MEMORANDUM FROM SECRETARY RUBIN

Divider Title: _____

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY
WASHINGTON, D.C.

October 9, 1997

SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRESIDENT

SUBJECT: Economic developments in Argentina, Brazil, and Venezuela

The economies of Argentina, Brazil, and Venezuela are all enjoying at least moderate growth, have scored significant gains against inflation, and have been so far untouched by the financial turbulence in Asia. Their challenge looking forward will be to maintain stable financial policies and embark on deeper reforms needed to raise the living standards of all their people. Five themes have shaped the recent history and future prospects of the three countries.

- First, decades of protectionism, statist controls, and financial instability culminated in the early 1980's debt crisis, followed by the "lost decade" of economic stagnation. The 1990's have seen a remarkable change in economic thinking as leaders in Argentina, Brazil, and to a lesser extent Venezuela, embraced market-oriented policies.
- Second, reforms of the 1990's and ample global liquidity have fueled large-scale flows of foreign capital to the countries over the past two years, with Argentina and Brazil together likely to receive as much as $50 billion this year. Those inflows can catalyze investment and growth, but they can also turn quickly into destabilizing outflows if policies slip and confidence wanes. Latin countries must stay vigilant about contagion from Asia -- especially Brazil, with its wide budget and current account deficits.
- Third, all three have undergone costly banking restructurings that have left their banking sectors in better health than Mexico in 1994 or Thailand today. Foreign banks have played important roles in recapitalizing and modernizing their banking systems.
- Fourth, the reforms achieved so far will not produce the sustained growth rates of five percent or higher needed to ensure that increased prosperity reaches all segments of society. The three countries, and others in Latin America, must tackle more difficult reforms to improve education, build modern institutions, and fight corruption.
- Fifth, Argentina and Brazil have deepened their economic integration through the Mercosur Customs Union. Those markets are a tremendous opportunity for American exporters, given that they have only recently opened their economies and their trade is expanding rapidly. But if Mercosur deepens without our involvement, trade will be diverted away from our exporters. Argentina appears more receptive to folding Mercosur relatively quickly into the FTAA, while Brazil is inclined to delay the FTAA while Mercosur deepens.

BRAZIL

In 1994, when President Cardoso was Finance Minister, Brazil introduced the Real Plan, its most serious effort yet at breaking the mold of hyperinflation and economic stagnation. The plan has succeeded brilliantly, cutting inflation from over 1000% in 1994 to 6% this year and boosting the popularity of President Cardoso. Brazil also liberalized trade and embarked on a vast privatization program expected to yield revenues of up to $80 billion over the next three years.

Fiscal deficits in excess of 4% of GDP, together with tight monetary policy needed to curb inflation, have kept economic growth rates down to only about 3%, and contributed to a strong currency and a current account deficit in excess of 4% of GDP. Those figures make Brazil the most vulnerable of the three countries to financial instability. The Real Plan is not now under threat and will likely be sustainable through the November 1998 Presidential elections, especially if today's global low interest rates persist. But to safeguard financial stability and raise growth, the government will need meaningful fiscal reform after the elections.

ARGENTINA

Argentina initiated serious economic reform in 1991 with its celebrated Convertibility Plan, which disciplined monetary policy by committing it to convert pesos into dollars at a one-to-one rate. Argentina also opened its borders to world trade and privatized much of its economy.

Today Argentina's economy looks healthy, with growth near 7%, inflation lower than in the U.S. (after more than 2000% in 1990), and manageable fiscal and current account deficits. Unemployment is an important problem, however, due in large part to rigid labor laws. The 16% jobless rate is cutting into support for President Menem and his reform policies. A poor showing in next month's Congressional elections could strengthen the hand of populist elements and lead to a softening of reforms. Another risk for Argentina is its exposure to potential currency instability in Brazil -- which accounts for close to one-third of Argentina's foreign trade.

VENEZUELA

Venezuela has not suffered the same degree of financial instability as Argentina or Brazil, and nor has it embraced reform as strongly, as it has used its oil revenues to subsidize inefficient policies. The end result has been average annual growth below one percent from 1980 to 1996, one of the lowest in the hemisphere.

Last year's "Agenda Venezuela" economic reform program was a step forward and scored modest gains. Those reforms and high recent oil prices helped cut inflation to about 35% this year, raise growth to about 4%, and bring the current account and budget into surplus. But implementation of Agenda Venezuela reforms has been incomplete, as key privatizations, pension and social security reform, and cuts in the public payroll are all behind schedule. One obstacle to reform has been Venezuela's poor record in attacking poverty directly and instead relying on inefficient subsidies and price controls to help the poor.

One notable recent reform is the opening of Venezuela's oil sector to foreign investors. The Venezuelan government expects oil production to double over the next ten years due to higher domestic and foreign investment.
