REMARKS BY THE PRESIDENT
AT RECEPTION FOR LEADERS OF AFRICAN NATIONS

Waldorf Astoria
New York, New York

12:50 P.M. EDT

THE PRESIDENT: Well, first of all, let me thank Congressman Jefferson. This reception was his idea, and I thank him for his work -- and all the members of the Congressional Black Caucus who helped him are detained in Washington for votes this afternoon. I want to thank the leaders of African nations who are here, and the diplomats and the business leaders who have come.

There's a simple purpose to this event. We want to say that Africa matters to America. Or as Reverend Jackson, my Special Envoy, was just saying, we don't see Africa as a continent of debtor nations, we see Africa as a credit bank for America's future; an opportunity for a real and genuine and lasting partnership.

I just got back from Nigeria and Tanzania, where I was with some of you in Arusha. And that trip reminded me again of all the positive things that are out there to be built in the future. It also enabled me to say something no American President had ever been able to say -- I was glad to go to Africa for the second time. (Applause.)

But I think, and I hope and pray, that no future American President will ever not say that; that we will take it for granted that we should have a broad, comprehensive, in-depth, consistent relationship with Africa. We have a shared interest in making sure that the people of Africa seize their opportunities and work with us to build a common future.

Of course, the governments of Africa have to lay the foundations for the rule of law, a good climate for investment, open markets and making national investments that broaden the economic base and provide benefits for ordinary people. These things will work.

Last year, the world's fastest-growing economy was Mozambique, and Botswana was second. Nigeria turned the fiscal debt into a surplus. That will work. But we must also reach out through our Export-Import Bank, our Overseas Private Investment Corporation, our Trade and Development Agency, to encourage more American investment in Africa.

We also should encourage the regional trade blocs to unite smaller economies into bigger economic units in more attractive markets. And Bill Jefferson said, we're going to do our best to make the most of the Africa Growth and Opportunity Act, the trade act which the Congress passed earlier this year. When we fully implement it, Africa will have much greater access to American markets than any region in the world has to American markets outside North America, and I'm very proud of that. (Applause.)

We are also working to bridge some of the other divides -- helping African countries connect to the Internet, training more than 1,500 government and civic institutions to use it. We know we have to do more communications in rural Africa. There are some rural areas where there's less than one phone line for every 500 inhabitants.

We don't want a digital divide between Africa and the rest of the world, but neither do we want a digital divide to develop within Africa itself, between cities that are connected and villages that are left out. So we will continue to do what we can for trade and technology. We know that is not enough.

A year ago, I announced that we would support a global effort on relief, and that we would completely write off the debts of as many as 20 African nations. Uganda has already used savings on debt payments to double its primary school enrollment -- double. (Applause.) Senegal used theirs to hire 2,000 teachers. Mozambique has used theirs to buy needed medicines.

I asked Congressman Jefferson to go back after meeting with all the leaders to influence the Congress to give us the $435 million we need this year to fully fund our debt relief program this year and to continue to extend debt relief to other deserving countries who will take the savings and invest it in their people and their future. (Applause.)

I also believe we should do more to promote education in Africa. We have launched a $300-million initiative, which I hope will be nothing more than a pilot program, to work with developing countries to provide free meals -- nutritious breakfasts or lunches in schools, so that parents be encouraged to send 9 million more boys and girls to school in countries that desperately need to increase school enrollment.

We estimate that if our friends around the world will join us, and we can cooperate with countries to deliver the food in an appropriate way and to make sure we don't interrupt local farm markets -- we don't want to hurt local farmers anywhere -- we estimate that for about $4 billion worldwide, we could provide a nutritious meal in school to every child in every developing country in the entire world. That could change the future for many African countries and many countries in Asia and Latin America, as well. (Applause.)

Finally, we're trying to do more to fight infectious diseases, especially AIDS. I want to thank Sandy Thurman, my AIDS Coordinator, is here, for all the work she and others in my administration have done to try to help Americans realize that this is a global crisis. (Applause) Earlier this year we declared that AIDS was a national security issue for America.

