Janice:

You have shoe-horned an amazing amount of stuff into an 11-page speech. You have jobs, family and peace; you have the five pillars; you have points of lighty stuff; you have another American Century; you even have (bless your soul) capital gains cuts.

I'll offer two sorts of suggestions here: First, notes on Charlotte, a city I know something about; second, a few suggestions about the Vision Thing.

As to Charlotte: The town really has exploded in recent years. The Old NCNB Towers, which were a gleaming brand new landmark 20 years ago, have been dwarfed by new towers (I forget what they are, but they also belong to what they now call NationsBank). Charlotte has become a major league city, with the Charlotte Hornets basketball franchise; it is the largest city in the Carolinas; and it calls itself the Queen City because of its namesake, Queen Charlotte.

Jim Martin graduated from my alma mater, Davidson College, and taught chemistry there before entering politics as a Republican in 1972, a sin for which many of his ex-colleagues have never forgiven him. I don't know about the doctor stuff; as far as I know, he doesn't have an M.D., but you know his plans better than I do. You might want to throw in some kind of kudo to Martin: Republicans have been begging him to run for the Senate against Terry Sanford, but his wife adamantly opposes his entering the race. As a result, this may be his last year as an active figure in NC politics; he may become a sort of eminence grise, in the mold of Jim Holshauser, the previous Republican governor.

Charlotte has done lots of interesting stuff with volunteerism, integration, urban renewal, etc. NCNB (NationsBank) underwrote the revitalization of the city's Fourth Ward in the 1970s and 1980s. I don't know if that has turned out a success or a failure, but it's worth investigating if Michelle has a little extra time, and Lamar Alexander likes to rave about the Charlotte-Mecklenberg school system.

But enough tourist notes. A few general observations:

1) We have come up with an impressive array of themes and objectives, but we haven't yet connected them to George Bush. My friends in the press increasingly count the number of "change words" in speeches -- "change," "reform," "revolution," etc. -- and have come to the cynical conclusion that the President just has a poll-inspired shtick.

We need to demonstrate a) that George Bush has been promoting fundamental reform ever since he took office; b) that his reformist streak arises not out of a desire to raze the system, but from a desire to save it; and c) that his motivations have less to do with the Beltway than with his heart and soul: He really believes in this stuff.

I'd suggest that you begin with the essentials. Everything George Bush does and is emanates from his family and friends. He views each and every policy in terms of how it affects his mother, his wife, his brothers, his children, his grandchildren - - and his many friends. You want to know what the five pillars uphold? They uphold families and schools and churches and communities and businesses. They allow decent people to live full lives. If you look at his policies from that point of view, everything suddenly comes into focus.

So: Begin with the record. I've enclosed a very sketchy speech I threw together for Ron Kaufman last week. It hasn't been proofed or anything, and I literally wrote it as fast as I could type it, so don't expect polish. But the point was simple: George Bush has set in motion the most significant series of reforms in recent American history. They all aim at improving the system by giving government back to the people.

You can run through the standard litany: choice in education, child care, welfare; market incentives in the clean air act and the national energy strategy; and so on. That's the foundation, and the theme is simple: We want government that can deliver the goods. Why? Because we want people to be able to make the most of life -- to learn and work and love and live and feel secure about their own safety and security.

We can cast new initiatives as a way of moving America into the 21st Century and meeting the challenges that the new world poses. The five pillars each affect real people: Government reform gives government back to people; education helps people assert direct control over the most precious thing in their lives, their children; health care enables us to treat those who have been left behind and assure working people that they won't have to sell everything they own just to get over the flu; legal and regulatory reform restore some decency and common sense to our lives; trade reform lets us maintain leadership in the global village, where mass communications have shrunk time and distance and cultural divides.

George Bush thus could look out over the crowd at Carowinds, he can say: When I think about policy, I do the same thing you do. I think about the people I love. I think about their hopes and hardships. And I do everything in my power to clear away unnecessary of unfair obstacles on the road to their futures. (By the way, his foreign policy also has great family impact. He loves to talk about the fact that kids don't go to bed trembling in fear of nuclear annihilation anymore. They just complain because they can't stay up and watch Wayne's World on SNL.)

I know this all might seem a bit overwhelming, and you're probably sorry you asked me to look over the speech, but there you are: You've got all the elements, but you can do something that Bob Grady and the campaign have not yet supplied: a reason to believe that this stuff comes from George Bush's heart, and not from a bunch of policy wonks locked into stuffy West Wing offices.

Sorry: You hit one of my hot buttons. Good work.

MEMORANDUM FOR BOB BORK

FROM TONY SNOW
SUBJECT INFERNAL OP-ED

Bob: As promised, a few quick and gratuitous comments, although probably way late to be of any use:

First, as I mentioned on the phone, it might be nice to come up with some sweeping, big-vista, honey-this-is-Niagara-Falls-and-it's-bigger-than-God sort of opening in which the USTR takes us on a walking tour of the future. You get the idea.

