STATEMENT

Calvary Baptist Church is cited by Oszuscik (1979) as representing "the maturity of the corner tower church" in Davenport, after the example set by John C. Cochrane's Edwards Congregational Church of 1873. Calvary combines late Victorian polychrome surfaces with a shingle-style roof line treatment and wide round arches from the Richardsonian, illustrating the trends in architecture characteristic of the late 19th century period.

Architect - John S. Woolacott, Chicago

Builder - John Whittaker

This building is associated with a minor protestant congregation in the community. It played no statewide religious role and had no important religious leaders associated with it.

HISTORY

DESCRIPTION

Calvary Baptist Church organized in 1851 after a split with another Baptist Church. A new church building was erected in 1857. At the end of the Civil War in 1864, the two congregations united as Calvary Regular Baptist Church. This building was erected in 1890. Calvary was the largest Baptist church in Davenport.
