Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Sunset Park Historic District consists of 3237 contributing buildings sited on all or part of seventy-one blocks, plus one contributing site. Sunset Park, taking up six full city blocks. The district encompasses a large portion of the Brooklyn neighborhood of Sunset Park. The historic district is an architecturally cohesive unit that is clearly separate from its surroundings. The district extends in a north/south direction for up to twenty-seven blocks; the district is three blocks wide. To the north of the historic district are a mix of altered frame houses and architecturally undistinguished masonry houses, as well as a number of factories and the tracks of the former South Brooklyn Railroad. These tracks are now used as a train yard by the New York Transit Authority. Two blocks from the northernmost point in the historic district, the corner of Fifth Avenue and 39th Street, is Greenwood Cemetery (NR listed). To the south of the historic district are industrial buildings, set along the tracks of the Long Island Railroad. At approximately 65th Street, the Gowanus Expressway and Shore Parkway divide Sunset Park from the neighborhood of Bay Ridge. The western boundary of the historic district is Fourth Avenue, a wide six-lane boulevard with central malls that were once landscaped. The Fourth Avenue Line (R train) of the BMT subway runs beneath the street. To the west of Fourth Avenue, most of the blocks are lined with altered frame dwellings. Third Avenue, which supports the elevated Gowanus Expressway, are large industrial buildings including the Bush Terminal Complex. Active freight piers extend into the water along First Avenue. To the east of the historic district are blocks of residential buildings, primarily lined with architecturally undistinguished homes from the 1920s and later decades. of Seventh Avenue, the Sunset Park neighborhood merges with the Borough Park neighborhood. There are 205 non-contributing buildings and 14 noncontributing vacant sites (including lots, parking lots, and playgrounds) in the historic district.

The Sunset Park Historic District is primarily residential in character, but it also includes a significant number of mix-use residential/commercial structures, as well as a number of wholly commercial buildings, institutional structures, and public buildings. The district has a low-rise scale. The majority of the buildings are two-story or two-story and raised basement dwellings. The multiple dwellings and mixed-use structures tend to be four or five stories tall. There are no buildings taller than six stories in the district. Brick is the predominant facade material in Sunset Park. A relatively small number of stone row houses and an even smaller number of contributing frame residences can also be found within the boundaries of the historic district.

The earliest buildings within the historic district are frame structures, many of which predate the organization of the Brooklyn Buildings Department, with its records of building architects and dates. Stylistically, the earliest contributing buildings are a small number of frame houses with Italianate style cornices. No. 456 52nd Street, for example, is a transitional building with Italianate and neo-Grec style detail. Some of the frame residences are individual structures but most were built in rows with brick basements, high stoops, and projecting trim. With two exceptions, all of the frame houses have been resided. Most have also had their ornamental detail stripped off and many have lost their stoops and cornices; these buildings are non-contributing elements within the historic district. The two frame houses that retain their original siding are 572 56th Street (Henry Spicer & Son, 1890), a neo-Grec style house with original novelty shingles on the second floor, bracketed cornice, entrance portico with jigsaw brackets, and a small section of original clapboard on the first floor, and 5615 Fifth Avenue (Henry Spicer & Son, 1888), a home that was altered for commercial use on the ground floor leaving the upper stories with their complex pattern of novelty shingles deteriorated but untouched. Due to its commercial alterations, this is a non-contributing building.

Most of the frame buildings in the historic district were designed in the neo-Grec style. The neo-Grec style became popular in Brooklyn in the late 1870s and remained popular through the 1880s. The most prominent feature of the style is the use of angular forms such as projecting angled two or three sided bays and stylized cornice and lintel brackets. In addition, ornament on neo-Grec houses often consists of stylized incised forms. Since most of the frame houses have been altered, few original details are evident within the historic district. Most of the contributing frame buildings, however, have angled bays and many retain their stylized bracketed neo-Grec cornices. Few frame buildings of later styles appear in the historic district, since by the 1890s, the construction of frame houses had largely been replaced by the construction of new masonry homes.

Most of the earliest masonry row houses in the historic district, erected in the first years of the 1890s, were also designed in the neo-Grec style. The earliest masonry row identified is that at 422-30 47th Street (Henry Spicer & Son, 1891). These five houses are late examples of the style and indicate that builders of modest homes continued to use popular older styles of design long after they had ceased to be stylish for grander houses. This is particularly true in Sunset Park where neo-Grec incised decoration appears on many of the row houses erected in the twentieth century. Forty-seventh Street between Fourth and Fifth avenues contains several fine neo-Grec row houses. All of these buildings are faced with brick and trimmed with stone. They have angled bays of either brick or metal, wooden cornices with angular stylized brackets, and high stoops with iron railings. An interesting feature of several of the neo-Grec style row houses is the extremely wide cornice that runs around the attic windows. This is evident, for example, at 413-27 49th Street (1893). The high stoops on most of the neo-Grec row houses have machine made wrought-iron railings in the form of wheels. Ironwork with this wheel motif predominates throughout the historic district on buildings from all periods of design.

In the 1890s, a small number of buildings with Queen Anne and Romanesque Revival forms appeared in the historic district. Most of the Queen Anne details are visible on frame buildings. The Queen Anne style, with its asymmetry, textural contrasts, and turned woodwork is most evident on the pair of wooden houses at 448-50 48th Street designed in 1890 by George Walkinshaw. This pair of houses exhibits steep mansard roofs, a tower, original entrance hoods, and, at No. 450, the original stoop and double doors. A Queen Anne style door hood and original double doors and trim are evident at 440 46th Street (1892).

Romanesque Revival features, including rough-textured stonework, heavy round arches, and Byzantine carving, appear on masonry buildings, generally in conjunction with other stylistic forms and tend to be found on the row houses erected between 1892 and 1896. On the blocks between Fourth and Fifth avenues are several transitional neo-Grec/Romanesque Revival style row houses; among the finest are those on 54th Street. Nos. 449-51, 457-59, and 460-66 54th Street (all built in 1892) are examples of these transitional neo-Grec/Romanesque Revival style houses. Extremely fine Byzantine style carved detail is evident on some of the Romanesque Revival style buildings within the district. This stylized three dimensional type of carving can be seen, for example, at the entrances to several of the houses in the row at 434-42 57th Street (Robert W. Frith, 1895).

