NSR 3: Recommended Policies

NSR 3 affirms the strategy and policies the United States has broadly pursued vis-a-vis the Soviet Union in the post-war years, both for ourselves and our Allies. Implementation of this affirmed long-term policy approach involves several facets: our long- and short-term objectives, our strategy for achieving them, and the immediate task of implementing our approach. All are critical if we are to build a policy that is comprehensive, stable and sustainable with our Allies and at home.

Long-Term Objectives

Over the next ten years, we should pursue three broad sets of objectives in our relations with the Soviet Union.

Our basic strategic-military objective is to maintain strong modern defenses, strengthen deterrence and enhance the security of the U.S., our Allies and friends. To this end, we should seek ways to transform new Soviet defense concepts, such as a restructuring of the military toward lower force levels and a truly defensive posture, into reality.

In the political-diplomatic area, we should seek to preserve strong ties with our Allies and friends in Europe and Asia, while encouraging Soviet retrenchment in the Third World and greater autonomy in Eastern Europe. We should challenge Moscow to subordinate client relationships to the objective of finding peaceful solutions to regional conflicts and, over the longer term, seek to remove the competitive East-West dynamic from such conflicts. We also want to take advantage of opportunities that arise to expand cooperation in dealing with global issues like terrorism and the environment.

And finally we should seek democratization, that is, genuine reform -- including greater respect for human rights and domestic liberalization institutionalized by law -- within the USSR. We want a Soviet Union that increasingly casts its values and priorities in terms of the quality of life of its people, rather than expansion abroad, and where there are internal political constraints on the power of the Soviet leadership and party. In the long term, we seek to make cultural, economic and social contacts with the Soviet people flow through private channels, similar to those we have with other countries.

The Overall Strategy

The strategy to achieve these objectives must be multi-faceted: it must be fully consistent with broader U.S. national security objectives; it must be sustainable with our Allies and at home; and it must effectively challenge the Soviets to move in the directions we seek. Given these requirements, our strategy specifically should:

- Be comprehensive, taking advantage of opportunities to push forward on all elements of the relationship. We should not permit the Soviets to dictate a selective approach, e.g. one limited to arms control and regional conflicts of interest to Moscow. Indeed, the primary weakness of the détente process in the 1970s was that it held out a promise of improved relations without addressing many of the sources of real tension between the U.S. and USSR. Today, with the plurality of views and interests in America concerning the Soviet Union, it is even more important to take a comprehensive approach to relations with Moscow.
- Be grounded in the consistent pursuit of our fundamental interests. The opportunities now facing us are largely the result of U.S. policies of the last forty years and particularly the last eight (e.g. our efforts to modernize our military, restore our economy's vitality, strengthen alliances, and foster democracy and economic growth in the Third World). They will continue to be key components of a successful strategy for dealing with Moscow.
- Be sensitive to Alliance concerns. A coordinated Western approach significantly increases the chances of reaching our goals -- and Allied disunity significantly increases the risk of failure. Pursuing a forward-looking policy toward the Soviet Union with well-defined goals is an essential element of U.S. international leadership.
- Be steady and consistent with a long-term perspective. Soviet reform will take many years to play out; progress in our relationship will be gradual and uneven, as the relationship remains largely adversarial and susceptible to crisis. We must be able to handle "bad" as well as "good" Soviet behavior, avoiding overreaction to either that could undermine our long-term aims.
- Instill confidence in our leadership. We must articulate our objectives and vision of future relations, even as we stress a current agenda of our creation that focuses on the real issues and hard work necessary to turn that vision into reality. This means establishing an agenda rooted in solid objectives which we pursue in a consistent manner. This will be essential if we are to keep public expectations realistic.

