THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

October 2, 1995

Dear Benjamin:

Thank you for your letter concerning Kim Sun Myung and other Korean prisoners mentioned in a recent New York Times article.

While we did not intercede specifically on behalf of Mr. Kim or the other 24 prisoners, we have regularly expressed our concern over prison conditions, torture and sentences handed down by previous South Korean administrations. We raise these concerns in our annual State Department human rights reports as well as in bilaterals.

The Kim case notwithstanding, the Republic of Korea has made considerable progress in democratization and human rights in recent years. Nonetheless, we will continue to voice our concerns over these issues and push the South Koreans toward compliance with international human rights standards.

Sincerely,

Anthony Lake

MEMORANDUM FOR TONY LAKE

THROUGH: MORTON H. HALPERIN mt
FROM: MATTHEW LORIN ml
SUBJECT: Response to Letter from Benji Pogrund re: South
Korean Prisoners

Attached at Tab I is your letter responding to Benjamin Pogrund's correspondence to you concerning Kim Sun Myung and the fate of 24 other prisoners in South Korea.

In his letter Benji Pogrund emphasizes his concern over the length of internment for political prisoners in South Korea. He is particularly concerned that the United States has not been more outspoken with South Korea on the Kim Sun Myung case as well as the other 24 cases reported in the August 20, NYT.

In your response, you acknowledge that the United States did not intervene in this case. You remark that conditions for South Korean political prisoners have significantly improved in the past few years; that we continue to point out these issues in our annual human rights report; and, that we will continue to raise this concerns at the highest levels.

Dear Tony,

I hope you will not mind my writing to you, particularly at this time when you are burdened by Bosnia. But I am sending you a clipping from Sunday's New York Times about Kim Sun Myung because it raises a disturbing set of questions: Surely the United States Government knew about Kim Sun Myung's continuing imprisonment? Surely Washington has considerable power of persuasion in regard to the South Korean government and could have pushed for Kim's release? What did the US do over the years to secure his release? And what of the other 24 who are said to be still in prison after more than two decades?

Anyone who gives such unflinching support to North Korea is clearly a strange person. But to be locked up for so long is an obscene punishment and I am astonished that the South Korean Government got away with it for so long, and is still doing the same to others.

I am not arguing that the US should be the policeman of the world. But Kim's case is so way out that it should have cried for attention.

Yours sincerely,

Benjamin Pogrund

Free in Seoul After 44 Years, and Still Defiant

By NICHOLAS D. KRISTOF

SEOUL, South Korea, Aug. 19 — It was in the middle of a war in an impoverished peasant country that Prisoner No. 3597 was first arrested, tortured and locked up in a closet-sized cell.

This week Prisoner No. 3597 was finally freed, exactly 43 years and 10 months from the day he was imprisoned, after earning the unhappy status of the world's longest-serving known political prisoner. He recovered his old name, Kim Sun Myung, and faced a changed world.

"I've never seen a bottle like this before," a bewildered Mr. Kim said as he inspected an ordinary plastic water bottle, something that did not exist in Korea when he was arrested in 1951 during the Korean War. He said that until this week he had never seen a television or used a flush toilet.

A small lean man — a result of prison starvation diets — the 70-year-old Mr. Kim may not be worldly but he is nothing if not constant. He could have been released decades ago if he had just agreed to abandon his support for Communist North Korea. But through beatings and threats of execution, even when he watched fellow prisoners die under torture, Mr. Kim refused to give in.

"They say that when you hammer steel, it only gets harder," he said, looking a bit awkward in a brand-new white shirt, the first time in four decades he has worn clothes other than a prison uniform. "Well, when you hit people, you just turn them into enemies, and they become stronger."

Yet Mr. Kim's courage seems especially poignant because of how the world has changed from under him, as if to mock his persistence and idealism.

South Korea, impoverished and dictatorial when it imprisoned Mr. Kim in the 1950's, is now a prosperous democracy with another former political prisoner as its elected President. North Korea, which once loomed as the great economic and social hope to many Korean nationalists like Mr. Kim, today stagnates in poverty and military dictatorship.

Imprisoned in solitary confinement, denied access to news of the cataclysmic changes in the Communist world, losing his vocabulary because he was given nothing to read and no opportunity to speak, going blind from cataracts that prison doctors did not treat, Mr. Kim was stuck in a frozen 1951 version of reality. He remained loyal to a totalitarian re-game in North Korea that initially scored economic and social gains but that in the decades after his imprisonment came to be regarded by the world as economically disastrous and politically brutal.

If Mr. Kim's jailers wanted to break him, they might have been more successful if they had halted the beatings and simply sent Mr. Kim for a visit to North Korea.

To be sure, since his release from prison on Tuesday Mr. Kim has not had any crisis of faith. In nearly four hours of conversation, at an appearance before South Korean reporters, in a car winding through the traffic jams of Seoul, and in the new home he shares with four other former political prisoners, Mr. Kim was not overawed by the highways and skyscrapers around him.