The vast majority of the buildings within the Sunset Park Historic District display attributes of the neo-Renaissance style. Renaissance-inspired forms began to become popular on American buildings in the 1880s, inspired by the design of McKim, Mead & White's Villard Houses on Madison Avenue and 50th Street (NR listed) in Manhattan and the same firm's Boston Public Library. Following the 1893 Worlds Columbian Exposition in Chicago, Renaissance and Classical architectural forms began to appear on even the most modest buildings. The popularity of these forms coincided with the major period of development in the Sunset Park Historic District. Neo-Renaissance style detail first appeared in the historic district on transitional buildings that also display neo-Grec and Romanesque Revival features. An example of these transitional buildings can be seen at 423-39 55th Street (Thomas W. Edwards, 1894). These seven houses combine neo-Grec, Romanesque Revival, and neo-Renaissance forms.

Among the earliest neo-Renaissance style houses in the historic district are brownstone rows erected in the late nineteenth century and first years of the twentieth century, but the style remained popular into the second decade of the twentieth century. Most of the earliest brownstone neo-Renaissance style houses are located on the streets between Fourth and Fifth avenues, although a few are found farther to the east. A large number of the stone houses in the historic district contain projecting full-height bays. These rounded or angled bays are typical of the neo-Renaissance style as it manifested itself in Brooklyn. The neo-Renaissance style stone houses also often have elaborate entrance enframements and carved panels. Similar to the brownstone homes, are a limited number of limestone-fronted row houses. A particularly interesting feature of many of the stone rows found within the Sunset Park Historic District is the fact that a variety of different types of stone, including varying shades of brownstone as well as limestone, can be found within a single row.

Most of the neo-Renaissance style houses in the historic district are fairly modest brick buildings. These brick neo-Renaissance style row houses appear in two major varieties, those with rounded bays, not unlike the rounded bays commonly seen on the brownstone row houses, and those with shallow projecting flat bays. A smaller number of brick row houses have angled bays or flat facades. There is very little ornament on these buildings. Renaissance ornamental detail is generally limited to the galvanized iron cornices that are embossed with such Renaissance motifs as wreaths and garlands.

An interesting feature of the neo-Renaissance style row houses within the Sunset Park Historic District is the fact that many of them exhibit retardataire neo-Grec ornament. A large number of the brick houses have limestone window and door lintels with simple incised decoration. This decoration appears on houses erected thirty years or more after the neo-Grec style first became popular in Brooklyn and is evidence of how long certain architectural forms lingered in the work of builder/architects.

The final contributing row houses in the Sunset Park Historic district are vaguely neo-Renaissance style buildings erected during the second decade of the twentieth century. These buildings also tend to be two-family houses and they retain the scale and use of materials found on the earlier row houses. Their use of a dark hued brick and extremely simple Renaissance inspired detail sets them apart from the other row houses. The simple ornament is often made of cast stone and many of these buildings lack cornices. A number of these buildings also have front porches, not generally found on the earlier residential buildings in the historic district. A few have Mediterranean detail (generally Spanish tile roofs or imitation Spanish tile produced from pressed metal) or small bits of Arts and Crafts ornament. The finest Arts and Crafts detail in the historic district is found on the mixed-use residential/commercial row at 6112-20 Fifth Avenue. Some buildings from this period are so simple as to be almost astylar. These buildings are scattered throughout the historic district, but the largest concentrations are located between Sixth and Seventh avenues, particularly on 55th and 56th streets.

It is not only the stylistic similarities among the row houses of the Sunset Park Historic District that lends the area its cohesive character. Equally important is the similarity in scale and in use of materials. As has been noted, almost all of the row houses are two-story or two-story and basement structures and most——are faced with brick. The handsome stone houses are, for the most part, limited to the blocks between Fourth and Fifth avenues, with smaller numbers between Fifth and Sixth avenues, and they tend to appear in long cohesive rows. Although not apparent on the exterior, almost all of the row houses in the historic district are two family units with separate apartments on each floor (the two-story and raised basement houses have a duplex unit and a second floor floor-through unit.)

The design of the multiple dwellings in the historic district tends to parallel that of the row houses. All of the multiple dwellings are faced with brick, often trimmed with limestone. They were designed by the same architects who were responsible for the row houses and were erected by many of the same speculative builders. The multiple dwellings are found in great numbers on the avenues, particularly on Fourth and Sixth avenues, but they also appear on the same blocks as the row houses and are interspersed with the smaller buildings. Almost all of the multiple dwellings are in the neo-Renaissance style, with ornament generally limited to the entrance enframements and to galvanized-iron cornices. The multiple dwellings are almost all walkups and they tend to be either three or four stories tall. The narrowest of these structures have a single apartment on each floor include a significant number of three-story, three-family buildings that are virtually indistinguishable from the two-story and two-story and basement row houses. Most of the multiple dwellings are larger than the row houses and were erected on wider lots. These buildings tend to have two apartments per floor, each apartment running through the building with windows on both the street and yard elevations. As with the row houses, the last contributing multiple dwellings are dark hued brick vaguely neo-Renaissance style buildings with cast stone trim.

The most unusual multiple dwellings in the historic district are those built by the Finnish community as cooperative apartments. These cooperatives are located in the northeastern part of the district and are unusual for their plans. Most of these buildings incorporate a large central court into their design, thus assuring that an abundance of light and air would reach all apartments. In scale, choice of materials, and in design, these buildings relate closely to the more traditional multiple dwellings erected in the historic district by speculators.

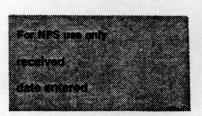

A major component of the historic district is the presence of mixed-use residential/commercial buildings. These buildings are generally located on the north/south avenues. The major commercial street in the historic district is Fifth Avenue. Almost all of the buildings on this street are of the mixed use variety, although a few contributing buildings were erected solely for commercial purposes. Mixed use buildings also appear on Fourth, Sixth, and Seventh avenues, especially at corner locations. The design, style, scale, and use of materials on these buildings parallels that of the row houses and multiple dwellings. The earliest of the mixed-use structures display Romanesque Revival forms, as is evident at 3882-88 Fifth Avenue (1894), but the vast majority of these buildings were erected in the Neo-Renaissance style

The mixed-use structures were designed with shops on the ground floor and apartments above. At the ground floor level, most of these buildings had cast-iron columns and storefronts with projecting metal cornices. Some of the cast-iron piers are still visible and a few stores still retain original features, but most of the stores have been altered over the years.

faced with brick and most are three or four stories tall.