Then segue into a paen to the Bush administration's trade policy, noting that we got to the future first, and that we will promote free trade because 1) it's the right thing to do; 2) it will promote peace and prosperity everywhere; and 3) a good economy is worth 500,000 California votes in November. Well, you might want to skip #3.

At any rate, all the pieces are here. We might want to try to jazz them up a bit, with her approval. I'll be out of town tomorrow, but will be back in the office Friday afternoon -- or in the dead of night, Tokyo time.

Give me a call, we'll try to figure out where to go next.

And good work: You've jammed a lot of stuff into a short space.

Drew:

I'd suggest some significant changes in the piece, mainly to sharpen its focus and make it more reader-friendly.

1) Be more straightforward with the lead:

"Many businesses in America have begun implementing employment provisions of the Americans with Disabilities Act, and they have learned something very interesting: The ADA won't put them out of business. Instead, it does what President Bush set out to do when he pushed the ADA through Congress. It opens the workplace to the disabled without hurting small businesses struggling to survive in the harsh marketplace.

The proof lies in the critical area of regulations. The administration has tried to reduce paperwork, hold down taxes and discourage costly nuisance lawsuits. It has taken pains to minimize the strain on small businesses, which create the majority of our new jobs.

This common-sense strategy contrasts dramatically with the traditional approach of using regulations as a cudgel to punish wayward entrepreneurs. The regulations also should calm critics who had claimed that the ADA would impose insufferable new burdens on our struggling economy.

I shouldn't have gotten so verbose, so here's the point. We need to make several points up front:

a) The act does not hurt businesses, and regulations demonstrate that we're serious about cutting away business burdens (paperwork, taxes, lawsuits) in order to open the doors of opportunity.

b) We understand the importance of small businesses, and have crafted laws and regulations accordingly.

c) We care about results, not rhetoric. By encouraging businesses to join in, we raise the likelihood that the economy will grow, and that disabled Americans will get the jobs they want and deserve.

d) Our critics are uninformed jerks.

2) Cut out as much jargon as possible: Title numbers enthrall lawyers, but they don't mean a thing to lumpenproles -- our target audience. Besides, businesses won't change their minds because of an op-ed. They'll let experience guide them. At any rate, explain the provisions of Title I and III, the DOJ and EEOC regulations, etc., but avoid legalese wherever possible.

3) You need to tackle a couple of difficult questions:

What is a "reasonable accommodation?" Do we have any clear regulatory definition? If so, what is it? If not, can we define the term in a way that readers can understand? The key is to reassure people that the term isn't a euphemism for "anything that doesn't put you out of business."

Ditto with "undue hardship." I like the $100 figure for the majority of accommodations. Can we describe some typical accommodations and situations? It helps to make these things concrete.

4) Where do we get the figure of 3% for the cost of accessibility in new buildings? Again, can we specify what we mean generally? (Ramps, elevators, etc.)

5) Give insight into why people with disabilities don't feel inclined to enter the world of frivolous litigation. Use personal touches and cover them over by using third person pronouns.

6) In general, be conversational: "The President understands that you can't help the disabled by regulating companies into bankruptcy. The ADA punishes those who discriminate against Americans with disabilities, but it does not issue an open invitation to tort lawyers, regulators, and interest groups who seem more interested in punishing businesses than in letting our economy flourish and grow.

Disabled Americans have a vested interest in an expanding economy. Strong businesses can give disabled Americans a chance to prove themselves in the competitive marketplace. The ADA won't crush competition. It enables us to make full use of 43 million workers who might not otherwise have the chance to make a full contribution to our economic future. The ADA fulfills the great American dream of extending to all Americans the rights of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

(I know I'm laying it on a bit thick here, but you get the idea.)

7) Finally, one writer's nit: Use active verbs wherever possible. Example: "For disabled people who are hired, the EEOC regulations require that their disability-related needs must be reasonably accommodated by the employer, but only to the extent that this does not create an undue hardship."

I'd suggest something like: "Regulations require employers to address workers' disability-related needs, but only to the extent that the accommodations do not impose undue hardships on their businesses....."

MEMORANDUM FOR ROBERT ZOELLICK

FROM TONY SNOW

SUBJECT DEFICIT REDUCTION

I received a call last week from William Baldwin of New Orleans, a lifelong Republican who has an idea that he believes will ignite fresh enthusiasm for the President's campaign.

Mr. Baldwin suggests that the President signal his seriousness about deficit reduction by appointing one or two credible experts to a cabinet-rank position, and charging that person or persons with 1) identifying the spending cuts and budgetary reforms necessary to eliminate the budget deficit and 2) doing so in a way that will not kill the economy.

He believes that such an announcement would demonstrate a genuine determination to get a grip on spending, and that voters in turn would pressure Congress to follow along. The new cabinet-level position also would differ from the Grace Commission, the Abshire commission and others in that it would have the unmistakable imprimatur of the President.

What do you think?