The five-part agenda (human rights, arms control, regional dialogue and bilateral issues supplemented by global issues) is designed to give specific content to these broad principles and to provide an overall framework for pursuing our strategic-military, political-diplomatic and democratization goals over an extended length of time. Much of Soviet "new thinking" is still only words. We should continually challenge Gorbachev to back those words with concrete and specific actions that meet U.S. interests. Clear challenges will not only signal to Moscow what actions we want them to undertake, but will also lay down clear milestones by which our publics can judge Soviet behavior. Such challenges are also meant to ensure that we continue to define the agenda for U.S.-Soviet relations.

Short-Term Objectives

In the next 3-4 years, we seek to make significant strides toward the long-term objectives outlined above. Specifically, we should challenge the Soviets on all key elements of our relationship and press ahead in those areas where opportunities to further U.S. interests present themselves. Only in this manner will we be able to "get out front" of Soviet policies. The particular fascination that the world has for Gorbachev because of his perceived bold gambles is an arena in which we should not attempt to compete.

The five-part agenda should guide our policies: it is concrete, it is of our creation, and experience shows that it is an approach that works. It also provides a yardstick by which to judge the success of our policies and the Soviet response to our challenges: by the specifics of the accords that we negotiate; the degree to which the competitive East-West dynamic is removed from regional conflicts and replaced by cooperation; the steps that the Soviet leadership are willing to take to meet our concerns on human rights; and the extent to which measures are implemented that increase transparency in the USSR and contribute to the irreversibility of domestic reform.

The key to asserting U.S. leadership in this area will be the demonstration in both word and deed that we have a sound and realistic policy: one that is forward-looking and does not shrink from the future, but one that also focuses on the concrete steps needed to get us there. Two immediate steps can be taken to this end: U.S. policy toward the Soviet Union should be presented in its totality; and we should reengage with the Soviets on the basis of our agenda as quickly as is appropriate.

Thus, we would recommend the following in the near-term:

- Complete the review and, in consultation with our Allies, build a consensus in support of our objectives.
- Project its findings, specifically our objectives and overall agenda. A Presidential speech could get the ball rolling.
- Reengage the Soviets and challenge them across the spectrum of issues with specific initiatives that fit our overall agenda and serve U.S. interests.

NSR 3 Near-Term Initiatives

The paper identifies specific possible initiatives that might serve U.S. policy objectives. Agencies disagree on the utility of certain candidates; all would require further work before they could be fleshed out into concrete initiatives. The following simply lists the possibilities; the more detailed discussion is contained in NSR 3.

Strategic-Military (pages 16-19)

- Reengage as soon as appropriate on the full range of issues on the arms control agenda.
- Consider possible new strategic confidence-building measures (CBMs).
- A new chemical weapons (CW) initiative.
- Supplement existing military-to-military contacts by having new "national security" discussions.

Political-Diplomatic (pages 19-24)

- Reengage on the regional conflict dialogue, including a regular cycle of regional experts meetings on such issues as Central America, the Middle East, Africa and Asia.
- Build Allied agreement to a revamped and forward-looking new stress on NATO as a political alliance devoted to ending the division of Europe through systemic changes in the East.
- Work with our Asian allies to challenge the Soviets by opening the Soviet Far East to international trade and communication.
- Challenge the Soviets to work in practical ways to curb terrorist activities.
- Establish a working relationship with narcotics authorities and implement our bilateral Memorandum of Understanding.
- Challenge the Soviets on such global issues as the environment.

Democratization (pages 24-31)

- Active use of bilateral and high-level dialogue to press the Soviets on human rights, including individual cases.

- Press the Soviets at the Paris human rights conference for follow-through on commitments made regarding Soviet human rights performance.
- Increase the role of inter-parliamentary bodies and non-governmental organizations on human rights: inter-parliamentary contacts; Congressional/CSCE Commission channel; "Rule of Law symposia.
- Promote Western ideas within the USSR: an "Enterprise Initiative" to encourage the development of market institutions in the USSR; promote labor contacts between the two countries; press for reciprocal cultural centers.
- Foster expansion of non-strategic trade, including joint ventures, on strictly commercial terms.
- Work with Allies to seek greater transparency in lending to the East.
- Consider "no exceptions" COCOM policy; work with Allies on streamlining and strengthening export controls.

