REMARKS BY THE PRESIDENT AND PRIME MINISTER MANLEY OF JAMAICA
UPON DEPARTURE

The South Portico

1:18 P.M. EDT

THE PRESIDENT: Mr. Prime Minister and members of the Jamaican delegation, thank you for coming to the White House. We are pleased and, indeed, honored that you are with us here today.

It's been my pleasure to host Prime Minister Manley on this first official visit to Washington. Columbus may have had something going correct when he said in 1494 -- he called it "the fairest isle that eyes hav beheld, speaking about Jamaica." And those of us who have been there, and I'm included, understand exactly what Christopher Columbus meant.

The United States and Jamaica enjoy a very close relationship, and that's because we have so many bonds of friendship and family. Some 5,000 Americans have made Jamaica their home, while 400,000 of your people have settled here in the United States. And I think that's to the enrichment of both countries. Early in this century, one Jamaican couple moved to this country, they raised a son, told him to "do something with his life." Their son grew up to be the man that both Jamaicans and Americans can be very proud of: And I'm talking about our Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Colin Powell. I had a chance to discuss him behind his back with the Prime Minister at lunch, and he assured me that Jamaicans have that same high regard that we do for our Chairman.

In our meeting today, we not only renewed a friendship that I value, but we expressed -- I had a chance to express to him the total satisfaction that I feel about the cooperation between our countries. We talked about some difficult problems -- the economic and financial situation. The Prime Minister, no holds barred, told me of some of the problems that he faces in terms of an external debt. That was coupled with some news he gave me about the dynamic growth in the Jamaican GNP. I commended his efforts to meet the difficult economic and developmental challenges through diversification, and then again, he's been out front on the private sector investment front. And I salute that, and told him so.

The United States wants to help in these efforts, and I'm afraid I cried on his shoulder a little about some budget limitations that we face here in the United States. But we will continue to support development and growth in Jamaica. And his neighbors that share democratic traditions -- we explored the historic political developments in the Caribbean and Latin America. I asked him for his views about what was happening in Central America as well as the Caribbean, and he shared them with me -- a very insightful presentation.

I do appreciate his insights, and I very much appreciate the role that Jamaica plays in regional affairs. We gave particular applause to his efforts on behalf of democracy and economic reform. I think we see eye to eye on the need for that to continue. I've commissioned Secretary Brady and asked Secretary Eagleburger both to undertake some specific assignments to see how much flexibility the United States can have in helping Jamaica in the ways that would benefit their move towards more privatization, more economic growth, and more to the benefit of all Jamaican people.

So we talked about some -- we touched on the subject of cooperation in narco trafficking. Jamaica has been steadfast in working with us, determined to cut down this trafficking. We want to salute those individuals in Jamaica who are working in cooperation with the United States on the war on drugs. The Jamaican efforts are crucial, and we look forward to continued cooperation in this area.

So all in all, it was just the kind of visit that I, at least, looked forward to -- a frank discussion between friends. We also shared with the Prime Minister our global view of our relations with the Soviet Union and our insight into developments in Eastern Europe, knowing that though the way we handle these matters affect countries here in the Caribbean and all around the world, Your country's motto, sir, "Out of many, one people," and ours is "E Pluribus Unum," which is pretty much the same thing.

So we have different people, one common aspiration, one common goal -- and that's freedom. So let's not rest until all the nations of our hemisphere enjoy the fruits of democracy and freedom. I guess what I really want to say is, good luck, sir. I'm glad you came our way.

PRIME MINISTER MANLEY: Mr. President and distinguished members of the administration. I'd, first of all, like to thank you very much for this invitation and for the marvelous hospitality, courtesy which we've been received, and for the very interesting discussions that this made possible.

I'd like to say to everybody that when the next winter comes, if anybody has the slightest doubt about where they should go, I refer them to the President of the United States quoting Christopher Columbus. (Laughter.)

I might also say that I assured the President that we Jamaicans regard General Colin Powell as perhaps our most distinguished export, of whom we are very proud.

We had, as the President has said, extremely interesting discussions, and very frank. We share your delight in the increasing triumph of democracy all over the world. On the other hand, we have been concerned that some of us who have been in the trenches of democracy all along might get forgotten in the new excitement. But I am very confident from things that we had observed in President Bush's administration and from our talks today, that you do not intend to divert from our immense needs, but rather to seek new ways of helping new friends, you might say, new members of the family of democracy.

I must also say that we have been very impressed with the feeling that the President has a genuine interest in this hemisphere outside of North America. We really have felt his personal interest in the Caribbean, Central America and Latin America. And I must say, Mr. President, that even though we argue strongly not to divert resources from us, but equally realize that the United States is under tremendous pressure -- has tremendous problems of its responsibilities all over the world.

And I think that to me, the most interesting and constructive single thing that came out of these talks is that we feel that when you look at debt -- when you look at problems of capital formation, where do we get the capital to sustain economic development in a country like Jamaica, that we can't so much try to find new money to throw at the problem; but what we have to do is to use our ingenuity, use our sheer brains and imagination to find ways that take resources that are there and put them to work.

And it has been a great source of encouragement to me, Mr. President, to feel that you and your administration are responsive to that. I think, together, if we just put our imagination to work, put our brains to work, we can accomplish remarkable things. And as I say, when next you plan to travel, Jamaica is there and within reach.

Thank you very much, Mr. President. God bless you and your great country.

THE PRESIDENT: Thank you very much. Just beautiful. Thank you, sir. That was wonderful. (Applause.)

PRESIDENTIAL REMARKS: DEPARTURE STATEMENT: P.M. MANLEY
DIPLOMATIC ENTRANCE, SOUTH PORTICO
THURSDAY, MAY 3, 1990, 1:30 P.M.

