CED

THE CED MISSION

The Committee for Economic Development has a special mission that no other business-related organization performs. At CED, business leaders actively engage in the policy process by combining their practical, day-to-day experience with the findings of objective research. Volunteering their time, CED's trustees meet with distinguished academic and business experts to develop statements on national policy. Only the trustees have the final say on CED's policy recommendations.

250 trustees — mostly board chairmen, corporate presidents, and university presidents — make up this independent, nonprofit, and nonpartisan research and education organization. The trustees serve independently of their business and professional affiliations. CED itself represents no industry group or special constituency, and it is financed by voluntary contributions from businesses, foundations, and individuals.

Since 1942, CED has been an active forum for the exchange of ideas for policy development on many of the most difficult and controversial issues facing the nation. Today, CED continues to reflect the best thinking of the business world, infusing a responsible and valuable perspective into the public dialogue.
