REMARKS BY THE PRESIDENT AND PRIME MINISTER HAUGHEY OF IRELAND
UPON DEPARTURE

The South Grounds

1:24 P.M. EST

THE PRESIDENT: Well, it's been a great pleasure to meet today with Prime Minister Haughey. The last time we met was almost a year ago as we celebrated St. Patrick's Day here at the White House and renewed the shared values and kinship that have bound our two nations together for over 200 years. Nine signers of the Declaration of Independence proudly claimed Ireland as their ancestral home. And so it's an honor to welcome the Taoiseach to America's home, designed by an Irishman, I might add.

And today, the Prime Minister is visiting Washington, though, in another capacity -- as the President of the European Council. And with the rapid change we're witnessing across Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, the relationship between the United States and the European Community has never been more important.

The Revolution of '89 brought with it new opportunities and challenges, and it is critical that we work to make the strong bonds between this nation and its European friends even stronger.

The Prime Minister and I had a productive discussion of the many issues of great interest to the United States, to the EC, to Ireland, including: the prospect of German unification, regional issues around the world, and we touched on Northern Ireland as well.

I was especially interested in the Prime Minister's views on the new architecture of Europe. He and I agree on the principles that should guide the design of the new Europe. First, we both welcome the prospect of overcoming the artificial division of the continent and building a Europe whole and free, united by universal values that are based on freedom and democracy. And second, there is no question that Western solidarity protect stability in this time of change. And the transatlantic cooperation now is more important than ever.

As I've said before, the United States will remain a European power. Third, we both look to the Conference of Security and Cooperation in Europe, the CSCE, to play a greater role in Europe's future, including guidance for the conduct of truly free elections and the transition from planned economies to pluralistic systems.

Fourth, we believe the EC must play a vital role in the new Europe. A more united Europe, able to take its rightful place in world affairs, is good for the United States of America. And we'll look for ways to improve our ties to the community so a new Atlanticism will be teamed with a new Europe. And today's meeting takes us forward in building new structures for the U.S. relationship with the community. We committed ourselves to regular meeting between myself and the President of the EC, to provide overall political guidance for the relationship. We agreed to twice-yearly meetings between the EC foreign ministers and our Secretary of State. And we committed ourselves to joint efforts in the war against drugs and our hopes to preserve the global environment.

We do not expect perfect agreement between the United States and the EC on every issue, but we do agree that our inherent belief in the value of freedom, democracy, opportunity, binds us together and that our mutual cooperation can benefit all. And we also agree that the historic ties of friendship between our two countries, the United States and Ireland, can serve the cause of peace in the international arena.

We're grateful for Ireland's efforts to encourage and enhance U.S.-EC cooperation. And we also appreciate Ireland's efforts to promote economic development, security, reconciliation, and peace in Northern Ireland. In a time when all things seem possible, all Americans hope for an end to the conflict that has brought such sadness to your beautiful land and your wonderful people.

Mr. Prime Minister, we wish you Godspeed on your journey home. The days ahead are exciting ones, full of expectations. And together, they can be days of great cooperation and great progress for all people. Thank you, sir, for your leadership. Thank you for your friendship. And God bless the United States and Ireland. Thank you, sir. (Applause.)

PRIME MINISTER HAUGHEY: Mr. President, ladies and gentlemen, my visit to Washington takes place at a time of profound international change. The President and I, in my capacity as President of the European Council, discussed U.S.-European Community relations and their future evolution in the context of the Community's increasingly important role on the international, political and economic scene.

The President and I agreed, at this time, to strengthen the links between the European community and the United States. We agreed for that purpose, as the President has said, that a meeting between the U.S. President and each President in office of the European Council should become a regular feature of the U.S.-European Community relations, and that one such meeting should be held each presidency of the European Council. And I'll be recommending to my European colleagues, the heads of state or government of the European community, immediately on my return.