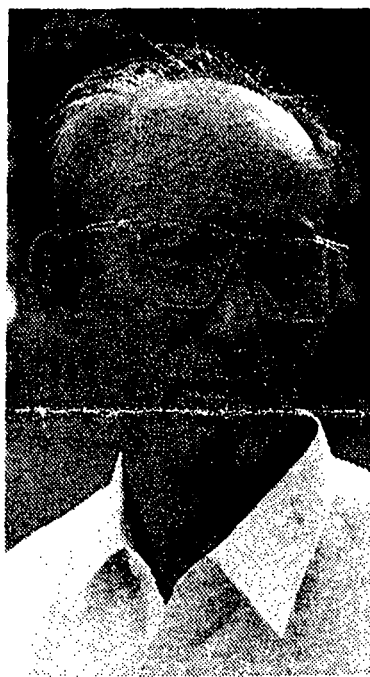

"It's changed so much that I don't recognize any of it," he said, as he was driven through the capital. "But this kind of thing doesn't impress me, because there are still a lot of poor people. These tall buildings are the labor of poor people. Did you ever see any rich people digging on a construction site? The fight against poverty goes on."

Mr. Kim was released conditionally from prison, and he said he had been ordered not to speak to reporters, at the risk of even more years behind bars. But as he spoke to a Westerner for the first time since interrogation by an American intelligence officer during the Korean War, he made it clear that he was not intimidated.

A fierce Korean nationalist, Mr. Kim was repelled after World War II by the way South Korea allowed pro-Japanese collaborators to come back and regain authority. So even though Mr. Kim's family was from the south, he joined the northern army when the Korean War began in 1950. The North Korean leadership was then seen by many idealistic Koreans as the true nationalist government that could unite and enrich the nation.

United Nations forces captured Mr. Kim on Oct. 15, 1951, and South Korea eventually sentenced him to death for espionage, a charge that he denies. The sentence was later commuted to life imprisonment.

As Mr. Kim related his story, he choked several times as he told of friends who had been beaten to death in prison. He lost his composure entirely when he was asked about his father and sister. The South Korean army executed them as a way of punishing Mr. Kim for having joined struggling to control himself, "when- ever I think of this." And then he broke down and bent over and sobbed, pulling out a red handkerchief to wipe away tears that welled underneath his glasses.

Mr. Kim's immediate family members, harassed and threatened by the South Korean Government, never visited him in prison. His surviving brothers and sisters declared Mr. Kim legally dead in 1975, and Mr. Kim's 93-year-old mother still thinks that he died two decades ago.

"My mother is so old that I'm afraid that if I just walk in, she'll have a heart attack," said Mr. Kim, who speaks lovingly of his mother and is puzzling over how to reconcile with his other family members. "So my family will gradually explain the situation to her, and then I'll visit her."

Partly because of the memory of what happened to his father and sister, Mr. Kim's main emotion upon being freed seems to be not euphoria but guilt.

"When I lie down at night, I can't sleep," he said. "I think of all these

The worst moments, he said, come when he is eating. He thinks back to the 1970's when the authorities began a campaign to force the political prisoners to denounce North Korea. Their methods were beatings and starvation.

"The guards would show me food, like a soup full of meat," Mr. Kim recounted. "And then they would just give me broth for dinner. They would say, 'If you want food, you better change your beliefs.'"

Other former political prisoners say that dissidents could resist such overwhelming pressures because of their conviction in their beliefs, the inspiration of those who had been tortured by Japanese occupiers early in the century and become national heroes, and the knowledge that resistance at least offered a strand of self-respect in an environment so devoid of dignity that prisoners were expected to wash themselves with their own urine.

"The only way these guys could sustain themselves was that resistance was their way of confirming that they were human beings," said Kwon Nak Ki, a former political prisoner in South Korea.

Mr. Kim said that conditions in prison have improved substantially, but he did not sound very enthusiastic about the present democratic Government. President Kim Young Sam released Mr. Kim as part of a "grand reconciliation" that also freed a North Korean sympathizer who had spent 42 years in prison and another who had been jailed for 38 years.

The Government continues to hold 24 North Korean sympathizers who have been in prison for more than two decades.

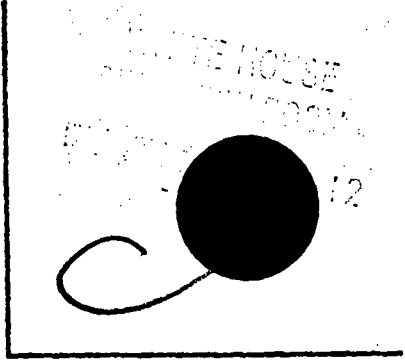

It is not clear whether the Government will release more of these people, or whether it will order the re-arrest of Kim Sun Myung if he continues to speak out. The Government would like to be regarded as democratic and is embarrassed at imprisoning people for political views, but many conservative South Koreans argue that their country cannot tolerate the risk of anyone who speaks in favor of the archenemy to the north.

Mr. Kim's guide to the 1990's is Kim Suk Hyun, an 82-year-old man who was released from prison three years ago after serving 32 years for refusing to renounce North Korea. They held hands as they rode in the car, and Kim Suk Hyun patiently showed his friend — whom he had occasionally met in prison during exercise breaks — how to turn on a television and make a telephone call.

"I'll tell Mr. Kim that the system isn't entirely bad," Kim Suk Hyun said. "I'll tell him that the system is

Dear Mr. President:

On the occasion of the signing of the historic peace accord between the State of Israel and the Palestinian Liberation Organization, I wish to express to you, Mr. President, my most sincere admiration for the invaluable role that you have played in making this event possible.

I am confident that this accord will be a major step toward the comprehensive solution of the problems in the Middle East and will also pave the way for permanent peace and stability in the region and contribute greatly to world peace.

Sincerely,
