Elementary School Makes Students Into Success-Driven Goalies

Students are goal-tending at Oldham School in East Providence, R.I., but their teachers are giving praise, not penalties.

During the past school year, each kindergarten through sixth-grade student began setting one or two "realistic and attainable" personal goals for a five-week period, says Principal Janice Keller. Teachers help the students set goals, track their progress, and honor those who achieved their goals every five weeks.

Innovations

A group of teachers started the program to acknowledge the winner in every student, says Keller, a veteran teacher in her first year as principal. "We were trying to come up with a way where any child could be recognized," she says.

A handful of teachers worked out the "hows and wheres" with Keller, creating a five-week scheme with a schoolwide assembly at the end of each goal period to hand out "attaboys" and inspire further achievement.

To Each His Own

Goals vary as much as students, says Keller. Some set social goals, such as a pledge to refrain from pushing anyone, while others promise to do their homework or learn to tie their shoes.

About 140 of the school's 200 students achieve their goals every five weeks, and teachers try to praise all who work hard to improve.

"The kids are tougher on themselves than the teachers are," says Keller. Sometimes teachers counsel students to choose a more attainable goal or choose the same goal again with a different method of achievement.

Student and parent response has been positive, the principal says. Students come up to her in the halls to say, "I've only got two more checks 'til I reach my goal," she says.

And teachers have been enthusiastic about the program, which takes little time or money. They worried about tracking student progress at first, Keller says, but the planning committee decided to let each teacher find his or her own method. Some use charts, some use checklists, but all are content.

Pumping Up

The schoolwide assembly generates further enthusiasm, Keller adds. A speaker, such as the school superintendent or an artist-in-residence, offers advice on short- and long-term goals.

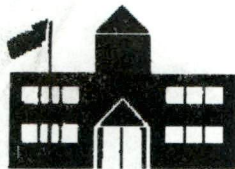

Then, teachers acknowledge those who have achieved their goals with a small token, such as a coupon or bookmark, says Keller. Selected students perform a teacher-written goals cheer, and the 30-minute assembly "gets the kids pumped up," says Keller.

This year's final assembly included praise for students who had achieved all of their goals all year, including 13 of 17 students in one first-grade class.

Keller says the program is bringing the school closer to its objective. "Our goal," she says, "is to have all the kids reach their goal."

Alice Deal

Educator, Principal of Columbia Junior High School; born December 16, 1877; graduated fromoucher College 1899.

Appointed in Washington Public Schools February 11, 1908, as teacher of mathematics in McKinley Manual Training School. October 2, 1918 granted leave of absence for war service and returned to service in McKinley Manual Training School on December 30, 1918; occupied principalship of Columbia Junior High School without advanced salary. On March 6, 1920, she was promoted to the salary that was provided for the position of principal; principal of the school to her death. Was first principal of the summer high school and held the position until she resigned in 1925; secured funds from private sources to begin a research department - considered the beginning of the present research department in the public schools of the District of Columbia and was the pioneer in the junior high school movement in the Washington Public Schools. Died March 31, 1928.

Alice Deal Junior High School

Deal Junior High, built to relieve the overcrowded E.V. Brown School, opened in September of 1931. The school was opened for white students only, while the black children went to the Reno Colored School located behind Deal. Even though the Reno community was integrated from the black children at recess. She claimed it never occurred to any of the children, from either school, to play together.

SCHOOL HISTORY

It is probably hard to imagine Fort Drive as a one-block pathway ending in a cliff of muddy red clay when Alice Deal Junior High opened its doors in 1931 to an eager group of seventh and eighth graders. The students reached the main entrance under the gleaming white tower by walking on wooden planks laid across a sea of mud. There was no landscaping at all around the school and only a few other buildings nearby, the Reno Tower, Reno Elementary School (the gray stucco structure still behind Deal) and a few frame houses on the hill across the street. Wilson High School had yet to be built. Deal graduates had to travel to Georgetown to attend Western High School, now the Ellington School of the Arts.

Alice Deal Junior High School, named for the principal of the first junior high school in Washington, was a much smaller building then because only the center portion had been built. There were no wings, no gymnasiums, and no playground. The student body was small enough so that the principal, Miss Bertie Backus, knew each pupil by name. Everyone ate together in the cafeteria at the same time at small tables decorated with flowers. There was one main cook who served her own pastries with the home-cooked meals. No one left the campus during lunch time.

The auditorium doubled as a gymnasium because it was constructed with a flat floor reached by descending several steps from the lobby. There were also playrooms on either side of the cafeteria which provided areas for physical education activities.

The library was in what is now 200 A and B. It was to be moved twice before being located in its present area. The book room was small also, as was the nurse's office (hardly a health suite).