We also agreed that the foreign ministers of the community will meet the U.S. Secretary of State on two occasions a year, at least. In addition, the European Commission is taking steps to increase the frequency of its formal meetings with the U.S. government. This arrangement will give us both a better overall structure and direction to the wide variety of existing contacts and discussions, and they will also provide a new framework for enhanced political and economic ties between the Community and the United States.

We are, in fact, building a broader bridge across the Atlantic. We also, the President and I, discussed areas for specific cooperation. And we agreed that the fight against international drug trafficking and the international movement of drug funds are areas very appropriate for specific cooperation. We shared common concerns on the need for continuing efforts to protect the environment in areas such as global climate change, the depletion of the ozone layer, and endangered species. And may I say that I think it's entirely appropriate that I, who have set myself the aim of being of a green presidency of the European Community, should be having these discussions at this stage with President Bush who has set for himself the role of environmental President in the United States.

During our meeting, we also reviewed developments in Central and Eastern Europe; in particular, implications of German unification. The President and I agreed that the United States and the Community have a pivotal role to play in overcoming the divisions between East and West and in laying the foundations for a Europe united in its commitment to peace, prosperity, democracy, and above all, a respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms.

The President and I also discussed a number of bilateral issues, including immigration, super royalties, passive foreign investment companies and, of course, the situation in Northern Ireland.

And I greatly appreciate the President's deep personal concern for the situation in Northern Ireland and his constant wish to be of any possible assistance he can in bringing forward a solution to that intractable and difficult and tragic problem.

I expressed my appreciation for constructive U.S. interest and support for Anglo-Irish relations.

Mr. President, it has been for me a great pleasure to have had the benefit of talking to you and receiving the benefit of your views and your insights into European and, indeed, international affairs at this very exciting time for all humanity. Thank you very much, indeed. (Applause.)

THE PRESIDENT: Well, thank you, sir. It's a great pleasure to have you here.

I told the him that Americans welcomed the single market program and the the United States supported European integration. The form of such integration is for the members of the Community of Twelve to decide. But as that integration takes place, the European Community should ensure that its actions are outward looking, and do not adversely affect the economic interests of non-members.

The role and responsibilities of the European Community is growing at a pace that no one could have dreamed of even a year ago. And as that role changes, we are looking for ways to enhance ties between the United States and the European Community. We must build an even stronger framework for cooperation -- consulting regularly with one another on a broad range of issues covering the entire economic and political spectrum.

PRESIDENTIAL REMARKS: DEPARTURE OF PRIME MINISTER HAUGHEY
FEBRUARY 27, 1990
DIPLOMATIC ENTRANCE
1:00 P.M.

It has been a great pleasure to meet today with Prime Minister Haughey. The last time we met was almost a year ago as we celebrated St. Patrick's Day here at the White House and renewed the shared values and kinship that have bound our two nations together for over 200 years.

Thirteen signers of the Declaration of Independence proudly claimed Ireland as their ancestral home, and so it is an honor to welcome Prime Minister Haughey to America's home -- designed by an Irishman I might add.

But today, the Prime Minister is visiting Washington in another capacity -- as the ^{President} ~~Chairman~~ of the European Council. With the rapid change we are witnessing across Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, the relationship between the United States and the European Community has never been more important. The Revolution of '89 brought with it new opportunities and challenges, and it is critical that we work to make the strong bonds between this nation and its European friends even stronger.

The Prime Minister and I had a productive discussion of the many issues of great interest to the United States, to the E.C., and to Ireland, including ^{the prospect of German unification,} regional issues around the world, and

INSERT "A"

The Prime Minister and I agree on the principles that should guide the design of the new Europe. First, we both welcome the prospect of overcoming the artificial division of the continent and building a Europe whole and free, united by universal values based on freedom and democracy. Second, there is no question that Western solidarity protects stability in this time of change and that transatlantic cooperation is more important than ever. As I have said before, the United States will remain a European power. Third, we both look to the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, the CSCE, to play a greater role in Europe's future, including guidance for the conduct of truly free elections and the transition from planned economies to more pluralistic systems. Fourth, we believe the EC must play a vital role in the new Europe. A more united Europe, able to take its rightful place in world affairs, is good for America. We will look for ways to improve our ties to the Community so a new Atlanticism will be teamed with a new Europe.

