DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

These carefully maintained outbuildings were originally accompanied by a large Greek Revival temple-style mansion, whose location was identical to that of the present main house. The architecture of the outbuildings, typical of their 1840-50 construction period, is diminutive yet powerful. They are impressive examples of Greek Revival adaptation of stylistic features to all types of structures.

The slave quarters feature pilastered walls, deep brick cornices, a central chimney, stone foundation, tiny lookouts in the cornice for the loft and a front porch. The smokehouse also has double brick pilasters and cornice and a hipped roof. The stylish Greek Revival entrance makes for an impressive doorway.

The family residence, built on the foundation of the original house, has been rebuilt as a bungalow-type dwelling using much of the original brick. The earlier structure was described by Johnson's son Henry in his memoirs as having been sixty to seventy feet square with a massive stone porch, wide stone steps, Ionic columns to the roof, with brick and frame quarters for the Negroes, a brick smokehouse, ice house, two large ponds and a variety of landscape innovations. The outbuildings--both functional and monumental--must have contributed to extending the domestic order of the mansion into the rural landscape.

A light frame porch and enclosed room have been added to the front of the slave quarters, and roofs recently replaced on both structures. It would appear that the cornice of the smokehouse has been somewhat altered.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The house, slave quarters, and smokehouse of George W. Johnson, Kentucky's first Confederate (provisional) Governor, were built by Johnson in 1841 on property in southern Scott County, Kentucky, purchased from his father-in-law Captain Willa Viley. Viley, a well-known antebellum horseman, was a prosperous Scott County landowner with approximately one thousand acres in the vicinity of Ironworks Pike and South Elkhorn. It was on the south side of the Ironworks Pike near Paynes Depot Pike that Johnson located his "stately, white pillared mansion" and outbuildings. Although the temple-style Greek Revival house burned in 1861 and has twice been rebuilt, the slave quarters and smokehouse of fine Greek Revival detail still stand.

Johnson was born May 27, 1811, into a family of illustrious soldier-politicians. His father, William, died as a result of wounds incurred during the War of 1812 and Johnson was raised in the Fayette County home of his step-father, John Allen, father of novelist James Lane Allen. George Johnson's grandparents, Robert and Jemima Suggett Johnson, originally from Orange County, Virginia, migrating to Kentucky soon after their marriage. Robert was appointed by President John Adams one of the five commissioners to secure the valuation of property in Kentucky for the purpose of taxation. He was also a member of the conventions which formed the first two constitutions (1792, 1800) for the State of Kentucky, a trustee of Transylvania University, and the first Senator from Woodford County in the State Legislature (he represented Scott County in the House eight times).

Three of Robert Johnson's sons were to serve in the United States Congress; the most famous of them was Richard M. Johnson (1780-1850). At twenty-one years of age he was elected to the State Legislature and, in 1807, to the U. S. Congress. In the War of 1812 he headed a regiment of mounted riflemen in the battle of the Thames and, though it has never been confirmed, ^{is} said to have killed the great Shawnee Chief Tecumseh. He remained in Congress until 1819, when he retired to his Scott County home. He was ~~then~~ returned to the State Legislature and that body elected him to the U. S. Senate. In 1836 Richard Johnson was elected Vice-President of the United States under Martin Van Buren and he presided over the Senate for four years.

George Johnson, coming from such an impressive background, was less ambitious politically than were other members of his family. He contented himself with three terms in the State Legislature as a representative from Scott County. A cultured, well-educated farmer and planter, Johnson took pride in his family and home--"the center of hospitality for the numerous kinspeople and friends."

As war between the northern and southern states loomed closer, however, Johnson found himself involved in critical political decisions which were to affect Kentucky's position in the national conflict. He had hoped his state would remain neutral and worked toward that end. The Kentucky Legislature's enactment September 18, 1861, of a law to "Prohibit and punish rebellion in the citizens of Kentucky and others in the State" he considered a declaration of war against the Confederacy and thereupon endorsed Kentucky joining the Southern cause. He was instrumental in organizing a provisional government for Kentucky effected by a convention held at Russellville, Logan County, November 18-19, 1861. A constitution was adopted and Johnson was elected Provisional Governor.

Johnson did not want war between the states. His only desire, as stated in a letter to his wife October 25, 1861, was for the "independence of the South and free trade with the North." Unfortunately the September action of the Kentucky Legislature thwarted the chance for Kentucky to mediate upon such terms, wrote Johnson. But "these were the terms," insisted Johnson, "upon which the North must ultimately make peace, or be utterly ruined or conquered as a dependency of the South." He was certain that Southern "military genius" and "unanimity of purpose" would insure these results.

Contrary to Johnson's hopes, the Confederate State of Kentucky was never realized. The action taken at Russellville was considered illegal by the Frankfort government and Kentucky, occupied by large numbers of Federal troops throughout the duration of the war, remained in the Union.

During the winter of 1861 Johnson accompanied the rebel Kentucky troops in their withdrawal to Tennessee and became companion and guest in the field of the commander. He participated in the councils leading up to the Battle of Shiloh and went forward with the army "feeling that upon the result hung the hopes of the Confederacy" and "desiring to share with the troops of his state the result of the contest." On April 6 after heavy fighting he became separated from his unit. He strongly expressed his wish to participate in the next day's battle, however, perhaps affected by news of the death of Albert Sidney Johnston--Johnson's daughter was married to Johnston's nephew. "And, causing the oath of a private soldier to be administered to him, he enrolled as a member of Company E, Fourth Kentucky Infantry." He was shot sometime during the battle and died the following day.

Although his dwelling is long since gone, the surviving outbuildings express in architectural terms Johnson's rectitude and idealism which a contemporary described as embodying "the very spirit of the typical citizen - soldier of the South."

Dear Doctor Murtagh:

In mid-September additional material was requested by Mr. Mark Barnes of your staff regarding the George W. Johnson Slave Quarters and Smokehouse nomination form. Enclosed is a photograph of the present structure built on the original site of George W. Johnson's residence. Although the existing bungalow in no way resembles Johnson's Greek Revival mansion, the relation of the main house to the slave quarters and smokehouse remains the same.

We are very much interested in the nomination and hope that the enclosed photograph supplies the needed information.

Sincerely yours,
