An author and Wellesley friend and classmate of HRC by the name of Katherine Hall Page sent me the attached letter. Page would pay for the books.

Debbie - I explained to Kathy Page the book wouldn't be ready, but she would like to do this anyway in another ~~venue~~^{way} for the library. This seems to be very harmless.

Washington, D.C,

Dear Pam,

I am writing to you in regard to the fund-raiser I mentioned on the phone this morning. It is being run by The Cary Memorial Library Campaign for the New Century, which is raising funds for the endowment to be used for acquisitions, new technology, and staff development. I'm on the steering committee. The event is a new book sale on December 2nd. We have lined up a number of children's and adult book authors who will be at the library signing their books: Eric Brown, Natalie Babbitt, Henry Louis Gates Jr., William Tapply, Cynthia Johnson, (me), and several others from whom we have not yet heard.

My hope was to have a dozen signed first printings of Hillary's book that we could offer through a silent auction, perhaps setting a minimum bid of $50., which I am sure would not last long! The books would be a donation to the library from Alan, Nicholas, and me. I would ship them with a prepaid return to The White House. However, as I said to you this morning, if this is in any way an inconvenience, please enough said. I am sure Hillary would like to have people not asking her to do things once in a while. I have ventured this request because I think the book is a crucial one and I'd like to showcase it at the library. The other reason is because of the regard I have for our public libraries, coping with cuts, and still providing a haven and resource for readers of all ages. Librarians are some of the gutsiest people I know, on the front lines in censorship battles, etc.

It was good to talk to you. I went down and read the Maureen Dowd Op Ed and fumed. She should drive across country and see some of the bumper stickers, then try to say it's not because Hillary is a strong woman. Hillary isn't playing the gender card, it's all those terrified congressmen and constituents who couldn't see beyond the deck to what the country desperately needs. Such twisting of words, it has to be so upsetting, and unnerving, to find yourself described as some other person. Talk about the invasion of the body snatchers!

Best wishes,

Kathy

Dear Mrs Clinton -

You were so kind to acknowledge my essay about returning to my Peace Corps site.

I drew with - and for the very last time sending on my work - in my profile of the ultimate power leprechaun, President Mary Robinson of Ireland. I read that she's coming to visit you in June. In 1992, I had the privilege of spending two weeks traveling throughout Ireland with her at a crucial moment in recent Irish history when a 14-year-old girl who had been raped & gone to England for an abortion was called back by the Irish attorney general.

I got to know her whole family as well as the President herself. She is simply outstanding & you two will have much in common from the law & politics to a concern about women & children. (I suppose you have already met. At any rate, she was one of my favorite subjects ever (keep the people I interviewed from the Reagan article). a powerful symbol for modern Ireland.

Enjoy! All the best, Laureen Orth

Dear Mrs Clinton

Thanks so much for another beautiful St. Patrick's Day party among the power leprechauns! The Irish (all of us) who so often feel slighted, positively tinkle & glow at the White House - bursting with pride to be there enjoying your marvelous hospitality. Baileys, Irish Cream mousse? Not likely on the auld sod!

The most important point was made by the Irish PM, that the President didn't have to try to do anything about bringing peace to Ireland but he did - we all are extraordinarily grateful.

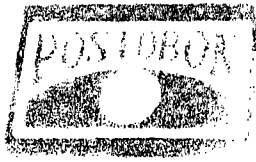

Finally, my small but living proof testament to "It Takes a Village" - an ~~essay~~ ^{account} I wrote for the Peace Corps 35th Anniversary about an extraordinary visit I had last fall back to a school I helped build in Medellin, Colombia as a Peace Corps volunteer in the sixties. It took the village & it thrives today. going back made me feel as if I had been inaugurated, Peace when it works - you can't beat it!

Thank you for a lovely
St Patrick's celebration.

MARINO BIRTH

Colombia, South America

Twice In My Life

by Maureen Orth

My Medellin has never been like the headlines that have been flashing round the world for a decade. The gentle “city of eternal spring,” the capital of the department of Antioquia, that I lived in and cherished for two years in the sixties as a Peace Corps Volunteer, has been morphed into a violent and bloodthirsty symbol of illicit drug-dealing—where bombs and kidnappings have replaced conservative Catholicism and the Antioquenos long-held reputation for entrepreneurial fervor.