Mr. Prime Minister, Members of the Jamaican delegation -- thank you for coming to the White House. We are very pleased and honored that you are here.

It has been a great pleasure to host Prime Minister Manley on his first official visit to Washington. When Columbus came ashore on Jamaica in 1494, he called it "the fairest isle that eyes have beheld." And in 1983, I saw on my own visit that the reputation for the natural charm of both the Jamaican people and their land remains well-deserved.

The United States and Jamaica have enjoyed very close relations, as befits two nations who share so many bonds of friendship and family. Some 5,000 Americans have made Jamaica their home, while 400,000 of your people have settled here, to the enrichment of us all. \ \ Early in this century, one Jamaican couple moved to this country, raised a son, and told him to "do something with his life." Their son grew up to be a man of whom both Jamaicans and Americans can be very proud: Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Colin Powell. \ \ \

In our meeting today, the Prime Minister and I renewed our friendship and expressed our satisfaction in the close cooperation between our countries. We discussed Jamaica's economic and financial situation, and the Prime Minister
described the seriousness of his country's large external debt.

I commend his government's courageous efforts to meet Jamaica's difficult economic and developmental challenges through diversification and private-sector investment. The United States wants to be helpful in those efforts, and, within our own budget limitations, we will continue to support development and growth in Jamaica.

As neighbors sharing democratic traditions, we explored the historic political developments in the Caribbean and Latin America. I deeply appreciate Prime Minister Manley's insights and the positive role Jamaica has played in regional affairs. I particularly applaud his leadership in the struggle for political freedom and respect for human rights. It was Simon Bolivar, writing from Jamaica in 1815, who said, "A people that loves freedom will in the end be free." With a new tide of freedom sweeping the Western Hemisphere, we both hope for democratic and peaceful solutions to the problems of the Caribbean and elsewhere in Latin America.

We discussed bilateral cooperation in combatting narcotics trafficking. And we want to salute our partners in Jamaica who are working in cooperation with the U.S. in the war on drugs. The Jamaican government's efforts are crucial, and we look forward to continued cooperation in this area.

Thank you, Mr. Prime Minister, for your visit. You are a close and good friend of the United States -- a leader dedicated to freedom, democracy, and peace -- and a trusted ally. I could not help but notice that your country's motto -- "Out of many, one people," -- is essentially the same as ours: "E Pluribus Unum." And so it could be for the entire Western Hemisphere. Many different people, but one common aspiration, one common goal: freedom. So let us not rest until all the nations of our hemisphere enjoy the fruits of democracy and freedom. I wish you and the people of Jamaica all the best and look forward to working with you as together, we face the challenges of the future. Thank you.

I commend his government's courageous efforts to meet Jamaica's difficult economic and developmental challenges through diversification and private-sector investment. The United States wants to be helpful in those efforts, and, within our own budget limitations, we will continue to support development and growth in Jamaica.

As neighbors sharing democratic traditions, we explored the historic political developments in the Caribbean and Latin America. I deeply appreciate Prime Minister Manley's insights and the positive role Jamaica has played in regional affairs. I particularly applaud his leadership in the struggle for political freedom and respect for human rights. It was Simon Bolivar, writing from Jamaica in 1815, who said, "A people that loves freedom will in the end be free." With a new tide of freedom sweeping the Western Hemisphere, we both hope for democratic and peaceful solutions to the problems of the Caribbean and elsewhere in Latin America.

We discussed bilateral cooperation in combatting narcotics trafficking. And we want to salute our partners in Jamaica who are working in cooperation with the U.S. in the war on drugs. The Jamaican government's efforts are crucial, and we look forward to continued cooperation in this area.

Thank you, Mr. Prime Minister, for your visit. You are a close and good friend of the United States -- a leader dedicated to freedom, democracy, and peace -- and a trusted ally. I could not help but notice that your country's motto -- "Out of many,

one people," -- is essentially the same as ours: "E Pluribus Unum." And so it could be for the entire Western Hemisphere. Many different people, but one common aspiration, one common goal: freedom. So let us not rest until all the nations of our hemisphere enjoy the fruits of democracy and freedom. I wish you and the people of Jamaica all the best and look forward to working with you as together, we face the challenges of the future. Thank you.

DIPLOMATIC ENTRANCE, SOUTH PORTICO
THURSDAY, MAY 3, 1990, 1:30 P.M.

Mr. Prime Minister, Members of the Jamaican delegation -- thank you for coming to the White House. We are very pleased and honored that you are here.

It has been a great pleasure to host Prime Minister Manley
on his first official visit to Washington. When Columbus came ashore on Jamaica in 1494, he called it "the fairest isle that eyes have beheld." And in 1983, I saw on my own visit that the reputation for the natural charm of both the Jamaican people and their land remains well-deserved.

The United States and Jamaica have enjoyed very close relations, as befits two nations who share so many bonds of friendship and family. Some 5,000 Americans have made Jamaica
their home, while 400,000 of your people have settled here, to
the enrichment of us all. \\ Early in this century, one Jamaican couple moved to this country, raised a son, and told him to "do something with his life." Their son grew up to be a man of whom both Jamaicans and Americans can be very proud: Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Colin Powell. \\\

In our meeting today, the Prime Minister and I renewed our friendship and expressed our satisfaction in the close cooperation between our countries. We discussed Jamaica's
economic and financial situation, and the Prime Minister
described the seriousness of his country's large external debt.

I commend his government's courageous efforts to meet Jamaica's difficult economic and developmental challenges through diversification and private-sector investment. The United States wants to be helpful in those efforts, and, within our own budget limitations, we will continue to support development and growth in Jamaica.

As neighbors sharing democratic traditions, we explored the historic political developments in the Caribbean and Latin America.