Official Notes 'Realistic' Stand by Bush on SDI
LD2203143989 Moscow TASS in English 1429 GMT
22 Mar 89

[Text] Moscow March 22 TASS—For years the Reagan administration went out of its way to convince its NATO allies and other countries that the Strategic Defence Initiative, better known as Star Wars, is useful and even necessary for mankind.

But most countries are still skeptical, according to Gen. Nikolay Chervov, department head of the Soviet General Staff.

Speaking to TASS in connection with the sixth anniversary of the announcement of the Star Wars programme, Chervov said that Washington was exploiting fears of nuclear arms by asserting that SDI could rid the world of nuclear weapons.

"We view SDI as a military programme targeted against the Soviet Union and designed to gain decisive military advantage", Chervov said.

"It is extremely destabilising, provokes the arms race and increases the risk of a nuclear war."

"Our arguments against SDI are as follows:

"Firstly, SDI means an introduction of arms to space. These weapons will have an offensive rather than defensive character and will be capable of hitting numerous targets 4 to 5 thousand kilometres away in a very short time. Space strike weapons have a high degree of combat readiness, can be used almost instantly and if used leave no time for defensive or retaliatory measures.

ARMS CONTROL & DISARMAMENT

"Secondly, the SDI programme stipulates space deployment of extremely complex automated weapons systems. The more sophisticated the systems are technically, the more likely are human errors, hitches and unpredictable situations that can have catastrophic consequences. Human civilisation will become a hostage to technology.

"Thirdly, SDI aims to acquire disarming first strike capability. Massive deployment of space and land-based weapons at several stages will help destroy incoming missiles launched in retaliation. The United States obviously wants to be able to get away with a first nuclear strike, gain military advantage and a chance to blackmail the Soviet Union and impose its will on this country."

The Star Wars violates the ABM Treaty which has no time limitations and is a cornerstone of the arms reduction process, Chervov said.

The implementation of SDI will inevitably kill the ABM and other treaties and remove major limitations on the arms race.

Chervov said that the Bush administration seems to have a realistic stand toward the SDI programme and its adventurism and, judging by available information, might limit it to laboratory research, without violating the ABM Treaty. Common sense must prevail and the mutually-agreed Washington formula of how to read the ABM Treaty must not be scrapped. This will remove one of the major obstacles for 50 percent reductions of strategic offensive forces.

U.S.-SOVIET RELATIONS POLICY REVIEW

Issues

The paper sets our broad strategic-military, political-diplomatic and "democratization" goals and prescribes that we challenge Moscow across the full range of our five-part agenda to put content in the concepts of "new thinking." In designing a strategy for this challenge, we should consider the following questions:

- o Should we set priorities within (not among) the five parts of our agenda (human rights, arms control, regional conflicts, global issues and bilateral relations)?
- o How can our leverage, as outlined in the paper, be applied most effectively?
- o What events or contingencies might spark a U.S.-Soviet crisis (nationality strife, trouble in Eastern Europe, regional conflict, succession in Iran)?
- o What is the range of next steps in U.S.-Soviet relations (NST resumption, summit)? Are there initiatives we want to launch in the near term (arms control, bilateral relations)?
- o Where do we want Soviet cooperation in resolving regional conflicts; where is it most likely; where would it be most useful; what should we shoot for?
 - Middle East
 - Africa
 - Central America
 - South Asia
 - Korea/Cambodia
- o Do we have the capability to affect the economic reform process in the Soviet Union? To what end?
- o How should we respond to Soviet attempts to upgrade the economic relationship? How do we handle growing interest in easing restrictions on the export of high technology? How should we respond to Soviet efforts to join international economic institutions?