At a very early date some of the apartments in the Fifth Avenue buildings, and to a lesser extent in the Fourth Avenue buildings, appear to have been changed to commercial use. This is evident in the fact that the windows on the second floor and sometimes on the floors above, have been enlarged to allow light to come into the office spaces. On Fifth Avenue, signs now cover the upper facades of several of commercial buildings, but original fabric undoubtedly survives behind most of this signage.

Of the buildings erected solely for commercial use, the most imposing are those erected by banks. Of special interest are the former Bay Ridge Savings Bank (now Anchor Savings Bank), a bold Classical Revival style limestone building on Fifth Avenue, and the Mechanics Bank (now Manufactures Hanover Bank), a neo-Renaissance style brick structure on Fourth Avenue.

As Sunset Park became a prosperous residential neighborhood, public and private institutions began to build imposing new structures in the area. Some of the finest institutional buildings in the Sunset Park Historic District were erected by church congregations. The earliest church in the district is St. Andrew's Episcopal Church. Erected in 1893, at the time when masonry buildings were just beginning to be erected in the area, St. Andrew's is a Romanesque Revival style structure with some of the same stylistic forms found on contemporary Romanesque Revival style row houses. Several of the churches were designed in the neo-Gothic style which became popular for religious edifices in the early years of the twentieth century. Among these are the English Evangelical Lutheran Church and Trinity Lutheran Church, both on Fourth Avenue. The most prominent church in the district is Our Lady of Perpetual Help R.C. Church, an enormous neo-Romanesque style stone building on Fifth Avenue between 59th and 60th streets.

The City of New York was also an active builder in Sunset Park during the years in which the area was being developed as a residential neighborhood and in the years after. The earliest civic building in the district appears to be the small fire house at 5209 Fifth Avenue, erected by the Brooklyn Fire Department prior to the 1898 union of the city's of Brooklyn and New York. special interest among the civic buildings in the district are school architect C.B.J. Snyder's Beaux-Arts style P.S. 94 on Sixth Avenue and 50th Street, Mortimer Metcalfe's Classical Revival style Magistrate's Court on Fourth Avenue and 42nd Street, and the Art Deco style Sunset Play Center, designed by Aymar Embury and built as part of a WPA-funded construction project during the 1930s.

There have been very few major alterations to the masonry buildings in the historic district. The row houses and apartment buildings remain virtually intact. Alterations have, in general, been limited to the replacement of original double doors with single-leaf doors, the addition of metal entrance awnings, and the occasional replacement of wooden window sash with aluminum windows. The commercial buildings have in general been altered on the ground floor, but some original shopfront details are visible and others are undoubtedly extant beneath the later shopfronts and signs. Occasionally signage has covered the upper stories of buildings on Fifth Avenue.

Building List

What follows is a list of all of the buildings within the Sunset Park Historic District. Each entry contains the address of the building or buildings, the number of buildings in the row, the architect (if known), date of construction (if known), and major alterations. All row houses for which information is available are two-family, two-story or two-story and basement homes unless otherwise noted. All buildings are neo-Renaissance in style unless otherwise noted. Minor alterations, such as changes to doors, windows and ironwork have not been noted. Dates are given only when confirmed in primary sources. Most dates have been ascertained through Brooklyn Buildings Department records. Dates preceded by c. (circa) have been ascertained through use of conveyance records. For the blocks at the southern end of the historic district, from the south side of 60th Street to 64th Street, no Buildings Department records are extant. Note: The address numbering system in Sunset Park skips many numbers.

The residential buildings in the Sunset Park Historic District tend to fall into certain basic types. In order to simplify the building list, the houses have been divided into seven types, each of which is described below.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)
The Sunset Park Historic District is architecturally and historically significant as an extensive intact turn-of-the-century residential neighborhood consisting primarily of a large and cohesive group of masonry row houses and multiple dwellings erected to house middle and working class people. The district was developed beginning in the 1880s, when it became easily accessible to Manhattan via improved transportation and was subsequently improved with grading and street paving by the city of Brooklyn. The large residential/commercial neighborhood developed very rapidly after this, with the majority of the row houses constructed between 1885 and 1912 and the second wave of development consisting of infill housing and public, religious, and institutional buildings completed by the early 1930s. The rapid development of the area was a result of the singularity of its building program and its somewhat homogeneous population. The principal residential type within the historic district is the two-story or two-story and basement brick or stone fronted row house. Although almost all of these row houses were built as two family dwellings, it is evident from their design and materials that they were in conscious imitation of the one-family residences that dominated Brooklyn's middle-class neighborhoods throughout the nineteenth century. The appearance of this building type here, in a neighborhood of moderate means, in the early twentieth century, long past the peak in its popularity elsewhere, is an important illustration of the complex social history and development of Brooklyn. The district also includes a large number of multiple dwellings and tenements, several of which are among the earliest example of progressively planned non-profit cooperatively owned apartments in the city. The architectural character of the Sunset Park neighborhood is dominated by restrained applications of popular late nineteenth century styles including neo-Grec, Romanesque Revival, and neo-Renaissance. Identical houses, row patterns, and decoration appear throughout the district, often attributed to different architects, indicating that the designs were often the work of local developers or builders and were produced for the speculative market. The final contributing residences in the historic district continue the predominant row house type but are simpler and less ornamental, with modest Italian Renaissance and Mediterranean ornament, or, on occasion, Arts and Crafts detail. The district also includes several long avenues of buildings that were designed for commercial use on their first floors and residential above and a number of civic, religious, and institutional buildings, primarily designed in the early years of the twentieth century to support the populous and thriving neighborhood. Sunset Park Historic District contains one of the earliest and most extensive concentrations of two-family masonry row houses in New York City. Covering all or part of more than seventy city blocks, the area's architectural integrity and neighborhood cohesiveness is outstanding. The final contributing element in the district, the WPA-era Sunset Play Center completes the area's historic period of development and confirms and symbolizes its neighborhood identity.

Prior to the advent of residential development in the historic district the area was farmland located at the southern edge of the city of Brooklyn and northern edge of the town of New Utrecht. As a Dutch colony during the seventeenth century, what is now Brooklyn was divided into six towns. Present day 60th Street was the boundary between Breukelin (Brooklyn) and Nieuw Utrecht (New Utrecht/now Bay Ridge). The area was laid out as farms, most owned by the Bergen family. Hans Hansen van Bergen was one of the earliest settlers in the New Netherlands and his descendants became major landowners in both Brooklyn and Manhattan. According to Henry Stiles, the Bergen family owned "the greater portion of the area of the city of Brooklyn extending along the water from the Wallabout and Fulton Ferry to Bay Ridge." Typical of Dutch practice, the farms in the Sunset Park area were laid out on long narrow plots. They extended from the waterfront, east up the slopes on which the Sunset Park neighborhood was built, to Brooklyn's boundary with the town of Flatbush.

