PRESIDENTIAL REMARKS: URUGUAY ARRIVAL STATEMENT
MONTEVIDEO, URUGUAY
DECEMBER 4, 1990 12:30 P.M.

I'm delighted to be here in Uruguay, Artigas' strong nation which is once again a shining example of democracy. And I'm especially pleased to be meeting again with President Lacalle -- a man of courageous vision; a strong leader I admire very much. I know this trip will solidify the special association that exists not only between us as leaders -- but also between our countries.

This is an exciting time, because we're entering a new era in U.S.-Latin American relations. That's why I thought it was important to come to this region; to talk face-to-face with the men and women who are going to lead this continent into the 21st century. To talk about key issues that concern all our nations.

When President Lacalle and I meet, we are going to discuss in detail our Enterprise for the Americas Initiative, which calls for a major hemispheric effort toward economic restructuring.

And we will speak of our concern for the successful completion of the Uruguay Round of GATT, which began here in 1987. The negotiators, who resumed their talks yesterday, must reach agreement now -- so that we can begin immediately to reduce or eliminate distortions to world trade.

We will also talk of an ultimate aim of our countries: a free trade system that links all of the Americas. For, as

President Lacalle said, "We do not believe that the solution is more aid, but rather more trade."

And, perhaps above all, I look forward to talking with President Lacalle about the exciting future that lies ahead. We in the Americas are on the brink of something unprecedented in world history: the first wholly democratic hemisphere. In anticipation of that, we need to create -- together -- a permanent partnership among all the nations of the Americas.

Centuries ago, the first visitors to Uruguay came seeking a new passageway to the Pacific. Today, we come seeking new understanding and new opportunities. Nearly 90 years ago, Jose Batlee y Ordonez could have been speaking for all of us today when he said: "Fellow citizens, peace is on the horizon ... accompanied by its splendid court: liberty, legality, progress, civilization."

For this is the new dawn of a New World, and we are excited to be entering this era shoulder-to-shoulder with our brothers and sisters of Uruguay and all of Latin America. Thank you for this warm welcome, and God bless your beautiful country.

PRESIDENTIAL REMARKS: URUGUAY ARRIVAL STATEMENT
MONTEVIDEO, URUGUAY
DECEMBER 4, 1990 12:30 P.M.

I'm delighted to be here in Uruguay, Artigas' strong nation which is once again a shining example of democracy. And I'm especially pleased to be meeting again with President Lacalle -- a man of courageous vision; a strong leader I admire very much. I know this trip will solidify the special association that exists not only between us as leaders -- but also between our countries.

This is an exciting time, because we're entering a new era in U.S.-Latin American relations. That's why I thought it was important to come to this region; to talk face-to-face with the men and women who are going to lead this continent into the 21st century. To talk about key issues that concern all our nations.

When President Lacalle and I meet, we are going to discuss in detail our Enterprise for the Americas Initiative, which calls for a major hemispheric effort toward economic restructuring.

And we will speak of our concern for the successful completion of the Uruguay Round of GATT, which began here in 1987. The negotiators, who resumed their talks yesterday, must reach agreement now -- so that we can begin immediately to reduce or eliminate distortions to world trade.

We will also talk of an ultimate aim of our countries: a free trade system that links all of the Americas. For, as

President Lacalle said, "We do not believe that the solution is more aid, but rather more trade."

And, perhaps above all, I look forward to talking with President Lacalle about the exciting future that lies ahead. We in the Americas are on the brink of something unprecedented in world history: the first wholly democratic hemisphere. In anticipation of that, we need to create -- together -- a permanent partnership among all the nations of the Americas.

Centuries ago, the first visitors to Uruguay came seeking a new passageway to the Pacific. Today, we come seeking new understanding and new opportunities. Nearly 90 years ago, Jose <sup>Batlle</sup> Batlle y Ordonez could have been speaking for all of us today when he said: "Fellow citizens, peace is on the horizon ... accompanied by its splendid court: liberty, legality, progress, civilization."

~~For this is the new dawn of a New World,~~ and <sup>we</sup> we are excited to be entering this <sup>new</sup> era shoulder-to-shoulder with our brothers and sisters of Uruguay and all of Latin America. Thank you for this warm welcome, and God bless your beautiful country.

This is an exciting time, because we're entering a new era in U.S.-Latin American relations. That's why I thought it was important to come to this region; to talk face-to-face with the men and women who are going to lead this continent into the 21st century. When President Lacalle and I meet, we are going to discuss in detail our Enterprise for the Americas Initiative, which calls for a major hemispheric effort toward economic restructuring.

And we will speak of our concern for the successful completion of the Uruguay Round of GATT, which began here in 1986. This week our ministers are in Brussels for the final 1997. The negotiators, who resumed their talks yesterday, must reach agreement now -- so that we can begin immediately to reduce or reduce or eliminate distortions to world trade.

USTR

We will also talk of an ultimate aim of our countries: a free trade system that links all of the Americas. For, as

Clarify the situation must send the right message that USTR wants them to receive.

President Lacalle said, "We do not believe that the solution is more aid, but rather more trade."

And, perhaps above all, I look forward to talking with President Lacalle about the exciting future that lies ahead. We in the Americas are on the brink of something unprecedented in world history: the first wholly democratic hemisphere.
