President George W. Bush returns to the White House aboard Marine One in Washington, September 11, 2001. A hijacked plane crashed into the Pentagon Tuesday causing untold casualties and massive damage that sent the nation's capital into shock and led President Bush to order extraordinary security measures. Most of the federal government shut down for the day. The president plans to address the nation at 9:00 PM EDT. (Larry Downing/Reuters)

President George W. Bush said in an address to the nation September 11, 2001 that the aircraft attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon had 'ended thousands of lives' and in responding America would make no distinction between 'the terrorists and those who harbor them.' Bush, for the first time alluding to the enormity of the casualties in the attacks, said: 'Thousands of lives were suddenly ended by evil, despicable acts of terror.' Bush is seen during the address in the Oval Office at the White House. (Larry Downing/Reuters)

President George W. Bush said September 11, 2001 that the U.S. had taken all appropriate steps to protect the American people and would hunt down and punish those responsible for the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. "We have taken all appropriate security precautions to protect the American people," Bush, facing the first big test of his eight-month presidency, told reporters at a hastily arranged appearance at Barksdale Air Force Base. Bush is seen pausing for a moment of silence after speaking about the attack while visiting a school in Sarasota, Florida. (Win McNamee/Reuters)

U.S. President George W. Bush (L) emerges from behind a blue curtain opened by White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card (R) to speak on the developments in New York City while visiting a school in Sarasota, Florida September 11, 2001. During his remarks Bush said, "Terrorism against this nation will not stand." The kamikaze airplane attacks that destroyed New York's World Trade Center and damaged the Pentagon on Tuesday were unprecedented in the history of civil aviation, security experts said. REUTERS/Win McNamee
