PRESIDENTIAL REMARKS: DEPARTURE FOR KIEV
HALL OF ST. GEORGE, THE KREMLIN
AUGUST 1, 1991
[TIME]

I leave Moskow grateful for your kindness, and encouraged by our progress.

We've worked to build a new basis for prosperity --- and new hope for peace and stability. We've discussed ways to encourage economic cooperation, and share expertise and advice. We've sought a framework for shared efforts toward peace in the Middle East.

We have considered ways to curb the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, and to encourage environmental stewardship. And we've signed an historic START treaty that will help the world breathe a little easier.

But more fundamentally, after decades of ideology that cruelly divided us, I hope we have confirmed more of the shared values that unite us. Compared to the dark days of the Cold War, we have less in the way of differences than ever -- and more reason for hope.

My optimism about the future of this great land stems from the strength of its leadership -- that of President Gorbachev, and many others. But more fundamentally, I find faith in the future of the Soviet Union, because I believe deeply in the power of its people.

I've met with business people, leaders of the Republics, and reformers at all levels. In spite of the vast array of challenges before you, a deep undercurrent of enduring optimism runs here. The forces of reform -- the drive toward democratization, political pluralism and market economics ---all offer real hope for lasting stability and prosperity.

In my country, those who struggled for their own kind of reform two hundred years ago began our Constitution with the words, "We the people" -- words we Americans still admire.

And while the Soviet Union will forge its own future in its own way, this we hold in common: We seek to unleash the energy and ambition of the individual in the service of a greater good. We believe that while men may, for a time, be intimidated by force, mankind finds inspiration in freedom.

Leo Tolstoi once wrote, "The strongest of all warriors are these two: Time, and Patience."

We have both -- matched by a determination that our two nations, once feared as the strongest of warriors, now become the firmest of friends.

Thank you all for your many kindnesses.

May God bless the U.S.S.R.
