Minutes

Mr. Gates began the meeting by discussing the process for decision on the issues. He said that after today's meeting, there would be an NSC meeting on Tuesday (April 17, 1989) and that the President would then make decisions in concert with Secretary Cheney. (S)

that the President would then make decisions in concert with Secretary Cheney. (S)

Mr. Gates continued that he wanted to start today's meeting with ICBM modernization and in particular a discussion of whether ICBM modernization is needed and how urgently, options for modernization, views on those options, and then turn to SDI basic choices and specific options. (S)

Mr. Gates began discussion of ICBM modernization by noting that there were tradeoffs in terms of dollars and also in terms of arms control. Thus a MIRV'd mobile missile ban, different mobile missile verification options, and limits on exercises all have a bearing on choices for mobile ICBM modernization. With that introduction, Mr. Gates called on Amb. Wolfowitz. (S)

Amb. Wolfowitz noted that the NSR 12 paper is long but there had been an executive summary distributed subsequently. He said that because silo-based ICBMs are at risk, they can no longer play all roles. In practice they are no longer a hedge against the Soviets holding bombers or submarines in port at risk. Instead of two survivable legs of the triad, we have two vulnerable legs. This does not mean there is no deterrence, but we do have less confidence. Silo vulnerability creates pressure to make a "use or lose" decision. Because of that, we have no secure reserve force. Shifting even a portion of the ICBM force to mobile basing would ameliorate the situation. In effect, we would have another leg that we could be highly confident was survivable. Some argue that we might improve survivability even more if we de-MIRV silo-based missiles. (S)

Nonetheless, there remain two alternatives: MX on railroad cars; and SICBM carried by a hard, mobile launcher. Peacekeeper is cheaper, available starting 2-3 years before IOC of the SICBM (and 10 years before FOC for the SICBM) but, absent strategic warning is susceptible to surprise attack. SICBM is survivable with only tactical warning in Northern basing, and survivable virtually without warning in Southwestern basing. There are also three suboptions for Peacekeeper. (S)

Mr. Gates stopped Amb. Wolfowitz and asked what he characterized as the broadest of questions, is modernization needed? Is there a general view that it is needed? (S)

Gen. Herres noted that the NSR 12 paper says it is needed. (S)

Mr. Gates asked Amb. Wolfowitz to continue. (S)

Amb. Wolfowitz resumed by saying that there are three Peacekeeper sub-options: buying 50 new missiles; rebasing the 50 missiles currently in silos; or both, ending with 100 missiles on railroad cars. The options differ by cost and the number of missiles available. All are highly flexible. All would provide crisis management options. Deploying some or all missiles into the rail net would not be provocative or destabilizing. The missiles could be launched anywhere. The deployment would be analogous to sending submarines to sea or generating bomber forces. (S)

Amb. Wolfowitz continued that there are also three small ICBM options. The options differ on where the missiles are based. Northern basing is cheaper but depends on dash on tactical warning. Southwestern basing on government land would allow constant movement. A mixed option, with some missiles in each place would differ by only a small percentage of the cost, about $2 billion. Northern basing makes crews vulnerable. Southwest basing would require direct Soviet attack. However, it would entail greater environmental concerns. (S)

It would also be possible to select an option melding the Peacekeeper and SICBM options with strategic warning of benefit to the MIRV'd Peacekeeper and tactical warning sufficient for the flexible, single warhead missile. This would combine the earliest possible deployment with later solution of the "bolt from the blue" and potentially greater threat from SLBMs problems. However, the option would cost more. (S)

Mr. Gates noted that this was a discussion that could last one hour, three weeks, or fifteen years, but that in any case, he would like to hear agency views on the tradeoffs, preferences among options, and arms control considerations. (S)

Gen. Schlossberg said that State was comfortable with a mix of road and rail options, that they were not firm on the numbers, but that less than three hundred seemed to be right. He noted that although the cost goes up with the mixed option, it is the way to go because it is most important that the decision be politically sustainable. The mix would also support our arms control negotiators. (S)

Gen. Herres said that he thought the purpose of the meeting was to ensure that the options paper was acceptable, not to record agency views. (S)

Mr. Gates said that the meeting could do both. (S)

Gen. Herres said he worried that if the deputies met and decided something it would not matter, because the decisions were ultimately the President's. He said that the deputies should ensure that the decision paper was a sound basis to move forward. (S)

~~SECRET~~

~~SECRET~~

~~SECRET~~

Mr. Gates said he was comfortable with that characterization of the deputies' task. (S)

Gen. Herres said that the DOD had not reached a decision on which option to support. (S)

Mr. Gates said that ultimately the decision was between the President and SecDef, and that he had no problem at all with discussing whether the paper properly frames the issues, or other options have merit. The purpose is not to come up with recommendations on options, but it is also to get whatever views are held by agencies. This decision is not like the one on East-West relations. Nonetheless, the process can be used to let the President and SecDef have the opportunity to hear the views of other agencies. (S)

