PRESIDENTIAL REMARKS: DEPARTURE STATEMENT, EUROPE TRIP
ANDREWS AIR FORCE BASE
MAY 26, 1989

I depart for Europe this morning to meet with all our North Atlantic allies, and also to pay visits to Italy, Germany and the United Kingdom for discussions with the leaders of those Alliance nations on issues of common interest.

I am especially pleased to make my first visit to Europe as President as we celebrate the 40th anniversary of NATO. America is a proud partner in the Atlantic Alliance -- and American interests have been well-served by our alliance system.

Twice in the first half of this century, Europe was the scene of world war. Twice, Americans fought in Europe for the sake of peace and freedom. Today, Europe is enjoying a period of unparalleled prosperity and uninterrupted peace -- longer than any it has known in the modern age. NATO has made the difference -- and the Alliance will prove every bit as important to American and European security in the decade ahead.

The importance of the Alliance and its democratic underpinnings is the message I now take to Europe. NATO has been a success by any measure. But success breeds its own challenges. NATO's unity and strength have kept the peace -- and NATO's resolve has proven a catalyst for the ~~real and overdue~~ changes we are now seeing in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. Changes that

For too long, unnatural and inhuman barriers have divided East from West. We are eager to see a Europe that is truly free, united and at peace -- a significant step for a world at peace. NATO's new challenge in this time of change is to continue to sustain the freedoms that are bringing hope to all of Europe.

Our alliance has been the cornerstone of peace for forty years. It remains so today. Today, as I depart for Europe, let me reaffirm the unwavering American commitment to NATO, ~~and our~~ ^{-- To keep the} ~~belief as a member of the Atlantic Alliance that security is~~ ^{peace in Europe is to keep the peace for America.} ~~indivisible.~~

Many common concerns confront us. Beyond the traditional economic security spheres, we and our partners in the Alliance are working hard on a growing international agenda -- from a common approach to environmental protection, to cooperation against terrorism and drug trafficking.

We also welcome Europe's progress towards a truly common market, and growing European cooperation on security issues, as the basis of an even more dynamic trans-atlantic partnership. As we approach 1992, it is essential that we work with our European partners to ensure an open and expanding world trading system, and that we take strong steps to prevent trade disputes from obscuring our common political and security concerns.

NATO is based on the many bonds between us: our shared heritage, history and culture; our shared commitment to freedom, democracy and the rights of the individual. This is the moral compass of America and the values I will bring to the Summit.

Thank you.

REMARKS BY THE PRESIDENT
UPON DEPARTURE FOR TRIP TO EUROPE

Andrews Air Force Base
Suitland, Maryland

7:07 A.M. EDT

THE PRESIDENT: Well, I depart for Europe this morning to meet with all our North Atlantic allies and also to pay visits to Italy, Germany and the United Kingdom for discussions with leaders of those Alliance nations on issues of common interest.

I'm especially pleased that my first visit to Europe as President is to celebrate the 40th anniversary of NATO. America is a proud partner in the Atlantic Alliance -- and American interests have been well-served by the Alliance.

Twice in the first half of this century Europe was the scene of world war, and twice, Americans fought in Europe for the sake of peace and freedom. Today, Europe is enjoying a period of unparalleled prosperity and uninterrupted peace -- longer than it has known in the modern age and NATO has made the difference. And the Alliance will prove every bit as important to American and European security in the decade ahead.

The importance of the Alliance and its democratic underpinnings is the message I now take to Europe. NATO has been a success by any measure. But success breeds its own challenges. Today, dramatic changes are taking place in Europe, both East and West. For us, those changes bring new challenges and unparalleled opportunities.

For too long, unnatural and inhuman barriers have divided the East from the West. And we hope to overcome that division, to see a Europe that is truly free, united and at peace. We are ready to work with a united Europe, to extend the peace and prosperity we enjoy to other parts of the world. And we hope to move beyond containment -- to integrate the Soviet Union into the community of nations.

We welcome the political and economic liberalization that has taken place so far in the Soviet Union and in some countries of Eastern Europe. We will encourage more changes will follow.

Many common concerns confront us. Beyond the traditional economic and security spheres, we and our partners in the Alliance are working hard on a growing international agenda -- from a common approach to environmental protection, to cooperation against drug trafficking and against terrorism.

We also welcome Europe's progress towards a truly common market and a growing European cooperation on security issues as the basis of an even more dynamic trans-Atlantic partnership. As we approach 1992, it is essential that we work with our European partners to ensure an open and expanding world trading system and that we take strong steps to prevent trade disputes from obscuring our common political and security concerns.

NATO is based on the many bonds between us: our shared heritage, history and culture; our shared commitment to freedom, democracy and the rights of the individual. Barbara and I are looking forward to visiting Europe.

Thank you all very much.

PRESIDENTIAL REMARKS: DEPARTURE STATEMENT, EUROPE TRIP
ANDREWS AIR FORCE BASE
MAY 26, 1989

I depart for Europe this morning to meet with all our North Atlantic allies, and also to pay visits to Italy, Germany and the United Kingdom for discussions with the leaders of those alliance nations on issues of common interest.

