Dear Mr. Biddy:

On behalf of President Ford, thank you for your letter concerning a national commitment toward better understanding among the peoples of the nation.

I am sure you know, the President has often spoken of the need to make our country greater in all aspects of life. The basic factors, to which you refer, are an integral part of any future understanding and aim. I can assure you, the President will continue to work for such human betterments.

Your interest is greatly appreciated.

Sincerely,

Milton E. Mitler

From this day fourth, the American people will be celebrating all sorts of bicentennial festivities, which will take place throughout our nation, until the final day arrives, which will be the Fourth of July of Nineteen hundred and Seventy Six. Our 200th Anniversary.

Since various American groups are busy at present, with their bicentennial speeches, projects, etc., I'm just wondering how many of the American people will make a bicentennial commitment to better serve their community, state and nation?

There could be no greater challenge, no task more worthy of our best efforts to try and overcome racism, brutality, greed and corruption which is a great threat to our way of life at present.

Our children's whole future, will depend upon our best efforts.

What is your bicentennial commitment to better serve the people of this nation?

Sincerely,
Randall Biddy