Mr. Kerr said he had one general observation that the decision on these options would be unlikely to have much impact on Soviet plans. From the monitoring point of view, rail garrison and SICBM verification poses a daunting monitoring problem. He said the Intelligence Community finds the problem very challenging. (S)

Mr. McEachin noted that nothing would surprise the Soviets or cause them problems. On the other hand, mobiles create monitoring problems for the U.S. (b)(1)

Gen. Herres

(S)

Mr. Kerr

Mr. McEachin

Mr. Joseph noted that our confidence in our ability to monitor Soviet mobile missiles depends on the Soviets maintaining their standard operating procedures. (S)

Mr. McEachin

(b)(1)

Gen. Herres said he did not accept the idea that because we have road-mobiles we know more about how to verify them. He called the idea a knee-jerk reaction and said that we may find the reverse is the case. He noted also that when the Soviets have more experience with road-mobile ICBMs they may be able to do more to trick us. (S)

Mr. McEachin

(b)(1)

(b)(1)

Mr. Joseph noted that the discussion again centered around standard Soviet practices which we cannot control. (S)

Mr. Gates suggested that the discussion step back. He said that if the President makes a decision to change the U.S. START position it would have a profound effect on monitoring and verification of mobile missiles and greater uncertainty than would be entailed with silo-based missiles. (S)

Mr. Joseph said that if we are to move on mobile missiles, we need more intrusive suspect site inspections to deal with missile production. This entails not only the problem of dealing with Soviet sites but Soviet inspections of U.S. sites. (S)

Gen. Herres said the options are there, and while variants are possible, they are close enough for decision, although not at this meeting. For the record he noted the last JCS position was for 100 Peacekeepers on rails. There has been no action to back away from that position. There are other considerations on the horizon, political, and economic. Things are quite a bit different today. (b)(1)

(b)(1)

It is important to emphasize that day-to-day and with launch under attack we are not starting from scratch. The radiation problem is overplayed in hard mobile launchers on Minuteman sites. It is easily manageable. The contribution to deterrence would not be affected one iota. General Herres added what he called a footnote that the aspect of cost is not insignificant in that it draws funds away from something else dealing with the defense problem. There is a firm limit to the defense budget and tradeoffs must be made. He said he was satisfied with the paper. (S)

Mr. Moore said the Department of Energy would be producing the

~~SECRET~~

~~SECRET~~

Small ICBM warhead. If the Mark 21 is used there would be no problem. The cost would run from $30 to $50 million for start up production. But if the Mark 21 is not suitable, eight to nine years of study and investment as high as $1 billion would be required. (S)

Gen. Herres said that the Mark 21 is suitable for either Peacekeeper or the Small ICBM. (S)

Mr. Moore said that the Energy Department is just a contractor for the Defense Department. (S)

Mr. Diefenderfer said that the tight defense budget is not likely to ease any time soon. (S)

Gen. Herres said that looking at Gramm Rudman and projections by the Congressional Budget Office things will not get better. (S)

Mr. Gates called on George Murphy. (S)

Mr. Murphy said he favored Option D (rail garrison Peacekeeper) for a variety of reasons. 1) like the Soviets, Congress is taking a hard look at broader strategy. 2) Cost is key to our deterrent, and 8" or 155 mm. artillery shells are not the essence of deterrence. We are the richest nation on earth and we cannot afford to send to the graveyard our fundamental deterrent forces. 3) Although rail mobile verification seems harder, there are things more important than verification. Intelligence is important, but improving our retaliatory capability is more important. We shouldn't negotiate on mobile missiles when we have none and the Soviet Union has SS 24s and SS 25s and are improving their SA 10 air defense missiles. We need more muscle in the strategic budget. (S)

Mr. Gates said that he hears from agencies that the paper properly frames the issues and that these are the most sensible options and that no additional significant observations are necessary prior to the NSC meeting. In short, he said, it was a brilliant piece of work. (S)

Gen. Herres said he would not go that far. (S)

Mr. Gates called on Amb. Wolfowitz to begin the discussion on SDI. (S)

Amb. Wolfowitz said the paper concludes that defense dominance is not technically possible in the foreseeable future. However, there are a range of less demanding options: 1) protection against accidents or threats from third countries; 2) attrition of limited Soviet attacks to deny the Soviets some limited

~~SECRET~~

~~SECRET~~

~~SECRET~~

options or options for decapitation; or 3) meeting the JCS established minimum for a Phase I contribution to deterrence, 50 percent of SS 18s and 30 percent of remaining warheads. (S)

Mr. Gates asked about the origin of the JCS-established requirement. (S)

Gen. Herres said it was based on analysis of the minimum level to contribute to deterrence. (S)

Amb. Wolfowitz said the goal is to blunt the leading edge of an attack to create uncertainty in the minds of Soviet planners. This uncertainty about the chances of a successful attack can be increased by moving to mobile ICBM basing. The SDI options are eight, falling into four groups:

- Enhanced Defenses, meeting Phase I requirements;
- Modest Defenses, that are ground-based, to deal with a limited Soviet attack;
- Limited Defenses, to deal with accidental or third country launches;
- Technology Base, not aiming at a particular type of deployment but funding broad based technologies. (S)

Mr. Gates said that his reading is that there is a branch point between the technology base program and all the other options because there is no out-year funding wedge for deployment. Thus, options for deployment in the 1990s would be foreclosed. He asked if this characterization is accurate. (S)

Amb. Wolfowitz said he believed it to be accurate. (S)

Gen. Herres said it was not accurate from the point of view of the proponents of the option. He said the JCS are the only ones supporting the approach and that they have no intention of wandering down an aimless road. The Phase I requirements would remain the principle objective. But there are major technological uncertainties, for example some specific and unsolved problems with getting the sensor to detect the rocket body rather than the plume or distinguishing between decoys and re-entry vehicles. There is reason to be optimistic, but we are not sure we can engineer and weaponize the technologies. We need more time. We need to ensure survivability. We need to study the options in more depth. We need long term technology, and we can't solve the need to make such investments. Now is not the time to throw money at deployment. Affordability is a major factor. In a couple of years we should be smarter. There is a

~~SECRET~~

~~SECRET~~

~~SECRET~~

~~SECRET~~

lot of risk and we need more technical exploration. The option would not cancel any effort. It would focus on uncertainties. (S)

Mr. Gates observed that the practical effect would be to eliminate from the Five Year Defense Plan a funding wedge for deployment. (S)

Amb. Wolfowitz said several options recognized the rationale for delay. They are responsibly ambitious and recognize that we may go slower, but it would be impossible to speed up if the technology warranted it. (S)

Gen. Herres said he takes issue with the branch point (described earlier by Mr. Gates). All the options defer deployment, except the current program and one based on Brilliant Pebbles. The last option (Technology Base) defers a little longer. But the idea that it would abandon SDI's original goals is wrong. (S)

Mr. Gates said it would defer money for deployment. (S)

Gen. Herres said we can't spend money with no answers. (S)

Gen. Schlossberg said we should work vigorously reduce uncertainties and costs. But we should also be careful in the signal we send to Congress about the Administration's seriousness about the SDI program. A low number would not be seen as serious. All options except the Technology Base option would be seen as vigorous pursuit of the program. There are problems with START in testing and deployment of defenses. We need good consultations with the Hill. Also the Allies would worry about a deployment decision. The French are concerned about the Force de Frappe and the UK is concerned about the effect on Trident. In terms of dollars a good signal would be sent with a request of $4.5 billion. (S)

Mr. Moore said that the DOE had been directed to look at the x-ray laser as a hedge. Funding cuts interrupt lab work, retard development of options, and make it difficult to keep a broad-based technology program going. (S)

Mr. Kerr said the General (Herres) could have written the memo his crowd gave him. He did not see the Technology Base program as backing away, rather it is the easiest on the budget and the most saleable on the Hill. (S)

Mr. Murphy said he was against the Technology Base option because it might well kill the program. Sure, the technical people have not solved all of the problems, but neither had they when we started the Manhattan project. (S)

(b)(1) He said he favored the current program. The worst that could happen is that Congress could cut it, but why surrender in the first place. (S)

Gen. Herres said he was not here to debate the merits of options. He said his speech was not to sell his case, not to make a decision, but pejorative language needs to be fixed. The option is not an attempt to kill the program, not an attempt to save money, but an attempt to solve problems. There should be a funding profile that directs the objectives. (S)

Amb. Wolfowitz said he saw the paper not a pejorative but as charitable toward the JCS option. A flat fiscal profile, out of which we would buy the Boost Surveillance and Tracking System would amount to backing away from SDI's major objectives. Important experiments would be cancelled or deferred. If there is a better way of saying this we should fix the words. (S)

Mr. Gates said he had two observations. On the ICBM paper, one area seemed a little weak, the discussion of relative strategic advantage of two systems. On SDI and strategic defense, he asked Amb. Wolfowitz to scrub the discussion of the Technological Base for places where there might be inaccurate characterization of deferment v. cancellation of experiments. (S)

Amb. Wolfowitz said that they might need to use footnotes in order not to fudge real differences of view. (S)

Mr. Gates said he saw merit in giving the Chiefs an opportunity to footnote the document in order that they be fairly represented. (S)

Gen. Herres said he could offer a point of convergence. There has not been much thought on a START agreement and an ABM system in combination. What do we want or need? We pretend options are mutually exclusive when they are not. We should be thinking about these things and not spend all this god damned money if we are not. We should stop making decisions in isolation. (S)

Mr. Gates said we cannot avoid decisions now. He pushed Amb. Wolfowitz to include more contrasts between options on tactical and strategic considerations in the ICBM modernization paper. (S)

Amb. Wolfowitz said this would be tough. (S)

Mr. Gates asked that he keep open the possibility. (S)