There were some people who made fun of me when I did that -- some people who said, what's the President doing; how can AIDS be a national security crisis? When you think about all the democracies we want to do well in the 21st century and all the people who will lose their freedom because they can't even keep their people alive, it is quite clear that AIDS is, in fact, a national security challenge for the United States and we have to do more to meet it. (Applause.)

Now, what are we doing in America? We, again -- Bill Jefferson is here -- we're trying to get Congress to approve a $1-billion vaccine tax credit to give tax incentives to our big companies to develop vaccines they otherwise would not develop because they know most of the people who need the medicine are not able to pay for it. So we are trying to cut the cost of developing it so they will still have a financial incentive to it, and then, if they develop them, we'll find a way to pay for it and distribute it.

Even as we insist, however, on vaccine research and research for cure, we should remember that AIDS is 100 percent preventable. We need more with education and prevention programs and to break the silence. We have a chance to take on this human challenge together.

One of the most moving experiences I have had as President -- and have been through a lot of interesting and profoundly emotional experiences the last eight years -- but one of the most moving things that's happened to me happened when we were just in Nigeria and President Obasanjo and I went to this event in an auditorium with a lot of people to talk about what they were doing in Nigeria to try to prevent AIDS. So there were two speakers. The first speaker is a beautiful, 16-year-old Nigerian girl gets up and talks about what she's doing as a peer counselor to talk to her contemporaries to keep the children out of trouble. That was pretty good.

Then, this young man gets up. I think he must have been about 30. And he talked about how he fell in love with a woman who was HIV positive and how his family and her family didn't want them to get married, and about how their priest didn't want them to marry and they were deeply religious people, and how their love was so strong, they finally convinced the priest that they ought to get married, and he finally convinced the parents that it was all right, and so they did. And then he became HIV positive. And then his wife became pregnant. And he had already lost his job because he was HIV positive and he was desperate to find the money to get the medicine for his wife so that there could be a chance that his child would be born without the virus.

And finally, he got the money, his wife took the medicine, the baby was born without the virus. And he basically was affirming the fact that he was glad he followed his heart, even though he contracted the virus, he was glad that he and his wife had had a child who was free of HIV, and he wanted the world to do more to get rid of this illness.

And then, the President of Nigeria brought his wife up on stage and she embraced her in front of hundreds of people, and it was all over the news in Nigeria the next day. It changed the whole thinking of a nation about how to approach this disease -- to treat the disease as the enemy, but to treat the people who are gripped with it. It was an amazing encounter. (Applause.)

So I just say to all of you, we're committed for the long run. We want to take on the great human challenges; we want to take on the great political challenges. There are some things that you will have to do, I believe America is moving inexorably to be a much better partner over the long run for Africa. It is one of the things that I was determined to do when I became President. I am more determined today than I was. And I am more convinced today that it is not an act of charity -- it is an act of enlightened self-interest for the world that we should be building together.

Thank you very much. (Applause.)

REMARKS BY THE PRESIDENT
TO THE SECURITY COUNCILSecurity Council Chamber
The United Nations
New York, New York

2:08 P.M. EDT

THE PRESIDENT: Thank you very much. Mr. President, Mr. Secretary General, members of the Security Council. We come together in this historic session to discuss the role of the United Nations in maintaining peace and security. I thank President Konare for the moment of silence for the U.N. workers who died in West Timor yesterday, and ask the Indonesian authorities to bring those responsible to justice, to disarm and disband the militias, and to take all necessary steps to ensure the safety of civilians and to continue to work on humanitarian goals there.

Today I would like to focus my peacekeeping remarks on Africa, where prosperity and freedom have advanced, but where conflict still holds back progress. I can't help noting that this historic meeting in this historic chamber is led by a President and a Secretary General who are both outstanding Africans. Africans' achievements and the United Nations' strengths are evident. Mozambique and Namibia are just two success stories.

But we asked the United Nations to act under increasingly complex conditions. We see it in Sierra Leone, where U.N. actions saved lives but could not preserve the peace. Now we're working to strengthen the mission. In the Horn of Africa, U.N. peacekeepers will monitor the separation of forces so recently engaged in brutal combat. In Congo civil strife still threatens the lives of thousands of people and warring parties prevent U.N. from implementing its mandate.