In the 1820s, Brooklyn began to shed its rural atmosphere as middle-class families moved into newly developing urban neighborhoods. Most people who moved to Brooklyn commuted to jobs in Manhattan, although some worked in the factories that were erected along the Brooklyn waterfront. The earliest urban development in Brooklynn took place in Brooklyn Heights, the area that is closest to Manhattan. The growth of Brooklyn as a popular place of residence was only possible because of the advent of safe and reliable ferry service connecting the independent cities of Brooklyn and New York. Brooklyn's population swelled dramatically during the nineteenth century and urbanization moved out from Brooklyn Heights in great arcs, as neighborhoods to the south and to the east were built up with new row houses. The Sunset Park Historic District is several miles from Brooklyn Heights and was not greatly affected by this movement until late in the nineteenth century. Throughout most of the century, Sunset Park remained open land with farms and several country estates, notably Kent Castle on 59th Street, a Gothic Revival style villa designed by Andrew Jackson Davis.

The name Sunset Park was not used to describe the Eighth Ward of Brooklyn, located between Prospect Street and 60th Street, until the late nineteenth century. As the Brooklyn Daily Eagle noted in 1910, "there was no especial name for the Eighth Ward section, running down to the former city line at Sixtieth street." In the final decades of the nineteenth century, a large portion of southwestern Brooklyn was dubbed South Brooklyn. This included not only what was to become Sunset Park, but also the present-day neighborhoods of Bay Ridge, Bensonhurst, Borough Park, Dyker Heights, and Bath Beach. In Brooklyn's history, the term "South Brooklyn" has been "an elastic one." The name was originally applied to the neighborhood south of Brooklyn Heights, including the streets now encompassed by the Cobble Hill, Carroll Gardens, and Boerum Hill historic districts (all NR listed). As the city grew, however, the term generally began to refer to neighborhoods at the southern edge of the city and to the communities such as Bay Ridge that were annexed to Brooklyn in the early 1890s. The term Sunset Park began to come into use soon after the city decided to set aside park land between Fourth and Seventh avenues at 41st to 44th streets. Since the park is located on a slope with spectacular views towards the sunset in the west, Sunset Park was an appropriate name.

The first major change in the rural character of the Sunset Park area occurred in 1838, with the establishment of Green-Wood Cemetery. The cemetery purchased land between 21st and 34th streets at Fifth Avenue and laid out New York's first rural cemetery. The cemetery brought many visitors to the vicinity, but little development occurred since the area was still inconvenient for daily commuting. The major catalyst for change in the region was the opening of the 39th Street Ferry in 1889. The new ferry line was "the first genuine stimulant to the growth of this section affording as it did transportation to and from Manhattan." This was soon followed by the opening of the Fifth Avenue elevated rail line, which reached as far as Fifth Avenue and 38th Street in 1890 and had been extended to 65th Street by 1893.

Following the inception of ferry services there was a great deal of land speculation in the vicinity of the historic district. The Brooklyn Daily Eagle commented in 1892 that "there is no section of the city where real estate has advanced in valuation more than it has in some portions in the boundaries of the Eighth Ward [Sunset Park]." This same article also noted that the city had already purchased woodland in the neighborhood that "has natural attractions that are seldom met with within city limits." Although the land for Sunset Park was acquired in 1891, it was not developed until years later when the surrounding neighborhood was built up with large numbers of new homes.

In the 1880s, speculative builders began to become active in the construction of homes within the historic district. All of the early buildings were frame structures. Many were erected individually, although others were built in short rows. The earliest firmly dated house in the historic district is 513 57th Street, erected in 1883. This building has been heavily altered and is, therefore, considered to be a non-contributing element. The oldest firmly dated contributing buildings are the three frame houses at 450-54 52nd Street, built in 1887. Most of the frame buildings are three-story structures raised on high brick basements. All had stoops and many had angled bays. Almost all of these buildings have been altered and are considered to be non-contributing elements within the historic district boundaries. A few of these frame houses still retain handsome cornices, window lintels, and door hoods, most in the neo-Grec style.

The earliest masonry buildings within the Sunset Park Historic District appear to be the row of five houses at 422-30 47th Street erected in 1891. Almost all of the early development was limited to the blocks between Fourth and Fifth avenues. An examination of the 1898 Bromley atlas of Brooklyn reveals that within the district were scattered groups of masonry and frame houses, largely located on the blocks to the north, closest to the previously settled areas of Brooklyn and to the 39th Street Ferry. There was almost no construction east of Fifth Avenue.

Much of the early development in Sunset Park apparently occurred as a result of the fact that the city of Brooklyn issued bonds in c.1890 that were to pay for improvements in the Eighth Ward. The money from these bonds was used to open, grade, and pave streets. A 1905 account of Sunset Park's growth reported that this:

[plus] other improvements which were beginning, resulted in the rapid development of this section. The avenues began to be built up with substantial business blocks and the cross streets with dwellings. Farms were cut up into lots, and where garden truck had been raised men and women turned to raising children. 9

It was during the 1890s that some of the finest buildings within the Sunset Park Historic District were erected. The early row houses, located, for example, on 54th, 55th, 56th, and 58th streets between Fourth and Fifth avenues and on 47th Street between Fifth and Sixth avenues, were generally among the most expensive erected in the area. Some of these buildings have brick facades, but most were erected with brownstone fronts. Most of the "substantial business blocks" that were erected at this time were mixed use structures with commercial ground floors and apartments above. The handsome row of Romanesque Revival style tenements with commercial ground floors at 3882-88 Fifth Avenue built in 1894 is a good example of this type of building.

By the last years of the nineteenth century, development was moving eastward onto the blocks between Fifth and Sixth avenues and brick row houses were joining the brownstone homes. Several hundred row houses and a few multiple dwellings had been erected within the boundaries of the Sunset Park Historic District by 1900. The first decade of the twentieth century witnessed a tremendous building boom in Sunset Park as hundreds of new row houses and apartment buildings, most built of brick, were erected. One commentator noted in 1906 that "while the great bulk of the property of South Brooklyn consisted only a few years ago of pasture lands and truck farms, it is now changing into a rapidly growing city." Four years later a Brooklyn Daily Eagle writer exclaimed that the South Brooklyn area was "upbuilding with a rapidity astounding even to its most enthusiastic friends." 11

The substantial increase in development activity in Sunset Park during the first decade of the twentieth century can be attributed to the planning and construction of a subway line along Fourth Avenue. Construction of this route was formally announced in 1905. The Fourth Avenue subway was planned to connect South Brooklyn with Downtown Brooklyn and, via the new Manhattan Bridge, with Manhattan. By 1908, the Real Estate Record and Builders Guide had noted the effect that subway construction was having on development in Sunset Park:

All along the line of the railroads there are plainly visible the result of the advertising of the contracts for the construction of the 4th av [sic] subway. Row upon row of houses—and block after block of stores and flat property—all either well under way in construction or cellars dug and foundations being reared. 12

After many delays, the subway line was completed in 1915.

