Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The William Ferguson Farm contains a variety of interesting structures. There is a main house, a residence made from the former carriage house and granery, and a tenant house. A massive barnyard wall still remains, as do the ruins of an early house.

The main house was built in two sections, the first around 1741, the second around 1830. There is also a small extension to the rear. The earlier section, measuring 46 feet by 35 feet and facing southwest, is a 2½ story structure, 6 bays wide by 2 bays, in the Georgian style of architecture. Constructed of rubble coursed fieldstone with quoins, it has been stuccoed in some areas. The gable roof, covered by asphalt shingles, has a boxed cornice. An interior double-wide brick chimney with a corbeled cap is found in the eastern gable; an interior plain brick chimney is found in the roof's southern slope near the western edge. Almost all the windows on the first and second floors are double hung sash and are 6 over 6 lights. The smaller attic windows in the gables are 3 over 6. The main entrance currently has a recessed panelled door; very simple trim surrounds the sidelights and multi-paned transom. A bulky transom bar extends over the sidelights. The bottom 2/5 of the sidelights have recessed panelling to match the main door instead of glass. A one-story porch in front of the house was probably added in the late 1800's. It covers the center four bays and measures 8 feet by 27 feet. The supports for the shed roof are squared wooden pillars with recessed panels.

The rear extension measures 23 feet by 21 feet. The same architectural style of the main section is used with the exception of a shed roof. The western elevation is 2½ stories high, and the eastern elevation is 2 stories high. The interior brick chimney has brick corbeling. The basic purpose of the extension was to house servants and fieldhands.

The only other addition is a small one-story frame extension with a shed roof. Measuring 7 feet by 17 feet, the narrow side is attached to the northern elevation of the main house, while the longer side is attached to the eastern elevation of the extension.

The current residence was converted in 1957 from a carriage house and granery. The eastern half was the carriage house. Constructed of heavily mortared rubble coursed fieldstone, it is one story high. The medium-pitched gable roof is covered with asphalt shingles and has a plain cornice. A central interior square chimney has an extended covered flue. Windows are six light casement and are flanked by panelled shutters.

The western half of the structure was the granery. It is two stories high; the first story is stuccoed while the second story has horizontal siding. The windows, doors, roof and cornice are the same as the other half of the structure.

The stuccoed stone tenant house has characteristics of both the Georgian and Federal periods of architecture. The details of the windows are features of the Georgian period, while the smooth facade and placement of windows are reminiscent of the Federal period.

The main house is 2½ stories high and is 2 bays long and 2 bays wide. The medium pitched, tin-covered gable roof has an interior plain chimney. Windows are double hung sash, 6 over 6 lights, and have panelled shutters on both floors of the front facade. Trim is plain, the final touch of this section is the picket fence in front of the building.

A two story extension to the rear is also stone and has features similar to the main house. The stone is exposed rather than entirely stuccoed.

Remaining structures include evidence of an earlier barn and house. An imposing rubble coursed barnyard wall now encloses a swimming pool. This wall is supported by enormous buttresses. The second remnant of the ruin is the only remaining conical column support from the forebay of the barn. The final remnant is the 2 story storage building built on the barn ruins.

The fieldstone ruin has deteriorated, recessed mortar, rubble coursed walls. A few of the wooden pegged window frames have survived. It seems to have been an early residence, because the size is too large for even a 2 story spring house and too small for any type of mill. The window openings also warrant it being an early residence. The construction date of about 1730 is an educated historical conclusion based on past research experience in this geographical area. Descendants of William Penn wanted to maintain the area as Springton Manor until 1750. They were successful in removing some of the original settlers. Since the Ferguson family did not arrive until 1741, it is probable that the ruins are remains of a first family settlement removed by the Penn proprietors.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The William Ferguson Farm has seen a great variety of events and housed various owners of national religious and local political historical significance. A later owner, Edward Hunter, was one of the founders of the Church of the Latter Day Saints. Another owner, John Cornog, was quite influential in local affairs. The architecturally significant ruins date from an even earlier period than that of William Derguson. The structures now on the Farm are also good examples of an early agricultural settlement.

The earliest settlers of the area were probably Eupopean squatters living on land owned by the descendents of William Penn. These descendents wanted to maintain the land as Springton Manor until 1750. The ruins are probably the remains of one of these early settlers who was removed by the Penn proprietors.

The farmhouse and tenant house are good examples of early architectural styles. William Ferguson, the first owner, had a prosperous farm. In the Chester County tax lists he is reported to have 50 acres in 1769; this increased dramatically to 210 acres in 1771.

People from throughout the country make pilgrimages to this farm because it was the home of Edward Hunter, one of the founders of the Church of the Latter Day Saints. Mr. Hunter purchased the farm in 1827. He built a school house called West Nantmeal Saminary, on his property, which was open to all sects for worship on Sunday.

Later Mr. Hunter heard about a new sect, the Mormons, who were worshiping in the southern part of the county, and he got in contact with them. Joseph Smith, the leader of the Mormons, held services at the Seminary after 1839, and Mr. Hunter opened his home to all Mormons. Financial contributions were made by Hunter to the development of the Mormon church.

Edward Hunter was a great influence in the community and had many followers. To this day, the area surrounding the farm is called Mormon Hollow. After Hunter permantly left the area, he became a High Priest in the church, and then a Presiding Bishop on April 7, 1851. Today, the "William Ferguson Farm" is considered worthy of a shrine by the Church of the Latter Day Saints.

A later owner of the farmstead was John Cornog, a local political leader. West Nantmeal Township was a large township which needed to be divided for more efficient administration. Cornog led the protest not to separate the area into two different political subdivisions, a feud that eventually involved the state legislature.

Cornog was also involved in the construction of the East Brandywine and Waynesburg Railroad. The company was incorporated by an act of the Pennsylvania legislature on April 29, 1854. Farmers along the proposed route objected to the creation of the railroad, feeling that it would spoil their land. Gradually, subscription of $97,000.00 were received, and Cornog was elected president of the company on May 9, 1860. The railroad was completed August 28, 1861. The track went through Cornog's land. One of the ten stations between Downingtown and Honey Brook was known as Cornog, and still is known as that today.

The farm has been host to a number of early settlers and prominent personage. It has significance in the areas of architecture, exploration & settlement, politics & government and particularly religion.

William Ferguson Farm
Justification of Boundary

The proposed parcel contains the largest concentration and most significant collection of structures from the original farm of several hundred acres. These twenty-two acres from the original tract have remained associated with the historical significance of the William Ferguson family in the eighteenth century. The acreage has also been in continuous agricultural use since its patent which was granted by the William Penn heirs.

Cartographically, the perimeter of the application warrants the current size, in order to have all structures within the boundaries. Finally, the visual impact of the structures within the prescribed area is continuous.

4. DETAILS OF DISCUSSION

Confirmed boundary justification received 3/28/80. Jane indicated that certain features (ruin, etc.) ~~are~~ described in nomination as contributing are located in the upper NW corner of the $\frac{1}{4}$ square delineated by the boundary. — That is, the area where there is nothing indicated on the USGS map. Jane indicated there is no excess land included — that the area delineated is only that area necessary to encompass all features of the farm complex.
