Dear Dr. Yellen:

Thank you for meeting with my colleagues and me last week. We greatly appreciated the opportunity to begin an open exchange on what is happening to manufacturing jobs in our economy.

At the close of the meeting you suggested that we continue this dialogue, and I am writing to you about some areas where we think continued discussion could be productive. I am sure you and others will have additional thoughts and we welcome them.

1. Manufacturing Jobs

A key issue for us is the place of manufacturing jobs in the economy. In particular, we believe that there is something special about manufacturing jobs, and that this special character needs to be taken account of in the design of policy. We believe that manufacturing jobs matter for productivity growth, income distribution, the trade deficit, and the ability of the U.S. economy to follow a full employment growth path. Further research and discussion regarding the significance of manufacturing jobs is much needed. If our claim is right, national policy makers must aim to develop economic policies that take account of manufacturing's special place.

2. The Trade Deficit

A second issue of concern is the trade deficit. This issue is multifaceted. It includes how the trade deficit may affect the number of manufacturing jobs, whether the trade deficit is indicative of national economic failure or whether it is merely the expression of economic agents' spending preferences, whether the trade deficit can continue at current levels indefinitely, or whether it ultimately poses a threat to economic stability and full employment.

Dr. Janet Yellen
March 22, 1999
Page 2

3. Trade Policy

A third issue is trade policy. The global financial crisis has shown that some U.S. manufacturing sectors are vulnerable to adverse employment effects arising from sudden changes in the value of currencies. These employment effects are unrelated to factory floor productivity. At the moment we have little in our policy tool kit to deal with such effects. Financial globalization is not going to go away, and we need to develop new tools for these types of problems.

Another problem is that many countries are pursuing industrial policies that target sectors for development and export. Often this includes subsidizing capacity build up. This too places U.S. manufacturing jobs at risk. Similarly, we need to construct new policies to deal with this.

Once again, I thought our meeting was a useful first step and look forward to your thoughts on how best to continue.

Best wishes,

David A. Smith, Director
Public Policy Department