The construction of new homes in Sunset Park was apparently so profitable that hundreds of large and small developers became active in the area. Many of the developers were either local residents or were professional developers with offices in the area. Most of the developers were only responsible for a small number of houses, but a few erected over one hundred buildings each. By the time that Sunset Park was built up, local laws mandated that an architect be involved with the design of all buildings. The architects who were most active in Sunset Park were all men who worked almost exclusively in Brooklyn. Many were residents of Sunset Park or had established offices in the neighborhood. None of these architects was in the forefront of his profession; most had probably been trained as builders.

By far the most active architect in the historic district (and the only architect about whom any information is available) was Thomas Bennett. An entry in the 1906 South Brooklyn issue of the American Journal of Commerce contains an entry on Bennett. The short entry with portrait was probably a promotional piece for which Bennett paid a fee. 13 It notes that he was "among the prominent architects to whose talent the city [of Brooklyn] owes much." The article reports that by 1906, Bennett had been an architect for twenty years and had been responsible for the design of apartment houses, two-story and basement dwellings, cottages, factories, public halls, etc. Within the boundaries of the district, over 600 buildings designed by Bennett have been identified. Bennett lived within the historic district at 435 55th Street, ironically, in a house that he had not designed. Also extremely active were Henry Pohlmann, Henry Spicer, William Kay, and Eisenla & Carlson. These architects did not work exclusively in Sunset Park, but followed development patterns in Brooklyn, working wherever speculative builders were active. Eisenla & Carlson, for example, were responsible for several very fine rows in the southern part of the Park Slope Historic District.

Although architects such as Bennett, Pohlmann, and the others were responsible for large numbers of buildings in the historic district it is impossible to assign a particular style to any individual architect. The buildings attributed to these and other architects all display a similar architectural vocabulary. One of the attributes that gives the Sunset Park Historic District its cohesive character is the repetition of a limited number of architectural forms throughout the district. It is unclear just how much of the facade design and detail can be attributed to the architects, but a careful examination of the rows within the historic district leads to the conclusion that the architects probably had very little to do with facade design. They were probably responsible for the layout of interior space, and for structural work, but not for the specific design. This is clearly seen when examining groups of identical houses that are unquestionably a single row, but which Brooklyn Buildings Department data record as the work of more than one architect. The most dramatic example of this is the unique row of thirty, one-family row houses at 513-571 55th Street. Built in 1897, this entire blockfront has a unified, rhythmically designed street frontage that is unlike any other row in the historic district. The row was erected by the Southeast Building Company in 1897, but two different architects were involved. The ten houses at 513-31 were the work of Mackenzie Schiff, who did other work for the company within the district; the remaining twenty buildings are ascribed to David King. Another telling example is the row of twenty brownstone houses at 412-59 58th Street. Erected between 1896 and 1900 in groups of five by three different architects for two different owners. the houses are all built to the exact same design. It remains unclear who actually designed the buildings.

Throughout the historic district are similar examples of brick rows of identical design, attributed to a variety of architects. Evidence of how these buildings might have been designed is found in the Brooklyn Buildings Department file for 662 50th Street. In 1902 Emil Brenner commissioned a design for a house on this site from the firm of Pohlmann & Patrick. Pohlmann & Patrick submitted blueprints for a brick house with a rounded bay, but the house was never built. Two years later, Brenner commissioned Thomas Bennett to design a house on the site. Bennett resubmitted Pohlmann & Patrick's drawings to the Buildings Department, simply removing the other architect's name from the blueprints. The design of this house is not an unusual one; it is typical of hundreds of two-story brick buildings with rounded bays that were erected throughout the historic district.

Most of the row houses in the historic district are, it appears, a turn-of-the-century extension of the builder tradition in Brooklyn. Earlier in the nineteenth century almost all of Brooklyn's row houses had been put up by builders without the assistance of architects. Historic districts such as those in Cobble Hill, Fort Greene, and Clinton Hill (all NR listed) contain impressive rows of these homes. Frequently, identical homes within these older historic districts were erected by different builders. In the last decades of the nineteenth century, as architects began to proliferate in Brooklyn, row houses planned for sale to the upper middle class were individually designed by well trained architects. The Sunset Park homes were not aimed at this audience, but were erected for a group of less wealthy people who had not previously been able to afford to buy individual homes. They were erected by builder/architects who used and reused popular and marketable house designs.

The homes in Sunset Park were erected for people of moderate means who, in earlier decades, would probably have been unable to afford to live in a private house. As has been noted, the majority of buildings in the historic district are row houses. Ever since Brooklyn had begun to develop as an urban center in the 1820s, the vast majority of new residences were row houses, almost all built by speculators. These were almost exclusively built as single family homes. They ranged in size from narrow two—story and basement structures to grander three and four story and basement buildings. These row houses were almost all sold to middle—class people of varying economic status. At the turn of the century, at just the time that Sunset Park was being built up, row houses began to lose favor with affluent people. These people began to move into freestanding suburban homes, such as those in the Prospect Park South and Ditmas Park historic districts (NR listed). The Real Estate Record and Builders Guide remarked, in 1905, that "a remarkable movement towards the suburbs is observable. Thousands of families are taking advantage of the first good opportunity in their experience to obtain a separate residence." 14

Ironically, it was amidst this exodus of the middle-class from Brooklyn's older row house neighborhoods, that the row houses of Sunset Park were erected. The reason for the success of the Sunset Park development is that the new buildings in this neighborhood were, in general, not planned for affluent middle-class people, but were designed to attract people of moderate means who could not afford to live in either a large single-family row house or in one of the new suburban neighborhoods. The Brooklyn Daily Eagle was aware of Sunset Park's unusual character when it wrote in 1910 that:

Greater South Brooklyn is apparently to have a residential character peculiar to itself....There is every indication that the two-story, two-family dwelling houses will predominate....The general tendency seems to be to develop Greater South Brooklyn in such a way that families possessed of moderate incomes may there establish themselves...under conditions which will not put too heavy a strain on the purse. ¹⁵

The most interesting feature of the Sunset Park row house type is the fact that almost every one of these buildings was designed to be a two-family dwelling. From the exterior, it is impossible to tell that these are twofamily homes since they were designed to look exactly like contemporary onefamily row houses. Two-family row houses began to appear in large numbers in Brooklyn during the 1890s. Sunset Park has the largest concentration of these buildings, but extensive groups were also erected in such neighborhoods as Crown Heights and in the Prospect Lefferts Gardens area of northern Flatbush, both of which developed at the same time as Sunset Park. The two-family dwelling attracted families who could not afford a full house, but wished to live in what appeared to be a private home. In Sunset Park, such a family could live behind the facade of a traditional row house, while only actually occupying a portion of the building. Almost all of the houses within the historic district were sold by their speculator builders to people of moderate income. Most moved into one apartment and rented the second one for extra income. It is only after one enters these row houses that it is evident that they house more than one family. Some of the houses were apparently adapted for use as single-family homes. These often housed a single extended family.

The plan of the two-family row house is quite interesting. Two different floor plans were popular in Sunset Park. The least expensive row houses in the neighborhood are two story structures with a single apartment on each floor. An example of this type is 539 57th Street built in 1904. As is typical of New York's row houses, the front door of this building, and almost all others in Sunset Park, is reached via a stoop. After passing through a small vestibule, one reaches a hall. From the hall, one gains entrance to the first floor apartment, while a flight of stairs leads to the upper apartment. The lower unit contains a parlor in front and a dining room and kitchen to the Between them are two other rooms. At 539 57th Street, both are referred to as bedrooms, although the front bedroom could be combined with the parlor to create a larger room for entertaining. At other houses of this type, such as 622 58th Street also dating from 1904, the plan refers to the front inner room as a back parlor. The upper apartment is identical except that it contains a tiny third bedroom located above the entrance vestibule and part of the hall.

The more substantial houses in the historic district are two stories with a full raised basement. These buildings contain a duplex unit on the first floor and basement and a floor—through apartment on the second floor. In buildings such as 414 57th Street of 1900, the first floor contains the public hall giving access to both apartments, as well as a front parlor, sitting room, back parlor, bedroom and bathroom. The back parlor could easily have been used as a second bedroom. The dining room and kitchen were in the basement. The plan of the second floor apartment resembles that of the house described above.

Most of the Sunset Park row houses were extremely crowded by modern standards. The 1910 census records indicate that these small two-family homes often housed ten or more people. Some people took in boarders; very few had live-in servants. The early residents of the Sunset Park houses were an ethnically mixed group. The census shows that the majority of residents were American born, but that large numbers were of Irish, English, Scottish, English/Canadian, or Norwegian birth or descent with smaller numbers from Holland, Denmark, Germany, Austria, and Sweden. Almost all were working people. Many of the residents were involved with jobs related to the waterfront. At the turn of the century the Sunset Park shoreline became heavily developed as freight piers were erected, Bush Terminal opened, and factories were built. Many people who worked in the commercial and industrial area west of Third Avenue moved into the new, conveniently located Sunset Park homes.

Besides the large number of two-family homes, the district includes a few one-family residences and a large number of multiple dwellings. The most notable row of one-family houses is the Southeast Building Company's unusual blockfront on the north side of 55th Street between Fifth and Sixth avenues. These thirty, three-story neo-Renaissance style homes with their continuous cornice line and rhythmically placed oriels were erected in 1897. The district also contains a single-family home designed by one of New York City's leading turn-of-the-century architectural firms. This large house, located at 404 55th Street at the corner of Fourth Avenue, was designed by Harde & Short. The firm of Harde & Short is best known for its grand apartment houses, such as the Studio on West 77th Street, the Alwyn Court on Seventh Avenue and West 58th Street, and 45 East 66th Street at Madison Avenue (all NR listed). Unlike the apartment buildings, which were designed in an ornate late French Gothic/Early Renaissance style, the Sunset Park house is a simple well proportioned neo-Renaissance style structure.

The district contains a substantial number of multiple dwellings. These buildings were erected at the same time as the row houses and the same architects and builders were involved with their construction. The multiple dwellings range from three-story, three-family homes with plans not unlike those of the two-story, two-family homes, to large four and five story buildings. Most of the larger buildings have two apartments per floor, arranged either as railroad flats or with front and back units. The most stylish group of tenements in the historic district is located at 442-68 and 443-71 40th Street. These unusual Beaux-Arts inspired brick buildings with limestone trim and pedimented entrances were designed by Eisenla & Carlson and built in 1912-13.

The most interesting apartment houses in the historic district are those erected by Finnish immigrants as non-profit cooperatives. Finns began arriving in the New York area in the 1890s and many settled in the relatively undeveloped area to the north and east of the newly established Sunset Park. By the early years of the twentieth century, as increasing numbers of Finns were attracted to the Sunset Park neighborhood, a critical housing shortage developed. To solve this problem, families banded together and erected apartment buildings that were to be owned cooperatively. The first of these Alku I (Alku means "beginnings"), located at 816 43rd Street, outside of the historic district, was begun in 1916. Alku I was followed by several other cooperatives, including those built by the Sunset Home Association at 4015-21 Seventh Avenue and the buildings at 4001 Seventh Avenue and 673-83 41st In addition to the apartment houses built specifically as cooperatives, Finns also purchased already built traditional apartment houses and converted them into cooperatives. Examples of these are the four buildings on the south side of Sunset Park at 566-74 44th Street and 4404 Sixth Avenue designed by Eisenla & Carlson in 1913-14.

Several of the cooperatives erected by the Finns were planned in the most progressive manner with careful attention given to the issues of light, air, and privacy. Most of the coops have large light-filled open courts reached through an entryway along the street. These cooperatives were the first examples in New York City of the non-profit cooperative. In a non-profit coop, the cooperative society holds title to the building and individuals subscribe to shares. Cooperators hold a perpetual lease on their apartment. When a cooperator moves, the society buys back the shares at the same price as originally paid and the lease is cancelled. No profit is made, thus ensuring that the apartment will continue to be affordable to a working family. of the Finnish cooperatives are still in operation, although they no longer exclusively house people of Finnish ancestry.

