PRESIDENTIAL REMARKS: EMBASSY REMARKS
BUENOS AIRES, ARGENTINA
THURSDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1990

o Ambassador Todman, Doris, friends. Thank you for that kind introduction. It is indeed a pleasure to return to Argentina and it is a particular pleasure to see one of our country's most distinguished career Ambassadors.

o I was last here in December 1983, when I was among those privileged to welcome Argentina back to the community of democratic Nations. I have hosted President Menem in the United States on two occasions. It is an honor to now be in your home.

o After just a few hours here, I know why many refer to Buenos Aires as "the intellectual capital of the continent." I only wish we had more time to explore its many wonders. I also wanted to get in a set of tennis with Ambassador Todman. The winner gets taken over to the Rio Alpa for steaks and beer. // Maybe next time. //

o From our experience in China, I realize what a burden a Presidential visit can be. I know, too, that no one can further ties between the host and visiting countries more than the men and women -- American and foreign -- who staff our embassies. Both Doro and I extend to you our heart-felt thanks.

o When you look at a map, Washington and Buenos Aires seem at opposite ends of the globe. // Of course, many Americans say that regarding any city and Washington, D.C. // Yet during the last two days, we've sampled a touch of America many miles from home. The reason is the kindness of both Argentines and Americans. // o For that, we thank you -- and for helping to affirm the values which link our Nations. Think of freedom and democracy. Both countries believe in them. // Think of economic reform. Like America, Argentina has undertaken it. // Think of the work ethic, belief in country, and love of God. Never have our two countries been better allies, or friends. //

o We are two Nations -- but you have helped further the ties that bind. Doro and I salute you, and look forward to again meeting the men and women who embody America at her finest. Thank you all, and God bless the United States of America.