Today the rap on Medellin is horrendous: the U.S. State Department warns Americans that all of Antioquia is off limits for safe travel. Journalists are especially susceptible to guerrilla attack. My Colombian novio of long ago, who had become a Senator, was murdered in 1989 when he refused to give in to a self-styled militia leader who wanted a piece of his land. Amid this turmoil I could only dream of going back to Medellin to visit my Peace Corps site and to see the school that I had helped build.

My memories, of course, were vivid. One Sunday a dramatic posse of five men on horseback dressed in black gaucho hats and traditional wool ruanas galloped up to my door in the barrio. They were leading an extra horse for me. We rode straight up into the mountains for about three miles to meet an isolated community of campesinos in a vereda called Aguas Frias. The people were desperate for a school.

Several Sundays later we began with a community work day and formed a human chain to throw rocks down the mountainside to clear the land. A year later there was a brick building that on dedication day bore a crude hand-lettered sign that was a happy surprise to me: Escuela Marina Orth.

I had not seen the school since 1979. Then suddenly an invitation came out of the blue from "Friends of Colombia," our in-country group, and I thought that I must go. In the fall of 1995 I became part of an official goodwill tour of Colombia, one of a dozen former Colombia Peace Corps Volunteers graciously invited by the Colombian Ambassador to visit four cities. Medellin was not on the itinerary, but I could easily go there by myself. Things had calmed down, I was told, since the world's most notorious narcotraficante, Pablo Escobar, had been killed.

Then a curious thing happened: I became afraid of the depth of my own emotions. I couldn't even think of going back to Medellin without choking up inside. So many intense memories of specific people and the majestic, sweeping Andean countryside came flooding back—not to mention the Spanish language, the music, the freedom of galloping on a horse through grass as high as my shoulders. Of course in those days we called the rain forest the jungle; there were families of fifteen and twenty children, and good girls still courted through grilled windows; the young man wasn't allowed inside until he had declared. What if what I now saw broke my heart? We all knew the culture minutely; we had such a strong sense of identification with a country completely different from our own, and I was so young then, yet, never afraid of anything—not of living alone in a barrio considered rough, not of the rigid power structure that I believed kept my poverty stricken neighbors locked in a dead-end destiny, and certainly not of the Peace Corps rules and regulations. The arrogance of youth—just leave us alone to do our work.

About a month before I was due to arrive, I wrote to the Señora Directora of the school at Aguas Frias and had an old friend who lived in the city deliver it for me. She could get there by jeep, my friend reported—the road was now paved and a horse was no longer required.

I didn't even recognize my old barrio, Las Violetas. Where once you had to cross a creek with water coming halfway up the bus's wheels to enter, today the creek is gone and the barrio, even more teeming with people and cars—cars!—looks not poor anymore but typical of a Colombian blue-collar neighborhood—an extension of a more prosperous area that used to be a few miles away.

As we climbed the road it was reassuring to see the towering Andes flanking us. The higher we climbed, the calmer I felt. At least the dark green mountains hadn't changed. And then we turned a curve and the day became magical. Two smiling, scrubbed little school boys in brand new uniforms were out on the road to greet me waving paper Colombian flags.

We parked below and they ran ahead to lead me up the steep steps (another innovation) to the carved-out side of the mountain where we had built the school. "Here she comes!" they cried. At the top of the steps, in tears and hiding her face in her skirt, was my kind neighbor from across the street in the barrio, Doña Mariela—mother of fifteen, grandmother of forty, now widowed, now living close to the school. I too began to cry as I hugged her, the first of many tears that day.

The school looked fantastic. A second story had been added, hanging pots of tropical flowers were suspended from the upper corridor, and just below on the front wall was a big metal sign donated by a local soft drink company that said Escuela Marina Orth. Next to it hung a second, hand lettered sign: "Welcome Home." Instead of the 35 students in two classrooms that I knew of in the sixties, there were now 120 children in grades one through five. I was amazed and unprepared for the six-hour homage to come.