In addition to the wholely residential buildings, the Sunset Park Historic District contains a large number of commercial structures or mixed use commercial buildings with residential units on the upper floors. Almost all of the buildings on Fifth Avenue have commercial ground floors. The earliest buildings on Fifth Avenue are located at the southern end of the district. These are the six Romanesque Revival style stores with apartments above at 3882-88 Fifth Avenue. Some of the Fifth Avenue commercial buildings were erected as individual structures, but most were built in groups, some of which encompass an entire blockfront. Examples of architecturally unified blockfronts of mixed-use commercial/residential buildings can be seen on the east side of the avenue between 48th and 49th streets (Nos. 4801-25: Henry Pohlmann, 1905), the west side between 49th and 50th streets (Nos. 2902-22; Thomas Bennett, 1898), and the east side between 54th and 55th streets (Nos. 5401-23; Henry Pohlmann, 1906). The most distinguished group of buildings on Fifth Avenue is located on the west side between 54th and 55th streets--Nos. 5404-20 designed in 1897 by William H. Abbott, Jr. These handsome three-story neo-Renaissance style buildings have projecting angled galvanized-iron bays and unusual metal window lintels.

Fourth Avenue contains a mix of buildings erected entirely as apartment houses and buildings with commercial ground floors. Sixth Avenue has fewer commercial buildings, although some of the corner apartment houses have ground floor shops. Most of the storefronts within the historic district have been modernized, although a few still have original features visible, particularly the original cast-iron piers that supported the upper floors. On other buildings, original storefronts have probably simply been covered with modern materials. Relatively intact storefronts or storefronts with some original features can still be seen, for example, at 4423, 5423, and 5717 Fourth Avenue, and at 3886, 3917 and 3919 Fifth Avenue. Above the storefronts. the integrity of these buildings remains high. Many of the corner buildings have original one-story commercial extensions, most with modest projecting iron cornices. Perhaps the most prominent commercial building in the historic district is the imposing Classical Revival style limestone bank erected by the Bay Ridge Savings Bank on the northeast corner of Fifth Avenue and 54th Street in 1926.

The vast majority of the contributing residential and mixed use residential/commercial buildings in the Sunset Park Historic District are masonry structures faced either with brick or stone. The use of these materials on the facades of the Sunset Park buildings is quite interesting. Continuation sheet

Most of the stone houses are faced with brownstone. The Sunset Park houses represent a fairly late example of the use of brownstone since, by the time these houses were built, limestone and brick had generally replaced brownstone in the work of Manhattan and Brooklyn's most prominent architects. It is probable that the Sunset Park builders were consciously trying to evoke the image of Brooklyn's prosperous older brownstone neighborhoods. Among the most handsome rows of brownstone homes are those on 56th Street between Fourth and Fifth avenues. There are also a few limestone rows in the historic district, notably the row of twenty houses at 514-560 44th Street designed in 1908 by Thomas Bennett. A particularly interesting feature of several of the stone rows in the historic district is that they are not faced with a single variety of stone, but include houses faced with limestone and brownstones of several hues. An excellent example of a row of houses with facades of various stones interspersed throughout is located at 514-570 47th Street (Thomas Bennett, 1897-99).

Most of the buildings in the Sunset Park Historic District have brick facades. These buildings are unusual in the mix of colors and textures found on the brick. The bricks used on the Sunset Park buildings vary in color, with rows of houses and commercial structures faced with brick of yellow, beige, gold, red, and other hues. Iron spot bricks are extremely common; houses faced with Roman brick are scattered through the historic district. A particularly unusual brick feature found in the historic district is the use of rough-textured bricks. These appear on entire facades, on basements, or as trim on a number of rows. Rough bricks are used, for example on many of Henry Pohlmann's houses on 53rd Street between Fifth and Sixth avenues.

As Brooklyn's residential neighborhoods were being developed, institutions were founded that catered to the new residents social, educational, and spiritual needs. This was as true in Sunset Park as in Brooklyn's older neighborhoods. In the last years of the nineteenth century and the first decades of the twentieth century a substantial number of religious institutions erected handsome buildings in Sunset Park. Within the boundaries of the historic district are eight contributing churches, all of which are located on the avenues. The oldest church in the historic district is St. Andrew's Episcopal Church at 4917 Fourth Avenue, designed in 1893 by the firm of L.B. Valk & Son. The simple Romanesque Revival style brick church with brownstone trim was originally to be the chapel for a much larger building that was planned for the corner of Fourth Avenue and 50th Street. The church, which was to be a larger version of the chapel, was never built.

Five of the eight churches in the historic district were designed in the neo-Gothic style. Trinity Norwegian Lutheran Church at 4515 Fourth Avenue is one of the few buildings in the historic district designed by a prominent Manhattan architectural firm. The brick church was designed in 1911 by Foster, Gade & Graham, a firm best known for its substantial turn-of-the-century Manhattan townhouses. The original home of the English Evangelical Lutheran Church of the Incarnation at 5317 Fourth Avenue is a neo-Gothic style brick building with terra-cotta trim. This building was designed in 1907 by Bannister & Schell, a firm that specialized in the design of Lutheran churches. In 1927-28, a large new neo-Gothic style sanctuary was erected immediately adjacent to the original church building. Also on Fourth Avenue is architect Carl L. Otto's extremely fine Zion Norwegian Lutheran Church. This brick and terra cotta, Italian Renaissance inspired basilican church was built in 1919-20. A terra-cotta bas relief of the Good Shepherd, located over the front entrance, was designed by Trygve Hammer and was installed in 1928.

By far the largest institutional building in the historic district, and also the largest church is Brooklyn, is Our Lady of Perpetual Help Roman Catholic Church on Fifth Avenue between 59th and 60th streets. In 1892, the Roman Catholic diocese purchased the block bounded by Fifth and Sixth avenues and 59th and 60th streets. A small church was opened in 1894. This was followed by the construction of a school in 1903 (see below) and rectory in 1910. Also in 1910, the basement of the new church was built and opened for services. It was not until 1925 that the main sanctuary was begun. Completed in 1928, the church is a grand neo-Romanesque style structure of stone with Guastavino vaults on the interior. The presence of such an enormous Catholic church in Sunset Park is indicative of the large Catholic population (primarily Irish) that lived in the vicinity.