We must do more to equip the United Nations to do what we ask it to do. They need to be able to be peacekeepers who can be rapidly deployed, properly trained and equipped, able to project credible force. That, of course, is the thrust of the Secretary General's report on peacekeeping reform. The United States strongly supports that report. It should be a goal of our assistance for West African forces that are now going into Sierra Leone.

Let me also say a word, however, beyond peacekeeping. It seems to me that both for Africa and the world, we will be forced increasingly to define security more broadly. The United Nations was created to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war. War kills massively, crosses borders, destabilizes whole regions. Today, we face other problems that kill massively, cross borders and destabilize whole regions.

A quarter of all the deaths on the planet now are caused by infectious diseases.

diseases like Malaria, TB and AIDS. Because of AIDS alone, life expectancy in some African nations is plummeting by as much as 30 years. Without aggressive prevention, the epicenter of the epidemic likely will move Asia by 2010 with very rapid growth rates also in the New Independent States.

The affected nations must do more on prevention, but the rest of the world must do more, too -- not just with AIDS, but also with malaria and TB. We must invest in the basics -- clean water, safe food, good sanitation, health education. We must make sure that the advances in science work for all people.

The United States is investing $2 billion a year in AIDS research including $210 million for an AIDS vaccine. And I have asked our Congress to give a tax credit of $1 billion to speed the development in the private sector of vaccines against AIDS, malaria and TB. We have to give the credit because the people who need the medicine can't afford to pay for it as it is. We've worked to make drugs more affordable, and we will do so. And we have doubled our global assistance for AIDS prevention and care in the last two years.

Unfortunately, the U.N. has estimated that to meet our goals, we collectively need to provide an additional $4 billion a year. We must work together to help close that gap. And we must advance a larger agenda to fight the poverty that breeds conflict and war.

I strongly support the goal of universal access to primary education by 2015. We are helping to move toward that goal, in part, with our efforts to provide school lunches to 9 million boys and girls in developing nations. For about $3 billion a year, collectively, we could provide a nutritious meal to every child in every developing country in a school in the world. That would dramatically change the future for a lot of poor nations today.

We have agreed to triple the scale of debt relief for the poorest countries, but we should do more. This idea of relieving debt if the savings will be invested in the human needs of the people is an idea whose time has long since come, and I hope we will do much more.

Finally, Mr. Secretary General, you have called on us to support the millennium ecosystem assessment. We have to meet the challenge of climate change. I predict that within a decade -- or maybe even a little less -- that will become as big an obstacle to the development of poor nations as disease is today.

The United States will contribute the first complete set of detailed satellite images of the world's threatened forests to this project. We will continue to support aggressive efforts to implement the Kyoto protocol and other objectives which will reduce the environmental threats we face.

Now, let me just say in closing, Mr. President, some people will listen to this discussion and say, well, peacekeeping has something to do with security, but these other issues don't have anything to do with security and don't belong in the Security Council. This is my last meeting; I just have to say I respectfully disagree -- these issues will become more and more and more in the Security Council. Until we confront the link between deprivation, disease, and war, we will never be able to achieve the peace that the founders of the United Nations dreamed of.

I hope the United States will always be willing to do its part, and I hope the Security Council increasingly will have a 21st century vision of security that we can all embrace and pursue.

Thank you very much.

Millennium Summit Focuses on Africa

By NICOLE WINFIELD
Associated Press Writer

UNITED NATIONS (AP) — Burdened by debt, war, poverty and AIDS, Africa is getting special attention at the U.N. Millennium Summit with world leaders calling for a new commitment to bring the continent out of its misery and give its people hope.

“One more day of delayed action is a day too late for our people,” pleaded Botswana's President Festus Mogae, whose country is among those hardest hit by AIDS. “Our people are crying out for help. Let us respond while there is time.”

Mogae appealed Thursday for “tangible and adequate resources” to educate his people about the virus, test and counsel them and provide them with the expensive drugs that are combatting it. A third of Botswana's adults are infected with HIV.