Slowly and shyly, men and women I had known and worked with came from around corners and behind pillars to greet me. They brought me lemons from their garden. They told me of births and deaths and invited me to their houses. I was most thrilled to hear that some children from the school had gone on to the university and were now professionals working in Medellin, a nearly inconceivable dream when we began. They exclaimed at and eagerly grabbed pictures of my family that I had brought to show them.

Then I saw Luis Eduardo, the humble, soft-spoken president of the vereda's community action junta and really the co-founder of the school as well. A portrait of us taken together nearly thirty years ago, now tattered, was brought out for our inspection. How many times Luis Eduardo and I had ridden to town together to knock on doors in the city government to beg for bricks and mortar. He was so quietly persistent that he had been hired by the city of Medellin to work in its office of school construction, a big step up for his family.

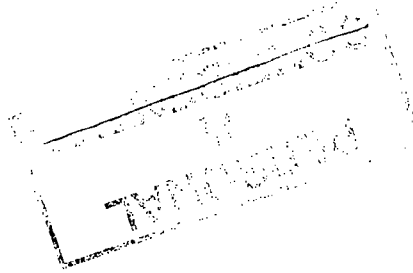

The children, shined up bright, were taking their places outside to raise the flag and sing for me the Colombian and Antioqueñan anthems. The principal presented me with a beautiful homegrown arrangement of orchids, lilies and roses, and gave me a formal speech of introduction. With the children standing at attention, she announced a twelve-act program in my honor to be followed by a lunch, a serenade, a toast, and a mass!

I was standing but I felt I should sit. The moment was surreal. It seemed that I could almost touch the other side of the mountain. The populous valley of Medellin was spread out below and I was surrounded by these beautiful children honoring me in a school that bore my name. Was I really in this exotic place on this cool sunny Friday morning so far away from the rest of my life? I missed my family and wished they could share this with me. Nevertheless, I felt completely at home.

At the end, mass in this setting was simple and moving, celebrated by a young priest in white vestments on a makeshift outdoor altar in front of the school.

The mass to me was the most important part of the day. The people's faith remains strong and as a Catholic myself I felt a special bond in sharing it with them, in having the children come up to touch my hand to wish me peace, and to take communion with them.

I tried to make my fifth speech of thanks and told the congregation that the whole idea of the Peace Corps was to plant the seed so that the community could go on as they had. This was my real thanks—that they had persevered. As I turned to go I realized that at least once in my life, when I was young, enthusiastic and just doing my job, I actually accomplished something that my country and my family could be proud of. And twice in my life, the Peace Corps and the people of Colombia had given me more than I could have ever imagined.

January 15, 1996

Dear Mrs. Clinton,

This overdue note is to thank you and the President for the great honor you paid to my father in Derry during the Presidential visit to Northern Ireland. The President was so generous in his remarks -- the entire O'Neill family is most grateful. The American Ireland Fund made a video of the event and provided us with a copy. We were able to show it to my mother and my aunt on Christmas day. They were of course thrilled with the Clintons' tribute to my father.

I also wish to thank you for your wonderful meeting with Joyce McCarten and the other women at the Women's Drop In Center in Belfast. I was able to catch a small snip-it of the meeting in the evening TV news after you and the President returned to Belfast. I think that that meeting, along with the President's meetings in Belfast that morning, were some of the most important events of the trip. The fact that that session was held just six weeks before Joyce died of a collapsed lung is most moving. I do not know if there will be any follow-up after that session, but if there is, I would be honored to assist with it.]

The glow of the President's and your visit to Ireland stayed with me right through the Christmas holidays. I can't tell you how much it meant to the people of the island of Ireland for you to be there. It is so hurtful to think that you are being maligned by the likes of Alphonse D'Amato and William Safire. I know however that you will take heart and I am confident that in the next few weeks you will disarm your critics and show them for what they are.

Again, please accept my thanks and my very best wishes to you and the President.

Sincerely,

Thank you for your recent letters. As always, your continuing support and encouragement mean more than I can say. I am glad to know you enjoyed your Christmas visit to the White House and I appreciate your kind comments about our holiday photograph.

As you requested, I will share your most recent letter with the President. He will continue to stand firm for meaningful welfare reform that does not jeopardize those most in need, and a balanced budget that is good for the economy, but does not raise taxes on working families and will protect Medicare, Medicaid, the environment and our investment in education.