Besides churches, the historic district contains three notable schools. St. Alphonsus School is housed in a distinguished late Victorian Gothic style buildings located on Sixth Avenue, behind Our Lady of Perpetual Help Church. Built in 1902-03, the school is faced with red brick trimmed with beige and black brick bands. The two city schools in the district are P.S. 94 on Sixth Avenue between 50th and 51st streets, a Beaux Arts style brick building with limestone and terra-cotta trim designed by New York City school architect C.B.J. Snyder in 1906, and P.S. 169 on Seventh Avenue between 43rd and 44th streets, a neo-Gothic style building probably designed by Snyder in the 1910s.

Besides P.S. 94, the historic district contains three other especially notable civic structures. At 5209 Fifth Avenue is a small two-story neo-Renaissance style firehouse built by the city of Brooklyn in the 1890s. In 1930, an imposing Classical Revival style courthouse was erected on Fourth Avenue between 42nd and 43rd streets. This extremely fine structure now houses several community organizations. During the 1930s, several play centers and swimming pools were erected in New York City's parks, under the auspices of the Works Progress Administration. These Art Deco style buildings were designed by Aymar Embury. The Sunset Play Center, in Sunset Park, with its round central pavilion, is among the finest of these buildings. This structure is the outstanding element of Sunset Park, a city park that has been relandscaped many times since it was laid out in the 1890s. The park rises along the slope of the land and has spectacular views over the historic district to Lower Manhattan and New York's harbor. It contains lawns, paths, benches, playing fields, a comfort station, a flagpole, and extremely fine late nineteenth-century stone walls.

The Sunset Park Historic District retains much of its late nineteenth and early twentieth century ambience. The masonry residential buildings retain their integrity to a particularly high degree, with alterations of only the most minor variety. The frame houses have undergone more extensive alterations and many of the shopfronts have been modernized, but these do not detract from the historic districts special character.

Dear Mr. Lehman:

The according of landmark status to the area would further improve the area's image and preserve the stability of its primarily middle-class, working residents, the moral fiber of this city, state and nation. Such status would clearly benefit New York and instill pride in its citizens, while helping maintain the unique neighborhood atmosphere of the area, for which New York is famous.

I urge you to support Sunset Park's attempt to acquire landmark status and ask your assistance in expediting this tremendous effort.

Dear Commissioner Lehman,

I am the Assemblyman for Sunset Park and I am writing in support of the proposal to designate portions of Sunset Park as a Historic District.

Sunset Park was selected by the Historic Preservation staff because it has a fine example of two and three family brownstone and brick row houses built between 1890 and 1915. The community was built primarily for low and middle income families and remains so today. Sunset Park is a multi ethnic community with a rich cultural composition.

Sunset Park is a community deserving landmark status and I urge you to give it your full consideration.

I would like to take this opportunity to express my support for the proposed Historic District designation of portions of Sunset Park.

The Sunset Park Community has been selected by the Historic Preservation staff, because of its fine example of two and three family brownstones and brick row houses built at the turn of the century, primarily for middle and low income families. Because of affordable housing, the community has remained a multi-ethnic neighborhood.

The working middle class housing units, are features, which I believe, should remain for future generations. Hoping you will support the communities endeavors in this matter, I remain,

Dear Commissioner Lehman:

I am writing this letter in support of the proposed designation of portions of Sunset Park, Brooklyn, New York as a Historic District.

This community was selected by the Historic Preservation staff because it offers a fine example of splendid two and three family brownstones and brick row houses which were built from 1890-1915.

I understand the boundaries are from 39th Street to 60th Street and 4th Avenue to 6th Avenue; however, I would like to suggest that the boundaries be expanded to include 37th Street between 4th and 5th Avenue be included because of the historic 17th century Spanish blue cobblestones on this street.

I strongly support designation of portions of Sunset Park as a Historic district.

Orin Lehman, Commissioner

Agency Building 1-20th Floor
Empire State Plaza
Albany, New York 12238

Dear Mr. Lehman:

I write to express my wholehearted support for State and National Historic District designation for a large section of my Brooklyn neighborhood, Sunset Park. I am on the Board of Directors of several neighborhood organizations: Sunset Park Restoration Committee, the Sunset Park School of Music, and Marien-Heim of Sunset Park (the senior citizen complex). I care deeply about the neighborhood and its future and know that Historic District designation can only benefit the neighborhood and its residents by helping to preserve the century-old private homes and business properties in \Sunset Park. Even though the private homeowner has vast discretion as to what he can do to his own property, Historic District designation will set the right tone for the neighborhood, encouraging appropriate and sensitive restoration and renovation of its buildings. And the historic perspective provided by such designation should instill a solid sense of pride and, in the long run, improve the quality of life for all who live or work in Sunset Park.

I knew, when I bought my house (417 52nd Street) in 1981, that the Sunset Park Restoration Committee was seeking landmark designation for the neighborhood, and that fact, plus the convenience and natural beauties of the neighborhood, its buildings and major park, were what attracted me to Sunset Park. I have been very happy here and have been pleased in the intervening years to see the neighborhood improve, physically, culturally, and educationally.

The Sunset Park Restoration Committee has worked long and hard to bring about Historic District designation which, hopefully, will soon become a reality. I have only one suggestion: please review, for future addition as contributing structures, a number of frame houses within the Sunset Park district.

My house (417 52nd Street) is one of the frame buildings which have been excluded, largely since it is on an all-frame end of the 400 block of 52nd Street. However, my block has a peaceful, tree-lined, well-tended air to it, which I have grown to love and appreciate. My house itself is a beauty. It is older than most Sunset Park brownstones, limestones and brick houses (it dates from 1891), has all of the original wood cornice-work, plus the original wood and cast-iron porch roof and cast-iron stoop railing, plus a lovely iron front fence. It is bay-windowed, with the original colored-glass inserts atop the parlour-floor windows. The only alteration in the past 97 years was the post-war addition of brown brick-look siding on the front of the house. Because of that siding, many people think my house is brick, not frame. Inside, there are two skylights, an etched glass front door, tin ceilings, parquet floors and lovely woodwork and mouldings throughout. Structurally, the house is amazing in its solidity. In short, I set out seven years ago to buy a brownstone and found greater treasures and beauty in my almost 100-year-old frame house.

Inclusion of such frame structures as contributing buildings might actually have a more visible, immediate preservationist impact on the Sunset Park neighborhood than would inclusion of many of the brownstone, limestone and brick buildings. Such inclusion would encourage owners of frame buildings to remove the old siding and either restore the old clapboards or do an historically sensitive new siding job (there is a fine such example across the street from me, at approximately 434 52nd Street), repaint and restore the cornices and replace the old stoops. So please give additional attention to the frame buildings.

I heartily endorse designation of the Sunset Park Historic District.

Sincerely,
