yours very truly,