It was good to hear from you. I am grateful for your own efforts to bring change with equity to our nation.

Sincerely yours,

Hillary Rodham Clinton

Hillary Rodham Clinton
First Lady of the United States
The White House

Dear Mrs. Clinton,

Happy New Year!! . If anyone deserves a better New Year, it is you and the President. Few have been subject to the pressures that you two have had to endure.

Before getting into the message of this letter, I want to tell you how very much the NETWORK staff enjoyed the Christmas tour of the White House. It was a delight!. The staff of the Office of Public Liaison were wonderful hostesses and hosts.

Incidentally, I hope that next year you use the picture of the First Family which was on the inside cover of the tour book for a Christmas card. It was beautiful. Chelsea is becoming a very attractive young woman.

Is it possible for you to relay this letter to the President? I spend most of my time being concerned about his decisions and his penchant for compromise, even though I realize that consensus building is one of the five marks of leadership. But such consensus must not sacrifice principles.

When the President stated that he would not back down from the principles he outlined for the budget, there was a genuine upsurge of hope and support among those who see the budget as a statement of the nation's moral and ethical priorities, interreligious groups in particular. The GOP Budget meets none of the criteria for justice and equity. It is mainly the work of a group of zealots who have little economic expertise, little vision for the nation based on people and the common good and, little experience with political life.

I know that the pull toward compromise must be strong. But if the President compromises on the principles he enunciated, he will not be able to retrieve the consequent loss of stature in the coming year. I say that without equivocation. This morning's news that he would back down on the capital gains tax cut sent up the usual signals of "See he is backing down."

I think I know the leanings of a large part of the interreligious constituency and especially of women religious in this country. I cannot overestimate their concern that he stand firm on the principles he enunciated weeks ago. For the first time, we and other public interest groups who lobby on the budget and welfare saw some unifying dynamics between the Congressional Democrats and the White House. The Dems were lauding the President. Such unity is critical now! There has been a dirth of unified leadership.

Maybe you can't deliver this. I hope you can. It comes from someone who sees you both as providing a moral compass for the nation. From my perspective, the President has all the qualities of a great leader, but he has a weakness, the penchant to please rather than stand firm. This could be detrimental not only to his greatness, but to the future of the nation.

One year from today, we will be approaching an inauguration. I want it to be that of President Clinton, but only if he can keep that moral compass staunchly directed. The members of Congress who are pressuring him should not be allowed to prevail.

I appreciate being able to share my concerns with you, Mrs Clinton. You are indeed one of the joys and hopes of this nation. I can only imagine the traumas of your role, but you carry it off with such grace and charm.

Sincerely,

First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton
The White House
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue NW
Washington, D.C. 20500

Dear Mrs. Clinton,

HAPPY, HAPPY BIRTHDAY. No one deserves one more than you. You have done and are continually doing so much to make this world a better place. You are in my thoughts and prayers.

I have started several letters to you in recent months, especially after your spectacular performance in Beijing. I was so proud of you and grateful that the political pundits were proven wrong about the advisability of your attendance. Several of my friends who participated were delighted with your presence.

Since then the reports of your presentations across the country have been most favorable. It seems, however, that you must go abroad to have the U.S. media pay attention to your wisdom. Unless one is fortunate enough to have friends who are privileged to be invited to events at which you speak, little is reported, undoubtedly by design.

But do know that you are admired, loved and appreciated by so many of us. At our Motherhouse in Cleveland, you are a household word. Now to the reasons for this letter:

I have asked Melanne to give you three items, one for you and two for the President.

The communication for you is a treatise on Social Security. It is the dissertation of a young woman whom I met while keynoting a welfare reform conference for Partnership for Hope in San Antonio. She gave a presentation at that conference on children and their thinking.

We seemed to become fast friends that day. In a follow-up conversation, she spoke of the topic of her dissertation and asked me to read it. I recalled at the time that I had heard that you were giving attention to the whole issue of Social Security.

Consequently, when her complete dissertation arrived, I called to ask if she would like to share it with you. She was ecstatic at such a possibility, but had to check with the publishers who gave an enthusiastic affirmation.

