DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The original section of Hurricane Hall, which predates 1800, is a two-and-one-half-story brick block, four bays in width (see photo 1); the use of four bays (two in the upper and lower hall areas) seems to preclude the likelihood that a symmetrical two-story addition to the left was intended originally. The roof has a full denticulated cornice with modillions that extend up the gables. There are two interior chimneys on the east end wall. The windows on the facade are twelve-over-twelve-pane glass downstairs and six-over-nine upstairs. (The diminution of upstairs windows on axis with the lower ones was an old Virginia practice, noted by Clay Lancaster in Ante Bellum Houses of the Bluegrass, but it was usually accomplished by a subtlety in dimension rather than the reduction of number of panes in both directions as here.)

The first floor is divided into a parlor, dining room, and fifteen-foot wide stairhall, a feature of early houses that perhaps represents a last survival of the medieval living-hall (see Lancaster's plan). A fireplace at one time was located in the front section of the hall (believed to have been removed when a wing was added to the west side). Three rooms are on the second floor with the staircase continuing to the garret around a square opening.

The treatment of the stair and other millwork is a virtual casebook example of pre-1800 residential architecture in Kentucky (photo 3). The stair rail in the hall is simple with decorated step ends. Chair rail remains.

The surviving wood trim in the parlor shows the elegance achieved by early craftsmen (photo 4). Bettye Lee Mastin in her article on the house (Herald-Leader, February 3, 1974) states: "Hurricane Hall is rare in Fayette County in that its oldest section has a paneled chimney breast, gougework cornices and window frames with unusual reentrant angles."

The antique hand-blocked wallpaper in the parlor is one of the most significant features of the house (photo 4). The colors are still remarkably bright and clear. It is known that wallpaper was sold in Lexington as early as 1793 at the emporium of Joseph Hudson. That of the Hurricane Hall parlor was hung to celebrate the wedding of Sarah Ann Eliza Quarles to a cousin, William Z. Thomson, in 1817, when presses to either side of the chimney breast were removed to provide enough surface for full display of the panoramic scene. However, a little too much space was provided so it was necessary to put the fragment cut out for the hall door on the right side of the chimney. The wallpaper, a sweeping Italian pastoral, has Roman ruins in the foreground with a body of water and a Renaissance city in the background; figures and domesticated animals are scattered throughout.

Of the other rooms and the porch attached to the rear of the main block, Miss Mastin writes, "The dining room and two upstairs rooms retain cupboards of unusual charm.... A back porch retains another rarity, an early scalloped cresting with pendants trimmed with tulip-like cutouts"(see photo 2). Presses on the side of the fireplace in the room over the parlor are decorated with dangling over-drawers; one of the dangling pilasters terminates in a candle bracket. At chair-rail level is a pull-out writing shelf.

A one-and-one-half-story wing, added shortly after 1805, adjoins the west side of the house and is flush with the main block facade. In this section, a stairway between walls leads from the back room up to the small second floor rooms. A front porch with chamfered posts and benches was added after 1805 but was removed when the Petters bought the house in 1962.

In the 1840s another one-and-one-half story wing was added, set back quite a few feet from the earlier wing. In the 1850s a wing with a single room which no longer exists was built adjacent to it. This was entered from a rear gallery behind the 1840s addition.

A brick kitchen ell attached to the east rear of the main house is thought to be of very early construction. The base of the chimney is of stone; the interior opening extended the full width of the rear wall.

Originally there were a number of outbuildings, some of which remain. A brick schoolhouse, constructed circa 1840, with scalloped eaves, is located approximately thirty feet behind the main house. An early 18th-century log "overseer's" house sits to the rear of the schoolhouse, approximately 80 feet from the main house (the former slave cabins are gone). A smokehouse is approximately 70 feet directly behind Hurricane Hall; the springhouse is approximately 100 feet due west of the house. There is also a family cemetery located on the grounds west of the springhouse.

Behind the east parlor is the main stair hall whose unadorned open staircase (see photo 10) gracefully winds and rises to a landing from which all second story rooms including the east gallery are accessible. The auxillary connection for the two floors is a closed quarter-turn with landing staircase in back of the dining room.