The new school lacked much in equipment of every type, but the students had a marvelous opportunity for creation which would quickly become traditions. There were contests for everything - with the world to choose from for ideas. The school colors (garnett and gold), the motto, the design of the seal, the lyrics for the school songs, the name and shape of the yearbook, selection of the first landscape planting -- all were the result of students' efforts and desires. The yearbook, for example, was the Square Deal and was square in shape until 1969. The newspaper was called the Deal Light when it won the Columbia Press Award for student newspapers. Both names were the result of contests among the students.

The first wing built was the present east wing with the boys' gymnasium inconveniently placed on the third floor. The additional wing was necessary to accommodate an ever growing student body which graduated its first class in February, 1933. By then the overflow of pupils caused four teachers to take their social studies and mathematics classes to Murch School for space.

Before World War II broke out in Europe, the west wing was added. By then the auditorium designed had been changed to its current shape with sloping floor and permanent seats. English classes performed Shakespeare in it for assemblies each advisory (a six week period). Other assemblies were held approximately once a week, usually from material written by teachers and students. The larger student body required that only half of the pupils could occupy the auditorium at a time. Similarly, there were two lunch periods necessary. Each was only thirty minutes long. Sometimes assemblies were held in the alternate period or there were club activities. The playground had been constructed, and intramurals were often held at noon.

The war changed many things at Deal. Most of the men teachers left for military service. Women teachers rose to the challenge. Some left for military service also. Those who remained taught boys physical education and shop classes quite well. There was a shortage of teachers and supplies but not students! Classes were often as large as sixty and sometimes two classes in different subjects were taught in the same room by one teacher. The pupils assisted in the wartime activities by helping the teachers with food and gas rationing duties and collecting useful materials to purchase needed supplies. The tower was manned at night by teachers as airplane spotters since Fort Reno is one of the highest spots in Washington. There were frequent air raid drills and the collection of emergency supplies in the tunnel beneath the school.

From the beginning Deal was a school with an international flavor because many diplomats sent their children here. The number increased during the war years, and later, after intergration, Alice Deal became truly an international school. It was among the first to provide social instruction for youngsters who knew little English. It earned the recognition of the United Nations over twenty years ago for a pageant created by Deal teachers and performed by students who were natives of nearly every nation then in the United Nation.

In an effort to create smaller classes and to provide additional library, art and music space, the first floor of the west wing extension was built. For several years it jutted out into the field looking strangely flat and long.

The other two floors were added nine years ago, and Deal assumed its present shape.

The school seems old, indeed, to the present student body. It is true that much of the building has taken on a dignified shabbiness with age. Some areas seem old fashion - but there are wonderful memories like friendly ghosts in the old halls. Listen sometimes in the main hall and perhaps you'll hear the laughter of the proud pupils who autographed the acoustical tile in the ceiling as their paper collections helped to purchase it. Be still in the gymnasium and maybe you'll hear the music of the weekly Friday Night Club dances with vaudeville acts performed by sections. Look at the old scrapbooks in the library; ask a second or third generation student if his parent remembers building the floats which paraded at each annual Deal Matinee. One old timer might tell you about the night several hundred students were stranded during a blizzard - but here it is 1978.

Enough of the past. It gave us worthy goals and standards to aim for; it is true. But each September is a brand new year, writing for creations and ideas - yours!

Dear Mr. Bush,

My name is Keith Horbin. I am 10. I am in fifth grade at Lace School. My favorite sports are soccer, kick ball tennis basketball and hockey. I have lots of friends. I have two fish for pets. I live in Darien, Ill. I like video games. I also like pizza.

How is it living in the White House? Do you like being President of the United States of America? How long do you think you'll be president? Did you ever play soccer or do your grandchildren play soccer? I play on a team every year. My position is called defense.

What do you think will be happening in the U.S.S.R.? Do you think the people in the U.S.S.R. will want new leaders? Will the U.S. do anything to help them or is it

Dear Mr. Bush,

I am writing
you to ask you why
you have to be sixteen years old to work. I feel as though you're not

I would

you are always on

feel that you are the

Dear Mr. Bush:

My name is Quentin Froemke and I attend the ninth grade at Poynter Jr. High. My government class has to write a letter to you about some problems that we think are important. I think that the environment and energy are important so I will write about them.

I have read a lot of National Geographic magazines and they recently had an article on the impending energy crisis. That article informed me on many things about energy and changed my opinion on some topics. For instance now I think that we should be exploring new types of energy instead of nuclear power and fossil fuels. Out here in Oregon we have lots of Hydroelectric power which I think is the type I know of so far. It doesn't pollute the environment and produces no harmful waste material. I have also heard somewhere that right now we are using fission for our nuclear power, but that if fusion were being used it would not create nuclear waste and would produce far more energy.