Mali's President Alpha Oumar Konare called for world leaders to “assume the duty of our generation,” and combat ignorance about AIDS, the leading killer in sub-Saharan Africa.

Education of Africa's young and women, he said, “must enlighten the new millennium.”

About 150 world leaders — the greatest assembly of presidents, prime ministers, monarchs and other rulers in history — listened as British Prime Minister Tony Blair, President Clinton, Cuba's Fidel Castro and a long line of others addressed the unprecedented session Wednesday.

Qatar's emir, Sheik Hamad bin Khalifa Al Thani, opened the summit's second day by urging the United Nations to get more involved in Mideast peace efforts — a call that came as leaders, including German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder, planned meetings with Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat to try to persuade him to make decisions needed to conclude a peace agreement.

But Africa remained a major concern. Blair, in an address focused entirely on Africa and U.N. peacekeeping, had called for world governments to enter into a new partnership with the continent to help it settle its conflicts and encourage its economies to develop.

"There is a dismal record of failure in Africa on the part of the developed world that shocks and shames our civilization," Blair said. "We should use this unique summit for a concrete purpose: to start the process of agreeing a way forward for Africa."

On Thursday, the heads of state of the 15 Security Council members scheduled a special open council meeting on peace and security in the next century. The wars in Sierra Leone, Congo, and Eritrea-Ethiopia are among the biggest challenges today to the United Nations.

The U.N. peacekeeping department has taken on enormous duties in recent months in Africa, but has found itself at a loss to carry them out effectively because of poorly trained and equipped troops spread over large areas — Congo itself is one-fourth the size of the United States.

In Sierra Leone, 500 U.N. peacekeepers were taken hostage last May by rebels of the Revolutionary United Front — an embarrassing debacle that led to calls for U.N. member states to provide peacekeeping troops who are trained, equipped and willing to counter such challenges with force.

A recent U.N. report, commissioned by the secretary-general for the summit, recommended a complete overhaul of the peacekeeping department. It called for the equivalent of a ministry of defense to modernize and professionalize the peacekeepers, so troops can deploy rapidly and take action in clear cases of aggression.

The report by a panel of international experts has been widely applauded by world leaders at the summit, who say the U.N.

failures that led to the 1994 genocide in Rwanda and the 1995 massacre of thousands of Bosnian Muslims in Srebrenica must never be repeated.

"The darkest pages were written in Rwanda where, under the indifferent eye of all of us, a genocide was committed," said Belgian Prime Minister Guy Verhofstadt, whose country lost 10 U.N. soldiers in the opening days of the massacres in central Africa.

He called for a new concept of operations for peacekeeping that would include rapid-reaction regional peacekeeping capabilities. Blair called for a similar radical change.

Beyond peacekeeping, several African speakers called for the United Nations and its members to address the root economic causes.

Algerian President Abdelaziz Bouteflika, the chairman of the Organization of African Unity, decried how the world's wealthy countries continued to get richer while Africa's poor suffered under crushing debt.

``Can we one day free ourselves of this crushing yoke and at last devote our resources to our development and the well-being of our populations?" he asked.

Mozambique President Joaquim Chissano complained that Africans weren't reaping the benefits of globalization and were in fact suffering even greater economic inequalities while also trying to deal with the AIDS epidemic.

``This in turn constitutes a source of frustration and conflicts that pose serious threat to international security, stability, democracy and peace," he said.

While echoing those views, Kenyan President Daniel arap Moi turned the criticism toward his fellow Africans for having allowed wars to fester for generations on a continent that can little afford to fight them or care for their refugees.

``These conflicts also make a mockery of all attempts to reduce poverty — the greatest challenge faced by our continent," he said.

But he cautioned against the ``dangerous pessimism" that Africa was a lost cause, saying its people wanted peace and prosperity.

``I declare our confidence and faith in the future of Africa," Moi said. ``I hope you share this confidence too."

