NARRATIVE DESCRIPTION

The Primera Iglesia Bautista de Caguas (Caguas' First Baptist Church) is a concrete building at the corner of Ruiz Belvis and Intendente Ramírez Streets, in the town of Caguas (Fig 1). Caguas' First Baptist Church has a rectangular plan (approximately 30 feet wide by 118 feet long) with paired side towers; one polygonal shape and a smaller square, both of different heights. It stands out from its urban context by the Romanesque Revival features, such as gabled roofs with eaves, buttresses, semi-circular arches, belt courses, compound arch windows, recessed fenestrations and a compressed portico.¹ It was planned and constructed between 1907- 1909.² In 1930's the church building was expanded to provide classrooms for the parish school and library. In 1996, Caguas' First Baptist Church was rehabilitated to be used as a museum and musical center - known as Centro Musical José Ignacio Quintón.

Fig. 1 Location plan

The rectangular plan of the building shows a tripartite division (narthex, nave and bema) stated along the transversal axis. The narthex or lobby is characterized by a central arch, a character defining features of the church. It is higher and wider than the side arches (Figs. 2 and 3). This space allows for a transition between exterior and the interior nave. To each side of the narthex space, smaller arches delineate the bell tower and a secondary space. The main tower or bell tower is located in the interior West corner of the church. There are no stairs to this bell tower. The space is enclosed with tongue and groove wood planks (3/4"x 6" wide planks with continuous groove along center line). There is an opening in the ceiling, which was probably used to pull the bell's rope. (Fig.4) The secondary space is located in the East corner of the church. It was reconstructed with new gypsum board arches. Apparently, at a given point in time there was the need to accommodate

¹ Many of these characteristics coincide with the fact that points the Romanesque as the style preferred by the Protestant Church in the United States at the end of the nineteenth century. The protestant movement perceived a modest and conservative character in this style when compared to the gothic. Robert Dale Owen. more wood benches within the church and the original arches were demolished.³ These were rehabilitated according to the original pictures from the 1930's - 1940's that served as historical evidence, and traces that remained in the building. (Fig. 2)

The bema design's is stress by a central arched opening flanked by semicircular pilasters and moldings. (Fig.5) During the rehabilitation, these were repaired, as well as, the stone moldings around the door openings at both sides of the arch (reconstructed according to historical evidence). A baptismary by immersion was located in front of this main arch. With the 1930's building expansion it was re-localized behind the main arch. The front area was covered and used as an altar. The baptismary has been adapted as a water fountain 18 inches deep.

Caguas' First Baptist Church has a gabled, wood roof made of a plank and beam structure. It was covered with galvanized zinc. The rehabilitation project proposed galvanized steel instead of zinc supported by two arched wood trusses (Figs. 6 and 7). These wood trusses add character and proportion to the principal nave space. During the rehabilitation, the wood deteriorated components of the roof were substituted and painted as needed. To comply with seismic and hurricane codes additional steel members were installed, not altering the original geometry of the roof structure. The building's floor was made of polished concrete with joints imitating tiles. Due to severe deterioration, it was substituted by hydraulic cement tiles (similar in color and size).

The building's entrance, located at the main façade to the South, is defined by a portico, a double paneled door, a gabled roof that rests over short massive columns supported by hammer braces (Fig. 8). The roof structure of the portico is made out of wood planks. It had a tin roof covering the Spanish tiles. The proposed rehabilitation substituted only the deteriorated Spanish tiles.

The gable that defines the building's main façade is embellished by a large rose window made out of stained glass. The stained glass pattern is geometric and polychromatic; restored by artist Claudio Solano. A similar rose window was present over the main arch that marked the bema. This element had been filled with concrete blocks. The rehabilitation proposed the reconstruction of this element. Two towers of different heights are the main façade's attractiveness. A main tower or bell tower shape is located at the Southwest corner of this façade (Fig. 9). Its plan shape is octagonal. It has a long rectangular recess fenestration with a stained glass window in it, which has been restored by artist Claudio Solano. The bells are no longer in the tower - the former owner of the building is still in possession of them - and the access to the interior of the tower has been closed. The tower has recessed door openings with balconies at the two elevations that face the street. It has an eight skirts roof covered with Spanish tiles stressed by a belt course.

