No Bull

The Campaign America Needs — But Won't Get

The No Bull Campaign

Fed up with political promises, suspicious of government, worried about the country's future, American voters say they want a No Bull presidential campaign. As candidates stumble into the political arena, they try to speak truth to power and avoid the manipulations that characterized the last election. But will America get the campaign it needs? And is that what the voters really want? NEWSWEEK's cover package forecasts the prospects for Campaign '92, offers snapshot profiles of the official Democratic contenders and elicits some straight-talk reflections from candidates on the subject of race. And there are tips for how the media might improve their own performance in '92. National Affairs: Page 22

Congressman's protest: A call for disclosure

Free Lunch, Rubber Checks

It was pigs-at-the-trough time again: members of Congress had been caught bouncing thousands of personal checks, giving themselves interest-free loans and stiffing the House restaurants for hundreds of thousands. As editorialists thundered and radio call-in phones jingled, there was panic on Capitol Hill. National Affairs: Page 30

For His Eyes Only, Until Now

In his journals, novelist and short-story writer John Cheever told his darkest, truest stories to himself alone: tales of alcoholism, bisexual adulteries, domestic rows and all-round misery. Now they've been published in book form, with the blessing of his long-suffering family. It's clear that this was a man hanging by a thread. The Arts: Page 66