I hope that I didn't presume too much. But it is a topic which will become more important in the President's next term. How do you like that? Please use it as you see fit.

The missives for the President are two. One is from the leadership of the Sisters of Mercy, a copy of which was sent through regular channels. The Mercies are about 8000 in number, their justice offices connected on a daily basis with NETWORK. They wanted their message to get directly to the President. Please help me out.

The other is a letter from myself to the President. (He must be sick of hearing from me.) BUT I AM CONCERNED!!!

First, I believe firmly in him and in his ability to lead the nation. BUT, he cannot compromise on previous positions.

I and countless others who support him felt personally betrayed by the backtracking on the FY 1993 Budget Resolution. We worked like dogs to get that legislation passed. On the night of House passage, we literally coaxed Democrats from their offices and from the chamber to challenge them to vote with him. I honestly couldn't believe my ears when I heard the statement that the tax on upper-income people was a mistake.

Is there someone misguiding him? The "zealots" who control Congress, especially the House, are not worthy of compromise. I know that the President doesn't want divisions between the parties. He thinks it is bad for the nation. That is admirable.

I am confident he will not compromise on the Reconciliation Bill. Compromise in this case means giving into a single-minded goal of balancing a budget in seven years while augmenting the nation's social deficit in ways we cannot even imagine.

Our members, many of whom own, sponsor or minister within health care, social services and other agencies are terrified at what may be the aftermath of the welfare reform and FY 1996 Budget Reconciliation bill. People everywhere are grieving!! even when they don't understand the fine print.

That in essence is what I share in my letter to the President. We need him to stand tall and not backtrack. He has the potential to be historically a great President. His speech on the race issue was absolutely superb, a platform for real leadership on the issue.

But, he cannot let his penchant for building consensus operate when the operatives in the process are not guided by his values and faith. It is compromising on quicksand.

Please forgive my boldness. So many of us are moved to the breaking point these days. Among the lobbyists with whom I work and the organizations with which we are in coalition, there is deep support for the President, but there is also worry about being betrayed.

Personally, I think both of you are among the finest people I know. We as a nation are blest to have both of you in the White House. We don't want to lose you amid the highly conflictive and often non-principled debate which rages around Capitol Hill, in the media and elsewhere.

We want America to look at Bill Clinton and say, "He stands for justice, equity and concern for the common good."

I will probably never again get an invite to the White House. But, if that be the case, know that my heart is in the right place.

Keep up your courage; you are one in a trillion. (We have past the meaning of millions in this nation.)

With great admiration,

Dear Mrs. Clinton:

It was great to see you again so soon after such a wonderful experience as last Friday's taping with the children and their parents. Your remarks today at the White House briefing for advocates of better quality children's television were truly cause to celebrate. It reminds us of how personally satisfying it is to successfully champion for the rights of children. Your lifetime of dedication to improving the quality of life of our nation's children and the leadership of the President, Vice President, and Mrs. Gore on the issue of television violence in particular give us cause to celebrate the extraordinary legislative accomplishments we have seen take place under this administration on the behalf of children.

Thank you again for your warm and kind words today as we chatted. I hope that you will call on me again if ever I can be of assistance to you or the President.

With best wishes I remain,

I was gratified to see the enthusiastic response of the sell-out crowd to your appearance.

I believe that, by their standing ovation and sustained applause, the audience was telling you that they know that you are being treated unfairly and that they stand behind you. Dear Melanne Verveer:

My friend and high school classmate, Lucy Durr Hackney, has suggested that I send Mrs. Clinton a copy of my book, Sweet Mystery: A Book of Remembering, which has just been published by Farrar, Straus & Giroux. It is about growing up in a loving but troubled Alabama family and includes a look at the complexity of Southern racial history. But it is because of Mrs. Clinton's commitment to children's issues--as well as the alcoholism in her husband's family--that I think she will be interested in Sweet Mystery.

Thank you for your recent letter and very thoughtful postscript. I appreciate your reinforcing Norm Dicks's suggestion of a White House event honoring Dale Chilhuly. As you know, I admire his work greatly, however, constraints created by an already busy social schedule and campaign and foreign travel made it impossible to arrange. Ann Stock, our Social Secretary, has already been in touch with Congressman Dicks to explain.