A smaller tower rises at the Southeast corner of the main façade. It is a watchtower with a square shape and a Spanish tile covered roof. The main façade has a compound arch window to the Southwest, and a single arch window to the Southeast. Both windows are topped by a fanlight and a water table. The compound arch window is protected by a prominent eave that extends to the portico supported by hammer braces. Spanish tiles also cover the eave.

Buttresses on the East wall, have been blocked with the construction of the neighbor's property. The main roof extends over the buttresses completely blocking them. Buttresses characterized the lateral West façade (Fig. 10). The original concrete walls and buttresses were consolidated, patched and repaired with epoxy wherever dowels were exposed.

Before rehabilitation, when the building became a commercial facility, the original historic openings were sealed with concrete blocks. Photographic evidence shows three bays lattice wood windows, with transom over them, on the lateral façades of the church. These features were recovered as part of the rehabilitation using photographic evidence. The windows at the Intendente Ramirez Street were reconstructed and those at the opposite side remain close with a gesture that denotes their prior existence. In 2008, due to deterioration, all wood windows were replaced with metal windows. The new metal windows resembled the old wooden windows.

In 1930's Annex included the construction of two levels made of concrete. A lateral entrance, to the West, provides access to the facilities and interior communication with the original church. The second floor lost its wooden roof and floor. This level was very deteriorated and had partially collapsed. The new roof was constructed in a lightweight concrete metal deck. To the east, there is an exterior lateral patio, which provides access to the second floor thru an exterior concrete stair.

This section of building was partitioned in various offices, meeting and rehearsal rooms. The floor of the first level is raised 3 feet, partially covered with patterned hydraulic cement tiles locally known as losa nativa and polished concrete with joints imitating tiles. Floor deterioration was beyond repairs. It was necessary selective substitution of the losa nativa and replacement of the hydraulic cement tiles (similar in color and size). The floor of the second level was made of wood and it was reconstructed with Mahogany - flooring board over plywood using steel joists to support it.

The rehabilitation project proposed several measurements to guarantee structural stability. New mechanical and electrical systems were placed over concrete pads, with no visual impact over the Church building.

The building is in excellent conditions and retains its integrity. Caguas' First Baptist Church is a beautiful example of Romanesque Revival architecture. The character defining features of this building are the main entrance portico, the two towers of different heights, the gabled, wood roof, two arched wood trusses and the narthex central main and smaller arches. The 1996 rehabilitation project permitted the conservation of all these features. Stabilization, repairs, detailed on site recycling and replacement of parts were the main focus of the project. In fact, the project was submitted for review and comments by the Puerto Rico State Historic Preservation Office; it complied with the Secretary of the Interior's Standards for Rehabilitation.

NARRATIVE STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Primera Iglesia Bautista de Caguas (Caguas' First Baptist Church), built by 1909, is locally significant under Criterion C in the area of architecture as the property represents the only example of early Twentieth Century Romanesque Revival style in the Municipality of Caguas. As one of the first (if not the first) buildings constructed with reinforced concrete in the city, instead of the traditional wood, brick and mortar, the First Baptist Church represents the introduction of new construction methods. The First Baptist Church is also locally significant under Criterion A in the area of social history as the property embodies the establishment, during the early 20th century, of the Protestants ideals, concepts and values within the local social network. The First Baptist Church was the site of the first Baptist congregation in the island established directly by a Puerto Rican minister, as such, the property represents the early development of a local leadership within the new religious trend. It also represents the religious openness promoted by the change of regime in the island after the Spanish American War of 1898 and the establishment of the separation of State and Church initiated by the Foraker Act of 1900.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND AND SIGNIFICANCE

The First Baptist Church is located at the intersection of Ruiz Belvis and Intendente Ramirez streets in the city of Caguas. Officially founded in 1775⁶, Caguas remained a small town during its first five decades. In 1782, when Fray Iñigo Abbad y Lasierra made his historic visits through out the island, he found only five houses around one simple church in today's Caguas urban core.⁷ By 1820, the town had only few identifiable buildings: the City Hall, the Church, a building for cock-fights, a slaughter house, a grocery store and a few wooden houses. Most of the population was spread throughout the countryside surviving in a subsistence farming system.

