DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Commenced in 1890 (finished 1892) the first building of the University of New Mexico was a stiff, rather awkward Richardson Romanesque design constructed of dark red brick with rough stone trim. Two stories tall on a high stone basement, it had identical pavilions on both main facades. These pavilions of three stories were capped by steep gables which rose as high as the ridge of the hip roof that covered the rectangular structure. The lateral facades also had gables, each surmounted by a large chimney. The proportions of the structure were pinched and vertical, an effect that was exacerbated by the off-center, split-level entrance covered by a broad arch. Fenestration was graded: small square sash in the basement, rectangular openings on the first floor, rounded windows with heavy archivolt on the second, a bank of smaller windows with arched transoms in the pavilion at the third level. Three more openings crowded the gables and eyebrow dormers lighted the attic.

After serving less than two decades a drastic remodeling in 1908 transformed this run of the mill composition into a Spanish-Pueblo design. A flat roof was substituted for the hip. (There appear to have been structural reasons for this change.) All four gables were removed, and the arches over doors and windows were disguised by the simple expedient of dropping a veneer of stucco over the upper portions of the opening. For the sake of economy, however, the roundheaded sashes were not replaced and still show plainly from the interior. The proportions of other windows in the north wing were similarly changed by partial blocking; and the off-center entry of the east facade, which now became the main entrance, was minimized by the addition of a projecting vestibule covered by a low loggia (the latter since removed). Also to relieve the cramped symmetry of the mass, which would be inappropriate in a Spanish-Pueblo type building, an elaborate stair pavilion with masonry parapets was added at the southeast corner. This ascends in broken runs to a covered terrace at the second level treated as a traditional portal. This last feature was achieved by demolishing one corner of the masonry building. The original brick and stone masonry was covered with earth colored stucco, imitation buttresses with wavey contours were added at all corners, and equally unfunctional viga ends were attached to the north and south facades.

The setting for the remodeled Administration Building - "Hodgin Hall" - was enhanced by the planting of Rio Grande Valley cottonwoods and mountain ponderosa by President Tight and the student body of the University in 1908. The grove was later named in his honor "Tight Grove".