I hope my letter finds Gwen well and I appreciate the time we all spent together last fall. Stay in touch.

Dear Hillary:

Gwen and I enjoyed our visit with the President and you in the historic surroundings of the Map Room and amidst the excitement of a papal visit last October. I had planned our trip East a year ago as an incentive and a treat for Gwen when she began six months of chemotherapy and radiation therapy following surgery for a rare and aggressive cancer. The trip fulfilled those purposes beautifully, but the unexpected White House visit was, without question, the highlight for Gwen--and for me. It was kind of you to find time for us, and I am most grateful.

Now, I shall push my luck a bit and urge yet more work upon you.

7 Norm Dicks tells me that he has asked you to consider a White House dinner to honor Dale Chihuly. I do hope you can find the time and energy to pursue Norm's very exciting suggestion.

When you were a student at Wellesley, we were all still basking in memories of the Kennedy years. President and Mrs. Kennedy had had a transforming impact on our sense of ourselves as a nation, especially as a young, but increasingly significant world leader, through the personal attention which they gave to the arts. The spotlight which they focused so directly upon, individual achievement by living American artists through the "visual" power of the White House, gave everyone--at home and abroad--a sharp and much needed reminder that brash, uncouth American was fast becoming, not merely a world political leader, but a leader in the creative arts, as well.

Today, Dale Chihuly is probably having a greater impact on the world of art than any other living American. His medium is an ancient one, but he has, quite simply, transformed the very nature of that art form and made it wholly new and infinitely richer. And he has done so increasingly as the leader of what has become an international movement in the medium.

The culmination of this whole development in glass art will come next fall in Venice. Chandeliers which Dale and artists in Italy, Finland, the Czech Republic, Ireland, Japan, Mexico and the United States have created will be hung over the canals of Venice in September.

Hillary Rodham Clinton
February 9, 1996
Page Two

The White House dinner which Norm has recommended would be a singular tribute to an American artist who has had a singular impact on his art form at the very moment when the international impact of his work would be most vividly and visually evident.

I hope you can! Thank you.

Very Best Wishes,

Philip M. Phibbs

Dear Hillary,

So many individual Americans admire you!- for your perseverance, courage and intelligence, and for your ability to keep your chin up even when the opposition takes so many unfair swings at it.

When I had a consultant staff of over one hundred professionals, a principal's billing time of two percent barely represented supervision of invoicing accuracy for a client account and only the billing of at least the minimum thirteen-percent threshold was considered active management direction. Law firms manage time sheet control in much the same fashion.

There are millions of small business service companies and law firms in America that know this. It seems to me that your staff should identify several of their organizations to stand up to the plate and bring some credible third party input into this fray to assist your cause.

Secondly, we should be able to find a respected voice to explain that a faithful but inexperienced subordinate can turn a simple request for a rapid solution into a royal ordinance. Anyway, Charles I made sense when he said, "Never make a defense or apology before you be accused." But some third party oblique action can't hurt!

I wish I could help more but I'm too far from the front line trenches on this one, much to my regret.

Dear Hillary,

Just a note to tell you and Mr President how sorry Walter and I are about all of the terrible troubles - especially the tragic events of this past week.

If there is anything we or I can do, please let me know. But in the meantime, both of you please take courage in the knowledge that you are doing the right things for the right reasons - you are moving this country forward and the people in the right direction.

Please keep faith in yourselves and in your dedication. And please know that there are many of us who support you and care about you in this dark hour.

Love,

Dear Mrs. Clinton:

I am now working as a Staff Attorney at Western Arkansas Legal Services. I enjoyed my stint in broadcast news, and even did some live work on the air; however, I could not pass up this position. I was very pleased to read in your column about your role in bringing Legal Services to Arkansas. The constant efforts by some to eliminate Legal Services is disheartening and the caseload is overwhelming; nevertheless, I am really enjoying the position because we help people who have no other place to turn.

I wish both you and the President luck in the upcoming campaign. I am enclosing an updated resume for consideration in the President's second term, should a suitable position arise. If I can be of any service in the campaign or in preserving Legal Services, please do not hesitate to contact me.

With best regards, I am

Sincerely yours,