But the fertile land in the Turabo Valley, where the city is located, facilitated the eventual development of the small village. By mid nineteen century, sugar cane and tobacco became the main exporting crops. The new economy promoted the population's increase not only in the municipality as a whole, but especially in the city's traditional center. By 1878, Caguas had a population of 16,099 inhabitants. An interesting fact about Caguas' increased population was that it consisted mostly of Creole families. This gave the city a strong native and local atmosphere.⁸ Still mostly a rural town by 1878, the urban center had by then three hundred and eighty-eight houses and seven hundred and sixty-one families arranged around twelve well organized streets.⁹ A Caguas' diagram sketched by the Spanish Military Command Geographic Service in 1884 shows a well developed urban center with the traditional figures of the Catholic Church and the town square as the main focus points (Fig. 9).¹⁰ The town's acquisition of the title of "City" in 1894 was a reflection of its increasing importance.¹¹

Fig. 9 Caguas' sketch, 1884.

Just when Caguas was increasing in social and economic importance, the history of Puerto Rico took an unsuspected turn. The Spanish American War of 1898 transformed the island from a Spanish colony into a United States' territory. Boat loads of land speculators, adventurers, social researchers, photographers with their new Kodak cameras and teachers came to the new acquisition in the Caribbean.

One other social group whose arrival into the island was extremely significant was the religious representatives. The Protestants missionaries followed the footprints on the United States soldiers, right after the Treaty of Paris was ratified and Puerto Rico was ceded to the American government. This arrival was not accidental. Just prior to the military occupation of Puerto Rico the Protestants factions had divided the island among themselves. Anticipating the United States' victory over Spain, on June 20, 1898, the Foreign Missions Board of the Presbyterian Church called for a meeting among the main Protestants sections to unify the efforts and to properly divide the work load in the new territories of Cuba, Philippines and Puerto Rico.¹²

By March 1899, eight months after the occupation, executives from the Baptists, Methodists, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Congregationals, Disciples of Christ, among others, got together in New York to establish the procedures, boundaries and rules in the "Protestant colonization" of Puerto Rico. Showing their numerical and organizational strength, the Baptists and Methodists claimed the major urban centers. Their position became even stronger when the Civil Government was established. The 1900 Foraker Act created a local civil administration, controlled by the US Congress and the President, with the three republican branches (although not too clearly separated).¹⁴ Very significant to the Protestant factions was that the Foraker Act also established the total separation of State and Church, quickly eroding the Catholic Church's four hundred years of absolutist power.

The Foraker Act created a political and cultural door for the openly establishment of Masonic leagues, Allan Kardec's Spiritist Centers, Freethinkers and almost every other Protestant designation present in the United States at the time. The missionaries came with the bible in one hand and the United States flag in the other. Religious proselytism and Americanization became a unified project throughout the island,¹⁵ an expansionist ideological project already in practice in other locations and with other ethnics.¹⁶

During the Spanish colonial period, the Catholic Church influence was mostly circumscribed to the urban cores of the cities and towns. The Catholic Temple became an architectural icon directly associated with the social and public space around the town square. With most of the people amply spread-out in the countryside, it meant that the population's contact with religious officials was limited to their unusual trips into town. Adding to the separation between the regular folks and the Church officials was the absence of a native-composed priesthood. This fact created a perception that the local Catholic clergy was always made-out of "Peninsulares".¹⁷

Drastically different to the Catholic practice, the new Protestant missionaries conducted a fierce and well organized proselytism. Protestants meeting-houses sprout-up, not only within the main cities urban cores, but deep into the countryside.¹⁸ These meeting houses, used to promote the new religious ideals and the American values, became the seeds for the official Protestants chapels. The Protestants temples built within the first few decades of the twentieth century adopted diverse

¹⁸ By 1900 there were only two organized Protestant's churches with 85 members. But by 1905 there were 299 meeting-houses; 91 organized churches; 19 temples built and 4 under construction; 12 chapels and a weekly assistance of 17,160 members. architectural styles. This stylish diversity became a perfect tool to disassociate themselves from the Catholic architectural language.

