CONFIDENTIAL REMARKS: AMERICAN COMMUNITY RECEPTION
TOKYO, JAPAN
TUESDAY, JANUARY 7, 1992

Thank you. I'm glad to be here, with wonderful hosts [Ambassador and Mrs. Armacost] and with friends like all of you. I do have one disappointment, though. Earlier today I wanted to stop and buy some souvenirs -- but Barbara's cut my kozu kai. \\

This meeting gives me a chance to hear from you: engineers, teachers, electronics specialists, businessmen and women. Together, as the American community in Tokyo, you show the world the advantages of our nations' relationship. Better than any other Americans, you understand Japan's complex culture.

In addition, you play pivotal roles as decision and opinion makers. I want to learn about your experiences, and about your insights into how to make our nations' working relationship as mutually beneficial and productive as possible.

And I want to discuss with you one message that is absolutely critical to our nation's future. America can soar only if America spreads its wings.

Our world faces a new day. We've joined together to break down the old symbols of division -- symbols like the Berlin Wall. Well, now we have the chance to break down other kinds of barriers. We need to start by swinging our sledgehammers at the wall of misunderstanding that separates two nations. When we can break down that wall -- then our horizons will be unlimited. For America must continue to grow abroad in order to grow at home.

Nowhere is this more true than here, in the Pacific region. And no relationship is more important to our interests than the one with Japan. We must join hands together in trust and commitment. We must learn from each other -- learn from the traditions and thoughts that are different as well as from the interests and objectives we share.

I know that's not always easy. Economic competition can strain even the healthiest relationship, especially when there's a lack of reciprocal access to each other's markets. Each of us must begin by realizing that open markets and free trade give every nation the chance to express its own economic genius.

One critical element: we need greater access to Japan's markets. I know many of you here can attest to the fact that, although this isn't an easy task, it can be done.

Yes, we have work to do at home. My upcoming State of the Union message will set out a broad agenda to restore American competitiveness. But we also have to look beyond our shores to solve our economic problems. We all now belong to an international marketplace. And we all now share the critical lesson of the 20th century -- peace and prosperity flourish only through global engagement, and through free and fair trade. Nations that withdraw into their own borders, that embrace protectionism, or that practice isolationism, only guarantee their own society's disintegration.

We can -- and we will -- achieve our objectives. We will do this not by hiding behind misunderstandings, or by turning our backs on challenging relationships, but by using the strengths of those relationships. We will succeed by working to understand each other, our ways of life and our dreams.

I want to thank every one of you here tonight for the daily contributions you make toward building stronger U.S.-Japan relations. Keep up the good work. God bless you -- and the two nations we share -- Japan and the United States of America.

01 PRESIDENTIAL REMARKS: AMERICAN COMMUNITY RECEPTION
TOKYO, JAPAN
TUESDAY, JANUARY 7, 1992

Thank you. I'm glad to be here, with wonderful hosts [Ambassador and Mrs. Armacost] and with friends like all of you. I do have one disappointment, though. Earlier today I wanted to stop and buy some souvenirs -- but Barbara's cut my kozu kai. \\
01 PRESIDENTIAL 5:09

This meeting gives me a chance to hear from you: engineers, teachers, electronics specialists, ^{bankers and} businessmen ^{people} and women. ^(tracy)
Together, as the American community in Tokyo, you show the world the advantages of our ^{two (Fleary)} nations' relationship. Better than any other Americans, you understand Japan's complex culture.

In addition, you play pivotal roles as decision and opinion makers. I want to learn about your experiences, and about your insights into how to make our nations' working relationship as mutually beneficial and productive as possible.

And I want to discuss with you one message that is absolutely critical to our nation's future. America can soar only if America spreads its wings.

Our world faces a new day. We've joined together to break down the old symbols of division -- symbols like the Berlin Wall. Well, now we have the chance to break down other kinds of barriers. We need to start by swinging our sledgehammers at the wall of misunderstanding that separates two nations. When we can break down that wall -- then our horizons will be unlimited. For America must continue to grow abroad in order to grow at home.

Nowhere is this more true than here, in the Pacific region. And no relationship is more important to our interests than the one with Japan. We must join hands together in trust and commitment. We must learn from each other -- learn from the traditions and thoughts that are different as well as from the interests and objectives we share.

I know that's not always easy. Economic competition can strain even the healthiest relationship, especially when there's a lack of reciprocal access to each other's markets. Each of us must begin by realizing that open markets and free trade give every nation the chance to express its own economic genius.

One critical element: we need greater access to Japan's markets. I know many of you here can attest to the fact that, although this isn't an easy task, it can be done.

Yes, we have work to do at home. My upcoming State of the Union message will set out a broad agenda to ^{improve further} ~~restore and~~ American competitiveness. ~~competitiveness~~ But we also have to look beyond our shores to solve our economic problems. We all now belong to an international marketplace. And we all now share the critical lesson of the 20th century -- peace and prosperity flourish only through global engagement, and through free and fair trade. Nations that withdraw into their own borders, that embrace protectionism, or that practice isolationism, only guarantee their own society's disintegration. If we really want to put America first, we do it by staying engaged, staying a leader in world affairs. (Treasury) We can -- and we will -- achieve our objectives. We will do this not by hiding behind misunderstandings, or by turning our backs on challenging relationships, but by using the strengths of those relationships. We will succeed by working to understand each other, our ways of life and our dreams.

I want to thank every one of you here tonight for the daily contributions you make toward building stronger U.S.-Japan relations. Keep up the good work. God bless you -- and the two nations we share -- Japan and the United States of America.
