Debating economics. The fight for the Democratic nomination now centers on which of the front-runners has the better plan to repair the damaged economy — Tsongas (above) or Clinton.

Did the war end too soon? Schwarzkopf wanted 24 more hours to finish off Iraq's Republican Guard, but Bush ended the war.

Who's next? Efforts to stop the bomb's spread have failed.

Job hunting. There are some books that can really give you a jump on the job market.

Why It's Back

How We Can

AIDS patients are often defenseless against the TB bacterium

Tuberculosis: An Old Killer Returns

After declining for nearly a century, a disease once ranked as the nation's leading cause of death is back. Its resurgence is neither fluke nor mystery, but a tragic social failure. Poverty, homelessness and AIDS—combined with a crumbling public-health system—have all helped give tuberculosis deadly new force. Can TB be stopped? Lifestyle: Page 52

A Voters' Guide to the Candidates

With Super Tuesday upon us, the race for the presidency is in full swing. In the hurly-burly of charges and countercharges, it's easy to lose track of how the candidates stand on the real issues. To help sort through the confusion, NEWSWEEK offers a concise guide, including biographical sketches and summaries of how each candidate stands on such issues as the environment, health care, the economy and social policy—as well as brief descriptions of how each might govern if he made it to the White House. National Affairs: Page 30

Frohnmayr Explains

In his first interview since the White House forced him to resign as chairman of the National Endowment for the Arts, John Frohnmayr, who officially leaves in May, spoke to NEWSWEEK's Daniel Glick about misunderstandings he had with both artists and politicians during his tenure and of his belief that "cultural terrorism" threatens the future of the agency. The Arts: Page 69
