ANDRÉ WATTS

At age 34 André Watts has already earned a secure place among the international keyboard giants of our time. Born in Nürnberg, Germany, Watts lived in Europe until he was 8. His first instrument was a miniature violin, which he began playing at age 4. By the time he was 6, however, he made clear his preference for the piano and his mother gave him his first lessons. The family took up residence in Philadelphia, where André attended Quaker and Catholic parochial schools, continuing his musical studies at the Philadelphia Musical Academy. At age 9 he won a competition entitling him to play at a Philadelphia Orchestra Children's Concert and at 10 was engaged for the Orchestra's summer series at Robin Hood Dell. At 14 he played on the Philadelphians' Winter Subscription Series.

At 16 Watts burst into international fame when Leonard Bernstein introduced him to CBS televiewers as soloist for a New York Philharmonic Young Peoples' Concert and three weeks later presented him to the Philharmonic's regular subscribers with an ovation reported by wire services and magazines around the world.

In 1973 he made a debut in the Soviet Union as soloist on a State Department sponsored tour of the San Francisco Symphony. Just prior to his departure to Russia, Watts, at 26, became the youngest person in more than 200 years to receive an Honorary Doctorate from Yale University. He also holds an Honorary Doctorate from Albright College and the Order of Zaire.

The Nation's Steinway piano, which was presented to President Roosevelt by Theodore E. Steinway in 1938, has recently been returned to the White House after seven months of renovation. It has completely new keys, strings and a sounding board made of wood from a slow-growing tree in Alaska. This concert by Andre Watts will be the first time it has been used by a concert pianist since the renovation was completed.

The case of the piano is made of the finest Honduras mahogany and was designed by Eric Gugler. Dumbor Beck did symbolic decorations which represent elementary American music, the Virginia reel, the New England cotton-picker and the cowboy singing. The eagles which support the case are the work of Albert Stewart.

The tables in the State Dining Room are covered with white linen tablecloths overlaid with a grey silk circle. The Truman china along with vermeil flatware and the Morgantown crystal will be used.

The flowers arranged to resemble a lily pond, are in a clear lucite shallow dish set on a silver tray. They include: Allium gigantum, waterlilies, cattail foliage and amaryllis foliage.

REMARKS OF THE PRESIDENT AND KING HUSSEIN

AT THE ARRIVAL CEREMONY FOR THEIR MAJESTIES
THE KING AND QUEEN OF THE HASHEMITE KINGDOM OF JORDAN

The South Grounds

(10:12 A.M. EDT)

THE PRESIDENT: This morning it is my very pleasant duty, on behalf of the people of the United States, to welcome Their Majesties King Hussein of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, and Her Majesty Queen Noor. There is a great deal in common between our two people, the Kingdom of Jordan and the United States of America: ties of friendship, the deep roots of shared experience, long years of consultation and cooperation; a cooperation based on mutual interest, which we both recognize, and on beliefs in the same basic principles and a foundation of mutual respect, one for another.

This friendship, this relationship, has been tested in crisis, and it has stood all tests without damage. We know that our people want the same things: peace, peace through strength; dignity of individual human beings; proper attention to human rights, and the nurturing of the talent and ability of each person; economic progress; taking advantage of technological improvements in the world around us, and at the same time the preservation of the principles which never change.

As is the case between independent nations there are sometimes some differences of approach about how to deal with current crises, but we have always let these differences be properly aired, and as I have said earlier they have never damaged the basic mutual commitment and the basic relationship which binds our two countries together.

We recognize that the Middle East, the cradle of recorded human history, has been torn and is torn now by tension, by an absence of understanding and trust, inadequate communications, turmoil, sometimes suffering from war too often, and also the threat of terrorism. We know that we must end these threats to peace and alleviate this tension, and end the threat of terrorism and bloodshed. The conflict which has torn this region can be settled and must be settled with dignity and with justice. We share this commitment, and we share this belief, and we share these mutual goals, because we recognize the tremendous benefits, not only to the people of that region but to the people of almost every nation on earth, to bring about peace and stability in this troubled land.

MORE

It is not an easy thing to accomplish. There are doubts about the prospects for peace, and there are differences about the routes to take to achieve peace. His Majesty has shown in his enlightened rule over a courageous people his commitment to progress, economic development, to a better life for those who look to him for leadership. And at the same time he has been able to preserve, in the finest possible way, the traditional values of his people, of their religion, of their history, which never change.

We have the same basic challenge: to approach the future with confidence; to accommodate inevitable change; to provide better economic and other opportunities for our people, but to preserve basic values.

This year we join in the observation of the 14th centennial of the world of Islam, for the spiritual and intellectual and moral contribution of these worldwide worshippers mean so much to us all. It is an honor for us to participate in a proper way in this notable observance. We are also mutually committed to the stability of the Persian Gulf region, and to Southwest Asia, to the preservation of peace, the honoring of international boundaries, the cohesion of nations, independence of people, and the preservation of their security.

The search for peace is filled with difficulty and complexity, but there is no doubt that it is worthy of the most persistent and notable effort. It is vital for the future of all.

MORE

With these observations of our common commitments, it's an additional pleasure for me to welcome again Their Majesties representing the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan. This is an honor for us and a pleasure on this beautiful day in the lives of two peoples bound together by so many common commitments, principles, ideals and hopes for the future. Your Majesty, you are welcome. (Applause.)

KING HUSSEIN: Mr. President, both Queen Noor and I feel happiness and pleasure at having this opportunity to visit the United States and to be with you here today.

We thank you and Mrs. Carter for making it possible for us to accept your kind invitation, to be amongst friends, to be once again in the United States. Indeed it has been a match throughout the years by our peoples in many fields and in many areas with the dedication to the same aims and objectives, the following of the same principles and values and the sharing of a common vision of a better future -- a future with dignity for all mankind, a future of peace with justice, a future that will give the generations that follow us better opportunities, better times than those we have had to endure.

There is much indeed, sir, that we share, and regardless of the differences in terms of outlook regarding the route, as you say, to achieve an objective or to reach a goal, we do believe very much in the firm commitment of both our governments and peoples and ourselves to the same goals and the same objectives.

Our world is facing enormous difficulties at this point in time. It's a privilege and a very, very great pleasure for me to have this opportunity to benefit from your wisdom, to convey to you our impressions, to share with you thoughts and ideas regarding the times ahead and the responsibilities that we bear toward the future.

I look forward to my meetings with you, sir, and with our friends here. And, once again, I, my government and people are proud that we have always adhered to the same principles, we've always upheld the same ideals on which this nation, the greatest in our times, was created and stands for.

Thank you very, very much indeed, sir, for your courtesy and your kindness. (Applause.)