Speech for Security Council Summit

Mr. Secretary General, President Konare, fellow heads of state and government: We have come together in this unprecedented session to discuss the role of the UN in maintaining peace and security -- especially in Africa, where prosperity and freedom have advanced in the last decade, but where conflict still holds back progress.

From Mozambique to Namibia, Africa's achievements and the UN's strengths are evident. But we are asking the UN to act under increasingly complex conditions. In Sierra Leone, UN action saved lives, but could not, preserve the peace, and we are now strengthening the mission. In the Horn of Africa, UN peacekeepers will be asked to monitor the separation of forces recently engaged in brutal combat. In Congo, civil strife still threatens the lives of thousands of people as warring parties prevent the UN from implementing its mandate.

One answer would be to say, we should not ask the UN to do what it is not equipped to do. Our answer should be, let us equip the UN to do what we ask.

Let us not allow criticism of the UN's limitations become a self-fulfilling prophecy, but work with Africans and others to repair them, ensuring peacekeepers can be rapidly deployed, with the ability to project credible force, and the training and equipment they need. That is the thrust of the report of the Secretary-General's panel on peacekeeping reform. It is the goal of U.S. assistance for West African forces going into Sierra Leone.

The larger point I would like to make is this: For Africa and the world, peace depends on more than peacemaking and peacekeeping. In a global age, we must define security more broadly.

The UN was created to "save succeeding generations from the scourge of war" for the simple reason that war kills massively, crosses borders and destabilizes whole regions. Today we face another problem that kills massively, crosses borders, and destabilizes whole regions.

Infectious diseases like malaria, TB and AIDS are now responsible for one quarter of all deaths on the planet. Because of AIDS alone, life expectancy in some African nations is plummeting by as much as 30 years. And without aggressive prevention, the epicenter of the epidemic is likely to move to Asia by the year 2010. Already, the fastest growth in the rate of infection can be found in the New Independent States.

To our partners in Africa, not to mention nations like Russia and China, the cost of defeating this scourge may seem daunting. But it is nothing compared to the cost of letting it defeat us. And there is one critical aspect of this struggle that costs nothing: leadership, and a willingness to talk openly about how this disease spreads and how it can be prevented.

For the wealthiest countries, part of our challenge is to understand that advances in science and technology will mean little for developing countries unless we also help invest in the basics: clean water, safe food, good sanitation, and health education. We must also make advances in science actually work for developing countries, by creating incentives for innovations, including vaccines, that the private sector would otherwise never pursue.

The United States is investing $2 billion a year in AIDS research, including $210 million for an AIDS vaccine, and I've proposed a $1 billion tax credit to speed private sector development of vaccines against AIDS, malaria and TB. We've worked to make drugs more affordable, and doubled our global assistance for AIDS prevention and care in the last two years. But the UN has estimated that to meet our goals, we will need to collectively provide an additional $4 billion a year. We must join together to help close the gap.

And we must advance a larger agenda to fight the poverty that breeds insecurity. I strongly support the goal of universal access to primary education by the year 2015, and hope we can help advance it with our food for education initiative. I'm proud we've agreed to triple the scale of debt relief for the poorest countries, so they can invest more in basic human needs. The first are starting to benefit, but we must do more to make real the promise of this initiative.

Finally, if we want to avoid a future in which more people are locked in violent struggle over fewer resources, we have to meet our biggest environmental challenges. One thing the Secretary-General has called on us to do is to support the Millennium Ecosystem Assessment, so we can marshal the best science to help us grow our economies while protecting the environment. I am glad to announce that the United States will contribute to this project the first complete set of detailed satellite images of the world's threatened forests.

Some will hear our discussion of these issues and say, they have nothing to do with security and they don't belong in the Security Council. And yes, our most urgent task here is and will remain responding to breaches of the peace. But if we don't confront the iron link between deprivation and war, 50 years from now our successors will still be meeting in this room sending soldiers to douse fires in too many places suffering a shortage of hope. We'll still be spending most of our time responding to conflict instead of measuring our success in preventing it.

We can do better. There is no great debate about what must be done. We simply have to muster the resources and the will. Let us make that our Security Council resolution for a new millennium.