Another significant difference between the Catholic official practice and the evangelization crusade of the new missionaries was that the Protestants quickly created a cadre of young Puerto Ricans' males ordained as ministers.¹⁹ This was more than just a way to deal with the language barrier, as the early American missionaries came with previous work experience in Latin America. The action of using locals as ministers was used to reflect the democratic values announced by the new Establishment. This practice helped to create a Puerto Rican leadership early within the Protestant movement. The strategy was valuable to penetrate areas with a strong native-spirit, as it was the city of Caguas. The First Baptist Church represents this complex context.

La Primera Iglesia Bautista de Caguas

The Caguas' First Baptist Church is a reinforced concrete building of Romanesque Revival style. It is located in a rectangular corner lot at the intersection of Segundo Ruiz Belvis and Intendente Ramirez streets, two blocks from Plaza Federico Degetau, the town's public square. The church was built in 1909, but the arrival of the Baptists missionaries to the town was from an earlier period.

Just as previously agreed among the Protestant factions, the Baptist had the evangelization monopoly of the city. By 1899, the once small village, was the twelfth largest town in the island, with a population of 19,857.²⁰ By 1910, Caguas was the tenth largest city, but with 10,354, it had the fourth largest amount of people concentrated in the urban core.²¹ Because of these numbers, a quick foothold in Caguas' urban center became a significant priority for the Baptist missionaries.

As part of that priority, the first Baptist congregation in Caguas was quickly organized in August 3, 1900. The American Baptist's leadership decided to use a member of the newly formed cadre of Puerto Rican preachers as spear-head in the initial ideological penetration of the town, in respond to the strong regionalist orientation that already characterized the city. The person selected was Reverend Manuel Lebrón, as such, the Baptist congregation in Caguas became the first one in the island to be directly established by a Puerto Rican minister.²²

The original meeting-house, no longer existent, was a rental property in Vizcarrondo Street. By 1906, $1,100 was assigned by the American Baptist Home Mission Society, located in New York City, to acquire the corner lot for the church. In September 1907, the Mission Society donated $7,500 for the temple's construction. Money was allocated through the next two years to pay for the architect fees (unknown until present time), furniture and equipment. The building was finally inaugurated on January 3, 1909.²³

The architectural style of the church, the Romanesque Revival, gave the building, from the very start, a unique design and personality that made it stand out within its immediate surroundings. The style served also the purpose of breaking with the architectural pattern associated with Catholic churches, creating a new image for a new ideological discourse. The interior spatial arrangement, a small rectangular nave with a low and simple apse, served to create a more intimate, accessible and democratic relationship between the official clergy and the congregation, reflecting the new Establishment values and in contrast with the highly divided and hierarchal space within the Catholic temples. The building's low level, its humble architectural lines and the lack of grandiose ornamentation (inside and out), served also to accentuate the Baptist's project in reaching-out to the simple local-folks.

The site selected for the church was also a significant statement (Fig. 11). The First Baptist Church occupy a privilege location, facing the Segundo Ruiz Belvis Street, giving the property an immediate exposure to all the frequent users of the busy road. Two blocks away from the nineteenth century Catholic Church in the town square, its location represented a direct challenge to the old-status-quo for the control of the public space and the public conscience.

The Baptist congregation grew-up quickly through the first decades. In the 1930s, an expansion was added, along the northwest axis of the church, without conflicting alterations to the original building. The annex was used as a Bible Parish School and Library Store.²⁴ In 1957, the congregation determined that the old building was no longer suitable to their purpose. They acquired a new lot, and the Baptist Home Mission Society sold the First Baptist Church building to Erasmo Velazquez y Olmedo for $40,000, who used the property as a furniture warehouse. During the 1970s, until the late 1980s, it was rented-out to the Defenders of the Faith (a Pentecostal faction). From 1988 until the mid 1990s, the building was used as an office by a private commerce (New Vision Optics).

In 1993, the property was finally acquired by the City of Caguas.²⁵ After a successful rehabilitation process, the property was converted into a museum.²⁶ Through all the changes in functionality after 1957, the property has kept its integrity of materials, location, volume and feeling (Fig. 12).