I am especially pleased to make my first visit to Europe as President as we celebrate the 40th anniversary of NATO. America is a proud partner in the Atlantic Alliance -- and American interests have been well-served by our alliance system.

Twice in the first half of this century, Europe was the scene of world war. Twice, Americans fought in Europe for the sake of peace and freedom. Today, Europe is enjoying a period of uninterrupted peace and unparalleled prosperity longer than any it has known in the modern age. NATO has made the difference -- and ^{the} ~~our~~ alliances will prove every bit as important to American ^{and European} security in the decade ahead.

The importance of ^{the} alliances ^{of the democratic values which underpin it} is the message I now take to Europe. NATO has been a success by any measure. But success breeds its own challenges. NATO's unity and strength have kept the peace -- and NATO's resolve has proven a catalyst for the real and overdue changes we are now seeing in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe.

We welcome the political and economic liberalization that has taken place so far, and we watch that process with hope that more will follow.

For too long, unnatural and inhuman barriers have divided East from West. We are eager to see a Europe that is truly free, united and at peace -- a significant step for a world at peace. NATO's new challenge in this time of change is to continue to sustain the freedoms that are bringing hope to all of Europe.

Our alliance has been the cornerstone of peace for forty years. It remains so today. Today, as I depart for Europe, let me reaffirm the unwavering American commitment to NATO, and our belief as a member of the Atlantic Alliance that security is indivisible.

Many common concerns confront us. Beyond the traditional security ^(and economic) sphere, we and our partners ^{in the Alliance} are working hard on a growing international agenda -- from a common approach to environmental protection, to cooperation against terrorism and drug trafficking. ✓

We also welcome Europe's progress towards a truly common market, and growing European cooperation on security issues, as the basis of an even more dynamic trans-atlantic partnership. As we approach 1992, it is essential that we work with our European partners to ensure an open and expanding world trading system, and that we take strong steps to prevent trade disputes from obscuring our common political and security concerns.

NATO is based on the many bonds between us: our shared heritage, history and culture; our shared commitment to freedom, democracy and the rights of the individual. These common values are our moral compass as we look toward the future.

Thank you.

PRESIDENTIAL REMARKS: DEPARTURE STATEMENT, EUROPE TRIP
ANDREWS AIR FORCE BASE
MAY 26, 1989

I depart for Europe this morning to meet with all our North Atlantic allies, and also to pay visits to Italy, Germany and the United Kingdom for discussions with the leaders of those alliance nations on issues of common interest.

I am especially pleased to make my first visit to Europe as President as we celebrate the 40th anniversary of NATO. America is a proud partner in the Atlantic Alliance -- and American interests have been well-served by our alliance system.

Twice in the first half of this century, Europe was the scene of world war. Twice, Americans fought in Europe for the sake of peace and freedom. Today, Europe is enjoying a period of uninterrupted peace and unparalleled prosperity longer than any it has known in the modern age. NATO has made the difference -- and our alliances will prove every bit as important to American security in the decade ahead.

The importance of alliance is the message I now take to Europe. NATO has been a success by any measure. But success breeds its own challenges. NATO's unity and strength have kept the peace -- and NATO's resolve has proven a catalyst for the real and overdue changes we are now seeing in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe.

We welcome the political and economic liberalization that has taken place so far, and we watch that process with hope that more will follow.

For too long, unnatural and inhuman barriers have divided East from West. We are eager to see a Europe that is truly free, united and at peace -- a significant step for a world at peace. NATO's new challenge in this time of change is to continue to sustain the freedoms that are bringing hope to all of Europe.

Our alliance has been the cornerstone of peace for forty years. It remains so today. Today, as I depart for Europe, let me reaffirm the unwavering American commitment to NATO, and our belief as a member of the Atlantic Alliance that security is indivisible.

Many common concerns confront us. Beyond the traditional security sphere, we and our partners are working hard on a growing international agenda -- from a common approach to environmental protection, to cooperation against terrorism and drug trafficking.

We also welcome Europe's progress towards a truly common market, and growing European cooperation on security issues, as the basis of an even more dynamic trans-atlantic partnership. As we approach 1992, it is essential that we work with our European partners to ensure an open and expanding world trading system, and that we take strong steps to prevent trade disputes from obscuring our common political and security concerns.

NATO is based on the many bonds between us: our shared heritage, history and culture; our shared commitment to freedom, democracy and the rights of the individual. These common values are our moral compass as we look toward the future.

Thank you.

Many common concerns confront us. Beyond the traditional security sphere, we and our partners are working hard on a growing international agenda -- from a common approach to environmental protection, to cooperation against terrorism and drug trafficking.

We also welcome Europe's progress towards a truly common market, and growing European cooperation on security issues, as the basis of an even more dynamic trans-atlantic partnership. As we approach 1992, it is essential that we work with our European partners to ensure an open and expanding world trading system, and that we take strong steps to prevent trade disputes from obscuring our common political and security concerns.

NATO is based on the many bonds between us: our shared heritage, history and culture; our shared commitment to freedom, democracy and the rights of the individual. These common values are our moral compass as we look toward the future.

Thank you.