The old types of power plants use fossil fuels and that should be stopped as soon as possible to preserve the environment and lessen our dependence on foreign countries for oil. Nuclear power should also be discouraged where other sources of power could be found. On the good side it produces lots of energy and does not pollute directly. On the other hand it produces nuclear waste and so far as I have heard the best way to dispose of it is to put in an underground cave and let it sit there for a few hundred-thousand years. (I heard they were doing this in Sweden.) This does not sound like a very good solution since no matter what precautions anyone takes there is always a chance for leaks.

Another reason I do not think nuclear plants are so hot (pun intended) is that they can have a meltdown like at Chernobyl and three mile island. This would be a major disaster and would screw everything up for quite a while.

Now that you think I'm done I've got more to say about the environment. The first thing that should be done is that there should be some type of substitute for cars. They produce a lot of gases that pollute the atmosphere. There should also be stricter regulations on factories. They also produce a lot of pollution in the larger cities.

I have also thought that there should be more parks. In Oregon it seems like have parks up the kazoo but there are still not enough. We should every scrap of undeveloped land turned in to parks. Also, when someone comes into an area to cut it they should have to plant new trees immediately, not one or two years later. (Even though it is most likely 10 years)

Even if you do not get this letter I appreciate your time.

Sincerely,

Quentin T. Froemke

Dear George,

I'm not writing this letter to your secretary, I'm writing it to you! As I want you to read it. So make sure you do please write me back that time but write in hand writing. I wrote you one before and I got a typed letter and a ally picture and I know I miss you didn't even know I existed!!

I'm only 10 and I'm upset about lots of things, for instance the war. But why's could've been sent there, but fortunately wasn't. I think that if all could've been avoided, if we just kept our noses out of it, I know it's supposed to be kind, but is being kind with kissing men and women's lips? I bet a lot of those men and women were coming parents

Dear Mr. Bush :

I am a 9th grade student in high school. I was wondering if you could answer a few questions I have? I hear on the news all the time that we are in a recession. If so then why are we always giving money away? I understand that to help people in need is great and I believe it is good to an extent not to extremes! Now the U.S.S.R. is breaking up. I'm glad they are free but by breaking up there is a possibility that the outcome will be a group of poor nations. Again we will feed, give money to, and help. How many millions and billions of dollars go to other countries? The U.S. is a powerful and helpful country but do we have to help everyone can't we just help some? If we don't have enough money why are we giving what we have away? I just wanted to ask. I would appreciate if you could answer my questions. Thank you for reading my letter.

Dear Mr. President,

My name is Lauren Fajkowski and I live in Phoenix, Arizona. I am 5 years old and one of your biggest fans. I would like to meet you on your upcoming trip to Arizona.

I would like to ask your advise on becoming Ambassador to Mexico. I have taken 2 years of Spanish and my parents take me to Mexico (Rocky Point) 3 or 4 times a year. I get to practice my spanish with my friend at the bakery in town.

I attend Monetssori School and have been working very hard to memorize all the States and their Capitals this summer. I already know the seven continents, addition and subtraction (but I can't carry over yet); and, I read almost a book a day.

Perhaps when I get a little older I can do something to help you in your job. I would like to work for you.

I know you are a very busy man, my Daddy is a President too and he is very busy, thankyou for taking the time for me.

First of all you are letting people cut down all these old 200 year forests. You've left it all for the demon stralers to decide the fate of the forest. Well its not fair for the demonstralers

to handle the task on their own!

Then I think you should make it a law to recycle and to help put more recycling booths across the nation. Did you know that every ton of recycled paper saves 7,000 gallons of water? The U.S. only recycles 10% of its trash, but China recycles a 50% amount of their trash!

Why can't our figures match up or at least be better?

Will we think that you just need to work all the harder on the environmental area.

Thank you,

Jane Johnston

Dear President Bush

I'm writing to you about pollution everyone keeps on talking our rivers and don't really care. And I was wondering if you could do something about that.

And another thing I am really concerned about air pollution because people who have gardens keep spraying pesticides in the air and people spray the trees and the trees die and the air carries the chemicals of the trees and makes the rest of us sick as if I could encourage you to do something about it please I became ill people keep on polluting the air and water we won't be able to swim in rivers or smell fresh and. And by the way thank you for your time.

School to deal with this problem. I can not go to school if it happens. We would end up getting married at these ages cause we would have to runaway cause our parents are Christian.

We consider our selves to be but we know we made a mistake. If we don't get married our parents might split us apart.

Please help me. Can you get me the right to Homestudy so I can get a job for living with my girlfriend/wife. If not help me make the requirements to make Narcotics.
