QUESTIONS

The interviewers have agreed on a general range of questions, divided between the economic issues of Versailles and the security issues of Bonn. While exact wording of the questions has not been provided, the subjects to be raised will come from the following:

Economic

This is the same group of leaders with whom you met at Ottawa. You asked them to give your economic program a chance. Their concern with the impact of the U.S. economy on their own economies has deepened since Ottawa. What have you achieved since last summer when you told them your program would bring recovery and lower interest rates? What has gone wrong in your predictions for a quicker recovery? What are your expectations now for the economy? What about high interest rates and their negative impact on the European economies? How will you get unemployment down?

How should the summit deal with exchange rates?

What do you expect to be achieved at the economic summit? Are tangible results ever possible from such meetings?

What followup from Ottawa and Cancun will there be for the LDCs and "global negotiations" -- two areas where the U.S. is perceived to have different views than the allies?

The Presidency appears on paper to be one of the world's most powerful positions. In practice what can you achieve? You came into office determined to make significant changes, to lead what some called the Reagan revolution. What have you been able to accomplish here and abroad? In what areas have you achieved less than you desired? Have you been able to improve the morale and spirit of the American people? How do you evaluate the spirit of the Western democracies?

East-West?

Last year at Ottawa, the U.S. made its position clear on the pipeline and your concern over dependency on the Soviets as an energy source. What is your position now on the pipeline and have you had any success convincing the Europeans to accept your view? Given the economic ties between Western Europe and the East, how much progress do you expect to make on the East-West credits issue at Versailles?

How do you view the NATO alliance? Is it in crisis? Are the Europeans doing enough for defense? Are you dissatisfied with their contribution? If they won't do more, would you be sympathetic to congressional calls for withdrawing some of our troops? Should NATO be willing to work together outside Europe -- in the Persian Gulf, for instance?

Have the allies done what you felt was necessary on Poland? How do you view the situation in Poland?

Do you feel your INF and START proposals have put the lid on the peace movement?

You have agreed to START talks even though there has been no change in the Afghanistan or Polish situation. What happened to your belief in linkage?

How do you feel about the strong Italian commitment to modernization (INF deployment)? Do you feel that process must be completed or could negotiations succeed first?

What do you expect out of the Bonn summit?

NOTE: Supplementary briefing material will be provided tomorrow.