The original flooring of yellow poplar has been retained, and the interior's only major alterations have been the installation of modern bathroom and kitchen facilities and the addition of a first floor bedroom off the original pantry.

A hip-roofed square smokehouse of brick built at the same time as the house is fifty feet to the southeast. Also surviving is a large splash stone at an outside corner of the kitchen (see photo 11), a brick walk laid in herringbone pattern on the east (see photo 12), a limestone bench on the north lawn, and a portion of a stone fence at the property's entrance at the north (see photo 13).

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Built in three or more phases between circa 1794 and the 1840s, Hurricane Hall is called by historian Clay Lancaster "the most engaging residence in Fayette County of which a part predates 1800" (Lancaster, p. 33). Various details of its construction may reflect medieval characteristics, such as the disregard for symmetry in the positioning of the front doorway and its wings, lack of emphasis on trim around openings, and the prominence of the stairway in the large hall. The original portion of the house is rare in Kentucky in having decorated cornices on the exterior and interior and is important architecturally for the survival of the paneled chimney breast, and door and window frames with reentrant angles. The second-floor cupboards with dangling pilasters are unique in the state. A later significant feature is the hand-blocked wallpaper added to the original parlor in 1817 in honor of the wedding of two members of the Quarles-Thomson family that owned the place for six generations.

The original block was built by David Laughead (or Langhead or Lawhead) on property located on the South Fork of Cane Run, seven miles north of Lexington. In 1805 Roger Quarles and his wife Jane Thomson, emigrants from Spottsylvania County, Virginia, purchased the house along with 190 acres of land. It is believed they added the wing to the immediate left of the main mass soon after the sale.

Quarles came to an area in the Bluegrass which by 1800 was already settled. The county was formed in 1780 by the State of Virginia and is one of the three original counties that at one time comprised the whole district of Kentucky. The surface of the county is very gently undulating, the soil rich and productive, and has proved excellent for the raising of stock (Collins, p. 263).

Six generations of the Quarles-Thomson family have lived in Hurricane Hall. Roger Quarles, the first generation of his family to farm the land, gave one square acre on the Ironworks Pike for the Cane Run Baptist Church; he and his family were among the original members of that church (conversation with Thomson R. Bryant, grandson of Patrick Henry Thomson, April 24, 1975; Peter, p. 863). Roger's will, probated in 1856, left Hurricane Hall to a grandson, Patrick Henry Thomson, who married Julia N. Farnsworth, daughter of a president of nearby Georgetown College, the Reverend B. F. Farnsworth. They had twelve children and reared nine; it was probably to house this growing family that a one-and-a-half-story wing was added in the 1840s and another single room in the 1850s. The Thomson children and others "especially those unable to obtain an education elsewhere" were taught by a school teacher from New England in a private school maintained by the family for thirty-five years in a small brick building that still survives near the house. According to family tradition the house received its name because of the turmoil and comings and goings of Patrick Henry Thomson's large brood. The last members of the Quarles-Thomson family to own and live in the house were Mr. and Mrs. John Atkins Stevenson and their children, James and Betsy Banks. In 1962 Stanley Petter, Jr., and his family bought the house and farm, they have carefully restored its beauty and architectural integrity and contributed to the "image" of Hurricane Hall with their four lively children, numerous dogs and horses, and constant stream of visitors while at the same time maintaining a working farm.

In conclusion, the old brick house, with its picturesque massing and outbuildings reflective of the functional demands of 19th-century family life, was described by Elizabeth Simpson as belonging "to yesterday. It is a sort of last frontier, resisting the relentless invasion of modernity." (Simpson, quoted in Lancaster, p. 50.)

Dear Dr. Murtagh:

Enclosed are additional photographs for the nomination to the National Register of Historic Places of Hurricane Hall (Quarles-Thomson House) near Lexington, Fayette County, Kentucky, requested by Mr. Ray Luce. These show the surviving outbuildings and relation of the main house to its setting. If other information is required, please let us know so that we can supply it as soon as possible.

Please also note two alterations to the original form: the log overseer's house dates from the early 19th (not the 18th) century, and the scalloped eaveboards have been removed from the 1840s brick schoolhouse.
