Armed and ready: A proposal with historic possibilities—and risks

■ Bush and the Bomb: Will His Plan Work?

For 33 years, diplomats and strategists have struggled to control the nuclear-arms race like bean counters in the shadow of apocalypse. But last week George Bush took a bold step toward breaking the cycle of frustration. His unilateral cutbacks gave the world a reason to feel a little safer. He offered the new Soviet leadership a way to switch desperately needed resources from defense to civilian needs. And his call for renewed U.S. leadership offered Americans a chance to decide the nation's mission in the era after the cold war. Special Report: Page 18

Bush outlines his plan

■ The Last Taboo

With Roseanne Arnold and other celebrities publicly alleging that they were sexually abused as children, incest is now moving further out of the shadows. As the number of reported cases multiplies, experts are learning more about the nature of memory and the damage incest inflicts. Lifestyle: Page 70

Stanford students on eve of centennial

■ Big Woes on Campus

Stanford's centennial celebration should have been a triumph. The university is one of the world's great centers of learning. So why has it become the school that couldn't shoot straight? From debates over multiculturalism to fights with the Feds, Stanford reflects the peculiar state of higher education overall. Society: Page 54