Today ^{is meeting} ~~the Prime Minister, acting in his EC capacity, joined with me in issuing a statement that~~ takes us forward in building new structures for the U.S. relationship with the Community. We committed ourselves to regular meetings between myself and the President of the European Council to provide overall political guidance for the relationship. We agreed to twice-yearly meetings between EC Foreign Ministers and the Secretary of State. And we committed ourselves to joint efforts in the war against drugs and our hopes to preserve the global environment.

Northern Ireland. I was especially interested in Prime Minister Haughey's views on the new architecture of Europe.

cc I told ~~the~~ him that Americans welcomed the single market program and ~~the~~ the United States supported European integration. The form of such integration is for ~~the~~ members of the Community of Twelve to decide. But ~~as~~ that integration takes place, the European Community should ensure that its actions are outward looking, and do not adversely affect the economic interests of non-members.

The role and responsibilities of the European Community is growing at a pace that no one could have dreamed of even a year ago. And as that role changes, we are looking for ways to enhance ties between the United States and the European Community. We must build an even stronger framework for cooperation -- consulting regularly with one another on a broad range of issues covering the entire economic and political spectrum.

INSERT
A ~~The Prime Minister and I both know that ours is not a~~ ~~perfect world. And so we~~ ^{We} do not expect perfect agreement between the United States and the E.C. on every issue. But we do agree that our inherent belief in the value of freedom, democracy, and opportunity binds us together and that our mutual cooperation can benefit all. And we also agree that the historic ties of friendship between our own two countries - the United States and Ireland -- can serve the cause of peace in the international arena. We are grateful for Ireland's efforts to encourage and enhance US-EC cooperation, and we also appreciate Ireland's efforts to promote economic development, security, reconciliation and peace in Northern Ireland. In a time when all things seem possible, all Americans hope for end to the conflict that has brought such sadness to such a beautiful land and a wonderful people.

Mr. Prime Minister, we wish you Godspeed on your journey home. The days ahead are exciting ones -- full of expectation. Together, they can be days of great cooperation and great progress for all people.

OFFICIAL WORKING VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER HAUGHEY OF IRELAND

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

DRAFT REMARKS

Today, I was happy to meet with Prime Minister Haughey, who is visiting Washington in Ireland's capacity as the President of the European Council.

The Prime Minister and I discussed many issues of great interest to the United States, to the EC, and to Ireland, including regional issues around the world and Northern Ireland.

I was especially interested in hearing Mr. Haughey's views on the new architecture of Europe. The EC serves as a symbol and guide in reshaping Europe in this decade. We are both determined to work closely together to see economic and political freedom extend to all the citizens of Europe.

I told the Prime Minister that we welcomed the single market program and that the U.S. has always supported European integration. The form of such integration is for Europeans to decide. It is important, however, for the EC to ensure that European integration remains outward looking and does not adversely affect the economic interests of non-members.

We are looking for ways to strengthen U.S.-EC links. We believe that we should build a consultative relationship which covers the whole economic and political spectrum as the Community's responsibilities grow. As today's meeting indicated, we are now well into this building process.

We also believe that our fundamentally shared values and interests will continue to ensure that transatlantic cooperation will benefit us both.

I was happy to express our appreciation for Ireland's efforts to promote U.S.-EC cooperation.

I also had the opportunity to express America's appreciation for Ireland's efforts to promote economic development, justice, security, and reconciliation in Northern Ireland.

America's traditional relationship with Ireland is enhanced by ties of kinship and shared values. Today's meeting is an example of U.S.-Irish cooperation in the international arena in the cause of justice, peace and progress. Working together to solve international problems encourages the development and maturation of our traditional bilateral relationship and friendship.

Mr. Prime Minister, we wish you a safe journey home, and we look forward to continued cooperation in the days ahead.
